The copy filmed here has been reproduced thanks to the generosity of:

Library of the Public Archives of Canada

The images appearing here are the best quality possible considering the condition and legibility of the original copy and in keeping with the filming contract specifications.

Original copies in printed paper covers are filmed beginning with the front cover and ending on the last page with a printed or illustrated impression, or the back cover when appropriate. All other original copies are filmed beginning on the first page with a printed or illustrated impression, and ending on the last page with a printed or illustrated impression.

The last recorded frame on each microfiche shall contain the symbol → (meaning "CONTINUED"), or the symbol ▼ (meaning "END"), whichever applies.

Maps, plates, charts, etc., may be filmed at different reduction ratios. Those too large to be entirely included in one exposure are filmed beginning in the upper left hand corner, left to right and top to bottom, as many frames as required. The following diagrams illustrate the method:

L'exemplaire filmé fut reproduit grâce à la générosité de:

Les images suivantes ont été reproduites avec le plus grand soin, compte tenu de la condition et de la netteté de l'exemplaire filmé, et en conformité avec les conditions du contrat de filmage.

Les exemplaires originaux dont la couverture en papier est imprimée sont filmés en commençant par le premier plat et en terminant soit par la dernière page qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou d'illustration, soit par le second plat, selon le car. Tous les autres exemplaires originaux sont filmés en commençant par la première page qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou d'illustration et en terminant par la dernière page qui comporte une telle empreinte.

Les cartes, planches, tableaux, etc., peuvent être filmés à des taux de réduction différents.
Lorsque le document est trop grand pour être reproduit en un seul cliché, il est filmé à partir de l'angle supérieur gauche, de gauche à droite, et de haut en bas, en prenant le nombre d'images nécessaire. Les diagrammes sulvants illustrent la méthode.

The Best and Rarest History of the French and Indian War.

Mente (Thomas.). History of the Late War in North America, and the Islands of the West Indies, including the Campaigns of 1763 and 1764, against His Majesty's Indien Enemies. With 18 fine large folding War Maps. Quarto, orig. calf, neatly retacked, London, 1772.

A very fine and large copy of this extremely rare work, containing all the finely engraved folding maps and plans and the very scarce leaf of errate at the end. But few copies were printed, though the large and beautiful plans and military maps must have made its production a work of much expense. A copy sold at anction March 6, 1919, for $405.00; the DePuy copy sold Jan. 27, 1920 for $400.00; and the Severance copy, Nov. 15, 1922, for $375.00.

It is one of the most valuable histories of the time, highly praised by Bencroft and Sparks. Mante was Major of Brigade in the French and Indian War. He describes with great detail the campaigns of Washington and Braddock; of Generals Abercrombie and Amherst, and of Colonels Bradstreet and Boquet. The last chapter gives the principal incidents of Pontiac's War. The introduction gives en account of Washington's escape from assassination in December, 1753.

To give an idea of the value of the material we quote a part of the Table of Contents.

Mr. Washington takes the field; defeats M. Jumonville; is defeated in his turn by M. Villier. - Major General Braddock arrives; is defeated by M. Dumat and dies of his wounds; defence of his conduct. - Gen. Shirley proceeds to Oswago; returns to Albany. - Maj. -Gen. RO-

BY the treaty of Utrecht, confirmed by that of Aix-la-Chapelle, the boundaries of the French and English possessions in North America were so vaguely settled, as to allow the court of France new pretexts for extending her dominion in that part of the world, and to make such attempts to encroach upon the English territories, as would in time totally exclude them from so vast a continent. Accordingly, the French, with this view, determined to erect a chain of forts on the back settlements of the English, from the river St. Lawrence to the Mississip; they pursued, with incessant ardour, every method to ingratiate themselves with the natives, and effectually win them over to their interest, whilst the mother-country liberally contributed all the supplies requisite to carry into execution these grand, however unfair, designs.

Representations against such proceedings were not neglected by the English. Memorials were delivered to the French ministry; and these produced the appointment of commissioners, who met at Paris, and opened their respective commissions on the 21st of September 1750. M. de la Galissioniere and M. de Silhouette were chosen on the part of France; and Mr. Shirley and Mr. Mildmay on that of Great Britain. The design of the court of London, in agreeing to this measure, was amicably to fettle the true limits of the French and English territories in North America; but it soon appeared, it was by no means that of the court of Versailles. In proportion as the English commissioners advanced in their inquiries, such stutile objections were started, and such unnecessary delays contrived, by the French, as obliged Mr. Shirley and Mr. Midmay to break up the conferences and return to England.

In the mean time, the French continued to erect forts on the western frontiers of Virginia, which lie upon the Ohio; nor were they less attentive to what seemed to be another grand plan, that of encroaching upon fuch parts of the northern colonies of the English as were actually inhabited. M. du Quesne, who fucceeded M. de la Galissioniere in the government of Canada, having received instructions to take possession of the countries on the Ohio for the crown of France, in the beginning of the year 1753, ordered the Sieur de St. Pierre with a detachment to take post on the river aux Bœufs, and there to remain until he received farther orders. De St. Pierre took post there accordingly, and erected a fort for it's fecurity. Of this Mr. Dinwiddie, lieutenant-governor of Virginia, had early intelligence; which was confirmed by a messenger he had dispatched to explore the encroachments of the French, and reconnoitre their fituation. This messenger reported, that the French had fifteen hundred regular troops in those parts; that they had built three forts on the frontiers; that, as they had not met with any opposition, they were resolved to maintain their ground: to which he added, that, unless the English likewise pursued vigorous measures, and built forts on the river Mississipi, the French would, in a short time, fortify themselves there soeffectually, as to make it impossible to expel them. alarming alarming advice induced Governor Dinwiddie to fend, by Mr. Washington, the following spirited letter to the French commandant on the river aux Bœuss:

SIR,

THE lands upon the river Ohio, in the western parts of the colony of Virginia, are so notoriously known to be the property of the crown of Great Britain, that it is a matter of equal concern and furprize to me, to hear that a body of French forces are erecting fortresses and making settlements upon that river, within his Majesty's dominions. The many and repeated complaints I have received of these acts of hostility, lay me under the necessity of fending, in the name of the king my master, the bearer hereof, George Washington, Esq; one of the adjutants-general of the forces of this dominion, to complain to you of the encroachments thus made, and of the injuries done to the subjects of Great Britain, in violation of the law of nations, and the treaties now sublisting between the two crowns. If these are facts, and you think fit to justify your proceedings, I must defire you to acquaint me, by whose authority and instructions, you have lately marched from Canada with an armed force, and invaded the king of Great Britain's territories, in the manner complained of; that, according to the purport and resolution of your anfwer, I may act agreeably to the commission I am honoured with, from the king my master. However, Sir, in obedience to my instructions, it becomes my duty to require your peaceable departure; and that you would forbear profecuting a purpose so interruptive of the harmony and good understanding which his majesty is desirous to continue and cultivate with the most Christian king. I am, &c.

With this letter, Mr. Washington received instructions to procure all the intelligence he possibly could of the situation of the French, and the encroachments they had made. It was late in the feafon, namely, the 22d of November, before he could reach the Monangahela; on his arrival there, he found that the French troops had retired into winter-quarters. Three days after, however, he met fome French deserters, who informed him, that they were part of an hundred men who had been fent with eight canoes laden with provisions from New Orleans to Kuskaskas, with a promise of being there joined by a party from the Mississipi to convoy them up the river; that the French had built four small forts between New Orleans and the Black Islands, and garrisoned them with thirty or forty men; that, at New Orleans, near the mouth of the Mississipi, there were thirty-five companies of forty men each, with a fort of fix carriage guns; and, at Black Islands, feveral companies, and a fort of eight guns. They also acquainted him, that there was a small palisadoed fort on the Ohio, at the mouth of the Ouabach. An Indian trader, who accompanied these deferters, added, that, at Shanaoh town, he had feen a Sachem of the Six Nations, from whom he had learned, that a fort had been erected on Lake Erie; and another, on a small lake about fifteen miles distant, with a good road between them; that three Indian nations, subject to the French, had taken up the hatcher hatchet against the English; that the French had assembled the Mingos and Delawares, telling them, that they intended to have been down the river that Autumn, but were obliged, by the inclemency of the weather, to defer their expedition till the Spring, when they should certainly attack the English, and doubted not of being able to give a good account of them: at the same time soothing these Indians to their interest with such fuccess, as to obtain from them a promise of assistance. Mr. Washington then proceeded to Venango, where he arrived the 4th day of December. This fort was commanded by M. Joncaire, who conducted Mr. Washington to another fort, at which the French commandant, M. de St. Pierre, had taken up his winter-quarters. This gentleman entertained Mr. Washington with great politeness; and, after some conferences on the business of his commission, gave him the following answer to-Governor Dinwiddie's letter.

As I have the honour of commanding here in chief, Mr. Washington delivered to me the letter which you wrote to the commander of the French troops. I should have been glad, that you had given him orders, or that he himself had been disposed, to proceed to Canada, to see our general, to whom it better belongs than to me, to exhibit and prove the titles of the king my master, to the lands situate along the river Ohio, and to examine the pretensions of the king of Great Britain thereto. I shall transmit your letter to the marquis du Quesne. His answer will be a law to me: and if he shall order me to communicate it to you, Sir, you may be affured.

affured that I shall not fail to dispatch it forthwith. As to the summons you send me to retire, I do not think myself obliged to obey it. Whatever may be your instructions, I am here by virtue of the orders of my general; and, I intreat you, Sir, not to doubt, one moment, of my being determined to obey them with all the exactness and resolution which can be expected from the best officer. I do not know that, in the progress of this campaign, any thing has passed, which can be deemed an act of hostility, or any way contrary to the treaties which subside between the two crowns; the continuation of which is as much the interest of, and as pleasing to us, as the English. Had you been pleased, Sir, to particularize the facts which occasioned your complaint, I should have had the honour of answering you in the fullest, and, I am persuaded, the most satisfactory manner.

From the fort on the river aux Bœufs, LEGARDIER DE ST. PIERRE. December 16th, 1753.

With this answer, Mr. Washington set out on the 16th of December, from M. de St. Pierre's quarters. On his return, he very providentially escaped being treacherously murdered by an Indian who attended him in the double capacity of guide and interpreter. This wretch, contrary to the usual custom of his countrymen, kept up a continual whooping, the whole way, in spite of all Mr. Washington's orders and entreaties to make him desit; and, one day in particular, greatly protracted the ordinary time of marching, so as to assord Mr. Washington just reason to suspect that he had hopes of being joined, with no friendly defign, by fome other Indians. Nor did he suspect more mischief than was intended. One evening, as Mr. Washington, and Mr. Guest his companion, were moving on, the guide, who was at a small distance from them, suddenly presented his piece, and fired at Mr. Washington, but luckily missed him. Upon this, Mr. Guest proposed immediately to destroy the Indian; but was prevailed upon by Mr. Washington to desist, as the Indian countries through which they had passed knew they were attended by this man, and, on missing him, would conclude, notwithstanding any arguments that could be used to prove the contrary, that they had wantonly murdered him. Therefore, to avoid any new disputes with the favages, which, they knew, could not but be attended with very ill confequences, particularly at this juncture, they contented themselves with immediately separating from him. However, to avoid farther treachery, they marched full fixty miles without halting. At length, after encountering many difficulties and dangers, they arrived fafe at Williamsburgh, on the 16th January, 1754.

The contests on the subject of the French and English posfessions on the Continent of North America, from the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle to this time, were chiefly confined to memorials and representations. No part of the occurrences within that period can be considered as immediately appertaining to the history of the war. Nevertheless, I thought it would not be improper to present my readers with this introductory detail; especially, as some of these transactions gave rise to the events, which, agreeable to my engagements with the public, I am now to relate.

HISTORY

BOOK I.

The province of Virginia prepares to oppose the encroachments of the French .- Mr. Washington takes the field; defeats M. Jumouville; is defeated, in his turn, by M. Villier .- Major General Braddock arrives; is defeated by M. Dumat, and dies of his wounds: defence of his conduct. - Major General Shirley takes upon him the command of the English forces; proceeds to Ofwego; returns to Albany. - Major General Johnson's expedition; he is attacked by M. le Baron Dieskau, but is victorious; he erects Fort William-Henry; puts his army into winter-quarters, and returns to Albany .-Distress of the English Back-settlers; military operations undertaken to protect them .- Obstinacy of the Pensylvanians in not agreeing to any warlike preparations; they yield at last to the prayers and threats of the Back-fettlers, and pass a militia act. The act. The other colonies very remiss in preparing for their defence. --- Remonstrances and instructions of the distressed inhabitants of the back fettlements .- Council of war at Albany .- General Shirly endeavours to unite the divided colonies, and conciliate the affections of the Indians .- Measures agreed to in consequence thereof .-General Shirley ordered to England.

THE hostile designs of the court of France being sufficiently apparent, from the transactions we have related in the introduction, Mr. Dinwiddie, lieutenant-governor of C Virginia,

Virginia, the province most exposed, thought it his duty, without any fresh orders from Great Britain, to employ all the authority with which he was already invested, to put a stop to their encroachments. For this purpose, he prevailed on the affembly of Virginia to vote the fum of 10,000 l.; and, likewife, proposed the levying of a regiment of militia; and that the Ohio company of merchants, who had procured an exclusive grant from the crown to fettle the lands on the Ohio, should, in compliance with their engagements with government, immediately raise thirty men, and send them to take post at the forks of that river, a fpot which, from its fituation, was supposed to be that the French would first endeavour to seize upon. These men were accordingly raisea; and immediately proceeded to the place of their destination, where, on their arrival, they began to execute their orders by laying the foundations of a fort; but, on the 18th of April, 1754, when it was fearcely above the furface of the ground, M. de Contrecœur appeared before it with a body of twelve hundred men, and fummoned the commanding officer to retire, which he accordingly did, for want of fufficient strength to defend himself. In the mean time, the provincial troops proposed to be raised in Virginia, were nearly completed; and part of them ordered to reinforce those of the Ohio company. The colonel of this body dying foon after he took the field, the command devolved on the lieutenant-colonel, Mr. Washington; who, continuing his rout, met the Ohio company on their return home at Wills creek.

On the 27th, in the evening, Colonel Washington being encamped on the great meadows, Monacatootha and the Half King, two principal Sachems of the Five Nations, brought advice, advice, "That a party of French had been fent to intercept him, but had miffed him in the woods; that they had retired to a fmall diffance, and were that night encamped in a very thick and fecret place about half a mile out of the road." Colonel Washington, on receiving this intelligence, prepared his men for action, and in the night fet out with them to attack the At the dawn of day he arrived at their encampment, and immediately attacked it: out of the whole party, which confifted of M. Jumonville and forty-five men, but one escaped; the reft were either killed or taken prisoners. The colonel then erected a small fort, which, from the reason of his erecting it, he called Fort Necessity, as it was to protect him till the arrival of a body of men which were to follow from the provinces of New York and the Carolinas. Soon after, he was joined by the remainder of the Virginia troops, and a company from South Carolina, which increased his little army to four hundred effective men: this number however being too fmall for any farther offensive operations, he employed them in clearing a road to Red-Stone Creek; there he received advice that M. de Contrecœur had detached M. de Villier with a thousand regular troops, and an hundred Indians, to demand fatisfaction for the attack on M. Jumonville. Upon this, Colonel Washington immediately returned to Fort Necessity, where he determined to wait the arrival of the troops promifed by the province of New York. But, on the 3d of July, the enemy appeared before the fort, and at about eight in the morning, began to attack it fo warmly, that by eight in the evening of the fame day, Mr. Washington thought proper to agree to a ceffation of arms proposed by M. de Villier, which terminated in the following extraordinary capitulation:

Capitulation

- Capitulation granted the 3d of July, 1754, by M. de Villier, Commandant of his most Christian Majesty's forces, to the English troops in Fort-Necessity, built on the lands within the king's dominions.
- Art. I. We give the English commander leave to retire with all his garrison, and return peaceably into his own country; and promise to prevent his receiving any infults from the French troops under us, or from the savages with us, as much as shall be in our power.
- II. The English shall likewise have leave to carry off all that belongs to them, except the artillery, which we reserve.
- III. We will allow them the honours of war; that is, to march out, drums beating, with a fwivel gun; being willing to flow them that we confider them as friends.
- IV. As foon as the articles are figured on both fides, the English are to strike their colours.
- V. To morrow, at break of day, a detachment of French shall be admitted to see the garrison file off, and take possession of the fort.
- VI. And, as the English are not well provided with oxen or horses, they are free to hide their effects, and come and search for them when they have met with their horses; they may even for this purpose leave watchmen behind them, in what number they please, on condition they give their word of honour not to work upon any buildings in this place, or on this side of the mountain, during a year, to be reckoned from this day: And, as the English have in their power an officer of our's, two cadets, and most of the common men made prisoners at the assistance of the Sieur de Jumon-ville, (an officer charged with a summons, as appears by his writings,) they are to promise to send them back to Fort du Quesne, situated on the Ohio. And, as a security for their performing the whole of this capitulation, and the present article in particular, Mr. Jacob Vanbraam, and Mr. Robert Stobo, both captains in the English service, shall be left as hostages till the arrival of the Canadians and French abovementioned. We oblige ourselves, on our part, to surnish these two officers with an escort, to convey them safe home. We expect our countrymen shall be restored us in two months and a half at farthest; a duplicate being made upon one of the posts of our blockade the day above.

CON. VILLIER.

This capitulation was written in French; and, as neither Mr. Washington nor any of his party understood that language, a foreigner was employed to read it to them in English. But, instead of acting the part of a faithful interpreter, when he came to the odious word assignation, he translated it "the descat of M. Jumonville." This I have the best authority to assert; the authority of the English officers who were present. Indeed, the thing speaks for itself. It cannot be supposed that these gentlemen should know so little of what they owed to themselves, both as men and as soldiers, as not to preser any extremity rather than submit to the disgrace of being branded with the imputation of so horrid a crime.

After all, had they been really guilty of this charge, they could fearce have been worfe used than they were: the capitulation.

tulation was fearcely figned, when it was most shamefully broken; the officers were kept prisoners for some time; the whole of their baggage was plundered; and all their horses and cattle killed on the fpot. However, at length, Colonel Washington retired in as good order as his fituation would admit. On his return, he met the New-York and North-Carolina companies at Winchester. Had they joined him at the appointed time, there is no doubt but that he would have fecured a post till he had received fuch farther reinforcements as would have enabled him to diflodge the French, and drive them from the country they had usurped. To compensate as much as possible for this disappointment, he halted at Wills Creek, and affifted in creeting a fort there, which was afterwards called Fort Cumberland. Meanwhile, the governor of the English colonies lost no time in transmitting to London an account of these transactions; and, in consequence of which, the British ambassador at Paris had immediate orders fent to him to remonstrate seriously against them, as fo many infractions of the treaty of peace subsisting between the two nations. But the French ministry, far from paying any regard to these remonstrances, no longer took any pains to conceal their hoffile intentions. They publicly gave orders for the speedy reinforcement of their colonies with men and military flores; that of Quebec in particular, in order to enable it to follow, without loss of time, the blow they had already flruck in that part of the world; and M. le Baron Dieskau, and M. de Vaudreuil, actually embarked for Canada with troops and orders to "tack Ofwego. But the English ministry contented themselves with sending cautionary instructions to their governors to unite in their defence, and ordering, that, in case the subjects of any foreign prince fhould fliould prefume to make any incroachments on the dominions of the king of England, by erecting forts on his lands, or committing any other act of hostility, and should, after being required to delift from fuch proceedings, still perfit in them, they should then draw out the armed force of their respective provinces, and use their best endeavours to repel force by force. The English governors were likewise ordered to form a confederacy; and Mr. Delancy, lieutenant-governor of New York, was appointed to confer with the chiefs of the Five Nations, and endeavour, by prefents and every other means, to fecure them firm to the British interest. Commissioners were accordingly deputed from the feveral provinces to form this congress, which was appointed to be held at Albany on the 14th of June, 1754; but few Indians repaired to it, and these, instead of shewing any great willingness to assist, made no scruple openly to blame the conduct of the English, and as openly applaud that of the French, who had been fo diligent to maintain their fettlements, and protect their allies; whilft the English, they faid, left both their fettlements and their allies exposed to ruin and destruction. They however accepted the British prefents, renewed their ancient treaties, and expressed a defire to receive vigorous assistance from the English, in order to drive the French from their invaded territories.

At this meeting, measures were proposed for forming a general union between the colonies, and establishing a fund, by way of military chest, for defraying all the extraordinary expences incident to a state of war. But the clashing interests of the provinces, in matters of much less moment, prevented these salutary measures being properly adopted.

Whilft the congress was yet fitting, Mr. Shirley, as governor of the province of Massachuset's Bay, prevailed on that province to build a fort near the head of the river Kennebec, and make provision for eight hundred men, to protect it from the inroads of the enemy. He took the field with these troops; and, with the confent of the Indians, erected Fort Western, about feven-and-thirty miles from the mouth of the Kennebec river; and Fort Hallifax, about fifty-four miles down the fame river. An account of these transactions being transmitted to the English ministry, together with the present state of that part of the conginent, Governor Shirley not only received the thanks of the king his mafter in council, but was ordered to concert measures with Lieutenant-Governor Lawrence for attacking the French fettlements in the bay of Fundy. But the feafon happened to be too far advanced, when they received these orders, to commence hostilities in that quarter till the ensuing spring: they therefore contented themselves with making all the extraordinary preparations for that fervice which the delay of it afforded them. They raifed two thousand men, whom government supplied with arms. In the mean time, the negociations which had been renewed in Europe for the amicable termination of these disputes, not taking the turn which the court of London thought herfelfintitled to expect, fhe therefore refolved to purfue still more vigorous measures, and issued orders for raising two regiments in America, to be commanded by Sir William Pepperel, and Governor Shirley, whilft Halket's and Dunbar's were ordered from the Irish establishment with General Braddock, who was, on his arrival in America, to take upon him the command of all the British forces in that part of the world. The Virginians, in the mean time, completed the fort, which they called Fort Cumberland; and even formed a camp on Wills Creek, in order to attack the French on the Ohio.

Major General Braddock arrived with two regiments from Ireland by the latter end of February, 1755; and, as foon after his arrival as he possibly could, summoned the different governors of the English settlements on the continent to meet him at Alexandria in Virginia, in order to deliberate with him on the most proper measures to recover, by force of arms, what had been loll in fruitlefs remonstrances; and thereby restore the credit of the English amongst the Indians. Various were the plans proposed for this purpose. At length, it was agreed, "That, for the prefervation of Ofwego, and the reduction of Niagara, Shirley's and Pepperel's regiments fhould proceed to Lake Ontario; and that one or more armed vessels, of about fixty tons each, should be built on that lake, to command it. Governor Shirley was charged with the execution of this fervice; Colonel Johnson with that of investing Crown-Point with fome provincial troops; and General Braddock was to attack Fort du Quesne.

While these plans were prosecuting with the greatest diligence, that which had been concerted between Governor Shirley, and Governor Lawrence, was carrying into execution; the assembly of the Massachusets having not only laid a severe embargo to prevent all correspondence with the French at Louisbourg, and, by their means, with those on the Continent, but raised a body of men. About the end of May, Governor Lawrence detached Lieutenant Colonel Monekton with about two thousand men against the French settlements in the Ray of Fundy, whilst Captain Rous, with three frigates and a sloop, was dispatched up the bay to give his affilance by fea. When the colonel arrived at the river Maffiguath, he found a number of regulars and neutral Acadians determined to oppose his partige; to which end, they had mounted some cannon in a blockhouse, and thrown up a breast work of timber. In this situation he attacked them, and, in less than an hour, obliged them to retire, leaving the river clear for the passage of our troops, who thereupon marched, without farther interruption, to the ground intended for their encampment. From thence he proceeded to the attack of Fort Beausejour, which, though well fortisted, desired to capitulate on the 16th of June after a bombardment of sour days only, and without putting the Faglish to the trouble of erecting a single battery against it. Upon this, Colonel Monckton granted the French the following terms:

- "The commander, officers, flaff-officers, and others, in the fervice of the French king, and the reft of the garrifon of Beaufejour, flaff march out with their arms and baggage, drums beating.
- " The garrifon fluid be fent directly by fea to Louisbourg, at the expense of the king of Great Britain.
- "The garrifon shall be provided with sufficient provisions for their passage to Louisbourg.
- "With regard to the Acadians, as they have been forced to take up arms on pain of death, they shall be pardoned the part they have taken on this occasion.
- " Lastly, the garrison shall not bear arms in America for the space of fix months.

Colonel Monckton, on taking possession of this fort, called it Fort Cumberland, and, leaving a garrison in it, proceeded next day to reduce another small fort on the river Caspereau. Here the French had their principal magazine for supplying the inhabitants and Indians, and he accordingly found a great quantity of provisions and military stores of every kind; he then disarmed the inhabitants to the amount of about sifteen thousand. In the mean time, the French abandoned their fort on St. John's river, which Captain Rous with his ships destroyed, together with all the other works which the French had raised on that river. By this expedition, which was attended with very little loss, the English secured to themselves the peaceable enjoyment of that fine and extensive country known by the name of Nova Scotia.

This first success of the English military operations was considered as a happy prelude to those which were expected to follow, notwithstanding the many difficulties General Braddock had to encounter, through the want of necessaries for the subsistance of his army, which, in despite of every obstacle, he conducted to Fort Cumberland on the Potawmack river: and here he was obliged to halt till he should receive a fresh supply of provisions, waggons, and horses, that had been promised him. Whilst he was anxiously expecting the arrival of this affistance, he received various accounts of the enemy. At length, succours came, but far short of what he depended upon; instead of one handred as during we received only fifteen, and in lieu of three hundred herses no more than one hundred. This already very fevere difanpointment was greatly increafed when, upon unloading the waggons, the provisions were found to be in so bad a state, that nothing but the keenest hunger could induce any one to cat of them. However, means were found to procure a new and found fupply by the 10th of June, when General Braddock, having nothing now to retard his march, once more fet forward for Fort du Quefne, the reduction of which formed the principal object of his expedition. On reaching the little meadows, he received fuch intelligence as convinced him he could not arrive too early at the place of his deflination, in order to prevent the French from throwing any reinforcements into it. Therefore, leaving behind him Colonel Dunbar with eight hundred men, and the greatest part of the waggons and flores, with orders to follow him as fast as the nature of the fervice would permit, and thereby judiciously lessening his line of march, he proceeded himfelf at the head of twelve hundred men with ten pieces of cannon. On the 8th of July he found himfelf within ten miles of Fort du Quefne, whilst marching on with his flanks properly secured, his advanced guard, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Gage, unexpectedly received a few flraggling-fhot, without being able to difcover from what kind of an enemy they came. Troops, unufed to this kind of fervice, are, if their officers be not extremely careful and attentive, in perpetual danger of being feized with a panic on the first alarm, and of course thrown into diforder. Such was now the cafe. On the first five the advanced-guard, after difcharging a few rounds from their cannon, fell back on the main body, and general confufion enfued. The Indians, animated by this hatly retreat of the English, and feafonable reinforcements of the French, redoubled from one moment to another their galling fire on the enemy, who all this while could fee nothing but trees and bushes to direct their vengeance against; in vain therefore did General Braddock employ all his authority to reflore order. The attempt coft him his life, and most of his officers were either killed or wounded: a mufket fhot through his right arm and lungs gave him a mortal wound, of which he died the fourth day after. What now remained of the regulars thought it high time to confult their fafety by flight. But this flight was fo well favoured by the cool bravery of the Virginian provincials, that most of those who must otherwise have fallen immediate victims by general confusion, lived to reach Colonel Dunbar's party. They carried their fears along with them; and thefe fears proved of fo infectious a nature, that the Colonel's party immediately caught them; the confequence of which was, that neither the one nor the other flopped to look behind, till they found themselves sheltered by the walls of Fort Cumberland. Befides the general, the English lost in this affair twenty officers, amongst whom was Sir Peter Halket; twenty-feven were wounded; about two hundred rank and file were killed, and about four hundred wounded. General Braddock's cabinet, and, what fcarce need be mentioned, all his artillery and flores, fell into the hands of the victors. After this fignal victory, M. Contrecœur, the commanding officer of the French, returned to Fort du Quefne, and proceeded to render that poll fo respectable as to make the English justly confider, as an object of the first consequence, the gaining possession of it, and driving the French from that part of the Continent which it commanded.

Few generals perhaps have been fo feverely centured for any defeat, as General Braddock for this. But if we fuffer our-felves coolly and impartially to confider what were in all probability bability the motives that influenced him on this occasion, we may discover in them sufficient reason to acquit him of the ill-conduct with which he is charged. To lighten the turf of those who, with all their faults, it must be allowed, fell bravely, is a task so incumbent on humanity, that, independent of my duty, as an historian, to investigate and record the truth, I may prefume on leave to oppose a few remarks to that torrent of blame with which General Braddock has been so universally loaded.

It must be allowed, that the certain intelligence he had received of the garrison of Fort du Quesne expecting a speedy reinforcement, was a sufficient motive for his dividing his forces, and leaving his heavy baggage behind him; as without doing so it must have been impossible for him to have reached the fort time enough to have prevented the enemy from entering it. And it must be considered, that General Braddock's opinion of his own military skill could not have been so excessive as to make him wholly neglect the instructions of a so much older and more experienced general as the late Duke of Cumberland; and that he must have totally neglected such instructions, to be justly censured for the defeat he sustained, will appear from the following directions, which were given to him by his Royal Highness:

Infiructions to Major General Braddock.

"SIR,

"His Royal Highness the Duke, in the several audiences which he has given you, entered into a particular explanation of every part of the service you are about to be employed in; and, as a better rule for the execution of his Majesty's instructions, he, last Saturday, Saturday, communicated to you his own fentiments of this affair; and fince you expressed a desire not to forget any part thereof, he has ordered me to deliver them to you in writing. His Royal Highness has this service very much at heart; and it is of the highest importance to his Majesty's American dominions, and to the honour of his troops employed in those parts. His Royal Highness takes likewise a particular interest in it, as it concerns you, whom he recommended to his Majesty to be nominated to the chief command.

"His Royal Highnefs's opinion is, that, immediately after your landing, you confider what artillery and other implements of war it will be necessary to transport to Willes's Creek, for your first operation on the Ohio, that the service may not be interrupted by any failure of them; and that you form a second field-train, with good officers and foldiers, to be fent to Albany, and be ready to march for the second operation at Niagara. You are to take under your command as many as you think necessary of the two companies of artillery that are in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, as soon as the season will allow, taking care to leave enough to defend the last of these places.

"When Shirley's and Pepperell' regiments are near complete, his Royal Highness thinks you should cause them to encamp; not only that they may be the more speedily disciplined, but also to draw the attention of the French, and keep them in suspense about the place you really design to attack.

"The most strict discipline, at all times extremely requilite, is more particularly so in the service you are engaged in. Wherefore, his Royal Highness recommends to you, that it be constantly observed among the troops under your command, and that you be particularly careful to guard against their being thrown into a panic by the favages, whom the French will certainly employ against them. His Royal Highness recommends to you the visiting of your posts night and day; that your colonels and other officers be careful to do it; and that you yourself frequently set them the example, and give all your troops plainly to understand, that no excuse will be admitted for any surprize whatsoever.

"Should the Ohio expedition continue any confiderable time, and Pepperell's and Shirley's regiments be found enough to undertake, in the mean while, the reduction of Niagara, his Royal Highness would have you confider, whether you could be there in person, leaving the command of the troops on the Ohio to some officer on whom you might depend, unless you shall think it better for the service to fend to those troops some person whom you had designed to command on the Ohio. But this is a nice assair, and claims your particular attention.

"If, after the Ohio expedition is ended, it should be necesfary for you to go with your whole force to Niagara, it is the opinion of his Royal Highness that you should carefully endeavour to find out a shorter way from the Ohio thither than that of the Lake, which, however, you are not to attempt under any pretence whatever, without a moral certainty of being supplied with provisions, &c. As to your design of making yourself master of Niagara, which is of the greatest consequence, his Royal Highness recommends to you to leave nothing to chance in the prosecution of that enterprize.

"With regard to the reducing of Crown Point, the provincial troops being befl acquainted with the country, will be of the most service. After the taking of this fort, his Royal "... Highness High neight a forts are precord may ough the precord forts, two Highness advises you to consult with the governors of the neighbouring provinces, where it will be most proper to build a fort to cover the frontiers of those provinces. As to the forts which you think ought to be built, (and of which they are perhaps too fond in that country,) his Royal Highness recommends the building of them in such manner that they may not require a strong garrison. He is of opinion, that you ought not to build considerable forts, cased with stone, till the plans and estimates thereof have been approved by the government here. His Royal Highness thinks, that stockaded forts, with palisades and a good ditch, capable of containing two hundred men, or four hundred upon an emergency, will be sufficient for the present.

"As Lieutenant-Colonel Lawrence, who commands at Nova Scotia, hath long projected the taking of Beau-Sejour, his Royal Highness advises you to consult with him, both with regard to the time and the manner of executing that defign. In this enterprize, his Royal Highness foresees, that his Majesty's ships may be of great service, as well by transporting the troops and warlike implements, as intercepting the stores and succours that might be sent to the French, either by the Bay Françoise, or from Cape Breton by the Bay Verte.

"With regard to your winter-quarters, after the operations of the campaign are finished, his Royal Highness recommends it to you to examine, whether the French will not endeavour to make some attempts next season, and in what parts they will most probably make them. In this case, it will be most proper to canton your troops on that side, at such distances, that they may easily be affembled for the common defence. But you will be determined in this matter by appearances, and the intelligence, which it hath been recommended to you to procure by every method immediately after your landing. It is unnecessary to put you in mind, how careful you must be to prevent being surprised. His Royal Highness imagines, that your greatest difficulty will be the subsisting of your troops: he therefore recommends it to you, to give your chief attention to this matter, and to take proper measures relative thereto with the governors, and with your quarter-masters and commissaries. I hope that the extraordinary supply put on board the sleet, and the thousand barrels of beef destined for your use, will facilitate and secure the supplying of the troops with provisions, &c."

It has been afferted, that General Braddock, in direct contradiction to these instructions, led on his men, without so much as securing his slanks, or fending out scouts to reconnoitre the country. But I have authority to affirm, that this affertion is absolutely false. His slanking parties were driven in by the enemy, and no detachments were made from the advanced guard to repel the attack on its slanks.

Had fuch detachments been made in proper time, they most certainly would have beaten off the enemy. This was by no means the General's fault; for the advanced guard fell into confusion before it was possible that the General could fend his orders to put into execution what ought to have been done without any orders from him. Had it not been for this neglect, instead of the confusion, slaughter, and slight we have been relating, we should have had to tell of the triumphant entrance of the English into Fort-du-Quesne, as will appear by the following narrative.

As foon as M. de Contrecœur, who commanded at that fort, received certain intelligence of General Braddock's strength, he gave over all thoughts of acting offenfively; well knowing that a flockaded fort, garrifoned with a handful of men, could make no pposition but what might irritate an enemy. He, therefore, confined himself to the getting of a single piece of cannon mounted, in order to make fuch a fliew of refillance, as might entitle himfelf and his garrifon to the honours of war. In the mean time, he detached M. Dumat, with a few French and Indians, to observe the motions of the English. This party he covered himself, with the greatest part of the garrison of the fort, to which he intended to retire before the English: but the party of M. Dumat discharging some random-shot upon their enemy, without expecting any material advantage from it, till they faw the advanced guard give way; they then put up the war-yell, which being both extremely terrible in itfelf, and altogether new to the English regulars, caused such an abatement in the fire that was returned by them, as made M. de Contrecœur conclude, that they were retiring. Upon this he advanced brifkly to the affiftance of M. Dumat; and foon after joining him, found himfelf furprifed into a victory over troops, to whom, a few hours before, he was making every preparation to become their prisoner of war. And that this was, in the strictest terms, a surprise into victory, is evident from M de Contrecœur's not being able to improve the advantage by purfuit, for his numbers were fearcely fufficient to fecure the ground on which it was gained, and the flores left behind by the fugitives, especially as his Indians had too much work, in their own horrid way, to attend to any thing elfe. They immediately fell upon all the poor wretches left on the field of battle, and promifeuously scalped, not only the dead and the dying, but even those who, though unable to fly, might have E 2 have otherwise recovered: at least we have heard but of one exception; and that owing to fuch an uncommon degree of humanity, as fhould not be forgot, even in a history peculiarly dedicated to the commemoration of what are deemed very different virtues. Amongst the wounded was Captain Treby, of the 44th regiment. His wounds, indeed, were not mortal; but they were fuch as effectually prevented his crawling from the field of battle. But, fortunately for him, Mr. Farrel, then a volunteer, now a captain in the 62d regiment, happening to be apprifed of his fituation, and knowing the terrible confequences of it, caught him up on his back, and conveyed him, at the most imminent peril of his own life, to some distance from the field of battle, and then procured him fuch farther affiftance, that, difabled as he was, he had the good fortune to reach Fort Cumberland with the other fugitives.

But to return to General Braddock: Had he been ever fo incautious; had he been guilty of the greatest neglect; had Fortune but favoured him, censure, in all probability, would never have dared to open her pestilential mouth against him. But the ashes of the dead were treated with indignity, to prevent the eye of scrutiny from penetrating into the conduct of the living.

Notwithsanding the inability of the conquerors to pursue the advantage they had gained, the conquered army continued its slight, as I have before related, till it reached Fort Cumberland; and even then, the troops were so little recovered from their panic, that they had not presence of mind enough to slop there, and enlarge the works of the place, as they might very well have done; for they still consisted of sixteen hundred regulars, and two provincial companies. this measure been pursued, it might have been such a check upon the French and their fcalping Indians, as would have effectually prevented many of those favage cruelties that were committed during the enfuing winter, upon the western borders of Virginia and Pennsylvania. Instead of this, Colonel Dunbar left none in the fort but the fick and wounded, whom it was impossible to remove, with the two companies of provincial troops, by way of garrison. He marched out, or rather evacuated the place, on the 2d of August, with the remainder, for Philadelphia, where his troops could be of no fervice. They were foon ordered from thence to Albany, in the province of New-York, by Major-General Shirley, on whom the command in chief of the British forces in North America was now devolved, by the death of General Braddock; whose defeat, however detrimental in itself to the English affairs in that part where he commanded, was rendered still worse by its evil influence wherever the news of it reached.

At the conference held at Alexandria in Virginia, it was resolved, that General Shirley should conduct the operations against Niagara, with his own regiment, Sir William Pepperel's, the Jerfey Blues, commanded by Colonel Schuyler, and a detachment of the royal artillery, who were all to affemble at Albany; and that fome veflels should be built there, not only to fecure the place from, but render it a terror to, the French. Accordingly Captain Bradffreet fet out for that place, with two companies, fome fwivels, and the first fet of workmen, early enough to reach it by the 27th of May. Three days before his arrival, thirty French boats had passed within fight of it, and two days after eleven more. These boats might contain fifteen or fixteen men each; a force, in the whole, more than fufficient to mafter the fort in a few hours, with 5 with the aid of a fingle mortar, as the French themselves well knew, for all its flrength confifled of no more than eight fourpounders, and one hundred men, under the command of Captain King. These were followed, on the 29th, by eleven more; but Captain Bradflreet, who now commanded, though fourred on with the most irrefulible inclination, dared not to attack them, his boats being too fmall for that purpose. On the 7th of June, the fhip-carpenters arrived from Boston; and on the 28th of the fame month, they launched the first English veffel that lake ever carried. She was a schooner, forty feet in keel, mounting twelve fwivel guns, and made to row, when necessary, with fourteen oars. This vessel, with three hundred and twenty men, was all the force at Ofwego, in the beginning of July 1755. The men were victualled at the expence of the province of New-York; and happy, indeed, it was that colony had taken fo much precaution; for fo little had been observed in forwarding the government's provisions, that when the forces under General Shirley arrived there, they must have perished for want, if they had not found a supply which they had no reason to expect. These circumstances the French were well acquainted with; but they thought it not fo much their interest to make themselves masters of Ofwego, as to purfue their projects on the Ohio. Befides, they would have forfeited the friendship of the Indians, as the Englith had already done, by interrupting the trade carried on at Ofwego.

In the beginning of July, the Jerfey Blues began their march. But before Shirley's and Pepperel's regiments could be put in a condition to follow, the melancholy accounts of Mr. Braddock's dock's defeat arrived. This fo dispirited these regiments, that numbers deferted from them; and it had fuch an effect upon the boat-men in particular, that almost the whole of them difperfed, infomuch as to render it impossible to keep fusiciently fupplied with provisions even the few troops that had not fuffered themselves to be infected by this almost general panic. General Shirley, however, left Albany before the end of July, with as many of the troops and flores as he could find methods of conveying. He depended on being joined by numbers of Indians of the Five Nations, through whose country he was to pass: but his expectations were too fanguine. Instead of complying with his request, they remonstrated against his committing any hostilities on that side of the country, alledging, "That Ofwego was a place established for traffick, as it really was; and that therefore the peace of the country ought not to be disturbed by either the English or the French." A few, however, joined him, and with these he profecuted his rout to Ofwego, which he reached, with part of his troops, the 18th of August: but it was the last day of that month before the refl arrived, when their flore of provision was found too short for the whole to proceed against Niagara. He therefore determined to make an attack upon that place with fix hundred men, especially as by leaving the remainder at Ofwego, there would be the lefs danger of its being furprifed by the French from Fort Frontinac, which happened at that time to be powerful, and the French could eafily bring great part of that force over Lake Ontario. But, upon a closer examination of the slores, they were found infufficient even for this fmall body, till, on the 26th of September, there arrived just enough for that purpose, after twelve days thort allowance was referred for the troops who were to remain behind. A council of war was therefore held to confider of the prefent fituation of the army, in which it was refolved, that as the feafon for action was fo far elapfed, the attempt upon Niagara should be deferred till the next year. The little that remained, however, was employed in securing the possession of this important post. The troops began to erect two new forts; the old one, though dignissed by that name, being no better than a stone-house, originally built for the convenience of trade, at the particular desire of the Five Nations of Indians. There could be no situation at this place, however advantageous for trade, but what was so much the worse for the purpose of desence: the forts, as they were situated, could not be made tenable but against small arms, being entirely commanded by adjacent eminences.

The fleet, which fo much industry had put affoat, now confifted of a decked floop of eight four-pounders and thirty fwivels; a decked schooner, of eight four-pounders and twenty-eight fwivels; an undecked schooner, of fourteen fwivels and fourteen oars; and another, of twelve fwivels aud fourteen oars. But these vessels were ordered to be unrigged, and laid up, whilft the French still kept cruifing on the lake with theirs; and all the benefit that was expected from a fuperior fleet, was lost to the English, by disabling it so foon. Ofwego was now not only deprived of the protection of the vessels, but, on the 24th of October, after a quantity of provision having arrived, the General withdrew himself from thence with all his forces, except feven hundred men, who were left under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Mercer, to finish and defend the forts; without a possibility, however, of being relieved, should they be attacked during the to the winter-feason. And this, there was some reason to apprehend, would be the case. Indeed the French would have endeavoured to gain it in the spring, had not their attention been diverted, by transporting stores to Niagara, for the use of Fort-du-Quesne, which they then considered as an object of the first magnitude.

The last resolution of the council of Alexandria now claims our attention; namely, the expedition concerted against Crown-Point. Although this expedition had the least appearance of success, especially from the want of experience in the general, and of discipline in his troops, it was that which terminated with most honour to the English arms. The good sense of General Johnson, his conciliating manner of treating the Indians, his humanity and generosity, had procured from the forces under him such considence as to compense the want of almost every other advantage, and create the greatest, where there was scarce the least hope of, success.

The troops for the fervice of this campaign were composed of the militia of the northern provinces, commanded by Major-General Lyman, till the arrival of General Johnson. They were assembled at the carrying-place between Hudson's river and Lake George, to the number of about two thousand two hundred. During the interval between their arrival and that of General Johnson, they were employed in throwing up some works to secure the landing-place: these works will hereafter be called Fort Edward. General Johnson, on his part, was employed at Albany in collecting and forwarding to Fort Edward such stores as the service demanded; and on the 8th of August, he set out from thence with several boat-loads of artillery, ammunition, and provisions, and joined General Eleman

Lyman time enough to be able to put his little army in motion by the latter end of the fame month, leaving Colonel Blanchard, with about three hundred provincials, as a garrifon in Fort Edward. The artillery and ammunition happening to meet with fome delay, the General thought proper to encamp at Lake George till their arrival, when he refolved to proceed against Ticonderoga. The situation he chose was advantageous, on an eminence, flanked by bufly fwamps; Lake George was in his rear; whilft the ordinary guards fufficiently fecured his front. From the afcendency he had gained over the Indians who composed part of his army, and which he improved to the greatest advantage, as they were thoroughly acquainted with every path, he conflantly employed a number of them as fcouts, to prevent all possibility of surprize. Accordingly, in confequence of this prudent measure, he, on the 7th of September, received intelligence, that a body of the French were on their march from Ticonderoga, with an intention to attack Fort Edward. Upon this he immediately fent off an officer express to Colonel Blanchard, with orders to withdraw his out-poffs, and keep his whole force within his works: but this officer happening to fall in with fome of the advanced parties of the French, had the misfortune to be killed. About midnight, an Indian whom the General had fent to look out for, and to observe his enemy, returned with advice, that he had difcovered them, but without being able to tell their numbers, which happened to be too great for the arithmetic of an Indian, who has no means to express the difference betwixt five hundred and as many thousands; to that the General still continued at a loss for what it most iniported him to know. He therefore immediately called a council of war, which unanimously approved of his fending a detach-

a detachment early the next morning, of one thousand provincials, under the command of Colonel Williams, and two hundred Indians under the direction of old Hendrick, the Mohock Sachem, with orders to attempt cutting off the retreat of the French in their return from Fort Edward, whether they fucceeded or mifearried in their defigns against it. This was on the 8th of September. About nine in the morning, Colonel Williams marched his detachment from the camp; about two hours after, a fmart firing was heard by those in the camp, which grew louder from one moment to another, fo as to afford the General fufficient reason to apprehend, that Colonel Williams was attacked by the enemy, and defeated. He, therefore, immediately ordered Lieutenant-Colonel Cole, with a detachment of three hundred men, to check the supposed pursuit of the enemy, and to cover the retreat of his friends. This well-timed order refcued many of them from destruction. He likewife ordered the flumps of fome trees that had been burned down, to be piled up in his front; and most of his men being expert at the axe, fuch whole trees as flood convenient for the purpose were soon felled, and added to the stumps, fo as to form with them a breaft-work, with as much regularity as the confusion of the time would admit. Such as it was, it was fearcely finished, when the remains of Colonel Williams's party foon arrived at the camp: that the French had beat them, was the only certain account which they could give; as to the numbers of the enemy in particular, they reprefented it fo differently, as to increase the confusion rather than leffen it. But foon the French themselves made their appearance in front, moving up to the English in one large column, and in good order, with their bayonets fixed, and a fleady countenance; till difcovering fome cannon, they halted F 2 halted for a moment, not without flewing figns that their ardour was a little abated by a fight fo unexpected. However, the cannon of the English did not appear more disagreeable to them, than that of their bayonets to the Englith, who, from fome flrange neglect, were not provided with any. When the French had recovered themselves a little, they fet forward again; and about noon, at the distance of one hundred yards from the breaft-work, began a regular platoon-firing: but by this time, the English troops, having equally recovered themselves, plied their musketry and cannon fo well, and thereby gave the French fuch a flock, that their Canadians and Indians abandoned the frontattack, and crept behind the trees, upon the flanks of the English; and from thence continued firing, but with very little execution, as by this time the flanks had received an additional fecurity of a breast-work. The French, finding themselves thus deserted, thought proper to alter their platoon-firing to the Indian method, and take shelter behind the trees. In this manner they advanced their frontattack to within fifty vards of the breaft-work, where they continued firing near two hours; till discovering that they could not make the least impression on the front, they again altered their plan, and made an effort, first on the right wing, and then on the left: but these attacks proving equally unfuccessful with that upon the front, and numbers of men having fallen on every fide, the remainder abandoned their hopes, and retired about four o'clock in the afternoon. The chief lofs that the English fustained in this affair, confisted of those who had fallen in the retreat, or rather flight, of Colonel Williams's detachment. The breast-work effectually preferved all those who were covered by it; and the cannon prevented, prevented, in all human probability, the defeat of the English; for the French were superior to them in numbers, who, from fixteen hundred effective men, were reduced to thirteen hundred by the defeat of Colonel Williams; whereas the French confided of two hundred grenadiers, eight hundred Canadians, and feven hundred Indians of different nations. After the difaster that attended the party of Colonel Williams, not a fingle Indian would flew himfelf in favour of General Johnson; much less could any of them be prevailed upon to exert themselves offensively. In this affair the English had about one hundred and thirty killed, amongst whom were Colonel Williams, Colonel Titcumb, Major Aftley, fix captains, and old Hendrick, the Mohock chief; feveral were wounded, and the General received a ball in his thigh. The French had about two hundred and fixty killed, amongst whom was M. de St. Pierre, who commanded the Indians; about thirty were taken prisoners, together with the Baron Dieskeau, who commanded the whole of the French troops. The English commander, fatisfied with his victory, abstained from all pursuit. This omiffion had nearly proved fatal to a party of about one hundred and twenty men, commanded by Captain Macginnis, who had been detached from Fort Edward to reinforce General Johnson's camp. About three hundred of Baron Diefkean's troops having rallied, and being in one body, met Captain Macginnis near the place where Colonel Williams had been defeated the preceding day. But as Captain Macginnis observed the greatest precaution in his march, and was informed by one of his fcours of the enemy's approach, he immediately made a disposition to receive them, and not only repulfed their first attack, but so vigorously charged them in his turn, that he foon put them to flight, and entirely difperfed.

perfed them, with the lofs of only two men killed, eleven wounded, and five misling. Captain Macginnis was wounded; of which wounds he died in a few days after his arrival in General Johnson's camp.

If we must allow, that General Johnson committed some overfights in the course of this campaign, we may fafely affirm, that the Baron Dieskeau committed much greater. When General Johnson received intelligence of the enemy's march, he did not take his refolutions, nor make his difpositions, with that celerity which circumftances feemed to demand. Delays, always dangerous, are feldom otherwife than fatal in the business of war. Unless opportunity be seized at the very inflant it prefents itfelf, it is gone, never to return. In the interval, between General Johnson's receiving certain intelligence of the approach of the French, and his making the detachment to attack them, there was undoubtedly time enough given to Baron Diefkeau, if his defign had been against Fort Edward, to strike his blow against it; and whether he fucceeded or not, to have retreated beyond the reach of Colonel Williams. Not profecuting his victory by a brifk purfuit, was flill more blameable; by it he must have deflroyed, or taken prifoners, a great number of the fugitive French; and Captain Macginnis's party would have been freed from the danger which they fo narrow!; escaped, the next day.

As to Baron Diefkeau, when he left Ticonderoga, his intentions were to cut off the garr fon at Fort Edward; but when he approached within three or four miles of that place, his troops, prepoffeffed with the notion of its being well fortified with cannon, remonstrated against the execution of his defigns. They, however, from the same principle of averse-them in this fervice, fince, by its being their own choice, their honour would be most engaged to execute it properly. But he had ftill another motive: he had learned by an English prisoner, that a few days before, when he had left the Englith army, it was unprovided with cannon; and in fact, no cannon had at that time reached them: fo that every thing conspired to insure him success. The defeat of Colonel Williams flushed his troops with new hopes, and gave them additional spirits. Had he therefore pushed on, without halting the fhort time that he did, and rushed forward with fixed bayonets, during the confusion in which he might easily guess the defeat of Colonel Williams's party had thrown the English camp, he must have redoubled that confusion, and of course fucceeded in his attempt. His halting, however short it was, gave the English time to recollect themselves, and increase their desence to such a degree, as to destroy every advantage that could arife from his mond ing armed with bayonets; from his fuperiority of numbers, and the spirits which his troops had acquired by the defeat a Colonel Williams: or had the Baron retreated in good order, as he might eafily have done, on account of his fuperiority in numbers and arms, as foon as he found the English were provided with cannon, and defended by a breaft-work, and that they had fufficiently recovered their spirits to avail themselves of both, he might still have carried his point against Fort Ed-

The most useful weapon in sudden assaults, either for attack or defence, is the screwed bayonet. There was not a single bayonet in General Johnson's army; whereas every man amongst the French was provided with one; and it was impossible for the English to march as fast with their cannon as the French with small arms only; so that the defence of the former must be consined solely to the sirclock, a machine of very little utility when the fixed bayonet can be properly used.

Few battles, it may be fafely averred, have been fought, but that, in the course of the action, there generally presented themselves certain advantages, which, if seized at the critical moment, would have rendered it much more decisive.

We are not, therefore, to be surprised at General Johnson's committing fome errors; for, fo far from pretending to the knowledge of military business, he always professed an ignorance in that science; but an ardent desire of serving his country was his chief motive for accepting the command: the confidence of his troops, and the opinion that he entertained of their courage, gave him the most consident hope of fuccess. It was, perhaps, owing to this his modest opinion of himself, that he had the singular satisfaction of returning victorious with his provincials, when the army, composed chiefly of regulars, fent against Fort-du-Quesne, met a total defeat; and that defigned against Niagara, confisting of regulars also, was obliged to abandon the enterprize. Yet it is a debt we owe to candour to confess, that if these troops had been properly led on, it is most probable they would have met with equal fuccess.

The account of General Johnson's successes no sooner reached England than the king, as an acknowledgment for his fervices, created him a baronet; and the parliament, to reward them, prefented him with five thousand pounds. Nor were these services overpaid. The English troops were so afraid of their enemy that they always expected defeat; this advantage gained by General Johnson restored them a little to a considence in themselves, and taught them to regard the enemy with a less degree of apprehension than they had done for fome time past; yet they did not immediately acquire that martial turn of mind by which they afterwards became fo diffinguished. This alteration alone would have fufficiently compensated for a much greater loss than that which General Johnson fustained in the action with the Baron Dieskeau, had there been no other advantages gained by it; which was very far from being the case. The success of General Johnson gave fecurity to the northern provinces, by difabling the French troops, and obliging them to retire: On the contrary, had he been defeated, the French might have penetrated even to Albany without opposition, and have destroyed the whole country. General Shirley might also have been attacked in a fituation, when neither courage or conduct could have been fufficient to fave him.

General Johnson, after this affair, turned his thoughts to the securing of the country from the incursions of the enemy when he should retire into winter quarters; and the erecting of a fort at his encampment appearing the best measure that he could take for that purpose, he immediately gave orders for the constructing of one, which he called Fort William Henry. Captain Robert Rogers, of the new Hampshire regiment, a perfon well acquainted with the woods of North America, and with the Indians in the interest of the English, having by this time joined General Johnson, he was ordered on different scouts to discover the number of the enemy, and how they were employed. On the 24th of September he was sent to Crown Point, where he found the French were in number about five hundred, and were erecting a battery at the side of the fort. On the 7th of October he was ordered to Ticonderoga, where he discovered about two thousand French, who had thrown up an intrenchment, and prepared a large quantity of hewn timber in the adjacent woods; he was even a witness to their laying the foundations of a fort on the point which commands the pass between Lake George and Lake Champlain.

These discoveries were fusicient to convince General Johnfon of the impracticability of attacking the enemy at Ticonderoga with any prospect of success. From their great fuperiority of numbers he had reason to expect they would again attack him, flrengthened with cannon; he therefore refolved to act on the defensive, and direct his whole strength towards finishing Fort William Henry. Continuing this work as long as the feafon would permit, he was then obliged to enter into winter-quarters, leaving a regiment of provincials and Captain Rogers's company to garrifon that place and Fort Edward; and on the 24th of December retired to Albany, and from thence dispersed the remainder of his army to their respective provinces. Thus then, though the plan of military operations agreed upon in the council of war held at Alexandria, was attempted in its utmost latitude, the aspect of the Englith affairs on the continent was very little, if at all, improved by it. withdrawing of the troops from Philadelphia, the most central of the English colonies, by General Shirley, gave the French an opportunity, in spite of General Johnson's success, to improve their situation on the Ohio, especially by enlarging and strengthening the forts they had already erested to secure their claim to that part of the country; and make from thence such excursions into the English back-settlements as obliged the wretched inhabitants to abandon them, and to retire for safety into the more inhabited parts. The tedious delays in preparing military slores for the siege of Niagara, and the seandalous neglect in forming proper magazines of provisions for the same purposes, begot an uncommon spirit of enterprize in the French, and encouraged their Indians to assist them in carrying destruction into the back-settlements of the English.

To put a flop to these depredations the government of Virginia ordered, that the militia of the counties of Dumfries, Prince William, and Fairfax, should be draughted, and one hundred and fixty of them should march towards the south branch of the Potomack, which had been lately the scene of several cruel murders. About the middle of October, sive hundred more were ordered to rendezvous at Fort Cumberland, to prevent further outrages from the French in that quarter.

But all these measures proved only local and temporary remedies. As fast as the French, and particularly their Indians, were curbed or chastised in one place, they broke out, and committed fresh outrages in another, especially on the side of Philadelphia. On the 3d of November, the governor of that province informed the affembly, by meffage, That a most formidable body, composed of fourteen hundred Indians, and one hundred French, were on their march from the Ohio, with an intention to divide, as foon as they fhould come within a certain distance of the frontiers, into separate parties; fome against Shamekin, others against Jurnata, and a third party against Harris's ferry; and, in that manner, spread themselves in small companies quite over the province of Pennfylvania, fo as to be able to take up their winter-quarters quictly at Lancaster; that they were now encamped on the Safquehanah, within fo little distance as eighty miles of Philadelphia; That they had ingratiated themselves to such a degree with the Delawares and the Shawanese as to make them take up the hatchet against the English, and declare they would not lay it down whilft there was any English alive to use it against. The governor added, That he could have put the province into a posture of defence, and prevented all the mischief which had been already done by this party, had his hands been properly firengthened; but that he had neither money, nor arms, nor ammunition, at his difpofal; that there was no militia; and that he could not form the back-fettlers into fuch regular bodies as the prefent exigencies required. He, therefore, earneftly recommended it to them to grant the proper supplies of money for these important purposes, and prepare a bill for establishing a militia, with a clause in fayour of those who, from truly conscientious motives, scrupled the bearing of arms; as it was impossible, without such a law, to prevent confusion and disorder, and answer the purposes of government, however confiderable the mere pecuniary fupplies granted for that purpose might be.

To this meffage the affembly avoided giving any explicit answer. The leading men amongst them, being Quakers, did all that lay in their power to obstruct every proposal for complving with the most material part of the governor's message, that of raifing men as well as money. Some of them went fo far as to vindicate the enemy, and advise forbearance, as the best measure they could take to secure both their liberty and property. To confirm this fpirit of delufion that had feized upon the majority of the reprefentatives, many speakers or preachers, both men and women, ran about, with more than common affiduity, protefting against all warlike preparations, and declaring, that whatever evils might come upon the English provinces, it was of their own feeking; that the French were fettled on their own lands; and that the defeat of the English troops was a judgment for dislurbing the French in their peaceable habitations; that their colony was under the immediate protection of Heaven; and that therefore it was as unnecessary to take any sleps to keep the French out of Pennfylvania, as it had been wicked to attempt the driving them out of their own possessions. The governor, therefore, was obliged to fend them another meffage to the fame purport, with the alarming news that the fettlement at the Great Cove was utterly destroyed, and all the settlers killed or taken prifoners. But they flill held out. On the 10th, therefore, of the fame month, the governor further informed them, in the most pathetic manner, That the Indians who still continued true to the English had publicly required the affistance of the province, declaring, that, unless it was immediately granted, they must, in their own defence, take part with the French, as they were not themselves able to make head against them. The governor spiritedly added, That he was fully fully refolved, with the advice of his council, to fet out in person for the back-settlements, in order to assist the wretched inhabitants who were still lest alive, with his presence, and put them in the best order he could to defend themselves, as he had no hopes lest of being able to do any thing for their interest in concert with the assembly, though bound by many more ties than himself to consult it.

One would imagine that this meffage left no room for any other; notwithflanding which, much fruitlefs altercation passed between the governor and assembly, even about pecuniary fupplies. In a meffage which the governor fent the affembly on the 18th, he acquainted them that the Indians had driven away the inhabitants of Tulpekochen, and then deflroyed the fettlement itself; and observed, that the ways and means of fupply they had under confideration were of too dilatory a nature, as no money could be raifed in confequence of them in lefs than fix weeks, by which time great part of the province might be laid waste. He, therefore, again urged them for an immediate fupply, and an immediate law to render that supply effectual, by establishing and regulating a militia, and fubjecting it to military difcipline. These applications were considerably reinforced by the unexpected arrival at Philadelphia, the very next day, of many hundreds of the back-fettlers. These wretched fugitives demanded, in a body, that relief they were entitled to by the laws of God and Nature, from the protection of government. They first applied to the governor, who gave them an account of his medlages to the affembly in their behalf; and thewed them an order from the proprietaries for a confiderable fum to be laid out as a free gift in the defence of the province. Upon this, they hurried to the fladt-house with a waggon loaded with the dead bodies of their friends, who had been fealped only about fixty miles off by the Indians; and fet them down at the door of the affembly-house, cursing the Quakers and their principles, and bidding the committee of affembly behold the fruits of their obflinacy, and confefs, that their pretended fanctity could not fave the province without the afliftance of the arm of flesh. To these arguments they added threats to come down again on the fame errand; adding, That in cafe they found no effectual steps taken for their protection, the confequences should be fatal. These declarations were made with fuch marks of grief and defpair in their faces, for the lofs of their wives and children, and the labours of their whole lives, that the affembly, either moved by the diffress, or over-awed by the menaces, of the injured people, immediately dropt all their difputes, passed a money-bill for fixty thousand pounds, and likewise a militiabill, too new and curious in its kind to be here omitted. It is as follows:

An Aél for the better ordering and regulating fuch as are willing and defirous to be united for military purposes within the Province of Pennsylvania, pussed November 25th 1755.

"WHEREAS this province was first fettled by (and a majority of the assemblies have ever since been of) the people called Qualius; who, though they do not, as the world is now circumflanced, condemn the use of arms in others, yet are principled against bearing arms themselves; and to make any law to compet them thereto, against their consciences, would not be only to violate a fundamental principle in our constitution, and be a direct breach of our charter of privileges, but would also

also in essect be to commence persecution against all that part of the inhabitants of the province; and for them, by any law, to compel others to bear arms, and exempt themselves, would be inconsistent and partial: Yet forasmuch as, by the general toleration and equity of our laws, great numbers of people of other religious denominations are come among us, who are under no such restraint, some of whom have been disciplined in the art of war, and conscientiously think it their duty to sight in defence of their country, their wives, their families, and estates; and such have an equal right to liberty of conscience with others.

"And whereas a great number of petitions from the feveral counties of this province have been prefented to the house, setting forth, That the petitioners are very willing to defend themselves and their country, and desirous of being formed into regular bodies for that purpose, instructed and disciplined under proper officers, with suitable and legal authority; representing withal, That unless measures of this kind are taken, so as to unite them together, subject them to due command, and thereby give them considence in each other, they cannot assemble to oppose the enemy, without the utmost danger of exposing themselves to confusion and destruction.

"And whereas the voluntary affembling of great bodies of armed men from different parts of the province on any occa-fisnal alarm, whether true or falfe, as of late hath happened, without call or authority from the government, and without due order and direction among themselves, may be attended with danger to our neighbouring Indian friends and allies, as well as to the internal peace of the province.

" And whereas the governor hath frequently recommended it to the affembly, that in preparing and paffing a law for fuch purposes, they should have due regard to scrupulous and tender consciences, which cannot be done where compulsive means are used to force men into military service; therefore, as we represent all the people of the province, and are composed of members of different religious persuasions, we do not think it reasonable that any should, through a want of legal powers, be in the least restrained from doing what they judge it their duty to do for their own fecurity and the public good; we, in compliance with the faid petitions and recommendations, do offer it to the governor to be enacted, and be it enacted by the Honourable Robert Hunter Morris, Efq; with the King's royal approbation, lieutenant-governor, under the Honourable Thomas Penn and Richard Penn, Efquires, true and absolute proprietors of the province of Pennsylvania, and of the counties of Newcastle, Kent, and Sussex upon Delaware, by and with the advice and confent of the reprefentatives of the freemen of the faid province, in general affembly met, and by the authority of the same, That from and after publication of this act, it shall and may be lawful for freemen of this province to form themselves into companies, as heretofore they have used in time of war without law; and for each company, by majority of votes in the way of ballot, to chuse its own officers, to wit, a captain, lieutenant, and enfign, and prefent them to the governor or commander in chief for the time being, for his approbation; which officers, to chosen, if approved and commissioned by him, shall be the captain, lieutenant, and enfign of each company respectively, according to their commissions; and the said companies being divided H.

After all, we must remark, in justice to the Quakers, that the rest of the English colonists, who held no religious tenets which could obstruct their councils, or tie up their hands, were very far from being properly united, or even fo much as agreed, regarding the grand point of raising the necessary supplies of men and moncy for their common safety. Those indeed, who were nearest the seat of danger presented several spirited remonstrances to their rulers, and instructions to their reprefentatives, fetting forth, "That when they faw the views of an ambitious and potent prince extended, in open violation of the most folemn treaties with the native Indians and the crown of Great Britain, and his fubjects feizing lands undoubtedly within the limits of the English territorics, fortifying themselves thereon, assisted by all the native forces of Canada, a large number of veteran foldiers from France; and thereby opening a fliort and cafy paffage to the back-fettlements of the English: That when they reflected on these intruders, who were the avowed enemies of the property and trade, the liberty, laws, and religion of the English, the utter extirpation of which could only fatisfy them: That when they confidered this, it plainly appeared to be the grand leading view in all their ambitious defigns, and the only way, in their opinion, to chablish an arbitrary and tyrannical empire, and with it a bloody and perfecuting religion, diroughout the whole continent of North America: That when they observed them, in purfuance of this plan, to act in me uniform manner, guided by one fleady courcil, and directed to one fixed and unalterable point; their flrength confitling in union, and their profpect of employing that firength fuccefsfully, founded on the prefent unhappy disjointed flate of the English colonies; a circumstance so evident even to the Indians in alliance with the English, that felf-preservation had induced many of their warriors to go over to the French, believing, that either the affairs of the English were desperate, or that the English themfelves were an easy, esseminate, and daslardly people, and consequently not to be relied on, either for prudence to provide against, or courage to oppose, the impending dangers. " That when they ferioufly confidered and observed all these things, they could not forbear being alarmed at a fituation fo shocking to every true subject of Great Britain: adding, That it was with the utmost concern they had feen those evils, from fmall beginnings, grow, though by flow degrees, to a most alarming height; and that they could not help attributing this their monstrous growth to the private views and disunion, the irrefolution and inaction, of the feveral legislatures of British America; fo that an invasion, which, considering the natural flrength of the English colonies, if properly united, might have been heretofore repelled at an eafy expence, was now become a matter of the most ferious concern to themselves, as well as of the greatest importance to the mother-country, by requiring a provincial afliftance in men and money, far beyond what, in case of an early junction and fpirited measures, would have been amply sufficient."

These remonstrances and instructions had, in a great meafure, the defired effect, by disposing the minds to whom they were directed to listen to the advice, and obey the injunctions of the court of London to the same falutary purpose. General Shirley,

Shirley, who arrived at Albanyon the 4th of November, on the 2d of the following month, wrote circular letters to the feveral Engliff governors upon the continent, to meet him at that place, in order to hold a council of war; which, by order of his master, the King of Great Britain, was to confift of as many English governors and field-officers as could poslibly attend at it. As foon asthis council met, Mr. Shirley laid before them the inftructions that had been given his predecessor General Braddock; and then exerted the utmost of his abilities to establish a good harmony amongst the English colonies; and was particularly happy in effecting an union between the governments of New-England and New-York, towards the common cause of defence against the incroachments of the French: and, what was of still greater confequence, he conciliated to the British interest many of the Indians who had already gone over tothe French, or had given just reason to suspect their intending it.

The first fruits of this success were, that the measures he proposed, in consequence of General Braddock's instructions, were cheerfully agreed to. These were, To secure, at all events, the navigation of Lake Ontario; and employ six thousand troops against the French forts on that lake, and tenthousand against Crown-Point. It was likewise proposed to renew the expedition against Fort-du-Quesne, and attack the French on the river Chaudiere: but these operations were approved merely on condition they did not interfere with the principal expeditions already agreed to. The council then unanimously declared it to be their opinion, That it would be impossible to recover and secure his Britannic Majesty's just rights, without an additional number of regular forces; and, as the French were building veffels at Frontenac, they also ordered a fnow, a brigantine, and a floop to be built at Fort Ofwego.

The executing of these measures required no small degree of military (kill; and, whatever merit General Shirley might be possessed of as a negotiator, he had not, in the course of his command, discovered any great abilities as a foldier. The court of London, therefore, thought proper to superfede him in his command, and ordered him to England, before he could have an opportunity of carrying any of his wintercouncils into execution.

Notwithstanding the defeat of M. Dieskeau, there still remained a great number of the French regulars, which the Baron and M. de Vaudreuil had brought over with them, to the amount of three thousand men and upwards. These troops, with the Canadians, who were as well, if not better, qualified for fervice in that country, than the French regulars, joined to the numerous tribes of Indians in the French interest, being conducted by one chief, formed an infinitely more formidable power than the regular and provincial troops of the English, who could not unite their strength on account of the jarring interests of the different provinces.

The posts of Ticonderoga and Crown-Point were effectually fecured by the French, who likewife continued to use the greatest diligence in constructing vessels at Fort Frontenac; they also strongly garrisoned Niagara, and stationed a sufficient number of troops on the communication between that place and Fort-du-Quefne, fo as to fecure either from furprize

The severity of the season having forced the main body of the French army into winter-quarters, the French commander in chief pursued such measures with the Indians as effectually conciliated many of them to his interest; and then, in concert with them, formed a plan for the operations of the ensuing campaign.

THE British provinces having applied for a reinforcement of troops, the court of London determined to increase her efforts in North America. The Earl of Loudon was therefore appointed commander in chief in that part of the British empire; but, as he would be necessarily detained fome time in England, Major-General Abercromby was ordered to proceed immediately to North America, and take the command of the troops, till his Lordfhip fhould arrive. The Earl of Loudon, already colonel of a regiment, was nominated to another, which was to confift of four battalions, to be called the Royal Americans, and to be officered chiefly by foreigners; an act of parliament having passed for that purpose. He was likewise constituted governor of Virginia; and was, moreover, invested with fuch powers as were thought necessary, by giving a greater latitude to his authority, to enable him to promote an union amongst the English colonies. In the mean time, the necessary preparations were made in British America to forward the execution of the plans agreed upon in the council of war that had been held at Albany. The militia of the feveral provinces were affembled at that place; but there remained, for want of a commander in chief, till the latter end of June, when General Abercromby joined them in that capacity. The General having brought with him the thirty-fifth regiment, and the fortyfecond, or Lord John Murray's regiment of Highlanders, the British troops now in North America confided of these two corps, Pepperel's, Shirley's, the forty-fourth and forty-eighth regiments; with four independent companies from New York; four from Carolina, and a confiderable body of provincials.

Though General Abercromby approved of the plan of operations agreed upon by the Albany council of war, he conceived it by far too extensive to be carried into execution by the forces under his command. He, therefore, thought proper to wait the arrival of Lord Loudon; but, in the mean time, ordered the provincials to march immediately for Fort William-Henry, under the command of General Winslow.

The French diligently availed themselves of this inaction of the English, and M. de Montcalm, who had arrived in Canada, with about three thousand regulars, detached a party to attack Fort Bull on Wood-Creek, in the country of the Five Nations; the whole garrifon of which, except two, were fealped. He likewife formed a camp at Ticonderoga, and firengthened the post at Crown-Point. Moreover, being fufficiently apprifed that the British forces were not to act offensively till Lord Loudon should take the command, and knowing that his Lordship could not arrive before the feafon would be elapfed for attacking Crown-Point, or relieving Ofwego if attacked by the French, Montcalm refolved to carry into execution a plan formed by M. de Vaudreuil against that fort; and, to infure fuccess to his operations, he placed ambufcades, in order to prevent its receiving any kind of supplies, either of men or provision, from Schenectady.

of the Albany council of war, to form, at Ofwego, fuch magazines of military and other flores as the importance of the place feemed to require; and having left Schenectady on this fervice, with about three hundred boat-men, the French got intelligence of his proceedings, and formed an ambuscade to intercept him, either in his way to Oswego, or as he should be returning from that place. The detachment for this purpose were to proceed to the north shore of the Onondaga river; and were ordered to fire into the English boats that would pass before the men could land, or make any disposition for their defence. But this body lost their way in the woods, and did not reach the banks of the river, from whence they were to fire on Colonel Bradstreet, till he had passed that place. However, as no proper measures had been taken by the English to scour the country well, the French found means to continue unnoticed in the woods till the Colonel's return. Boats on this kind of fervice must always be exposed to an attack, from the impossibility of having troops on shore to cover them. Upon these occasions, therefore, it is necessary to make such dispositions as may the soonest enable them to retire from an ambuscade, or give them an opportunity of forming in a manner fo as to be able to oppose it. Such was the disposition made by Colonel Bradstreet. He divided his boats into three divisions, with orders to keep at a proper distance asunder, to be the better able to land and support each other. He himself headed the first. Whilst he was slemming the stream of the Onondaga in this order, on the 3d of July, he was faluted with the war-whoop, and a volley of musket bullets, from the northern shore.

Upon this, he ordered his men to land on the opposite banks; and then, recollecting that there was a little island just above him where the enemy might ford the river, and attack his his men before they could form, he inflantly rowed to it with fix men only. But he had fcarce got on fhore when he was attacked by at least twenty. These, however, he soon repulsed; and, being joined by more of his party, beat them off a fecond and a third time. The French, therefore, despairing of being able to pass the river at this place, marched in a body along the northern banks to attempt another ford about a mile higher, and Colonel Bradflreet kept moving along the opposite shore with two hundred men to oppose their pasfage; till, feeing that another detachment had already croffed the river, and posted themselves in a swamp, he fell upon them with fo much fury as to leave them no prospect of security but in flight. Many of them, however, fell in their way to the river, and many more were driven into it and drowned. This proved a critical advantage to the English; for the other French party had, by this time, passed the ford; but it was only to experience the fame difgrace. The Colonel marched up to them, forced them to give way, drove them to the north thore of the river, and there totally routed and dispersed the whole detachment. This affair continued warm for about three hours, during which the English had above fixty killed and wounded; and the French about one hundred killed, and feventy taken priioners; and had not a heavy rain come on that night, and continued all the next day, few, if any, of the French would have escaped the same fate; though the French concerned in this affair confifted originally of feven hundred men, and the English they had to deal with were wholly undisciplined. But actions of this kind are fo irregular, as to make refolution in the men more than compenfate for any want of military knowledge. And this was the case of Colonel Bradstreet's party, which was composed of

The very night after this affair, Colonel Bradstreet was joined by Captain Patten with a company of grenadiers, in his way from Oneida to Ofwego; and the next day by a detachment of two hundred men from the garrifon of Ofwego; but, before the rain, and the floods, occasioned by its swelling all the adjacent rivulets, would permit them to stir, all the French who had escaped, and were able to march, had got back to Lake Ontario, and either taken refuge on board the vessels which had brought them from Fort Frontinac, or joined a large body of French, which, by the reports of the prisoners, were encamped on the east side of that lake, and made part of an army deftined against Oswego. The detachment, therefore, from that place, marched back to it with Captain Patten and his grenadiers, whilft Colonel Bradfireet returned to Schenectady, where, without meeting with any further moleftation, he arrived the 14th of July. The next day, he fet out for Albany, and communicated to General Abercromby the intelligence he had received from his prisoners concerning the designs of the French upon Oswego.

The General, upon this, immediately ordered Colonel Webb to march with the forty-fourth regiment to reinforce the garrifon there; but, fomehow or other, this body was degreed till the 26th of July; when Lord Loudon being arrived at New-York, immediately proceeded to Albany, and took upon himfelf the command of the English army, which now consisted of three thousand regulars and upwards, besides the provincials. The garrifon at Oswego was infensibly increased to fourteen hundred.

hundred men; and several parties were stationed on the road between it and Schenectady, in order to preserve an open communication between them. The French, on their side, had about three thousand men at Crown-Point and Ticonderoga. But they had posted their chief strength at Fort Frontinac, in order from thence to carry on their designs against Fort Oswego.

The loss of this place would not only render abortive the grand scheme, which had been so long in agitation by the English, to reduce Niagara, but leave the French masters of the navigation of Lake Ontario, and thereby fecure to them a free and eafy communication with their forts on the upper lakes, and on the English back-settlements; and by that means rivet to their interest the Indians inhabiting those countries. These considerations required that no time should be lost by Lord Loudon in purfuing the most vigorous measures to improve the intelligence obtained by Colonel Bradfreet. The feafon, indeed, was too far advanced to attempt Niagara this fummer; but had part of the English army, which, as we have before observed, continued all this time most shamefully inactive at Albany, marched to Ofwego on the first advice of the motions making by the French, they might have fufficiently fortified themselves there, by intrenchments and other works, fo as to have fecured that place, and the large magazines formed in it, and have been fo far in their way, and in readiness to attack Niagara. But, tho' these were objects of the utmost consequence to the success of the future operations of the war, the detaching of any troops to answer them was strongly opposed by a party at Albany, who thought, that whilft Crown-Point continued in the hands of the French, there could be no fecurity for the province of New-York.

General Winflow, who was to command an expedition against Crown-Point, was already more than sufficiently strong for that purpose, yet this party insisted on his being reinforced with two or three regiments of regular troops; and that an army should likewise continue at Albany to defend it, in case the troops sent against Crown-Point should happen to be defeated. Nay, they strongly opposed the departure of the regiment which General Abereromby had already ordered for Ofwego. Some of the New-England colonies joined that of New-York in this opposition; so that it was not without the greatest difficulty Lord Loudon, who did not think proper to do any thing material without their approbation, could for much as prevail upon them to let Colonel Webb depart for Ofwego. Therefore it was the 12th of August before that officer could leave Albany; and, by the time he reached the carrying-place between the Mohawk's river and Wood-Creek, he received the difagreeable news that Ofwego had been befieged and taken. Thus the public fafety of the whole British Empire in North America was made to yield to the private views, or rather blind prejudices, of fome leading people in the provinces of New-England and of New-York.

This unexpected intelligence struck such a panie into the Colonel, that he ordered the navigation of Wood-Creek to be destroyed, in order to prevent the French from coming to attack him; whilft they were equally bufy in filling up the mouth of the stream, to prevent their being attacked by the English.

It must be owned, however, that the assistance of this regiment alone could not have faved Ofwego; the delay of it,

therefore, cannot be deemed an unhappy circumstance. But, unfortunately for the province of New-York, doomed, as it were, to feel the first bitter fruits of the loss of Oswego, as she had been the first to contribute to that loss, Colonel Webb retreated to Burnett's Field, and from thence to Schenectady: in consequence of his so doing, instead of remaining at the German Flats; this, the finest and most plentiful part of that province, became an easy prey to the French and their Indians. Such of the inhabitants as could not sly from them, were either scalped or made prisoners, their plantations destroyed, and their houses burnt to the ground.

From the little attention bestowed on the preservation of Ofwego, it is no way furprifing that it fell fo eafily into the hands of the French; but then it is very extraordinary, that a place of fo much importance should be so neglected. The vast magazines of warlike and other stores, that had been formed there, constituted, alone, an object of the utmost consequence. Either no such magazines should have been established there, or proper fortifications should have been crected to secure them. However, it might be reafonably expected, that, as these oversights and neglects were chiefly owing to the extraordinary care and circumspection used to enable General Winslow to act vigorously against Crown-Point, they would be counterbalanced, in some measure, by his fuccess against that place; and that, in consequence of fuch fuccess, the English, by the end of the campaign, would find themselves masters of all the French forts on Lake Champlain. But all the preparations made for these important purposes terminated in strengthening Fort Edward and Fort William-Henry without striking, or even attempting to

In the beginning of November the provincial troops returned to their respective provinces, and the regulars to their quarters at Albany; leaving in Fort Edward and Fort William-Henry a garrison of five hundred men each, to secure the passage between Lake George and Hudson's river, and protect the northern frontiers of New-England and New-York against any further incursions the French might undertake during the winter.

We are now to give fome account of the plan formed by the French against Oswego, and the execution of it, to which the destruction of Fort Bull, and the attack of Colonel Bradftreet, were the preludes. This plan had been formed carly in the fpring; and accordingly, as foon as the river St. Lawrence became navigable, the troops intended for the execution of it, were ordered to rendezvous at Fort Frontinac, on Lake Ontario. Thirteen hundred regulars, and seventeen hundred militia, with a body of Indians, affembled there, in consequence of these orders; and, on the 29th of July, were joined by the Marquis de Montealm, who, immediately on his arrival at Fort Frontinac, dispatched two armed vessels to cruize off Oswego; the one of twelve, the other of sixteen guns; in order to prevent the garrison's receiving any intelligence of his defigns by water; and, at the fame time, detached a numerous body of Canadians and Indians, with orders to post themselves between Oswego and Albany, for the purpose of intercepting any messenger that might attempt to pass fromeither of these places to the other. Soon after, he ordered his advanced guard to proceed to a creek called Anse-aux-Cabannes. three leagues from Ofwego; and the first division of it arrived there the 10th of August in the morning, and in the afternoon proceeded through the woods, and took post at another creek, within half a league of Ofwego, in order to favour the debarkation of the rest of the troops as near as possible to the object of their operations. For this purpose they, immedi: ly on their arrival there, began to erect a battery pointing to Lake Ontario, in order to protect the ships and other vessels that were coming after them. The 11th and 12th they employed in making fascines, gabions, and such other things as could be made on the fpot, and were requifite to forward the use of their artillery, and in cutting a road through the woods to the place where they intended to break ground against the fort. On the 12th, the remainder of the troops arrived with the artillery and provisions; which being landed, the ground intended for the first parallel, and where the first batteries were to be creefed, was immediately traced out, at abou: two hundred yards from Fort Ontario. But before we proce 4 any further with the befiegers, it is necessary we should see hat the befieged were doing to oppose them.

It was so late before the English at Oswego scovered the French who came to attack them, that, inste i of having time to construct their batteries with common non-rials, they were forced to employ barrels of pork for that purpose, and intrench themselves with what sew tools they had, on the eminence which commanded the fort, at about two hundred yards distance. This work, which the French should have found found ready to receive them, employed the English till the 13th, by which time the French had completed a battery of ten cannon, under cover of a wood, within two hundred yards of Fort Ontario. Upon this, Colonel Mercer ordered part of Pepperel's regiment, which was posted there, to spike up their guns, destroy their ammunition and provisions, and retreat in some whale-boats he had sent for them. This disagreeable task was performed in good order; and, when the troops arrived at the Oswego side, they marched up to the new intrenchments on the eminence which we just now mentioned.

The French being, by this retreat, masters of Fort Ontario, they immediately began to work on a battery, from which, the next morning, they fired into the old fort, on the opposite side of the river, with two twelve-pounders. these they soon added two others, and one hawitzer, which enfiladed the fort fo effectually, that all the officers and men, except those on duty, were ordered out of it, and were put under cover of a breast-work. In about two hours after, three guns, which had been mounted on one of the batteries constructed with barrels of pork, were difmounted, and feveral of the fmall mortars burst. The guns, however, were re-mounted on other carriages, in spite of a heavy fire from the French; but they were again difmounted in a very short time. Upon this the Marquis de Montcalm increased his fire in the same proportion as that of the English slackened, and ordered a considerable body of men to pass the river, and take post on the Oswego side of it, in order to be in readiness to florm the fort, in conjunction with another body, which was to advance against it in boats, under cover of their ten-gun battery.

Colonel Mercer, who had been very careful to observe the motions of the French, ordered Colonel Schuyler, with five hundred men, to dispute the passage of the river with them; but he had fearcely delivered these orders, when, going into the fort, to give fome others equally necessary, he was killed by a cannon-shot. Upon this, Lieutenant-Colonel Littlehales, upon whom the command now devolved, feeing that the French had already passed the river, and were forming, ordered Colonel Schuyler back, and called a council of war, composed of the captains as well as the field-officers, to be the better able to determine what was to be done in fo critical a conjuncture. Mr. Mackeller, the chief engineer, being then asked, How long he thought it was possible for the place to hold out? and answering, " An hour," the fort was voted not tenable; and that therefore it would be the heighth of folly to wait a storm by fuch fuperior numbers. But this did not appear to be the fense of the rest of the garrison, or at least the common men. These could hardly be prevailed upon to think of surrendering to the French. However, the chamade was beat, and two officers were fent to M. de Montcalm, to know what terms he would grant them, without any instructions to atk, themselves, such as a brave garrison had a right to infift upon. The French took the advantage of this ceffation of arms. They brought up more cannon, advanced their main body within musket-shot of the place, and made every other preparation necessary to storm it; and M. de Montcalm was himself so sure of carrying his point, that all the answer he condescended to give the English officers fent out to him, was, That he was willing to receive a capitulation upon honourable terms. he came to explain himself, proved as mortifying as he well could make them, viz. That the English should give up their forts, and surrender themselves prisoners of war; in which light he indeed assured them of all the regard they could expect from the politest of nations. Then, keeping Mr. Drake, one of the officers charged with the message to him, as an hostage, till the capitulation should be signed, he sent M. de Bougainville, one of his aids-de-camp, to receive such articles as Lieutenant-Colonel Littlehales might think proper to propose to him, consistent with the terms already mentioned. However, M. de Bougainville soon returned with the following paper:

Conditions required by the Commandant at Ofwego, from the Marquis de Montcalm, Army and Field Marshal, and Commander in Chief of the troops of his Most Christian Majesty in North America.

- ARTICLE I. The garrison shall surrender prisoners of war, and shall be conducted from hence to Montreal, where they shall be treated with humanity; and every one in a manner suitable to his rank, according to the customs of war.
- II. The officers, foldiers, and others, shall have their baggage and clothes belonging to them as individuals; and shall be allowed to carry away these their effects with them.
- III. They shall remain prisoners of war till exchanged.

To these proposals, M. de Montcolm gave the following answer:

"I agree to the above articles, in the name of his Most Christian Majesty, on condition, that the besieged shall give up, faithfully, the fortifications, artillery, ammunition, magazines, barks, and boats, with their appurtenances.

"I give full power to M. de le Pauze, Major-General, to reduce this present capitulation into form, and settle the manner in which our troops are to be put in possession of the forts, and the proper steps for securing the English from any insult.

"Given at the camp before Ofwego, the 14th day (at eleven o'clock in the morning) of the month of August 1756.

M. de le Pauze having performed the task assigned him in the above answer of M. de Montealm, the garrison laid down their arms, and furrendered themselves prisoners of war. Their lofs, in killed and wounded, during this fiege, was never ascertained; that of the French was so inconsiderable as scarce to deserve the name. It consisted of one engineer, and one gunner, one French and one Canadian foldier, killed; with about twenty regulars and provincials flightly wounded. The loss of the English, during the siege, was not equal to what followed the furrender of the place. The French neglected to relieve the fentries over the English hospital, all the fick and wounded it contained were fcalped; as was likewise Lieutenant De la Court, as he lay wounded in his tent, though under the protection of a French officer. Nay, the Indians were permitted, in open contempt of the capitulation, to infult the officers and foldiers as they flood defenceless on the parade, and even to rob them of their baggage, and murder fome of them.

The furviving English officers were indeed sent off to Montreal the next day, but without their men: there they were treated in a manner not to leave any room for complaint; and, in the course of the year, most of them were exchanged.

The conquerors began to demolish the forts as foon as they could remove the magazines contained in them. These were too vast not to merit a particular enumeration. They confifted of one hundred and thirty-five pieces of artillery, of different kinds; a quantity of fmall arms; twenty-three thoufand weight of powder; eight thousand weight of lead and iron, in balls and bullets; one hundred and fifty bombs, with other finaller flores in proportion; and twelve months provifions for four thousand men. The little fleet, which had been put afloat on Lake Ontario, became likewise the prize of the conquerors, with fome veffels that were on the flocks. This fleet confifted of the Halifax fnow, pierced for eighteen guns on her main deck, but never finished; the London, a brig, pierced for fixteen guns, twelve of which were mounted; two floops; viz. the Mohawk, pierced for ten, and the Ontario, for fix guns; the Ofwego, a schooner, of fix four-pounders; and a small schooner, of twelve fwivels; with a number of boats, and a great quantity of cordage and other naval stores. If the accumulating of fuch magazines in a place not only justly deemed untenable in itself, but fituated out of the reach of immediate assistance, is not sufficient to impeach the honesty of those who were concerned in the contracts, it is at least more than enough to prove, that there existed somewhere a degree of misconduct, which alone might account for the miscarriage of the best laid plans.

The lofs of Ofwego was, in some degree at least, compenfated to the English by the fuccess of Colonel Lawrence in Acadia or Nova Scotia. He purfued his blow there; and, to make it have the defired effect, was obliged to use great feverity, as the French neutrals and Indians, who inhabited that country, refused to conform to the laws, or fwear allegiance to the King of Great Britain: nay, many of them had engaged to join, the enfuing fpring, the troops that were expected from France, on their own coast, or at Louisbourg; and some of which were taken, on their passage, with military and other flores, by the English cruizers stationed off Cape Breton. Colonel Lawrence purfued those dangerous inmates with fire and fword, burning their houses, driving off their cattle, and making one entire defart of their whole country. At length, shocked at the thoughts of utterly extirpating the French neutrals, though he knew they only waited for a fair opportunity to join the open enemies of Great Britain, he confidered that he might reconcile humanity with what he thought found policy, by transplanting them to some part or another of the British empire; where, from implacable encmies, they, or at least their children, might, in time, become useful subjects. He, therefore, distributed about seven thoufand of them that were left, amongst the different English colonies in North America; and thereby established peace and tranquility throughout the province, to the full extent of its ancient limits, as fettled in the cession made of it to Great Britain, by the treaty of Utrecht. Things continued here, in this fituation, till the month of February 1756, when a party of three hundred French and Indians began to appear on the frontiers, with a defign to make inroads about Chinecto, and cut off the English wood-cutters, who were carrying on their bufinefs business in a supposed state of the most profound security from any hostile visit. But Lieutenant-Colonel Scot having got intelligence of their defigns, marched with three hundred provincials in quest of them; and fortunately coming up with them time enough to prevent their furprifing the wood-cutters, wounded a confiderable number, and killed eight Indians on the foot.

About the month of August, Fort Granville, an inconsiderable fort on the confines of Pennsylvania, was surprised by a party of French and Indians, who made the garrifon prifoners; but, inflead of fealping them, with equal prudence and humanity, loaded them with flour, and drove them into captivity. But the Ohio Morians killed above a thousand inhabitants of the western frontiers. The death of these poor people did not remain long unrevenged. Colonel Armstrong, with a party of two hundred and eighty provincials, marched from Fort Shirley, which had been built by the Pennfylvanians on the Juniata river, about one hundred and fifty miles west of Philadelphia, to Kittanning, an Indian town, and the rendezvous of the Morian murderers, and got near enough to them to discover their fituation, early in the morning of the fifth day after his fetting out, being the 8th of September, whilft their warriors were regaling themselves at a dance. Then, halting about one hundred perches below the town, on the banks of the river, he prepared his men to attack them; and led them on for that purpose as foon as it was light. Captain Jacobs, the chief of the Indians, gave the war-whoop, and defended his house bravely, through loop-holes in the loggs with which it was built. Colonel Armstrong offered them quarter; but many of them juftly fuspecting the fincerity of the offer, as the many inhuman murders they had been guilty of were yet fresh fresh in their memories, they refused to submit. Armflrong, therefore, ordered their houses to be fet on fire, which was immediately done; and many of the Indians were thereby fuffocated and burnt; others were shot in attempting to reach the river: Captain Jacobs, his fquaw, and a boy called the King's Son, met the fame fate, as they were getting out of the window; and all were fealped. These Indians had a great number of fire-arms ready loaded in their houses, and a large quantity of gun-powder, which went off, blew up their houses, and killed many of them. Eleven English prifoners were releafed from captivity, or, perhaps, a most cruel death. These informed the Colonel, that, on that very day, two boats filled with Frenchmen, and a large party of Delawares, were expected to join Captain Jacobs, in order to procced on an expedition concerted against Fort Shirley; and that, with this view, an advanced party of twenty-four warriors had been detached the preceding evening to reconnoitre the country.

This intelligence was foon after confirmed by Lieutenant Hogg, who had been left to feize on a party of Indians, fupposed not to exceed four, whom Colonel Armstrong's scouts had discovered the night before round a fire, but whom he did not chuse to interrupt, lest any one of them might escape and alarm the town. In the morning, when Mr. Hogg attacked this party, they proved to be the twenty-four who had been detached from Kittanning. The first fire that Mr. Hogg gave, killed three of them; but the Indians killed as many of his men in return; upon which the rest of his detachment fled, leaving him desperately wounded behind them. Colonel Armstrong, being informed of this misfortune, sent out a party to bring in Mr. Hogg, who, notwithstanding all the care that could be taken of him, died of his wounds. Severe as this chassifiement of the Indians may appear to be, the effects of it proved merely local. On almost every other part of the frontiers, parties of them and the French still kept skulking, to seize an opportunity of massacring all the British subjects who might come in their way, without respect to age or sex. The governor of Pennsylvania had indeed the good fortune to conclude a treaty of peace with the Delaware Indians, inhabiting the borders of the Susquehanna; and secured the friendship and alliance of the Catawbas. A fort was built at Winchester, called Fort Loudon; and some Cherokees joined the garrison of Fort Cumberland.

Experience had taught the English the folly of any great dependence on these alliances with the Indians; yet the prefent created hopes that, with their affiftance, they should be able to profecute the next campaign in North-America with more vigour than any of the former; especially as reinforcements of regular troops had already landed on that continent. The feafon was too far advanced to admit of any new enterprize against the enemy. Lord Loudon, therefore, confined his endeavours to the making of preparations for taking the field early the following fpring, and in fecuring the frontiers of the colonies: in forming of an uniform plan of action; and infuling a spirit of concord into the provinces, who were divided in their opinions, or at least acted as if they were, perpetually thwarting each other from illiberal principles of parfimony, at a time when they ought to hazard their whole property to oppose the encroachments of those whose designs extended against their liberties and lives.

lives. The Forts Edward and William-Henry were, as we have before observed, well garrisoned, and otherwise put into a proper posture of defence; and, excepting some scouting parties, the remainder of the troops continued in winter-quarters at Albany, where barracks had been built for that purpose. The same precaution was taken at Halifax in Nova Scotia, and three new forts were erected to secure that place against any surprize.

The French army had likewife retired into winter-quarters; fo that, on that account, as well as the feverity of the feafon, nothing material could be expected to happen for fome months. Thus, then, ended the fecond campaign between the English and French in North-America, in which the arms of the former were fo much dishonoured by misconduct and timidity, that they would have been utterly contemptible, had it not been for the conduct and resolution with which Colonel Bradstreet behaved when attacked by the French on the Chondaga river. Whilft preparations were making on both fides for the next campaign, Captain Rogers, on that of the English, was constantly employed in patroling the woods about the Forts Edward and William-Henry, and observing the motions of the French at Ticonderoga and Crown-Point; and this fervice he performed with fo much alertness, that he made a great number of prisoners, and thereby procured very good intelligence of the enemy. The substance of this intelligence was, that M. de Montcalm intended to attack Fort William-Henry, as foon as the weather would permit him to take the field.

If, from their numbers, the English had reason to hope that they should be able to push the ensuing campaign with more more vigour than the preceding, almost every subsequent event feemed to thwart their expectations. Notwithstanding the endeavours of the Earl of Loudon to establish unanimity amongst the English colonies, their private interest blinded them to fuch a degree, as to frustrate all the arguments he could think of to effect to defirable a purpofe. This obliged him to become a mediator, in order to engage them to raife the necessary supplies for prosecuting the war. But this his laudable zeal was attended with very little fuccess: diffidence and difcord making them procrastinate those meafures which required the most immediate execution. The French were too wife to omit taking advantage of the diftracted fituation of the British colonies. By their successes in the last campaign, they were become entirely masters of all the lakes, and thereby were furnished with the means of practifing on the Indians by prefents and promifes. Every accession to the strength of the French was a real diminution of that of the English. The French had promifed the Indians, that they would reduce the forts at Ofwego; and their having fucceeded in the enterprize, gave them, qualified as they were to judge only by appearances, an idea of their fuperiority, which M. de Montcalm very well knew how to improve to his advantage. Whilst the precipitate retreat of Colonel Webb, his filling up of Wood-Creek, and thereby deflroying the only communication the English had with that part of the country of the Five Nations, exposed these Indians to the mercy of their enemies, and opened the path for the defolation and the ruin which attended the German Flats. This, with the destruction of the fort at the carrying-place, so alienated even the Indians of the Five Nations, that it was with the utmost difficulty that Sir William Johnson, with all his prudence,

In the mean time, the Earl of Loudon exerted himself in collecting a sufficient force to strike a decisive blow. With this view, the resolution to attack Crown-Point, which had been so long in agitation, was now laid aside; the taking of that place being an object of far less importance than the reducing of Louisbourg, which was substituted in its stead. Besides, the strength of the mother-country could be more easily brought against this place; and was not so liable to suffer from the distunion of her colonies.

Accordingly preparations were making in England for this grand defign, with the greatest vigour and celerity. In the month of January 1757, a considerable body of troops, under Major-General Hopson, as commander in chief, and the Colonels Perry, Forbes, Lord Howe, and other able officers, with a detachment of artillery, were ordered to rendezvous at Cork, and there wait the arrival of a formidable sleet sitting out to escort them to America, and assist them in their operations there. Yet notwithstanding all the dispatch that could be used, it was the 26th of April before this sleet arrived at Cork, when the armament formed thereby consisted of the following land and sea forces.

This force, in conjunction with that already in North America, was to affemble at Halifax in Nova-Scotia, and from thence proceed to the attack of Louisbourg.

It was not without a jealous eye that the French beheld the preparations of the English; nor were they ignorant of the object these preparations were levelled against. roughly fenfible of the importance of Louisbourg to their possessions and trade in North America, and particularly to their fisheries on the banks of Newfoundland, they gave immediate orders for equipping, with the utmost expedition, three feveral fquadrons, to cover and defend that place, as well as to firengthen their forces on the continent. One of thefe fquadrons was fitted out at Toulen, and found means to fleal out of the Mediterranean, in spite of all the vigilance of Admiral Saunders, who was flationed off Gibraltar to intercept it; and the other two, which were equipped in the French ports of the ocean, had got to fea, before a powerful fleet, which was deflined to attack them, could be made fufficiently ready for that purpofe.

Whilst the French were preparing for the next campaign with so much vigour at home, M. de Montealm vied with them, to the utmost of his power, in Canada. He kept continually on foot, during the whole winter, several small parties, whose business it was to scour the woods, procure intelligence, intercept the supplies of provisions which the English might attempt to send to their out-forts, and harass their back-settlements.

The feafon being now fomewhat advanced, the French were as good as their word respecting Fort William-Henry. M. de Regaud

M. de Regaud Regaud was ordered to proceed against that place, with a detachment of about twelve hundred men; and arrived before it on the 19th of March; when, advancing against it without any precaution, his troops were fo warmly received with a brifk discharge of cannon and mulketry, that they thought proper to retire, after having endeavoured in vain to fet fire to a floop and the boats belonging to the fort. From the implements which they left behind them, it appeared, that their hopes were founded on the fuccess of a general assault. Accordingly, notwithstanding this first disappointment, they made their appearance foon again, in fuch a disposition as indicated a design to surround the fort. They advanced, for some time, with a great deal of bravery, through a continual discharge of cannon and fmall arms; but they again retreated. On the 20th, about midnight, they refumed the attack, fully refolved to florm the fort with their whole force; but this attempt succeeded no better than the former. They were driven back a third time; and, after fetting fire to two floops and feveral boats, retired at day-break. About noon, they feemed to take the rout of Ticonderoga; but, all on a fudden, fent back two men with ared flag towards the fort; from whence an officer and four men were ordered out to meet them. This party carried one of the Frenchmen into the fort, with a letter from M. de Vaudreuil, directed to the commanding officer of Fort William-Henry, and importing. " That he had fent M. le Chevalier de la Merciere, commander of the artillery, to acquaint him with his resolutions; and that he might give entire credit to what that gentleman should fay to him in his behalf." M. de la Merciere, who was the other person, was, upon this, brought into the fort, blindfolded. His message was, in substance, "That M. de Vaudreuil, being very averse to the shedding M 2

ding of human blood, should be glad to put an end to the war; and therefore, for this good purpose, as the English had been the aggressors, by encroaching upon the territories of his Most Christian Majesty, and building forts upon them, he proposed, that the said forts might be delivered up to him in a peaceable manner; in which case the garrisons should be allowed all the honours of war, and be permitted to carry away all their valuable effects, leaving only fomething to gratify the Indians, from whom they had nothing to fear. as there were regulars enough to protect them from any violence that might be offered: That, if these terms were not accepted, the French would make a general affault; in which, fhould they fucceed, the garrifon must take the consequences." To this extraordinary fummons, Major Eyres, the commanding officer, returned the following short answer: "That it was his fixed resolution to defend his Majesty's fort to the last extremity." M. de la Merciere was then dismissed, and conducted back blindfolded. Soon after he arrived at his own army, the French wheeled about, and prepared every thing for a general affault. But neither their threats nor fuperior numbers could intimidate the garrison. Both men and officers behaved with the greatest vigilance, and shewed the greatest refolution, fully determined to die rather than yield; and they had occasion for it all. The French returned to the attack; but were again obliged to retire for the fourth time. Nevertheless, as though this was a service to be executed at all events, they once more prepared for an affault; and in the night made a general attack; but still without success. Upon this, they fet fire to feveral store-houses belonging to the provincial troops, and to all the huts of the rangers, which were confumed. They afterwards burnt a floop on the flocks; and then totally disappeared. Had not this garrison been strong enough, and resolute enough to make a proper use of that strength, nothing could have hindered the French from penetrating to Albany; the consequences of which might have been fatal to every part of the British empire in North America.

The miscarriage of this attempt against Fort William-Henry, was fomewhat alleviated to the French by an advantage they gained over a detachment of about four hundred men, commanded by Colonel John Parker, who went by water to attack their advanced guard, near Ticonderoga. He landed in the night on an island; and, before day-break, fent three boats to the main-land, to reconnoitre the enemy. But the French, being on their guard, furprifed these boats, and made all the men in them prisoners. Then, having procured, by this capture, intelligence of the Colonel's defigns, they formed their plan accordingly. They posted three hundred men in ambush behind the point where he proposed to land; and fent the boats they had taken, with men of their own in them, to the place where he had ordered his own men to lie on their oars, as a fignal for him to land. The bait took. Colonel Parker, believing these boats to be still his, eagerly put on shore, where he was furrounded by the enemy, who had been reinforced in the mean time, with four hundred men; and was attacked with fo much impetuofity, that, of his whole detachment, not above the one half escaped being either killed or taken priioners.

Whilft the little war was thus carrying on, the Earl of Loudon was feriously engaged in making every necessary preparation to assemble his troops, and repair to the rendezvous at Halifax; and, the better to conceal his defigns from the enemy, render provisions cheaper to the English forces, and make fure of a fufficient number of veffels to carry his troops to Louisbourg, he laid an embargo on all the ships in the English North-American ports. But the merchants and planters; all, in fine, except those who were not concerned in the contracts for the army and navy, cried out loudly against the measure. They openly affirmed, that it was impossible it thould ever do any good; whereas it already did a great deal of mischief, by causing a stagnation in every branch of trade, and rendering corn a dreg in America, at a time when England was in danger of a famine for want of it. For, just before the orders for this embargo were iffued, accounts had been received from England, that, through a failure of the last year's crops, both in England and Ireland, bread was become fo excellive dear, that the common people, in many places, were on the point of rifing; and, with these melancholy accounts, there came orders to ship considerable quantities of wheat and flour, to relieve the nation from this diftrefs. Nay, these orders were so pressing, that most of them had been already complied with, and feveral veffels loaded before the embargo took place. The merchants, and indeed the whole body of the people of England, who fuffered equally, if not more, by this prepoflerous measure, than the Americans, were proportionally difgusted and provoked by it; and complained of it in fuch bitter terms, and remonstrated against it with so much spirit, that instructions were immediately fent to the respective governors of the British colonies in North-America, never, for the future, to attempt laying any embargo on thips bound from their ports to those of Great Britain or Ircland.

A confiderable part of the English troops stationed on the northern frontiers of the British settlements adjoining to Canada, and in other parts, were now drawn to New-York, where a number of transports were collected together, and ordered to be in readiness to receive them. On the 6th of May, Sir Charles Hardy, governor of that place, hoisted his slag as rear-admiral of the blue, on board the Nightingale of twenty guns; the troops expecting every day to embark, as the commander in chief waited only to hear of the fleet from England being arrived at Halifax. During this state of suspence, on the 20th, there was a hot prefs at New-York, and four hundred men were taken into the fervice. Between the 22d and the 25th, the troops were embarked, and ordered to Sandy-hook, where the transports came to an anchor. On the 5th of June, Lord Loudon followed, and embarked on board the Sutherland, now commanded by Rear-Admiral Sir Charles Hardy; determined, however, not to fail without further intelligence: for, before he left New-York, he had learned from the prifoners made on board fome French ships brought into that port, that these prizes were part of a fleet of French merchant-men, under convoy of five ships of the line, designed for Louisbourg, from which they had not been a long while feparated. This intelligence was confirmed by an express from Boston, informing him, That five French ships of the line, and a frigate, commanded by Monsieur de Beaufremont, had been feen cruifing off Halifax, to intercept, it was thought, Sir Charles Hardy's fleet; but had retired, in confequence of the report of a fisherman, that the English had actually twenty fail of the line in the harbour of Halifax. This news, as far as it concerned the arrival of the fleet from England, being falfe, it was highly probable, that as foon as M. de Beaufremont fliould.

should find it to be so, he would return to his station. As therefore Sir Charles Hardy was by no means a match for him, Lord Loudon had no expedient left but to continue at anchor, and dispatch two ships of war to reconnoitre the coast. These ships returning without being able to see the enemy, or learn any thing about them, the sleet was ordered to unmoor, and sailed from the Hook on the 20th, with instructions to rendezvous, in case of separation, at Halifax. This armament consisted of the Sutherland of 50 guns, the Nightingale of 20, the Vulture of 14, the Ferret of 16, and about seventy transports, having on board the 22d, 42d, 44th and 48th regiments, two battalions of Royal Americans, together with five companies of rangers commanded by Captain Rogers.

Part of a battalion of Royal-Americans, about a thousand of the Pennfylvania, three hundred Maryland, and fix hundred Virginia provincials, commanded by Colonel Stanwix, were ordered for the protection of the western frontiers; and, in Carolina, part of a battalion of Royal-Americans, commanded by Colonel Bouquet, with three independent companies, and the colony troops, were to be employed for the fame purpofe. The only force left to observe and oppose the vigilant and active M. de Montcalm on the frontiers of New-York, was the garrifon of Fort William-Henry, commanded by Colonel Monro, with an army of four thousand men under Colonel Webb to cover it. But though Webb was well acquainted with all the motions of M. de Montcalm, he beheld them with an indifference and security bordering on infatuation. In particular, he neglected to contect the militia, which, when affembled, would have been sufficient to oblige M. de Montcalm to relinquish a design he had formed, to renew the operations against Fort William-

Henry, or at least would have rendered the execution of it very doubtful and hazardous. At length, however, the appearance of M. de Montcalm on the Lake, rouzed him from his lethargy; but filled him, at the fame time, with fuch terrible apprehensions, that he determined to retire immediately to Fort Edward. But he was prevailed on to flay till the next morning, when he marched off early with a strong train of artillery, leaving Colonel Monro, with about two thousand men, to defend the fort.

We must now take leave of the English for a short time, to relate the proceedings of the French immediately prior and subsequent to the appearance of M. de Montcalm on the Lake. No fooner had Lord Loudon put to fea, than M. de Montcalm feized on the fair opportunity thereby afforded him, of renewing his favourite project against Fort William-Henry. He had collected his forces at Ticonderoga, where, being joined by a confiderable body of Indians, his whole army amounted to about eight thousand men, well provided with artillery and stores of every kind in proportion to their numbers. He therefore loft no time in putting his troops in motion, part by land, and part in boats. Those who marched by land, were commanded by M. de Levi, and confifted of fix companies of grenadiers; feven pickets, of fifty men each; ten brigades of Canadians, of four hundred men each; another body of three hundred Canadians, and feven or eight hundred Indians. These forces began their rout on the 30th of July. On the ist of August, the remainder embarked, and proceeded in the following order: the artillery, the regiments of La Reine and Languedoc, and one battalion of the marine, formed the first division, by way of an advanced guard; the regiments of Guienne and La Sarre followed; the boats, with the mortars, ammunition N ammunition and other stores, guarded by the regiment of Royal Roufillon, and a corps of Canadians under M. de Rigaud, formed a rear guard; the whole under the command of M. de Montcalm in person. At midnight they arrived at a bay which the Indians called Ganousky bay; where they found M. de Levi in a very good fituation, either to favour their debarkation, or to receive an enemy. The next day, about noon, M. de Levi began his march; and the rest of the army, about two hours after, proceeded in their boats, and at about ten in the evening arrived in a bay very near the fort. Some French favages perceiving two English boats at a distance, and fearing they might be discovered by them, Guisensick, chief of the Abenakies, purfued them with two canoes, and paddled towards them with fo much celerity, that one of the boats furrendered with little refistance; when all the men in it, except two, were massacred: the other escaped. The prifoners made in that which was taken, informed M. de Montcalm, that the garrifon had difcovered his approach, and intended to make a fortic of twelve hundred men to meet the French in the woods. This news was agreeably received, as a battle, he hoped, would superfede the necessity of a siege. The flate and position of the English, of which till now the French had not the least idea, became likewise known to them by this accident; fo that, being no longer under any necessity to fecret themselves, part of their savages, in canoes, to the number of one hundred and twenty, flood out into the Lake; and forming a chain from one fide to the other, gave their cry of war. The army likewise began their march by land, M. de Levi commanding the advanced guard, which was composed of all the favages left on shore. As the rest of the army approached the fort, it formed into three columns, whilst the favages  favor where feat Auguing the mo-favages retired into the woods; where discovering a party which had been in search of some cattle, they soon took forty scalps, and sifty head of cattle. The French spent the 3d of August in reconnoitring the place and its environs, and erecting some batteries; but their savages being impatient to begin the attack on the fort before any cannon could be mounted, M. de Montcalm, the next day, sent the Governor the following summons.

August 4th, 1757.

"I have this morning invested your fort with a numerous army, a superior artillery, and all the savages from the upper parts of the country, the cruelty of whom a detachment of your garrison has so lately experienced. I am obliged in humanity to desire you to surrender your fort. I have it yet in my power to restrain the savages, and to oblige them to observe a capitulation, as none of them have been as yet killed; which it will not be in my power to do in other circumstances; and your persisting to defend your fort, can only retard the loss of it a few days, and must infallibly expose an unhappy garrison who can receive no succours considering the precautions that I have taken. I demand a decisive answer immediately, for which purpose I have sent you the Sieur Fonvive, one of my aids-de-camp. You may give entire credit to what he will inform you, as from me.

I am, with respect, &c.

MONTCALM."

This fummons was answered by Colonel Monro with that fpirit which the importance of his charge required. He said, he was determined to defend the fort till the last extremity, or till, by the affistance of Colonel Webb, M. de Montcalm should be compelled to retire.

This determined answer served only to accelerate the works of the French, who not meeting any opposition from the quarter whence they most dreaded it, the army under Colonel Webb, prosecuted the siege with the utmost vigour. In the night between the 4th and 5th, the trenches were so far advanced, that on the 6th, at day-break, the fort was saluted with ten pieces of cannon and one nine-inch mortar. This gave the savages fresh spirits, though they did not want any increase to be sufficiently mischievous. Numbers of them, skulking behind stumps of trees; and others, who with some Canadians had found means to hide themselves in a garden near the fort, kept a constant sire on every thing that appeared on the ramparts, and continued it during the whole siege.

The besieged, notwithstanding, conducted their defence with the greatest spirit and resolution. Neither the threats nor the promises of M. de Montealm made any impression on them, as long as they continued in a condition to defend themselves, or could reasonably hope for any assistance from Colonel Webb. But the vanity of depending on him was soon evinced by the arrival of M. de Bougainville, with an intercepted letter from Colonel Webb to Colonel Monro, which M. de Montealm immediately sent him. This letter imported, that he did not think it prudent to attempt a junction with the Colonel, or endeavour to assist him, till he should be reinforced by the militia of the colonies; and therefore advised him to make the best terms he could. Though every prospect of relief from Colonel Webb was now at an end, the garrison still per-

MONTCALM.

Notwithstanding this capitulation, the Indian chiefs infisted on the performance of a previous agreement made with M, de Montcalm, who had promifed them the plunder of the English; and, on M. de Montcalm's refusing to comply, they refolved to execute the agreement themselves. Accordingly, as foon as the garrifon had furrendered, they began an affault upon the men, killing and scalping about ten or a dozen of them. The Colonels Monro and Young, with a great number, found means to gain protection from the French; and about fix hundred more of the garrifon fled and escaped to Fort-Edward. The French Indians made flaves of all the English Indians and negroes; and the French demolished the fort, deftroyed all the English vessels and boats upon the Lake, carried off all the artillery and other warlike flores and baggage, one hundred live oxen, and provisions for five thousand men for fix months; but without purfuing their fuccess by any other attempt.

That the French favages broke this capitulation, is universally confessed; and it has been said, it was with the confent and approbation of M. de Montealm: that a partizan who led the French savages, gave the death halloo, when the English marched out of the Fort, to gratify the Indians.

in their lust for blood and plunder. But the truth is, that as foon as the horrid fcene commenced, M. de Montcalm exerted his utmost endeavours to put a stop to it. He laid bare his own bosom, and bade them kill their father, but spare the English, who were now under his protection; he even defired the English to defend themselves, and fire on the favages; but the English were seized with such an unaccountable flupor, that they fubmitted to the tomahawk without refiflance; nor were M. de Montealm's officers idle in the cause of humanity; many of them were wounded in endeavouring to refeue the persons of the English from the barbarous rage of the favages; and, after they had got them into their tents, flood themselves as centries over them for their prefervation, till the fury of their favage allies had fubfided. Incidents of this kind are almost always exaggerated in the recital; for the impressions of fear are in general too flubborn to yield to the clearest truths; and the prejudices of weak minds are not to be removed by the efforts of reason, which can operate on those alone who possess it. Hence it is, that the car of credulity is fo often imposed on by the false representation of actions, which, when related with impartiality, are many times found deferving the highest approbation. If it be asked, Why M. de Montcalm did not make use of his own troops to prevent these cruelties? the answer is obvious; the English were armed, and superior in number to the savages; and were, besides, as we have already faid, defired by the French General to defend themselves; nay, even to fire on the Indians his friends. Moreover, the balance of power in North-America, was now in the hands of the favages; and however humanity might urge M. de Montcalm to interfere with his whole force, reasons of policy and duty to his country bade him not hazard the consequences that might attend such a step. Though we cannot help shuddering at the recollection of this tragical event, yet candour requires we should speak of it as we have done. Let not then the generosity of the English, when it can take place consistent with truth, suffer an undeferved blot to remain and sully the reputation of a noble enemy and an excellent soldier.

Having thus related the consequences of the Earl of Loudon's taking so many of the English troops from this part of North-America, it is now necessary we should pursue the detail of the enterprize in which these troops were to be employed, as the success of it could scarce fail to determine the issue of the war.

We have faid, that Lord Loudon failed from Sandy Hook on the 20th of June; but we did not observe, that, as there was some reason to apprehend he might meet in his passage with a French fleet superior to that which carried him, especially as there was no account of Admiral Holborne, it was rather trusting too much to chance to risque the loss of so considerable a part of the troops as were to be employed in the expedition. The only excuse therefore, if any, that can, with any propriety, be urged for such an hazardous attempt, was the season being so far advanced, and the necessity there was of saving as much time as possible for the business of the approaching campaign. Be that as it will, Fortune seemed to interest herself in conducting the arma-

A detachment of the fortieth, the forty-fifth, and the forty-feventh regiments, with a detachment of Royal Artillery, had been for fome time at Halifax. As foon as the troops from New-York had landed, the ground being uneven, the men were employed in making a parade for exercise, and a garden to furnish vegetables for the fick and wounded, who might be tent thither for their recovery, in case the intended attack against Louitbourg should take place.

In the mean time, feveral of the best failing vessels were dispatched, under able pilots, to look into Louisbourg harbour, and make what discoveries might be necessary; and some of the English sleet were daily arriving, till, at length, by the ninth of July, the whole armament was assembled. It consisted of the following ships and regiments; which were immediately formed in the order in which we give them.

the farce of sham battles and sieges was acted in the highest degree; in order, as it was faid, to perfect the undisciplined troops in the whole art of attack and defence. Whether the General could have better employed his army or not, thefe measures were highly censured by some as trisling away the courage of the foldiers, and expending the wealth of the nation, in mock engagements and planting of cabbages, when they should have been usefully employed in real attacks on the enemies of their king and country. The extraordinary ardour of Lord Charles Hay having made him much louder than others in condemning Lord Loudon's behaviour on this occasion, a council of war was called to confider the tendency of his reflections; and the confequence was his being put under an arreft. At length, from intelligence received by vessels that had been ordered to keep on the look-out for that purpose, it was determined to profecute the intended enterprize; and the troops were embarked the first and second of August, with orders to rendezyous at Gabarus bay, a little to the westward of Louisbourg harbour. But, on the fourth, before they could put to fea, it was discovered by a French prize schooner, which, after a chase of several hours, had been taken on the banks of Newfoundland, that there was then actually in garrifon at Louisbourg three thousand regulars, besides some Indians, and the Burghers who had taken up arms; and, in the harbour, the following formidable French fleet, which had arrived there fo early as the month of June: For, on the fourth of that month, M. This intelligence produced a council of war, the refult of which was to recal the former orders to rendezvous at Gabarus bay, and even totally change the plan of the campaign.

Accordingly, the royal and twenty-eighth regiments were ordered to difembark and encamp, all the other regiments remaining on board, with orders to fend for their heavy baggage and and the fick which they had left on shore. The twenty-seventh, the forty-third, and the forty-sixth regiments, with a detachment of the royal artillery, were to be in readiness to sail for the bay of Fundy under the command of Governor Lawrence; and, when the object of this detachment was fulfilled, the twenty-seventh were to go to Boston, and six companies of the forty-third to Annapolis. The other four were to garrison-Fort Edward about thirty-six miles from Halifax; and the forty-sixth Fort Cumberland. Major-General Hopson was left to command at Halifax, and the rest of the army was to proceed with the earl of Loudon to New-York, whilst Admiral Holborne was to cruize off Louisbourg, and watch the motions of the French sleet in that harbour, in order, if possible, to bring them to an action.

These resolutions were taken on the fixteenth of August, and, in purfuance of them, the whole fleet foon got under way, the fhips which composed it taking their course agreeable to their feveral deftinations. But they were fearce feparated, when an express arrived from Boston with dispatches to the earl of Loudon, informing him of the fate of Fort William-Henry. A fignal therefore was made for the fleet to lie to, and a council of war was immediately held on board the Winchelfea; in confequence of which, the orders of the twenty-feventh and forty-fixth regiments were altered; thefe corps were now to accompany the earl of Loudon, and General Hopson was to replace them with the twenty-eighth. Matters being thus fettled, the feveral fquadrons made fail again in the evening; Admiral Holborne for Louitbourg; that with Lord Loudon for New-York; and that with the rest of the troops which had not been relanded for the bay of Fundy.

On the thirty-first of August, Lord Loudon arrived with his troops at New-York, where they were immediately put on board fmall veffels, and fent to Albany. Fort Edward being now the most advanced post of the English, the garrison was increased, and the command of it given to Lieutenant-Colonel Haviland. Lord Loudon likewife repaired thither in person to give some directions about its defences, and afterwards returned to Albany. Captain Rogers was then dispatched on a scout to Ticonderoga, with orders to make fome prifoners. Having fucceeded, he returned with them to Fort Edward. account given by these prisoners was, that the garrison of Ticonderoga confifted of about three hundred and fifty regulars; and that of Crown-Point of about one hundred and fifty. The weakness of these posts naturally suggested the propriety of hazarding an attempt on the first by an escalade; but, after many preparations for that purpose, the project was abandoned.

The forty-third regiment, and the detachment of artillery, commanded by Governor Lawrence, arrived in Beau-Basin, about five miles from Fort Cumberland, on the twenty-fourth of August; and, on the twenty-fixth, was disembarked and encamped. A detachment of the fortieth, forty-fifth, and forty-seventh regiments, equal to a battalion, were already in garrison there, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Wilmot. On the thirtieth, the twenty-eighth regiment arrived and encamped. These troops were intended for the protection of Fort Cumberland, and the circumjacent country. They were kept in constant alarms by finall parties of the French rangers, and were extremely harassed in constructing of lines, and otherwise making furd the valuexp by the Fort Cumberland a respectable station. This work being completed by the eighth of October, the forty-third regiment was ordered to embark their baggage; and the twenty-eighth to remain in garrison with a company of rangers. On the four-teenth of October, six companies of the forty-third sailed for Annapolis Royal; and the other four for Fort Edward, in order to relieve the garrisons of these places, which sailed for Halisax. On the twenty-sisth, Governor Lawrence, who had touched at Annapolis in his way from Fort Cumberland, sailed also for Halisax with the detachment of the fortieth, forty-sisth, and forty-seventh regiments, which he had brought with him from Fort Cumberland.

The garrifons of Annapolis Royal and Fort Edward were obliged to be alert; for parties of the French kept continually skulking about in their neighbourhood. This, together with the severity of the season, and sometimes a scarcity of provisions, involved them in great distress.

Nothing worthy of our attention attended the troops under Colonel Stanwix, or those that were detached to the southward under Lieutenant-Colonel Bouquet.

In the conduct of this campaign, Lord Loudon was cenfured for having ordered fo many of the regular troops from the frontiers of New-York, and thereby leaving to extensive and valuable a part of that country, as well as the province itself, exposed to the infults of the enemy. But this conclusion is by no means just. He was well warranted in drawing off these forces, by the strength of the garrison of Fort William-P Henry, 1757.

Henry, confiding of a detachment of the thirty-fifth, and a battalion of the Royal American regiment, exclusive of the provincials; the whole amounting to two thousand men. For these troops, with the army under Colonel Webb, and the militia which he ought to have assembled, were doubtless strong enough, if conducted with proper resolution, to oppose and frustrate any designs of the French. A general, indeed, ought not to be accountable for the behaviour of his subordinate officers; but then, it is his duty to take care that such as are appointed to particular commands under him, should be men of approved courage and abilities; the retreat, or rather the slight, of Colonel Webb, when he heard of the loss of Oswego, could not recommend him to the commander in chief as possessed

Though the defensive plans of the English were thus shamefully neglected, and their offenfive views against Louisbourg miscarried, in some degree, it must be owned, through an unforefeen event, yet there was no occasion for perfilling in the defign against that place fo long as to be obliged to omit other operations. Minute intelligence is the fountain of fuccefs. Without it, the measures of a general must be continually exposed to the sport of chance. It had, no doubt, been highly centurable in Lord Loudon to have profecuted the intended enterprize, without knowing fomewhat certain of the flrength of the French; but, furely, the proper fleps fhould have been taken to attain that knowledge in time. Had this been done, the council of war would have come to the fame conclusions much earlier; and the troops, of courfe, might have been back time enough to fave Fort Wil-Ham-Henry.

Thus ended the third campaign between the English and the French in North-America, in which the English, notwith-standing their manifest superiority over the French, left their allies exposed to the resentment of a cruel enemy, and suffered the inhabitants of their back-settlements to be massacred in their sight, to the eternal reproach of those who directed the British arms in this part of the world, and not without dishonour to the British name.

Though the unfortunate operations of the Earl of Loudon in the field did not, as we have already hinted, escape the severity of censure, his abilities in council were productive of such plans, as, in future, added greatly to the natural power of the British colonies in North-America, and rouzed them into such an exertion of their strength, as procured them almost immediate security. This happy condition was so much improved by a succeeding commander, as to enable them, with the affishance of the mother-country, to subdue the whole power of France in that part of the world.

Whilft the feverity of the feafon confined the respective armies in their different quarters, the sparks of war were kept alive by a few scouting parties, without any material advantage on either side; and, in the mean time, a change in the English ministry having produced the recal of the Earl of Loudon, the command of the English forces devolved on Major-General Abercromby.

The English fleet, whilst cruizing off Louisbourg, was furprifed, on the 24th of September, by a violent gale of wind, in which the whole of it had nearly perished. The Tilbury was driven ashore on the island of Cape Breton; and two hun-

The Newark drove into Halifax, after throwing eight of her guns overboard. Others were obliged to do the fame, being, for the greatest part, dismassed. In this distressed situation, Admiral Holborne, with as many ships as he could collect, made the best of his way for England, excepting only a small squadron which he left at Halifax, under the command of Lord Colville, to protect the trade of the English, and watch the motions of the French in those seas.

THE plans of action formed by the English ministry for the preceding campaign in North-America, were such as could not be executed but at a very monstrous expence; and therefore, their having been little more than barely

of CAPE BRETON

barely attempted, gave the people of England the greatest difguil. They were, and not without reason, tired with seeing those preparations end in an empty blaze, which shey were made to believe must terminate in the reduction of the power and pride of Trance; and for which they had, accordingly, most cheerfully granted the ministry all their exorbitant demands. They were shocked at the fight of fleets returning to their harbours, and the news of armies retiring to their winter-quarters, almost without striking a fingle stroke; and began to grow fo clamorous, attributing all their loffes and difgraces to the want of honefly, or spirit, or prudence, in those about the throne, that the King of Great Britain thought it necessary to remove his ministers, and replace them with men more agreeable to the bulk of his fubjects. Of this number was again appointed Mr. Pitt, one of the fecretaries of flate; a poft, which, by every virtue and talent necessary to fill it worthily, became, in him, equivalent to that of prime minister. The refeuing, therefore, the foldiery from that languor into which the dispirited behaviour of their leaders had thrown them, and the English arms from that dishonour which was the unhappy confequence of both, feemed to demand the first exertion of his superior abilities, in which the people had placed the most unbounded confidence; and this confidence he immediately juffified, by meafures which infpired every department and every rank with new life. He refumed the expedition against Cape Breton; and, informed by late experience, that wifdom and precaution in the cabinet avail little without adequate conduct and resolution in the field, he thought it high time to employ other officers in both the military and naval fervice in North-America. Accordingly, having observed in Colonel Amherst a solid judgment, a steady courage, and an active genius, he, without fear of offending others older in command, in a case where the honour and interest of his country were deeply concerned, recommended him so strenuously to the King, that he was thereupon recalled from the service in Germany, promoted to the rank of major-general, and appointed to command the land-forces destined for the attack of Louisbourg.

Nor was Mr. Pitt lefs guarded and alert in providing for the fuccess of the naval service in that part of the world. The honourable Edward Boscawen was named to the command of a grand fleet to join in that attains; and, so early as the 19th of February, sailed from Portsmoulling for Halifax in Nova-Scotia, to be not only in the greater readiness to act himself in his own province, but make all the preparations he could to enable General Amherst to proceed in his with the utmost vigour. With this view, he was provided with a commission that gave him the command even of the army, till it should be superseded by the arrival of General Amherst.

As the operations of the English on the continent were once more to be directed against Ticonderoga and Fort du Quesne, Captain Rogers, being appointed a major in America only, and the corps of rangers under his command being augmented, was ordered to discover the strength of the French at the first of these places. Accordingly, the Major issued from Fort Edward, on this service, with one hundred and seventy men, on the 10th of March; but, on the 13th, he unexpectedly fell in with a party of one hundred trench, and fix hundred Indians. A fevere action was the confequence; in which both the Major and those under him did every thing that could be expected from good officers and foldiers, killing about one hundred and fifty of the enemy, and wounding as many more; though not without losing five of his officers, and about one hundred rank and file killed. The enemy, therefore, still retaining their superiority in point of strength, and leaving him, of course, but very little hopes of succeeding better in a second attack, he thought it prudent to retreat. Lieutenant Philips, and a few men, who had surrendered, in this assair, to the French Indians, in confequence of a promise of protection, were inhumanly tied up to trees, and cut to pieces.

We are now to return to Admiral Boscawen and General Amherst, whose operations were not only superior in importance, but prior in time, to those upon the continent. The former, as has been already observed, failed, from Portsmouth, tor Halifax in Nova-Scotia, where all the forces, both of sea and land, destined against Louisbourg, were to rendezvous. On the 16th of March, General Amherst embarked, at Portsmouth, on board the Dublin man of war, Captain Rodney; but, in consequence of contrary winds, did not reach Halifax till the 28th of May; when Admiral Boscawen, desirous of losing as little time as possible, was coming out of the harbour with his whole sleet, and all the land-forces which General Amherst was to command; the following troops having been left ashore for the safety of the place, under Major Morris of the 35th regiment.

Fifteenth.

Third brigade. Brigadier-General Wolfe.

Seventeenth.

Forty-feventh, 2d battalion.

Thirty-fifth.

The above regiments made eleven thousand fix hundred men, of which nine thousand nine hundred were fit for duty.

Colonel George Williamfon commanded the artillery, and Colonel Baffide a brigade of engineers. Colonel Monckton was ordered on fhore, to fuperfede Major Morris, and command in Nova-Scotia.

The Admiral continued his voyage to the place of his deflination, and arrived off Cape Breton on the 2d of June, when the greatest part of the sleet came to an anchor in Gabarus bay. Here the General issued the following order:

"As the General's intentions are to furprize the French, as well as to attack them, he depends upon the care and vigilance of the officers commanding the transports, that his orders be strictly complied with. — The troops are to be in their boats by two o'clock exactly. No lights are to be shewn in any of the transports, except signals, after twelve o'clock at night. There must be a profound silence throughout the whole army; and, above all things, the firing of a single mustice must be avoided. — The General is sufficiently convinced of the good disposition of the troops, by what he has already seen. — He desires they will not huzza, or make any noise at landing; but be attentive to the commands of their others: by which they will avoid confusion, and will not fail of success. Their officers will lead them directly to the enemy."

The weather rendered the execution of these orders impossible till the 8th of June, when, the sea being less turbulent than it had hitherto been since the arrival of the sleet, a successful attempt was made for that purpose. — But I cannot pretend to give my readers a better detail of this assair, and of the operations that immediately preceded and followed the landing of the troops, from the junction of the Admiral and General, to the surrender of Louisbourg, than what they themselves gave in their respective letters to the secretary of slate; especially as that of the General was so much approved, that it produced commands to him to transmit the operations of any army be might again command, in the same kind of detail, as being the best method of conveying a true and explicit idea of military operations. — The General's journal of this important assair is as follows:

- "On the 28th of May, I had the good fortune to meet Admiral Boscawen, with the fleet and the troops, coming out of the harbour of Halifax.
- "The 29th, we had fine weather; the flips kept well together; the whole confided of one hundred and fifty-feven fail. The Dublin went very fickly into Halifax.
- " The 30th, the wind blew hard in the afternoon: the ships were greatly dispersed.
- "The 31ft, the wind fometimes contrary, obliged us to tack; and it blew fresh.
- "The rft of June, Captain Rous, in the Sutherland, came from off the harbour of Louitbourg: he faid, That two ships had got in on the 30th of May; and that there were thirteen fail in the harbour. We faw the entrance of Gabarus at night.
- "The 2d, it was foggy in the morning; about twelve we faw Louisbourg and the ships in the harbour. The sleet, with about a third of the troops, anchored in Gabarus bay. This evening, with Brigadier-Generals Lawrence and Wolfe, I reconnoited the shore as near as we could, and made a disposition for landing in three places, the next morning, in case that the troops should arrive.
- "The enemy had a chain of posts from Cape Noir to the Flat Point; and some irregulars, from thence to the bottom of the bay; some works had been thrown up at the places which which appeared practicable to land at; and there were fome batteries.

- "On the 3d, most of the transports arrived, and all prepared for landing; but the furf on the shore was so great, that this design was thereby rendered impossible. As one bay was found to have less surf than the others, a disposition was made to land, the next morning, in one place instead of three.
- "The 4th, the wind and furf was fo high, that Admiral Boscawen faid it was impracticable to land.
- " The 5th, a great fwell and fog in the morning; and the Admiral fill declared it impracticable to land.
- "The 6th, an appearance of a change of the weather; the fignal was made to prepare to land; but the fog came on again, and the fwell increased during the time the men were getting into the boats; and the Admiral again declared it impracticable to land. I ordered the troops on board their respective ships; first acquainting them with the reason for 60 doing.
- "The 7th, the weather was bad in the morning; in the afternoon, the fwell rather decreafed, and gave us great hopes of landing at day-break the next morning; for which orders were given; and Bragg's regiment, who were in a number of floops, to fail under convoy, by the mouth of the harbour, to Lorembec; fending at the fame time a proportion of artillery deflined for the Light-house Point, with orders to make all the show they could of landing; but not to land till further orders, intending to draw the enemy's attention on that side.

"From the 2d to this time, the enemy has been reinforcing their posts, adding to their works, cannonading and throwing shells at the ships, and making all the preparations they can to oppose our landing. Seven transports were now missing, with troops on board, three of which came in at night.

" On the 8th, the troops were affembled in the boats, before break of day, in three divisions; and Commodore Durell having viewed the coast, and given his opinion the troops might land, without danger from the furf, the Kennington and Halifax fnow began the fire, on the left; followed by the Grammont, Diana, and Shannon frigates, in the center; and the Sutherland and Squirrel, upon the right. When the fire had continued about a quarter of an hour, the boats upon the left rowed in to the shore, under the command of Brigadier-General Wolfe, whose detachment was composed of the four eldeft companies of grenadiers, followed by the light infantry (a corps of five hundred and fifty men, chosen as marksmen from the different regiments, commanded by Major Scott); and the companies of rangers, supported by the Highland regiment; and those, by the eight remaining companies of grenadiers.

"The division on the right, under the command of Brigadier-General Whitmore, consisted of the Royal, Lascelles's, Monckton's, Forbes's, Anstruther's, and Webb's; and rowed to our right, by the White-Point, as if intending to force a landing there.

"The center-division, under the command of Brigadier-General Lawrence, was formed of Amherit's, Hopson's, Otway's, Whitmore's, Lawrence's, and Warburton's; and made, at the fame time, a flow of landing at the Fresh-water Cove. This drew the enemy's attention to every part, and prevented their troops posled along the coasts from joining those on their right.

"The enemy acted very wifely; did not throw away a fhot till the boats were near in thore, and then directed the whole fire of their cannon and musketry upon them. The furf was fo great, that a place could hardly be found to get a boat on thore. Notwithstanding the fire of the enemy, and the violence of the furf, Brigadier Wolfe purfued his point, and landed just at the left of the Cove, took post, attacked the enemy, and forced them to retreat. Many boats overfet, several broke to pieces, and all the men jumped into the water to get on shore.

"As foon as the left division was landed, the first detachment of the center rowed to the left likewise, and followed; then the remainder of the center-division, as fast as the boats could fetch them from the ships; and the right division followed the center, in like manner.

"It took up a great deal of time to land the troops; the enemy's retreat, or rather flight, was through the roughest and worst ground I ever faw; and the pursuit ended in a cannon-ading from the town, which was so far of use, that it pointed out how near I could encamp to invest it.

"On the enemy's fide, two captains of grenadiers, and two lieutenants, are prisoners; one officer killed, and an Indian chief; several men killed; and, I imagine, about seventy men taken prisoners. They were sent on board as fast as possible. By some of the prisoners I had intelligence, that M. St. Julien commanded in the Cove; that there were sive battalions in the town, namely, Bourgogne, Artois, Royal Marine, Cambise, and Volontaires Etrangers, with about seven hundred Canadians. The three first regiments wintered in Louisbourg; Volontaires Etrangers came there, not long since, with part of the fleet; and Cambise, the night before we landed.

"We took from the enemy three twenty-four pounders, and feven fix-pounders, two mortars, and fourteen fwivels; all which were placed along the shore to prevent our landing; likewise some ammunition, some tools, and stores of all kinds.

"The 9th, Lieutenant-General Bragg's regiment returned, in their floops, from Lorembec. The weather continued extremely bad, and the furf fo great, that we could get only fome of our tents on shore in the afternoon.

"The roth, the furf still continued, and it was with great difficulty that we got any thing on shore.

"On the 12th, from the intelligence I had received, that the enemy had destroyed the grand battery, and called in their out-posts, I detached Brigadier Wolfe, with twelve hundred men, four companies of grenadiers, three companies of rangers, and some light infantry, round the north-east harbour, to the Light-house Point, with an intention to silence the island-battery, and, at the same time, to attempt to destroy the ships in the harbour; fending, likewise, by sea, the proportion of artillery, ammunition and tools, that had been ordered for this service.

"I received, this day, a report from Brigadier Wolfe, that he had taken possession of the Light-house Point, and all the possesson that side the harbour, which the enemy had abandoned, leaving several cannon, which were rendered useless, and a great quantity of sish at Lorembec. The weather continued extremely bad, but we got some tools on shore this night; so that, on the 13th, we began to make a communication from the right to the left, in front of the camp; and I ordered three redoubts on the most advantageous ground in the front. A party of the enemy came out, this day, towards our camp, but were soon beat back by the light infantry, before two picquets could well get up to their assistance. We worked at three redoubts in front all night.

"The 14th, the enemy cannonaded us great part of the day. The furf flill continued fo high, that it was with the greatest difficulty we could land any thing. The fleet under the

the command of Sir Charles Hardy, which appeared yesterday for the first time, was, in the night, blown off to sea.

"The 15th, I fent four more mortars, in a floop, to the Light-house; but we could not get any artillery landed on this shore. At night, two deserters from the Volontaires Eurangers came in, and faid, they had five killed and forty wounded in the skirmish on the 13th.

" The 16th, the first fine weather, we landed twelve days provision, and got many things ashore; but could not yet land any artillery.

" The 17th, I got Colonel Bastide on horseback, and, with Colonel Williamson and Major Mackellar, we reconnoitred the whole ground, as far as we could; and Colonel Baffide was determined in his opinion of making approaches by the Green-hill, and of confining the destruction of the ships in the harbour to the Light-house Point, and the batteries on that fide. I added two inhe-inch mortars, and three royals, to the Light-house batter

"The 18th, we had fine weather. Some Indians took three of the transports men at the bottom of Gabarus bay, who landed there contrary to orders. 'The road for the artillery was pushed on as fast as possible. We got three twentyfour-pounders on shore, though the furf was great the beginning of the day.

" The 19th, the batteries of the Light-house were intended to have been opened this night; but could not be got ready fo soon. L'Echo, a French frigate of thirty-two guns, was brought in to-day. She had got out of the harbour the 13th, at night, and was bound to Quebec. By her we have intelligence, that the Bizarre got out the day we landed, and the Comette, fince our arrival off the harbour.

"The 20th, the island battery and ships fired at the batteries on the shore, who began their fire this last night. The enemy burnt an old ship at the bottom of the harbour.

"The 21fl, very bad weather, and the furf high. The enemy diffeovered us making the road for the artillery, and cannonaded us; threw fome fhot into the left of the camp, but did not oblige me to decamp any part. An advanced redoubt, towards Greenhill, was thrown up this night.

"The 22d, the bad weather continued; we were employed on the roads, and getting up a block-house on the left, by the miry road, to secure the communication to the north-east harbour and light-house, and to hinder any parties from going into the town.

"The 23d, the Admiral affured me there were above one hundred boats loft in landing the troops and provisions. This day, fine weather; and we now have, on shore, twelve twenty-four pounders, and six six-pounders. The enemy fired a great deal from their shipping and island-battery; and they threw some shot into the left of the camp. Colonel Messervey, and most of his carpenters, taken ill of the small-pox, which is a very great loss to the army. Gabions and fascines are landed, and carried forward as fast as possible, to make an epaulment to Greenhill. The batteries at the Light-house fire with success against the island-battery, and, I hope, will silence it.

"On the 24th, the enemy fired on the light-house batteries from the town and shipping; and, on our advanced redoubt, which was sinished, they fired from the town. We had this day, in the park of artillery, thirteen twenty-four-pounders and seven twelve-pounders.

"On the 25th, the cannonading continued night and day; in the evening, the island-battery was filenced: their own fire had helped to break down part of their works. Fascines and gabions were forwarded to Greenhill as fast as possible; all the men employed at work, and making the necessary communications. The enemy fired a good deal at our advanced redoubt.

"On the 26th, a finall alarm on the left, of a party that had advanced from the town, and got up to the Block-house, which was not quite finished. They had with them a barrel of pitch, to set it on sire. The guard on it was not sufficient to oppose a large party; but a detachment was sent out so quick, that they were forced to retreat without effecting their design, though two of the men had been in the Block-house; and they were drove back into the town very fast.

"Three hundred pioneers ordered to Greenhill. Admiral Boscawen landed two hundred marines, and took the post at Kennington Cove, which is a great ease to the army. I desired of the Admiral four thirty-two-pounders, and two twenty-sour-pounders, to leave at the Light-house, to keep the island-battery in ruin; that, with a proper number of men intrenched there, Brigadier Wolfe, with his detachment, might be able to come round the harbour, bringing his artillery with him, and to try to destroy the shipping, and to advance towards the west-gate.

"On the 27th, one brafs twenty-four-pounder was loft in twelve-fathom water, by flipping off the catamaran, as they were coming from the flip to land it. The cannon I afked of the Admiral were, this night, landed at the Light-house.

"On the 28th, many popping fhots and cannonading. As the post at Greenhill was covered, we began the road over the bog, by throwing up an epaulment. Colonel Masservey and his son both died this day; and, of his company of carpenters, of one hundred and eight men, all, but fixteen, who are nurses to the sick, are ill with the small-pox. This is particularly unlucky at this time.

"On the 29th, cannonading continued; a frigate fired conflantly at the epaulment. We perfevered in working at the road, which coft a great deal of labour. At night, the enemy funk four ships in the harbour's mouth: the Apollo, with two decks; La Fidelle, of thirty-fix guns; La Chevre and La Biche, of fixteen guns each; and they cut off most of their masts. Remain in the harbour, sive of the line of battle, and a frigate of thirty-fix guns.

"The 30th, at night, fome firing at Kennington Cove; the marines thought they faw Indians. The frigate fired all night at the epaulment, as the men worked in the night-time.

"The 1st of July, the enemy crept out, in the morning, to get some old palisades and wood. Brigadier Wolfe, and Major Scot's light infantry, pushed them in with a very brisk sire; and the Brigadier took post on the hills, from whence it was intended to try to demolish the shipping: we marched forward on the right; forced the enemy back to Cape Noir, with a smart sire.

"The 2d, the epaulment and road went on heavily, from the extreme badness of the ground. The enemy continued their cannonading, and threw some shells; we skirmished all day with parties out of the town.

"The 3d, a great cannonading from the town and fhipping, on the batteries. Brigadier Wolfe was making an advanced work on the right, thrown up at fix hundred and fifty yards from the covered way, with an intention of erecting a battery to deflroy the defences of the place, as the falling of the ground, from this place, towards the works, would hinder our difcovering as much of the works as would be neceffary to do them any confiderable damage. In the evening, the fea-officers imagined, that fome of the fhips would try to get out of the harbour. The batteries on the left immediately played on them; but it grew fo dark, they could not continue.

"The 4th, a great fog: when there were glares of light, the cannonading began. Five hundred men were kept continually making of fascines.

"The 5th, very bad weather. The epaulment was haftened on as much as possible; it swallowed up an immense number of fascines, and cost some men, as the frigate cannonaded it without ceasing.

"The 6th, a floop failed out of the harbour, with a flag of truce, to Sir Charles Hardy, to carry fome things to their wounded officers and prisoners.

"On the 7th, we had very foggy weather; the cannonading continued all day, with many popping fhots, from the advanced poffs.

"The 8th, I intended an attack on fome advanced poffs at Cape Noir; but it did not take place. Colonel Bastide got a contusion by a musket-ball on his boot, which laid him up in the gout.

"The 9th, in the night, the enemy made a fally, where Brigadier Lawrence commanded; they came from Cape Noir, and, though drunk, I am afraid they rather furprifed a company of grenadiers of Forbes's, commanded by Lord Dundonald, who were posted in a small work on the right. Major Murray, who commanded three companies of grenadiers, immediately detached one, and drove the enemy back very eafily. Whitmore's and Bragg's grenadiers behaved very well on this occafion; Lord Dundonald was killed; Lieutenant Tew wounded, and taken prisoner; Captain Bontein, of the engineers, taken prifoner; and one corporal, and three men were killed; one ferjeant and clever, men are missing; and seventeen men wounded. The fally was of five picquets, supported by fix hundred men. A Captain, Chevalier de Chauvelin, was killed; a lieutenant wounded, and taken prifoner; feventeen men killed; four wounded, and brought off prifoners; befides what wounded they carried into the town, one of whom, a captain, died immediately. The enemy fent out a flag of truce to bury their dead; which when over, the cannonading began again. The frigate was fo hurt, the hauled close to the town; the thips fired very much against Brigadier Wolfe's batteries.

"The 11th, a waggoner was taken off by fome Indians, between the Block-house and the left of the north-east harbour.

"The 12th, it rained very hard all night; we made an advanced work to Greenhill; at night, the waggoner, who had been taken, luckily made his escape, and faid, they were two hundred and fifty Canadians. The citadel bastion fired very fmartly.

"The 13th, the enemy threw a great many shells; we perfeded our works, as fast as we could; bad rainy weather; the enemy was at work at Cape Noir to hinder our taking post near that point, which is of no consequence; some deserters came in, and faid a floop from Miray got in, three days ago.

"The 14th, the batteries were traced out, last night, with an intention to place twenty twenty four pounders, divided into four different batteries, to destroy the defences; and a battery of feven mortars, with fome twelve-pounders to ricochet the works and the town.

"The 15th, the cannonading and firing continued; the enemy tried to throw fome shells into our camp, supposed to be intended against our powder magazine; at ten at night, the light-house battery fired some rockets, as a signal of ships failing out of the harbour. Sir Charles Hardy answered it; a frigate got out, and Sir Charles Hardy's fleet got under fail and went to fea. Before day-break, Captain Sutherland, polled at the end of the north-east harbour, was attacked, and there was a great deal of firing; the grenadiers of Brigadier Wolfe's

Wolfe's corps marched to fustain him, and all the light infantry; it was over before they could arrive, and, by a deferter from the enemy, they were only one hundred men, come from Miray, where they left Monsieur de Bois-Hibert, who had, on their fide of the water, three hundred men with boats ready to pass. Major Scott, with the light infantry, purfued; but could not get up with them. I encamped a corps forward.

"The 16th, towards night, Brigadier Wolfe took possession of the hills in the front of the Barasoy, where we made a lodgment; the enemy fired very briskly from the town and shipping.

"The 17th, we resolved to extend the parallel from the right to the left. The fleet returned.

"The 18th, all last night, the enemy fired musketry from the covert-way; and tried to throw shells into the camp.

"The 19th, I relieved the trenches by battalions, the fourteen battalions forming three brigades; a fmart fire from the covert-way; the batteries, on the left, fired against the bassion Dauphine, with great success.

"The 21st, one of the ships in the harbour had some powder blown up in her, made a great explosion, and set the ship on sire, which soon caught the sails of two more; they burned very fast, and we kept siring on them, the whole time, to hinder the boats and people from the town to get to their assistance; the Entreprenant, Capricieux, and Celebre, were the three burned ships; the Prudent and Bienfaisant remained.

"The 22d, two batteries, on the right, opened with thirteen twenty-four pounders, and another of feven mortars; and fired, with great fuccess; the enemy fired very smart from the town, for some time; and threw their shells into our works. Our shells put the citadel in slames. I ordered Colonel Williamson to confine his fire, as much as he could, to the defences of the place, that we might not destroy the houses. A lieutenant of the Royal Americans, going his rounds on an advanced post, lost his way, and was taken prisoner near Cape Noir. A battery was begun, on the left, for four twenty-four pounders.

"The 23d, the cohorns we used at night, and the French mortars were sent to throw slones from the trenches. The enemy fired all forts of old iron, and any stuff they could pick up. Colonel Bastide was out to-day, for the first time, since he received his contusion. Our batteries fired with great success. This night, the shells set fire to the barracks, and they burnt with great violence.

"On the 24th, the fire was very brifk on our fide; and the enemy's decreafed. The Admiral gave me four hundred feamen to help us to work at the batteries, and two hundred miners were added to a corps of a hundred already effablished, that we might make quick work of it; and they were immediately employed. The four gun battery opened, and another of five erecting. One of the men of war in the harbour, the Bienfaifant, fired at our trenches, at high-water; and the citadel, and Bastion Dauphine, fired against the four gun battery; but our men, firing small arms into the embrazures, beat the enemy off their guns.

"The 25th, the batteries fired, with great fuccefs. The Admiral fent me word, he intended to fend in boats, with fix S 2 hundred Inundred men, to take or destroy the Prudent and the Bienfaifant, in the harbour. I ordered all the batteries at night to fire into the works, as much as possible, to keep the enemy's attention to the land. The miners and workmen went on very well, with their approaches to the covered way, though they had a continued and very smart sire from it; and grapeshot, and all forts of old iron from the guns of the ramparts.

We continued our fire, without ceasing, and en ricochet. The boats got to the ships at one in the morning, and took them both: They were obliged to burn the Prudent of seventy-sour guns, as she was a-ground; and they towed off the Bienfaistant of sixty-four, to the north-east harbour.

"The 26th, the Admiral came on shore; and told me he proposed to send six ships into the harbour the next day. Just at this time, I received a letter from the Governor, offering to capitulate, and the following articles were agreed upon. The troops remained in the trenches, this night, as usual.

Articles of Capitulation between their Excellencies Admiral Boscawen and Major-General Amberst, and his Excellency the Chevalier Drucour, Governor of the Island of Cape Breton, of Louisbourg, the Island of St. John, and their appartenances.

ARTICLE I. The garrifon of Louisbourg shall be prisoners of war, and shall be carried to England in the ships of his Britannic Majesty.

II. All the artillery, ammunition, provisions, as well as the arms of any kind whatsoever, which are at present in the town of Louisbourg, the Islands of Cape Breton, and St. John, and their appurtenances, shall be delivered, without the least damage, to such Commissaries as shall be appointed to receive them, for the use of his Britannic Majesty.

Le Chevalier de DRUCOUR. EDWARD BOSCAWEN. JEFFERY AMHERST.

Louisbourg, 26th July, 1758.

This account was too full to leave Mr. Boscawen much to fay; accordingly, his letter to Mr. Pitt, on this occasion, dated on board the Namur, Gabarus Bay, the 28th of July 1758, was comprized in the few following words:

"I will not trouble you with a particular detail of the landing and fiege, but cannot help mentioning a particular gallant action, in the night between the twenty-fifth and twenty-fixth instant. The boats of the squadron were, in two divisions, detached, under the command of Captains Laforey and Balfour, to endeavour either to take or burn the Prudente of feventy-four guns, and the Bienfaifant of fixty-four, the only remaining French ships in the harbour; in which they succeeded so well as to burn the former, she being a-ground, and take the latter, and tow her into the north-east harbour, notwithstanding they were exposed to the fire of the cannon and musketry of the island-battery, Point-Rochfort, and the town, being favoured with a dark night. Our loss was inconsiderable; seven men killed, and nine wounded."

On the 27th of July, three companies of grenadiers, commanded by Major Farquhar, took possession of the towa; when the garrison consisted of

And the fleet of that nation fuffered, in this fiege, a confiderable diminution, by the lofs of Le Prudent and L'Entreprenant, of feventy-four guns each; Le Capricieux, Le Celebre, and Bienfaifant, of fixty-four each; Apollo, fifty; Le Chevre, Biche, and Fidelle, frigates; the Diana, taken by the Boreas; and the Echo, by the Juno.

On the 30th of July, the Shannon frigate, commanded by the Honourable Captain Edgecumb, who was charged with the Admiral's dispatches, and carrying Captain Amherst, with those of the General, failed for England. These gentlemen took with them the colours of Louitbourg, and of the troops. These trophies, after having been presented to the King of Great Britain by Captain Amherst, were deposited, with great pomp, in the cathedral church of St. Paul's, London, to perpetuate the glory of the British arms, by this conquest reflored to their former luftre.

It must appear, by the foregoing journal of General Amherst, that there was fcarce a difficulty, which accident or industry could create, that did not prefent itself to obstruct his operations. Yet, whilft we admire the intrepidity that forced a landing, when the violence of the furf almost bassled the power of art, we must not conceal the share which fortune had in the execution of fo dangerous an enterprize. Even the refolution of Brigadier Wolfe was flaggered, when he viewed the breaking furge; and, supposing a landing at that time impracticable, he made a fignal with his hat to retire. Lieutenants Hopkins and Browne, and Enfign Grant, pushed on shore. These, with their men, climbed up some rocks, and formed. This being observed by Mr. Wolfe, he advanced his brigade, and landed, in the face of an infernal fire. In the mean time, the party that was on shore crept unseen on the slank of the enemy, who, being ignorant of their numbers, immediately quitted their intrenchments, and sled. Animated by the example of Mr. Wolfe, those boats nearest to him pushed for the shore, and the men leaped into the sea to gain the land; but many of them were drowned in the

No opposition, it feems, could check the animating spirit raised by the ardent desire of regaining credit, and of expunging the soul blot with which the miscarriages of successive years had stained the British colours. The vigilance, resolution, and other military virtues, of the two commanders in this enterprize, and, perhaps still more, the perfect harmony that reigned between them, gained the considence of all the forces under their command; and every officer exerted his utmost abilities, in token of this considence; particularly Brigadier Wolfe, whose martial ardour made him ever ready to execute the boldest plans of his General; yet, with a circumspection and skill, which justly procured him the affection and esteem of the whole army.

The alertness of the gentlemen of the navy to affift in forwarding the operations of the army must not be forgotten. And the attack on the French men of war, the Bienfaisant and the Prudent, by Captains Laforey and Baltour, will ever remain an honourable testimony of their bravery, as it gained them such immediate encomiums from their Admiral.

> But, whilst we are thus lavish of our praise on the conquering army, our impartiality will not fuffer us to overlook the good conduct and bravery of the belieged. As to the landing of the English, it must have been effected by facrificing lives in one part or another; it being impossible to guard fuch an extent of coast with about three thousand men, and yet leave a fufficient number for duty in the town. The French occupied above two leagues and an half of ground in the most accessible parts: but there were some intermediate places they could not guard; and it was precifely in one of these that the English took post.

> The French employed every method to retard and deftroy the works of the befiggers, both by the fire of the place, and that of the ships in the harbour. The Commodore of those ships warmly folicited for leave to quit the place; but M. de Drucour, knowing the importance of their flay to its fafety, would not permit them to depart. It was his business to defer the determination of his fate as long as possible. The accounts he received from Canada affured him, that M. de Montcalm was marching to the enemy, and would come up with them, between the 20th and 25th of July. of June, the English Admiral would have entered it immediately after, and the place might have been loft before the expiration of the month; and this would have put it in the power of the English General to employ the months of July and August in fending fuccours to the troops marching against Canada, and to enter the river St. Lawrence at the proper feafon. This object alone feemed to M. de Drucour of fufficient importance to require a council of war, who agreed with him in opinion. The fituation of the ships was no less critical than that of the town. Four of them were burnt, and the cafemates were destroyed, by the bombs of the English. At length, no French ships being left, and the place being open in different parts of the King's, the Dauphin's, and the Queen's bastions, the Governor still did all that an officer in his fituation could do: - He called a council of war; and yielded to its advice to atk a capitulation.

M. de Drucour proposed much the same terms as were granted at Minorca; and the English General's reply to his proposal, was to the following purport:

"In answer to the proposal I have just now had the honour to receive from your Excellency, by the Sieur Loppinot, I have only to tell your Excellency, That it had been determined by Admiral Boscawen and myself, that his ships shall go in to-morrow, to make a general attack upon the town. Your Excellency knows very well the situation of the army and the sleet: and, as the Admiral, as well as myself, is very desirous to prevent the essistion of blood, we give your Excellency one hour, after receiving this, to determine, either to capitulate as prisoners of war, or to

M. de Drucour answered the above letter, in the following terms:

"To answer your Excellencies in as few words as possible, I have the honour to repeat to you, That my resolution is still the same; and that I will suffer the consequences, and sustain the attack you speak of.

Le Chevalier DE DRUGOUR."

Immediately after this letter was dispatched, M. Prevot, Commissary-General, and Intendant of the colony, brought M. de Drucour a petition from the traders and inhabitants, which determined him to fubmit to the law of fuperior force; a fubmission, in his situation, inevitable. Before this, for eight days together, his officers had not, any more than the private men, one moment's reft. Indeed, they had no place in which they could take any; nor did there remain any place of fafety, even for the wounded: fo that they were almost as much exposed, every minute of the four and twenty hours, as if they had been on the covered-way. Nevertheless, the men did not murmur in the leaft, nor difcover the fmallest discontent; which was owing to the good example and exact discipline of their officers. None descrited but Germans; one of whom prevented an intended fally: for, as he had gone over to the English two hours before it was to have been put in execution, it was not thought prudent to hazard it. of the ships, and of the casemates of the King's and Queen's bassions, hindered another. A third had no better success: the French proceeded no farther than the glacis of the coveredway. So that, of four fallies that were intended, one only succeeded; in which, thirty grenadiers and two officers were made prisoners.

No refources could be had by intrenchments in the gorges of the bassions; nor were the French provided with the necessary implements for such operations. And, of fifty-two pieces of cannon, which were opposed to the batteries of the bestiegers, forty were dismounted, broken, or rendered unserviceable. In such circumstances, therefore, it was impossible for the French to make any further resistance; and, of course, it was no way blameable in them to surrender prisoners of war.

We must now resume our narrative of the operations of the English forces.

On the 7th of August, a detachment, commanded by Major Dalling, was ordered to Espagnolle, to take possession, agreeable to the capitulation, of the appurtenances of Louisbourg; and another, under Lord Rollo, on the same errand, to the island of St. John; the inhabitants of which, amounting to about four thousand souls, immediately on his arrival, brought in their arms. This place had been, ever since the commencement of the war, a thorn in the sides of the inhabitants of Nova-Scotia; at the same time that, from its fertility in corn and cattle, it contributed not a little to the support of the inhabitants of Canada, whom it greatly imported the English to distress; since, as long as that country remained in the hands of the French, they could not rely upon any permanent tranquility in North-America. For this reason, Admiral Boscawen and General Amherst, having resolved to reap every advantage they poslibly could from the conquest of Cape Breton, as foon as the transports could fail with the French prisoners to Europe, which was not till the 15th, Sir Charles Hardy, with feven ships of the line and three frigates; and Brigadier Wolfe, with the fifteenth regiment, Amherfl's; the twenty-eighth, Bragg's; and the fifty-eighth, Anstruther's; a detachment of artillery, two engineers, two light fix-pounders. two eight-inch mortars, five royals, fix cohorns, and every kind of flores in proportion; were ordered to fail for the gulf of St. Lawrence, and as far up the river of the fame name as the feafon would permit, with instructions to destroy all the French fettlements in both bay and river, with their ships and boats, especially on the fouth side; and, in particular, those of Mirimichi, Baye de Chaleurs, and Gaspée; and disperse or carry off the inhabitants. None of these places were of any great force; but those we have particularly mentioned were well inhabited; and the inhabitants of all, by being feated immediately on the back of Nova-Scotia, afforded shelter to a fet of renegadoes, who, by just marching over the head of St. John's river, and fo to the bay of Fundy, had it always in their power to infest the English fettlements in that peninsula; and, accordingly, never let flip any opportunity to do it. Anotheradvantage expected from this expedition, was the alarming of the French at Quebec, and thereby effectually preventing their fending any freth fuccours, as they might otherwife do, to their countrymen employed against General Abercromby. Sir Charles Hardy and Prigadier Wolfe failed, on this fervice, on the 28th of August; and, two days after, the thirtyfifth fifth regiment, the fecond battalion of the Royal Americans. and three hundred and fifty rangers, to be commanded by Colonel Monckton, were fent up the bay of Fundy to deilroy the French fettlements on the river St. John, clear the country of its inhabitants, take and keep poffession of St. Anne's, and, in thort, penetrate as far up the river as they conveniently could. to annov the enemy. In these two expeditions, as the several officers commanding them behaved with their usual brayery and conduct, and were properly feconded by the officers and men under them, fo they met with adequate fuccefs. When the above fervice was finished, Brigadier Wolfe was ordered to fend to Louisbourg the twenty-eighth regiment, Bragg's, which it was intended should make part of that garrison; call back to their regiments the fick and wounded of the fifteenth. Amherst's, and the fifty-eighth, Anstruther's, that had been left there; and then, with thefe two regiments, proceed to Halifax, and take on him the command of the troops there, till he should receive further orders.

The Admiral and General having, as foon as they had fent off the troops for these expeditions, again deliberated on their instructions, and on the present flate of assairs in North-America, were of opinion, that the measures which had been pursued fince the reduction of Louitbourg, for annoying the enemy's settlements as long as the season would permit, was all that, with prudence, could be attempted in that part; and having, at length, received undoubted assurance, that the attack on Ticonderoga had miscarried, with such an heavy loss as obliged the troops to retreat, they did not hesitate a single moment in coming to the resolution of sending sive battalions, (which were the remains of the army, after garrisoning

For, though their instructions did not extend to any part of the continent bevond Nova-Scotia, they wifely judged themselves authorised to bestow their attention and assistance wherever the interest of their country required it, and it could be afforded without deviating from their instructions. In order, therefore, to lofe as little time as possible in doing this important fervice, and that it might be done as effectually as poslible, General Amherst, in person, took on himself the command of the second battalion of the Royal, the feventeenth, forty-feventh, fortyeighth, and feventy-eighth regiments; and failed with them, on the 30th of August, for Boston, where he arrived the 13th of September. The next day he landed, and encamped his troops. Then, confidering that the accidents attending the paffage, by fea, to New-York, might frustrate his intentions to join General Abercromby as foon as he could wish, he determined to march to. Albany, through the Green-wood; and demanded of the magistrates of Boston guides to conduct him; but, inflead of guides, the felect men fent him a deputation to affure him, that his defign was impracticable, there being no road through the wood, and that it was impossible to make one. Not content with this bare affertion, many of them, in hopes of diverting the General from his purpose, voluntarily made affidavits to confirm what had been advanced by the whole. However, from the information of many people, whom the General himself took the trouble to examine, the passage was so far from being found impracticable, that there did not appear any great difficulties to effect it. He likewise discovered the reasons why the magistracy were so averse to his attempting it. If the General could conduct an

But these were not sufficient reasons, in the opinion of the General, to make him alter his refolution. He therefore decamped, and began his march. On the 2d of October, about thirty-five miles east of Albany, he left he troops under the command of Colonel Burton, with orders to continue his rout, the next day, to Kinderhook-mills; and fo, through Albany, to Lake George; whilft himfelf proceeded to General Abercromby's camp, which he reached on the 5th, and found as fecure as intrenchments could make it. Having conferred with General Abercromby, and put the regiments he had brought with him under his command, he returned to Albany on the 8th, and from thence immediately proceeded to Halifax; where, by his inftructions, he was ordered to remain, after the reduction of Louisbourg, for farther orders.

We are now to relate the operations of the armies on the continent, intended for the execution of the plans against Ticonderoga and Fort du-Quesne, and which were to rendezvous at Albany and Philadelphia. The first was commanded by General Abercromby; and consisted of

out. In consequence of this intimation, Commodore Moore repaired with his squadron to Basse-Terre road, where he was,

might have been equally exposed, and as severely annoyed without such waste. The fort, if improved and enlarged, could not fail, from the excellency of its harbour, and its convenient situation, to render the English masters of Lake Ontario, and thereby enable them to ruin the commerce of the French, and be a check upon all their expeditions to the westward. And, as to the vessels, and the goods and stores, the latter might have been easily removed by means of the former, and both saved, even though it was 1: . thought proper to leave the fort standing; or trust them to the care of a garrison, in the case it was.

Fort Frontenac was, at this period, the general rendezvous of all the Indian nations, that had any knowledge of each other; the center of all the trade between themselves, and with the French, whose traders, in consequence of their conciliating methods, were fo much preferred, by the Indians, to the English traders, that great numbers of them, in their yearly progress to this market, actually passed by the town of Albany, though they might hav : been supplied there, with what articles they wanted, on m ch better terms, than they could at Fort Frontenac, or even Aontreal; fo much better, that the French traders themselves fren purchased their commodities for the Indian market fr in the Albany merchants, as coming much cheaper than the could procure them from France. It was not, however, fro a mere commercial views, that all the fouthern Indians under ok fo long a peregrination. These annual meetings constituted a kind of general council, in which the events of the preceding year were related; alliances renewed, or new ones formed; and plans of operation agreed upon for the enfuing year; and many Indians reforted to Fort Frontenac, chiefly on these accounts.

The reduction, therefore, of this place was attended with one more advantage to the English, besides those we have already taken notice of: and that a very singular one. It proved the means of dissolving a very powerful confederacy amongst their most dangerous enemies, and considerably weakening the interest of the French amongst them. And there is no doubt, but that the reduction of Fort Frontenac greatly facilitated the expedition of the English against Fort du-Quesne, as the French troops, against whom Brigadier Forbes's army was to act, were thereby effectually deprived of the necessary supplies. Accordingly, the King of Great Britain took notice of the importance of this conquest, from the throne, to his parliament, along with that of Cape Breton.

The troops deflined for the attack of Fort du-Quesne, were to assemble at Philadelphia. But, till the middle of April, Brigadier Forbes, who had been named to command them, was a General without an army. The Provincials, who were to make part of it, were not so much as raised; and the Highlanders, expected from Carolina, who were to make another part, did not arrive till the 7th of June. As to the artillery and military stores, which were to come from England, they did not make their appearance till the 14th of the same month. In short, it was the 30th of June, before he could get the last division of his army out of Philadelphia. This army now confided of

From the valour, experience, and vigilance of the General, there was a great deal to hope in this expedition. But, on the other hand, from the length of the march, and the number of close woods, narrow defiles, deep swamps, and high mountains, which lay in his way, there was as much to fear. Add to all this, the opposition he had just reason to apprehend from an infidious enemy, who had acquired new degrees of courage by a long and almost uninterrupted series of successes. But all these mighty obstacles yielded to the excellent disposition of the General's line of march; and several attempts, which the Indians made to obstruct his progress, were all frustrated by the alacrity of the troops in obeying his

When the Brigadier got as far as Ray's Town, about ninety miles east of Fort du-Quefne, he halted with his main-body, and detached Lieutenant-Colonel Bouquet, with two thousand men, to take post at Lyal Hanning. The Colonel, supposing that this force was fufficient to reduce the fort, without any affifiance from the General, and eager to fecure to himself the honour of such an archievement, began to think of forming a plan for that purpofe. With this view, he detached about eight hundred Highlanders, under Major Grant of Montgomery's, to reconnoitre the fort and its outworks, and make the best observations in his power. The Major, in the execution of these orders, drew his men up on the heights near the fort; and beat a march by way of daring the French to come to an action, in which if he had fucceeded, in all probability the fort must have fallen, and then the whole glory would have been his own. The French accepted the challenge; they detached a party, to meet him; and a very fevere action was the confequence. The Highlanders fought with with great bravery for fome time, till superior numbers obliged them to give way; and, about three hundred of them, including nineteen officers, having been either killed or taken prisoners, with the Major himself amongst the latter, the reststed, in great disorder, as far back as Lyal Henning. On this occasion, Colonel Bouquet's ambition got the better of his judgment. The splendor of the prize he had in view dazzled his understanding; for, if it was thought by as able officers as himself, that Brigadier Forbes's whole army was little enough to besiege Fort du-Quesne, how could the Colonel reasonably hope to supply the want, and so great a want, of equal power, by any surprize or stratagem?

When the news of this defeat reached the Brigadier's camp, he was, as may naturally be expected, greatly chagrined at the lofs of fo many brave fellows; who, without his orders, or even knowledge, had been facrificed to an unwarrantable thirst after glory. This misconduct, however, in one upon whom he fo much depended, sharpened his vigour. He exposed no more parties to the danger of suffering by the vanity of individuals; but marched his whole force, under his own direction, with all possible expedition, and with a shew of ftrength, which effectually imposed upon the French. It struck them with fuch a panic, that, dreading the confequences of a fiege, they difmantled and abandoned the fort, and retired down the river Ohio, to their fettlements on the Mississippi; and, the day following, being the 25th of November, Brigadier Forbes took polleflion of it. Moreover, the Indians in the French interest, having suffered severely in many skirmithes, began to think it impracticable to destroy the conrmunication of the English with their posts, and prevent their penetrating, 158 penetrating to Fort du-Quesne. They, therefore, thought proper to enter into a neutrality, and became reconciled to the English government. The fort was ordered to be repaired, and garrisoned with provincials, by the name of Pittsburg. The Brigadier then began his march back to Philadelphia, and, at Lyal Henning, built a Block-house for the defence of Pennsylvania. But, unfortunately for his country, he did not live long to enjoy the glory he acquired by this memorable expedition. His constitution having been exhausted by the incredible fatigues of the service, he died at Philadelphia, in the forty-ninth year of his age, justly regretted, as a public loss, by all ranks.

Brigadier Stanwix had been detached with a confiderable number of provincials, to creek a fort at the carrying-place between the Mohawk river and Wood-creek, and leave a fufficient garrifon in it to afford, at leaft, a local fafety to those Indians in the neighbourhood who were still firm to the English interest. This fervice the Brigadier had the good fortune to perform, and the honour of giving his name, in memory of it, to the fort he creeked. It was called Fort Stanwix.

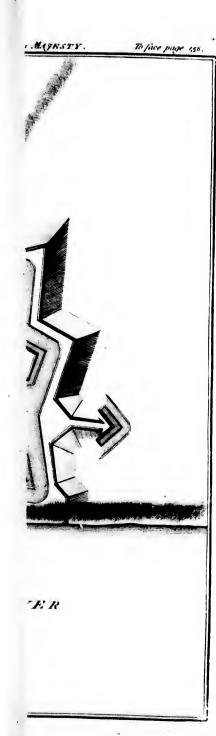

Whilst the intrenchments of General Abercromby inclosed him in security, M. de Montealm exerted his usual activity in harassing the frontiers, and in detaching parties to attack the convoys of the English. On the 17th of July, one of these parties destroyed three provincial officers and upwards of twenty men, at Half-way-brook; and on the 27th of the same month, one hundred and sixteen waggoners and sixteen rangers met with the same sate between that place and Fort Edward. Major Rogers was then detached with with a party of feven hundred men, in quest of the enemy; but they had the good fortune to escape him. On his return, he met an express from the General, with orders to proceed to fouth and east Bay, and return by Fort Edward. Whilst the Major was purfuing the rout prescribed him by these orders, he was attacked, on the 8th of August, near the spot where Fort St. Anne flood, by about five hundred of the enemy, his own number being reduced to five hundred and thirty men. But both he and his men behaved with to much spirit, that, in an hour, they broke the affailants, and obliged them to retreat, though (fuch was the enemy's caution) without any prospect of being able to distress them by a pursuit. In this action there fell one hundred and ninety of the French; and the English lost about forty, the missing included. Major Putnam and two lieutenants were made prisoners.

The prodigious preparations against Ticonderoga were carried on by two or three gentlemen, subordinate in command; but men, in whose military abilities, resolution, and activity the army justly consided. When Lord Howe was killed, a kind of despondency ensued; and the manner in which the attack of that place was conducted, too plainly proved, that there existed sufficient grounds for such despondency. All, however, that courage could do, was done. Although the English were beaten off by a number greatly inferior, they lost not a jot of honour by their retreat. The miscarriage of an ill-formed, ill-guided plan, cannot, with any colour of justice, be imputed to either the soldiers or inferior officers who resolutely attempted to carry it into execution.

The

The advantages refulting from the conquest of Fort Frontenac have been already recorded. The possession of Fort du-Queine fecured the frontiers of the English fettlements in that part of the continent from any further maffacres by the Canadians and Indians, who used to find shelter in that place. For this reason, though the English lost many brave soldiers in this campaign, they must be allowed to have been, upon the whole, gainers by it. The fole advantage on the fide of the French, was the defeat of the English at Ticonderoga; and the fole fruit of that advantage, the opportunity of improving the defence of their lines at that place against a second attack.

Thus concluded the fourth campaign, on the continent of North-America, of that war of which we have undertaken to write the history; and the first expedition in which the English fought under the administration of Mr. Pitt. His plans of operation, and his judgment in felecting officers to execute them, did not deceive the expectations of the people. The reduction of Cape-Breton would, alone, have been fullicient to indemnify them for all their wasted treasure; since, not to mention every advantage expected from that conquest, it gave them possession of a noble harbour, justly deemed the key to the river St. Lawrence; and from which they might, at any time, fend a fleet into the gulf formed by the mouth of that river, and thereby effectually prevent any fuccours from France being thrown into Canada.

A conquett of to much confequence could not fail of recommending its conqueror to the throne. Every military virtue was cherified by the King. Reward was the fure attendant on courage and perfeverance; and difgrace as certainly fol-

Accordingly, on the 9th of November, the latter, who was then at Halifax, received dispatches from England, by the way of Boston, with a commission, appointing him commander in chief of the English troops in North-America. Upon this he embarked, on the 19th, for Boston, where he landed the 3d of December. From thence he proceeded to New-York, where he arrived the 12th, and took upon him the command of the army. On the 24th of January following, General Abercromby sailed for England in the Kennington man of war. Brigadier Wolfe likewise returned to England, in consequence of permission granted him for that purpose in his letter of service; and Colonel Monckton was left to command in Nova-Scotia.

proach, feveral others had turned out, and endeavoured to efcape, but were intercepted and taken by the cruifers.

At five, the troops landed without the least opposition, the town and citadel being abandoned; and hoisted the English colours on the latter about fix. A Genoefe deferter from the French now gave information, that the enemy had but five companies of regular troops, fearce making one hundred men, in the whole ifland; and that a train was laid to blow up the powder magazine in the citadel, but that the garrifon had been obliged to retreat with too much precipitation, to execute this defign. Upon this the train was immediately cut off, and the magazinc faved. The guns had been all fpiked up by the enemy, but were afterwards drilled out by the matroffes. Part of the troops lay upon their arms all night upon the rifing ground, that overlooked the town; part of them made themselves masters of an advantageous post upon a hill, about a mile to the west; and part entered the town, which still continued in flames. The flip, in which was the physicians and head furgeons, not having appeared from the time the fquadron left the English channel, it was justly feared she was lost. But the now providentially arrived, when the began to be most wanted.

Early in the morning of the 25th, the French appeared on the hills, to the number of about two thousand. M. le Chevalier Nadau d'Utriel, had fixed his head-quarters at the distance of about four miles from the town; and gave out, that he would defend this post, with another called the Dos d'Ane, a little higher up the country, to the last extremity; saying, That, the English having left them-nothing but their lives, they would fell them dearly.

NADAU D'UTRIEL."

The

The Dos d'Ane is fituated about five miles from Baffe-Terre to the fouth-east, and is nothing more than a deep cleft or passage through the mountains, affording a communication with Capes-Terre, a more level, and indeed very beautiful part of the island. This opening, in itself hilly, stony and rugged, had been rendered very practicable by a tolerable road the French had made through it; and, had an attempt been made on this pass at the first landing of the troops, whilst the inhabitants were yet under the dominion of a panic, it might, perhaps, have been attended with success. General Hopson had fixed his head-quarters in the town of Basse-Terre, at the Governour's house, or rather in the ruins of it; and sent a slag of truce, with an offer of terms to M. d'Utriel; but this gentleman thought proper to reject them by a letter, in which he says,

"The terms your Excellencies offer me, are fuch as can only be dictated by the easy acquisition you have made of the town and citadel of Basse-Terre; for, otherwise, you must do me the justice to believe, that I would not have received them.

"The force you have with you is indeed fufficient to give you possession of the extremities of the island, but as to the inland part we there have an equal chance with you.

"In regard to any confequences that may attend my refufalof the terms proposed, I am perfuaded they will be such only, as are authorised by the laws of war. But should it happen otherwise, we have a master who is powerful enough to revenge any injury we may sustain.

The

The conduct of M. d'Utriel did not correspond with the spirit of this answer. A gallant behaviour and a worthy example during the sirst attack would have done him honour. But, instead of this, he retired to a plantation distant from danger; and remained an inactive spectator of the ruin of the capital, and every other disgrace, which, the same day, attended the French arms. Nor did he the next morning take any precautions to prevent the landing of the English troops, who had the dissiculty of a rugged shore and a violent surf, to surmount: And, even after their landing, when he might have defended the entrenchments, and the lines which were every where thrown up, he slew from them, in spite of all the advantages of ground and situation, which, in a manner, solicited him to defend them.

The General, as if convinced of M. d'Utriel's want of real courage, notwithstanding his blustering answer, proposed to try the effect of a second message; but the Commodore warmly opposed it; advising him to pursue his blow, before the enemy could recover from the consternation into which they were thrown; and offered to assist him in doing it with the marines on board the fleet. Mr. Moore the more strongly recommended this measure, as he knew the nature of the climate, and that the troops were likely to suffer more by sickness than opposition. And it must be owned, that, had this advice been adopted, the island would have been, in all probability, sooner reduced, as the posts the enemy possessed on the Capes-Terre side, were not as yet fortisted.

The inhabitants now exerted themselves like men engaged in the defence of every thing that was dear to them. They harassed the troops, on all occasions, with the greatest refolution n engaged em. They reateft refolution folution and activity, firing upon them from every fugar plantation that lay in their way. But this proved a very fliort resource. The English reduced to ashes every place that could afford them any shelter; and at one in particular, where a body of armed negroes had concealed themselves in the canes, and from thence annoyed the troops, they fet fire to the feveral corners of the field, and burnt the negroes and the canes together. Madam Ducharmey, with the valour of an Amazon, not only armed her flaves, but, heading them in perfon, made feveral attempts on fome advanced posts, and threw up some intrenchments upon a hill opposite to a post commanded by Major Melville. At length, orders being given to attack the works of this heroine, they were immediately executed; the intrenchments were carried, the houses were burnt. the plantations deflroyed; and it was with the greatest difficulty, that Madam Ducharmey made her escape. This affair cost the English about twelve men killed, and thirty wounded.

A redoubt, with feveral intrenchments, had been by this time thrown up at M. d'Utriel's head-quarters; and most of the French troops assembled there. On the 6th of February, early in the morning, a detachment of them, in their way towards the citadel, fell in with a party of the English, which they engaged with so much ardour, that the whole line of the English camp got under arms to their support. But, at length, the French, after a warm dispute, were descated, without any assistance.

All this while, the natives endeavoured as much as possible to harafs the troops in finall parties, and carry on their defence fence in flying platoons. Inured, themselves, to the climate, they had little to apprehend from its scorching heat; and were, besides, encouraged to bear it from the influence they very well knew it must have on an European constitution. And, indeed, the English army and navy now began to feel its effects; they were attacked with fevers, and other epidemical diseases to such a degree, that it was thought necessary to send sive hundred sick to the island of Antigua.

The difficulty of reducing the islanders, in the manner hitherto purfued, increasing from day to day, it was resolved to transfer the feat of war to the eastern and more fertile part of the island, called Grande-Terre. With this view, some men of war were detached from the fquadron, to take possesfion of Fort Louis. The Berwick, Roebuck, Renown, Woolwich, Bonetta, two bombs, and three tenders, were ordered on this fervice; and on the 13th of February, after a fevere cannonading of fix hours, the Highlanders and the marines were landed, drove the enemy from their intrenchments, hoisted the English colours on the fort, and kept possession of it. After this expedition, the men of war were ordered to cruize all round the island, to prevent the landing of any fuccours from St. Eustatia; and this service they effectually performed, the enemy, by their own confession, having had no provisions in the mountains, nor any fupply from elsewhere, but what they drew from their stores in Basse-Terre. However, the more effectually to answer this end, the Rippon and Bristol were ordered to fail to St. Eustatia, there to cruize, and prevent the Dutch attempting to throw into Guadaloupe that affiftance, which the inhabitants were now unable to procure for themselves.

General

General Hopson, who had been for some time in a bad state of health, died on the 27th; by which the command of the forces devolved upon Major-General Barrington, who, on the 28th, ordered the army to strike their tents, and to hut. On March the 1st, at break of day, the army was hutted; and the enemy so amused by it, as to imagine that the General proposed still to continue the attack; but, a few days after, the detachments at the out-posts were all drawn in; the batteries in and about the town of Basse-Terre blown up and destroyed; and the whole army, except one regiment, brought off and reimbarked on board transports, the whole, by break of day, and without the loss of a man.

The regiment left a shore was to garrison the citadel, the government of which was conferred on Colonel Desbrisay. The St. George and Buckingham were left to cover the garrison, in case of any attack from the enemy; and this proved a happy precaution. The French no sooner perceived the motion of the troops, than they descended from the redoubt, set fire to the huts, and entered the town. Upon this, Colonel Desbrisay fired upon them from the citadel, beat down and burnt the houses which they occupied, and at the same time made a fally, in which he took some prisoners; the rest made the best of their way back to the redoubt.

Although the fleet failed on the 7th of March, it was the 11th before all the ships of war and twenty-five transports came to an anchor at Fort Louis, owing to the very great difficulty of turning to windward. Accordingly, the others were driven to leeward, or were prevented by the winds and strong currents from weathering the point of the Saintes. The General, that night, went on shore to view the works that were carrying on by a detachment which had already been fent thither from Basse-Terre. On the 12th, he went in a boat to reconnoitre the coast on both sides of the bay, in order to find a proper place to make a descent. But Commodore Moore having acquainted him, in the evening of that day, that he had received certain intelligence of a French squadron, of nine fail of the line and two frigates, having been feen to the northward of Barbadoes, and that it was therefore necessary for him to exchange his prefent for fome more advantageous fituation; Mr. Barrington, the next day, called together the general officers, to confider what, in the present juncture, was best to be done. The result of this council was, That, notwithflanding the divided flate of the troops, by the feparation of the transports, the weak state of Fort Louis, and the impossibility of supplying it with water but from the ships, it would be more for his Majesty's service, and the honour of his arms, to do the utmost to keep possession of it, and wait for some further intelligence of the motions of the enemy.

The French fleet had now come to an anchor in the bay of Port-Royal. It was commanded by M. de Bompart, lieutenant-general, and chef d'escadre, and had on board some troops intended for the relief of Martinico, in case he found it invested by the English. It was very practicable for M. de Bompart to throw fuccours into Grande-Terre, as it was impossible at the same time for Mr. Moore, considering the situation of his squadron, to put to sea. A resolution was therefore taken to call in the cruifing flips, and fail immediately to Prince Rupert's Bay in Dominico, the only place where his ships could rendezvous and unite. Here he refreshed his men, who were grown fickly by fubfifting on falt provisions; here he supplied his ships with plenty of fresh water; here he had intercourse once or twice a-day with General Barrington, by means of small vessels, which passed and repassed from one island to the other. By continuing in this situation, he likewife maintained a communication with the English lecward islands, the inhabitants of which, on account of their defenceless condition, were constantly foliciting the Commodore's protection; and here he supported the army, the commander of which was unwilling he should remove to a greater distance. Had he failed to Port-Royal, he would have found the enemy's fquadron fo disposed, that he could not attack it to advantage, unless M. de Bompart had been inclined to hazard an action. Had he come to an anchor in the bay, all his cruifers must have been employed in conveying provisions and stores to the squadron. Besides, he could not have procured any fresh provisions or water; nor could he, in lefs than eight or ten days, have had intelligence of, or communication with the army or the leeward islands.

After all, this was but avoiding the greater evil: The privateers of the enemy took advantage of this movement. They skulked out along the coasts, and took between eighty and ninety fail of English merchant-men, which they carried into Martinico.

These frequent captures occasioned heavy complaints from the inhabitants of the British islands. They faid, it was as easy to have anchored in Port-Royal, as in Prince Rupert's Bay; and that by anchoring in the former, two ends would have been answered: the French men of war could not have got out, nor the prizes

HISTORY OF THE

prizes to their privateers have got in; fo that the latter must have fallen into the hands of the English cruisers, no harbour being then open to the French privateers, but St. Pierre's or Grenada, either of which could at any time be blocked up by a single frigate.

It was likewise afferted, that if the English had made their appearance off Port-Royal Bay, M. de Bompart would have been reduced to the alternative, either of engaging with a superior force, or of retiring, behind the citadel, into the Carenage, to avoid it; and so leave to Mr. Moore room to come to an anchor with his squadron between Fort Negro and Pigeon island, where he lay before.

The fleet being failed, the General continued to erect works for the fecurity of the camp, and for the finishing, as well as strengthening, the lines. At length, the chief engineer, who happened to be in one of the transports which could not get up fooner, being arrived, he made a report of the weakness of the fort; and, though a council of war had deemed it not tenable, the General determined to possess it, till some future event might point out to him what other step it might be proper to take for his Majesty's service. He reslected on the flate of the army under his command, and the little probability there was of fucceeding with them, in any attempt to reduce the country, without the affiftance of the ships of war to cover their landing. However, he determined to make a descent on the coast of Grande-Terre. For that purpose he ordered Colonel Crump, with a detachment of fix hundred men, to embark on board fome of the transports which carried the most guns, and endeavour to land between the towns of St.

Anne and St. François, and destroy their batteries; and the

The General imagined, that, by his fending Colonel Crump to attack the towns of St. Anne and St. François, the enemy would be obliged to detach fome of their troops from the post of Gosier. With this view, two days after the Colonel had failed, he ordered the only three hundred men he had left.

to be put on board the transports, and lie off Gosier; and, on the morning of the 29th, he reconnoitred the battery and the intrenchments; and, the enemy appearing less numerous than for some time before, he made a disposition to force them by two different attacks. This the troops executed the next morning, at fun-rifing, with great fpirit and refolution; and, notwithstanding the fire of the enemy from their intrenchments and their battery, foon carried both with very little lofs, and drove the enemy into the woods. The cannon and the battery were immediately destroyed, together with the town. Success having attended this attempt, the General ordered the detachment to force its way to Fort Louis; and at the same time fent orders for the garrison to make two fallies; one to the right, in hopes of putting the enemy between two fires; and the other, to attack their lines. The first was made; but, by some mistake, the other was not executed. The detachment from Gosier forced their way with fome lofs, in spite of a very strong pass which the enemy occupied; and took a battery of three twenty-four-pounders, which the next day was to have played on the camp. During these transactions, the French, at the redoubt and the Dos-d'Ane, came down upon Colonel Detbrifay in the cita-

del of Basse-Terre; and, having got a thirteen-inch mortar from Martinico, threw some shells into it from the neighbouring hills. They likewise creeked a battery, and kept playing with it upon the new works thrown up by the Governor. Now and then, they made a shew of assault in the body of the place, but were as often dispersed by the fire from the garrison; which, not content with barely defending itself, made frequent fallies to annoy the enemy.

On one of these occasions, a twenty-four pounder happened to be fired too near a barrel of powder, placed in a stone sentry-box, at the angle of the south-east bastion; the wadding set fire to it, and it blew up the Governor, Major Trollop, one lieute-nant, two bombardiers, and several men that were on the platform. Colonel Desbrisay and Major Trollop were taken up dead, being thrown at a great distance into the heart of the place; but some of the men, though greatly hurt, recovered.

By this unhappy accident, the army was deprived of two gallant and experienced officers; and the citadel loft a bold and active governor when it most wanted such an officer to defend it. The disorder occasioned by this explosion induced the French to come down in great numbers from the hills; but they were soon beat back. Major Melville, who had particularly distinguished himself, and who commanded the detachment of the thirty-eighth regiment, was appointed governor, in the place of Colonel Desbriday. The General ordered him to cause a detachment of three hundred men to fally out, under the command of Captain Blomer, on the 1st of April, to attack a bomb-battery, and other works of the enemy; and the Captain met with no great difficulty in carrying them.

The chief engineer, and the commanding officer of the artillery, were then fent to the citadel, that no time might be lost in putting it again into a proper state of defence. By this time, the remaining part of the transports, with the troops on board them, were arrived. A plan, therefore, was formed, in consequence of the information of some negroes, and their promifing to conduct the troops by night, in flatbottomed boats, to furprife Petit-Bourg, Guoyave, and St. Mary's, upon the Guadaloupe fide, and all at one and the fame time. The first of these services was to be performed by Brigadier Crump; who, as foon as he had carried his point, was to march to Bay-Mahaut, and defroy the batteries there, as well as a large magazine of provisions, which the enemy had formed by the help of the Dutch, and to prevent the arrival of any more Dutch ships. The second of these services was entrusted to Brigadier Clavering; who, after furprifing St. Mary's and Guoyave, was to march into the Capes-Terre, and reduce that fine country. The fruits of the fuccefs of this plan were evident, not only to the General, but to those who were to execute it. But the night proved fo bad, and the negro conductors were fo much frightened, that they ran feveral of the boats on the shoals, of which the coast is full. Brigadier Clavering, indeed, landed with about eighty men; but it was on a fpot fo full of mud and mangrove trees, that he was obliged to return, though not without being discovered by the enemy. Force now became necessary to execute what stratagem could not accomplish. The General, therefore, who, at this critical time, happened to be laid up with a most severe sit of the

gout, fent Brigadiers Clavering and Crump to reconnoitre the coast near Arnouville; and, in consequence of their report, ordered thirteen hundred regulars and one hundred and fifty of the Antigua volunteers, to land, under the protection of the Woolwich.

Accordingly, on the 12th of April, at day-break, they were put on thore at a bay not far diffant from Arnouville. The enemy made no opposition to their landing, but retired to very flrong intrenchments behind the river La Corne. This post was to them of the greatest importance; and therefore they had fpared no pains to strengthen it, though the situation was such as required very little affiftance from art. The river was acceffible only at two narrow paffes; and those they had occupied with a redoubt and well-palifaded intrenchment, defended with cannon, and all the militia of that part of the country. It was impossible to approach them but with a very contracted front; fo contracted as, at length, to be reduced to the breadth of the roads, which were interfected with deep and wide ditches. The artillery was ordered to keep a conflant fire on the top of the intrenchments, to cover an attack which was to be made by Duroure's regiment, and the Highlanders, who behaved, on this occasion, with the greatest coolnefs and refolution, keeping up, as they advanced, a regular platoon-firing. This gallant behaviour fo much intimidated the French, that they abandoned an intrenchment on the left, when the Highlanders threw themselves into it, sword-inhand, and, with part of Duroure's, purfued them into the redoubt. The French in the right intrenchment still kept their ground, and annoyed the affailants both with mufketry and cannon; and, though those who had carried the first intrenchintrenchment, had gained their rear, they could not get up to it, till a bridge could be made to pass the river. This took up near half an hour; notwithstanding which, the English crossed it time enough to take about seventy French, as they were endeavouring to make their escape; and, amongst them, were some of the most considerable inhabitants of the island. These intrenchments contained six pieces of cannon, yet were gained with the lofs of only thirteen men killed, and two officers and fifteen men wounded. As foon as the ditches could be filled up for the passage of the artillery, Brigadier Clavering marched towards Petit-Bourg. A confiderable number of the enemy had lined an intrenchment about half a mile on the left of the road; but when they perceived the English troops endeavouring to furround them, they abandoned it; keeping conflantly, however, within about two hundred yards in the front of the English, and setting sire, as they retreated, to the fugar canes; which often made it necesfary for their purfuers to avoid the road, to prevent any accident happening to their powder.

The English troops arrived late on the banks of the Lizard, beyond the only ford of which, the French had thrown up very ftrong intrenchments. These were protected by four pieces of cannon on the hill in their rear. The banks of the river being reconnoitred, and it appearing from the fituation of them, that it might cost a great number of men to force it, Brigadier Clavering kept up the attention of the enemy the whole night, by firing into their lines; and, in the mean time, got two canoes conveyed about a mile and a half down the river, and ferryed over, by means of them, before break of day, a fufficient number of men to attack the French in flank, whilst he did the same in front. The French soon perccived B b 2 ceived their danger, and left their intrenchments with the greatest precipitation. This passage did not cost a single man: and the enemy were flill purfued to Petit-Bourg, which they had fortified with lines, and a redoubt filled with cannon. Here the Grenada bomb, Captain Uvedale, was employed in throwing thells into the fort, where the enemy did not long remain after they had discovered in the English an intention to occupy the heights around them. They left the English masters of the fort and the port, with all the artillery and stores.

Brigadier Clavering now halted to get provisions for his men; and, on the 15th, Brigadier Crump was detached with feven hundred men to the Bay-Mahaut, and Captain Steil, with one hundred, to Guovave, to destroy a battery there. The panic of the enemy was fuch, that they just discharged their cannon at the latter, and then abandoned their post, tho' it might have been defended against an army. He nailed up seven pieces of cannon, and retired the fame evening to Petit-Bourg. Brigadier Crump, the next day, returned from the Bay-Mahaut, where he found the town and batteries abandoned. These he destroyed, with some provisions which had been landed there by the Dutch, before the English attacked the island; and he reduced the whole country as far as Petit-Bourg. The heavy rains which fell on the fucceeding days, fwelled the rivers fo much, that it was impossible to advance any farther; but the English took advantage of this circumflance to flrengthen the post at Petit-Bourg.

On the 18th, in the evening, the Antigua volunteers again took poffession of Guoyave; and, on the 20th, Brigadier Clavering, after leaving a fmall garrifon at Petit-Bourg, moved on to Guoyave, in order to proceed to St. Mary's, where he was informed, that the enemy were collecting their whole force to oppose him, and had thrown up intrenchments, befides befides making barricades on the road, to prevent his approach to it. Accordingly they were foon perceived at this work; and it was, at the same time, discovered, that there was a possibility of gaining their rear by roads which they thought impracticable, and confequently had guarded with very little care. A detachment was hereupon immediately formed under Colonel Barlow, for this fervice; and orders were fent to haften the artillery, which, from the badnefs of the roads, had not been able to get up. The first shot from the cannon, with the alarm which was given by the detachment in the rear, made the enemy very foon fenfible of their danger; and indeed their precipitate flight alone faved them from being all taken prifoners. They were purfued as far as the heights of St. Mary's, where the English again formed for a fresh attack on the lines and batteries, by which these heights were defended.

Whilft the barricades were levelling for the passage of the artillery, a fecond attempt was made to penetrate the woods, and gain the precipices that covered the flanks of the enemy's lines; but, before the cannon could arrive, the French perceiving the motion made for that purpose, began to quit their lines to oppose it. This produced a resolution in the English to make an attack in front, without any farther delay; and they made it, accordingly, with fo much vivacity, that, notwithstanding the constant sire both from the cannon and musketry of the French, they drove them from their artillery, and obliged them to retire in fo much confusion, that they never afterwards made head. Brigadier Clavering took up his quarters at St. Mary's the fucceeding night, and, the next day, entered the Capes-Terre, which is the richest and most beautiful part of the whole island, and exceeds perhaps any other other in the We?-Indies. Eight hundred and feventy negroes, belonging to one perfon only, furrendered this day.

Here the Brigadier was met by Messieurs de Clainvilliers and du Queruy, who were deputed by the principal inhabitants of the island to know what capitulation would be granted them. The Brigadier ordered them to be conducted to Petit-Bourg, where they were presented to General Barrington. The General, considering that his forces were now much reduced, and still daily decreasing; that part of the country remaining in the hands of the French, was very difficult of access; and that they might still be reinforced from Martinico; took the advantage of their present panic, and settled, without delay, the following terms of capitulation:

Articles of Capitulation between their Excellencies the Honourable Major General Barrington, and John Moore, Esquire, commanders in chief of his Britannic Majesty's land and sea forces in these seas; and M. Nadau d'Utriel, governor, for his Most Christian Majesty, of Guadaloupe, Grande-Terre, Deseada, and the Saintes.

Guadaloupe, 1ft May, 1759.	J. BARRINGTON.	JOHN MOORE.
	NADAU d'UTRIEL.	DE BOURGE.
	CLAINVILLERS.	DU QUERY.

It was a remarkably fortunate circumflance, indeed, that General Barrington loft no time in agreeing to these capitulations; for that with the inhabitants of Grande-Terre was but just signed, when a messenger arrived in their camp to acquaint them, that M. Beauharnois, the General of these islands, had landed at St. Anne's on the windward side of the island, with a reinforcement of troops, under the convoy of M. de Bompart's squadron. This armament, had it arrived but an hour sooner, might have rendered the conquest of the island very difficult, if not impossible. When M. Beauharnois heard that the capitulation was signed, he immediately reimbarked, and returned to Martinico.

The town of Baffe-Terre was now no better than an heap of ruins. But the inhabitants, in the true fpirit of Frenchmen, feemed to think no farther of their loffes than was needfary to repair them. They immediately fet about clearing away the rubbish; and the General assisted them with every humane.

Before this period which we have last recorded, Commodore Moore having received intelligence, that M. de Bompart had failed from Martinico, with a defign to land a reinforcement at Guadaloupe, and that his fquadron was feen feven leagues to the windward of Marigalante, he failed from Prince Rupert's Bay, and turned to windward with all poffible difpatch; carrying a prefs fail, night and day, with a view of coming up with the enemy; nor did he neglect any step that could be taken for that purpose. Had he pursued any other course, the French commander might have run into the harbour of St. Christopher's, and destroyed or taken a great number of merchant ships, which were then loading with fugar for England. Not content with this looking out for M. de Bompart, Mr. Moore had recourfe to every expedient and flratagem he could devise for bringing him to action. He even fent away part of his fquadron, out of fight of the inhabitants of Dominica, that they might represent to their friends at Martinico, his force as much inferior to what it really was. But this had no effect on M. de Bompart. He feemed to take as much pains to avoid a battle, as Mr. Moore did to bring him to onc.

Guadaloupe being thus reduced, General Barrington fummoned Marigalante, the Saintes, and Defeada to furrender. The latter fubmitted immediately, upon the fame terms that had been granted to Guadaloupe; as did Marigalante, on the appearance of the Berwick, Briftol, Ludlow-Caftle, and two Bombs, with a body of troops before it. The little Island of Petit-Terre was amongst the first to submit.

The General now prepared for his return to England; and, with this view, he gave the Commodore notice, that he intended to fend back to England, about the beginning of July, part of his troops in the transports which had brought them out. In consequence of this intimation, Commodore Moore repaired with his squadron to Basse-Terre road, where he was, the next day, joined by two ships from England. This reinforcement gave his squadron a great superiority over that of the French, which, by this time, was discovered by the Rippon to have retired to the island of Grenada. The Commodore was made acquainted with this circumstance; but, before he could weigh anchor, a frigate came in with fresh intelligence, that M. de Bompart had quitted Grenada, and was supposed to have steered towards Hispaniola.

In a tour the General now made of the island of Guadaloupe, he gave directions concerning what forts and fortifications he thought proper to have repaired and garrisoned; and regulated in concert with the inhabitants every thing that concerned them. He then ordered the Highlanders, with some draughts from the other troops, to North America; and conferred the government of the island on Brigadier Crump. Every thing being now settled to his entire satisfaction, he went on board the Roebuck, on the 23d of June; and on the 25th, set sail for Great Britain; in company with forty transports, carrying what remained of the old Buss, Barrington's, and Elliot's, after completing, by draughts from them, Duroure's, Watson's, and Armiger's, which were left to garrison the new conquests. Two days after, Commodore Moore, with his squadron, steered for Antigua.

WE must now return to the continent of North-America, where the English minister had determined to make, at once, three different attacks, in order to divide and weaken the power of the French, and, if possible, complete the conquest of Canada in one campaign.

The plan for this purpose was, That Major-General Amherst, the commander in chief, should endeavour to reduce Ticonderoga and Crown-Point; then, in case of success, by the Lake-Champlain, proceed, down the river Richlieu, to the banks of the river St. Lawrence, and there join Mr. Wolfe, now appointed a major-general, who, with another army, and a considerable sleet of ships, was to undertake the siege of Quebec, the capital of Canada; that a third army should invest the fort of Niagara, whilst a smaller one attacked the lesser forts in the neighbourhood of Pittsbourg, and on the line of communication between that place and Lake-Eric.

General Amherst, in conjunction with Admiral Boscawen, had now received the highest honour that the nation could bestow. They were thanked, by the representatives of the people affembled in parliament, for their gallant behaviour and fleady conduct in the reduction of the important fortress of Louisbourg. The great talents fo happily exerted on that memorable occasion, inspired the people with hopes, that the fame fuccefs would attend this campaign. Accordingly, every heart beat with anxiety for the iffue of the part which General Amherst was to have in these operations. The fatal miscarriage against Ticonderoga, in 1758, was still recent in the minds of every one, and gave great uneafiness to many. There was no reason to think, that the difficulties which then prefented themselves, were any way diminished, but rather the greatest grounds to fear they were considerably increased. The French had reinforced Crown-Point; acquired new strength on Lake-Champlain, of which they were entirely masters; and had, at Fort-Chamblé, a body of regulars Dd 2 and and Canadians, to maintain the pass from the falls of the river Richlieu to the river St. Lawrence.

To purfue, with effect, the plan of which we have been fpeaking, it was necessary to take the field early. General Amherst, therefore, embarked at New-York on the 28th of April, and arrived at Albany on the 3d of May. What time he spent here was employed in collecting his army, forming them for the field, and, in particular, giving the provincials some little idea of military discipline; getting ready whaleboats, and other boats, for transporting the troops, artillery, and stores; and in every other preparation necessary to attain the grand object of his instructions.

In the mean while, Major Rogers had been ordered, with Lieutenant Brheme, an affiftant engineer, and a party of three hundred and fifty men, to make what observations they could on the enemy's forts of Ticonderoga and Crown-Point. They left Fort-Edward the 3d of March. Lieutenant Brheme having executed his orders, returned. Major Rogers fell in with a working party of the French, killed some, and took several prisoners, near Ticonderoga, with the loss of three or four men. The weather was so intensely cold during this expedition, that it froze the feet of two-thirds of the detachment; some to such a degree, that the rest were obliged to carry them.

A regiment having been raifed in America, to ferve as light infantry, it was given to Colonel Gage, who was now appointed a brigadier. This regiment, having received new arms, were detached to take post at the rifts above Saratoga, there to remain till farther orders; as, likewife, a party of the feventeenth and the forty-second regiment, to the rifts near Still-water: and three hundred of the Rhode-island regiment to Fort-Edward. The forty-fourth regiment was ordered to encamp at Schenectady, where Brigadier Prideaux was to take upon him the command of the expedition defigned against Niagara. Colonel Haviland, with the remainder of the seventeenth, the twenty-seventh, and two companies of the Royal, joined Brigadier Gage's. The rest of the troops, when completed for the field, were ordered to Fort-Edward.

A fpirit of defertion broke out amongst the troops, which made examples necessary to stop, if possible, so great an evil. Lenity on such occasions is often a temptation to the commission of crimes, which the certainty of punishment would effectually deter men from committing: his Excellency, therefore, approved the sentence of a general court-martial which had found Dunwood and Ward guilty of desertion, and sentenced them to death; and the sentence was accordingly executed.

Some former orders to the regulars, declaring the General's refolution never to pardon defertion, and his affurances, that their good behaviour fhould be rewarded, were now addressed to the provincial troops, that they too might know what they were to expect from good or bad conduct, and have time to reslect on the ignominy which would certainly attend the latter. But, in spite of these examples, in spite of these promises and threats, the spirit of desertion still prevailed; and two other deserters, Rogers and Harris, being found guilty, were condemned to die.

On

On the 3d of June, the rear of the army were ordered to take the field. The General left Albany the fame day; and, on the 6th, arrived at Fort-Edward, where he encamped.

Blockhouses were crected in the front of each regiment; and every possible precaution was taken to prevent the army's being surprised by the enemy; nor was the preservation of the health of the troops less attended to. The drinking of spirituous liquors was totally discouraged, and a wholesome beverage was introduced in its stead. This consisted of melasses and the tops of the spruce sir, boiled together in a proper quantity of water; a mixture which had been found a most excellent antiscorbutic, and even an antidote against those distempers frequently occasioned by the excessive drinking of spirituous liquors.

A flag of truce now arrived from M. de Montcalm, forwarded by M. de Bourlemaque, on pretence of exchanging prifoners, and fettling a cartel. But the real purpose of it was, to gain an opportunity of making observations on the numbers and quality of the English troops, and other particulars of that nature. The General, therefore, whose vigilance was not to be cluded, frustrated the enemy's designs, by ordering the messenger to remain at a distance from the camp, till his dispatches were examined, and an answer returned to them.

Although fcouting parties were kept constantly on the patrole, and every kind of protection given to the inhabitants, yet numbers of them were daily scalped. The French and their Indians seemed to wanton in cruelty; nor age nor sex could arrest

"No fcouting party, or others in the army, are to fcalp women or children belonging to the enemy. They are, if possible, to take them prisoners; but not to injure them, on any account. The General being determined, should the enemy continue to murder and scalp women and children, who are the subjects of the King of Great Britain, to revenge it by the death of two men of the enemy, for every woman or child murdered by them."

Not any thing could add more to the reputation of General Amherst than this order, in which mercy and justice, humanity and found policy, were all so happily combined, as mutually to temper and support each other.

The greatest part of the troops, artillery, and stores being now arrived, the General left Fort-Edward on the 21st of June, with about fix thousand regulars and provincials; and marched them, in two columns, visiting the several posts on the communication, and making such alterations in them as he judged best for their security. In the evening, he encamped on the banks of Lake-George, and, the next day, with the assistance of Colonel Montresor, the chief engineer, traced out the ground for erecting a fort.

All possible expedition was now used to get up the remainder of the artillery and slores, and to hasten the arrival of the troops troops and the boats, that the army might lofe no time in proceeding on the intended enterprize. But the difficulties occafioned by the length of the carrying-place between Fort-Edward and Lake-George, and the badness of the roads over it, greatly impeded the endeavours of the General.

In the mean time, however, feveral ambufcades were formed on both fides of Lake-George, and feveral parties were fent out by General Amherst, as if merely to fish, in order to decoy the French into them; but all to no purpose. The French never appeared when these parties were out, or at least never took notice of them, but once, when, the advanced guard firing too foon, the enemy difcovered their flrength, and precipitately retired. The French, on their part, were no lefs affiduous in endeavouring to annoy the English camp. On the 2d of July, a ferjeant, corporal, and fixteen men, of the new Jersey regiment, who were cutting bark within fight of the camp, were attacked by a body of French Indians, who had concealed themselves in the brufh-wood, and from thence flole on them unperceived. The General, the moment he heard the firing, ordered a company of light infantry and rangers to their relief, and then two more companies of light infantry, and three companies of grenadiers. But tho' thefe troops were out as foon as ordered, and did not lofe a fingle moment in the purfuit, the enemy fled time enough to get into their canoes, after killing fix of the barkcutters. They, befides, carried off the corporal and five private men. The ferjeant, with the remainder, returned to the camp. Captain Jacobs of the Stockbridge Indians, with about thirty others, having been fent to hover about Ticonderoga, was not fo fuccefsful as the French Indians; but it was, in a great measure, his own fault. He had received orders orders not to appear on the lake in the day-time; but was fo imprudent as to disobey them: in consequence of which he was attacked by a superior force, and only ten of his party returned to the camp; Jacobs himself being taken prifoner.

On the 17th, another effort was made by M. de Montealm to gain intelligence of General Amherst's situation, by means of a slag of truce. But, as soon as it was discovered on the lake, an aid-de-camp was dispatched to conduct the boat into a bay, from whence the camp could not be seen; and a company of light infantry was ordered as a guard to the nearest of the two points that formed the bay. This slag of truce brought letters from M. de Montealm at Montreal, and M. Bourlemaque at Ticonderoga. The General answered them during the night; and, in the morning, sent an aid-de-camp with his answer to the Capitaine de milice, who had been the bearer of them.

The fuperintendence of the naval department, on this expedition, having been intrufted to Captain Loring of the navy, and a floop called the Halifax, that had been funk the laft campaign, having been weighed and rigged, and the whole of the troops, ammunition, flores, and boats being now arrived, the General, on the 21st of July, ordered the army to embark.

Whiting's regiment to have the batteau-guard; and Colonel Bradstreet was to make such dispositions for them as he thought best.

The front column was commanded by Colonel Haviland;

That in the rear, by Colonel Lyman;

The fecond column, by Brigadier-General Gage;

And the third, by Colonel Schuyler.

The artillery was ordered to land immediately after the fecond column. It was commanded by Major Ord, and composed the following train:

6 twenty-four-pounders

7 fix-pounders

3 three-pounders

6 eight-inch hawitzers

On the 22d of July, this armament arrived at a place called the Second Narrows, without any accident; and the troops difembarked very near the landing-place formerly used by General Abercromby's army. The advanced-guard skirmished with a party of the French, from which they took two prifoners; by whom the General learned, that M. Bourlemaque commanded at the lines, and that his force confifted of about three thousand regulars and Canadians, and about four hundred Indians. This was all the opposition General Amherst E c 2 met in his way to the Saw-Mills, where he now took post; and having effectually secured it, he advanced towards the enemy's lines. The troops, that night, lay on their arms. The next morning, the French observing that his Excellency's dispositions indicated a formal attack, they saved him any farther trouble, by abandoning their lines, which he immediately took possession of with the grenadiers of the army, and then encamped behind them with the rest of the army. The French now began a brisk cannonade from the fort, on the English troops; but the same work that had proved so destructive to the latter the preceding year, now became a protection to them.

In the center of these remarkable lines, the French had erected an high cross, which was now standing. Before this cross was sunk a deep grave. To the cross was affixed the following inscription, engraven on brass:

Pone principes corum ficut Oreb, et Zeb, et Zebee, et Zalmanna.

The French having abandoned their lines without oppofition, the General had the lefs reason to fear any resistance superior to the forces he had to conquer it. He, therefore, on the 24th, sent off the New-Hampshire regiment, to strongthen the garrison of Oswego, that, in case of necessity, a detach ment might be made from thence to assist in the reduction of Niagara.

Dispositions were now made to attack the fort with all the vigour the army brought against it could exert; and the garrison of the fort shewed every appearance of being equally disposed to make a resolute defence. But M. Bourlemaque, the commandant, foon finding that the General was not only well provided with every requifite to carry on the fiege, but was also possessed of every military talent necessary to employ them, thought proper to retire, on the 23d, with all his forces, except four hundred men, who remained till the evening of the 26th, when they likewife abandoned their post, after doing every thing the shortness of their time would allow them, to destroy and blow up the fortifications of the fort. Some deferters from this party came into the English camp, and informed the General, that the commander had loaded every gun, charged feveral mines, and laid fuzes to fpring them when all his men flould have evacuated the place; and that there was a great quantity of powder in the fort. The General offered them one hundred guineas if they would discover the fuzes, that they might be cut off; but they abfolutely declared, they did not know where to find them. Their fears, it is probable, had absorbed their whole attention to fuch a degree, as to make them forget what they knew of the matter. They flood trembling at the thoughts of the terrible event, although at fo great a distance from the feene of expected ruin. Nor were their fears ill-grounded, in point of time at least; for, as they were still protesting their ignorance, the explosion was heard. One would suppose, that the French were under some apprehensions from the consequences of it; for so precipitate was their retreat, that they forgot to give information of it to some of their scouting parties; the confequence of which was, that, when they returned, expecting to find their own army where they had left it, they found themselves pritoners in that of the English.

STATE OF THE STATE

As foon as the General could be fatisfied, that there no longer remained any latent feeds of destruction in the fort, he took possession of it; and, immediately, detached Colonel Haviland, with the light infantry, in flat bottomed boats, to pursue the fugitives. The Colonel came up with their rear; took some powder and a few prisoners; and then returned.

Ticonderoga is a very important post. It effectually covers the frontiers of the province of New-York; and is a fecure retreat for the army in case of necessity. The General, therefore, now ordered the fort near it, which lies towards the water, and which the French had not finished, to be not only repaired, but completed. He likewife gave directions for repairing the fort of Ticonderoga on the fame plan on which it was originally built, as this would be a great faving, confidering that but a fmall part of it had been ruined. This fort is a fquare, with four ballions, built with logs, on rocks covered with masonry, to assord a level foundation. The counterfearp of the glacis, and that of the ditch, with two ravelins, covering the only front to which approaches could be made, are all mafonry. Only one baftion and two courtines were demolished; and these not in the front easiest to be attacked. The glacis, the covert-way, the casemate, the walls of the barracks, and eleven good ovens, which proved of great use to the troops, had not received the least damage.

Fifteen private men were killed, and about fifty wounded, in the acquisition of this important post, besides Colonel Roger Townshend, who fell by a cannon-ball, on the 25th of July. His spirit and military knowledge justly entitled him to the esteem of every soldier; and, accordingly, the loss of him was universally lamented.

In

In the night of the 25th, the camp was alarmed by an imaginary attack. The foldiers flew to their arms; and every man's fears transforming his neighbour into a Frenchman, they fired at each other as if real enemies. This is one inflance, amongst many, to prove that the forming of a foldier is not the work of a day. It requires time to make the ruftic villager shake off his natural timidity; familiarise him to objects which heretofore they could not even think of without horror; and infuse into them habits of that obedience necessary to the prefervation of good discipline. The bayonet, in the hands of men who can be cool and confiderate amidst feenes of confusion and horror, is, by far, more fafe to those who use it, as well as more destructive to those against whom it is used, than powder and ball. On these principles, the General ordered, that in case, the enemy should make any attack in the night, they should be received with fixed bayonets. Another reason for giving this order was, to prevent the repetition of false alarms, by the discharging of muskets; and thereby preferve the lives of many, who might otherwife fall by the hand of their fellow-foldiers, in consequence of that disorder inseparable from attacks in the dark. In the morning, the army faw the lofs and difgrace with which difobedience of orders must infallibly be attended, especially by night; confidering the impossibility of distinguishing between friends and foes at that feafon. A panic, which had feized on two or three raw recruits, unhappily spread to great part of the line; and got the better of their recollection to fuch a degree, that nothing less than the General's presence could correct their belief of the enemy's being actually in the heart of their At length day-light convinced them of the confequences of thus encouraging groundless fears, by shewing them two of their comrades killed, and many others wounded; and how necessary it was for them implicitly to obey every order of their officers, in order to avoid suffering again in the like manner.

On the 28th, a courier arrived from General Johnson to inform the General of the death of Brigadier Prideaux before Niagara. Brigadier Gage was, upon this, immediately ordered to succeed him; and the second battalion of Royal Highlanders detached to Oswego, that, in case Niagara should not be yet taken, Brigadier Gage might renew the attack with the utmost vigour and dispatch.

Five hundred men were ordered to Lake-George, and to return with provisions and stores. The General's intention being now engaged in making himself equal, if not superior, to the enemy on the lake, he ordered Captain Loring to weigh some French battoes that had been sunk, and construct a brig; and took every other step that was necessary to be able to proceed without the least loss of time on the intended attack against Crown-Point.

As it was highly necessary to be first justly informed of the situation of the enemy, and the condition of the place, scouts were ordered out to reconnoitre both. A body of two hundred rangers, commanded by Major Rogers, were detached to take post as near Crown-Point as possible; but in such a manner, as not to be surprised; then seize on the best ground they could to defend themselves; and keep it, in case they were attacked, till they could be reinforced by the army. But all these precautions proved equally needless. On the 1st of August, intelligence was received, that the French had abandoned that place; upon which a detachment was ordered to take poffession of it. The General followed, with the bulk of the army, and arrived on the 4th, when he encamped his troops, and ordered a new fort to be traced out by Lieutenant-Colonel Eyres, as a farther protection to the British dominions, particularly against the scalping parties that had so long insested this part of the country; and thereby insure such a continuance of peace and quiet to the King's subjects, as was necessary to induce them to return to their deserted habitations between this place and Albany.

The fcouts employed to procure intelligence were not idle; and were, befides, so judiciously disposed, as to bring some, almost every hour. Part of this intelligence was, that the enemy had halted on the Isla-Aux-Noix in Lake Champlain; that their army consisted of three thousand sive hundred men, and a very large train of artillery, the whole commanded by M. Bourlemaque; that there were, besides, on the lake, four large vessels well manned, and mounted with cannon, commanded by M. le Bras. In consequence of this information, the General, who was resolved to secure a naval superiority on the lakes, sent orders to Captain Loring, who had been left at Ticonderoga, to add a sloop of sixteen guns to the brigantine now on the stocks, whilst Major Ord constructed a rast to carry six six-pounders.

On the 3d, a courier arrived from Niagara, with the agreeable news that the garrifon of that place had furrendered to Sir William Johnson, by capitulation, on the 25th of July.

Brigadier Gage had been instructed, in case Niagara should be reduced, to take post immediately, at a place the French F f called 1759.

called la-Galette, near the entrance of the river St. Lawrence: and as foon as General Amharft was informed of the above event, he fent Major Christie to Brigadier Gage, to enforce those orders, as by that means the English on the Mohawk river would be as effectually freed from the inroads of the enemy's fealping parties, and be enabled to live in as much fecurity, as the inhabitants of any part of the country between Crown-Point and New-York had already been. But. however necessary it might be to take possession of this post, the difficulties which would attend the doing of it appeared to Brigadier Gage fo great, that he thought proper to make the General acquainted with them; and, in the mean time, defer the execution of his orders to a more favourable opportunity. As the General deemed this post an object of the first consequence, he was greatly chagrined at the account from Brigadier Gage, especially as the season would be too far advanced before his orders, if he renewed them, could reach Brigadier Gage, for the Brigadier to execute them. He, therefore, was obliged to postpone this necessary business to another campaign.

Captain Kennedy, who had been fent by the General with a flag of truce, to offer peace to the Indians of St. François, was detained by them with his whole party. This infult exafperated the General to fuch a degree, that he immediately determined to chaftife them with a feverity equal to the offence. With this view, the more effectually to diffress the enemy, he ordered a party of two hundred men under Major Rogers to march and attack them on the fouth side of the river St. Lawrence; the barbarities and infamous cruelties which those dastardly villains, in particular, had promiseuously committed on women and children, meriting the most exemplary punishment. The troops sent against them were, however, forbid to use any retaliation against women and children; in a spirit truly becoming an English enemy.

The floop, the brig, and the raft, being now ready, the General, on the 11th of October, embarked his whole army in boats, with a defign to attack the enemy on the Isle-Aux-Noix. But his endeavours to get at them were bassled by the extreme bassles of the weather, which obliged him to get into some place of security. For this purpose, he chose a commodious bay on the western shore, where all except the Rangers landed, and boiled their kettles, covered by Gage's light infantry. The Rangers were disembarked on a neighbouring island. The lake now became too boisterous to venture on it with any kind of safety; and the year was too far advanced to leave any room to expect it would be again favourable for military operations. The winter itself approached with the most rigorous aspect.

On the 18th, however, the lake calmed a little, and a foutherly wind, the usual forerunner as well as cause of mild weather in all northern climates, fpringing up, the General was tempted to make one more effort. But a northerly wind blowing fresh on the 19th, convinced him of the impracticability of executing his plan, or at least the impropriety of attempting it. He therefore ordered the troops to return to Crown-Point. This was a fevere disappointment, as they thought themfelves on the eve of putting an end, by one decifive stroke, to the uncommonly fevere fatigues and dangers of an American war, which they had now fo long endured. Thus, just as they were upon the point of feizing the palm of peace, and, of courfe, infuring the possession of the wreath of glory, their views were blafted; and the completion of their wifnes Ff2 protracted protracted to the return of a feafon more favourable to new exertions of their patience and spirit.

The first evening after the army left Crown-Point, a mistake had nearly proved fatal to part of the forty-fecond regiment. This corps, having followed the light of the brig inflead of the radeau, was led close to the enemy, and attacked by them; and it was with the greatest dishculty they cleared themselves, at the expence of one boat, and twenty-five men, with Enfign Mackey, taken prifoners. But the French foon paid for this advantage. The English brig was a formidable veffel for this lake. She mounted fix fix pounders, twelve fourpounders, and twenty fwivels; carried feventy feamen, and a detachment of fixty men with officers, from the troops, to ferve as marines; this vessel was commanded by Captain Loring. The floop mounted four fix-pounders, twelve fourpounders, with twenty-two fwivels; carried fixty feamen, and fifty foldiers; and was commanded by Lieutenant Grant of the feventy-feventh. These vessels gave chase to three French floops, and drove them into a bay on the west shore, where their own crews funk two of them, and ran the third on shore. But Lieutenant Grant got her off, whilst Captain Loring went in purfuit of a schooner, the only vessel belonging to the French, which now remained on the lake to molest the Englifh.

On the 21st of October, the whole English army arrived at Crown-Point, where the General's first care was bestowed on the fort he had begun. He gave orders for adding to it whatever could contribute to its strength, and for opening of roads to Ticonderoga, the Massachusets, and New Hampshire, governments. He likewise distributed the troops into winter-quarters, quarters, in fuch a manner as to cover that part of the country from the inroads of the enemy. He then, on the 25th of November, after appointing fufficient garrifons for Crown-Point, and other forts, to preferve the communication with Albany, fet out for New-York, where he arrived on the 11th of December.

Though the General had been early acquainted with the fate of Niagara, it was the 19th of October before he received the leaft intelligence of General Wolfe's fuccess before Quebec; and this was by a prisoner, who informed him that Quebec had surrendered on the 18th of September. Some letters, indeed, had passed between him and M. de Montealm about the settling of a cartel, in which mention was made of General Wolfe's being before that place; but, till the period we have mentioned, he continued an entire stranger to his operations, though he had done his utmost to open a proper channel of intelligence for that purpose.

On the 8th of November, whilft the General was still at Crown-Point, he received the following account of the expedition on which he had sent Major Rogers, against the Indians of Saint François. It was not till the twenty-second day after his departure that the Major came in fight of the place; and, by this time, his party, from various accidents in the march, was reduced to one hundred and forty-two men. However, he reconnoitred the town about eight in the evening, in hopes of discovering an opportunity suitable to his numbers; and, agreeably to his wishes, finding the Indians in a high dance, returned to his party at two, and marched them to within five hundred yards of the town, where he cased them of their packs, and formed them for the attack. At half an hour hour after fun-rife the next morning he furprifed the town. when the inhabitants were all fast asleep, and fell on them to inflantaneously, that they had not time to recover themfelves and take arms for their defence. Some attempted to get to the waters, and, by that means, make their escape; but they were quickly purfued by about forty of the Major's people, who funk them and their boats. The remainder, in the mean time, fet fire to all the houses except three, in which there was corn, which Major Rogers thought proper to referve for the use of his party; and the flames confumed many of the Indians, who had concealed themselves in the cellars and lofts. By feven o'clock in the morning, the bufiness was completely over. In this fhort period the English killed at least two hundred Indians, and took twenty of their women and children; but they brought away but five. The rest were permitted to go where they pleafed. Five English captives were likewife delivered from flavery, and taken under the protection of their countrymen; and all this with the lofs of only one Indian killed, and Captain Ogden and fix men wounded. Major Rogers being informed by his prisoners that a party of three hundred French, with fome Indians, were about four miles below him on the river, and that his boats were, besides, way-laid, and having reason to believe this information was true, as they told him the exact number of his boats, and named the place where he left them, he thought proper to confult with his officers concerning a retreat, especially as he had the fame reason to believe that a party of two hundred French, and fifteen Indians, had, three days before he attacked the town, gone up the river to Wigwam Martinique, on a fuppolition of its being the place he intended to attack. The refult of this deliberation was, that there was no fafe way to return

way to return return but by No. 4, on the Connecticut river: upon this he marched his detachment that rout for eight days fuccessively, in one body, till, provisions growing scarce, near Amparamagog-Lake, he thought best to divide his people into fmall parties, giving guides to each, with orders to rendezvous at the difcharge of the Amansook river into the Connecticut river, as he there expected to receive a supply of provisions from the army, in confequence of a request he, on his fetting out, had made to the General for that purpose; for it was impossible for him, at that time, to tell which way he should be obliged to return. He then continued his march, and arrived at No. 4, on the 5th day of November; fatigue, cold, and hunger, with the continual prospect of starving, being his constant attendants. But great as the fufferings of this party were, they were nothing when compared with those of another, commanded by Lieutenant George Campbell, then of the Rangers. These were, at one time, four days without any kind of fusienance, when some of them, in consequence of their complicated mifery, feverely aggravated by their not knowing whither the route they purfued would lead, and, of course, the little prospect of relief that was left them, lost their senses; whilst others, who could no longer bear the keen pangs of an empty flomach, attempted to eat their own excrements. What leather they had on their cartouch-boxes, they had already reduced to a cinder, and greedily devoured. At length, on the 28th of October, as they were crofling a fmall river, which was in fome measure dammed up by logs, they discovered some human bodies not only fealped but horribly mangled, which they supposed to be those of some of their own party. But this was not a feafon for diffinctions. On them, accordingly, they fell like Cannibals, and devoured part of them raw; their impatience impatience being too great to wait the kindling of a fire to drefs it by. When they had thus abated the excruciating pangs they before endured, they carefully collected the fragments, and carried them off. This was their fole fupport. except roots and a fquirrel, till the 4th of November, when Providence conducted them to a boat on the Connecticut river, which Major Rogers had fent with provisions to their relief, and which rendered tolerable the remainder of their journey to No. 4, where they arrived on the 7th of November,

Having mentioned an attack on the fort of Niagara, as part of the plan of operations for this campaign, and having informed our readers of its being reduced, it is now time we flould give the particulars of that transaction. General Amherst, having taken every precaution necessary to insure success to this important attempt, Brigadier Prideaux set out from Schenectady, with the troops to be employed on it, on the 20th of May. These troops consisted of the following regiments:

The Forty-fourth, The Forty-fixth, The Fourth Battalion of Royal Americans, Two Battalions of New-York troops, A detachment of the Royal Artillery; and A large body of Indians, under the command of Sir William Johnson.

When Brigadier Prideaux arrived at Ofwego, he ordered Colonel Haldimand with a detachment, to remain and erect a tenable fort at that important post. On the 1st of July, the Brigadier embarked his troops on Lake-Ontario, and landed landed them, without meeting any opposition, about fix miles east of Niagara. This place, being fituated on a narrow peninfula, required no great labour effectually to invest it by land. As foon, therefore, as he could open a communication between the landing-place and the river, he began his approaches, and erected batteries, from which he fired on the defences of the fort; still advancing new works, in proportion as those defences were destroyed. The French, on their side, fully convinced of the importance of the place, exerted themselves in taking every necessary measure to defeat the endeavours of the English to get possession of it. With this view, all the troops they could spare from Detroit, Presque-isle, Venango, and Le-Bouf, were ordered to assemble at the Rapids, on the east side of Lake-Erie, and make the best of their way to attack the army belieging Niagara, in the rear; while the befieged made a fortie on their front. Brigadier Prideaux, who fortunately received timely intelligence of their defigns, made every disposition that was necessary to frustrate them. But he did not live to reap the honours due to his uncommon zeal and abilities. On the evening of the 19th of July, as he was giving directions in the trenches, he was unfortunately killed through the carelessness of a gunner in discharging a cohorn: the shell bursting instantly, as the Brigadier was passing by it. No time was loft in giving General Amherst an account of this accident; and his Excellency, on receiving it, ordered, as we have already feen, Brigadier Gage, from his own army, to fucceed him. In the mean time, the command devolved on Sir William Johnson, who continued the attack with the utmost vigour; took every precaution to receive the enemy, if they fliould attack him; and refolved to give them battle, rather than retreat; not doubting but that the courage and ardour of his troops would court victory to his banners.

Whilst in these dispositions, he, on the 23d, in the evening, received advice, that the French troops were marching towards him, under the command of M. d'Aubrey, to the amount of about twelve hundred men. Upon this, Sir William ordered his light infantry and picquets to take post on the left, on the road between Niagara Falls and the fort; and then, after reinforcing them with the grenadiers, and another part of the forty-sixth regiment, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Massey, and the forty-fourth regiment, commanded by Lieutenant-colonel Farquhar, disposed of them to such advantage, as effectually to support the guard left in the trenches.

On the morning of the 24th, the French made their appearance; and the Indians of the English army advanced to speak to those of the French; but the latter declining the conference, the former gave the war-whoop, and the action commenced. The English regulars attacked the French in front, whilst the English Indians gained their flank. This threw the French into great disorder, and the English, seizing so favourable an opportunity with all the eagerness it in turally inspired, charged the French with inexpressible sury, and totally routed them with great slaughter; which continued, it it is the number of the killed could not be precisely an ertained, their bodies lying so dispersed in the woods.

As the event of this battle, fought in fight of the befieged, might well be supposed sufficient to destroy every hope they entertained of being relieved, Sir William Johnson sent the commandant, M. Pouchot, Captain in the regiment of Bearne, an account of it, by the Honourable Captain Hervey; and summoned him to surrender in consequence of it, whilst he yet had in his power to restrain his savages from acts of cruelty. Besides, to leave the commandant no room to doubt his veracity, he permitted several of the officers he had made prisoners on the occasion, to visit him, and consirm it. These wise and humane measures had the desired and deserved effect. M. Pouchot consented to surrender on the following terms:

ARTICLE I. The garrifon shall march out with their arms and baggage, drum beating, and match lighted at both ends, and a small piece of cannon, to embark upon such vessels as the commander of his Britannic Majesty's forces shall furnish, to convey them to New-York, by the shortest road, and in the shortest manner.

Niagara, 25th July, 1759. Poucнoт, Captain in the regiment of Bearnc.

Wm. Johnson

The next day, accordingly, the garrison, which consisted of about six hundred men, marched to the side of the lake, with the honours of war; and there laid down their arms, and embarked on board the vessels provided to transport them, by the nearest route, to New-York, agreeable to the capitulation. The French ladies, and other French women who had followed their army, were, at their own request, conducted to Montreal.

Though this fiege was fevere, it was not attended with any confiderable lofs, except that of Brigadier Prideaux and Colonel

Colonel Johnson of the Provincials. When the command devolved on Sir William Johnson, he pursued the late Brigadier's vigorous measures; and, as his adopting them so readily did great honour to his modelly, so the happy event contributed equally to display his good sense and sound judgment.

This most important post of Niagara, the strongest the French possessed in this part of America, being now in the hands of the English, there was no room to fear any great resistance from the forts of Presque-Isle, Venango, and le Bœuf; especially considering how much their garrisons must have been weakened by the draughts made from them to assist the French army in their late unsuccessful attack of the 24th. Accordingly, Colonel Bouquet, who was detached from Imagadier Stanwix's army, for that purpose, had scarce any thing to do, but appear before them, to oblige the French to surrender.

We must now for a moment, return to Colonel Haldimand, who, as we have already mentioned, had been left at Oswego by Brigadier Prideaux. In the forenoon of the 5th of July, whilst he was executing the orders left him by the Brigadier, the Indian howl was heard, and word was brought by some scouts he had sent out upon the lake, that they had discovered about one hundred boats. Between eleven and twelve, some Indians and Canadians appeared round the place by land, and made a shew of attacking two redoubts, which he had thrown up to strengthen it; but he soon drove them off, into the woods. From thence, however, they continued to fire till sun-set; but kept quiet all night. In the mean time a deserter of the French corps de marine came in, and gave intelligence, that M. de la Corne commanded the party, confisting of about three hundred of the corps de marine, thirteen hundred Canadians, and one hundred and fifty Indians; and that la Corne had hopes of furprifing the post: that the Abbé Piquet marched at the head of these troops till they began the attack, encouraging them, from the prospect of plunder they were to get, to give no quarter. The night, however, passed without any alarm. At day-break, the Indians made their appearance again; and, by half an hour after feven, most of them marched to the left of the English, as if they intended to attack the intrenchment: but two pieces of cannon, loaded with grape, feconded by the musketry, drove them back again very speedily. They, then, no lefs than three times, endeavoured to fet fire to the boats; but all to no purpose. In these several attacks, the English had two men killed; and Captain Sowers, the Engineer, Lieutenant Otter of the Royal Americans, and eleven private, wounded. The French buried their dead; and took off their wounded; as appeared by the blood which could be traced to the batteaus. But the number was foon known by fix deferters of the corps de marine, all Germans. By their report, an officer of the corps de marine was killed; the Commandant of la Gallette, another officer, and about twenty private men, were wounded. M. de la Corne got as little honour as intelligence by this attack; for he neither made a prisoner, or got a scalp, though the deserters declared that he offered a thousand livres for one.

As to the Abbé Piquet, who distinguished himself so much by his brutal zeal, as he did not expose himself to any danger, he received no injury; and he yet lives, justly despised to such a degree by every one who knows any thing of his past conduct.

conduct in America, that scarce any officer will admit him to his table. However repugnant it must be to every idea of honour and humanity, not to give quarter to an enemy when subdued; it must be infinitely more so, not to spare women and children. Yet such had often been the objects of the Abbé Piquet's cruel advice, enforced by the most barbarous examples, especially in the English settlements on the back of Virginia and Pennsylvania.

We have still to relate the proceedings of Brigadier Stanwix, as part of the plan of operations immediately under the direction of the Commander in chief. He was ordered to Fort-Pitt, with a battalion of Royal Americans commanded by Colonel Bouquet, three battalions of Provincials, and some Indians, to attack the forts Venango, le Bœuf, and Presque-Isle; and likewise receive the submission of the Indians inhabiting that part of the country. He reached Fort-Pitt without any obstruction; and detached Colonel Bouquet to posses himself of the above poss, which he did without any great difficulty; the greater part of their garrisons, as we have already observed, having been detached with a view of raising the siege of Niagara; and, unfortunately for them, fallen in that attempt.

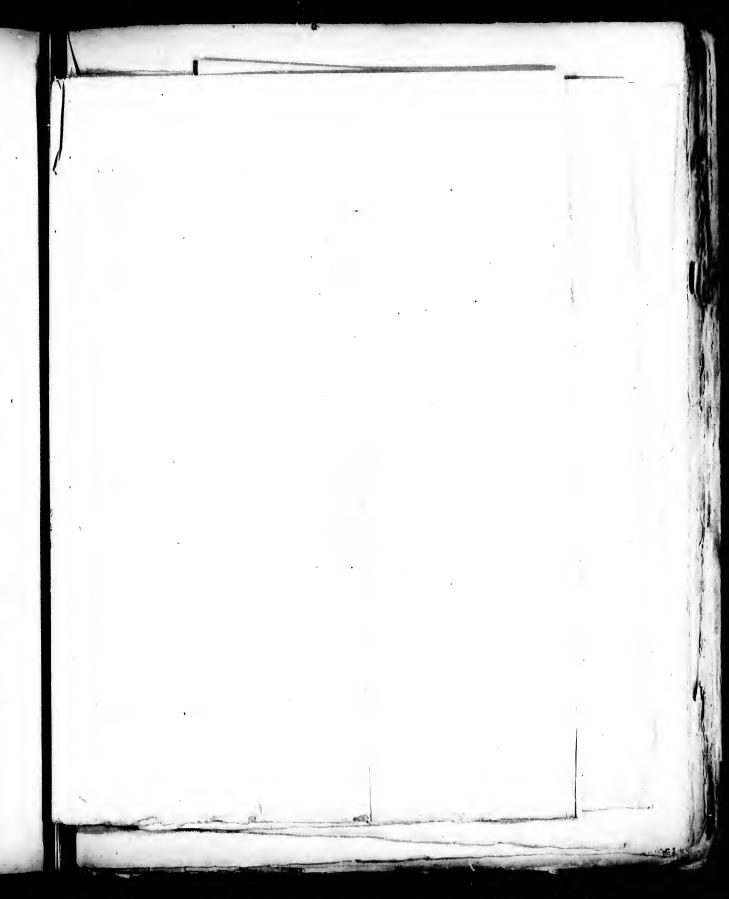

The Brigadier put Fort-Pitt and Fort-Ligonier into a good state of desence; and having attached some Indians to the interest of the English, returned to his former post. Venango and le Bœuf were well garrisoned, and likewise Presque-Isle. Detroit was the only fort of any consequence which the French still retained upon the Lake-Erie, and its garrison were exposed to the perpetual danger of perishing; as every communication, by which they could receive provisions, was entirely destroyed by the reduction of the above forts.

his engaging the attention of a great part of the forces that might otherwife be employed to defend that place, or by his penetrating to the affiftance of General Wolfe, who was to attack it. In the course of this expedition, we shall have occasion to admire the most undaunted resolution combined with the calmest perseverance, amidst an unusual variety of opposition, arising from the peculiar situation of the country, and the great abilities of M. de Montcalm, who was charged with tis defence.

About the middle of February, a confiderable squadron sailed from England to Louisbourg, where the sleet and the troops designed for the expedition up the river St. Lawrence were to rendezvous; and arrived off that place on the 21st of April. But the harbour was still so blocked up with ice, that there was no entering it. The squadron, therefore, of which Admiral Saunders was commander in chief, assisted by Admirals Durell and Holmes, steered for Halifax in Nova-Scotia; where being arrived, the whole sleet at that place consisted of the following ships of the line:

The

Before Admiral Saunders left England, he had received intelligence, that the French would endeavour to throw into Quebec a reinforcement of troops, ammunition, and other stores. He therefore ordered Admiral Durell, with a small squadron, to fail up the river St. Lawrence, and intercept any supplies intended for Quebec. Admiral Durell picked up two storeships; but seventeen had arrived too soon for him, with recruits, provisions, and military stores, under the convoy of three frigates.

From Halifax, Admiral Saunders proceeded to Louisbourg, as foon as the ice would permit him to enter that harbour. Here, in conjunction with the General, he made fuch dispositions as were necessary for the profecution of the intended enterprize against Quebec. Every possible precaution was taken by the Admiral to prevent any accidents that might happen to his ships in their progress up the river of St. Lawrence; the navigation of which the French had artfully represented as very dangerous. But had it been really so, the wise precautions of the Admiral, by posting vessels near every place there was any reason to suppose dangerous, would have procured safety to the sleet, as long as his order of failing should be observed.

Though

Though the ships began to sail out of Louisbourg harbour the 1st of June, it was the 6th before they had all cleared it. The Admiral then steered for Quebec; and on the 26th, arrived without the least accident off the island of Orleans, where the troops were landed the next day. This island is situated a little below Quebec. It is fertile, and well cultivated, and produces great plenty of grain. Immediately after the troops were landed, there came on a very heavy gale of wind, by which many anchors and small boats were lost, and the transports sustained much damage, by driving the one against the other.

On the 28th, General Wolfe published a manifesto, setting forth, "That the King his mafter, justly exasperated against the French Monarch, had equipped a large armament to reduce the most considerable French settlements in America; but that it was not on the industrious peasants, their wives, and children, nor against the ministers of religion, that he intended to make war; on the contrary, he lamented the mifery to which they must be exposed by the quarrel, and, therefore, he offered them his protection, and promifed to maintain them in the enjoyment of their temporal possessions, as well as in the free exercise of their religion; provided they would remain quiet, and take no part in the difference between the two crowns. That, as the English were masters of the river St. Lawrence, fo as to be able to intercept all fuccours from Europe; and as they had besides a powerful army, under the command of General Amherst, the resolution which they ought on this occasion to take, was neither difficult nor doubtful, as the utmost exertion of their valour would be useless, and ferve only to deprive them of the advantages, which they neight reap from their neutrality. He then mentioned the cruelties 3 eruelties exercifed by the French, which he faid would authorife the most severe reprifals; but that Britons were too generous to follow such barbarous examples. He again offered to the Canadians the sweets of peace amidst the horrors of war; and left to themselves to determine their own fate by their own conduct; expressing his hopes that the world would do him justice, should they oblige him, by rejecting these favourable terms, to adopt violent measures. He concluded, by representing to them the power, as well as the generosity of Great Britain, who thus stretched out the hand of humanity, and offered her assistance, when France was, by her weakness, compelled to abandon them in the most critical conjuncture."

This declaration had no effect. Every peafant exerted his utmost endeavours to be useful to his country. They either ferved in the army, or furnished it with provisions. Not content with this, they committed the most cruel hostilities, by scalping all those who fell in their way. General Wolfe exerted himself to put a stop to this inhuman practice, by representing these cruelties to M. de Montealm, as contrary to the rules of war observed by all civilized nations. But the French General's authority was not sufficient to bridle the bloody disposition of the savages; and General Wolfe, in order to intimidate them, was obliged to connive at some irregularities by way of retaliation.

M. de Montealm, who commanded the French troops, had greatly added to the natural strength of the country, by intrenching every accessible place; and seemed to put more considence in his situation than in the number of his troops, though superior to that of the invaders. He had, likewise, thrown into

Quebec

Quebec five battalions of regulars, completed from the best inhabitants of the country. Some of the troops of the colony, and every Canadian able to bear arms, with several nations of savages, had taken the field, in a very advantageous situation; and encamped, along the shore of Beauport, from the river St. Charles to the Falls of Montmorenci.

The Admiral having conceived some suspicion, that the enemy had artillery and a force upon the point of Levi; he communicated it to the General, who, thereupon, detached Brigadier Monckton, with four battalions, to drive them from thence. With this view, the Brigadier passed the river on the 29th at night; and marching next day to the Point, obliged the enemy's irregulars to retire, and possessed himself of that post, after skirmishing a little with the Canadians and the Indians, without any material loss. But the Brigadier found no cannon or batteries, as was supposed to be erected on this spot. Colonel Carleton marched, also, with a detachment to the westermost part of the isle of Orleans, from whence there was some reason to think the operations would commence.

On the Point of Levi were now erected, though not without great difficulty, batteries of mortars and cannon, to fire the magazines, demolish the works, and silence the batteries of the town. It was incumbent on the English to make themselves masters of, and fortify these two Points, were it only because the French, from either one or the other of them, could easily render it impossible for any ship to lie in the bason of Quebec, or even within two miles of it.

M. de Montcalm, well aware of the advantage which these works would give to the English, by the time he judged they were in fome forwardness, ordered sixteen hundred men to cross the river and destroy them. But this detachment fell into disorder, fired upon each other, and made a precipitate retreat; which, in all appearance, however, prevented their being entirely cut off. These batteries were not long finished, when they justified M. de Montcalm's fears; they did considerable damage to the upper town, though the fire was across the river. As to the lower town, it was entirely destroyed by them.

In the mean time the fleet had been exposed to the most imminent danger. The enemy, judging that the storm on the 28th must create great confusion, prepared seven fire-ships to take advantage of it; and at midnight sent them down from Quebec among the transports. But this scheme, though well contrived, was intirely deseated by the seasonable orders of the Admiral, and the boldness and dexterity of the seamen, who towed the sire-ships a ground, where they burnt to the water's edge, without doing the least injury to any part of the squadron.

The works, for the fecurity of the hospitals and stores on the island of Orleans, being now sinished, the army, in the night of the 9th of July, passed the north channel; and encamped near the enemy's left, the river Montmorency lying between them. The next morning Danks's company of Rangers, who were posted in a wood to cover some workmen, were attacked and entirely descated by a body of Indians; who, however, suffered considerably in this assair, and were, in their turn, repulsed by the nearest troops.

The General had conceived fome hopes of engaging M. de Montealm upon more equal terms than those of directly attacking him in his intrenchments; for the ground to the eastward of the Falls feemed to him to be, as it really is, higher than that on the enemy's fide; and from thence he thought fome advantage might be derived. There is also a ford below the Falls, which may be passed, for some hours, in the latter part of the ebb, and the beginning of the flood tide; and there was some reason to believe, that other means might be found to pass the river above the Falls. But though, in reconnoiting the river, a ford was discovered about three miles up, the opposite bank was so sleep and woody, and so well intrenched, that any attempt to pass at that place must have proved inessectual. The detachment sent to reconnoitre it, was twice attacked by the Indians, but they were easily repulsed. These rencounters, however, lost the English forty private men, besides some officers killed and wounded.

The General now determined to reconnoitre the country above the town. For this purpose, on the 18th of July, the Admiral ordered two men of war, two armed floops, and two transports, which had some troops on board, to run up the river; these passed by the town, and got into the upper river without any loss, except that of the Diana, who ran ashore upon the rocks of Point-Levi: but here the enemy had used the same precautions as in the lower, and the difficulties occasioned by them were greatly increased by that of communicating with the flats, and by the nature of the ground. But the most forbidding circumstance was, a well grounded apprehension that, if the General should attempt a landing between the town and Cape-Rouge, the body sirst landed would be attacked by the enemy's whole army, before any more troops could be put ashore to support it.

These mighty obstacles, however, were not sufficient to deter the General from forming a plan for landing at St. Michael's, chael's, about three miles above the town. But having discovered that the enemy, jealous of the defign, had actually brought artillery and a mortar to play upon the shipping, and judging that, as it must be many hours before they could be attacked by his troops, even supposing that a favourable night should carry the boats unhurt beyond the reach of the town, he dropt the defign as rather too hazardous. However, to divide the enemy's force, draw their attention as high up the river as possible, and at the same time procure some intelligence, he ordered Colonel Carleton, with a detachment, to land at the Point-aux-Trembles, to attack whatever he might find there, and bring off fome prisoners, and all the useful papers that he could; for information had been received, that feveral of the inhabitants of Quebec had retired to that place; and this was a circumstance which rendered it not improbable, that a magazine of provisions had been formed there.

Colonel Carleton was fired upon by a party of Indians the moment he landed; but he foon difperied, and drove them into the woods. He then fearched for magazines; but all to no purpose. However he brought off some prisoners, and returned with little loss.

The General now came to Montmorency, where Brigadier Townshend had, by a superior fire, prevented the French from erecting a battery on the banks of the river, from whence they intended to cannonade the English camp.

But as General Wolfe had not yet been fortunate enough to discover any spot where the difficulties were less, he resolved, at all events, to seize the first opportunity which presented itself of attacking the enemy, however advantageously they might be posted, and how well soever they might be prepared to receive him.

The men of war could not get near enough to the enemy's trenches to annoy them, for want of a fufficient depth of water. The Admiral, therefore, prepared two transports that drew but little, to be run a-ground, if occasion required it, and thereby favour the descent. With the assistance of these vessels, which the General understood would be carried in close to the shore, he proposed to make himself master of a detached redoubt, close to the water's edge, which appeared to be out of musket-shot of the intrenchment upon the hill. If the enemy offered to support this work, it would bring on what he most wanted, an engagement; and if it did not, it would at least assorted the means of discovering their situation, with sufficient precision to determine where it was most eligible to attack them.

Whilst preparations were accordingly making for an engagement, on the 28th of July, at midnight, the French fent down a raft of fire flages, confifting of near an hundred radeaux, which fucceeded no better than the fire-ships. Things being in readiness for the service in agitation, on the last day of July, in the forenoon, the boats of the fleet were filled with grenadiers, and a part of Brigadier Monckton's brigade, from the Point of Levi. The two brigades, under the Brigadiers Murray and Townshend, were ordered to be in readiness to pass the ford, when it should be thought necessary; and the Admiral placed the Centurion in the channel, in order to facilitate their paffage by checking the fire of the lower battery, which commanded the ford. This was a happy thought; her fire being extremely well directed, answered every purpose that could be expected from it. A numerous train of artillery was befides placed on the eminence, to batter and enfilade the left of the enemy's intrenchments. The two transports were then run a-ground; and that which was farthest upon the shore, assorbed the General an opportunity of observing, that the redoubt was too much commanded, to be kept without very great loss. For the two armed ships could not be brought near enough to cover it, as was at first supposed, with their artillery and musketry at the same time.

These previous measures, however, having thrown the enemy into some confusion, the General, who was prepared for an action, thought it no bad opportunity to make an attempt upon their intrenchment. He therefore sent orders to the brigadiers-general, to be ready with the corps under their command; Brigadier Monckton to land, and the Brigadiers Townshend and Murray to pass the ford.

At a proper time of the tide, the fignal was made for this purpose; but many of the boats, in rowing towards the shore, grounded on a ridge of rocks, that ran out a considerable distance into the river. This accident caused some disorder, and so much loss of time, that the General was obliged to stop the march of Brigadier Townshend's brigade, which he perceived to be in motion. During the time it took the seamen to get off the boats, the enemy fired a vast number of shot and shells; but they did little damage. The grounded boats being set associate, the whole were soon ranged in a proper manner; and some of the navy-officers accompanied the General to discover a better place to land at. They took with them a slat-bottomed boat to make the experiment; and as soon as they had found what they wanted, the General ordered the troops to disembark, thinking it not yet too late for the attempt.

Thirteen companies of grenadiers, and two hundred of the fecond battalion of the Royal Americans, got first on shore. The grenadiers grenadiers had orders to form themselves into four distinct bodies, and to begin the attack, fupported by Brigadier Monckton's corps, as foon as the troops should have passed the ford. and were near enough to affift them. But, whether from the noise and hurry of landing, or from some other cause, the grenadicrs, instead of forming themselves as they were directed. ran on impetuously towards the enemy's intrenchments, in the utmost disorder and confusion, without waiting for the corps which was to fupport them, and join in the attack. Brigadier Monckton was not yet landed; and Brigadier Townshend was still at a considerable distance from them, though upon his march to join them in very good order. The grenadiers were checked by the enemy's first fire, and were obliged to thelter themselves in or about the redoubt, which the French abandoned at their approach. In this fituation they continucd fome time, unable to form under fo hot a fire; and many gallant officers, careless of their persons, having been wounded, it became necessary to call them off, that they might form behind Brigadier Monckton's corps, which was now landed, and drawn up on the beach in extreme good order.

By this new accident, and the fecond delay occasioned thereby, it was near night before any more could be done; and then a fudden florm came on, and the tide began to make; so that the General thought it most advisable not to persevere in so dissipute an attack; particularly as, in case of a repulse, the retreat of Brigadier Townshend's corps might become hazardous and uncertain.

The artillery had great effect upon the enemy's left, which Brigadiers Townshend and Murray were to have attacked; and it is very probable, that, had it not been for the above accidents, the English would have penetrated there; and their their left and center being more remote from their artillery, would have borne all the violence of the French musketry.

The enemy made no attempt to interrupt this retreat. But the favages, agreeable to their custom, came down, and murdered such of the wounded as could not be got off, and scalped the dead. Among the wounded who escaped their cruel hands, was Lieutenant Peyton of the Royal Americans; whose case, for the singularity of it, describes to be particularly mentioned. Being providentially provided with a double-barrelled sufil, though not able to stir from the spot where he lay, he killed two of the savages as they were advancing to execute their horrid purpose; and, before others could come up, he was taken off the field by a Highlander, and laid down in a boat which was ready to put off.

In this attack the English had upwards of four hundred killed and wounded. Amongst the former, were two captains and two lieutenants; and, amongst the latter, Colonel Burton, fix captains, and twenty-two fubalterns. The two transports that had been run ashore, were ordered to be burnt, to prevent their becoming a prize to the enemy. The advantages which induced the General to make his attack at this place rather than any other, were, that here artillery could be brought into use; the greatest part, or even the whole of the troops, might act at once; and the retreat, in case of a repulse, was secure, at least till a certain time of the tide: advantages which could not be found any where elfe. But, to balance them, the beach upon which the troops were drawn up, was covered with a deep mud, full of holes, and interfeeted with many gullies; the hill to be afcended was fleep, and not every where practicable; the enemy numerous in their intrenchments, from whence they kept up a heavy fire. The lofs, therefore, even had the attack fucceeded, must have been very great; and, from the shelter which the neighbouring woods would have afforded the enemy, theirs would have been very inconsiderable. Besides, the river of St. Charles was yet to pass, before the town could be invested.

Soldiers, in general, have the honour of their regiment, or the corps in which they ferve, greatly at heart. The cenfure or praife bestowed on it, has therefore a particular effect on their imaginations; although every individual may not perhaps feel the fling of reproach, yet, as a body, they feldom betray a want of fenfibility. This no one was better acquainted with than General Wolfe. He, therefore, the next day, iffued the following order: " The check which the grenadiers met with yeslerday, will, it is hoped, be a lesson to them for the time to come. Such impetuous, irregular, and unfoldier-like proceedings, destroy all order, and put it out of the General's power to execute his plan. The grenadiers could not suppose, that they alone could beat the French army; therefore it was necessary the corps under Brigadiers Townfhend and Monckton should have time to join them, that the attack might be general. The very first fire of the enemy was fufficient to have repulfed men who had loft all fense of order and military discipline. Amherst's and the Highland regiment alone, by the foldier-like and cool manner in which they formed, would undoubtedly have beaten back the whole Canadian army, if they had ventured to attack them. The lofs, however, is very inconfiderable, and may be eafily r. paired, when a favourable opportunity offers, if the men will fhew a proper attention to their officers."

Immediately after this check, twelve hundred men, under the command of Brigadier Murray, were detached above the town, to attempt, in conjunction with Admiral Holmes, to deflroy ζh-

ftroy the French ships, if they could be got at, in order to open a communication with General Amherst. Brigadier Murray was ordered, at the same time, to seek every favourable opportunity of engaging some of the enemy's detachments on tolerable terms; and even use all the means in his power to provoke them to attack him. The Brigadier, after making two different attempts to land on the north shore, without success, made a third attempt, unexpectedly, at de Chambaud, where he burnt some spare clothing belonging to the French troops.

The enemy's ships being secured in such a manner as not to be approached, and no other object presenting itself to induce Brigadier Murray's longer stay, he returned to the camp with some prisoners, who were the first to inform the English of the surrender of Niagara. It was likewise discovered, by intercepted letters, that the enemy had abandoned Ticonderoga and Crown-Point, and retired to the Isle-Aux-Noix; and that General Amherst was making preparations to pass the Lake-Champlain to fall on M. Bourlemaque's corps, which consisted of three battalions, and as many Canadians as made the whole amount to near three thousand men.

In the mean time, the General exerted his endeavours to retrieve the lofs he had fustained at Montmorenci, but the bodily fatigues he had endured, increased a disorder with which he had been afflicted even from his first leaving England, and this bringing on a fever, he was thereby totally disabled. He therefore wrote the following letter to the brigadiers:

Major-General Wolfe's Letter to the Brigadiers.

"That the public fervice may not fuffer by the General's indifposition, he begs the Brigadiers will meet and consult together for the public utility and advantage, and consider of the best method to attack the enemy.

" If

Kk

- " If the French army be attacked and defeated, the General concludes, that the town would immediately furrender; because he does not find they have any provision in the place.
- "The General is of opinion, that the army should be attacked in preference to the place, because of the difficulties of penetrating from the lower to the upper town; in which attempt, neither the guns of the shipping, nor of our own batteries, could be of much use.
  - " There appears to be three methods of attacking the army:
- "First, In dry weather, a large detachment may march in a day and a night, so as to arrive at Beauport (fording the Montmorenci eight or nine miles up) before day in the morning. It is likely they would be discovered upon this march on both sides of the river.——If such a detachment penetrates to the entrenchments, and the rest of the troops are ready, the consequence is plain.
- "Second, If the troops encamped here pass the ford with the falling water, and in the night march on directly towards the point of Beauport, the light infantry have a good chance to get up the Woody-hill; trying different places, and moving quick to the right, would foon discover a proper place for the rest. The upper redoubt must be attacked, and kept by a company of grenadiers. Brigadier Monckton must be ready, off the point of Beauport, to land where our people get up the hill; for which signals may be appointed.
- " Third, All the chosen troops of the army may attack at Beauport at low water. A diversion must be made across the ford an hour before the second attack.
- " N. B. For the first attack, it is sufficient if the water begins to fall a little before day-light, or about it. For the other two, it will be best to have it low water half an hour before day.

" The

"The General thinks the country should be ruined and destroyed as much as can be done consistent with a more capital operation. There are guides in the army for the detachment in question."

The Brigadiers immediately affembled in confequence of this letter; and having deliberated on it, returned the following answer:

Point-Levi, August 29, 1759.

"Having met this day, in consequence of General Wolse's desire, to consult together for the public utility and advantage, and to consider of the best method of attacking the enemy, and having read his Majesty's private instructions which the General was pleased to communicate to us, and having considered some propositions of his with respect to our future operations, we think it our duty to offer our opinion as follows:

"The natural strength of the enemy's situation between the rivers St. Charles and Montmorenci, now improved by all the art of their engineers, makes the defeat of their army, if attacked there, very doubtful. The advantage which their cafy communication along the shore, gives over our attack from boats, and by the ford of the river Montmorenci, is evident from late experience; and it appears to us that that part of the army which is proposed to march through the woods, nine miles up the Montmorenci, to furprise their camp, is exposed to certain discovery, and consequently to the disadvantage of a constant wood fight; but allowing that we could get footing on the Beauport fide, the Marquis de Montcalm will still have it in his power to dispute the passage of the river St. Charles, till the place is supplied with provisions from the ships and magazines above, from which it appears they draw their sublistence.

"We therefore are of opinion, that the most probable method of striking an effectual blow, is to bring the troops to the fouth shore, and to carry the operations above the town.

" If we can establish ourselves on the north shore, the Marquis de Montcalm must fight us on our own terms; we are between him and his provision, and between him and the army opposing General Amherst.

" If he gives us battle and we defeat him, Quebec, and probably all Canada, will be our own, which is beyond any advantage we can expect by the Beauport fide; and should the enemy pass over the river St. Charles with force sufficient to oppose this operation, we may still, with more ease and probability of fuccess, execute the General's third proposition, (which is in our opinion the most eligible) or undertake any thing else on the Beauport shore, necessarily weakened by the de tachments made to oppose us above the town.

> (Signed) MONCKTON. Brigadiers Townshend. MURRAY."

This plan of operations being approved of by the General, preparations were immediately begun to carry it into execution.

· The Admiral and the General had already reconnoitred the town with a view to a general affault; but, after confulting with the chief Engineer, who was well acquainted with its interior part, it appeared, that, though the batteries of the lower town might be easily filenced by the men of war, the business of an affault could be but little forwarded by such success; since the few passages that lead from the lower to the upper town were carefully intrenched, and that the ships must be content to receive great damage from the shot and bombs of the upper batteries, without making the least impression on them. The enemy belides, to the uncommon strength of the country, thod country, had added, for the defence of the river, a great number of floating batteries and boats; and as to any thoughts of furprising them, their vigilance, together with the alertness of the Indians, who kept continually hovering round the English army, rendered it impossible. Seldom a day passed, that these favages did not skirmish with the English; and though they were always beaten, yet it was often at a considerable expence. Such an uncommon combination of circumstances, which left nothing but a choice of difficulties, was sufficient to perplex and distress the most able commander.

In consequence of the resolution taken to quit the camp at Montmorenci, the troops and artillery there were reimbarked and landed at Point-Levi; and it being likewife determined to carry on the operations above the town, the General, after fecuring the post there, and at the isle of Orleans, marched with the remainder of the forces from Point-Levi the 5th and 6th of September, and embarked them in transports which had passed the town for that purpose. On the 7th, 8th, and 9th, Admiral Holmes with the ships sailed up the river, in order to amuse the enemy now posted along the north shore. But the transports being extremely crowded, and the weather very bad, the General thought proper to cantoon half his troops on the fouth shore, in order to refresh them: in the mean time he was wholly employed in reconnoitring: at length he discovered a fmall path leading from the river fide up a fleep precipice, at the fummit of which it appeared that the enemy had a post, but by their number of tents, which did not exceed a dozen, it was judged the strength of it could not be more than one hundred men; the General therefore determined, if possible, to land on this fpot: preparations were accordingly made for this purpose the day and night preceding the attack, and the Admiral, to engage the attention of the enemy, caufed many buoys to be laid, and employed a number of boats in founding the Beauport coast, to create a suspicion that it was intended to land on that shore.

On the 13th, at one in the morning, the light infantry commanded by Colonel Howe, the regiments of Bragg, Kennedy. Lascelles, and Anstruther, with a detachment of Highlanders and American grenadiers, the whole under the command of Brigadier Monckton, were put into the flat-bottomed boats, about three leagues above the intended landing-place; and, after some feints made by the ships, under the immediate direction of Admiral Holmes, to draw off the attention of the enemy above, the boats fell down with the tide: the ships followed them about three quarters of an hour afterwards, and got to the landing-place just at the time that had been concerted to cover the landing. The troops landed on the north shore, within a league of Cape-Diamond, an hour before day-break, The rapidity of the tide of ebb having carried them a little below the intended place of attack, the light infantry were obliged to fcramble up a woody precipice in order to fecure the landing of the rest of the troops, by dislodging the men at the before mentioned post, which defended the small intrenched path they were to ascend. After a little firing, the light infantry gained the top of the precipice, and dispersed the guard; by which means the rest of the troops got up, and were formed with very little loss from the opposition of a few Canadians and Indians in the wood. The boats, as fast as they were emptied, were fent back for the fecond embarkation, which was immediately made by Brigadier Townshend. Brigadier Murray, who had been detached, with Anstruther's battalion, to attack a four-gun battery on the left, was recalled by the General, who now faw the French army croffing the river St. Charles, and thereupon began to form his line, having his right covered by the Louisbourg grenadiers; on the right of these again he afterwards brought Otway's; to the left, were Bragg's, Kennedy's, Lascelles', the Highlanders, and Anstruther's. The right of this body was commanded by Brigadier Monckton, and the left by Brigadier Murray. His rear and his left were protected by Colonel Howe's light-infantry; the Colonel being returned from the four-gun battery beforementioned, which had been taken possession of by part of 'Anstruther's. M. de Montcalm having, as he advanced, difcovered an intention to flank the left of the English, Brigadier Townshend was immediately ordered there with General Amherst's battalion, which he formed en potence. His numbers were foon after increased by the arrival of the two battalions of Royal Americans. Webb's was drawn up by the General as a referve, in eight fubdivisions, with large intervals. The French lined the bushes in their front with fifteen hundred Indians and Canadians, and amongst them most of their best marksmen, and by means of them kept up a very galling, though irregular fire, on the whole line, who bore it with the greatest patience and good order; referving theirs for the main body now advancing. This fire was, however, checked by the front posts of the English, which protected the forming of their line. The right of the enemy was composed of the troops of the colony, the battalions of la Saare, Languedoc. and the remainder of their Canadians and Indians. Their center moved on in a line; but as it advanced, accidentally gained the appearance of a column. It confifted of the battalions of Bearne and Guienne. Their left was formed of the remaining troops of the colony, and the battalion of Royal Roufillon. They brought up two pieces of small artillery. The English had been able to bring up but one gun. But as it was admirably well ferved, it galled the French troops exceedingly. The attack of the French was very fmart and brifk to the right. The English troops referved their fire till the French came within forty yards of them; and then gave it so heavily, and continucd tinued it so smartly, that the French every where gave way. It was now that the General fell, at the head of Bragg's, and Colonel Carleton received a desperate wound on his head; some time after, whilft the Louisbourg grenadiers were advancing with their bayonets fixed, Brigadier Monckton was shot through the body at the head of Lascelles'. In the front of the opposite battalions fell also M. de Montcalm; his second in command was likewife wounded, and afterwards died on board an English ship. Part of the French made a second, but faint, attack. Part took to some thick copse-wood, and made such an effectual stand, as covered the retreat of the rest of the French army. At this moment, each particular corps of the English seemed in a manner to rival each other, with a view to its own peculiar character. The grenadiers, Bragg's and Lascelles', pressed on with their bayonets. Brigadier Murray, advancing britkly with the troops under his command, completed the rout on this fide. The Highlanders, then, supported by Anstruther's, took to their broad fwords, and drove part of the French into the town, and part to the works at their bridge on the river St. Charles.

The action on the left and in the center of the English was not so severe. The houses into which their light-infantry were thrown, were well defended by them, as they were supported by Colonel Howe, who, taking post with two companies behind a small copse, and frequently fallying upon the slanks of the enemy during their attack, drove them often into heaps, and Brigadier Townshend, by advancing platoons of Amherst's regiment against the front of this body, totally prevented the right wing from executing their first intention. Before this, one of the Royal American battalions had been detached to preserve the communication with the boats, and the other, to occupy the ground which Brigadier Murray's movement had left open. Brigadier Townshend remained with ined with with Amherst's to maintain this disposition, and keep in awe the right of the French, and a body of their favages, who waited fill more towards the rear of the English, opposite the posts of their light infantry, for an opportunity to fall upon it. Things were in this fituation, when the command in chief devolved on Brigadier Townshend, who thereupon immediately repaired to the center; and, finding that some of the troops were in diforder, occasioned by their pursuit of the enemy, formed them again as foon as possible. A corps of cavalry, light infantry, and grenadiers, commanded by M. de Lougainville, was still drawn up in the rear of the English army. This corps confifted of about two thousand men, and was intended to march along the shore abreast with the boats of the English, to prevent their landing if possible; but the current of the river hurried down the boats with fo much rapidity, that the troops were difembarked, before the French could arrive. But Brigadier Townshend did not think it prudent to quit his advantageous fituation, and risk the promising advantages of the day by feeking a fresh enemy, posted, perhaps, in the very kind of ground he might have wished for, which was woods and fwamps. The loss of the English in this memorable action was fifty-feven killed, and fix hundred and feven wounded. The French had near fifteen hundred. chiefly regulars, killed, wounded, and made prisoners; among the prisoners were some officers, taken on the field of battle. M. de Montcalm died of his wounds; and the Brigadiers de Senefergue and de Saint Ours were killed. The French, befides, loft one piece of cannon.

As foon as the action was over, Brigadier Townshend redoubted his camp beyond infult; made a road up the precipice for the cannon and artillery; constructed batteries against the town; and cut off its communication with the country. But, on the 17th, at noon, two or three days before any of these batteries could be ready to play, he received by a stag of truce proposals of capitulation from the Governor, and then sent them back again with his answer, and a message, purporting, That unless he received a satisfactory reply in four hours, he should listen to no farther treaty. Admiral Saunders had, by this time, brought his large ships to bear on the town, as if he intended to attack it. This was another spur to the French to come to some speedy determination: and on the 18th accordingly, the same officer who had brought the Governor's proposals, returned at night with his reply; and the next morning, the commanding officers on both sides signed the following capitulation:

Articles of capitulation required by M. de Ramfey, Commander, for his Most Christian Majesty, in the higher and lower town of Quebec, Knight of the Military Order of St. Lewis, from his Excellency the General commanding his Britannic Majesty's forces.

ARTICLE I. M. de Ramsey requires the honours of war for his garrison; and that it shall be conducted back to the army in safety, by the shortest road, with its arms, baggage, six pieces of brass cannon, two mortars or hawitzers, and twelve rounds.

Answer; the garrison of the town, composed of land forces, marines, and failors, shall march out with their arms and baggage, drums beating, lighted matches, two pieces of cannon, and twelve rounds; and shall be embarked, as conveniently as possible, in order to be landed at the first port in France.

CHARLES SAUNDERS.
GEORGE TOWNSHEND.
DE RAMSEY.

Agreeable to this capitulation, Lieutenant-Colonel Murray, with three companies of grenadiers, took possession of the upper town; and Captain Paliser, of the navy, with a large body of seamen, of the lower.

In the course of this campaign, Fortune distinguished herself by her usual caprice. If General Wolfe did not happen to be her favourite at the instant of the attack in the neighbourhood of Montmorenci, she amply compensated him when he made good his landing; and he so well knew how to improve her favours, by means of an able disposition, as to insure success: But unhappily, like another Epaminondas, death snatched him from the arms of victory.

A recent event, by the general's manner of communicating it, diffuted new spirits amongst his troops. An order appeared the day preceding the action, informing the army,—" That the enemy's force is now divided, great scarcity of provisions provisions in their camp, and a universal discontent amongst the Canadians. The second officer in command is gone to Montreal or to Saint John's, which gives reason to think that General Amherst is advancing into the colony. The troops below are in readiness to join us, and the army will land where the French seem least to think of it. The officers and men will remember what their country expects from them, and what a determined body of foldiers, inured to war, are capable of doing against five weak French battalions, mingled with a disorderly peasantry."

In war the most uisling accident may sometimes destroy the best imagined plan. The following circumstance had nearly proved fatal to the General's feheme of landing where he did. In the twilight of the evening preceding the battle, two French deferters, from the regiment of la Sarre, came in: and, being carried on board a flip of war commanded by Captain Smith, then lying near the north flore, gave information, that, that very night, the garrifon of Quebec expected a convoy of provisions from M. de Bougainville's detachment, which was higher up the river. These deserters, some time after, perceiving the English boats gliding down the river in the dark, fupposed them to be the expected convoy; and on this a noise enfued, which General Wolfe fortunately heard time enough to prevent the refolution which occasioned it: For Captain Smith, not having been informed of the General's intentions, was making preparations to fire into the boats, believing they were the convoy the deferters had been speaking of; and had he done fo, would have not only confiderably hurt his friends, but fufficiently alarmed the French to frustrate the attempt. Again, the French fentries, posted along the shore, were in expectation expectation of the convoy; and therefore, when the English boats came near their posts, and properly answered their usual challenge, they suffered them to pass without the least suspicion.

Thus the great abilities of the English officers, exact discipline of the troops, and courage of both, gave them possession of Quebec.

Though the conquest of Quebec was of the utmost importance to the English, yet the heavy loss they sustained in the death of their commander, greatly abated its value. They loft a general who merits every encomium that is due to quick conception, to fleady courage, to unwearied perfeverance, to a nobleness of fentiment, and fuperior abilities. General Wolfe early habituated himself to study, and being perfectly acquainted with the theory of his profession, the practice of it was familiar to him: His genius was of that active kind, that no impediment could prevent the execution of any plan he once had formed: His judgment was confpicuous on every occasion; this begot an implicit con. we e in all under his command, but more particularly those who were immediately to execute his orders; hence the alertness of the Brigadiers: And if they were affured that no ill-formed plan would fall to their lot to execute, on the other hand the General was certain of their full exertion of every endeavour to accomplish his orders. The House of Commons therefore voted them their thanks, but addressed his Majesty that he would be pleased to order a monument to be crected in Westminster Abbey to the memory of General Wolfe: And it will not be improper here to observe, that the French army petitioned Mr. Pitt for leave 1759• leave to erect a monument, in the principal church at Quebec, to the memory of their late General, M. de Montcalm; to which Mr. Pitt gave his immediate confent, and fent proper instructions to the Governor for that purpose.

In combined expeditions, the capital parts of action must, in general, fall to the share of the land forces; yet, as in this case, it would, without a powerful sleet, have been impossible to succeed, the English admiral and his scamen have an equal claim to praise with the English generals and their troops. The sailors executed their part of the service with an alacrity and resolution peculiar to a body who are by nature the protectors and guardians of their country; and who have enriched it with trophics brought from every quarter of the world. The admirals therefore on this expedition, likewise received the thanks of the House of Commons.

Quebec being garrifoned with feven thousand men, and well victualled, the government of it was entrusted to Brigadier General Murray; and Colonel Burton was appointed Lieutenant Governor. Brigadier Monckton returned to New-York, where he soon recovered of his wound; and Brigadier Townshend embarked, with Admiral Saunders, for England where they both arrived about the beginning of the winter.

The Cherokees, all this while, were continuing to destroy the settlements on the frontiers of South Carolina, not without exercising the most shocking cruelties on the settlers themselves. Governor Lyttleton, therefore, convinced that it was only by an early and vigorous exertion of the force of the prouc-

vince, that the Indians, committing these ravages, could be brought to reason, determined to march against them as soon as possible. With this view, he applied to the legislature of his province, for the necessary authority and powers to raise and maintain a body of men; and when he had raised them, marched at the head of eight hundred provincials and three hundred regular troops into their country. This quick and spirited proceeding so intimidated the barbarians, that they immediately sent a deputation of their chiefs and head warriors to beg a peace, which the Governor thought proper to grant them by the following treaty.

Treaty of Peace and Friendship, concluded by his Excellency William Henry Lyttelton, Esq; Captain-General and Governor in chief of his Majesty's Province of South Carolina, with Attakulla-kulla, or the Little Carpenter, Deputy of the whole Cherokee nation, and other Headmen and Warriors thereof, at Fort Prince George; December 26th, 1759.

ARTICLE I. There shall be a firm peace and friendship between all his Majesty's subjects of this province and the nation of Indians called the Cherokees, and the said Cherokees shall preferve peace with all his Majesty's subjects whatever.

- II. The articles of friendship and commerce, concluded by the lords commissioners for Trade and Plantations with the deputies of the Cherokees, by his Majesty's command, at Whitehall the 7th of September 1730, shall be strictly observed for the time to come.
- III. Whereas the Cherokee Indians have, at fundry times and places, fince the 19th of November 1758, flain divers of his M m Majesty's

The alacrity of the troops during this march, and the fafety with which it was conducted, deferve the highest applause. But what does most honour to the Governor, is the almost incredible shortness of the time in which, withal, it was performed. It was the beginning of October before he could set out for Congrees, about one hundred miles off, to collect the militia; and from thence he had an uninhabited track to march them through, to Keowee, a place in the Cherokee country three hundred miles from Charles-Town, where he obliged the Indians to sue for peace. Yet this truce was to all human appearance happily concluded on the 26th day of the following December.

THE scason being no longer favourable to military operations, the English troops, as we have seen, were ordered into winter-quarters; but General Amherst, in the mean time, formed his plan for the total reduction of Canada, the next campaign. Montreal was now the only place of consequence remaining to the French in that colony; but here they had collected collected their whole strength, and here they intended making their last efforts: however, it was only to complete that difgrace, which their too ambitious views deserved. Against this place, therefore, to do the business at one stroke, if possible, the General resolved to direct all his strength, as soon as the season would permit, by sending an army against it by the Lake-Champlain; conducting another, himself, by Oswego, over the Lake-Ontario, and down the river St. Lawrence; whilst General Murray led a third, up the same river, from Quebec; the three to rendezvous before Montreal, and, jointly, form the attack of that place, or whatever troops might be assembled there for its defence.

Although the winter afforded case and repose to the generality of the British forces employed in North America, the garrison of Quebec had too troublesome neighbours to enjoy any long cessation from labour. The reduction of the city proved to them the commencement of a campaign as severe and as extraordinary as any they had yet served. Though the garrison consisted of the 15th, 28th, 35th, 43d, 47th, 48th, 58th, and 78th regiments, and the 2d and 3d battalions of the Royal Americans, with a detachment of artislery, amounting in the whole to between seven and eight thousand men, and the Admiral had left the Race horse of 20 guns, and the Porcupine of 18, commanded by the Captains Miller and Macartney, yet great numbers of the men being entirely disabled by an inveterate scurvy, the rest were extremely harassed with every kind of duty.

The Canadians having retired to their habitations, the French army was thereby greatly diminished. Nevertheless, it still continued much superior to that of the English, and had many other advantages over them. The French had endured but little fatigue compared with what the English had fuffered. They were also accustomed to the climate, and were befides warmly lodged. They had provisions in great abundance, the country being under their command; whilft, from the fingular fituation of the town, every movement of the English was open to them. Though the English were in Quebec, they were very far from being well provided with good, or indeed any quarters at first; the shells and shot thrown into it during the fiege having left very few houses that could afford them any shelter. Besides, the whole defence of the town confided of fix bastions with their courtines, forming a chain from St. Roch to Cape-Diamond; and even these bastions had neither banquette, nor embrasure, nor covered way, nor any other exterior work; and the cannon were fo much damaged by time as to be utterly useless.

The French had taken up their winter-quarters between Jacques-Quartier and Trois-Rivierres; their advanced posts lay at the Point-Aux-Trembles, St. Augustin, and Calvaire. Their patroles frequently advanced to within musket-shot of the English cattle guard; nay several detachments of them came up to the very gates of the town, by the assistance of their peafants, and even without the knowledge of their late conquerors.

The fecurity of the garrison engaged Governor Murray's first attention. He ordered eight timber redoubts to be erected without the works of the town, with ramparts, embrasures and banquettes, and seven platforms for cannon; and the road leading to the town to be broke up. He likewife caufed eleven months provision to be brought, by the foldiers, from the lower to the upper town; and five hundred houses to be repaired for the purpose of lodging the troops comfortably during the cold season.

The garrifon being fo far fecured, the Governor determined to extend his quarters, and take post at St. Foix and Lorette; the first about five, and the other nine miles from Quebec. Accordingly, about the middle of November, Major Huffey took possession of these posts with a considerable detachment; and, as foon as he had established himself, another of seven hundred men was ordered on the fame fervice to St. Augustine, where it carried off the advanced guard of the French. burnt about a dozen houses beyond it, and obliged the inhabitants to take the oaths of allegiance to his Britannic Majesty. This blow alarmed the natives; but they were foon quieted by a promife, that the damage should be repaid. However, the Governor, at the fame time, published a manifesto exhorting all the inhabitants to remain quiet, and firifly forbidding them, on the feverest penalties, to assist the enemy, but giving them, withal, the fullest affurances of his utmost prorection.

The establishing of posts at St. Foix and Lorette was of the utmost consequence, as thereby the motions of the English were concealed, and an opportunity secured of observing those of the French. The inhabitants of eleven parishes had now submitted themselves, and taken the oaths of allegiance to his Britannic Majesty; and were of great advantage to the army, by supplying it to the utmost of their ability with fresh provisions, during the whole winter.

Wood

Wood for firing now became an object of confideration. When the fleet left Quebec, there was fcarce enough remaining to fupply the garrifon for twenty days, and the winter advanced apace. No less than fixteen thousand cords was neceffary for the hospital and the guards in their quarters. A fmall quantity was cut on the island of Orleans; but the getting it to Quebec was attended with great risk and difficulty, the river being full of floating ice. For this reason, a few days after the post of St. Foix had been established, two hundred men were ordered into the woods of that name to make a fufficient number of hand-fleds for the foldiers to draw their wood upon; and, about the latter end of November, these sleds were distributed to those who were ordered on the wood-cutting fervice. By these a magazine was formed for every regiment, and then distributed, in equal proportion, to each company. The feverity of this duty was almost insupportable, as one fourth of the army was obliged to march ten miles every day while it lasted; and the frost so intense the whole time, that, in despite of every precaution, there scarcely passed a day that many of the men were not frost-bitten. The severity of this fervice, and the feducing arts of the priefls, caufed a defection in many of the foldiers; but the making an example of a Frenchman, who had inveigled an English foldier to defert, and of fome foldiers, whose intention of deferting had been discovered, put a slop to so criminal and dangerous a practice.

The feafon was now fo far advanced as to leave the French no room to doubt but that the English fleet had quitted the gulph. They therefore, in the night of the 24th of November, sent down eight or ten veffels loaded with peltry, in order to pass Ouebec; and although the English were apprifed of this defign, and the batteries of the town were prepared to prevent the execution of it, yet they all passed uninjured by the many fhot and shells that were discharged against them. One, indeed, by fome manœuvre in her working, ran ashore; and an unfortunate accident happened, in consequence of it, to Captain Miller of the Race-horfe, his lieutenant, and a number of his men, who, when the French abandoned their veffel, went and boarded her; but before the French quitted their ship, they laid a flow match, which communicated with the powder magazine; but this match being discovered and extinguished, no other danger was apprehended. Captain Miller, therefore, ordered a light to be struck, to enable them to examine the thip; but some of the sparks falling on a quantity of loose powder that had not been observed, blew up the vessel, and killed most of the party, wounding others in a most shocking manner. Captain Miller and his lieutenant died in a day or two afterwards.

The Governor, being affured that many of the merchants had gone to Montreal to purchase peltry; and that the silver they carried with them for that purpose was of no small benefit to the French army, their paper currency being in great discredit, and his own military chest scarce containing money enough for the expences of the garrison, he issued a manifesto prohibiting a commerce that was so prejudicial to the service of the King and his troops; and inviting all true patriots and friends to their country to bring in their cash, and receive notes from himself and Colonel Burton, payable in fix months, with interest at the rate of five per cent. In a few days after the publication of his manifesto, the military c' est was increased to eight thousand pounds sterling.

We have observed, that the inhabitants of eleven parishes had taken the oaths of fidelity to his Britannic Majefty. In order to add to the provisions with which they supplied Quebec, the Governor detached a party below the town, in order to give the inhabitants of that district every possible encouragement to bring theirs likewise to market. This measure was attended with the defired effect; and the affairs of the garrifon might now be faid to be in a good way; but that the fcurvy, which raged amongst the troops, increased from day to day, and carried off great numbers. The French were not ignorant of this circumstance. They therefore resolved to attack Quebec in the winter, formed a plan for that purpose, and loft no time in making every necessary preparation to carry it into execution. Snow-shoes were made, and distributed to their foldiers, who were withal exercised in mounting of walls with fealing-ladders. This attack they intended to make in the middle of February; but, notwithstanding all their precautions to conceal their defign, by cutting off all communication with Jaques-Cartier, which had hitherto been open to the Canadians, the English were apprifed of their intentions. The first step of the Governor, in consequence of this intelligence, was to order fix weeks provision to be distributed to each regiment, as there were many Canadians in the town ready to attempt the destruction of the magazines, if an opportunity fhould offer. It was likewise necessary that General Amherst should be made acquainted with the critical situation of the garrifon. The confideration of the great fatigue, dangers and difficulties with which the conveyance of fuch intelligence Nn2 intelligence must be attended, prevented the Governor from exerting his authority to force the commission on any one. But his wishes were no sooner known, than Lieutenant Montresor, an engineer, offered himself for the performance of this necessary duty; and having received the Governor's dispatches the latter end of January, he, in twenty-six days, delivered them to General Amherst, after enduring in his journey every distress that cold, hunger, and so long a march could be attended with.

M. de Levi still perfishing in his defign to attack the town, M. de Cadet the commissary collected a quantity of flour and cattle for the fubfillence of the troops to be employed in the enterprife; and a detachment was ordered to Point-Levi to cover it. Orders were likewise given to the inhabitants of the country to join the above detachment, and affemble for that purpose at the post of Calvaire. The French had been eight days at Point-Levi, when, on the 13th of February, Governor Murray ordered his light infantry, with two hundred men, and two pieces of cannon, to diflodge them; but, at the approach of these troops, the French retired with the greatest precipitation, leaving the principal part of their provisions behind them. The English, notwithstanding, took one officer and eleven foldiers prifoners, and then made a lodgment in the church of St. Joseph. All this while the French in Quebec had fuffered greatly for want of proper fubliflence; the Governor, therefore, ordered the provision taken on this occasion to be fold to them at a moderate price, and fome flour and cattle to be reflored to those to whom it belonged. This act of generofity was foon returned by the inhabitants of the adjacent country, bringing into the garrifon every kind of fresh provision they could poslibly spare.

On the 24th of February, the French affembled to retake the post of Point-Levi; but Governor Murray, being apprifed of their defign, ordered fome battalions with cannon to crofs the river on the ice, and cut off their retreat by the river Etchmin. The 15th regiment, with some light infantry, was to endeavour to get on their flanks, and in their rear. The French, feeing they were on the point of being furrounded, retired fo precipitately, that, notwithstanding all the endeavours of the English, they escaped with the loss of a few of their rear-guard, who were made prifoners. The conquerors. after this, erected fome redoubts, and felled a number of trees to fecure themselves from any sudden attack. The inhabitants about fix miles from Point-Levi, having, notwithflanding their oath of fidelity, joined with the French army. the Governor, juftly incenfed at this unprovoked breach of faith, on the 27th of February ordered a detachment to burn all their houses; but not without publishing a manifello to make known his reasons for having recourse to such meafures.

In consequence of these checks, M. de Levi postponed any farther attempts on Quebec till the spring, when he resolved to besiege that town in form: at least his preparations seemed to denote such a resolution. He collected a vast number of vessels and boats, cast a great quantity of bullets and shells, formed a magazine of fascines and gabions; and, in a word, did all that was necessary to carry on a vigorous siege. Governor Murray was not idle on his part. He strengthened his works, and prepared for an obstinate defence. Fascines and picquets he had already caused to be made during the winter, that they might be in readiness on any emergency, and be used, if not otherwise otherwise employed, in intrenching the heights of Abraham, as soon as the season would permit.

Every day now became more critical than the preceding: there being the greatest probability that the French army would come down as foon as the ice fhould break up. We have already intimated, that Governor Murray intended to intrench on the heights of Abraham; but it was yet imposlible, the earth being still too hard frozen for that purpose. This circumstance obliged him to order his light infantry to take post at Cape-Rouge, and there fortify themselves, in order both to prevent the enemy from debarking at that place, and be near enough to them to observe their motions. These works were scarcely begun, when the river became navigable. Accordingly, the French veffels came down, and anchored off St. Augustine, whilst their army proceeded by the rout of Lorette, to diflodge the troops at that post, and cut off those of St. Foix and Cape-Rouge. But Major Dalling, who commanded the light infantry at Cape-Rouge, having discovered that their advanced guard was within half a league of his poll, gave notice of it to the governor; and his intelligence was confirmed by a fericant belonging to the French artillery, who, being in a boat, was overfet by the violence of the wind, but had ferambled upon a cake of floating ice, and had been carried down on it by the tide, below Quebec, where he was taken up by a boat belonging to one of the Englith frigates.

The next day, being the 27th of April, the Governor, with part of his garrifon, marched out to cover the retreat of the troops posted at St. Foix and Cape-Rouge; and, notwithstanding the utmost efforts of the French to obstruct him, he lost but

Governor Murray now determined to take the field; and, if necessary, to hazard a battle. The French were indeed superior to him in numbers; but his troops had already beaten them; and he had a fine train of field-artillery, an article with which they were wholly unprovided. Had he shut himself up in his walls, he must have risked his whole stake on the single chance of defending a wretched fortification. Should the event of a battle prove unfortunate, he could ftill retreat into the town, hold out to the last extremity with the remainder of the garrison, and perhaps defend the place as long as if he had not given himself the chance of an engagement in the open field. Agreeable to this resolution, on the 28th of April, the Governor, with about three thousand men, and twenty field pieces, marched out of the city, taking with them fuch tools as were necessary to intrench on the heights of Abraham. His line was formed into three brigades; that on the right, confifted of the 15th and 48th regiments, and the fecond battalion of Royal Americans, commanded by Colonel Burton; and that on the left, of the 28th, 47th, and 78th, under Colonel Fraser; the 43d and the 58th composed the center, headed by Colonel James. The 35th, and the third battalion of the Royal Americans formed a fecond line. Major Dalling's light infantry covered the right flank; and fome volunteers and the rangers, the left; the field pieces were posted where most necessary, under the direction of Major Godwin; and Mr. Mackeller attended as chief Engineer. This little army being thus drawn up on the heights of Abraham, the Governor went to reconnoitre that of the French. We have already observed, that the French army lay in and near St. Foix. The night having been extremely wet, and the greatest part of the soldiers being uncovered, their arms had received the rain. Accordingly, when General Murray got near enough to make his observations, he found them irregularly employed in drawing their wet cartridges, and cleansing their firelocks. This confusion afforded an advantage of which the Governor determined to avail himself. He therefore immediately returned to his army, gave his orders for battle, and descended the heights.

The French beheld this movement with furprife, but an action was fill the farthest of any thing from their thoughts. M. de Levi could not believe the English General would abandon fuch advantageous ground to give him battle; but when he faw the English colours still advancing, he gave the word " To arms." The men hurried together; but, before they could be formed, two companies of their grenadiers, that had been advanced, by way of a covering party, as far as the entrance of the wood of Sillery, were attacked by the English light troops confifting of volunteers and rangers; and on their retiring, agreeable to their orders, the English, who took their retreat for a flight, britkly purfued them; but these soon received a check by a heavy fire from the French, who had by this time acquired some form. In short, they were entirely broken, and difperfed themselves along the front of the English right wing, by which means the cannon, that had hitherto played with fuccefs, was now rendered entirely ufelefs. Governor Murray, upon this, immediately fent them orders to form on the right of the army; but in attempting it, they fell into fuch confusion, that they precipitately retired to the rear, and never again returned to the charge. The right flank flank being now exposed, Major Morris was ordered, with Otway's regiment, to cover it from the attack of a column of the French troops, that had flipt along the escarpement of

St. Roche; and this movement of Major Morris had its defired effect, and reflored order on the right. All this while, the left fuffered greatly. As to the volunteers and the rangers, they were, as we have feen before, entirely defeated. The enemy took advantage of these circumstances, and advanced a column to attack the left; on which Governor Murray ordered the regiment of Kennedy from the center, and the third battalion of Royal Americans to Support it; but they arrived too late. The diforder was now general, and a retreat enfued.

Amherst's and Anstruther's supported each other with great firmness; and retreated in some order. The return of the other regiments refembled a flight more than a retreat, till they got under the cannon of the wooden redoubts. The field train which the Governor had brought with him, became the prize of the victors. In this affair, the English had three hundred killed on the field of battle, and about feven hun-

The French followed their blow by intrenching themselves, and making farther preparations to befiege the town, whilst Governor Murray employed himfelf in the erection of every work that could contribute to its defence. The lofs he fuffered on the 28th had reduced his army to two thousand two hundred effective men. Six hundred were in the hospital, mod of them upplie to walk without crutches. Yet, in this fituation, they gave their comrades all the affidance in their power; and that was far from being contemptible. Part, feated feated on the ramparts, filled fand-bags; others made cartridges for the cannon. The women exerted themselves likewise: They were indefatigable in taking care of the wounded, and drefling their meat for the foldiers, now too bufy to do it themselves. At length the alacrity of the troops had brought the affairs of the garrifon into a very respectable situation. there being no fewer then one hundred and thirty-two pieces of cannon mounted on the ramparts, the greatest part of them brought from the lower city by the labour of the foldiers; and fo fuccefsful was the continued fire of this numerous artillery, that the French were forced to defift from an attack they had begun against St. John's gate. After all, the only hopes of preferving the city centered in the arrival of Lord Colville, to whom Governor Murray had fent an officer with all potlible difpatch to inform him of his critical fituation. At length, on the 9th of May, the apprehensions of the garrifon began to fubfide, on the appearance of the Leostaffe frigate, commanded by Captain Deane; and brightened into hope on receiving by her the agreeable news of Commodore Swanton's being arrived from Old England, in order to intercept any affillance that France might attempt to give her army in Canada. On the 11th, the French opened three batteries of cannon, and one of mortars; but their fire was returned with great spirit till the 16th, when the happy hour arrived that fayed Quebec. On this day, the Vanguard, Commodore Swanton, came in fight, with the Diana. The next day, he paffed the town, and made a fignal for the two frigates to attack the veffels, that had brought down the French artillery, ammunition and flores. They accordingly entered upon this fervice with fo much celerity, that the enemy flipt their cables, and oles, and and made fail. But the frigates purfued them fo closely, and cannonaded them fo britkly, that the whole of them, fix in number, were foon a-ground in different places. Part of their crews, indeed, escaped on shore. The remainder were made prisoners; and, amongst them, M. Vauguelin, the commodore.

The arrival of Commodore Swanton was like a flroke of thunder to the French. They imagined that he had troops on board his men of war, and that he would land them at the Point-aux-Trembles, and endanger their retreat. They, therefore, raifed the fiege with a precipitation fearcely to be equalled. They abandoned their camp, thirty-fix pieces of cannon, fix mortars, all their ammunition and provisions, and all the tools and materials they had collected to carry on their approaches. Governor Murray ordered the grenadiers and light infantry to purfue the fugitives as far as Cape-Rouge, and they made some prisoners. Those who escaped, retired to the other side of Jacques-Cartier, to the quarters which they had formerly occupied.

It is impossible to express what the garrison suffered during the winter, from the inclemency of the weather, labour without intermission, and a most inveterate sourcy. Yet there were foldiers, whom even the want of pay during the whole of that rigorous season of near eight months continuance, could not tempt to deviate from the strictest observation of the most minute military duties. During this period, a thousand died of the source; and above two thousand had been alternately in the hospital, so that the whole labour fell on about four thousand men. Quebec being thus happily relieved, by the arrival of Commodore Swanton, General Murray proceeded to obey the orders he had received to join General Amherst, before Montreal.

Whilst the English were struggling to preserve a conquest of fo much confequence, in the manner we have related in the foregoing pages, the Cherokees, notwithstanding the treaty they had concluded with Governor Lyttelton, their having given up, as we have already feen, fome of the villains who had perpetrated the murders complained of, and even left two-andtwenty of their chiefs as hollages for the delivery of the remainder, relapted into their native barbarics and perfidiousnefs, if they had ever quitted it. Governor Lyttelton had fearce time to get home, when those miscreants began to ravage, as ufual, fuch of the back fettlements of the English as lay most convenient to them for that purpose. They first fell upon that called Long Canes, where they fpared neither plantations or buildings, men or cattle, women or children. They, in particular, murdered as many of the English traders as they found there. Not content with this first irruption, they soon after made a fecond, to the amount of about two hundred men. into the fame wretched country, and fpread themselves over that bordering on the forks of the Broad River, where they cut off about forty fettlers more. They likewife made an attack on Fort Ninety-fix; and, finding it too flrong for them, took the rout to Congarees, or Orange County, where, with fire and fword, they laid every thing waste before them. But the provinces to which these settlements belonged were far from beholding these excesses with their usual indifference, particularly that of South-Carolina. Governor Lyttelton, on the first news of this fresh infraction, immediately dispatched an express to General Amherst for instructions and a speedy reinforcement of troops; and, in the mean time, the Provincial Affembly, at his request, carnelly fet about getting ready a force sufficient to repel and chastife, with General Amherst's assistance, these cruel cruel and treacherous invaders, whenever the Governor's requifition should arrive for that purpose.

All this while, however, the Indians were following their blow. On the 18th of February, 1760, they affembled before Fort Prince George, in order, as it appeared, to furprise the garrison. With this view Ocunnasto, the great Warrior of Choté, coming within hearing, defired to fpeak to Lieutenant Coytmore, the commanding officer of the Fort, who thereupon went to the bank of the river to meet him, accompanied by Enfign Bell, Mr. Doharty, and an interpreter. The Warrior then informed Mr. Coytmore, that he intended to go down to the Governor on business of consequence, and defired a white man to accompany him as a fafeguard. His request being granted, he faid he would go and catch a horse for him. This was objected to; but the Warrior made a feint to perfift in this offer; and, whilft he was speaking, he swung a bridle, which he held carelessly in his hand, thrice over his head; when, inflantly, a volley was discharged at Mr. Coytmore and his company from an ambufcade, where fome Cherokees were placed, and to whom the flaking of the bridle was a fignal. Mr. Covtmore received a fhot through the left breaft, which proved mortal; Mr. Bell was wounded in the leg; and the interpreter in the buttock. Enfign Miln, who was left in the Fort, judging from this treachery that the garrifon was not fecure, should the hostages which the Fort contained be permitted to continue any longer under no reflraint but that of mere confinement to a room, ordered the foldiers to put them in irons. These orders they immediately set about executing; but the first who attempted to take hold of an Indian, was inflantly killed with a tomahawk; and another was wounded. This outrage great a round to make to the place where they joined, almost as the fame inflant of time, is truly aftonishing. Yet bold and daring, and almost desperate as the attempt may appear, it must at the same time be allowed, that it was the only plan of operations by which the Canadian war could be effectually terminated without another campaign.

General Amherst, immediately after the figning of the capitulation at Montreal, made the necessary preparations to take posdred rangers, another of the artillery, commanded by Lieutedelivered, and after a flay of only a few hours, to refresh himself and his men, returned to Presque-Isle. He then proceeded to the Streights that join the Lakes Erie and St. Claire; who commanded at Detroit, to acquaint him with the capitu343

Accordingly, on the 13th of September, Major Rogers embarked with a party of two hunnant Davis, and Lieutenant Brehem, aslistant engineer, to take possession of Detroit, and the posts established on the upper lakes. He was, befides, charged with the delivery of General Amherst's dispatches to Brigadier General Monekton, who commanded at Fort-Pitt. M. de Levi had now taken upon him the command of the fines of Virginia. And the garrison, being reduced to the utmost extremity for want of provisions, Captain Paul Demere, the commandant, summoned the officers to deliberate on their critical situation, when they came to the following resolution:

Fort Loudon, August 6, 1760.

"The officers being affembled by Captain Paul Demere, to concert proper measures to be pursued in the present distress of the garrison, it being represented, That our prov' ns are entirely exhausted: That we having subsisted upon horse-sless, and fuch fupply of hogs and beans, as the Indian women brought us by flealth, without any kind of bread, fince the 7th of July, by which means our men are greatly weakened. and must, in a short time, become incapable of doing duty: That the enemy blockade us night and day: That, for two nights past, considerable parties have deserted, and some even have already thrown themselves upon the mercy of the enemy: That the garrifon, in general, threaten to abandon us, and betake themselves to the woods: That we have no reason to hope for feafonable relief, having had no intelligence from any British settlement since the 4th day & June: We are. therefore, unanimously of opinion, that it is impracticable to maintain the fort any longer; and that fu 1 terms as can be procured from the Indians, confident with bonour, be immediately accepted of, and the fort abande led: That Captain Stuart go to Chotee to treat with the wa jiers and headmen, and to procure the best terms he can."

Signed by all the Officers.

A copy of this resolution was immediately sent to Colonel Byrd, at Williamsburgh in Virginia, to be forwarded to Governor Lyttelton, accompanied with the following letter:

Fort-Loudon, August 8, 1760.

"This goes by an express to acquaint you, that we have agreed upon articles of capitulation with the Great Warrior, and head-men of the nation; which, considering the great distress we are in, I hope you will approve of. Nothing but the inclination these Indians have for a peace could have saved us; for we should have been obliged to abandon the fort this day, happen what would; and few of us would ever have reached Carolina. To-morrow morning, we set out; and we slatter ourselves the Indians mean us no harm. We shall make all the dispatch that our starved condition will admit of.

"The Indians expect that, immediately upon our arrival at Keowee, the prisoners confined there will be released, all thoughts of farther hostilities laid aside, and an accommodation heartily set about; that a firm peace and well-regulated trade may be established, which, they say, will last for ever. We can discover nothing in their present behaviour, that contradicts this; and hope, at least, that nothing will be undertaken which may endanger us upon the march.

PAUL DEMERE."

Although the troops were in fuch distressful circumstances, and a capitulation with the Indians the only means of relieving them, they were too fanguine in their hopes of its being observed with fuch a degree of faith, as they might depend upon for protection. Accordingly, they too soon experienced that they were deceived. They had not marched above fifteen miles from the fort, when they were most treacherously surprised by a large body of Indians; and all the officers, except Captain Stuart, were killed, together with about twenty-sive of the the private men; the rest were made prisoners, and dispersed through the nation.

Captain Stuart was faved by the interpolition of Atta-kulla-kulla, the Little Carpenter, who parted with every thing he had for that purpole. Indeed, his attachment to the English was such, that his countrymen never informed him of their treacherous designs, less he should thwart or counteract them. He now lest the rest of the Indians on pretence of hunting; and conducted Captain Stuart safe to a party of Virginians on the Holston-River, who prevented Fort Ninety-six from sharing the same sate with Fort-Loudon; the Indians having thought proper to retire at the approach of this body.

Rogers, with a detachment of three hundred men, to enter Canada, that thereby the attention of the enemy might be drawn off, fo as to prolong the fiege of Quebec, till the men of war, expected to its relief, could get up the river St. Lawrence. As the most effectual method of executing this service, Major Rogers was ordered to fall down the Lake Champlain, under convoy of a brig; then, after laying up his boats, to proceed, by land, with two hundred and fifty men, on the west side of the Lake; get to St. John's, if possible, without the knowledge of the enemy; furprife the fort at that place, and destroy the vessels, boats, provisions; in a word, all the flores he might find laid up there for the use of the French troops at the Isle-Aux-Noix. From hence he was to proceed to Fort-Chamblé, on the fame bufinefs. In fhort, he was to deftroy every magazine he could meet with, and diffrefs the enemy every other way as much as possible, particularly by fending fifty rangers against Wigwam Martinique. But, as his arrival and operations must foon be known at the Isle-Aux-Noix, he had likewise directions to keep, in his return, on the east fide of that island, in order to prevent his retreat being cut off. In the mean time Lieutenant Grant was to continue cruizing in the brig, to be ready to receive the Major on

On the 4th of June, Major Rogers landed at the place he was ordered, and proceeded on his expedition by land; but, two days after, he was attacked by a party of about three hundred and fifty French, and had fixteen men killed, and ten wounded. Motte, where Lieutenant Grant was waiting for him in his brig. Here, being joined by the Stockbridge Indian company, he determined, at all events, to fet forward again and pursue his orders; first agreeing with Lieutenant Grant upon the place where the latter should cruize to receive him, and on fome fignals, by which he might know him at his arrival there. On the 9th of June the Major landed, about midnight, on the west shore opposite the Isle de la Motte, and from thence proceeded, as fast as possible, to St. John's; so that by the 15th, in the evening, he found himself but about two miles from the road that led to it from Montreal: the enemy, however, being too alert to be furprifed, he marched down the river fide to St. Therefe, where there was a flockaded fort, defenfible against small arms only. The French being carting hay, he feized the opportunity of a cart's being just entering the gate, and rushed into the fort before the carriage could be got clear enough of the gateway to let the gate be flut. The garrison, confisting of twenty-four foldiers, were made prisoners, with feventy or eighty inhabitants, women and children included. From the intelligence he gained here, the attack on Fort Chamblé appeared impracticable. This determined the Major to burn the village and the fort, and destroy every thing in them that could be useful to the enemy. The women and children he fent to Montreal, with proper passes to protect them from any fcouting party. He then continued his march on the east side of Lake Champlain; but, as he was palling by Missifuey-Bay, opposite to the Isle-Aux-Noix, his advanced party was attacked by an advanced detachment of the French, whose main body being about a mile in their rear, they thought proper to fall back upon it, whilft the Major feized the opportunity of purfuing unmolested his march with all possible expedition. On the 20th of June he arrived at that Qq2 part part of the banks of the lake, opposite to which Lieutenant Grant was to keep cruizing to receive him; and the lieutenant performed his duty on this occasion, so much like an officer, particularly by keeping a diligent look-out for the appointed signals, that the Major and his party were arrived but a few minutes before Lieutenant Grant had them on board, to the great mortification of a large body of French, who immediately after made their appearance. Lieutenant Holmes, who commanded the fifty rangers sent to Wigwam-Martinique, missed his way by going down a river which falls into the Sorel, instead of that called Wigwam-Martinique, which empties itself into the river St. Lawrence, at Lake Saint Francis.

The necessary preparations having been made to bring the whole power of the British forces in North-America, against Montreal, in order to finish by its reduction the war in that part of the world; and the feafon being fufficiently advanced to enable Sir Jeffery Amherst, the commander in chief, to commence his part of the operations, he embarked at New-York on the 3d of May, and proceeded to Schenectady. From thence, with part of his army, he purfued his rout to Ofwego, where he encamped on the 9th of July. The remainder he ordered to follow with the greatest diligence under the command of Brigadier Gage. On the 14th, two veffels hove in fight on Lake-Ontario, which proving to be those that had been fitted out at Niagara, under the command of Captain Loring, boats were immediately dispatched to him with orders to look out for, and attack the French veffels cruizing on the lake. On the 20th, two other veifels appeared, and proving to be the French veffels which had escaped Captain Loring's vigilance, a fmall boat was immediately difpatched to cruize

On the 22d, Brigadier Gage arrived with the rear of the army; as did Sir William Johnson, on the 23d, with a party of Indians. On the 24th, the General received intelligence, that the French vessels had escaped into the River St. Lawrence, and that Captain Loring was returning with the Onondaga of sixteen, and the Mohawk of eighteen six-pounders.

On the 5th of August, the General ordered the army, to be in readiness to embark. It now consisted of the following troops...

The first and second battalion of Royal Highlanders, forty-fourth regiment,,

fifty-fifth,

fourth battalion of the fixtieth,

Eight companies of the feventy-feventh,

Five of the eightieth,

Four battalions of the Connecticut regiment, and

One hundred and fixty-feven of the Royal Artillery;

amounting, in the whole, to ten thousand one hundred and forty-forty-two effective men, officers included. The Indians under Sir William Johnson were feven hundred and fix.

On the 7th, Captain Loring failed with his two veffels; and immediately after the first battalion of Royal Highlanders, the grenadiers of the army commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Massey, with Captain Campbell of the forty-second to assist him as major; the light infantry commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Amherst, with Captain Delancy, as major to assist him, with Ogden's and Whyte's companies of rangers; the whole under the command of Colonel Haldiman, embarked and failed to take post at the entrance of the River St. Lawrence.

On the 10th, the General himfelf embarked, with the Royal Artillery, the regulars, Sir William Johnson and part of his Indians, in boats and whale-boats; but, the wind being very high, and the water of the lake very rough, they were forced to make for a small creek, at whose entrance there is a very dangerous bar, on which one of the artillery boats was loft. The next day, the weather being a little more moderate, the General, at noon, proceeded for the river de la Motte; and, on the 12th, was joined by Brigadier Gage, with the provincials, in a bay, where the enemy had lately encamped. On the 13th, the whole embarked; and that very day encamped, with Colonel Haldiman, at the post which he had taken at the head of the River St. Lawrence. Captain Loring, with his two veffels, having miltaken the channel from the lake to the River St. Lawrence, the army paffed him, whilft he was endeavouring to extricate himself. On the 13th, the whole army gained Point de Barril, in the neighbourhood of the post called la-Gallette, which Brigadier Gage was ordered to destroy the preceding year. in which they built their veffels. The grenadiers and light infantry, with the row-gallies, took post that day, without halting, at Oswegatchie, a few miles below the Point de Barril.

All this while, one of the enemy's veffels kept hovering about the army; and, as Captain Loring had not yet got into the right channel, it became necessary, for the fafety of . the army, either to compel this veffel to retire, or to take her. The General was, therefore, obliged to order Colonel Williamfon, with the row-gallies well manned, to do one or the other. On the 17th, the gallies advanced with the utmost intrepidity, under a very heavy fire from the enemy; but it did not in the least damp the ardour of the affailants; their fire was returned with fuch resolution and bravery, that, after a severe contest of about four hours, the French vessel struck her colours. She mounted ten-twelve pounders; and had on board one hundred men, twelve of whom were killed or wounded. Two of Colonel Williamson's detachment were killed, and three wounded. The General immediately named the veffel the Williamson, in honour of the Colonel, and to perpetuate the memory of fo gallant an action. The fame day the army proceeded to Ofwegatchie, from whence it was necessary to reconnoitre Isle-Royal, so that it was noon the next day before the army could proceed.

Fort-Levi flood on this island, which was otherwise strongly fortisted. Though the reduction of Fort-Levi could be of little fervice, merely as a fort, yet it was, certainly, of too much consequence to be left in the rear of an army: besides, the number of pilots, perfectly acquainted with the intricate navigation of the River St. Lawrence, which the making of the garrison prisoners would afford, was alone a sufficient motive for attacking it. It was, therefore, invested that very evening. Whilst the English were passing the point, the French kept up a very smart cannonade on them, and destroyed one of the row-gallies, and a few boats, and killed two or three men; but notwithstanding this sire, and an uninterrupted continuance of it, the fort was so completely invested by the 20th, by the masterly disposition of the troops, as to make it impossible for the garrison to escape.

Captain Loring had arrived the day before with his two veffels, and the Williamson brig; and the batteries being now ready, the General, on the 23d, determined to affault the fort, that as little time as poslible might be wasted on it. He, therefore, ordered the veffels to fall down the stream, post themfelves as close to the fort as possible, and man their tops well. in order to fire upon the enemy, and prevent their making use of their guns; whilst the grenadiers rowed in with their broad fwords and tomahawks, fascines and scaling-ladders. under cover of three hundred of the light infantry, who were to fire into the embrafures. The grenadiers received their orders with a chearfulness that might be regarded as a fure omen of fuccess; and, with their usual alacrity, prepared for the attack, waiting in their shirts till the ships could take their proper stations. This the Williamson brig, commanded by Lieutenant Sinclair, and the Mohawk, by Lieutenant Phipps, foon did; and both fustained and returned a very heavy fire. But the Onondaga, in which was Captain Loring, by fome extraordinary blunder, ran a-ground. The enemy, discovering her distress, plied her with such unceasing showers of great and finall arms, that Captain Loring thought proper to strike his colours, and sent Thornton, his master, on flore ng.

shore to the enemy, who endeavoured to take possession of the veffel; but by Colonel Williamson's observing it, he turned upon them a battery, which obliged them to defift from the undertaking. The General then ordered Lieutenant Sinclair, from the Williamson brig, and Lieutenant Pennington, with two detachments of grenadiers under their command, to take possession of the Onondaga; and they obeyed their orders with fuch undaunted resolution, that the English colours were again hoisted on board her. But the vessel, after all, could not be got off; and was therefore abandoned about mid-The English batteries, however, put a stop to any future attempt of the enemy to board her. Captain Loring, being wounded, was in the mean time fent ashore. This accident of the Onondaga's running a-ground, obliged the General to defer for the present his plan of assault; but this delay proved rather a fortunate event, as it faved a good deal of blood, for on the 25th, M. Pouchot, the commandant, beat a parley, demanding what terms he might expect; to which no other answer was returned, than that the fort must be immediately delivered up, and the garrifon furrender prisoners of war; and but ten minutes were given for a reply. These terms were received within the ten minutes; and Lieutenant-Colonel Massey, with the grenadiers, immediately took possesfion of the place. The loss of the English before it, was twentyone men killed, and nineteen wounded. The first shot from the English battery killed the French officer of artillery. Eleven more were killed afterwards, and about forty wounded. The garrison, all to the pilots, for the sake of whom chiefly the place had been attacked, were fent to New-York; and the General named the fort, Fort-William-Augustus.

On the furrender of Fort-Levi, the Indians following the English army prepared, agreeable to their usual bloody custom when at war, to enter the fort in order to tomahawk and massacre the garrison. But General Amherst being apprised of their intentions, immediately fent orders to Sir William Johnson, to persuade them, if possible, to desit; declaring, at the fame time, that, if they offered to enter the fort, he would compel them to retire. The stores he promised should be delivered to them, as his army was not in want of what few blankets might be found there. This message had its defired effect. The Indians, though with great reluctance and apparent ill humour, were prevailed on to return to their camp. However, their resentment increased to such a degree, that Sir William Johnson informed the General, he was apprelienfive they would quit the army, and return to their respective villages and castles. The General replied, "That he believed his army fully fufficient for the fervice he was going upon, without their assistance; that, although he wished to preserve their friendship, he could not prevail on himself to purchase it at the expence of countenancing the horrid barbarities they wanted to perpetrate; and added, that, if they quitted the army. and on their return should commit any acts of cruelty, he would affuredly chastife them." Upon this, most of these creatures, who amounted to about feven hundred, abandoned Sir William Johnson, and retired to their respective villages and castles, but without committing the least violence. The faithful few, in number about one hundred and feventy, who continued with the army, were afterwards distinguished by medals. which the General gave them, that they might be known at the English posts, and receive the civil treatment their humanity, and their affection for the English, entitled them to.

If the French plan of policy had admitted of fimilar exertions of humanity towards their prisoners, there is no doubt but they might thereby have equally prevented the commiffion of acts, which, even had they conquered, would have been fufficient to fully the glory of their greatest atchievements.

Till the 30th, the army was employed in levelling the barteries, and repairing boats and rafts for the artillery, which was now embarked with the necessary stores; and, on the 31st, the General, with the first division of the army, consisting of the artillery, the grenadiers and light infantry, the 44th and 55th regiments, the 4th battalion of Royal Americans, and three regiments of provincials, embarked about noon; and, in the evening, reached the Isle-Aux-Chats, having passed the first rapids. On the 1st of September, they proceeded about ten miles farther, and encamped. On the 2d, Brigadier Gage, with the other division, joined the General, having lost three Highlanders in going over the Falls. The whole now proceeded together, entered Lake St. Francis, and that very evening reached Pointe-Aux-Boudets, where, the weather being extremely bad, the General halted. On the 3d, a prisoner was brought in, who gave intelligence, that Colonel Haviland had taken possession of the Isle-Aux-Noix, the enemy having abandoned it at his approach.

The navigation of the River St. Lawrence is, in this place, perhaps, the most intricate and dangerous of any actually used in North America, without the assistance of pilots accustomed to the force and direction of its various eddies. Though the French had been constantly going up and down this river ever fince their possession of Canada, General Amherst's attempt to navigate it in the manner he did, was judged impracticable. No doubt, the route by Lake-George and Lake-Champlain R r 2 might might have been the easiest to penetrate by into Canada: but this by the Mohawk-River, Oswego, and the River St. Lawrence, opened a passage, which had as yet been unexplored by the English, and essectually deprived the French of the opportunity of carrying on the war another campaign, by retreating to their unconquered posts at Detroit, and elsewhere to the fouth. Those who declared the river impracticable to the English, grounded their opinion on the unsuccessfulness of the attempt made on La Galette the preceding year by General Gage; not confidering the difference between a feeble irresolute effort, and a strong determined stroke. The pilots taken at Fort-Levi contributed much to the fafety of the army in this navigation; or, if it could have been equally fafe without their affistance, it would have been much more tedious. The chief art in getting through these rapids with a number of boats, confilts in the making them keep a proper distance. Without the greatest attention to this precaution, the lives of those who pass the Cedar-Falls especially, must be in the utmost danger.

It must be confessed, that the appearance of broken rocks and inaccessible islands, interspersed in the current of a rapid river, and the foaming surges rebounding from them, without a direct channel to discharge itself by, presents a scene of horror unknown in Europe; yet the mind, by degrees, soon loses the sensation of terror, and becomes free enough to direct the actions of the body.

On the 4th of September, the General put the army in motion, and it foon cleared the Lake St. Francis, and entered a country lately well inhabited, but now a mere defert. About noon the van of the army entered the Cedar-Falls. This, as we have already hinted, is by far the most dangerous part of the whole river, and had the boats crowded too close upon each other, most of them must have perished. Accordingly, for want of sufficient precaution, twenty-nine boats belonging to regiments, feventeen whale-boats, feventeen artillery-boats, and one row-galley, were dashed to pieces, with the loss of 88 men: and this too, before, on account of the night's approaching, the whole of the army could get through: what did, encamped on the Isle-Perrot. On the 5th, in the morning, the remainder, taking care to preferve a proper distance, passed the rapid with case. During the stay the General was obliged to make, to repair the damaged boats, the inhabitants came flocking in, and took the oaths of allegiance to his Britannic Majesty. Humanity and clemency ever attended on the victories of the Romans: the princes and people who submitted to their arms were fure of protection; and those who dared to oppose them, were made to feel the weight of their greatness and power. True policy might alone be thought fufficient, especially after fuch an illustrious example, to make the generals of every nation adopt fuch conciliating measures. It would have been justly matter of furprise, if, from the natural feelings of his own heart, independant of any other motive, General Amherst had neglected to stretch forth the hand of commiseration to the number of trembling, despairing wretches, who now appeared before him. The blood that had been shed in the wantonness of cruelty, had expunged from their breafts every hope of mercy; and they advanced like culprits approaching a judge to receive the fentence due to their crimes. Full as they were of conscious guilt, how great must have been their joy to find themselves forgiven, restored to their possessions and to their families; to be received

as friends, and have every necessary provided for them as such; and to crown all, to know, for certain, that they might securely depend on a continuance, or rather an increase of these blessings.

On the 6th, the army passed by the Cocknawaga Indians, who promised the General, that they would observe a strict neutrality: upon which he gave orders that they should not be molested. Soon after, the army, being arrived within a small way of the Falls of St. Lewis, disembarked at La Chine, on the Island of Montreal, about nine miles from the city; which the General immediately marched to, and that night invested; the French army having retired into it. The next day, the following letters passed between the two Generals, and ended in a capitulation, which was signed on the 8th of September 1760.

SIR, Montreal, Sept. 7th, 1760.

I repeat here the affurances of the defire I have to procure to your Excellency, and to the officers and troops under your command, all poffible convenience and protection; for which purpofe, I reckon that you will judge it proper that I should cause possession to be taken of the gates, and place guards immediately after the reciprocal signature of the capitulation: However, I shall leave this to your own convenience, since I propose it only with a view of maintaining good order, and to prevent, with the greater certainty, any thing being attempted against the good faith and the terms of capitulation; in order to which, I shall give the command of those troops to Colonel Haldimand, who, I am persuaded, will be agreeable to you. The capitulation agreed to in confequence of these letters was as follows:

Articles of Capitulation between his Excellency General Amberst, commander in chief of his Britannic Majesty's troops and forces in North-America, and his Excellency the Marquis de Vaudrenil, Grand-Croix of the royal and military order of St. Lewis, governor and lieutenant-general for the King in Canada.

ARTICLE I. Twenty-four hours after the figning of the prefent capitulation, the English General shall cause the troops of his Britannic Majesty to take possession of the gates of the town of Montreal; and the English garrison shall not come into the place till after the French troops shall have evacuated it.

Answer. The whole garrison of Montreal must lay down their arms, and shall not serve during the present war. Immediately after the signing of the present capitulation, the King's troops shall take possession of the gates, and shall post the guards necessary to preserve good order in the town.

(I. The troops, and the militia, who are in garrison in the town of Montreal, shall go out with all the honours of war, fix pieces of cannon and one mortar, which shall be put on board the vessel where the Marquis de Vaudreuil shall embark, with ten rounds for each piece. The same shall be granted to the garrison of Trois-Rivieres, as to the honours of war.

III. The troops and militia who are in garrison in the fort of Jacques-Cartier, and in the Island of St. Helen, and other forts, shall shall be treated in the same manner, and shall have the same honours; and these troops shall go to Montreal, or Trois-Rivieres, or Quebec, to be there embarked for the sirst sea-port in France, by the shortest way. The troops who are in our posts, situated on our frontiers, on the side of Acadia, at Detroit, Michilimakinac, and other posts, shall enjoy the same honours, and be treated in the same manner.

Answer. All these troops are not to serve during the present war, and shall likewise lay down their arms. The rest is granted.

IV. The militia after being come out of the above towns, forts, and posts, shall return to their homes, without being molested on any pretence whatever, on account of their having carried arms.

Answer. This is every thing that can be asked on this article.

VIII. The officers, foldiers, militia, feamen, and even the Indians, detained on account of their wounds or fickness, as well in the hospital as in private houses, shall enjoy the privileges of the cartel, and be treated accordingly.

Answer. The fick and wounded shall be treated the same as our own people.

IX. The English General shall engage to send back to their own homes the Indians and Morians, who make part of his armies, immediately after the signing of the present capitulation. And in the mean time, in order to prevent all disorders on the part of those who may not be gone away, the said General shall give safe-guards to such persons as shall desire them, as well in the town as in the country.

Answer. The first part refused. There never has been any cruelties committed by the Indians of our army; and good order shall be preserved.

X. His Britannic Majesty's General shall be answerable for all disorders on the part of his troops, and oblige them to pay the the damages they may do, as well in the towns as in the countries.

Aufwer. Answered by the preceding article.

XI. The English General shall not oblige the Marquis de Vaudreuil to leave the town of Montreal before the and no person shall be lodged in his house till he is gone. The Chevalier de Levi, commander of the land forces; the principal officers and majors of the land forces, and of the colony troops; the engineers, officers of the artillery, and commissary of war, shall also remain at Montreal to the said day, and shall keep their lodgings there. The same shall be observed with regard to M. Bigot, intendant, the commissaries of marine and writers, whom the said M. Bigot shall have occasion for; and no person shall be lodged at the intendant's house before he shall be gone.

Answer. The Marquis de Vaudreuil, and all these gentlemen, shall be masters of their houses, and shall embark when the King's ships shall be ready to fail for Europe; and all possible conveniencies shall be granted them.

XII. The most convenient vessel that can be found shall be appointed to carry the Marquis de Vaudreuil, by the shortest passage, to the first sea-port in France. The necessary accommodations shall be made for him, the Marquis de Vaudreuil, M. de Rigaud, Governor of Montreal, and the suite of this General. This vessel shall be properly victualled at the expence of his Britannic Majesty; and the Marquis de Vaudreuil shall take with him his papers, without their being examined, and his equipages, plate, baggage, and all those of his suite.

GRANTED;

GRANTED; except the archives, which shall be necessary for the government of the country.

XIII. If before, or after, the embarkation of the Marquis de Vaudreuil, news of peace should arrive, and that, by the treaty, Canada should remain to his Most Christian Majesty, the Marquis de Vaudreuil shall return to Quebec or Montreal, every thing shall return to its former slate under the dominion of his Most Christian Majesty, and the present capitulation shall become null and of no effect.

Answer. Whatever the King may have done on this subject, shall be o beyed.

XIV. Two ships shall be appointed to carry to France the Chevalier de Levi, the principal officers, and the staff of the land forces, the engineers, officers of artillery, and their fuite. These vessels shall likewise be victualled, and the necessary accommodations provided in them. The said officers shall take with them their papers, without being examined and also their equipages and baggage. Such of the said officers as shall be married, shall have liberty to take with them their wives and children, who shall also be victualled.

GRANTED; except that the Marquis de Vaudreuil, and all the officers of whatever rank they may be, shall faithfully deliver up to us all the charts and plans of the country.

XV. A vessel shall also be appointed for the passage of M. Bigot, the intendant, with his suite. In which vessel the proper accommodations shall be made for him, and the perfons he shall take with him: he shall likewise embark with him his papers, which shall not be examined, his equipages, plate,

VAUDREUIL.

Done in the Camp before Montreal, Sept. 8th, 1760. JEFF. AMHERST.

Thus have we feen all Canada furrender, by capitulation, to his Excellency General Amherst; yet, were it not that two other armies were in the neighbourhood of Montreal, it is most probable the French would have risked the fate of a battle, before they formally parted with their country. They faw it was impossible to defeat the measures the English General had taken to form a junction with the other armies, in which which case he would have been not only much superior to them in numbers, but better provided with ammunition and warlike flores, to carry on the business of a siege, in case they thut themselves up in Montreal. And this place was, besides, in too defenceless a state to sustain a regular attack, with any reasonable view of protracting the fall of Canada long enough to answer any good purpose. It was on these principles M. de Vaudreuil, no longer supported by the hopes of being able to preserve his government under the dominion of France, capitulated with the Commander in Chief of the British forces. But fince General Amherst's plan to reduce Canada comprehended, as we have faid, his being joined by an army from. Ouebec, and another by the Lake Champlain, we must therefore give an account of the progress of these armies to the neighbourhood of Montreal, where we just now mentioned. their being arrived.

The critical arrival of Commodore Swanton before Quebec, by relieving Governor Murray from the dangers with which he was furrounded, gave him an opportunity of purfuing fuch measures as were most likely to restore the troops of his garrison to their former health and vigour. In October 1759, the garrison of Quebec consisted of upwards of seven thousand three hundred effective men; but by the severity of the ensuing winter, and the incredible fatigues incident to a campaign in that season of the year, it was, by the month of June 1760, reduced to considerably less than six thousand. Out of these, besides, there could not be mustered more than two thousand sive hundred sit for duty. But the return of warm weather, and a good supply of milk and other summer refreshments, contributed so much to the speedy recovery of the rest, that Governor Murray now found himfelf in a fituation to comply with the orders of the Commander in Chief. and prepare to join him before Montreal, with a corps of two thousand four hundred and fifty effective men, officers included, besides leaving a sufficient number to do the garrison duty of Quebec, and contain the conquered, should they attempt any thing against it, during his absence. The troops he took with him, consisting of detachments from the regiments in garrison, were formed into seven battalions, and these into two brigades; the first of which was commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Burton, and the second by the Honourable Lieutenant Colonel Howe, as brigadiers. The whole commanded by himself in perfon.

On the 5th of June, this little army encamped near the town, whilft the fquadron that was to transport it, worked up and anchored near the encampment. On the 13th it embarked, and on the 14th failed with a fair wind. The fquadron was commanded by Captain Deane, and consisted of though the French fired very brifkly; and then anchored about a mile above Du-Platon. Upon this the French abandoned Jaques-Cartier, and proceeded to Dechambaud, in order to prevent the English putting any troops on shore at that place.

Dechamband is a point that firetches out into the River St. Lawrence, on the north-fide, and commands the pass at the Rapids of Richlieu. Here the French had creded a battery to flop the fleet, and likewise some redoubts and intrenchments, to prevent a debarkation: however, on the 16th, part of the fleet got through the Rapids, under a heavy fire from the battery, which proved ineffectual; but the wind flackening, the remainder could not follow. By this accident the army was divided, and lay twelve days, part above and part below the Rapids, for want of wind fufficient to enable the latter to flem the current. During this interval, Governor Murray made it a practice to land every day fome part of his troops, as well to refresh them, as to strike a terror into the inhabitants, whom he at the fame time informed by a manifesto, that fuch of them as did not deliver up their arms, and take the oaths of allegiance to his Britannic Majefly, should have their houses reduced to ashes. One of these parties, which landed on the fouth shore, surprifed a guard of the French commanded by M. Hartel, who was mortally wounded in this affair, and taken prifoner. M. Hartel had diftinguished himfelf as an excellent partizan during the whole war. On the 27th, the wind springing up in a direction favourable to that part of the fleet below the Rapids, it came up the river. If the fix French veffels, which were destroyed at the fiege of Quebee, had escaped and been stationed above the Rapids, it would have been impossible for the English to have passed them; and Governor and ernor Governor Murray would, of courfe, have been obliged to carry on his operations by land. This would have exposed his little army to a very difagreeable march, in which the French would have had many advantages over him, from the number of rivers and narrow passes, which distinguish this country from most others.

On the 8th of August the fleet passed Trois-Rivieres, where the French had thrown up many intrenchments, and on the 19th it anchored opposite to Sorel: here the French had likewise intrenched themselves, to prevent a junction of the troops under Governor Murray with those that might come from Lake-Champlain.

M. Damat, who had observed the fleet fince its departure from Quebec, with the pickets of the French army, the light cavalry, and a body of Canadians, making in the whole about three thousand men, abandoned every post, one after the other, immediately on the fleet's getting up beyond them; leaving at Jaques-Cartier but forty men, a fmall guard at Dechambaud, and only two hundred at Trois-Rivieres. A detachment of three hundred men had, indeed, been posted at St. François, with a view to prevent the communication between Governor Murray and Brigadier Haviland; but they now returned to Sorel, where M. Bourlemaque commanded a corps of about four thousand men, most of them regulars.

We left the fleet at anchor opposite to Sorel. General Amherst having ordered two regiments from the garrifon of Louisbourg, to cover the retreat of Governor Murray from Quebec, if it should become necessary for him to abandon that place; and the Governor having now received intelligence of their arrival there, 1760.

there, he fent for them, and dispatched some flat-bottomed boats to take them in, and thereby accelerate their joining him in his present station, where he resolved to wait their arrival.

M. de Levi had now taken upon him the command of the French troops that were employed to observe the English sleet; and M. Dumat was ordered to Berthier, a village on the north side of the River St. Lawrence opposite Sorel, with a view to prevent Governor Murray from making a descent on the island of St. Ignatius; notwithstanding which all the English troops landed on that island, in order that the transports might be thoroughly cleaned.

Governor Murray now dispatched a serjeant with twelve rangers to Colonel Haviland, to inform him of his strength; but he exaggerated it greatly in some letters, which the serjeant was to give up as all he was charged with, in case he fell into the hands of the French; the true state of things being confined to others concealed between the soals of his shoes. He also sent a Canadian on the same errand, but by a rout in which he was certain he could not escape; and in his dispatches by him, he declared his intentions to attack Montreal. The Canadian was taken, as the Governor intended; and, after being examined by the French commander, hanged up by his orders, as an enemy to his country.

On the 17th of August, Lord Rollo came up with the twenty-fecond and fortieth regiments; but the wind abating, he was obliged to drop anchor about a league from Trois-Rivieres. Here he received a verbal message from General Murray by Lieutenant Cocks of the navy, requesting his lordship to make all the dispatch he possibly could to join him.

Lord

Lord Rollo had with him Lieutenant Garnier of the navy, who had been fent by Lord Colville, with proper instructions from his lordship, to conduct the transports up the River St. Lawrence. Opposite to Trois-Rivieres, the river is divided into two channels; the one, immediately under the cannon of that place; and the other, out of their reach. General Murray chofe to take his paffage by the latter, notwithstanding his fhips of war and the artillery, with which the rest of his fleet was provided; and Lieutenant Garnier intended to use it likewife for Lord Rollo's transports. But just as he had made the necessary preparations for that purpose, by disposing his boats on the fhoals and fands, the better to fliew the deep water to the other veffels, Lieutenant Cock came on board Lord Rollo; and being an older officer than Mr. Garnier, infifted on taking upon him the command of the fleet, though, as we have faid before, Mr. Garnier had been fent by Lord Colville with Lord Rollo, for that express purpose.

Lord Rollo did not think proper to make any opposition to Mr. Cock's pretensions. He put the transports under his direction, contenting himself with faying, "That Mr. Cock must abide by the consequences." Mr. Garnier, whose instructions, as we have already faid, were to go by the channel farthest from Trois-Rivieres, told Lord Rollo he would engage to conduct him in fasety, if he chose to follow him; that he did not however mean to dictate to his lordship, but on the other hand, could not help owning, that he was apprehensive some fatal consequences must attend the attempting the channel under the cannon of the place, especially as his lordship had none in his fleet to bring against them. But, notwithstanding all these declarations, Mr. Cock still persisted in his resolution to carry the transports through that very channel; and Lord Rollo getting into the headmost ship along with Mr. Cock, gave orders for the flect to follow them. A favourable wind now fpringing up, the veffels got under way to attempt the paffage. Lord Rollo having, during the time he lay at anchor, fent feveral parties on fhore to difarm the peafants, and oblige them to take the oaths of allegiance, his name by that means became perfectly well known to the Canadians, and they had fense enough to make the proper use of it. As his vessels. were flemming the current of the river, that which carried his lordship was hailed, and asked in English, If Lord Rollo was on board? As the asking of this question was not suspected to proceed from any hostile design, it was answered in the affirmative. Nothing more, however, paffed at that time; but when the veffel had got a little higher she was again hailed, and the fame question repeated in French, and the fame answer given. By this time, the ship had advanced to within three hundred yards of Trois-Rivieres, when she received a fudden falute of grape-shot from the courtin of a bastion. However, his lordship having taken the precaution to fend the foldiers between the decks, none of them received any hurt. When the other transports faw Lord Rollo thus fired on, they tacked about, fell down with the stream, and were prefently out of the reach of the cannon. But Mr. Cock obstinately persisted in his attempt to get up the river by the channel he was in, in spite of a brisk fire, not only from the before-mentioned bastion, but from two pieces of cannon placed on an eminence above the town. From the glaring abfurdity of daring danger in fuch a manner, it may feem very extraordinary, m, and lr. Cock by the om the cannon ring abm very rdinary, extraordinary, that Lord Rollo did not interpose his authority, and take the navigation, which General Murray had before experienced to be the fafe one. To fuffer a verbal message to fuperfede a person, who was expressly ordered by Lord Colville to conduct the transports to General Murray, is not to be accounted for. There is no danger that British resolution will not chearfully encounter, when it has for its object an apparent advantage: but wantonly to expose the lives of men to felf-opinion and obstinacy, must esfectually destroy the very idea of glory. What recompence can be made to a carpenter who loft his arm, to Captain Malcolm, then an enfign in the twenty-fecond regiment, who loft his leg, in this very extraordinary inflance of weakness on the part of Lord Rollo, and of obstinacy in that of Mr. Cock, not to mention a poor lad who loft his leg likewife; but whom the humanity of General Murray has fince provided for, by apprenticing him to a trade, by which he may earn a comfortable living. Difobedience to orders is fearcely ever to be warranted; but, on this occasion, General Murray thought it so commendable, that he thanked Major Saintlo for quitting Lord Rollo, and following Lieutenant Garnier, who conducted the major's and the other transports safe through the channel he had proposed for the whole fleet.

M. de Levi and M. Bourlemaque now quitted their pest, and came opposite to the fleet; upon which General Murray ordered part of it, and the troops on board, to fall down the river opposite to Sorel, where they had been before; as the inhabitants had taken up arms, and burnt and deflroyed all the houses they could. This they accordingly did on the 21st of August, in the face of the troops that M. Bourlemaque had left to protect them. X x 2

The Canadians using they could hope for no fecurity against the arms of the English, and finding themselves anacked where they imagined themselves safest, became dispirited to such a degree, that they deserted in crowds, and delivered up their arms to General Murray.

On the 27th of August, all the fleet made fail, and anchored in the evening between the Isle-Therese and the church of Varannes. The General took post on the island, with the light infantry, intending to remain there, till he should receive farther intelligence from General Amherst. In the mean time, as he was but about three leagues and a half from Montreal, he ordered his vessels to proceed, till they were just without cannon-shot of that place.

General Murray, having in view the opening of a communication with General Amherst and Colonel Haviland, ordered a detachment to dislodge the enemy at Varannes; and as foon as this fervice was performed, landed the rest of his army, and encamped on the Island of St. Therese.

On the 7th of September, Governor Murray ordered his troops to reimbark; and foon after landed them without opposition at the lower end of the parish of Point-au-Tremble on the Island of Mentreal. On the 8th, he marched to the north-east side of the city, where he immediately encamped.

The troops ordered to join General Amherst before Montreal, by the way of Lake-Champlain, and under the command of Colonel Haviland, were assembled at Crown-Point, with every thing necessary to facilitate the expedition. They consided of Four

On the 11th of August, they embarked in

On the 16th, they encamped on the left bank of the river Richlieu, a little above the Island-Aux-Noix, where the Colonel crected three batteries of cannon, and one of mortars, which began to play on the French fort there the 24th of August. In the night of the 27th, M. de Bougainville retired from this island, leaving behind him a garrison of thirty men, who were made prisoners.

Colonel Haviland, having thus made himself master of the Island-Aux-Noix, as well as the fort of St. John, advanced to St. Therefe, where he encamped; and then dispatched an officer to General Amherst, and another to General Murray, to acquaint them of his arrival, and the operations which had preceded it.

M. de-

M. de Bourlemaque having abandoned Bouquerville and Longuille, and retired to the Island of Montreal, General Murray detached Colonel Burton, with the grenadiers and light infantry, to join Colonel Haviland; or to act otherwise, as circumstances should require: and, having received a letter by an officer from Colonel Haviland, he fent the same officer, with Lieutenant Montresor, to General Amherst, to inform him of his situation. This officer found General Amherst on the Isle-Aux-Perrots.

The three armies being now within a small march of Montreal, and able to form a junction without any difficulty, they were put in motion on the 7th of September. That of General Amherst approached to within two miles of Montreal; that of Colonel Haviland quitted the post on the Island of St. Therese; and, as well as that of Genera! Murray, directed its march to the same object.

As foon as General Amherst came within sight of this place, the French, as we have seen, demanded and obtained a cessation of arms; but General Murray happening to be ignorant of what passed, on account of his being on the other side of Montreal, proceeded to within one mile of the town. Upon this M. de Levi sent an officer to inform General Murray of the cessation of arms; but he could not be brought to believe it, till he had the news consirmed by one of his own officers, whom he sent for that purpose, to General Amherst. He then conformed himself to the will of his superior in command.

We cannot difmifs the fubject without observing, that the arrival of three armies, which had so many obstacles to encounter from the enemy, and the principal of which had so great

t the co enand fo great great a round to make to the place where they joined, almost at the same instant of time, is truly astonishing. Yet bold and daring, and almost desperate as the attempt may appear, it must at the same time be allowed, that it was the only plan of operations by which the Canadian war could be effectually terminated without another campaign.

General Amherst, immediately after the signing of the capitulation at Montreal, made the necessary preparations to take posfession of all the places which the French still held in Canada, as equally included in that act. Accordingly, on the 13th of September, Major Rogers embarked with a party of two hundred rangers, another of the artillery, commanded by Lieutenant Davis, and Lieutenant Brehem, aflistant engineer, to take possession of Detroit, and the posts established on the upper lakes. He was, befides, charged with the delivery of General Amherst's dispatches to Brigadier General Monckton, who commanded at Fort-Pitt. These dispatches Major Rogers soon delivered, and after a flay of only a few hours, to refresh himself and his men, returned to Presque-Isle. He then proceeded to the Streights that join the Lakes Erie and St. Claire; and from thence dispatched Lieutenant Brehem to M. Beletre, who commanded at Detroit, to acquaint him with the capitulation; and that he had a letter for him from M. de Vaudreuil, with instructions for his conduct on the occasion. Major Rogers, foon after, took possession of the fort in the name of his Britannic Majesty, and hoisted upon it the British colours. M. Beletre and the garrifon were ordered to Philadelphia, there to embark for Old France.

The feafon was now fo far advanced, that the fnow and ice rendered it impracticable to proceed to Michilimakinack;

the Major, therefore, left the troops at Detroit, and returned himfelf to Philadelphia.

The capitulation of Montreal gave to Great Britain the full possession of Canada.

England and France never contended for a greater prize, except when to attain the crown of either kingdom was the object of their armaments.

France very juftly valued her colonies, and that at a high rate, as they were a fource from which she might derive a prodigious quantity of fubfiftence and a powerful marine; the natural confequence of extensive commerce, and an unlimited fifhery, in the management of which, the French, perhaps, have not their equal. The certain profpect of gain would naturally induce people of almost every denomination to embark in this trade; and from this trade, as from its proper nurfery, would arife a number of hardy failors, the fure means of increasing their navy to an equality with that of Great Britain. If this should ever happen, it requires not the fpirit of prophecy to foretel what must be the confequence.

To form an estimate of the just value of this conquest, we must not alone consider what Great Britain has gained by it. What the French might have acquired from equal fuccess, ought to have the greatest weight in the calculation. Had victory inclined to their fide, the Continent, of which the English now enjoy the dominion, would, at this time, be obedient to their laws; and this would firengthen them to fuch a degree, as to enable them to feize on the British islands in the West Indies. If, in a war which has terminated fo honourably to this nation, foldiers merit reward for patiently enduring every species of distress, and encountering every danger with the most ready obedience, Britain never had an army whose claim to her favour and protection was so just as that which served in America; and though she had been mortified with repeated accounts of disgraceful checks, her general officers, and not her soldiers, were the cause of them.

It must be confessed, that it was a difficult task to surmount the numerous obstacles which obstructed the business of every campaign; but when Britain had a minister who could distinguish abilities, these difficulties in some degree vanished. Firmness in the commander in chief surmounted every opposition, and the views of General Amherst being confined to the acquiring of honour to his master's arms, and the putting a speedy period to the expence and horrors of war, they were happily crowned with that success, which such patriotic and disinterested views, joined to the most irreproachable conduct, gave every British subject the best grounded reasons to expect.

low the brave and indefatigable actors to others fituated under the feorching rays of a vertical fun, where they are to encounter, not only the French, but a climate extremely inaufpicious, or rather fatal, to European conflictations. However inured to every danger and diffress that could await a foldier in a temperate zone; the prospect of those peculiar to the torrid, could not but appear sufficiently terrible: yet the hope of victory swallowed up every other confideration, and steeled them equally against the sury of the enemy and the horror of the weather.

It must be owned, indeed, that the complete reduction of the power of France on the Continent of North America, had given them fome fhort respite. But the favages in the interest of the French still continued their cruelties, where they could exercife them with impunity. The Cherokees, in particular, and other nations in alliance with them, yet held up the axe of war. To chaftife this their unprovoked and barbarous violation of the most folemn treaties, Lieutenant Colonel Grant was ordered against the Cherokees; but they soon agreed to a peace. This was the only warlike expedition which diffinguished the year 1761 in North America. But General Amherft, with the greatest ardour, carried on his preparations to embark the partners of his former conquests, to reap fresh laurels in the West Indies. In the mean time, Great Britain took every opportunity to tellify her grateful approbation of their past services. The courage, patience, and perfeverance of the foldiers, directed by General Amherst, had fubdued all the enemies of Great Britain on the Continent; and her then ever gracious Monarch, still living in the hearts of his fubjects, thought proper to reward his merit Y v 2 with with the banners of chivalry, by creating him a Knight of the Bath.

The difgrace brought on the English arms, by the faint and ill-conducted attempt against Martinico in the year 1759, induced the minister to fend another armament against that island. Accordingly, about the month of August 1761, the greatest preparations were begun to be made for the execution of it.

The troops, deflined for this expedition, were to be affembled at Barbadoes, from the lately conquered ifland of Belle-Ifle, and from North America, as we have already intimated. Sir Jeffrey Amherst gave the command of them to Major General Monckton.

The fleet was to be formed of some ships from the same places, and such as were already in the West-Indian seas, to be commanded by Admiral Rodney.

On the 1cth of October 1761, the Admiral failed from Spithead in the Marlborough of fixty-eight guns, accompanied by the Vanguard of feventy, the Modeste of fixty-four, the Nottingham of fixty, and the Grenada, Thunder, and Basilisk bombs. On the 11th, he was joined off Plymouth by the Foudroyant of eighty guns, and stood immediately for sea. The Dragon of seventy-four followed him. In a few days after these ships had cleared the channel, they were separated by a violent gale of wind: the Admiral, however, proceeded on his voyage, and was the first to reach Carlisse Bay, off Barbadoes, where he arrived the 22d of November; the Foudroyant, Modeste, and Basilisk came in five days after; and, on the first of December, the Nottingham and Thunder; the Vanguard, with the rest of the fleet, joined them on the 9th.

Commodore Sir James Douglas was there already, with four fhips of the line, waiting for General Monckton with the troops from North-America. The Admiral, therefore, immediately on his arrival, difpatched Sir James off Martinico, with orders to block up the harbours of that ifland, and prevent the throwing of any fuccours into its ports; and, as foon as any fhips joined him from England, North-America, or elfewhere, he fent them to Sir James Douglas on the fame errand.

The Admiral likewise hired ten small sloops, and having officered and manned them from the fleet, stationed them in such a manner, as to prevent any vessel from St. Eustatia stealing with provisions into the smaller ports. These sloops being constructed for the purpose of running into very shoal water, kept perpetually visiting every little harbour; and thereby effectually completed the blockade. Expresses were likewise dispatched to the dissert governors of the English Leeward Islands, acquainting them with the arrival of the armament; and requesting from them every assistance in their power to promote the success of it.

In purfuance of this intelligence and requifition, the government of Barbadoes laid an embargo on all the flipping, to prevent the enemy's receiving intelligence of its real deftination, and raifed five hundred white and fix hundred black men, to reinforce it. The other iflands appeared lukewarm; and very little addition was received from them.

Necessary as it was to keep the enemy in the dark with regard to the intentions and motions of this armament, it was equally necessary to be well informed of theirs: Yet this important business seems, through some fatality or other, to have been strangely neglected; for no accounts had been procured of the enemy's fituation, full and authentic enough to enable the Admiral to begin his operations as soon as he might otherwise have done. To remedy this neglect, he offered the greatest encouragement to such seamen as were sufficiently qualified to serve as pilots; and also to those who knew any thing of the interior parts of the Island of Martinico. Vessels were likewise employed to sound the coasts, and an engineer to make a survey of them; and, by these means, a foundation was at length laid, on which the Admiral and General might form something of a plan for their subsequent conduct.

But flill, the uncertainty of the anchorage on the coast of Martinico, and the conflant rapidity of the current in confequence of the winds in those latitudes blowing perpetually from the fame quarter, rendered it impossible to prevent so large an armament's falling to leeward; and the pilots having reprefented this infurmountable difficulty, together with the impracticability of working up to windward, the Admiral determined to begin his operations by taking possession of the weathermost port of the Island of Martinico, from whence he could eafily fall on any other place wherever the General and himself might think proper to attack. In the mean time, it having been reported, that the troops from North-America were to rendezvous at Guadaloupe, the Admiral fent frigates to windward to cruize for them, with politive orders to the commanding officer of the convoy to join him in Carlifle Bay, in order to prevent their falling to leeward.

On the 14th of December, the Temeraire of feventy-four guns, and the Acteon of twenty-eight, came to an anchor in Carlifle Bay, with a number of transports, having on board General Rufane, with two thousand two hundred effective men from Belle-Isle. The fleet from North-America, with General Monekton and seven thousand soldiers, arrived on the 24th.

It having been determined to take possession of the neutral Island of Dominica, a detachment was ordered for that purpose, commanded by Lord Rollo, escorted by a squadron of four ships of the line, commanded by Sir James Douglas. In the beginning of June, this armament failed from Gaudaloupe to Dominica, the inhabitants of which surrendered, on the promise of protection till the pleasure of the King of England should be known. Part of the above detachment likewise now arrived from Dominica, under the command of Lord Rollo, which completed the armament.

A few days, however, were flill necessary to water the ships last arrived, and refresh the men they brought, and make such farther dispositions for the execution of the intended enterprize, as could not be sinished till all the forces to be employed in it were affembled.

At length, on the 7th of January 1762, the whole fleet, confifling of fixteen fail of the line, thirteen frigates, three bombs with their tenders, a number of transports, and some hospital ships, failed from Barbadoes in the following order:

As the fleet drew near to Martinico, the Admiral detached five fail of the line, with his flag flying, to lie before Fort-Royal, and as many frigates off La Trinité, on the opposite side of the island, with an intention to divide the enemy's force. On the 8th of January, the rest of the sleet and the army arrived off Martinico; and Sir James Douglas, with the ships under his command, was ordered to destroy the batteries in St. Ann's Bay; the finest and weathermost harbour of the island. This service he soon essected, and took possession of the place, though not without some loss. The Raisonable, through the ignorance of her pilot, though esteemed the best acquainted with that island of any pilot in the West-Indies, was run on a reef of rocks, and lost.

It being now represented to the Admiral and General, that. fince the last attempt on this island, the enemy had so fortified the coast from Point-Negro to Pas-Protte, that it was impossible to land an army any where between them; there arose a doubt, in confequence of the alteration in the circumstances of the island, if it would not be better to land the troops at Port-St.-Lucre in the Bay of St. Ann, and march them over the ifthmus to Groffe-Pointe, which, with Pigeon-Island, commanded the fouth fide of the bay opposite to Fort-Royal; as. thefe forts once reduced, the ships of war and transports could anchor in the Bay of Fort-Royal, and the attack against the citadel be carried on from the east side of the Bay. But the difficulties with which the transporting of provisions to the proposed scene of action could not but be attended, and the want of fresh water on that part of the island, obliged the Admiral and General to abandon this defign. They refolved, however, to attempt Pigeon-Island: For this purpose, Commodore Swanton, with fome ships, and the Brigadiers Haviland and Grant with their brigades, and the light infantry under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Scott, were ordered to Ance-Darlet, there to land; and from thence march to the heights opposite to, and commanding Pigeon-Island.

On the 10th of January, the Dragon, commanded by the Honourable Captain Hervey, was ordered into the Grand-Ance, where, in the finall space of an hour, he destroyed a very strong fort. He then landed with his marines, and took possession of the battery, which, in about two hours, he delivered up to Lieutenant-Colonel Melville, who had been detached by Brigadier Haviland with eight hundred men to possess what remained of the fort, in order to secure a retreat, should it be found necessary to make one.

On the 12th, Lieutenant Brown arrived with an express from Brigadier Haviland to General Monckton, informing him, that he was then polled near Pigeon-Island, within the range of the enemy's shells; but finding the road impassable for the cannon necessary for the reduction of that island, he judged it best to retire; and therefore should embark the brigades at the Ance-Darlet, and there wait with Commodore Swanton for farther orders. The light infantry, while on shore, were attacked, in one of their excursions, by three companies of grenadiers, some free-booters, negroes, and mulattoes, which had passed over from Fort-Royal; but they were so warmly received, that they retreated precipitately, leaving some dead, besides a serjeant and three of their grenadiers prisoners.

The Admiral and the General now determined to make a trial on the fouth-fide of the ifland, between Point-Negro and Casde Pilotte. They therefore proceeded, with their whole force, to Ance-Darlet, and from thence reconnoitred the coast. In the mean time, various other movements were made to alarm and fatigue the enemy; and this had the desired effect. The continual marches and counter-marches they were obliged to make to oppose a landing, wore them down so much as to render them, in some degree, greater objects of pity than terror.

A place which had the least appearance of being able to make any great opposition being at length fixed on to difembark the troops at, and from thence commence the operations against Fort-Royal, every necessary disposition was made for that purpose. In the night of the 15th of January, the grenadiers were distributed on board some ships of the line.

The

The more effectually to expedite their landing, and to cover it, nine other ships of the line were ordered to silence the different batteries on the coast. In the morning of the 16th, the ships got under way for the attack, and the slat-bottomed boats were all ready to take the troops ashore. About noon, the forts were almost all silenced; and, by six in the evening, near feven thousand men landed. Next morning, a little after daylight, the whole army was disembarked, at a small creek called Cas-des-Navires, with two battalions of marines, without the loss of a single man; and this at a place which the enemy deemed utterly impracticable.

This fuccessful disembarkation was conducted by Captain Shuldham on the right, Commodore Swanton in the center, and Captain Harvey on the left, whilft the subaltern officers and seamen received their orders with the most spirited chearfulness. The army, on landing, was supplied with such necessaries as it was most immediately in want of; and all the ships and transports anchored, as much in safety as the coast would allow.

This landing was greatly facilitated by the judicious difpofition of the ships, and the deliberate direction of their fire, which soon obliged the enemy to abandon the batteries they had crected to defend the inlet chosen for this purpose. Many difficulties, however, were still to be overcome. The regular troops of the enemy were not, indeed, very formidable; but the militia and mulattoes were numerous, well armed, and well skilled in the only kind of war which could be carried on in a country like this, though covered with hills, and broken by gullies, and every height intrenched, which could thereby be made to retard the progress of an army. This was particularly particularly the case with regard to the environs of Fort-Royal. Mount-Garnier, and Mount-Tortonson, two very considerable eminences, which commanded and covered the citadel; so that, while these hills were possessed by the enemy, no approaches could be carried on against it; and though there could, and even if taken, it could not be kept. This the French knew full well; and they, accordingly, did every thing that was necessary to improve nature by art, in a manner suitable to the importance of the stake.

The hills we have been speaking of were surrounded by deep gullies, and these gullies, however disticult in themselves to pass, they improved by such contrivances, as might make any other than British troops deem them impregnable. The General, by this time, encamped on the heights above Cas-de-Navires, was therefore obliged to commence his operations by erecting batteries, as well for his own fecurity as to facilitate. his approaches against Mount-Tortonson and Mount-Garnier; and, at the fame time, made the proper dispositions to carrythem by a coup de main. Accordingly, on the 24th of January, at break of day, the troops ordered for this fervice advanced to the attack. Brigadier Grant, with the grenadiers, supported by Lord Rollo's brigade, began it on the out-posts, under a brifk fire from the English batteries: Brigadier Rufane marched along the fhore on the right, to fecure the redoubts, which were erected on the coasts; whilst a thousand fermen in flatbottomed boats rowed up as he advanced: the and c-infantry, under the command of Colonel Scott, supported by Brigadier-Walsh's brigade, marched on the left, to gain a plantation, by which they might get round the enemy. The attempt fucceeded in every quarter; and the enemy's works were, fucceffively, carried with an irrefiftible impetuofity; fo that by nine o'clock, o'clock, the English troops were in full and quiet possession of the strong posts and redoubts on Mount-Tortonson, though defended by a numerous artillery. Some of the enemy fled precipitately into the town, whilft others feized on Mount-Carnier, which, being much higher than Mount-Tortonfon, overlooked and commanded it. Brigadier Haviland, with his brigade, two battalions of Highlanders, and a corps of lightinfantry, commanded by Major Leland, had received orders to crofs the gulley to the left of Brigadier Walfh, attack a body of the enemy posted on the opposite heights, and endeavour to get on their left. By this movement, it was intended to divide the force of the enemy; but the extreme difficulty of access, from the number of dangerous passes they had to surmount, made it late before any confiderable progress could be made in the execution of thefe orders, though the troops had begun their march by two in the morning.

The French having thus given way almost on every side, Colonel Scott's light-infantry, with Brigadier Walsh's brigade, and a detachment of grenadiers, were ordered to a plantation more to the left; upon which Brigadier Haviland was to have come down from Mount-Tortonson, if he had carried it: They drove off the enemy who were posted there, and possessed themselves of a very advantageous situation upon it, opposite Mount-Garnier: They were supported by Haviland's brigade after it had crossed the gulley: The grenadiers under the command of Brigadier Grant, and Walsh's brigade, kept possession of this last plantation, which was higher than the first, and communicated with Haviland's brigade, while the marines were posted so as to cover the road between the two plantations.

On the 25th, batteries were ordered to be erected, with the greatest diligence, against Fort-Royal; but the General finding, that that it was first absolutely necessary to be master of Mount-Garnier, he gave orders for the erection of batteries, as well to check those of the enemy on that post, which greatly annoyed his troops, as to facilitate his passage over the gulley. During these preparations, on the 27th, about four in the asternoon, the enemy's whole force descended from Mount-Garnier, favoured by a fally out of the town. Both made a surious attack on the posts occupied by the light-infantry and Brigadier Haviland's brigade; but they were received with the greatest steadiness, and immediately repulsed; and the ardour of the British troops hurrying them forward, they passed the gulley between Mount-Tortonson and Mount Garnier, with the runaways.

Night was now come on; but, notwithstanding, Major Leland moved on to the left with his light-infantry, and meeting no opposition, continued his rout towards the enemy's redoubt, which he soon came up to, and took possession of; the enemy, except a few grenadiers who were made prisoners, having abandoned it. Their regulars retired into the citadel, whilst the militia took to the country, and dispersed.

Brigadiers Walfh, Grant, and Haviland now advanced to fupport the light-infantry; and by nine at night, the troops were in possession of Mount-Garnier, which entirely commanded the citadel. So precipitate was the enemy's slight, that they left a mortar loaded, and eight or nine guns unspiked, with a quantity of ammunition and provisions. The next morning, the cannon and mortars were turned against the citadel.

The fuddenness with which these atchievements were performed, redoubled the ardour of the troops; even the obstacles they

they had still to encounter, gave fresh life to their activity. Accordingly, the work necessary to carry on their farther approaches, was undertaken and executed, with the most chearful alacrity. Fully convinced, that conquest alone could put a period to their toil, every individual soldier seemed, with unremitting zeal, to defy the most discouraging hardships, in order to add a new lustre to the British arms, and join to the never-fading laurels they had acquired in North-America and at Belle-Isle, those which must bloom on the surrender of Martinico. Thus every idea of fatigue and danger was lost in an inextinguishable thirst of glory.

The enemy feeing the English in possession of every height and advantageous situation in their neighbourhood; their own batteries turned against themselves, and new ones hourly added by the English, began to tremble at the thoughts of another attack: They therefore beat the chamade on the third of January, and surrendered the citadel of Fort-royal on the following terms, which were signed the next day, by the British Admiral and General, and Monsieur de Lignery, Governor of the fort, for his Most Christian Majesty.

In consequence of this capitulation, the gate of the citadel was delivered up to his Britannic Majesty's troops, the evening of the 4th of February; and, at nine the next morning, the garrison marched out, consisting of about eight hundred men, grenadiers, marines, militia, and free-booters. About one hundred and fifty of the garrifon were killed and wounded during the fiege. In the feveral attacks which preceded it, the enemy had not lefs than a thousand men killed, wounded, and taken prisoners. Among the latter were several principal officers of the militia who were taken on the 24th of January. The lofs, on the part of the English, was one captain, five lieutenants, one enfign, three ferjeants, and eighty-fix rank and file killed; and one lieutenant-colonel, two majors, eleven captains, fifteen lieutenants, three enfigns, twenty ferjeants, five drummers, and three hundred and thirty-two rank and file wounded; with eleven rank and file missing.

The capital of the island, St. Pierre, and some strong redoubts in its neighbourhood, still remained to be reduced, and the Governor-General, M. de la Touche, having retired to it with his forces, threatened to defend it to the last extremity. This his seeming resoluteness produced a general anxiety in the British army, not from any doubt of success, but from the most justifiable apprehensions, that, in consequence of a long siege, they might be overtaken by diseases peculiar to the climate, the malignity of which was much more to be dreaded than the enemy: But these apprehensions were greatly abated by the arrival of deputations from different parts of the island, with the following requisition of terms for the surrender of all such parts of it as were still possessed by the inhabitants.

Capitulation demanded by the inhabitants of the Island of Martinico, reprefented by Messieurs D'Alesso, Knight, Seigneur Desragny La Pierre, Captain of horse, and Feryre, Captain of infantry of militia, surnished with full powers from nine quarters of this island.

To their Excellencies Meffieurs Monckton and Rodney, Generals by land and fea of his Britannic Majefly's forces.

ARTICLE I. The inhabitants shall quit their posts with two fieldpieces, their arms, colours slying, drums beating, matcheslighted, and shall have all the honours of war.

Answer. The inhabitants shall march out of all their garrifons and posts (none excepted) with their arms and coloursslying, upon condition that they afterwards lay them down; and that all the forts, garrisons, posts, and batteries of cannonand: 1762.

II. The inhabitants of the islands of St. Lucia and St. Vincent, who are come to the affistance of this island, shall have the liberty to retire with their arms and baggage, and shall be furnished with a vessel to carry them to their own islands, with their servants which they have brought with them; as also provisions necessary for their voyage.

Answer. They must remain prisoners of war, as those of St. Vincent in the capitulation of Fort-Royal.

III. The inhabitants shall have free exercise of their religion; the priests, friars, and nuns, shall be preserved in their cures and convents; and it shall be permitted to the superiors of the order to fend for any of them from France, delivering their letter to his Britannic Majesly's Governors.

GRANTED.

IV. They shall be strictly neuter, and shall not be obliged to take up arms against his Most Christian Majesty, nor even against any other power.

Answer. They become subjects of his Britannic Majesty, and must take the oath of allegiance; but shall not be obliged to take arms against his Most Christian Majesty, until a peace shall determine the face of the island.

V. They shall retain their civil government, their laws, customs, and ordinances; justice shall be administered by the same officers who are now in employment; and there shall be a regulation made for the interior police, between the Governor for his Britannic Majesty and the inhabitants; and, in case the island, at the peace, shall be ceded to the King of Great Britain, the inhabitants shall be allowed to retain their political government, and to accept that of Antigua or St. Christopher's.

Answer. They become Britith subjects (as in the preceding article); but shall continue to be governed by their present laws, until his Majesty's pleasure be known.

VI. The inhabitants, as also the religious orders of both fexes, shall be maintained in the property of their effects, moveable and immoveable, of what nature soever; and shall be preserved in their privileges, rights, honours, and exemptions; their free negroes and mulattoes shall have the entire enjoyment of their liberty.

GRANTED, in regard to the religious orders; the inhabitants, being fubjects of Great Britain, will enjoy their properties, and the fame privileges, as in the other his Majesty's Leeward-Islands.

VII. They shall not pay to his Majesty any other duties than those which have been paid hitherto to his Most Christian Majesty; and the capitation of negroes, on the same footing it is paid at present, without any other charges or imposts; and the expences of justice, pensions to curates, and other occasional expences, shall be paid out of the domain of his Britannic Majesty, as they were out of that of his Most Christian Majesty.

Answered in the fixth article in what regards the inhabitants.

VIII. and IX. The prifoners taken during the fiege, shall be reflored on both fides; the free mulattoes, as well as the negroes, negroes, which shall have been taken, shall be restored as prisoners of war, and shall not be treated as slaves.

Anfwer. The inhabitants and mulattoes, now prifoners, will become British subjects, upon the submission of the whole island, and will enjoy the benefit of it. The negroes who have been taken in arms, are deemed slaves.

X. The subjects of Great Britain, who have taken refuge in the island for crimes, or been condemned to punishments, shall have liberty of retiring.

REFUSID.

XI. No others than the inhabitants, refident in this island, shall, till the peace, possess any estates in it, either by acquisition, agreement, or otherwise; but in case, at the peace, the country shall be ceded to the King of Great Britain, then it shall be allowed the inhabitants who are not willing to become his subjects, to sell-their estates, moveable and immoveable, to whom they please, and retire where they shall think proper; in which case, they shall be allowed convenient time.

Answer. All subjects of Great Britain may possess any lands or houses by purchase. The remainder of this article granted, provided they sell to British subjects.

XII. In case any exchanges shall be thought of at the peace, their Most Christian and Britannic Majesties are intreated to give the presence to this island.

Answer. This will depend upon his Britannic Majesty's pleasure.

XIII.

XIII. The inhabitants shall have liberty of retiring; that is, of sending their children to France for their education; the wives of officers and others out of the island, shall have liberty to retire with their effects, and the number of servants suitable to their rank.

Answer. The liberty of fending their children to France to be educated, depends upon the King's pleasure. The rest granted.

XIV. The Government shall procure for the inhabitants vent for their commodities, which shall be looked upon as national commodities, and of consequence shall have entry in England.

GRANTED; the island producing nothing but what may be imported into England.

XV. The inhabitants shall not be obliged to find quarters for the troops, or to do any works on the fortifications.

Answer. The inhabitants must furnish barracks or quarters for the King's troops in the several districts of the island.

XVI. The widows, and others abfent through fickness, who shall not have figned the capitulation, shall have a fixed time for doing it.

GRANTED, on condition they fign it in one month from this date.

XVII. Vessels shall be granted to the free-booters and others, who have no effects in this country, and are willing to leave it, to retire.

GRANTED, to go to France; but no where elfe.

Pigeon-Island furrendered the same day this capitulation was signed, and on the same terms with Fort-Royal, the allowance of cannon to the garrison only excepted.

It was now thought necessary to reduce the north-side of the island, were it only to cut off all relief from St. Pierre's, and the great redoubts in its neighbourhood, where, as we have already observed, Monsieur de la Touche had collected his whole strength, and threatened a long and vigorous defence. With this view, therefore, the General gave orders for attacking La Trinité, the principal port and town in that quarter; and, accordingly, on the 7th of February, the Honourable Captain Hervey, with the Dragon, and several other ships, himself in the Dragon with a distinguishing pendant, sailed for La Trinité, where they arrived on the 9th; landed Captain Hervey's marines, with five hundred seamen; took possession of the fort and the town; and obliged the inhabitants of the seven districts of that coast to consult their own interest by signing the capitulation, which had been granted those of the south-side of the island. Ten days after, Captain Hervey delivered over these districts in perfect tranquillity, to Lieutenant-Colonel Graham, who had been sent by the General to take upon him the government of them.

In the mean time, the preparations more immediately requifite for the reduction of St. Pierre, were carried on with fuch vigour, that every thing was ready for that purpose by the time Captain Hervey failed against La Trinité. But while the General was marching towards it, Monsieur de la Touche determined, probably by the success of Captain Hervey, sent his brother and a general officer, on board the Marlborough, with the following heads of a capitulation, which being agreed to, St. Pierre and the whole island of Martinico, were formally surrendered up to his Britannic Majesty's forces, on the 13th of Tebruary.

Capitulation proposed for the whole Island of Martinico, on the part of M. le Vassir de la Touche, the Governor-General.

PRILIMINARY ARTICLE. A fulpension of arms shall be agreed on for sifteen days; at the expiration of which, the following capitulation shall take place, if no succour arrives.

Anfacer. Twenty-four hours will be allowed the General to accede to the terms offered, from the time Messis. de Bournan and de la Touche shall be set on shore at St. Pierre; and if accepted, the troops of his Britannic Majesty shall be immediately ately put in possession of such forts and posts, as his Britannic Majesty's General shall think sit.

ARTICLE I. All the forts and posts of the island shall be evacuated by the troops of his Most Christian Majesty, whether regular or militia, or independent companies of free-booters, or livery-fervants; they shall march out with four field-pieces, their arms, two rounds per man, their ensigns or colours slying, drums beating, and all the honours of war; after which the said forts shall be occupied by the troops of his Britannic Majesty.

Anfaver. The troops and inhabitants shall march out of all their garrifons and posts with their arms, drums beating, colours flying; and the troops to have four pieces of cannon, with two rounds each, and two rounds per man; upon condition that the inhabitants afterwards lay down their arms; and that all the forts, garrifons, posts, and batteries of cannon or mortars, with all arms, ammunition, and implements of war, shall be delivered up to proper persons appointed by us to receive them.

II. Transport-vessels shall be provided, at the expence of his Britannic Majesly, sufficiently victualled, to carry to the Grenades the above-mentioned regular troops, and their officers and commanders, with the four pieces of cannon, arms, baggage; and, in general, all the effects of the faid officers and troops.

GRANTED; to France only.

GRANTED.

IV. There shall, in like manner, be provided, at the charge of his Britannic Majefly, a veffel and the necessary victualling, to carry to the Grenades M. le Vassor de la Touche, Commandant-General for his Most Christian Majesty of the French Leeward Islands in America, his lady, and all persons with him engaged in the king's fervice, or belonging to his household, and all their effects.

GRANTED, to France, the Grenades being blocked up.

V. M. de Rochemore, inspector of the fortifications and artillery in this illand, shall, in like manner, be conveyed to the Grenades in the same ships with the persons in his retinue engaged in the fervice of the King, their domestics, and their effects.

GRANTED, to France.

VI. There shall be made by two commissaries, who shall be named for that purpose, one of each nation, an exact inventory of all the effects, which shall be found to belong to his Most Christian Majesty in the arsenals, in the magazines, upon the batteries; and, in general, of all the arms, utenfils. and ammunitions of war, to be delivered up to the commanding officer of his Britannic Majefty.

GRANTED.

Answer. All military stores, and others employed as such, become his Britannic Majesty's.

VIII. All the prisoners made during the siege, or at sea, before the siege, of whatever nation and quality, shall be restored on either side; and those made in the citadel, if they be troops, shall follow the fortune of the other troops; and if inhabitants, they shall follow the fortune of the other inhabitants.

Anfaver. The troops, according to the cartel; the inhabitants will be released upon the figning of this capitulation.

IX. The free-negroes and mulattoes made prifoners of war, fhall be treated as fuch, and reflored, like the other prifoners, in order to their continuing to enjoy their liberties.

Answer. All negroes taken in arms are deemed flaves. The reft granted.

X. The Sieurs Nadau Dutreil, de la Potterie, and Cornette, prifoners of state, shall be likewise conducted, at the expence, and in the ships of his Britannic Majesty, to the Island of the Grenades, to be delivered into the hands of M. le Vassor dela Touche.

Anfacer. Messieurs de la Potterie and Cornette, shall be delivered up when taken; but M. Nadau having had our promise, (immediately upon his being made prisoner) to procure him a reasonable time to settle his assairs, he has three months, from the date hereof, for that purpose.

XI. The Island of Martinico shall remain in the hands of his Britannic Majesty, till such time as its condition shall have been been determined, by treaty made between the two powers, without the inhabitants being compelled, in any cafe, to take up arms, either against the king of France, or against his allies, or even against any other power.

Infacer. They become subjects of his Britannic Majesty, and must take the oaths of allegiance; but shall not be obliged to take up arms against his Most Christian Majesty, until a peace shall determine the fate of the island.

XII. All the inhabitants of Martinico, either prefent or abfent, even those that are engaged in his Most Christian Majesty's fervice, as well as all religious houses and communities, shall be maintained and preferved in the possession and property of their real and personal estates, of their negroes, thipping, and generally of all their essects, whether the said real and personal estates and essects be actually in Martinico or in any other island; and the slaves, which have been taken from them during the siege, shall be restored to them.

Answer. The inhabitants, as well as the religious orders, will enjoy their properties; and, as they become British subjects, they will enjoy the same privileges as in his Majesty's other Leeward Islands. In regard to the slaves, answered in the ninth article.

XIII. The boats, or other veffels belonging to Martinico, which are actually out at fea, or in neutral ports, whether they are equipped for war or not, fhall be permitted to return into the ports and roads of this ifland, upon the declaration to be made by the owners thereof, of their intending to fend them immediate orders to return, and upon their giving perfonal fecurity, that the faid veffels fhall make no attempt upon

XIV. The inhabitants of Martinico shall freely and publicly exercise their religion; the priests, friars, and nuns, shall be maintained in the public exercise of their functions, and in the enjoyment of their privileges, prerogatives, and exemptions.

GRANTED.

XV. The superior as well as inferior judges, shall likewise be maintained in their functions, privileges, and prerogatives; they shall continue to administer justice to the inhabitants of this island, according to the laws, ordinances, customs, and usages, which have been followed hitherto. No foreigner shall be allowed to sit in the council as a judge: But, if any place in the magistracy becomes vacant, the superior council of Martinico shall dispose of it, provisionally only, and the person chosen by them, shall perform the duties of it, till the one or the other of the two courts shall otherwise settle it, after that the condition of Martinico shall have been sixed by a treaty between them.

Anfaver. They become British subjects; but shall continue to be governed by their present laws, until his Majesty's pleasure be known.

Orders shall be given to the inhabitants, that are indebted to the officers of this corps, to pay them before their departure. The officers shall likewise be bound to discharge the debts they have contracted in this island.

Answer. They shall be fent to France. The rest granted.

XVII. All the land and fea-officers who are in the island, either on actual duty, or with leave, shall have a year's time to fettle all the affairs they may have there.

Answer. A proper time will be allowed to fuch as have estates upon the island, with the usual restrictions; and such as shall have M. de la Touche the Governor-General's leave.

XVIII. The nobility shall continue to enjoy all the privileges and exemptions which have been always granted them.

GRANTED; fo that it is not inconfishent with the British laws.

XIX. The flaves that have been made free during the fiege, or to whom their freedom has been promifed, shall be reputed and declared free, and they shall peaceably enjoy their state of freedom.

GRANTED.

XX. The duties of the poll-tax, those of importation and exportation; and, in general, all the duties established in this island, shall shall be continued to be paid for the future, on the same footing as heretofore.

Answer. Answered in the 15th article.

XXI. As it imports the glory and interest of every prince whatfoever, to make it publicly known, that he honours with a fpecial protection the action of every fubject which bears the character of zeal, love, and loyalty for his king; it has been agreed, that the things furnished to the colony on occasion of the fiege, either before or during the fame; fuch as provisions, utenfils, ammunition, arms, or money; shall continue to be confidered as debts of the colony, just as they were and ought to be, in its former state; consequently, that the amounts of these supplies shall not cease to be reputed as debts of the colony itself, and which it must fatisfy, into whatfoever hands it may pass, through the fortune of arms: that, confidering the nature and quality of these debts, it will add to the dignity of his Britannic Majesty, to grant the creditors all manner of protection; consequently, they shall be paid out of the first funds that shall arise, as well from the poll-tax as from the duties of importation and exportation on merchandizes that are liable to them. To which purpose, the flate of these debts shall be settled and verified by M. de la Riviere, intendant of the American Leeward Islands.

Answer. Will be settled by the generals of both sides, being foreign to the capitulation.

XXII. In virtue of the fame principle, and confidering the necessity of speedily bringing provisions into this colony, it has likewise been agreed, that such merchants of the town of St. Pierre, as, by orders from the intendant, M. de la

Answer. All supplies whatever, that were engaged to be thrown into this island by any neutral power, for the support of his Most Christian Majesty's troops and colony, will be deemed legal prizes, if taken by his Britannic Majesty's ships; and all engagements with neutral powers for such a supply, made before the reduction of this island, being void, no commerce for the future can be carried on but in British bottoms.

XXIII. M. le Vassor de la Touche shall be allowed five of the inhabitants, whom he shall cause to be put on board such of the vessels as are to transport his Most Christian Majesty's troops. His reasons for this demand are, that it imports all sovereign powers not to grant any protection to any one who breaks through the allegiance and fidelity a subject owes to his king.

A ship with provisions shall afterwards be furnished, at the expence of his Britannic Majesty, in order to convey to the Grenades, the said intendant, his wife, children, secretaries, and servants, with all their effects. The faid commissary-comptroller of the marine shall go on board the same ship, and be conveyed to the same island.

GRANTED; afterwards to be fent to France.

The

The loss sustained by the English in the conquest of Martinico, must appear very trisling, when we reslect on the numberlefs difficulties which every where prefented themselves, and the value of the prize contended for. Nature had, in every part, been lavish of her defences to oppose an invasion; and Art, far from neglecting to improve her bounties, had added every strength that judgment and experience could fuggest. Besides, the vast consequence of the island itself to France, together with the riches of the inhabitants, could not fail calling forth their utmost exertions to repel their invaders; and they . had continually before them every motive that could animate and inspire them with fortitude to bear every fatigue, and courage to brave every danger: The houses in which they were born, the land which nurtured them, the graves of their ancestors, the cradles of their children, their wives, their daughters, their whole eflates, exposed to the infults of a conquering foe, were fufficient to excite the utmost efforts of human skill; yet, however strong such a variety of sensations must have operated to the purpose of inspiriting the French, it proved unequal to the true valour and perfevering ardour of the English troops, who, in surmounting every obstacle, gave a noble example of British spirit. But the grenadiers commanded by the Lieutenant-Colonels Fletcher, Massey, and Vaughan; and the light infantry headed by Lieutenant-Colonel Scott, Major Leland, and Captain Quintin Kennedy, diffinguished themfelves in a particular manner; the warmest part of the service having fallen to their lot.

Nor was the innate bravery of the British failors ever more conspicuous than during this expedition; and the services they performed, as well on shore as on their own element, are almost incredible; and, to the everlasting honour of both the sea and land forces, the utmost-harmony subsisted between them, and Admiral Rodney gave the General every assistance in his power, with all the cordiality that might be expected, had his own glory alone depended on the event.

Though it was merely by the right of arms that the island of Martinico and its inhabitants, with all their riches, thus fell into the power of the English; the humanity and generosity of the conquerors made so deep an impression on the hearts of the conquered, that, instead of regarding them as outrageous foes, they hailed them their deliverers from tyranny and oppression; and, from the hitherto unknown degree of liberty they were now permitted to enjoy, conceived such an high idea of the British government, as made them break out into open prayers of long continuing to enjoy the blessings of it.

During the progress of the army, the Admiral kept his ships differently employed; but most of them were obliged to remain with the army, not only to cover the siege of Fort-Royal, and be able to do the same at St. Pierre's; but because their marines were all on shore, doing duty with the troops; and even many of their seamen were daily employed in the necessary task of hauling up the cannon to the troops, and carrying them provisions and ammunition. Proper officers were appointed to forward these services with that dispatch which the importance of them required.

The conquest of Martinico being thus accomplished, General Monckton would have proceeded in person to have reduced the other islands mentioned in his Majesty's instructions; but that

f both the d between fliftance in ected, had the island s, thus fell merofity of hearts of outrageous ny and opof liberty h an high break out e bleflings pt his flips obliged to c of Fortut because the troops; yed in the roops, and ficers were itch which ied, Geneve reduced tions; but that

that he thought it of more consequence to the service, considering the then critical fituation of affairs, to remain where he was. Befides, his presence was absolutely requisite to settle many material points conducive to the fecurity of his new conquest: Accordingly, every measure was pursued that pru-, dence could dictate, and that could tend to the preservation of harmony between his own troops, and fecure order and obedience from the inhabitants. The execution of the remainder of the King's instructions being a fecond consideration; it was, therefore, prudently refolved to fend a finall fquadron under Commodore Swanton, with the fifth brigade under Brigadier Walsh, and the corps of light-infantry, commanded by Colonel Scott, to reduce the Grenades. These troops soon arriving at their place of destination, landed on the 5th of March, without the least opposition. The Governor having, with some regulars and free-booters, possessed himself of a very strong and advantageous post commanding the fort, shewed, for fome time, a refolution to defend the place; and his dispositions indicated an obstinate intention of repelling the invaders, if possible; but he no sooner saw the British troops landed, and favourably posted, than he abandoned his strong situation; and then, finding himfelf deferted by the inhabitants, and that the communication with the country was cut off in fuch a manner as to preclude all hopes of relief, he submitted without firing a gun; fo that this valuable conquest, left to the crown of Great Britain by the definitive treaty, did not cost her a fingle man.

All this while, the greatest part of the sleet kept cruizing on different flations, to watch if any of the enemy should appear; and commodore Sir James Douglas, in particular, off the Salines: Notwithstanding which, the Admiral determined to at-* Ddd tack the islands of St. Lucia and St. Vincent, the right to which had so long been an object of contention between the French and the English. Accordingly, on the 24th of February, he ordered to proceed on this fervice; with liberty, on his making the island of St. Lucia, reconnoitring the coasts of it, and making all the other observations in his power, to attack it without waiting for farther instructions, if he thought himself strong enough to carry his point; otherwise he was only to fend the Admiral the best account he could, of the enemy's force and fituation, and block up their ports, in the best manner he could, to prevent their receiving any fupplies, and acquaint the Admiral, from time to time, of his proceedings: in case he attacked the island, he was left entirely to the direction of his own judgment, in his operations against it. If Captain Hervey should subdue the island, after taking pessession of the forts, and acquainting the Admiral therewith; he was to proceed to the Island of St. Vincent, and inform the chief of the Indians there, that he was not come to molest them, and much less strip them of their possessions; but to free them from the yoke which the French had imposed on them, and oblige the usurpers to evacuate that island; his Majesty being desirous to grant the natives his royal protection, and maintain them in that flate of neutrality to which they had an undoubted right: And, that Captain Hervey might the more effectually comply with these instructions, he was ordered to wear a broad pendent when not in fight of a fenior officer.

The first of these services was performed by the 27th, when the Island of St. Lucia furrendered by the following capitulation.

Articles of capitulation agreed on between the Honourable Augustus Hervey, Commander of a squadron of his Majesty's ships, employed off the Islands of St. Lucia and St. Vincent; and Monsieur de Longueville, Commander and Governor of his Most Christian Majesty's forces on the Mand of St. Lucia.

ARTICLE I. The troops of the Most Christian King, which are in the Island of St. Lucia, shall be allowed the same capitulation with the Island of Martinico; they shall be supplied with a veffel and provisions to remove to the faid island; they shall leave St. Lucia with the honours of war, their arms and baggage, drums beating, matches lighted, and a fieldpiece, and fo proceed to Martinico, with ten rounds for faid field-piece; and they shall be allowed two days to bring down their baggage from the redoubts.

Answer. The troops of his Most Christian Majesty shall march out of their garrisons and posts, with the honours of war, and be allowed a field-piece of cannon, with four rounds, and lighted match; they shall be allowed forty-eight hours to get their baggage from the redoubts, and then be embarked at his Britannic Majesty's expence for Martinico, and from thence to France as foon as possible.

II. The inhabitants of this island ask the same terms, which have been granted to those of Martinico, by the late capitulation made with M. le Vassor, our General.

This capitulation gave Captain Hervey possession of the finest. harbour in the West-Indies, strongly fortified by art as well as by nature. St. Lucia is, befides, remarkable for feveral fresh water rivers, and great plenty of wood. It extends north northeast, and south south-west about forty-sive miles, and is about thirteen in breadth. It is indeed mountainous and but little cleared, and contained but about one thousand inhabitants. though very fruitful and capable of yielding the fame commodities with all the other West-Indian islands. But, after all, its chief merit confifts in the excellent harbour called the Little Carenage on the leeward fide of the ifland. This harbour is one of the best in the West-Indies, and it is impossible to attack it by shipping when properly fortified, though it can receive vellels of the greatest draught, having seven fathom water close to the shore, and a cove where a first rate man of war may be careened.

We cannot help remarking in this place, that it is not bravery alone which conflitutes a good officer. A wife attention to circumflances, with the neceffary vigilance to gain by flratagem, what force, perhaps, would never effect, has fuperior merit. It is on this principle we must relate a fingular circumflance that attended the reduction of St. Lucia. When Captain Hervey arrived off the island, he was entirely at a loss for intelligence concerning the fituation of its French inhabitants, and the troops which defended it. From the peculiar position of the harbour, there was no reconnoitring it from without; and the coast was every where so well defended, that it was impracticable to land; he, therefore, determined to summon the Governor, and to accompany the officer charged with the summons in person, but dressed as a midshipman, sent, as it were, to

ferve as an interpreter. By this means he got into the harbour, and had an opportunity of feeing that the water was every where deep; nay, he was carried up to the fortress where the Governor resided.

The fummons was answered with a spirit that threatened a flout defence; but next morning, whilft the English ships were under fail to force the harbour, and the marines and feamen ready in the boats for the affault, the commodore received an offer of capitulation from the Governor, M. de Longueville. The officer fent on this errand, knowing again the Commodore, whom he had feen the day before in a different character, could not help betraying great furprise; but at the same time, rightly judging of the real cause of this duplicity, he presently recovered himself; and, without taking any farther notice of it, returned to the Governor, and foon after brought back those articles figned, which the Commodore had fent in by him. The ships then went in and took possession of the harbour, and the whole island immediately submitted: From hence, on the 4th of March, the Commodore failed to reduce the Island of St. Vincent; but, on his way, he met an express from Admiral Rodney, with orders to join him with all expedition. The following extract of a letter from the Admiral to Captain Forreft, who commanded his Majesty's fleet at Jamaica, will fusficiently account for the above orders.

" I must acquaint you, that the French squadron, under the command of M. de Blenac, confissing of eight ships of the line,

" fix ships of the line, and four or five frigates, in hopes of " being able to bring them to an action; but was disappointed " in my aim. Having gained intelligence, that the Island of " Martinico belonged to his Britannic Majefly, they made off, " without my being able to learn, for forty-eight hours, what " courfe they had taken. I had great reason to believe, that " they were gone to the relief of Grenada, then befieged; " but, upon receiving a certain account that they were feen off " St. Christopher's, steering west with all the fail they could " crowd, I collected, with the utmost dispatch, all my force, " and shall hasten to join you as foon as possible, and you may " every hour expect me. But, as I think the best way to defeat " the enemy's defigns, will be to attack them in their own " ports, I should be glad that you would join me with all the " fhips under your command, off Cal St. Nicholas; or, in " cafe that should be found impracticable, that you would " cause frigates to cruize to windward in quest of me, to " give me an account of the prefent state of the island, and " the intelligence you have been able to procure of the ene-" my's motions, that I may the better know how to take my " measures for the preservation of Jamaica."

In consequence of the above orders to Captain Hervey, he made all the fail he could to join the Admiral; and, on the 6th of March, came up with him off St. Pierre's, as did Sir James Douglas and Commodore Swanton; fo that, within a few hours, his whole fleet was collected. It was in vain to think of intercepting the enemy before they could arrive at St. Domingo. However, not a moment was lost in victualling and watering, and getting every ship ready for action, in order to succour the Island of Jamaica, as expresses had been received from the Governor

Governor and Council of that island, that they were in imminent danger; that the island was to be attacked by the united forces of France and Spain; and requesting that the Admiral and General would endeavour to prevent the said island from falling into the hands of the enemy, by sending them speedy succour.

Immediately on the receipt of this express, the Admiral communicated it to the General; and proposed to him to hold a considerable body of troops in constant readiness to embark for the relief of Jamaica, the moment intelligence should be received, of the Brest squadron's having quitted those seas; the Admiral being, on his side, determined to affist them with all the naval force, that could possibly be spared from the immediate protection of the Carribee Islands.

General Monckton was much distressed at the critical fituation of Jamaica; especially as he did not think himself authorised to part with any of his troops without express orders from England. This, however, did not prevent the Admiral from profecuting his purpose of hastening to the relief of Jamaica: he, therefore, ordered Captain Hervey to St. Christopher's, to collect all the ships on that station, and to remain there till joined by him with the rest of his sleet, in readiness to fail at a moment's warning; and soon after, the Admiral took the fame rout himself, leaving Sir James Douglas at Martinico. But before he could fail from St.-Christopher's, he received an express, on the 26th of March, by Captain Elphinstone of the Richmond, with orders to defist from any enterprise he might have in view, as it was indispenfibly necessary, that all operations should yield to the grand object, a secret expedition, which had been then resolved upon.

Thus we fee, that the time in which Martinico was reduced, was a circumflance of as much confequence as the reduction itself; for, the war against Spain having been declared in the beginning of the year, it became adviseable to strike early such an effectual blow against that nation, as might incline her to a speedy peace, or materially influence the fortune of the war, if she should persist in her hostile designs. It was, on this plan, necessary to employ, on one and the same service, a very great force; and, of course, call away a considerable part of that which had been employed at Martinico.

To be thus flopped in the career of glory, and fuperfeded in command, when just on the point of feizing fresh laurels, must have been extremely mortifying; for it was now imposlible to proceed to the protection of Jamaica, or attempt any thing against the fleet of the enemy in their own ports, without acting in contradiction to the inflructions received from the Lords of the Admiralty. However, as the prefervation of Jamaica was an object of fo much confequence, the Admiral thought himself justifiable in obeying a standing politive order, respecting all admirals or commodores commanding on the station of the Leeward Islands, that, in cafe any French fquadrons passed these seas, they should detach immediately an equal number of ships after them, or follow them in person; besides, the Admiral knew that the Jamaica fleet was to compose part of that commanded by Sir George Pococke, which was to be employed in the fecret expedition, and had not received the least intimation against what place that expedition was intended; he therefore thought it abfolutely necessary, not only for the preservation of Jamaica, but to prevent the junction of the French and Spanish sleets, to Есе detach detach Sir James Douglas with ten fail of the line, to Commodore Forrest, who had already seven fail of the line and ten frigates under him: And accordingly he sent Captain Holwell to Martinico, with orders for Sir James to repair with all the expedition possible, in the Culloden, to St. Christopher's, there to take on him the command of a squadron for Jamaica. On the 2d of April, Sir James arrived at St. Christopher's, and the Admiral immediately ordered the Captains, of the

He was likewife to dispatch a tender or frigate, on hisarrival at Jamaica, with what intelligence he could procure, to Sir George Pococke at Martinico, and give directions to the commanders of fuch vessels, to keep in the usual track of ships bound from Martinico to Jamaica; and then order his other frigates to cruize to windward, on the fouth-fide of Hifpaniola, that Sir George Pococke might have as early and as full intelligence as poslible.

On the 3d of April the Admiral failed with Str James and the whole fleet, to deceive the Dutch, who might observe their feparation, and give notice of it to the enemy; they kept company till night, when the fignal was made for Sir James to proceed to Jamaica; the Admiral steered for St. Pierre, and anchored in the road on the 9th. Immediately on his arrival, he began the necessary preparations for getting the ships in readiness for Sir George Pococke; and, in the mean time, fent off an express to acquaint him, that Casde-Navirre Bay was the fittest place for him to water in, and that the fleet and troops at Martinico should be ready to fail the moment of his arrival.

Sir James Douglas made Jamaica on the 11th of April, and having received intelligence from Commodore Forrest, that a French squadron was in Port-St.-François, in the Island of Hispaniola, and that they intended to join the Spaniards at the Havanna, with all the reinforcements they could collect; it was, in confequence of these advices, thought necessary to dispatch immediately as many of the ships as could be spared from the Jamaica flation, to cruize off the port of St.-François, and, if poslible, block up the French ships in it. It was off Port-Royal, in Jamaica, that this refolution was taken; and the ships to be employed in this service, had fixty or seventy leagues to work up to windward. Captain Hervey was ordered, with a broad pendant, on board the Dragon, to take on him the command of the and to take, befides, under his orders, all the ships he might meet with cruizing about that island.

Captain Hervey, on his arrival off Port-St.-François, found the French squadron all ready for sea; but on the third day after, the troops that were on board disembarked, and M. de Blenac, in consequence of a message he had received from the Governor of the Havanna, gave over all thoughts of going immediately to sea. ght ind lay de the ΙE otherwise receive from the acquisition of such an ally, was vigorously to attack some of the Spanish settlements in America, before they could be put into a proper posture of desence: For, should this plan be attended with success, it would not only obstruct the channels through which the Spaniards received all their wealth from that quarter of the globe, but possibly deprive them of the very sources which surnished it. The Havanna, on the Island of Cuba, was therefore the object singled out by the British ministry, as the most proper to accomplish these ends.

This city is fituated exactly under the tropic of Cancer, 830 west of London, and is by far the most considerable place in the West-Indies, as well on account of its trade, as of its harbour and docks, in which ships of war of the first magnitude are built. But what rendered it of yet far greater confequence, was its being also the key of the riches of Mexico, and the ufual repository till their final embarkation for Old Spain. The harbour lies to the east of the town, and is spacious enough to receive an hundred ships of the line. The entrance into it is defended by the Moro, a fort built upon a narrow point of land to the north of the town, and which is large enough to hold a garrifon of one thousand men, with all necessary provisions to result a long and vigorous siege. It contains very good cafements, and two cifterns which afford plenty of water. As it stands on steep rocks, it is inaccessible from the sea, which lathes its foundations. It is fortified to the east with two bastions, a courtin and good covered way, with a dry ditch, half of which is cut out of the folid rock. It commands the Fort de la Punta on the opposite side of the harbour's mouth, part of the town, and its three bastions to the north. more within the entrance into the harbour, and on the Moro fide, is a battery built of stone, called the Twelve Apostles; and a little higher up, another called the Shepherds battery; above these a chain of hills called the Cavannos, extend themfelves from the Moro to the plains of Guanamacoa. Thefe hills command the town and docks, and can always be proteeted by the ships in port, the very bottom of the harbour affording anchorage for men of war of the first rate, and being withal defended by a fleep hill called Gonzales.

All the eastern coast is covered with wood, the rest of the environs of the town is entirely cleared, and well cultivated; . and befides embellished with several small villages, and a prodigious number of country houses.

The operations against this capital object, by the possession. of which England might be fure to intercept the treasures that were to give vigour to the united efforts of the house of Bourbon, were to be conducted by the Right Honourable the Earl.

of Albemarle, as Commander-in-chief of the land-forces, and by Admiral Sir George Pococke, who was to command the fleet.

This enterprize, fo great in its confequences, that it might at once influence the fortune of the whole war in favour of the English, seemed to demand a very great force, to be attended with certain fuccefs; and it was therefore but reasonable to conclude, that every nerve and finew would be ftrained in fitting out the armament to be employed on the occasion, in a manner fullable to the importance of its deflination. But according to the plan of collecting the army and the navy for this fervice, there were, in all appearance, fo many and fuch great obflacles to overcome, especially with regard to the disposition of the ships and troops which were to compose them, that fortune must be extremely partial in favour of the English, if the necessary junction of them succeeded in every particular. The army was to be composed of fixteen thousand men; of which, notwithflanding, four thoufand only were to go from England. General Monckton, it was supposed, could furnish eight thousand more; and the remaining four thousand were to be supplied by General Amherst, from the Continent of North-America. The fleet was to be made as powerful as Possible: yet Sir George Pococke was to take with him from England but five flips of the line; the most considerable part of his firength being to be formed by fhips already in the West-Indies, under Admiral Rodney: But a Spanish sleet of nine thips of the line, then lying in Ferrol harbour, caufed an addition of two more flips, which, however, were only to accompany the fleet to the latitude of Cape-Finisherre, and then return to England. As to the troops expected from General Monckton, no accounts had been received from him fince he failed on his expedition from New-York; nor was it known whether whethe what pa and had mand of the quo to confiand two interior whether he had undertaken the reduction of Martinico, or in what part of the West-Indies he was to be found in case he had, and had miscarried in the attempt. The fleet under the command of Admiral Rodney was in the same predicament; and the quota of troops to be furnished by Sir Jessery Amherst was to consist only of two thousand provincials yet to be raised, and two thousand regulars to be drawn from Canada and the interior garrisons in other parts of North-America.

By the flenderness of this force, and the extreme uncertainty of collecting it, at least in due time to enter on action before the Spaniards could be prepared to receive an enemy, and take advantage, withal, of the only feafon fit for military operations within the tropics, we can fearcely conclude that this plan against the Havanna was adopted with any spirit, or that it was intended to operate to any great advantage. Yet, by the inflructions to the Earl of Albemarle, the British ministry seem to have been uncommonly folicitous, that no time should be lost in carrying the enterprize into immediate execution; for every other plan of operations in the West-Indies, even those actually entered upon, were to yield to the intended operations of the fleet and the army under Sir George Pococke and the Earl of Albemarle; nay, had General Monckton already attacked Martinico, he was to relinquish it, and directly embark with his troops to reinforce the Earl of Albemarle. As, under these circumstances, the General could not possibly know where to affemble his forces, it was judged necessary to dispatch the Richmond, Captain Elphinstone, immediately in quest of Admiral Rodney, with the orders for him we have already mentioned, to collect all his ships and hold them in readiness to receive Sir George Pococke's commands on his arrival in those seas.

The Admiral and the General now repaired to Portsmouth, where the one was almost without a fleet, and the other without an army. However, with the little certain force they had, they were going to attempt the execution of a plan, the issue of which, whether fortunate or unfortunate, would in some degree affect almost every power in Europe.

However inadequate to the fervice, the force to execute in appeared to be, the hopes of the nation were animated from the confidence that the people had in the Admiral; whose abilities, supported by an inflexible resolution, had, during a long command, been the preserver and guardian of the British possessions in Asia, and whose naval skill gained his inferior squadron a superiority over that of the French in two engagements on those seas; it was not therefore doubted, but that the same abilities would be exerted with the same ardour against a new enemy in a new quarter of the globe.

In this enterprize the Honourable Commodore Keppel was appointed fecond in command, with a diffinguishing pendant. This officer had fignalized himself during the whole progress of the war. He added Goree to the British empire: But his great judgment and activity, so eminently displayed during the more recent reduction of Belle-Isle, was affurance of success to any operations that the Admiral might think proper to entrust to his execution.

The flaff of the army was as follows:
The Earl of Albemarle, Commander-in-Chief.

Off Plymouth they were joined by the Burford and the Florentine. On the 11th, the St. Pret, a French East-India ship, of feven hundred tons burthen, with 230 men, befides paffengers, and laden with coffee and pepper, bound from the Island of Bourbon to Port-L'Orient, struck to the Valiant, and was escorted into Plymouth by the Burford. One of the large storefhips having run foul of another vessel, and being thereby too much difabled to proceed, the flores were taken out of her, and she was fent into port, under convoy of the Rippon. By the departure of these two men of war, the fleet was reduced to its original firength; and foon after it had entered on the Atlantic Ocean, there arose a violent storm, which separated it; but without any other material injury. The Namur arrived at Barbadoes on the 20th of April, after a passage of forty-five days, and here the fleet again united; the Rippon, notwithflanding her having been fent into Plymouth, had come in with fome some transports, a few days before. To this place Major Moneypenny had been difpatched by General Monckton, to acquaint Lord Albemarle with the fuccess of his Majesty's arms against Martinico. The Admiral therefore now steered for that island, where he arrived on the 26th of April, and anchored in Cas-de-Navire's Bay, where Admiral Rodney delivered up the command of his ships to Sir George Pococke, and General Monckton that of his troops to the Earl of Albemarle; and then both navy and army vigorously entered, in their different departments, upon all the preparations necessary for the profecuting of their intended enterprize. The feamen were employed in victualling and watering the ships, the soldiers in cutting and making fascines. Dispatches were fent to Sir James Douglas to repair immediately, with all the ships under his command, and others fent him by Admiral Rodney to Cape-Nicholas, the north-west point of Hispaniola, and there wait the arrival of Admiral Pococke.

The maritime defence of Martinico was entrusted to Admiral Rodney, with a small squadron. General Monckton, who so lately led an army to victory, had now the choice left him of the inactive government of the Island of Martinico, which he had conquered, or to accompany the earl of Albemarle as third in command: but his health being much impaired, he, in order to re-cstablish it, desired leave to return to his government of New-York; which being complied with, the government of Martinico devolved on Major General Rusane.

The regiments which the Earl of Albemarle received from General Monckton, having each a light-infantry company, those from England were ordered to be put on the same footing; and the light-infantry of the whole were formed into one corps. The grenadiers were divided into three battalions,

The our companies of light-infantry from England, with one battalion of the grenadiers, were given to Colonel Carleton, and the remaining two battalions of grenadiers to Colonel Howe.

Previous to Lord Albemarle's leaving England, orders were fent to the Governor of Jamaica, to raife two thousand stout negroes, for the fervice of the army, it being thought impoffible for the troops to do all the laborious work incident to the business of a siege in so hot a climate. He was likewise ordered to raife five hundred negroes accustomed to arms, who were to be regimented with proper officers. But Lord Albemarle, being apprehensive of some delay in the execution of these orders, considering how much the governor and the inhabitants of Jamaica were alarmed at the arrival of M. de Blenac's fquadron, or that these negroes, if raised, might be intercepted by some part of that squadron, on their passage to join him, prudently gave orders, at all events, for the purchasing of eight hundred or a thousand negroes at Martinico, St. Christopher's, and Antigua. Matters being thus fettled, the Admiral and General, on the 6th of May, failed from Martinico, with the ships and troops before mentioned; and, on the 17th arrived off Cape-Nicholas, where, on the 23d, they were joined by the ships from Jamaica, and the fquadron under Captain Hervey, that had been cruizing off Cape-François, to block up M. de Blenac, whose defign was, if possible, to form a junction with the Spanish fleet in the harbour of the Havanna; as together, they would be in a condition to give battle to the English sleet. Accordingly, he had, with this view, offered his endeavours to the Governor of the Havanna; but all the answer the latter returned, was a verbal message, that he would as soon admit an English as a French sleet into his harbour.

With this fleet the Admiral had the choice of two routs to the Havanna: The first and most obvious was the common one, along the fouth-fide of Cuba, and fo into the tract of the galleons. But this, though by much the fafest, could not but prove equally tedious; and delays, above all things, were to be avoided, as the fuccess of the whole enterprize depended. to all appearance, on its being in forwardness before the hurricane feafon came on. He therefore refolved to run along the north shore of that island, through that very intricate and almost unknown paffage of the old Bahama Straits, in length near fixty leagues; and this though in great want of pilots for fuch a courfe: for, though many had arrived from Providence and other islands, yet scarce any one of them had the least fatisfactory knowledge of these straits, or was able to take the charge of a fingle ship through them, much less to conduct fo large a fleet: But these circumstances, however discouraging, could not check the refolute ardour of an admiral long ufed to flruggle with difficulties. The first reason that induced him to rifk this paffage, and it must be allowed to be a very material one, was, that if he endeavoured to go round the island of Cuba, besides the unavoidable great tediousness of the paffage, many of the transports and heavy laden store-ships would not, perhaps, have been able to beat up again in time from the west-end of Cuba to the Havanna, against the tradewinds and currents. The fecond was, that by going that way, he must have left the passage of the old Bahama Straits open to the French, and they might, in the interim, flip through them to the Havanna, and reinforce the Spaniards, if the latter would accept of their affiliance; for, from the westend of Hifpaniola, they could not avoid feeing the English sleet Gggg

The Admiral, therefore, having first prepared a sufficient number of frigates, tenders, long-boats, and barges to take the lead, and place themselves all along the passage, on the different fhoals, with lights by night, and flags by day, to direct the headmost ships of the fleet, divided this great armament into feven divisions, the better to work clear of each other, and avoid all confusion. Then, on the 27th of May, he made the fignal to bear away in the following order:

On the 2d of June, the Alarm and Echo being ordered a-head to lie on the Cayo Sal bank, the former made the fignal for feeing five fail in the north-west quarter, and then both chaced. About two o'clock in the afternoon, Captain Alms in the Alarm, came up with, and engaged the Vanganza, a Spanish frigate of twenty-two guns and two hundred men; and the Phænix store ship armed for war, of eighteen guns and seventy-sive men; and, in three quarters of an hour, both struck to him. and two schooners were at first in company with the Vanganza; but one of the latter escaped. They were bound to Sagoa, in the straits, for timber for the use of the ships at the Havanna, from whence they had failed twelve days before. During the passage through the Straits of Bahama, the weather proved very fine, and the current moderate; and, on the 5th of June, the whole sleet was clear through and in fight of the Metances.

By the taking of the above Spanith frigates, the Admiral and the General obtained very good intelligence concerning the condition of the enemy; a circumflance at this time particularly defirable. The purport of this intelligence was, that the Spaniards had fixteen men of war in the harbour of the Havanna, almost ready for sea; that they were not in the least expectation of a vifit from the English; and that the garrifon confished of very few troops: But on the other hand, the Governor of Havanna was now as certainly informed of the nature of the visit he was going to receive, by the vessel which escaped; he therefore immediately fummoned a council of war, in which, befides the refident officers of his own garrifon, he was affifted by the Count de Superunda, Lieutenant General of his Catholic Majesty's forces, and late Viceroy of the kingdom of Peru; and Don Diego Tavares, a Major General, knight of the order of St. James, and late Governor of Carthagena; these officers being accidentally at the Havanna on their passage to Old Spain from their respective governments. In this council, it was refolved to defend the Moro to the last extremity, as the prefervation of the town wholly depended upon the defence that fort could make. Accordingly, the prefent Governor being old and infirm, Don Lewis de Velaico, captain of a man of war, was entrusted with this important fervice; and the Marquis de Gonzales,

Gonzales, likewife captain of a man of war, was nominated the fecond in command. These points being settled, the Governor proceeded to declare war in form against England, that ceremony being absolutely necessary to justify the arraying the militia, who, by law, serve only in time of war. The regular troops at the Havanna were as follows:

To the above forces, the activity and the diligence of the Spanish officers soon added a number of militia, mulattoes, and negroes, so as to form, all together, a body of thirty thousand men, by the time the English arrived in sight of the Havanna. The principal part of their regular troops were ordered to oppose the progress of the invaders; and, for that purpose, take post at a considerable village called Guanamacoa, and the remainder were occupied in such business as was judged which lay in the harbour, was ordered to continue at anchor. Whether they were thus inactive for want of inflructions, whether all their ships were not in a fighting condition, or whatever elfe was the cause, we cannot determine. If fome of the above reasons did not forbid it, we may very rationally suppose, that their best way would have been to come out and fight the English squadron; and though the iffue of a battle might have proved unfavourable to them; yet a battle tolerably maintained, would have much disabled the English armament, and perhaps have been the means of disconcerting the whole enterprize. The loss of their fleet in this way might have possibly faved the city; but the city once taken, nothing could preferve the fleet. It is true, the Spaniards much trufted to the flrength of the place, and to those assonishing difficulties which attend military operations drawn out to any length in this unhealthy climate. In other respects, they were very far from being deficient in proper measures for their defence.

But to return to the operations of the English: On the 6th of June, the Havanna, the aim of so long a voyage, and the object of so many anxious hopes and fears, was now before H h h them. The Admiral brought to, about five leagues to the castward of that city, to iffue directions to the captains of his sleet, and the masters of the transports, with regard to the landing of the army.

The fleet was formed into two divisions. Six ships of the line, fome frigates, and the flat-bottomed boats, manned from the fleet, formed the division that was to cover the debarkation of the troops, under the command of Commodore keppel. Thirteen fail of the line, two frigates, the bomb-ketches, and thirty-fix fail of victuallers and flore-ships, formed the Admiral's division, with which, about two in the afternoon, he bore away and ran down off the harbour, where he difcovered twelve thips of the line, and feveral merchantmen. There not being on board the whole fleet a fingle man acquainted with the coaft, nor any fpot being as yet abfolutely fixed on for the making of a defcent, the Alarm and Richmond were fent, with the Colonels Carleton and Howe, to reconnoitre the flore. In the mean time, orders were given for the dispofition of the first debarkation of the troops, who were to be commanded by Lieutenant General Elliot, Major General Keppel, and Brigadier Haviland. The third battalion of grenadiers was to do duty as a corps de referve under Colonel Carleton. The first and second battalions were commanded by Colonel Howe. The Earl of Albemarle was to be in the barge of the Valiant, with the Commodore. The troops, on landing, were to form into one line, the corps de referve in their rear. A lieutenant was appointed to conduct each flat-bottomed boat; and when the fignal was made, these boats were to repair to their respective rendezvous, at the sterns of the following men of war, whose Captains were to conduct them

The officers of the troops were, upon no account, to interfere in the manœuvres performed on the water, the Commodore having the fole direction of every thing to be done on that element.

The third, fourth, and fifth brigades, under the command of Major General Lafaufille, were to remain on board, till flatbottomed boats were fent to receive and land them. Brigadier Walth was to land with his brigade. The transports of the first debarkation were ordered to get as close to land as possible, for the greater convenience of putting the troops on fhore; and the Generals Elliot and Keppel were on board the Dragon, Captain Hervey, in readiness to land with the troops when the Commodore should make the fignal. A convenient place having been fixed upon for this purpofe, the next morning, about ten. the Admiral made a feint to land four miles to the well of the Havanna, at the fame time that the Commodore began to land in good earnest, and did it so essectually, that in about an hour, the troops were all on fhore, without any opposition, between the rivers Boca-Nio and Coximer, fix miles to the eastward of the Moro. The Commodore ordered Captain Hervey in the Dragon to run in, and batter a finall fort fituated at the mouth of that river, which prevented the troops from fording II h h 2

But another body of the French being now perceived in their way to support the former, Major Sutherland, with the remainder of the first battalion, was immediately ordered over to attack them. This determined the enemy to retreat; by which Colonel Amherst had time to take post before it was dark. The troops, however, lay on their arms all night. Captain Mackenzie, who commanded Montgomery's light infantry, was mortally wounded in this affair; and ten of the enemy were taken prisoners. On the 14th, the channel, in which the enemy had funk the shallops, was cleared; but they still occupied a breaft-work which commanded the entrance and a battery, though not quite finished. THE general peace, which thus put an end to a most extenfive and bloody war, was juflly deemed, by the bulk of mankind, a happy event. But the British subjects in North-America thought they had particular reason to rejoice at it, as it left the French fo little power in their neighbourhood, and determined by it the boundaries between the two nations, with the greatest accuracy and precision. In this, however, they foon found themselves greatly mistaken. They did not fufficiently confider the jealous temper of the Indians included within these bounds, nor the opportunity which the French, by retaining posletsion of New-Orleans, and the joint navigation of the Mississippi, still had of inflaming that jealoufy. What alarmed them most was the chains of forts running through their country, in almost every direction; especially those built on their lakes, and on the feveral straits between them. Those military establishments, they looked upon as the embryos of fo many new colonies, by which, fooner or later, they would be elbowed out of the land of their forefathers; and a very imprudent drunkenness arises, among them, all disorders. There is nothing, let it be ever fo thocking and abominable, of which an intoxicated Indian is not capable; nay, which he will not madly endeavour to commit; and, unfortunately, there is no advantage which the English traders scruple to take of them in that deplorable condition. They impose on the men both in buying and felling, abuse their wives and daughters, and other female relations; and go yet greater lengths, if poslible, in every other species of wickedness. Where is the wonder then, if we fo often find the Indians on our backs, without being able to particularite the motives of their infurrection: We might very well wonder if it were otherwife. Thus, the bare behaviour of a few diffolute pedlars has often, without any other affignable cause, coll the lives of many of our most inosfensive and industrious fellow-subjects, who are just emerging from the gloom of want and toil, into the fair prospect of case and affluence. fufficiently provide against any attack from them. Our hopes proved as vain and short-lived, as they had been sanguine and premature; and the storm arose from that quarter from which we least expected it.

It foon appeared, that at the very time we were representing the Indians to ourselves as completely subdued, and perfectly obedient to our power, they were busy in planning the destruction, not only of our most insignificant and remote forts, but our most important and central settlements. They had collected abundance of small arms and ammunition, and every other necessary such a hostile and general design could suggest; and then proceeded to the execution of it, with a degree of activity and resolution, such as till this occasion they had never before discovered. The Shawanese and Delawares, in particular, the original schemers of this war, were so eager to begin it, that it was with much dissiculty they could be prevailed upon to feventh, wounded. The battle ended only with the day. The great activity of Major Campbell, of the forty-fecond regiment, was of infinite fervice upon this very critical occasion. Indeed, the conduct of the officers in general, was above praife; and the men kept themselves, the whole time, so cool, and believed to feedlily, that they never attempted to fee without themselves masters of Le Bœuf, Venango, Presque-Isle, and Sandusky, on Lake-Erie; of La-Baye, on Lake-Michigan; of St. Joseph, on the River-St. Joseph; of the Miamis, on the River-Miamis; of Ouachtanon, on the Ouabach, and of Michilimackinack.

The garritons of all these forts were very weak, as, from the general peace to lately concluded, it was thought they had nothing to apprehend; and from the nature of their situation, they could not receive, in case of danger, any immediate assistance, either from the colonies, or from each other. The indians, knowing their weak and helpless condition, employed, nevertheless, stratagem as well as force against them. They made it their business to persuade the garrison in every fort, that those in the others had surrendered, before they themselves well knew whether they really had or not; and thus, by making their situation appear desperate, prevailed on many

The news of the loss of so many places, and of the ravages which the Indians still continued to commit, spread consternation through the provinces, and depopulated a considerable part of the frontier. In the space of a few days, the English saw themselves deprived of the fruits of several bloody and expensive campaigns. They were driven from some of the posts, the dispute about which had been the principal cause of the war, as the possession of them was one of the greatest advantages obtained by the peace. Their assairs, however, were not yet quite desperate. The hands into which these places fell were such as could not keep them, like the French; and they were still masters of Fort-Pitt, Niagara, and Detroit.

lution; but could not withfland the irrefiftible force of bayonets, with which the Major rushed in upon them, killing many, and putting the rest to slight. In the mean time, orders having been and to the other two companies to improve the advantage, they were delivered so critically by Captain Basset, and executed with so much celerity and spirit, that the routed 497 merlons of the front attacked, appeared entirely destroyed, though the latter exerted their utmost essorts to repair, in the night, the injuries of the day, by constructing new merlons made with logs of cedar, which they covered with nets of thick ropes, in order to secure themselver from the splinters.

The strength of the English army diminished daily, though it was supported as much as possible by the Admiral and the Commodore, who now landed five hundred more fea.... to erect a battery, on which they were to ferve their own guns. The greatest part of those who remained on board the men of war were employed in making junks, blinds, and mantelets: and the 40th regiment, in preparing the gabions that would be wanted to carry on a fap. On the 19th, all the merlons of the Moro being entirely ruined, Lord Albemarle ordered a Boyau to be immediately constructed all along the sea-shore, protected by gabions filled with cotton, for want of other materials; and a lodgment was made on the glacis. This favourable event gave double life to the operations of the Er zlish; but it was somewhat damped by a full discovery of what their fears had hitherto made them barely suspect, a new and almost insurmountable difficulty. This was the extrac dinary breadth and depth of the ditch, the dimensions of w ich deserve, on that account, to be particularly mentioned. They were as follows:

To fill up fuch a gulph in any expeditious way, appeared utterly impossible, though many romantic proposals were offered for that purpose. Difficult as the work of mining is in a solid rock, it was the only expedient that could be employed on the occasion; and it might have proved impossible even to set about it, if fortunately for the beliegers, a thin ridge of rock had not been left to prevent the fea from beating into the ditch. Favoured by this ridge, the English miners got over, with some difficulty, on the 20th, to the foot of the wall of the Moro; a thing impracticable in every other place, and made their way into the body of the bastion. In the afternoon, a shaft was begun to be funk without the covered way, for another mine to throw the counterfearp into the ditch, in order to fill it up, if possible, should there be a necessity for so doing. The fap was likewife continued along the glacis, and a gun planted in the faliant angle of the covered way.

It now became visible to the Governor of the Havanna, that, unless something was immediately done for the relief of the Moro, it must speedily be reduced. He therefore made every preparation for a strong sortie, and every encouragement was offered to the country militia, mulattoes, and negroes, that could operate on bigotted minds; such as prayers, bulls, pardons, and absolutions. The circumstances of the Spaniards were now become desperate; and in this one exertion of their K k k whole strength, all their hopes were centered. To raise the siege by one decisive blow was now their sole aim, as it was their only resource.

The English, uninformed of the impending danger, continued their fubterraneous labours, which were much impeded by the obstruction of very large stones. However, by two in the morning of the 22d of July, their miners had penetrated about eighteen feet under the face of the bastion of the Moro that was opposite to their right. Their sap too was, in some degree formed before this face, and part of the courtine near the palifades, where the engineers, fearing it should be taken in flank from the town, had directed it should turn off from the glacis, and be carried along the height, from whence the ground, or rather the bare rock, flopes to the fea on one fide, and to the harbour on the other. Colonel Carleton, Brigadier General of the day, disapproved this deviation from the glacis, on which alone there was fufficient earth to carry the work on: But even with this advantage, the work could not but prove both difficult and tedious, lying, as it would, in open view of the batteries in the town, and those of the ships in the harbour; for it would certainly draw the fire of the Spaniards from these places, as it extended from their batteries to the glacis, and which was their only communication: Brigadier Carleton, therefore, fent for Captain Dixon, the engineer of the night, and taking him along the palifades to the left, pointed out that fpot to him as alone proper for that purpofe, fince there the fap might be carried on with ease and fafety; and when made, would command the entrance of the ditch and front attacked. This new plan being approved by Captain Dixon, the workmen were ordered to conform to it.

The appearance of the atmosphere foretelling the approach of day, a ferjeant and twelve men were detached to look into the spur which inclined from the Moro towards the sca, but fomething lower than the level of the rampart from whence it ran out. Their orders were to make no noise, and to observe well that work, the nature of its communication with the body of the fort, and, if poslible, the state of the garrison. Accordingly, after getting over the narrow flip of the rock which led to the entrance of the mine, they descended a ladder placed in a confined notch of the rock, to the edge and level of the fea; from thence they mounted a longer ladder, and endcavoured to get to the top of the parapet. These ladders had been placed the night before by two engineers, who reported, that they had been discovered, and that large stones had been thrown down upon them. But to return to our adventurers; the third man had fearcely reached the top of the ladder, when about twelve Spaniards, who were lying close on their faces, flarted up and gave the alarm. On this the ferjeant returned immediately; but he was fent back again to obey his orders more fully. In this fecond attempt he was foon fired at from the Moro, but received no injury. The firing now extended all round the ramparts of the Moro, and even to the fide of the harbour; which proved, that the numbers within were much greater than those without generally believed. The alarm bell rang in the Moro; the reveille was beat by all the drummers in the town, though the day was but faintly broke on the horizon. The distant posts of the English caught the alarm; yet even those on the glacis could see no cause for all this trepidation, though fomething very ferious, it might be thence inferred, was on the point of execution. Soon after, they heard two or three shots towards their left; and quickly after, a close Kkk2 and 436

and heavy report of musketry, which appeared big with danger from the first instant of its becoming sensible. This report proceeded from the firing made by a body of twenty-five hundred Spaniards, who had croffed the harbour without being perceived on account of the darkness of the night, and the profound filence which they observed. But though the darkness of the night and their profound silence might have concealed their landing, it would have been impossible for them to have advanced undiscovered, if, agreeable to the orders given by Brigadier Carleton at Stuart's post; a detachment had been made, every half hour, during the whole night, to patrole between that post and the water's edge. The neglect of this necessary precaution afforded the Spaniards an opportunity of taking post, and concealing themselves amongst the shrubs at the foot of the hill till the dawn of day, when the tolling of the morning bells was to have been their fignal of attack. But it was, fortunately for the beliegers, precipitated by the alarm given from the Moro.

The firing from this detachment of the Spaniards continuing with great vehemence, the English, who were at work in repairing their batteries, threw down their tools and ran to their arms. Dixon's battery, and another two hundred yards behind it, called Williams's, were first exposed, as being nearest to the harbour. These batteries were each covered by a party of about thirty men, advanced still nearer the harbour into the wood, with about two hundred yards of cleared ground close to the glacis and the side of the harbour between them. Lieutenant Henry, of the thirty-fourth, commanded the party near Dixon's, which was posted in a stone-quarry, as in a kind of covered way. Lieutenant Colonel Stuart, of the ninetieth, commanded the other; and his men were placed behind some fascines, which had been thrown there for other purposes, and an abbattis of a fort of prickly West-India shrub, called by botanists the Prickly Pear, or Ficoides, ran before them just out of the wood. A finall party of twenty-five men was now ordered into the wood, to occupy the intermediate space between these two posts. The guards in the nearest batteries were also small; but one hundred and fifty men, under the command of Major Farmer, of the thirty-fourth, were posted in the battery that had been burned about one hundred yards from Dixon's; his men, however, were under arms before the alarm, and he marched one hundred of them off without delay to support the two first mentioned posts, conformable to the orders he had received a few hours before from Brigadier Carleton, and the Brigadier passing by immediately after, took the remaining fifty; and in a short time was joined by the royal, which had been encamped near the batteries, under a rock, with a view of supporting the advanced guards in case of a fortie, and now came up full speed for that purpose. Upon this, Brigadier Carleton fent back the fifty men of Major Farmer's he had taken with him, as the fire of the Spaniards encreased from one moment to another, and extended towards the fap, which the burned battery in some measure protected. The royal were led directly to Stuart's post, where, meeting with Major Farmer, Brigadier Carleton ordered him to follow that corps; and then conducted the whole close to the left of that post; from whence, after clearing the woods, and turning fhort to the right, in order to gain the flank of the Spaniards, he marched in file directly to a rock, which, floping gently to the land, covered the English from the floating batteries of the Spaniards, as well as those of the town, but to the harbour terminated terminated in a precipice: Such is the ground back to the Spanish redoubt; but advancing to the Moro, it slopes down to the harbour, fo as to afford an easy ascent, and is exposed to the full fire of the Spaniards. It was here the Spaniards landed. ascended the heights, and began their attack on the English, with a view of dislodging them from some of their batteries; in which case, they were to have been supported by the remainder of the Spanish troops, who were under arms ready to crofs the harbour. The English received them with their usual steadiness, and had two or three men wounded by the first fire they received at Stuart's post; but Henry's being taken at once in front and flank, they had feven men killed. The Spaniards then made an attempt on the fap of the English: but timid, as well as ignorant of the fituation of their enemy. they shrunk aside from a galling sire given them by the royal, which lasted about ten or sisteen minutes, if, in such circumflances, the length of time may be gueffed at. The Spaniards, not knowing the real force and fituation of the English, did not, at first, dispose of their numbers to the greatest advantage; and, being taken in flank by the parties of the royal and Farmer's, they were foon driven down the hill in confusion. The foremost of the runaways, seizing on their boats, immediately put off; those left behind shifted from place to place, calling to their friends on the other fide, like people in defpair. The faintness of the light being no finall advantage to troops whose strength did not consist in numbers; the whole force of the English was now ordered to advance. The royal, Major Farmer's corps, and the parties which had been posted in the intermediate space between Stuart's and Henry's posts, pushed forward, forming a curved line of one fingle rank upon the top of the heights, from which their shot, centering on the fugitives, fugitives, galled them exceedingly, whilst the fire in return, from the confused situation of those who made it, proved very defultory and unequal. But notwithstanding this advantage, Brigadier Carleton judged it prudent to draw off his troops, as they had infensibly descended the hill more than half way; and therefore, as the light became stronger, must, if they continued in their prefent fituation, be exposed to the floating batteries, with those of the Punta fort and north bastion; all which were the more formidable, as his men were within the reachof grape flot from them. The Brigadier afterwards passing by Stuart's post, ordered that officer to repeat his orders, and hasten the retreat of the troops that had descended the hill, where a brisk fire was still kept up. Then, having informed himself that all was well at Dixon's, he returned to these troops, and by urging the men to be expeditious in their retreat, he fortunately got them off the heights before a fingle cannon was discharged against them. They had scarce, however, gained the top of the hill, when they perceived, almost within musket-shot, a party of Spaniards which had, by some negligence, been permitted to pass the Spanish redoubt to the affiltance of their friends below, though too late to give themany affiftance. Brigadier Carleton being now wounded by a musket-shot that broke his arm, Major Farmer took the command, attacked and foon drove the Spaniards to the place from whence they came. Then, poffing his men near the edge of the precipice, he gave them an opportunity of firing down, with entire fafety to themselves, into the boats. The whole-English camp being by this time sufficiently acquainted with the nature of their danger, Major General Keppel ordered the brigades on the left, to the Spanish redoubt, and those on the right, to the batteries, and marched himself, with the royal Americans.

Americans, to the right of the English batteries, in order to pursue the fugitives; but most of them had already gained the opposite shore.

Thus ended this fortic of the Spaniards, with the lofs of very few men to the English, if compared with that of the enemy; or if it be considered, that their all was at stake: But then, the worth of those who fell rendered that loss irreparable for the present.

A flag of truce was now hung out by the Spaniards, and a messenger soon after arrived from them, desiring permission to bury their dead, which amounted to four hundred and eighty-sive; whereas those of the English did not exceed eighty-sive. The limited time for this office being expired, the firing was renewed on both sides with the utmost vigour.

This was the last effort made by the city for the relief of the Moro, which yet held out with a fullen resolution, and made no fort of proposal to capitulate. However, the advantages gained by the English in this fally, gave them new hopes; and these hopes became more lively by the arrival, on the 27th of July, of part of the long expected reinforcement from North-America, under Brigadier Burton, which had sailed from New-York on the 11th of June. The Chestersield, and four transports of the fleet which brought it, had the misfortune, on the 24th of July, to run on the Cayo Comsto, at the entrance of the Bahama Straits, on the Cuba side, about an hour before day-light, and were stranded; but neither seamen nor soldiers were lost. This shews the necessity there was for the precautions taken by the Admiral, when he ventured into this dangerous channel.

But

But notwithstanding this reinforcement, the Earl of Albemarle was now obliged to contract the different out-posts, on account of the great fickness amongst the troops. He withdrew Lieutenant General Elliot, with the corps of observation under his command, from Guanamacoa, and posted him at the entrance of the wood above the River Coximer. He likewife drew in the posts under Colonel Howe at Chorera and St. Lazare; nothing of any moment having happened at either of the three places during the whole fiege, except a few skirmishes, occasioned by the excursions of the light troops, and which always terminated to their advantage.

On the 29th of July, the excavation for the mines was ready to be loaded, and would have been loaded accordingly, and fprung, had not the Spaniards brought two floating batteries out of the harbour, and posted them in such a manner as rendered it impracticable, and made the beliegers defer fpringing them from the morning of the 30th, till near two o'clock in the afternoon, when the following difficultions for mounting the breach expected from the explosion were made: Three detachments of twelve men each, commanded by an officer, were to lead the attack; four companies of the Royal and Morgan's, with the fappers, making, in the whole, four hundred and thirty-one men, were to follow, under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Stuart, of the nineticth regiment; next Major General Keppel, with the first brigade; and the other brigades were in readiness to support him. The mines were now fprung. That in the counterfearp had no effect; but that in the bastion, having brought down a part of both faces, made a breach, but fcarcely practicable for one man in front. returned, immediately on its fubfiding, to their posts, and made a continual firing upon the top of the breach, and the polygon of the attack; and though there was no getting even to the foot of this narrow breach, but by filing the men one by one, over the ridge of rock already mentioned, fo fatal to the befieged, and to which, much as the befiegers were already obliged for its giving fecurity to their miners, they were now to be infinitely more fo for rendering the labours of these miners ferviceable. Major General Keppel, relying on the experience and bravery of his troops, loft not a fingle moment in making the affault. He instantly gave them orders to mount; and Lieutenant Charles Forbes, with the utmost alacrity and resolution, led them on. They formed very expeditiously on the top of the breach, and with fuch a happy combination of fpirit and coolness, that the Spaniards, who were drawn up to receive them, and who might have made the affault an affair of great bloodshed, assonished at their countenance, sled on every side. making but one fland behind a small traverse thrown up in one of the bastions; and this was only whilst they discharged their ready loaded arms. They then took to flight again, leaving the English in full possession of the Moro.

In this affault, the English lost two licutenants, with twelve rank and file killed; and one licutenant, with four serjeants, and twenty-three rank and file wounded. The loss of the Spaniards was, one hundred and thirty killed, thirty-seven wounded, three hundred and ten prisoners, and fixteen officers, all on shore; besides two hundred and thirteen drowned or killed in the boats; making, in the whole, seven hundred and six men.

Don Louis de Velasco, the Governor, whose spirited conducthad occasioned so many toilsome hours to the English, and the loss of fo many lives, was mortally wounded; yet their noble generosity dropped a tear of pity over his unfortunate valour. In consequence of a slag of truce, he was removed from the Moro to the Havanna, where he died the next day, regretted by his friends, and lamented even by his enemies. The second in command, the Marquis de Gonzales, fell whilst he was making brave but inessectual efforts to animate and rally his people.

Fort-major, Don Manuel de Cordova.

Fort-adjutant, Don Pedro Menditta.

Second Adjutant, Don Francisco de la Palma.

Engineer, Don Antonio Frebofo.

Regular troops, fix captains, five lieutenants, fix fecond ditto, two hundred and eighty ferjeants, corporals, drums, and private men.

Officers of the marine and feamen: two captains, two lieutenants, three hundred mariners, two officers of the works, two negroe officers, and ninety-four negroes.

The struggle for this fortress continued forty-four days, from the commencement of the first operations against it; and now no time was lost by the conquerors to improve this their so great advantage. The command of the Moro was given to Lieutenant Colonel Dalling, and the strength of it turned against its late masters.

Though the fickness in the English army still raged like a pestilence, yet many new and great works were to be undertaken before any reasonable hope could be formed of a final period to their labours, by gaining the city; therefore, Lord Albemarle, on the 31st of July, repaired to the west-side of the town, to reconnoitre the ground, and thereupon regulate his operations, should it be found necessary to form an attack on that side. On the 2d of August, the second division of the troops, expected from North-America, arrived, except three hundred and fifty-five men, in five transports, which were picked out of the convoy by a fquadron of French men of war, on the 21st of July, near the passage between Niaya Guanoa and the North-Caicos. In the mean time, the Spaniards fired with great fury against the Moro, pointing their guns chiefly at that part of the work which contained the ciflerns, in hopes of letting out the water. On the eafl-fide, General Keppel proceeded to creek fome batteries on the Cavannos, which were ordered by Lord Albemarle; these were to be raised by the joint labour of the sirst and third brigades and the feamen, and to confift of forty-five pieces of cannon. His orders were so well obeyed, that these batteries were ready by the 10th, when Lord Albemarle, being prepared to break ground on the west-side of the town, about ten in the morning of that day, fent, by an aid de camp, with a flag of truce, a fummons to the Governor to furrender on capitulation, and the following letter:

"No one can be more everse to the shedding of blood than I am: to prevent it as much as in my power, I desire your Excellency to consider, that, however my disposition may incline to humanity, it may not be possible to extend its influence to the preservation of your troops in a manner they so recently experienced at the reduction of the Moro, where the same generous principle in the British troops restrained them from acts of cruelty, when the custom of war would have authorised and justified their putting to the sword the garrison of a forteress taken by storm.

"I am master of the Cavannos and the Moro, which your Excellency, in a letter to Don Louis de Velasco, acknowledges to be the key to the Havanna. Add to this advantage, that of possessing the port of Mariel, where the Admiral can anchor with all his sleet, should the weather induce him to quit his present station; and I have a considerable army on this side of the town, which grows stronger by daily reinforcements.

"The officer entrufted with this letter is one of my aids de camp. His orders are to wait for your Excellency's answer.

"Should your Excellency want passports or escorts for the ladies who are at present in the town, I shall most readily send them to you, being very desirous to shew you, upon all occasions, how truly I am, Your Excellency's, &c. &c. &c.

1762.

To this letter, the Governor, after keeping the bearer till between three and four in the afternoon, returned the following answer, with the express verbal declaration, that he would defend the town to the last extremity.

MY LORD,

Havanna, August 10th, 1762.

"I cannot agree to the proposal your Excellency makes in your letter of this day, because the town, from its construction and its present condition, is such, as will admit of a long defence, and even assorbed me hopes of preventing your success. In this my constant care and endeavours, as well as my most earnest wishes, center; nor do they admit of any diminution by the letter to Don Louis de Velasco, on which your Excellency lays such stress; the only aim of that letter being, to make him sensible of the importance of the post he commanded, as it, no doubt, contributed to the defence and security of the body of the place.

- " I am very thankful for your Excellency's offer of passports for the ladies in the town.
- " I remain perfectly well disposed to oblige your Excellency, and pray to God to preserve you in health many years.
- " My Lord, I kifs your Excellency's hand, and remain your most attentive and affured fervant.

JUAN DE PRADO."

On the receipt of this letter, it was determined, that the next morning should convince the Governor that the menaces employed against him were not an empty boast. The batteries, which consisted of forty-five pieces of cannon and eight mor-

rars, were opened at day-break, by the fignal of a rocket. Their advantageous position alone rendered their fire truly formidable; but it was, besides, poured in on all sides with such continued and irrefiftible fury, that the Punta was filenced between nine and ten o'clock; and the north bastion, in a greatmeasure, about an hour after, its firing being reduced to now and then a fhot or two. At length, about three o'clock, flags of truce were hung out all round the town, and on board the Admiral's ship; and one, soon after, arrived at the English headquarters, with the town-major and an interpreter. Upon this, Sir George Pococke was immediately fent to, and a suspension of hostilities was agreed upon till the 12th at noon. During this time, there arose some disputes between the different commanding officers with regard to the capitulation; but they were at last settled; and on the 12th, the articles were figned and On the 14th, about noon, General Keppel's corps, the General being at that time very ill himfelf, took possession of the Punta-gate and bastion, and Brigadier Howe of the land-gate; the English colours were hoisted on both, and Captain Duncan likewife took possession of the men of war in the harbour, the Spaniards having evacuated them in confequence of the capitulation, which was as follows:

Articles of Capitulation agreed upon between Sir George Pococke, Knight of the Bath, and the Earl of Albemarle; and the Marquis del Real-Transporte, Commander-in-chief of the squadron of his Catholic Masiefly, and Don Juan de Prado, Governor of the Havanna; for the surrender of the city and all its dependencies, with all the Spanish ships in the harbour.

PRELIMINARY ARTICLE. Fort-la-Punta, and the land-gate, shall be delivered to his Britannic Majesty's troops to-morrow morning.

morning, the 13th August, at twelve o'clock; at which time it is expected the following articles of capitulation shall be signed and ratisfied.

I. The garrison, consisting of the infantry, artillery-men, and dragoons, the different militia of the towns in this island, shall march out of the land-gate the 20th instant, provided in that time no relief arrives, so as to raise the siege, with all the military honours, arms shouldered, drums beating, colours slying, six field-pieces, with twelve rounds each, and as many rounds to each foldier. The regiments shall take out with them their military chests; and the Governor shall have six covered waggons, which are not to be examined upon any pretence whatever.

Answer. The garrison, consisting of the regular troops, the dragoons dismounted, (leaving their horses for his Britannic Majesty's service) in consideration of the gallant defence of the Moro fort and the Havanna, shall march out of the Puntagate, with two pieces of cannon, and six rounds for each gun, and the same number for each foldier, drums beating, colours slying, and all the honours of war. The military chest resused. The Governor will be allowed as many boats as are necessary to transport his baggage and effects on board the ship destined for him. The militia without the town, as well as those within, to deliver up their arms to the British commissary appointed to receive them.

II. That the garrifon shall be allowed to take out of this city all their effects, and transport themselves with them to another part of the island; for which purpose there shall be allowed and permitted to come freely into the said city, all the beasts of burthen and carts: And this article is to extend to, and include, all other officers belonging to his Majesty employed in the administration of justice, the intendant of marine, the commissary of war, and the treasurer-general, who are to have the choice of going out of the city.

Answer. The officers of the above garrison will be allowed to carry with them all their private effects and money, on board the ships which will be provided at the expence of his Britannic Majesty, to transport the garrison to the nearest part of Old Spain. The intendant of marine, commissary of war, and those employed in the management of his Catholic Majesty's revenues, as soon as they have delivered over their accounts, shall have liberty to leave the island, if they defire it.

III. That the marines, and the ships crews in this harbour, who have ferved on shore, shall obtain, on their going out, the fame honours as the garrifon of the city, and shall proceed with those honours on board the said ships, that they may, together with their Commander-in-Chief, Don Guitieres de Heveia, Marquis del Real Transporte, fail in their faid thips. as foon as the port is open, with all their effects and money, in order to proceed to some other port belonging to the dominions of Spain; in doing which, they will oblige themfelves, that, during their navigation to their defigned port, they will not attack any fquadron or fingle fhip belonging to his Pattannic Majesty or his allies, nor any merchant veffels belonging to his fubjects: On the other hand, they are not to be attacked by any fquadron or fingle fhip belonging to his Britannic Majesty, or any of his allies. Likewise, liberty shall be given to go on board the said ships, to the aforementioned troops and ships crews, with their officers, Mmm

XIII. That to any of the aforesaid inhabitants of this city. who should not chuse to stay, it shall be permitted them to take out their property and riches in such specie as should be most convenient to them, and to dispose of their estates. or to leave them under the administration of others, and to transport themselves with them, to such of his Catholic Majefty's dominions as they fhall chuse, granting them four years to execute the same, and vessels to transport them, either upon purchase or on freight, with the necessary passports, and authority to bear arms against the Moors and Turks, upon this express condition, that they shall not use them against his Britannic Majefly's subjects or his allies; and that this and the two foregoing articles are to comprehend and admit to be included all his Catholic Majefty's ministers and officers. as well civil as marine and military, who are married and established with families and estates in this city, in order that they may obtain the fame privileges as the other inhabitants.

Answer. The inhabitants will be allowed to dispose of, and remove their effects to any part of the king of Spain's dominions in vessels at their own expense, for which they will have proper passports. It is understood, that such officers as have property in this island, shall be allowed the same indulgence as to the rest of the inhabitants.

XIV. That to these people no ill consequence shall arise on account of having taken up arms, owing to their sidelity, and their being inlisted in the militia, on account of the necessity of war; neither shall the English troops be permitted to plunder; but, on the contrary, they shall completely enjoy enjoy their rights and prerogatives as other subjects of his Britannic Majesty, allowing them to return without the least hindrance or impediment from the country into the city, with all their families, equipages and effects, as they went out of the city on account of this invasion, and who are to be comprehended in the present articles; and that neither of them shall be incommoded with having troops quartered in their houses, but that they shall be lodged in particular quarters, as it has been practised during the Spanish government.

GRANTED; except that in cases of necessity, quartering the troops must be left to the direction of the governor. All the King's slaves are to be delivered up to the persons appointed to receive them.

XV. That the effects detained in this city, belonging to the merchants at Cadiz, which have arrived here in the different register ships, and in which are interested all the European nations, a sufficient passport shall be granted to the supercargoes thereof, that they may freely remit the same with the register ships, without running the risk of being insulted in their passage.

REFUSED.

XVI. That those civil, or other officers, who have had charge of the management of the administration and distribution of the royal treasure, or any other affair of a peculiar nature from his Catholic Majesty, are to be left with the free use of all those papers which concern the discharge of their duty, with free liberty to carry them to Spain for that purpose; and the same shall be understood with the managers of the royal company established in this city.

THUS did this conquest prove the heaviest blow, in itself, and in its confequences the most decisive, of any that had been given fince the commencement of the prefent hostilities between fo many great powers. In the acquisition of the Havanna were combined all the advantages that could be procured in war. It was a military victory of the first magnitude; it was equal to the greatest naval victory by its effects on the marine of the Spaniards, who loft on that occasion a whole fleet. The vail quantity of tobacco and fugar, collected at the Havanna on the Spanish monarch's account, fold on the spot, exclusive of the flips and merchandize fent to, and fold in England, for feven hundred thousand pounds, which was divided amongst the conquerors in the proportion settled for the divifion of the plunder on the expedition of Lord Catheart and Admiral Vernon, if they had fucceeded, when they went against Carthagena.

From their first landing to the 13th of August, this important conquest cost the English, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, including those who died, two thousand seven hundred and fixty-four men. History, perhaps, does not record a siege with such a variety of difficulties to retard the approaches, as what attended the affailants of the Moro-castle. Not only there was searce a spit of earth near any of the intended batteries, as we have already taken notice; but the cutting down, binding up, and carrying the vast quantities of sascines, which it was necessary to substitute, proved a work of infinite labour; nay, the earth necessary to give stability and resislance to the sascines, was not to be obtained but by scratching it from between the crevices of rocks,

Though a great part of the provisions brought from England had been spoiled by the heat of the climate, the most distressing circumstance of the campaign was the scarcity of water. Of the valt catalogue of human ills, thirst is the most intolerable. On this occasion, it soon caused the tongue to fwell, extend itself without the lips, and become black as in a flate of mortification; then the whole frame became a prey to the most exeruciating agonics, till death at length intervened, and gave the unhappy fufferer relief. In this way, hundreds refigned themselves to eternity. A greater number fell victims to a putrid fever. From the appearance of perfect health, three or four flort hours robbed them of existence. Many there were, who endured a loathfome difease for days, nay weeks together, living in a state of putrefaction, their bodies full of vermin, and almost eaten away before the spark of life was extinguished. The carrion crows of the country kept conflantly hovering over the graves, which rather hid than buried the dead, and frequently feratched away the feanty earth, leaving in every mangled corpfe a spectacle of unspeakable loathsomeness and terror to those, who, by being engaged in the fame enterprife, were exposed to the fame fate. Hundreds of carcafes were feen floating on the ocean: Yet all these accumulated horrors damped not the ardour of the furvivors. Used to conquest, and to brave every kind of danger, every one exerted himfelf with fuch a particular aim to victory, as if the whole enterprife depended on his fingle arm.

Having

Having faid thus much in praise of the bravery and patience of the English, candour requires we should add, that the Spaniards were far from being descient in point of valour; and had their conduct been equal, it is more than probable, that the English had never obtained the noblest wreath of victory, that ever graced the brow of a conqueror in this quarter of the world. But, perhaps, the reader will be curious to know how the principal officers among them were received and treated by their sovereign on their arrival in Old Spain.

Don Juan de Prado, Governor of the Havanna; Don Gutiriez de Heveia, Marquis del Real Transporte, the Admiral; Viscount Superunda, Lieutenant General of his Majesty's forces, and late Viceroy of Peru, and Don Diego Tavarez, late Governor of Carthagena, being all tried by a council of war at Madrid for their behaviour on this occasion, were punished with sequestration of their estates, and banishment forty leagues from the court, during his Majesty's pleasure.

The fentence against Don Juan de Prado is in force. Don Gutiriez de Heveia was pardoned in consequence of the merit of his father-in-law, the Marquis de la Vitoria, Commander-in-Chief of the Spanish navy. Don Diego Tavarez was not only pardoned, but since promoted to the command of the Spanish lines at St. Rocque, the barrier against Gibraltar, which he still holds. Viscount Superunda was offered a pardon; but refused it, declaring he could not accuse himself of any crime. He is since dead.

As to Don Louis de Velasco, his family was ennobled; his eldest son created Viscount Moro, and a standing order made, that ever after, there should be a ship in the Spanish navy called the Velasco.

But to return to the Havanna; the first care of the Earl of Albemarle, on being put in possession of the place, was to see the articles of the capitulation punctually performed on both sides; restore order amongst the inhabitants; issue such orders for their conduct, and that of their conquerors, as might effectually prevent all disputes between them; particularly the lower classes, and the soldiers and failors; to receive the town-records; the accounts of the stores civil and military; the treasures; the merchandise; every thing, in short, which his high station and late success gave him a right to take cognizance of.

The Spanish troops were then embarked, agreeable to the capitulation, for Old Spain. Admiral Sir George Pococke ordered the Sutherland and the Dover to be sitted up as slags of truce, to accommodate the Governor of the Havanna, the Spanish Admiral, the Viceroy of Peru, and the Governor of Carthagena; the garrison were put on board transports.

The Earl of Albemarle being expressly ordered, when the Havanna fervice should be over, to return the same number of troops to North-America that he might receive from thence, he embarked the fifth brigade for that continent; but most of them died in the passage, or in the hospitals, immediately on their arrival; and the artillery sent with them was entirely lost at fea. The troops which remained were not much more fortunate; being, by this time, fo reduced by fickness, that even feven hundred could not be mustered in a condition to do duty. In this fituation, the utmost vigilance was necessary to prevent quarrels between the conquerors and the conquered, and keep the latter in awe; especially, as some of the districts, which Don Juan de Prado thought to have included in the capitulation, refused to accede to it, as not being within the jurisdiction of the Governor of the Havanna.

If we have not given as minute a detail of the operations of this important flege, as that which was transmitted to the British ministers, signed by the chief Engineer; but which, we have the greatest reason to believe the General never saw, till he arrived in England, it is to avoid the confusion which every where occurs in that account: But though we have aimed at clearness in the relation of this glorious atchievement. we hope we shall not be found to have omitted any circumflance which might in the least have contributed to the brilliant fuccess of the English arms. After all, it will scarce be credited by future ages, that an army of Europeans perfilled, for two months and eight days together, in the fiege of a fortress situated in the hottest climate of the torrid zone, and during the hottest season of that climate. Be posterity therefore farther informed, that during the whole of this fiege, there fablished such a perfect harmony between the land and fea-fervices, with fuch an extraordinary degree of good-will in the inferior officers and common men, to execute the orders of their Admiral and General, that both owed their fuccess to fuch patriotic endeavours.

Every necessary disposition having been made by the Admiral and the General in their respective departments, Lord Albemarle conferred on the Honourable Major-General Keppel, the government of the town; and Sir George Pococke detached the Honourable Commodore Keppel, with a squadron on a cruize: Soon after the Admiral sailed for England, leaving Captain Knight of the Belle-isle, with three ships of the line, to command at the Havanna. About six weeks after, Lord Albemarle also sailed for England, where both the Admiral and the General arrived the beginning of the year 1763.

By the vigilance of Commodore Keppel, he took a whole fleet of merchantmen off St. François: The entire command of the fhips in these seas, by the absence of Sir George Pococke, devolving on the Commodore, by virtue of the special commission we have already mentioned, and advice being received that a peace was concluded between England and Spain, he repaired to the Havanna, in order to superintend the embarkation of the troops ordered to Europe, after which he proceeded on the Jamaica station. The troops being at sea, were met by an express, ordering General Keppel to send some regiments to reinforce the army under Sir Jessey Amherst in North-America, on account of some commotions having arisen amongst the Indians on that continent.

With the troops that arrived from Old-Spain to garrison the Havanna, the orders came for the evacuation of that place in favour of the Spaniards: In consequence of these orders, without any directly from the British minister, the Spaniards retook possession of the most valuable harbour in the West-Indies.

HAVING been so long employed in recording the glorious atchievements of the British troops, it is with great reluctance we now find ourselves obliged to recite an event that must, for a moment, cast a gloom over the retrospect of so many brilliant conquests. But even in this instance, fortune seems to have been sickle, only to increase the credit of the British arms, and to afford another example, that the ardour of youth, tempered with judgment, will oftener command success in enterprise, than timid caution and inactive discretion, the general companions of old age.

France, by this time, had been humbled in every quarter of the world; she had received so many checks, that, almost driven to despair, shame urged her to the last exertion of her dying power. This was, to attack the defenceless Island of Newfoundland; and she accordingly sitted out a squadron for that purpose, consisting of

Le Robuste, 74 guns, La Garonne, 44 guns,

L'Eveillé, - 64 La Licorne, 30 and a bombketch.

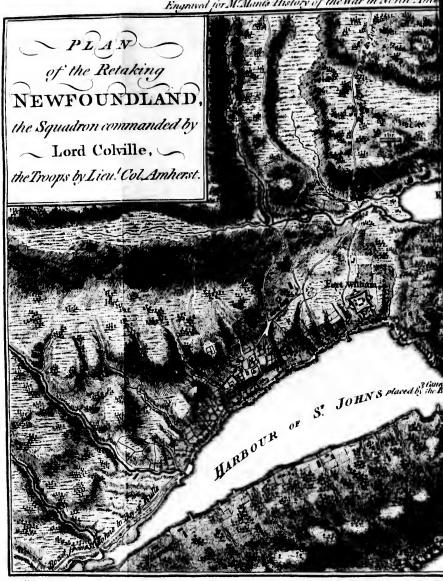

This fquadron was commanded by M. de Terney, who had fifteen hundred land-forces on board, under the orders of the Count de Hauffonville.

On the 24th of June, the French troops landed in the Bay of Bulls without opposition; and, on the 27th, obliged the garrison of St. John's, consisting of about fixty men, to surrender prisoners during the war, on a promise of security for their possessions and esseets. The Grammont being taken in the harbour, her crew was included in the above agreement. After the French had taken possession of the fort, they began to repair the fortifications; but destroyed every thing that belonged to the sishery, and burnt a great number of vessels in the north and south harbours; by which, indeed, private property alone was injured, but to so great a degree, that many individuals were ruined by it.

As foon as General Amherst received the news of this misfortune, he, without waiting for orders from the ministry, by which a season might be lost, and the place rendered more tenable by its present possessions, planned an attack to recover it. Actuated by that spirit of enterprise which had so eminently distinguished him during the campaigns of 1758, 1759, and 1760, he formed a few of the surviving troops, which had just arrived from the West-Indies, with some provincials, into a corps for this purpose, and entrusted the command of them to his brother, Lieutenant Colonel William Amherst. Accordingly, this gentleman embarked at New-York, on the 15th of August, on board the James transport, with five others, and one victualling thip; and next day failed out of the hook, without any convoy, for Halifax, there to join Lord Colville. and to take in some more troops, and from thence proceed to Louisbourg with his Lordship, for a farther reinforcement. On the 26th, Colonel Amherst arrived at Halifax; but Lord Colville had already left the place. The Colonel, however, thought it would be proper to embark the troops that were to accompany him from thence, and from Louisbourg, and follow his Lordship, who was gone with one ship of the line and a frigate, to reconnoitre the coast of Newfoundland. In confequence of this resolution, the fleet was ready to fail from Halifax by the 29th; but contrary winds prevented its getting out of the harbour till the 1st of September. On the 5th, it arrived at Louisbourg; and the next day, the troops that were to be taken from the garrifon embarked, when the land-forces and artillery of the armament were as follows:

On the 7th in the morning, Colonel Amherst put to sea again, and on the 1th joined Lord Colville, a few leagues to the south of St. John's. The Colonel had designed to land his troops at Kitty-Vitty; but by the intelligence he received from Lord Colville, sound it impracticable, in consequence of its being a very narrow entrance, and the French having entirely stopped it up, by sinking shallops in the channel; he therefore sixed on Torbay, about three leagues off, for that purpose; and indeed, it was now the only place near St. John's that troops could land at. Accordingly, the transports were sent into that harbour, under the protection of the Syren; but it was late at night on the 12th, before they all came to an anchor.

Colonel Amherst, with Captain Douglas of the navy, took a view of the coast, and discovered a very proper beach to land upon. But it blew so hard that night, that one of the transports, with the provincial light infantry on board, was driven out to sea. The remainder of the troops landed the next day, with very little opposition, at the bottom of a bay, from whence there was a path to St. John's. The light infantry of the regulars, who got first on shore, giving the French a sire, the latter immediately retired towards St. John's; upon which the whole of this little army marched on, for about four miles, through a very thick wood, and over very bad ground, when Captain Macdonald's light infantry, which was in front, came up with fome of the party which had been driven from the landing-place, but lay now concealed in the wood, and fired on the Captain as foon as he got within their reach; but part of his corps rufhed in upon them too fuddenly to give them time for another discharge, took three prisoners, and put the rest to slight.

The country now opening, the army marched to the left of Kitty-Vitty, to take possession of that pass; it being necessary to force a communication for the landing of the artillery and flores, as it was impracticable to get them up the roads, by which the army had advanced. When the right was close to Kitty-Vitty, the French fired on them from a hill on the oppofite fide. Colonel Amherst, therefore, fent a party up a rock, which commanded the paffage over; and, under cover of the fire made by the light infantry companies of the Royal and Montgomery's, fupported by the grenadiers of the former, passed over; drove the enemy, who had come down the hill, up again; and purfued them, on that fide, towards St. John's. But another body of the French being now perceived in their way to support the former, Major Sutherland, with the remainder of the first battalion, was immediately ordered over to attack them. This determined the enemy to retreat; by which Colonel Amherst had time to take post before it was dark. The troops, however, lay on their arms all night. Captain Mackenzie, who commanded Montgomery's light infantry, was mortally wounded in this affair; and ten of the enemy were taken prisoners. On the 14th, the channel, in which the enemy had funk the shallops, was cleared; but they still occupied a breaft-work which commanded the entrance and a battery, though not quite finished. Lieutenant Colonel Tuliken, who had been hurt by a fall, and left on board, joined the army

The French were still in possession of two very high and sleep hills; one in the front of the advanced post, from whence they fired on the guards, and the other nearer to St. John's. These two hills, in all appearance, commanded the whole ground from Kitty-Vitty to St. John's. As, therefore, it was necessary to proceed on this fide, in order to fecure the landing at Kitty-Vitty, on the 17th, just before break of day, Colonel Amherst ordered Captain Macdonald's corps of light infantry, and the provincial light infantry, which were now arrived, supported by the advanced posts, to endeavour to surprise the enemy on the hills. Captain Macdonald had the good fortune to pass their centries and advanced guards unobserved, and was first discovered by their main body on the hills, as he was scaling the rocks. However, they did not fire on him till he had gained the fummit, when they gave way on his returning it. Lieutenant Schuyler, and four rank and file were killed on this occasion; Captain Macdonald, and eighteen rank and file were wounded. The French had three companies of grenadiers at this post, with two pickets, commanded by M. Belcombe, Lieutenant Colonel, and the fecond in command. This gentleman and a Captain of grenadiers were wounded; his lieutenant and feveral foldiers were killed; and the wounded captain and thirteen private men were taken prifoners. The French had one mortar here, with which they threw fome shells in the night; a fix pounder not mounted, and two wall-pieces.

As these hills command the harbour, Colonel Amherst, on the 16th, marched to the hill nearest to St. John's, which the French

French had abandoned, though not without leaving a guard at the post of Kitty-Vitty, on the other side. Some provisions, artillery, and other stores were landed this day. In the preceding night, the French sleet, favoured by a fog, put to sea. On the 17th, a mortar battery was completed, and a battery begun for four twenty-four pounders and two twelve pounders, about sive hundred yards from the fort, and a road made for bringing up the artillery from the landing-place. At night the mortar battery was opened with one eight inch mortar, six cohorns, and six royals; she enemy, all the while, keeping a brisk sire, and throwing many shells from the fort.

On the 16th, Colonel Amherst fummoned the Governor to furrender, by the following letter, which produced a correfpondence that ended in a capitulation.

SIR, Camp before St. John's, Sept. 17th, 1762.

"Humanity directs me to acquaint you of my firm intention. I know the miferable flate your garrifon is left in, and am fully informed of your defign of blowing up the fort, on quitting it; but have a care; for I have taken measures effectually to cut off your retreat: and so sure as a match is put to the train, every man in the garrifon shall be put to the sword. I must have immediate possession of the fort, in the state it is now in, or expect the consequences. I give you half an hour to think of it. I have the honour to be,

" I do not thirst for the blood of the garrison; but you must determine quickly, or expect the consequences; for this is my final determination. I am,

SIR.

Your most obedient humble fervant,
Wm. Amherst."

The Count d'Haussonville's reply.

Sept. 18th, 1762.

"I have received, Sir, your letter, which you did me the honour to write me. I am equally averse with yourself to the essuance of blood. I consent to surrender the fort in good condition, as I have already acquainted you, if the terms I herewith inclose are granted to my troops. I have the honour to be, SIR.

Your most humble and most obedient servant,
THE COUNT D'HAUSSONVILLE."

Terms of Capitulation required by the garrifon of St. John's, and the troops in general in that place.

- I. The French troops shall surrender prisoners of war. Granted.
- II. The commissioned and non-commissioned officers shall keep their arms, to be the better able to keep their men in order.

  Granted.
- III. Good fhips shall be allowed the officers, grenadiers, foldiers, wounded as well as not wounded, within a month, to transport them to France, and land them on the coasts of Britanny.

  GRANTED; Lord Colville will, of course, embark them as soon as he possibly can.

LE COMTE D'HAUSSONVILLE.

This is to be figured by Lord Colville; but it will remain at prefent, as afterwards, in full force.

It appears by this capitulation, that Lord Colville was not prefent at the making or concluding of it. He was then at fea, and the wind would not permit his Lordship to stand in. Colonel Amherst, therefore, that retime should be lest in so advanced a season, took on himself to determine with regard to the terms that should be granted to the garrison of St. John's, and had the pleasure to find, on Lord Colville's return, that his Lordship approved them.

The fpirit and perfeverance of the troops employed on this occasion, exceeded the most fanguine hopes, even of their own officers, who knew them best. On their alacrity entirely depended the recovery of this valuable island, before the bad feason set in; and Colonel Amherst's endeavours to keep alive that spirit were effectually seconded by Colonel Tuliken.

Captain Macdonald was to have proceeded to England with an account of this advantage; but his wound, a broken leg, not being thought fufficiently healed for that purpose, Captain Campbell, of the twenty-second regiment, was named to replace him, and carry the colours the French had hoisted on the fort of St. John's,

The retaking of Newfoundland, a place of so much consequence to the mercantile part of England, terminated the war between the English and the French in this quarter of the world. The armies brought into the field by the former, during the first campaigns, were disgraced by knavery, ignorance, or timidity. But, happily for Britain, in 1758, a period was put to misconduct; and, from that auspicious æra, in which General Amherst was honoured with the command of the British arms in North-America, a succession of rapid conquests attended their efforts. Wherever the British colours were seen to sly, there victory generally followed; and, at length, the whole power of the French on the Continent of North-America yielded to the superior courage of the British soldiers, and the great abilities of their commanders.

A cessation of arms, which now took place, was, in a short time, followed by a definitive treaty. This treaty was signed at Versailles, on the 10th day of February 1763, and restored peace to France, Spain, and England, in every quarter of the globe.

THE general peace, which thus put an end to a most extenfive and bloody war, was juffly deemed, by the bulk of mankind, a happy event. But the British subjects in North-America thought they had particular reason to rejoice at it, as it left the French fo little power in their neighbourhood, and determined by it the boundaries between the two nations, with the greatest accuracy and precision. In this, however, they foon found themselves greatly mistaken. They did not fufficiently confider the jealous temper of the Indians included within these bounds, nor the opportunity which the French, by retaining possession of New-Orleans, and the joint navigation of the Mississippi, still had of inflaming that jealousy. What alarmed them most was the chains of forts running through their country, in almost every direction; especially those built on their lakes, and on the feveral flraits between them. Those military establishments, they looked upon as the embryos of fo many new colonies, by which, fooner or later, they would be elbowed out of the land of their forefathers; and a very imprudent imprudent omission of the usual presents on our parts, contributed not a little to confirm these apprehensions, which, if not originally excited, were, there is great reason to believe, greatly increased by the French. That nation, independent of any views it might have of recovering the country which it had lately ceded to the English, could not but regret the loss of the gainful trade it had fo long before that period, carriedon with the natives; and the likeliest method to get once more possession of this trade, was to sow and cultivate the seeds of diffention between the Indians and their new allies. They therefore taught the former to consider the latter in the light of masters, and even tyrants, rather than friends; and it must be owned, that the general behaviour of the French to the Indians, was so very different from that of the English, as to give all the weight the French could wish to those lessons; the effects of which, accordingly, became every day more and more visible. We mention these particulars, not only to recommend the manner in which the French treat the Indians as highly deferving to be imitated by us; but to wear out of the minds of fuch of our deluded countrymen as are not entirely destitute of good sense and humanity, the prejudices conceived against an innocent, much abused, and once happy people, who, with all their fimplicity, are no ftrangers to the first principles of morality; and, accordingly, entertain as deep a fense of the justice, benevolence, and condescension of their former friends, the French, as they do of the injuffice, cruelty, and infolence, with which they have been used by their pretent fellow-fubjects, the English.

But it may be proper to give an inflance or two of this difference. The French court encouraged marriages between its fubjects.

fubjects and Indian women; and this not only proved a great means of civilizing the nations to which the latter belonged; but effectually ferved to procure the former admiffion into their councils, and thereby a thorough knowledge of all their most fecret designs, from the formation of them; and this procedure so entirely won their affections, that to this very hour, the favages say, the French and they are one people.

Another thing, which does ftill greater honour to the policy and humanity of the French government, was their flrictly forbidding the fale of fpirituous liquors to the Indians, under pain of not being absolved by any clergyman but the bishop: this prevented many mischiefs amongst these unfortunate tribes, who have fallen to our lot by the last peace. To taste spirits and get drunk, is the fame thing with the Indians; and from drunkenness arises, among them, all disorders. There is nothing, let it be ever fo shocking and abominable, of which an intoxicated Indian is not capable; nav, which he will not madly endeavour to commit; and, unfortunately, there is no advantage which the English traders scruple to take of them in that deplorable condition. They impose on the men both in buying and felling, abuse their wives and daughters, and other female relations; and go yet greater lengths, if poslible, in every other species of wickedness. Where is the wonder then, if we fo often find the Indians on our backs, without being able to particularife the motives of their infurrection: We might very well wonder if it were otherwife. Thus, the bare behaviour of a few diffolute pedlars has often, without any other affignable cause, cost the lives of many of our most inosfensive and industrious fellow-subjects, who are just emerging from the gloom of want and toil, into the fair prospect of case and affluence.

There

No people on the face of the earth are fuller of the idea of liberty, than the North-American Indians. The very thoughts of that flavery which they were made to expect under the English, was enough to determine them to enter into every propofal the French could offer. It was with the utmost regret the favages had fo lately parted with the garrifons of that nation, which had been flationed amongst them; and with proportionable jealoufy and aversion they received the English. Yet we foolifhly flattered ourfelves, that this regret would wear out with time, but we never took the proper fleps to contribute to fo defirable an end; and this omiflion was accompanied with a mistake productive of a still greater. We vainly imagined, that however hoftile the dispositions of the favages might be, they could not, for want of afliftance from the French, do us any great mischief; and therefore, did not fufficiently provide against any attack from them. Our hopes proved as vain and fhort-lived, as they had been fanguine and premature; and the storm arose from that quarter from which we least expected it.

It foon appeared, that at the very time we were representing the Indians to ourselves as completely subdued, and perfectly obedient to our power, they were bufy in planning the destruction, not only of our most infignificant and remote forts, but our most important and central settlements. They had collected abundance of fmall arms and ammunition, and every other necessary fuch a hostile and general design could suggest; and then proceeded to the execution of it, with a degree of activity and refolution, fuch as till this occasion they had never before discovered. The Shawanese and Delawares, in particular, the original fehemers of this war, were fo eager to begin it, that it was with much difficulty they could be prevailed upon to refrain refrain from hostilities till their confederates were ready to enter into action with them. Their plan was to make a general and fudden attack upon the frontiers, in the height of the harvest, destroying all the fruits of the earth with man and beaft, as far as they could penetrate; and then fall on the advanced posts, intercept the convoys coming to them, and cut off their communication with the provinces. By way of prelude to this horrid tragedy, they maffacred the traders whom they had invited amongst them, and seized on their effects. Thus flushed with blood, their scalping parties advanced to the frontiers of Pennfylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, marking their way with devastation and slaughter, and every where committing the most horrid cruelties. main bodies then attacked all our out-posts, though at a great diffance from each other, almost at the same instant, and made themselves masters of Le Bouf, Venango, Presque-Isle, and Sanduíky, on Lake-Erie; of La-Baye, on Lake-Michigan; of St. Joseph, on the River St. Joseph; of the Miamis, on the River-Miamis; of Ouachtanon, on the Ouabach, and of Michilimackinack.

The garrifons of all these forts were very weak, as, from the general peace so lately concluded, it was thought they had nothing to apprehend; and from the nature of their situation, they could not receive, in case of danger, any immediate assistance, either from the colonies, or from each other. The sindians, knowing their weak and helpless condition, employed, nevertheless, stratagem as well as force against them. They made it their business to persuade the garrison in every fort, that those in the others had surrendered, before they themselves well knew whether they really had or not; and thus, by making their situation appear desperate, prevailed on many many of them to furrender on terms, which they never intended to observe. But what contributed more than any thing else to the lofs of these places, was their being most unaccountably left to depend for their provisions on the Indians in their neighbourhood; a circumstance alone fussicient to tempt the Indians to attack them. Prefque-Isle, which was the most tenable in itself, and flood best for relief, was one of those which furrendered by capitulation. The perfidy of the favages with regard to all former capitulations between them and the English, should have made the commanding officer risk every thing, as the fole chance of faving those under him from the fealping-knife, with which they were cruelly butchered, a very few excepted, amongst whom the commanding officer had the good fortune to make one.

The news of the loss of fo many places, and of the ravages which the Indians still continued to commit, spread consternation through the provinces, and depopulated a confiderable part of the frontier. In the space of a few days, the English faw themselves deprived of the fruits of several bloody and expensive campaigns. They were driven from some of the posts, the dispute about which had been the principal cause of the war, as the possession of them was one of the greatest advantages obtained by the peace. Their affairs, however, were not yet quite desperate. The hands into which these places fell were fuch as could not keep them, like the French; and they were flill mafters of Fort-Pitt, Niagara, and Detroit.

These forts, besides being much larger as well as better constructed than the rest, had sufficient garrisons to sustain a fiege of fome continuance. Niagara was not closely attacked; but fome feattering parties infelled the communication between it and Lake-Erie, on which feveral people were killed. Fort-Pitt and Detroit were indeed closely blockaded: but they were both defended with equal vigilance and bravery; the latter, in particular, by Major Gladwin, against the boldest leader among the favages, and the united efforts of all those inhabiting the banks of the Upper-Lakes.

The Indians had entirely invested Fort-Pitt, and had so effectually cut off the communication between it and every other place, as made it impossible for the garrison either to fend or receive any intelligence; they even took post under the banks of both rivers, near the ramparts, and there remained, with the most incredible patience, many days together, keeping upon the place a continual fire of small arms intermixed with heavy showers of lighted arrows. Too eager to wait till famine should compel the garrifon to furrender, they hoped to effect their purpose by wearing them down with constant fatigue, and dellroying by fire every place that could afford them the least fhelter.

Captain Ecuyer, who commanded in this fort, wanted almost as many necessaries to fustain a regular siege, as the Indians did to form one. Befides, his works had been greatly damaged by the overflowing of the neighbouring rivers: but he, with great judgment, employed every method to conquer these inconveniencies; and, feconded by those who had fled to him for protection, took every possible step, not only to maintain his post, but repulse the enemy.

Sir Jeffrey Amherst now commanded in America; but he was a commander almost without any troops to obey him. The finest army, for its numbers, in the whole world; that army which which had conquered the French territories in this quarter of the globe, was now quite melted down by the West-India service, insomuch that there scarce remained a sufficiency of effective men for the common garrison duty. Besides, the shattered remains of the seventy-seventh and eightieth regiments were at this very time actually reduced or disbanded, and ordered for England to be discharged there. But considering the critical situation of affairs, and the necessity there was of putting an immediate stop to the horrid cruelties which the savages were every where committing, he thought it his duty to detain them; and sending invalids to the nearer garrisons to relieve such troops as were more sit for active service, he ordered the forty-second and part of the seventy-seventh regiment to Fort-Pitt. The sifty-sisth was at Ontario, the forty-sixth at Niagara, and the eightieth at Detroit.

The fewness of his troops put it out of the General's power to think so soon of re-establishing the more distant posts: He, therefore, for the present, confined his whole attention to Fort-Pitt, Niagara, and Detroit.

A fmall body, therefore, was haftily collected for the relief of Detroit, and another for the reinforcement of the garrifon of Niagara. These troops were commanded by Captain Dalyell, who, having left those destined for Niagara, proceeded to Detroit, where he arrived on the evening of the 30th of July 1763. Pondiac, a celebrated Indian chief, with the numerous tribes in the vicinity of that place, had for some time been closely blockading it by land; and by means of a conference allowed him within the fort, had surprised the garrison, were it not for the vigilance of the very able officer who commanded there. Gladwin had the good fense to draw this conclusion from their former conduct in similar circumstances. Accordingly, before he admitted the Indians into the place, he put the garrison under arms, and made such other dispositions, as totally defeated their treacherous design. Had they succeeded in their deep-laid scheme, of putting him sirst to death, every man of them must have fallen a victim to the resentment of his troops. Pondiac had sagacity enough to perceive this. He harangued, as usual, on a belt, white on one side, and green on the other; and began his discourse on the white side. The turning the belt was to be the signal, in case circumstances proved favourable, for opening the tragedy by the murder of Major Gladwin; but Pondiac thought better of the matter, and never made use of it.

Many of the French had inlifted under the banners of Pondiac; and one of them became his fecretary. It was a thing without precedent, for fuch a multitude of Indians to keep the field fo long. Their firong propenfity to roving, and the difficulty of providing them with fubliftence, had hitherto hindered their chiefs from undertaking any affair which required time and numbers to atchieve it. But on this occasion, the influence of Pondiac kept them together, whilft the address of his fecretary procured them provisions. To accomplish this, he iffued formal orders to the neighbouring inhabitants, in the name of the French king, for what flour and cattle was wanted; and before Captain Dalyell's arrival, had gone fo far as to fummon Major Gladwin to furrender his fort to that monarch.

Had Captain Dalyell brought nothing but provisions with him to Detroit, his coming there might have been reckoned a very their

a very effential fervice; for, by the time he reached it, the garrison was reduced to the greatest straits. But this was not enough to satisfy his martial ardour. He unhappily considered the Indians as a very despicable soe, and despised them accordingly. As soon, therefore, as he became acquainted with their situation, he supposed that it could be no difficult matter, not only to make them abandon their present design, but so essentially chastise them, as to prevent their attempting any thing like it for the future.

It was in vain that Major Gladwin, who knew better, endeavoured to perfuade the Captain from this dangerous undertaking. All his arguments were looked upon by him as no better than fo many contrivances to prevent his reaping a large harvest of military glory. The Major, therefore, considering, that, as Captain Dalyell was Sir Jesfrey's aid de camp, he might be reasonably supposed best acquainted with his sentiments; he therefore permitted him to make the attempt with two hundred and fifty men. To give him more was impossible, without risking the loss of the place, should any accident happen to those he grave.

With this force, Captain? alyell fallied out, about half an hour after two in the morning of the 31st of July; taking the great road by the river-side, whith two boats, in the nature of row-gallies, and a pateraro in each of them, rowed up the river, with orders to keep close to the shore, and up with the line of march, in order to take off the killed and wounded, and cover a retreat in case of accident. About a mile and a half from the fort, the Captain ordered his men to form into platoons; and, if attacked in front, to defend themselves by street-siring. About a mile farther, the advanced guard, commanded manded by Licutenant Brown, was fired upon by the enemy from under the cover of their works, and had feveral men killed and wounded. Some of the balls reached to the main body, and threw the men into some confusion; but they soon recovered. Captain Grey then returned the enemy's fire on the front of their works, as the quarter where most execution might be expected, it being still too dark to dislinguish objects. Captain Grant, being in the rear, was now likewife fired on from fome houses and fences, about twenty yards from his left; upon which he faced about his own and Captain Hopkins's company, and gave a full discharge on those places from whence he had been fired upon. The enemy feeming to retire in consequence of this ready and resolute return of their falute, Captain Dalyell ordered Captain Grant to take possession of those houses and fences from which it had been given; and Captain Grant, having immediately executed these orders, found, in one of the houses, two men, who informed him, that the enemy were about three hundred ftrong; and being, withal, perfectly well apprifed of the garrifon's defign, intended to get between the fallying party and the fort, to cut off their retreat.

As foon as Captain Dalyell was made acquainted with this fuperiority of the enemy, and the use they intended to make of it, he concluded it was high time to think of a retreat; and to cover his march, ordered Captain Grant to take post in an orchard. By this time the Indians began an heavy firing on his rear, from the sences and corn-fields which lay behind it, and he himself was one of the first who fell on the occasion. Captain Grant, being informed by Lieutenant Macdougal of Captain Dalyell's death, and likewise, that Captain Grey was too severely wounded to act, assumed the command, which, by these these events, devolved upon him; and continuing the retreat, took possession of the houses, barns, and fences, in the way to the fort. But Captain Rogers, having been hard preffed by the enemy, from behind a house in which he had taken post, was obliged to wait for one of the row-gallies to cover his retreat. When the boat arrived, and had dispersed the favages by a few discharges, Captain Rogers lost no time in embracing the opportunity to come off; and his and the feveral other fmall bodies, into which the falliers had feparated, having joined again without any confusion, they continued their march back to the fort in good order. It must not be forgot, that Captain Grant, by the able manner in which he conducted this dangerous retreat, acquired to himself particular honour. Besides Captain Dalyell, we lost one serjeant, and eighteen rank and file killed; Captain Grey, Lieutenants Duke and Brown, one drummer, and thirty-eight rank and file wounded.

Though the iffue of this fally did great honour to Major Gladwin's forefight, it proved extremely difadvantageous to the English affairs; not so much, indeed, by their loss in men, as by the fresh spirits with which it inspired the Indians.

All this time, Fort-Pitt continued in the most critical situation. No news was to be heard from the garrison, or even about it; and it was a march of two hundred miles through the wood to relieve it. Colonel Bouquet, however, was ordered upon this difficult and dangerous fervice, with the poor remains of the forty-second and seventy-seventh regiments, and some ammunition and provisions. These corps had been enseebled, or rather worn down, by the expedition to the Havanna; and the few survivors not yet recovered from the confuming fuming and dispiriting diseases of the West-India climate, faw themselves, when they least expected it, suddenly engaged in an expedition, which required the utmost activity, and the most vigorous constitution.

Orders had been given to prepare a convoy of provisions on the frontiers of Penfylvania, against the Colonel's arrival there: But such was the general terror and consternation which had seized the inhabitants, that he had reached Carlisle before any slep had been taken to forward his march. It must be owned, however, that this was not altogether a groundless panic. A great number of the poor people's plantations had been pillaged and burned, and many of their mills destroyed by the savages. The harvest, indeed, was in complete maturity; but then, there was no one to gather it. Besides, the greatest part of the county of Cumberland, through which the army was to pass, was descreted; and the roads leading to it covered with wretched families, who having suddenly abandoned their habitations to save their lives, were now ready to perish for want of the most common necessaries to support nature.

By this confusion, the supplies for the expedition became more and more precarious. Instead of receiving succours from a people in easy and assume that circumstances, Colonel Bouquet was obliged to divide his own provisions with them. Nevertheless, in eighteen days after his arrival at Carlisle, by an happy combination of activity in him, and good will in the interior parts of the province, the stores and necessary carriages were ready, and the army put into motion.

The fpirits of the people, however, were not much mended by this march. They were too well acquainted with the 1. ftrength mended with the firength flrength and ferocity of the enemy, not to look upon them as more than an overmatch for Colonel Bouquet's army, confidering the finall number and weak condition of the regulars which composed it. Such of them therefore, as had settlements on the Susquehana, held themselves in readiness to abandon them on the first news of the fatal event they apprehended. In this state of despondency, it is not surprising that they resused to follow the troops for their common desence. Their knowlege of the woods, as well as their being good hunters, and excellent marksmen, might have been of the greatest service; but their sears were, unfortunately, too strong, to let them set a proper value upon these advantages.

The defeat of this little army would have exposed the province of Penfylvania, in particular, to the greatest danger, confidering the enterprifing genius and barbarous difpolition of the enemy it had to deal with. The county of Cumberland, which formed the frontier, could muster no militia to oppose the Indians, even if its inhabitants had not deferted it, most of them being traders and farmers, ignorant of the use of arms. Government, indeed, had ordered a levy of feven hundred men to cover these frontiers during the harvest. But what could be expected from new raifed, raw, and even undisciplined troops? Accordingly, Colonel Bouquet was obliged to depend entirely upon himself, having no troops, or any farther supply of flores to expect from the province, nor any reinforcement from the General, who had already given him every man that was in a condition to quit the hospital; nay, many of these were too weak to make use of their legs; and therefore were obliged to be carried in waggons, merely for the purpose of adding some ftrength, fuch as it was, in proportion as they recovered, to the fmall Rrr 2 fmall posts on the route, by which the communication was tobe kept up.

In the mean time, Fort-Ligonier was in great danger of falling into the hands of the enemy, before the Colonel couldreach it. Its defences were very bad, the garrifon weak, and the attack made upon it by the Indians vigorous enough to give apprehensions to a strong one. But they were repulsed by the conduct and bravery of Lieutenant Blane, who commanded there.

The preservation of this post was of the utmost consequence, from its fituation, and still more, from a great magazine of provisions it contained. Could the Indians have made themfelves masters of it, they might have continued the siege of Fort-Pitt, with better hopes of fuccess, and greatly incommode the troops destined to relieve it. Considering these circumflances, there was an almost absolute necessity for succouring it at any risk. A body, therefore, of thirty men, accompanied with good guides, was detached for that purpose, and ordered to take their route by the woods, by which means they had the good fortune to fucceed. Twenty volunteers, fent by Captain Oury from Fort-Bedford, a place between Carlifle and Fort-Pitt, in which there was another magazine, had arrived there before them. Fort-Bedford had not yet been attacked by the favages; otherwife it would have been highly imprudent in Captain Oury to have made fuch a detachment, as his place was not stronger, either in works or in men to defend them, than Lieutenant Blanc's; but a great number of distressed families in its neighbourhood had fled to it for protection, leaving their effects a prey to the favages: this enabled Captain Oury thus to attend to the relief of his partners in danger, whilst he took every measure which prudence and military skill could suggest to ensure his own safety, by preventing surprise, repulsing open attacks, and rendering useless or descating the effects of the burning arrows, which the Indians showered into the place. With this view, he formed into companies all the fugitives that were capable of carrying arms; and they did duty with the garrison, till the arrival of two companies of light infantry, detached by Colonel Bouquet.

This able officer having thus provided for the fafety of these two important magazines at the forts Ligonier and Bedford, advanced to the most distant settlements, without being able to procure the least intelligence of the number or situation of the enemy. He could not get any even at Fort-Bedford, where he arrived on the 25th of July. For though the Indians dared not to make any attack upon that place, their parties were fo well disposed in the neighbourhood, that neither mellenger nor any thing else could escape them; and accordingly, eighteen persons had been made prisoners, or killed and fealped by them. This total want of intelligence is no uncommon case with officers conducting campaigns in North-America; whereas the Indians always have the best information, and they had it at this time in particular. As foon as they heard of Colonel Bouquet's march, they raifed the fiege of Fort-Pitt, in order to meet him, fully refolved to feize the first opportunity of attacking him to advantage.

In this uncertainty concerning the strength and motions of the Indians, Colonel Bouquet left Fort-Bedford on the 28th of July. On his arrival at Fort-Ligonier, he prudently determined to leave there his waggons, with some provisions, powder, and other

other flores, and purfue his rout with the troops only, and about three hundred and forty horfes loaded with flour. He had to pass a place called Turtle-Creek, a dangerous defile. many miles in length, and commanded, on every fide, by fleep hills. Having halted fome time to refresh his men and horses at Bushy-Run, he came to a resolution of making a forced march through this defile in the night; but, at one in the afternoon of the 5th of August, after a march of seventeen miles, his advanced guard was fuddenly attacked by a body of the favages, who had hid themselves on the side of the road for that purpose; but being immediately supported by the two light infantry companies of the forty-fecond regiment, they drove them from their ambufcade, and even purfued them to fome diffance. The favages, however, returned to the attack, and their fire proving oblinate on the front, and extending along the flanks, Colonel Bouquet found it necessary to make a general charge with his whole line, to diflodge them from the heights, and fucceeded in the attempt, though without gaining by his fuccess any decisive advantage. The favages were no fooner driven from one place than they appeared in another, and when no longer purfued, returned to the charge, till, by receiving continual reinforcements, they were at last enabled to furround the English on every side, and even attack the convoy left in their rear, which obliged Colonel Bouquet to march back to protect it. The action, upon this, became general. But though the favages attacked the English upon every fide, and fought with uncommon refolution, they were conflantly repulfed with lofs. Ours, however, was by no means inconfiderable. Captain-Lieutenant Graham, and Captain Macintofh, of the forty-fecond regiment, were killed; and Captain Graham, Lieutenant Dow, of the Royal Americans, Lieutenant tenant Donald Campbell, and Volunteer Peebles of the feventy-feventh, wounded. The battle ended only with the day. The great activity of Major Campbell, of the forty-fecond regiment, was of infinite fervice upon this very critical occasion. Indeed, the conduct of the officers in general, was above praise; and the men kept themselves, the whole time, so cool, and behaved so seadily, that they never attempted to sire without orders; and at length drove the savages from their posts with fixed bayonets.

Poffession was now taken of a hill where the convoy had halted when the front was first attacked, as it afforded a commodious spot, both with regard to situation and extent, for the purpose of a temporary post. Accordingly, the whole of the army was here incircled, the wounded being covered with the flour-bags.

The morning of the next day, being the 6th of August, the favages furrounded the camp at the distance of about five hundred yards, and by a perpetual shouting and yelling quite round this extensive circumference, were in hopes of terrifying the army with their numbers. They then, very early, began an attack; and keeping up an incessant fire, made several bold efforts to penetrate the camp; but all to no purpose. Still, however, their method of sighting rendered our situation extremely critical and perplexing. Brisk attacks can have but little effect upon an enemy who always give way when pressed, and immediately appear again. Besides, the English troops were exceedingly fatigued with the long march, and long action of the preceding day; and what was still worse, distressed to the last degree by a total want of water, much more intolerable than the enemy's sire.

Tied to his wounded and his convoy, the Colonel could not lose fight of either, without exposing them to fall a prey to the favages, who pressed upon him on every side: Yet, to move with the whole was impracticable, as he had lost a great many horses, and the drivers, stupesied by fear, had either hid themselves in the bushes, or were become incapable of obeying or even hearing orders.

At length, the favages growing every moment more and more audacious, Colonel Bouquet, with that happy fagacity which fometimes draws from evils their own remedy, thought the best thing he could do, would be, if possible, to increase their confidence, and by that means entice them to close in upon him, or at least stand their ground when attacked. With this view, he ordered two companies of light infantry within the circle, and the troops on the right and left to open their files, and fill up the space these two companies had occupied, that it might look as if the latter intended to cover the retreat of the former. The third company of light infantry, with the grenadiers of the forty-fecond regiment, were ordered to support the two first companies. This manœuvre had the desired effect; for the few troops who had taken possession of the ground which the two companies of light infantry had left, being brought in nearer to the circle, the barbarians, mislaking all these motions for a confirmed retreat, hurried headlong on, with the most daring intrepidity. But just as, after excessively galling our troops with a most heavy fire, they thought themselves masters of the camp, Major Campbell, at the head of the two companies which had begun the deception, fallied upon them from a part of the hill they could not observe, and fell upon their right flank. The barbarians returned his fire with great refolution;

lution; but could not withfland the irreliftible force of bayonets, with which the Major rushed in upon them, killing many, and putting the rest to slight. In the mean time, orders having been fent to the other two companies to improve the advantage, they were delivered fo critically by Captain Baffet, and executed with fo much celerity and spirit, that the routed favages, who happened at that moment to be running before their front, received their full fire; and not being covered by any trees, their usual defence, suffered a considerable loss. The four companies uniting, did not give them time to load a fecond time, nor even look behind them, but purfued them till they were totally dispersed. This, indeed, was only the right of the favages; but their left was so effectually awed by the rest of the English troops, posted on the brow of the hill for that purpose, that they durk not attempt to support the right; and being at length witnesses to its unexpected defeat, prudently followed the example, and faved themselves by a precipitate flight.

The woods being now cleared, and the pursuit over, the four companies took possession of another hill in the front; and as foon as litters could be made for the wounded, and the flour destroyed, with every thing else, which, for want of horses, could not be carried off, Colonel Bouquet marched on without any farther moleftation, and encamped at Bushy-Run, where there was plenty of water. Here, however, his camp was hardly formed, when, notwithstanding the issue of the late actions, his little army was again fired upon by the favages. But they were again foon dispersed by the light infantry. The loss of the Indians in these actions could never be ascer-

After this defeat, the favages, having lost all hopes of destroying Colonel Bouquet's army on its march, instead of renewing the siege of Fort-Pitt, sled with the utmost precipitation to their most distant settlements. The Colonel reached that place, with his convoy, four days after his last action; but, as he did not find himself in a condition to follow the Indians beyond the Ohio, and thereby more completely reap the fruits of his late victory over them; and having no reason to hope for any reinforcements from the provinces in their present distressed condition, he put an end, though with great reluctance, to the operations of the campaign, by providing Fort-Pitt, and the posts on the communication, with provisions, ammunition, and other necessary stores, and distributing his troops into winter quarters.

During these operations, Detroit continued to be blockaded; and the garrison suffered greatly from satigue, and the want of provisions. They must even have fallen victims to samine, had it not been for the extraordinary bravery of the crew of a schooner, which had been dispatched from Niagara, with provisions for their relies. This vessel sailed from Niagara, the latter end of August 1763, with twelve men, including the master, and six Mohawk Indians, who were intended for a particular service. On the 3d of September she entered the River-Detroit; and, in the morning of the next day, the Mohawks appearing extremely desirous to be put on shore, the master very inconsiderately yielded to their wishes.

All that day the wind proved contrary. About nine in the evening, whilft the veffel lay at anchor, the boatfwain discovered a number of canoes coming down the river, with about three hundred and fifty Indians in them. They were immediately faluted with the bow gun. But, before the other guns could be brought to bear upon them, they had got under the veffel's bow and stern, in spite of all her small arms and swivels; and attempted to board her. Upon this, the men, abandoning their small arms, took to their spears, a weapon with which they had been fortunately provided; and, with amazing bravery and resolution, killed numbers of them; notwithstanding which, the favages cut the cable, thinking thereby to divert the attention of the crew from the defence of the vessel to the management of her fails and rudder; but the stratagem turned upon themselves. The schooner, swinging round, not only threw the Indians fuddenly into the utmost confusion, but gave the English an opportunity of making use of their great guns, which now did considerable execution, and disperfed the Indians, who were utter strangers to the nature of this marine manœuvre. The master of the schooner, and one of his men, were killed in this affair; and four men were wounded; but the remainder of the crew carried her to Detroit, whose fate depended on her safe arrival. To abandon the place, or at least gain Niagara by land, was impracticable without a greater flock of provisions than the garrison could command, even were there no enemies on the road to oppose their march; and famine must have been the certain consequence of remaining in it. The garrifon then had no other prospect but certain death. The arrival of the schooner, therefore, relieved them from the most dismal apprehensions; and proportional were the careffes and other marks of gratitude, with Sfs 2 with which they loaded the heroes to whom they owed their deliverance. The officers, in particular, as a mark of diffinction, as well as a reward for their bravery, presented each of them with a filver medal descriptive of the action; and it has been ever since constantly worn by them, at the button-hole, in the manner of a Croix de Saint Louis.

Excitements fuch as this, were they to be univerfally used in the service, would be attended with the most happy consequences; since nothing can be so flattering to the human mind, especially the mind of those engaged in a profession where glory is generally the chief object, as to be distinguished from one's fellow soldiers by some conspicuous ornament, to which superior merit can alone entitle the wearer.

The garrison of Detroit being now well supplied with provisions, the efforts of the enemy proved of no great consequence, though the setting in of winter prevented any thing more being attempted for its relief, till the return of a season more favourable to military operations. Major Gladwin secured the garrison against any sudden attack; and the Indians in a great measure dispersed, except some small parties who lurked about the fort in such a manner as to render it extremely dangerous to pass the pallisade.

Niagara bad not been attacked; but, then, the communication between it and Lake Erie, was continually infeffed by the Indians, which made it necessary to fend large efcorts with every thing, that was to pass the carrying place for the garrifon of Detroit. To remove this obstacle, a detachment of about ninety men was made from Niagara to attack the body of Indians which formed it. But the inconsiderate ardour of the commanding commanding officer hurried him into an ambuscade, in which himself, and the whole of his party, except three or four, unfortunately perished.

The nature of this campaign, of 1763, which was entirely defensive on our part, and the many advantages the Indians had gained in the course of it, without receiving any considerable check, inspired them with a boldness and resolution fuperior to any they had hitherto manifested. This increase of what generally turns the scale in every hostile contest, required the most active as well as most powerful measures in the English to counteract it to any purpose. Nothing less could answer, than a formidable army as early in the field as the feafon would permit, and the most vigorous offensive use that could be made of it; but the General was still without a number of regular troops fufficient for that purpose. Nay those he had were in a flate of discontent and mutiny, on account of an order which compelled them to pay for their rations, instead of being allowed them gratis, as they had been during the whole course of the last war. But Sir Jessrey Amherst having taken upon him to represent their inability to comply with this new regulation, and ordered provisions to be iffued, as usual, for the enfuing campaign, their minds became a little more quiet; and the following order, whilst it proved extremely slattering te thoic whom it more particularly concerned, ferved to create a fpirit of emulation amongst all those in general engaged in. the fervice.

Head-Quarters, New-York, 5th June, 1764.

"The King has been graciously pleased to fignify to the Commander in chief his royal approbation of the conduct and bravery very of Colonel Bouquet, and the officers and troops under his command, in the two actions of the 5th and 6th of August last, in which, notwithstanding the difficulty, and the distressing circumstances which presented themselves, and likewise the boldness and extraordinary resolution of the Indians, he frustrated their designs, repulsed their repeated attacks, and happily conducted his convoy safe to Fort Pitt."

The fearcity of regular troops obliged the General to make a requisition from the provinces; their respective assemblies chearfully complied with his demands, and issued orders for levying the reinforcements they had severally agreed to give him.

The plan of operations was to fend a corps, under the command of Colonel Bouquet, to attack the Delawars, the Shawanefe, the Mingoes, the Mohicons, and other Indians fettled between the Ohio and the lakes; whilft another, to be commanded by Colonel Bradfreet, attacked the Hurons, the Wiandots, the Ottawas, the Chippawas, and other nations on the banks of the lakes. The naval preparations on the lakes belonging to Captain Loring's department, he was ordered to Ofwego to do every thing that was necessary to forward them. In the mean time, Sir William Johnson was to go to Niagara, to ratify the following preliminaries of peace which he had fettled in the spring with the Senecas; and use his influence to prevail on as many as he could of the faithful Indians to accompany Colonel Bradstreet in his expedition.

MINARY

PRELIMINARY ARTICIES of peace, friendship and alliance, entered into between the deputies sent from the whole Seneca nation, and Sir William Johnson, Baronet, his Majesty's sole Agent and Superintendant of Indian affairs, for the northern parts of North America, and Colonel of the Six United Nations, their allies and dependants, &c.

ART. I. That the Seneca nation do immediately flop all hostilities, and solemnly engage never more to make war upon the English, or suffer any of their people to commit any acts of violence on the persons or properties of any of his Majesty's subjects.

Answer. The Sachems and Chiefs of the Senecas agree fully to this article.

II. That they forthwith collect all the English prisoners, deserters, Frenchmen, and Negroes, amongst them, and deliver them up to Sir William Johnson (together with the two Indians of Kanestio, who killed the traders in November 1762) previous to the treaty of peace, which will take place within three months, if these articles are agreed to; and that they engage never to harbour or conceal any deserters, Frenchmen, or Negroes, from this time; but, should any such take refuge amongst them, they are to be brought to the commanding officer of the next garrison, and delivered up; promising, likewise, never to obstruct any search made after such persons, or to hinder their being apprehended in any part of their country.

Anfaver. Agreed to; and they will affift in apprehending any fuch in their towns.

III. That they cede to his Majesty, and his successors for ever, in full right, the lands from the fort of Niagara, extending, easterly, along Lake-Ontario, about four miles, comprehending ing the Petit-Marais, or landing-place, and running from thence, foutherly, about fourteen miles to the creek above Fort-Scholffer or little Niagara, and down the fame to the river or strait; thence down the river or strait, and across the fame, at the great cataract; thence, northerly, to the banks of Lake Ontario, at a creek or fmall lake about two miles west of the fort; thence, easterly, along the banks of Lake-Ontario, and acrofs the river or strait to Niagara; comprehending the whole carrying place, with the lands on both fides the strait; and containing a tract of about fourteen miles in length, and four in breadth. And the Senecas do engage never to obstruct the passage of the carrying place. or the free use of any part of the said track; and will likewife give free liberty of cutting timber for the use of his Majesty, or that of the garrisons, in any other part of their country not comprehended therein.

Answer. Agreed to; provided the track be always appropriated to his Majesty's sole use; and that at the definitive treaty the lines be run in the presence of Sir William Johnson and some of the Senecas, to prevent disputes hereafter.

IV. That they allow a free passage through their country from that of Cayugas to Niagara or elsewhere, for the use of his Majesty's troops for ever; engaging never to obstruct or molest any of his Majesty's troops, or other his subjects, who may make use of the same, or who may have occasion to pass through any part of their country by land or by water, from henceforward.

Answer. Agreed to: And moreover (if required) the Senecas will grant escorts of their people; but it is expected they will not be ill-treated by any of the English, who may pass through their country.

V. That they grant to his Majesty, and his successors, for ever, a free use of the harbours for vessels or boats within their country, on Lake-Ontario, or in any of the rivers; with liberty to land stores, &c. and erect sheds for their security.

AGREED TO.

VI. That they immediately flop all intercourse between any of their people and those of the Shawanese and Delawares, or other his Majesty's enemies, whom they are to treat as common enemies; and to assist his Majesty's arms, in bringing them to proper punishment, solemnly engaging never to be privy to, aid, or assist, any of his Majesty's enemies, or those who may hereafter attempt to disturb the public tranquillity.

AGREED TO.

VII. That should any Indian commit murder on, or rob any of his Majesty's subjects, he shall be immediately delivered up, to be tried and punished, according to the equitable laws of England: and, should any white man be guilty of the like crime towards the Indians, he shall be immediately tried and punished, if guilty. And the Senecas are never, for the future, to procure themselves satisfaction, otherwise than as before mentioned; but to lay all matter of complaint before Sir William Johnson, or his Majesty's superintendant of Indian assays, for the time being, and strictly to maintain and abide by the covenant chain of friendship.

AGREED TO.

VIII. For the due performance of these articles, the Senecas are to deliver up three of their chiefs as hostages, who are to be Ttt well well treated, and restored to them as soon as the same are fully performed on their parts.

Answer. They agree to leave as hostages, Wannaughfila, Serrihodna, and Arajungas, three of their chiefs.

IX. In confequence of their perfect agreement to the foregoing articles, Sir William Johnson doth, by virtue of the powers and authorities reposed in him, in the name of his Britannic Majesty, promise and engage, that the said Indians shall have a full pardon for past transgressions: That they shall be left in the quiet and peaceable possession of all their rights not comprised in the foregoing articles; and that, on their only duly performing the same, and subscribing the definitive treaty of peace to be held in consequence hereof, they shall be once more admitted into the covenant chain of friendship with the English, and be indulged with a free, fair, and open-trade, so long as they abide by their engagements.

Answer. This article the Senecas expect will be strictly regarded, and also that trade will be carried on in a fair and equitable manner.

The foregoing articles, after being duly and fully explained to the chiefs and warriors, deputies from the Senecas, they have fignified their affent thereto, by affixing marks of their tribes, to these presents.

As the operations of Colonel Bradstreet were to be carried on by water, he constructed the model of a boat on a new plan, forty-fix feet in keel, to carry twenty-seven men, and three weeks provisions. The General having approved of this model, the proper workmen were immediately set upon building as many boats after it as the expedition required; and slores of every kind were collected at Schenectady, whilst Colonel Bradstreet exerted all his vigilance and activity to forward these and all other measures necessary to insure the advantages of an early campaign. But though the boats, provisions, ammunition, and other stores, were actually ready by the appointed time, it was the beginning of June before any of the provincial troops arrived at the rendezvous at Albany.

General Sir Jeffrey Amherst had obtained leave to return to England: activity and refolution had diftinguished his command; and the disposition of his successor, General Gage, proved fuch a contrast to it, as could not but strike the colonies. Accordingly, they foon discovered it; and the consequence was, a fudden abatement of the ardour with which they had begun to recruit. The number and quality of the troops they furnished for Colonel Bradstreet's expedition, by no means proved answerable to the intentions of the present General's predeceffor; and when a good number of those who had been raised for the fervice were first assembled, they looked more like candidates for an hospital, than men that were to be immediately employed on a duty, for which the most perfect health and vigorous conflitution were to indiffeentibly requifite. After many delays, however, the provinces put their troops in motion; and as foon as they arrived, Colonel Bradfreet ordered them to Ofwego. Sir William Johnson had ordered the Indians who were to accompany Colonel Bradffreet, to rendezvous at the Tttg

the fame place; and Captain Loring had ready there the veffels that were to be employed in carrying provisions from thence to Niagara, for the use of the army.

At this critical conjuncture, Colonel Bradstreet was seized with a violent illness; but nothing could abate his ardour for the service. Though incapable of affishing personally in the smallest degree, he could not be prevailed upon to remain at Albany, even a few days, but resolutely persisted in being conveyed to Oswego. The English troops were now there, as likewise the Indians under Sir William Johnson. Redhead, the chief of the Onandaga tribe, happening to die at Oswego, he was buried with all the honours of war, as well on our part as that of the Indians, the more to attach them to our interest. The death of this warrior proved a considerable loss to Colonel Bradstreet, who had, on many trying occasions, experienced his sidelity and courage.

the whole. Lieutenant Montresor, of the corps of engineers, had been ordered by Colonel Bradstreet to throw up a chain of redoubts on the carrying place, in order to prevent any insults from the enemy in transporting the provisions, stores, and boats from one lake to another; and likewise, to erect a fort on the banks of Lake-Erie, for the security of the vessels employed upon it; and these services were essectually performed before the arrival of the army.

During the preceding winter, or early in the fpring, Sir William Johnson had sent belts of wampum to certain Indian nations to meet him at this time, in order to renew their friendthip; and to others to accommodate differences, and fettle terms of peace. Major Gladwin had likewife recommended it, from Detroit, to feveral other Indian nations to attend this congress. Accordingly, Sir William being now arrived at Niagara, found there a valt concourse of the Indians, who had been thus fummoned or invited, reinforced by an equal number of others, whom want of trade, or a defire of purchasing necessaries, fuch as rum, blankets, &c. and even mere curiofity or accident had brought to the fame place; fo that, upon the whole, this great meeting might be deemed as much almost the effect of chance as defign. But, whatever motives these Indians might have had originally, for flocking together in this unufual manner, the pretext used by one part of them was to accommodate matters with the English; and by the other, to offer their fervice for the expedition: but all, to the amount of at least seventeen hundred, expected presents, and, whilst at Niagara, received their daily subsistence. The Jenessees or Senecas, who had been most instrumental in beginning the war, but were now to attend and ratify the preliminaries for a peace figned at Johnson-Hall, kept aloof. Upon this, Sir William

William fent them repeated meffages, which they answered by repeated promises of attendance, whilst, instead of preparing to fulfil them, they did nothing but deliberate amongst themselves, whether they should renew the war, or confirm the peace. Colonel Bradstreet, therefore, seeing no end of their arts to amuse Sir William, desired a peremptory message might be sent them, purporting, that if they did not repair to Niagara in five days, he would fend some troops to destroy their settlements. This brought them to attend the congress; and on their delivering up some prisoners, Sir William concluded a peace with them, and made them presents. The Wyandots of Sandusky had sued to Major Gladwin at Detroit for a peace; and Pondiac's band was on the Miamis river waiting the result of this conference.

Colonel Bradflreet, having formed two corps of light infantry, under the command of Majors Daly and Le Hunt, and made fome other necessary dispositions that had been still wanting, was become extremely anxious to proceed on the execution of his orders, which were, to give peace to all fuch nations of Indians as would fue for it, and chaftife those that continued in arms. But Sir William Johnson befeeched him not to put the army in motion, as he suspected the sincerity of the Indians, although he had concluded a peace fo recently with them; and even entertained fome doubts, whether they would not make an attempt upon the fort when the troops had left it. Colonel Bradifrect yielded to these folicitations, and remained where he was, till Sir William had finished his bufiness, and disposed of his presents to the Indians, about three hundred of whom accompanied the Colonel. But he ever thought himfelf obliged to regard them as spies, rather than employ them as auxiliaries.

Sir William Johnson now returned home, and the rest of the Indians dispersed. The Colonel, therefore, after leaving a sufficient garrison at Niagara, and having been joined by a battalion of Canadians and part of the forty-fixth regiment, proceeded with his army, on the 6th of August, for Fort-Schlosser. where he halted till the 8th, for the arrival of the Indians who were to accompany him in the expedition. He then proceeded to Fort-Erie, and from thence, on the 10th, continued his route along the fouth-fide of Lake-Erie, agreeable to the instructions he had received from General Gage. In the morning of the 12th, while detained at l'Ance-Aux-Fueilles, by contrary winds, he received a deputation from the Shawanefe, the Delawares, the Hurons of Sandusky, and the Five Nations of the Scioto plains, fuing for a peace; and in the evening he gave them an audience in the presence of the Sachems, and other chiefs of the Indians, who accompanied him.

The deputies, prefenting the Colonel with four belts of wampum, endeavoured to excuse their respective nations, and to apologize for the murders they had committed, by saying, that these enormities were executed without the knowlege of any of their chief warriors, and merely by some young men, whom they would take care to chastise. They begged forgiveness for all past offences, and requested that the chain of friendship might be brightened, and that they might be permitted to enter into a peace with their brothers the English, to continue as long as the sun and moon should endure.

Colonel Bradfreet, in confequence of the inflructions he had received from General Gage, and the great appearance of fincerity with which the deputies demanded peace, granted them the following preliminaries, which were to be ratified at Sandusky, when their prisoners should be idelivered up to him.

- I. That all the prisoners, now in the hands of the nations who had deputed them, should be delivered up to Colonel Brad-street at Sandusky, in twenty-five days from the 15th of this month.
- II. That the Shawanefe, &c. should renounce all claim to the forts and other posts that the English now have in their country; and that the English shall be at liberty to erect as many more as they may think necessary to secure their trade; and that the nations, represented by the present deputation, shall cede to the King of Great Britain, for ever, as much land round each fort, as a cannon-shot will sly over, for the purpose of raising provisions thereon.
- III. That if any Indian shall hereafter kill an Englishman, he shall be delivered up by his nation, and tried by the English laws, half the jury being Indians; and if any one nation shall renew the war, the others who are represented by this deputation, shall join the English to bring them to reason.
- 1V. That fix of the deputies shall remain with Colonel Bradstreet as hostages; and the other four, with an English officer, and an Indian shall immediately proceed to acquaint their nations with these preliminaries of peace, and forward the collecting of the prisoners, that they may be ready by the day appointed.

These preliminaries were signed by the respective parties the 12th of August, 1764.

The

The day following, Colonel Bradstreet, who had been detained all this time by bad weather, at l'Ance-Aux-Feuilles, proceeded on his route; and, on the 14th, reached Presque-Isle. where the fort flood which the Indians destroyed the last year. From this place, he fent expresses to General Gage and Colonel Bouquet, to inform them of his transactions with the Shawanefe, Delawares, &c. and dispatched the four Indian deputies. on the carand mentioned in the preliminaries, to their respective nations; continuing his route with the other fix, to the wellern point of Presque-Isle, where he halted till the next day, when he renewed his operations. From this to the 23d, the weather was variable, but nothing worth notice happened in the mean time. On that day, the Colonel arrived at Point le Petit-Isle, where he received intelligence, that a number of Indians were collected on the Miamis river, and determined to oppose his progress to Detroit. He therefore immediately prepared to attack them. But whilft on the Lake-Erie for that purpose, he was met by a deputation from them to sue for peace, and defire a conference at Detroit; for which place, they informed him, a number of their countrymen were already fet out for that purpofe. The Colonel thought proper to comply with their request; and finding the Indian encampment on the Miamis actually broken up, he returned to Point le l'etit-lile.

Colonel Bradilicet, thinking this a good opportunity to take possession of the country of the Illinois, which had been ceded to his Britannic Majesty by the peace of 1762, ordered Captain Morris, of the seventeenth regiment, with proper instructions, upon that service, with an Indian of each of the different nations that accompanied him, and one Godfroi, a Frenchman, as an interpreter; and he also sent U u u presents presents for the different nations through which they were to pass. The Colonel then continued his route for Detroit, where he arrived about the 26th day of August. Major Gladwin, as soon as he heard of the Colonel's approach, sent Captain Grant of the eightieth regiment, to condust him on shore, and paid him all the military honours due to his rank; whilst the Huron Indians, from their village on the opposite banks of the river, saluted him with their susils, and welcomed him into their country with such expressions of joy and respect, as are usual amongst the savages of this part of America; and all these compliments were returned by the cannon in the boats.

Immediately on the Colonel's landing, orders were given for the troops to debark, and they were encamped northward of the fort. The garrifon having fustained a long and fevere blockade, during which they had experienced the want of every necessary of life, required more than ordinary refreshments. It may, therefore, be eafily conceived, how the tranfition to ease and plenty, effected by the Colonel's arrival, operated on their spirits. They had now before their eyes a flattering prospect of peace; and possessed the means of acting offensively, should the Indians prove obstinate in continuing the war, and of offering up some of these faithless wretches to the manes of their comrades, who had fallen a facrifice to their perfidiousness and cruelty. To confide in these savages, is the fame thing as to be betrayed by them. Of this a striking instance happened during the blockade: The Indians having, on fome occasion or another, defired a conference, Captain Campbell, of the Royal Americans, who had received from them very particular marks of their effecm, voluntarily offered his fervice to the Commandant for that purpose; and his offer being being accepted, he repaired to their camp, in company with Lieutenant Macdougal, of the same regiment; but in a short time they were both made prisoners. Macdougal stole away, and, being young and active, had the good fortune to get back into the fort; but Campbell, being fat and unwieldy, and trusting besides too much to his influence over some of his old friends, took no pains to escape. The consequence was, that he was tomahawked and eaten.

Colonel Bradstreet, having seen the camp and the garrison fecured by proper guards, his next care was to enquire into the conduct of the inhabitants, both of the place itself and its environs, during the blockade. To fuch as had shewn a proper zeal to affift the garrison, he gave all the encouragement in his power; punishing, at the same time, as far as in him lay, those who had expressed any inclination to the common foe, or shewed themselves lukewarm in the cause of their friends, which was indeed their own. The inhabitants without the fort, being in the claws, as it were, of a most cruel enemy, were obliged to comply with all their demands to the utmost of their abilities; and these demands (a thing, till this period, as we have already observed, unknown amongst the Indians) were always made by written order, drawn up in the name of the King of France, by the Frenchman who acted as fecretary to Pondiac; and moreover, regularly authenticated by the addition of Pondiac's own fignature.

The inhabitants were next formed into three companies of militia; and in naming the officers, due regard was had to their past services. The garrison was then relieved by seven companies of the seventeenth regiment, commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Campbell. The two other companies, with two U u u 2 companies companies of the new militia, and a detachment of artillery, were ordered to retake possession of Michilimackinack, under the command of Captain Howard, of the same regiment. Moreover, for the better security of that place, and the important purpose of more essectually supplying it with every kind of stores, Colonel Bradssreet ordered a vessel to attempt the passage into Lake-Huron; and this passage was happily essected by the skill, industry, and perseverance of Lieutenant St. Clair, of the sisteenth regiment of foot, who commanded on board the vessel, the sirst that ever entered that lake, with which it was of so much consequence to have a communication of this kind.

Indians of various nations now began to make their appearance, and demand audiences of Colonel Bradftreet. He therefore appointed the 7th of September to meet them in a general congress; but, in the mean time, some preliminaries were agreed upon, as a foundation for a general peace. At length, the day appointed for the congress being arrived, the Indians, in great numbers, particularly the Ottawas and Chippewas, assembled at the Colonel's tent; and seating themselves on the ground, agreeable to their usual custom, opened the congress, of which the following are the minutes.

Waffong, Chief of the Chippewas.

"What I am going to fay is in the name of myfelf, Attawatty, and all the young warriors of the Ottawas and Chippewas: we do not mean to give offence, and this flring of wampum is to open your ears, and we expect to beheard patiently. We are extremely extremely glad to find ourselves so well received, and hope you will give us peace. In the name of the two nations of Ottawas and Chippewas, we thank you for having compassion on ourselves, our wives, and families." They give a string of wampum repeating their thanks.

Waffong speaks again on a green belt.

" Brother, I beg you would hearken to Wassing Attawatty, Shammindawa, Outawany, Apockefs, and Abetto: Laft year, God forfook us. God has now opened our eyes, and we defire to be heard. 'Tis God's will our hearts are altered. 'Twas God's will you had fuch fine weather to come to us. 'Tis God's will also, there should be peace and tranquillity all over the face of the earth and of the waters. Every thing that was done last year bad, was done by the old warriors, without cause: We have, therefore, turned them on one side. The young warriors are determined to fettle every thing themselves, and prevent, for the future, any mischief that might be intended. The young warriors, as well as the old Sachems, thank you, and are glad to fee the good difposition you are in. Now that the young people have the direction of affairs, they hope every thing may be fettled peaceably; and that they may be permitted to thake hands with you and your officers, asbrothers.

"This day the young chiefs break all their old chiefs; they shall never be allowed to act; but a action will be paid to what they say.

"You have forgiven us; but our offences are fo great, we must again ask it, in the name of our wives and children. We also pray, that all your troops will have compassion on them.

and us; and hope they will remove any ill opinion they may have of them and us; and we thank the Great King for allowing you to forgive us, and grant us peace. We fay this, not in our name only, but in the name of all the inhabitants round this country."—They shake hands.

Wassong speaks again on a string of purple and white wampum, painted green and blue.

"Brother, attend.——In the name of the Miamis I speak. They thank God for opening their eyes. They will use their utmost endeavours to restore tranquillity. 'Tis God's will there shall be peace all over the earth; and you shall hear nothing ill of them. They thank you, and are extremely glad to hear by the people you fent, that you will grant them peace. On their return, the village will be overjoyed, as they are at the peace with the Shawanese, &c.

"They once more thank God for opening their eyes. As foon as they get home, every thing will be established on the ancient footing of peace and friendship. Their sentiments are the same with those of the Ottawas and Chippewas; and they hope, that your army will lay aside all resentment against them; and that they may be allowed to shake hands as brothers. Again they ask for peace in the names of their wives and children."—They give the string.

Shammindawa speaks.

"When Captain Morris arrived at the Miamis, Pondiac fpoke to him on a belt of wampum, faying, he was heartily ashamed of what had happened; and if he could be forgiven, he would be very thankful, and do all the service in his power to the English; and that it gave him great pleasure to find, he, Captain Morris, was going on a business that would give peace and quietness to the inhabitants of the earth; that he would pray for his success, and remain quiet himself; and that, when Captain Morris returns, should he succeed, he will thank God for it, and hopes to be forgiven."

Colonel Bradstreet's Answer.

"The ingenuous confession of your folly last year, without any provocation from the English, assorbed me pleasure, as it gives me reason to believe your submissions sincere, and that your requests for mercy and forgiveness, come from your hearts. I shall take compassion on your distress, and grant you peace on the following terms."

- I. Yourselves, and the nations you represent, must acknowlege, that you are the subjects and children of his Majesty George III. of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith; and that he has the sole right of sovereignty over all and every part of this country, in as full and ample a manner as in any part of his other dominions whatever.
- II. If any nation, or tribe of Indians herein comprehended, dare violate this peace, the others shall look on themselves as bound to make war upon the offenders, separately or jointly, with the English and their allies, at all times when they shall be commanded by his Majesty, his General, or Officer, appointed for that purpose, and reduce to reason the offenders, or extirpate them; and that you will, whenever commanded, take up arms and join his Majesty's troops, or other his subjects. against any of his enemies whatever, and use your utmost endeavours to execute the orders that may be given you for that purpose; and you may be affured of the protection of the King your Father, and what affishance you may stand in need of, at all times.

- III. That you may thew farther proofs of your duty and obedience to the King your Father, should it happen that any Indians belonging to the herein mentioned nations plunder or kill any of his Majesty's subjects, in this or any other of his colonies, now settled, or that hereafter may be settled, you are voluntarily, and immediately, to deliver the offender up to the officer commanding this garrison, to be tried and punished, agreeable to the laws and customs of this colony at that time in force.
- IV. You must deliver up all prisoners and deserters that you have, as soon as possible. Should any white people desert to you, you are to send them immediately, prisoners to the post or settlement, nearest to you. But, when any families come to settle, by permission of the King, you are to esteem them friends and brothers.
- V. The French commanding officers have, at times, granted lands in fome of your villages: To give you a testimony of my intentions to do you the greatest justice, I will oblige all persons settled on such lands, to remove immediately.
- VI. At the request of Captain Morris, whom I have fent round to all the fouthern nations, respecting the general peace; and also, on account of Pondiac's submission, and promise of future good behaviour and friendship to the English, I do hereby pardon him, and he may meet me with the utmost safety at Sandusky.

The above conditions being reduced into writing, were ratified by the parties in the following form:

1764.

" By the power and authority to me given and granted by his Excellency the Honourable Major General Thomas Gage, Commander-in-Chief of all his Majesty's forces in North-America, the above are the terms on which I grant peace to the nations heretofore mentioned, that is to fay, the Ottawas and Chippewas, and others hereunto fubfcribing.

Given under my hand and feal, at Detroit, the 7th day of September, 1764.

(Signed) JOHN BRADSTREET."

" By the power to us given by the nations we reprefent, we do, in their names, together with ourselves, most gratefully accept the terms above granted; and we do most folemnly bind ourselves and them to the true performance of each article in every respect.

" In witness thereof, we have hereunto affixed the arms of the nations we represent, at Detroit, this 7th day of September, 1764, and in the fourth year of the reign of our now Sovereign Lord King George, &c."

" We hereunto fubscribing, and feveral principal men of our nation of Hurons, being prefent at the above submission, made by the Ottawas and Chippewas, and at the peace granted to them; and being unanimously of opinion, that nothing can tend fo much to the real fafety and happiness of all the Indians on this continent, as following their example, in begging  $X \times X$

the protection, and making themselves the subjects of his Majesty King George III. and at all times obeying his will and commands, and strictly keeping up to every article of the peace concluded with the Ottawas and Chippewas, most humbly request for ourselves, and the nation we represent, to be received, considered, and comprehended in every article of the submission made by the Chippewas and Ottawas, and the peace granted to them, as fully and as amply as the said Ottawas and Chippewas; promising most faithfully, never to violate, or depart from any article therein contained.

"In witness thereof, we have hereunto set the arms of the nation of Hurons, this 7th day of September, 1764, and in the fourth year, &c."

"We the fubscribers, Chiefs of the Pottawattomie and Sakie nations, having come too late to be present at the submission, made by the Ottawas and Chippewas, and the peace granted them, which having been fully explained to us, and we approving every part thereof, having the same just sense of this good work as the Hurons; and whereas peace is granted to us on the same conditions, we do most gratefully accept it, and hereby bind ourselves, and the whole of each nation we represent, to the true performance of each article in every respect, by hereunto assixing the arms of our respective nations, at Detroit, this 7th day of September, 1764, and in the fourth year, &c. &c."

"This day, being the 9th of September, 1764, Wapacomagat, with ninety young warriors, came to Detroit, and defired to have admittance to Colonel Bradstreet, which was granted; and after the usual compliments, he, Wapacomagat, defired Colonel Bradfreet would explain to him and his people, the substance of what had passed between him and the several nations of Indians, with whom he had made peace, which being also complied with, Wapacomagat got up, and declared, That it gave him infinite pleafure to find, that the Indians had put themselves into the arms of the great King of England, and that they were now his fubjects and children; and begged that he, and all the nations of the Messassaguas, might be received and comprehended in that submission and peace, in as full and ample manner as those who had subscribed to it; which being granted, Wapacomagat, in the presence of one hundred warriors, fet the arms of their nation to these prefents, the 10th inflant, declaring he did it at the unanimous defire and request of all his people present; and that he, they,

The business with the Indians being thus happily finished. and peace thereby reflored to the English settlements, Colonel Bradffreet began to prepare for his return to Sandusky, to meet the Shawanese and the Delawars, and put the finishing hand to the treaty which he had entered upon with the deputies of these nations on the Lake-Erie, and fixed the 24th of September for his departure: But he first gave such orders for the fecurity and tranquillity of the inhabitants, and the advancement of agriculture and trade, as could not fail, in time. to render this infant colony both happy in itself, and useful to the mother-country. To be convinced of this, we need only take a transient view of this delightful spot, a description of which, we hope, may be agreeable, as, on account of its remoteness, the ideas most people entertain of this country, are very much circumscribed. The country called Detroit, is that washed by the strait which forms the communication between the Lakes St. Clair and Eric. The improvements on the castern banks of this strait, extend north and fouth, about nine miles: and those on the western banks, about seven. In purity and wholesomeness of air, and richness of soil, it may be said to equal, if not excel any, even the best parts of America. Every European grain flourishes here in the utmost perfection: and hemp and flax, in particular, might be raifed to the greateft advantage. The woods are every where filled with vines of fpontaneous growth; and their grape yields a juice equal in flavour to the most excellent burgundy. The country around it appears like one great park flocked with buffaloes, deer, pheafants, wild turkies, and partridges. animals and fowls are here in the utmost perfection. Aquatic birds of every species are in the greatest plenty, and of the highest flavour; and the rivers afford an astonishing variety of the most delicious fish. The soil and climate are so favourable to vegetation, that every vegetable is to be procured with the fmallest trouble. In short, a man that can shoot and fish, and understands the art of making wine, may enjoy every luxury of the most sumptuous table, at the fole expence of his own labour. The inhabitants of Detroit are not numerous; and, notwithstanding the allurements which plenty holds forth to people to fettle here, the want of a fufficient force to fecure them against the caprice of the neighbouring Indians, and of authority to fecure good order amongst themselves, has hitherto deterred such as have any fettlements elsewhere, from endeavouring to partake of the abundant produce of nature, at the expence of the property they already enjoy, and perhaps their lives. But should Detroit be ever formed into a regular government, we will venture to prophecy, that it will greatly extend itself; and from. the plenty, variety, and richness of its produce, prove a beneficial fettlement to the mother-country.

Here it may not be amifs to give the numbers of the favages, who inhabit the country within five or fix days march of Detroit, as taken from the rown accounts.

Miamis,

Weaugh,

We shall now resume the detail of military operations, and conduct our readers to another spot, where Nature has not been less bountiful; but at present it is destitute of inhabitants.

Total, 1930

On the 14th of September, Colonel Bradfreet left Detroit, garrifoned with feven companies of the feventeenth regiment, and a detachment of artillery, commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Campbell; and on the 18th arrived at Sanduſky Lake. He then detached a party to deſtroy the fettlement of Mohican-Johns; but it was abandoned before they could reach it. The day following, an Indian arrived from the Delawares, one from the Shawanese, and one from the Five Nations on the Scioto plains, accompanied by a Tuscarora Indian, who had accompanied these deputies to Fort-Pitt, with a string and belt of wampum, to inform the commanding officer, that they were using the utmost diligence in collecting their prisoners; and that they should be delivered up at Sandusky, as soon as possible; possible; but that as many of them were hunting, and others at a great distance, the chiefs requested an additional feven days from that time. This being thought no unreasonable demand, it was accordingly granted. Colonel Bradfreet then proceeded up Sandusky river, to the village of the Hurons and Wyandots, which had been destroyed by Captain Dalvell the preceding year. Here he received letters from General Gage, condemning his conduct, with regard to the late preliminaries of peace with the Shawanese and the Delawares; and infifting, that he had not given him any power to conclude peace, as these preliminaries implied; but had ordered him to refer the Indians to Sir William Johnson, on any business of that kind, and to act in concert with Colonel Bouquet. The 2d of September was the date of the letter now in queflion; and that part of General Gage's instructions, which relate to this business, has, in the third article, the following words:

"And the objects I recommend for your offensive operations are, to attack the Wyandots of Sandusky, who live some miles beyond the small village destroyed the last year by Captain Dalyell. Major Gladwin says, they are much animated against us; that they have a good supply of ammunition; and plant abundance of corn, with which they supply the other nations; and this you will, no doubt, destroy, and break up that nest of thieves. I must require likewise, that you make an attack on the Delawares and the Shawanese, who are retired on the Muskingham and Scioto rivers. The way to the first is up the Cayahaga-Creek, which runs into Lake-Erie, betwixt Presque-Isle and Sandusky. You may gain the Scioto from Sandusky-river, there being but a small carrying-place betwixt these two rivers. You will chuse either of these routes you shall sind most preferable

And in the eighth article:

"You will give the Indians, in general, to understand, that you go with a body of troops to chastife such nations as shall continue in arms against us; to offer peace and his Majesty's protection to those who shall conclude a lasting peace, and live in amity and friendship with us."

And in the last article:

"You will be on the fpot, and I must trust for the execution of every thing to your discretion and judgment."

It will be impossible, we believe, for any one who will attend to the above instructions, to entertain the least doubt of Colonel Bradssreet's having been invested with authority to attack the Indians, and grant peace to such of them as asked it, and wifted to live in amity and friendship with us.

But these instructions are greatly corroborated by a letter from General Gage, dated the 16th of August, in which he fays, in answer to one from Colonel Bradstreet, acquainting him with the business at Niagara, and that he was going directly to Detroit;

"As you are gone directly to Detroit, I must conclude it is with a resolution to bring matters to a final decision, by either making a formal and regular peace with the Wyandots and Ottawas of Sandusky, Potawatamies, and Chippewas of Saguanam; or to attack attack them, though the opportunity of distressing them effectually, by destroying their corn, is lost. You'll please, without delay, either to bring these nations to such a peace, as shall, to appearance, be sincere and lasting, or, in failure of that, to attack them, and do your best to extirpate them."

These orders are certainly very clear, and if Colonel Bradftreet was authorifed to grant peace to the Wyandots of Sandusky, &c. which the General himself allows he had, by suppoling he was gone upon that errand, and yet not blaming him for it; he was equally authorifed to grant it to the Shawanese and the Delawares; as the order respecting them, in the General's instructions to the Colonel, with that likewise respecting the Wyandots, &c. was the same. But as a farther proof, that General Gage had invested Colonel Bradstreet with the power of making peace, it need only be observed, that the instructions given by Sir William Johnson to that part of the Six Nations, and to the Indian Captains under him who joined the army, and were to act under the command of Colonel Bradstreet, were, to make war on fuch nations of Indians as did not fue for peace; and that peace was to be granted to all those nations who did ask it, without any exception.

From these abstracts it appears very evident, that General Gage invested Colonel Bradstreet with powers, either to make war or to conclude a peace, according to the conduct of the savages. And as to his consulting Sir William Johnson, and sending the Indians to him to conclude a peace, Sir William Johnson's name was never mentioned, either in Colonel Bradstreet's instructions or letters, but once; which was, to desire that Colonel Bradstreet would correspond with Sir Y y y William.

William. Nor was there any order, inftruction, or letter, which fo much as hinted any intention that the army under the command of Colonel Bradfreet was to act in concert with that commanded by Colonel Bouquet; nor indeed was it possible it could at the distance of three hundred miles from each other.

We must then conclude, that when it appeared Colonel Bradstreet had laid a foundation for settling the whole business with
army, such proceedings greatly alarmed the ambition of the latter: For, if the preliminaries which the former had signed, as a foundation for a peace with the Shawanese and the Delawares had been ratissed, and the prisoners delivered up agreeable thereto, there would have been an end to the service expested from the army of Colonel Bouquet, whose orders were to attack these two nations, and to compel them to deliver up their prisoners to him. Colonel Bouquet, therefore, affected to doubt the sincerity of the nations represented by the deputies, who had signed the preliminaries with Colonel Bradstreet; and without halting to see, if their intentions were real or not, he prosecuted his operations according to his original plan.

The fame motive urged him to exert his influence over General Gage; and he fucceeded fo well as to induce him to deny even his own orders to Colonel Bradflreet.

Upon the whole, it appears, that Colonel Bouquet's ambition was too powerful for General Gage's easiness of temper, which yielded to the desire of giving an eclat to the Colonel's manœuvres, at the expence of Colonel Bradstreet, and even of the service of his country.

But

But to return to Colonel Bradstreet, whom we left on his progress up the Sandusky-river, to the village of the Hurons and Wyandots; this was the route prescribed him in General Gage's instructions for gaining the Scioto, on a supposition, that there was a fmall carrying-place only between that and the Sandusky-river: But on making the trial, there was not water enough even for a canoe, above the rapids of Sandusky-river, although in the winter there may be fixteen or feventeen feet, as appeared by the bark of the trees growing near it. Disappointed in this attempt, the Colonel then considered whether it was practicable for the men to carry a fufficie...cy of provisions to fubfist upon, supposing they were to march; but from repeated trials, and the information of fome of the most experienced hunters, both Canadian and others, it was represented as an impossibility, therefore not attempted.

To reach the Muskingham river by the Cayahaga-Creek, which falls into Lake-Erie, between Sandusky and Presque-Isle, was the alternative, which Colonel Bradstreet was ordered to use, in order to get up with and attack the Shawanese and Delawares collected on the Muskingham and Scioto rivers. But unluckily, the Cayahaga-Creek was now dry; and besides, the carrying-place from the creek to the Muskingham-river, which had been represented a very small way, proved to be upwards of thirty miles. When a General is ignorant of the topography of a country in which troops under him are to act, it is impossible his orders should avoid censure; for attempts to execute them may be attended with the most fatal consequences to a whole army, which, in this case, may be compared to a ship failing by salse charts and faithless soundings, which, striking on a shoal, does not discover the illusion till it is too late to guard against it.

The Colonel, thus frustrated in two attempts to attack a people, with whom he had so recently signed the preliminaries of general peace, encamped at the carrying-place at Sandusky, as the fituation of that place would enable him to be a check on any of the western nations, which might shew any disposition to affift the Shawanefe and Delawares against Colonel Bouquet's army. But these Indians discovered no intentions to give any farther trouble; their fole aim, to all appearance at least, being to conclude, at any rate, a lasting peace. The distress in which they were involved by fo long a war, induced them to wish for a flate of tranquillity; and they were actually making the necessary preparations to repair to Sandusky with their prifoners: But Colonel Bouquet's pressing in upon them, robbed Colonel Bradstreet and his army of the honour of concluding a work which they had commenced on Lake-Erie, and which would have been effected without Colonel Bouquet's assistance; for the Indians of the Six Nations had already fent the Shawanese and Delawares a message, importing, that they would immediately take up the hatchet against them, if they did not, in the strictest manner, fulfil every article of the preliminaries they had figned with Colonel Bradstreet; and this taking up of the hatchet by the Six Nations, was a thing the Shawanese and Delawares dreaded much more than the presence of the most formidable European army that could be fent against them; for, when one Indian nation takes up the hatchet against another. it is never laid down till one or the other is entirely exterminated. As a proof of the fincerity of the Shawanese and Delawares, three of the hoftages first kept by Colonel Bradstreet, still continued with him, and even consented to a fresh demand of General Gage's, that ten of the chiefs of these nations should be put to death; and that the nations should wait, in a proper manner, on Sir William Johnson, to sue for a peace. Moreover, the Six Nations again declared their resolution to take up the hatchet against them, if they attempted to deceive Colonel Bradstreet.

Letters had been received from Captain Morris, giving an account of the progress he had made in his journey, and the reception he had met with from the Indians. It was with great difficulty he reached the fort on the Miamis-river, where he met a number of savages, from whom he narrowly escaped with his life, as the account of the peace had not yet reached them.

The Indians who accompanied Captain Morris returned: but though they were considered as those who could be most relied upon for their fidelity to us; yet they brought with them a white flag, which they had received from one St. Vincent, a Frenchman, at the Miamis fort, as an inducement to persevere in their attachment to the French nation; and they were, befides, taught to believe, that the French would foon arrive by the Mississippi, and drive the English entirely out of the country. It was by accident this flag was discovered; and then it was publicly burnt. At the fame time, the Sachems gave Colonel Bradstreet the strongest affurances of their fidelity, and of their being fully bent upon exerting the utmost of their power, to bring to reason any nation of Indians who should not accede to the treaty of peace that had been concluded with fo many of their countrymen. As a proof of their intentions, a fcouting party, confifting of twenty warriors, headed by

by Cocknawaga-Peter, fet out from the camp to make war upon the Shawanese and the Delawares, should these nations give any just cause to suspect their sidelity. Colonel Bradstreet seized this opportunity to write to Colonel Bouquet, and charged Peter with his letters for him. In these letters he informed the Colonel, that he was encamped at the carrying-place at Sandusky; that he intended to remain there so long as possible, to favour his operations; particularly by prevailing on the western Indians to take up the hatchet against such of their countrymen as might still betray a desire of continuing the war. When Cocknawaga-Peter returned, he brought with him an Indian scalp, as a proof of the attachment to the English with which he had set out.

Colonel Bradflreet continued in the fituation in which we just now left him, a confiderable time, still exerting his endeavours to favour the operations of Colonel Bouquet, though the badness of the weather, and a very near prospect of scarcity. often reminded him of the necessity there was of his speedily fetting out on his return, unless he chose to expose himself and his army to the greatest danger of perishing ashore by famine, or on the lakes by tempest. But at length, his ardour for the good of the fervice was obliged to yield to the duty he owed his troops; and, on the 18th of October, he broke up his camp at Sandusky to proceed on his return to Albany. In the evening, as he was going to land the troops, a fudden fwell of the lake, without any visible cause, destroyed several of his boats; but no lives were loft. This furprifing phanomenon was, however, looked upon as the forerunner of a florm; and accordingly there foon arose one, which continued feveral days; therefore, it became necessary to detach part of the army by land to Niagara, with just provisions enough for the

the march, and order from thence a fulliciency to meet the remainder on the lake. The troops which proceeded by land fuffered greatly during the march, but they got there fafely at laft, as did, on the 4th of November, those which followed in boats. On their arrival, Colonel Bradffreet ordered them plenty of fresh provisions. The issuing of some necessary orders relating, as well to the troops which the Colonel proposed taking along with him, as to those which were to remain in garrifon at Niagara, detained him there till the 10th, when he proceeded, in the veffels, with the regulars and provincials that were to go down the country; with great difficulty he reached Ontario, after losing the Johnson show, just as the was going into the harbour; but the men were faved. As there now remained no obflacle or danger in the farther progress of these troops to Albany or New-York, we shall take our leave of them, to turn our eyes to another scene of this Indian war; that part of it, which was to be conducted by Colonel Bouquet.

The operations intrufted to this officer were to be executed by part of the forty-fecond and fixtieth regiments, in conjunction with the Pennfylvania and Virginia militia. Proper efcorts, with provisions and other stores, having been first sent off for Fort-Pitt, where they arrived without any molestation from the Indians, the remainder of the army followed, and reached that place on the 17th of September.

The whole of his troops, amounting to about fifteen hundred men, being affembled at Fort-Pitt, he left that place on the 3d of October. On the 6th, whilft in the neighbourhood of Beaver-Creek, a man, who had escaped from the Indians, informed him, that, the preceding day, some Indians had been on the fame fame road with his army; but being alarmed at the strength of it, had carefully concealed themselves. On the 8th, the army passed Little Beaver-Creek. On the 14th, whilst it lay encamped at Tuscarowas, there arrived two nien, who had been dispatched from Fort-Pitt by Colonel Bouquet, with letters for Colonel Bradstreet, in answer to some dispatches received from him. They had been made prisoners in their journey, some miles from that place, by the Delawares, and conducted to one of their villages about fixteen miles off; and kept there till the favages received advice of the arrival of the army at this place, when they were fet at liberty, and charged to tell the Colonel, that the chiefs of the Shawanese and Delawares were on the road, and advancing as fast as possible, to treat of a peace with him. Two days after, fix Indians came in, and informed the Colonel, that all their chiefs were affembled about eight miles from his camp, and ready to treat with him on peace, which they fincerely defired to conclude. The Colonel, to lose no time, appointed the very next day, being the 16th, for that purpose; when, accordingly, Kiyaschuta, a chief of the Senecas, with fifteen warriors, Custaloga and Castor, chiefs of the Delawares, with twenty warriors, and Keissenautchta, a chief of the Shawanese, with fix warriors, in quality of deputies from their respective nations, produced their belts of wampum, and opened the congress.

Their speeches consisted chiefly of excuses: They endeavoured to palliate their perfidious conduct, by throwing all the blame on the western nations, and the insolent rashness of their young warriors, and then, in the most abject manner, sued for peace; each deputation promising to deliver up all the prisoners in the hands of their respective nations. When they had said every thing they could think of to appease the Colonel, he informed them, that he would give his answer the next day; but bad weather intervening, it was the 20th before they could meet again, when the Colonel addressed the favages, and began by faying;

"The pretext with which you pretend to cover your fault, by throwing the blame on the western nations, and on the infolence of your young men, is frivolous to the last degree: For, if you could not protect yourselves against the western nations, you might have depended on the assistance of the English. As to your young men, it is your duty to keep them within proper bounds, and chastise them if they did amis."

He then gave many inflances of their perfidy. He upbraided them with their pillaging, captivating, and even murdering the traders, whom they had invited and requested to come and trade with them. He took notice of their belieging Fort-Pitt, though built by their own express permission; and of their enormous violation of a right always held facred, even by the most barbarous nations, in the persons of four public messengers from the English, whom they had put to death; of their infolence in prefuming to attack the King's troops the preceding year, and their inveteracy in continuing hostilities to the very moment of his now speaking to them. He concluded by telling them, that if they would deliver into his hands, at Waukatamike, all the prifoners they had, without exception, French as well as English, women and children, not excepting those adopted or married into their tribes; all, in short, who were to be found among them; and furnish them with clothing and horses to bring them to Fort-Pitt, and provisions during 7. 2. 2.

The chiefs of the Delawares had produced, on the first day of this congress, eighteen white prisoners, with eighty-three small sticks, representing the number of those that yet remained among them, whom they promised to bring in as soon as possible; and the other chiefs made the same promise with regard to theirs. The Colonel, judging that the most effectual way to make them fulfil their engagements, would be to go and meet the poor captives, and take an Indian of each nation to accompany him in his route, made the proper requisition for that purpose; and having obtained his demand, put his army in motion again, on the 22d. On the 25th, he encamped on a spot near the Muskingham-river; it being more central than Waukatamike, both for the Indians to bring in their prisoners, and for himself to march against such of them as should not punctually comply with their promises.

On the 28th of October, Cocknawaga-Peter, the chief of the Indians of that name, who had been fent, as we have already feen, on a feout by Colonel Bradftreet, and was likewife charged by him with letters for Colonel Bouquet, arrived in the camp. On the 9th of November, the Indians brought in most of their prisoners, consisting of thirty-two Virginia men and sisty-eight women and children; forty-nine Pennsylvania men, and sixty-seven women and children; with Major Smallman, who had been taken the year before by the Wyandots, near Detroit, and by them delivered up to the Shawanese. This gentleman informed the Colonel, that the reason why all the prisoners were not brought in was, that many of the chiefs chiefs were gone to trade with the French; and added, that a report having spread among the Indians, at the approach of his army, that it was his intention to extirpate them, they took the resolution of killing all their prisoners, and defending themselves to the last man; that a French trader amongst them, who had many barrels of powder and ball with him, made them a present of the whole, on their taking this resolution; but that, happily for the captives, whilst the Shawanese were preparing to act this bloody tragedy, they received the Colonel's message, that he had nothing in view but to rescue their English captives from slavery, and grant peace to them, on the same conditions he had already granted it to the Delawares.

On the 9th of November, Colonel Bouquet, accompanied by all the principal officers of the army, held a conference with the Senecas and Delawares. Kigashuta, with ten warriors, represented the former, and Custaloga, at the head of twenty warriors, the latter. Kigashuta opened the conference with faying:

"With this belt of wampum, I wipe the tears from your eyes. We deliver to you these three prisoners, the last of your sless and blood that remained amongst the Senecas, and amongst the Delaware tribe of Custaloga. With this belt we assemble and bury the bones of those who have been killed in this unhappy war, which the evil spirit excited us to kindle. We bury these bones, never more to be thought upon. We cover the burying-place with leaves, that it may be no more seen; and as we have been a long time opposing each other, and the roads between us have been shut up; we offer this belt to Z z z 2 clear, clean, and open them, that we may travel in peace to our brothers, as our ancestors did. As long as you hold it firm at one end, and we at the other, we cannot fail discovering and preventing every thing that may interrupt our friendship."

Colonel Bouquet replied:

" I have heard with pleasure what has been faid to me. I accept the three prifoners, as the last you have to give up; and I join with you in interring the bones of those that war has deftroyed, in fuch a manner, that the place of their interment shall be hid from the eyes of the living. As to peace, I shall no longer oppose it. The King, my Master, and your Father, fends me to make war only; he employs other fervants on the affairs of peace. Sir William Johnson is furnished with full powers to treat with you. You must address vourselves to him. But, before I permit you to depart, two things must be adjusted between us: 1st, As the peace will not be finally concluded here, you must deliver two hostages for the Senecas, and two others for the tribe of Custaloga, to remain in our hands at Fort-Pitt, as a fecurity to us, that you commit no violence against any of his Majesty's subjects; and, when peace shall be concluded, these hostages shall be faithfully returned. 2dly, The deputies you fend to Sir William. Johnson, must be furnished with full powers to treat for your tribes. In the treaties to be made with you, whatever concerns the trade will be regulated in fuch a manner as will endure for ever; and you must now name the deputies for my approbation."

Another

Another conference was held the day following, being the 10th, with the Delawares of the Turkey and the Turtle tribes, in the prefence of the Senecas, and the Delawares of Custaloga's tribe. The result of this meeting was, that the same number of deputies should be sent to Sir William Johnson on their part, and the same number of hostages left, as had been agreed upon for Custaloga's tribe: accordingly, King Custor presented the Colonel, next day, with six hostages, to remain with him, and sive deputies to treat with Sir William Johnson, who were all approved.

On the 14th, the Colonel held a conference with the Shawanefe, who confented to deliver up their prifoners in the fpring, at Fort-Pitt; as they were, at this time, at a great diftance hunting with their mafters, it was impossible to do it fooner. But then, they gave hostages for the performance of their engagements, and appointed deputies to wait on Sir William Johnson, to conclude a peace; both hostages and deputies being such as Colonel Bouquet approved.

All the purposes of the Colonel's expedition being thus accomplished, he decamped on the 18th of November, and began his route for Fort-Pitt, where he arrived on the 28th. The regular troops were then disposed of in the forts, and the provincials, with the prisoners that had been given up, ordered to their respective provinces.

The hostages, who were approved by Colonel Bouquet, did not think proper to observe their engagements: They broke their confinement and returned to their own country. However, we cannot conclude this work without observing, that although.

although the favages did not, in this respect, keep their faith with Colonel Bouquet, yet they regarded the preliminaries and the peace which they had signed with Colonel Bradstreet in so facred a light, that to this hour, they have not violated, in the smallest degree, any one of the articles, and are still desirous of continuing the blessings they thereby enjoy, and the conveniencies they caily experience from a free and mutual intercourse with the different provinces.

THUS have we brought down to the time proposed, the history which we engaged to give the public. But we cannot take leave of the generous encouragers of this undertaking, without expressing our grateful acknowledgments for the journals and plans communicated to us by many general and other respectable officers, employed on the different services which we have related. The only merit we pretend to in this compilation, is, our having strictly adhered to that impartiality which ought to be the first consideration of every historian.

The execution of the plans in general, and their utility in a work of this kind, must so effectually recommend them, as to make it needless for us to speak in their behalf. We shall only add, that no expence or labour has been spared on our part, and every possible care has been taken to render this work as perfect as the nature of the subject would admit.
