Through Tears. If mortal feet some path may trace, Where gladness reigned supreme, Wherein life's mysteries, face to face, Dissolved as in a dream, Then hope her pledges might fulfil, And love and faith prove victors still.

But evermore, the golden day With shadows is inlaid, Where pain and loss along the way Weave in their sombre shade: And though we smile through years,

The smiles lie very near the tears

The pangs each heart alone can know, The cries of pain and want, The feet that falter as they go, The memories that haunt All these, when earth is rich with bloom A mournful ministry assume.

Yet shines one star along the deep Where billows close around; Not those who smile, but those who Draw nearest holy ground: Through tears, we best discern the Hand Which holds all forces at command.

And lives grow eloquent, Then may we learn through tears, to smile. Through grief, to know content, And gather in earth's richest flowers, Refreshed and sweetened by the showers.
