Halley's comet, which was nearest to the sun and to the earth and at its greatest brilliancy more than a year ago has been followed on its journey into distant space with the telescopes of the Lick observatory. The comet is now a little farther than Jupiter is from the sun, that is about 500,000,000 miles, but Astronomer Curtis has photographed it with the Cressley reflector on two nights this week, exactly in the predicted positions. Even with the powerful photographic telescope, the tail of the comet is extremely faint on the plates, and it would no doubt be invisible in the most powerful telescopes if looked at visually. The comet is now sixty per cent. farther away from the sun than it was when its approach to the sun was discovered photographically in September, 1910.

Laird of Skibo Profited Immensely by Absorption of his Business-Mr. Rockefeller Also Stopped.

WASHINGTON, May 27 .- John W. Gates told the house steel investigating ommittee today the history of the United States Steel Corporation. Present at its birth, he described how it was the natural outcome of what he de scribed as the refusal of Andrew Carnegie to be bound by the "gentlemen's agreements" that marked the early days of open competition in the steel business.

He also told of millions lost and cre ated almost in a breath; how the Carnegie mills, appraised at $160,000,000, were reorganized as worth $320,000,000 almost within the time required to make the transfer to the corporation; the clash in formative days, when John D. This, he said, was a forced transaction carried out by Mr. Morgan and other financial leaders to save the Trust Company of America, threatened in the financial upheaval because it had loaned

Mr. Gates revealed how Mr. Morgan alarmed by Mr. Carnegie's plans, had sought the advice of himself and James I Hill: how Charles M. Schwab, who, he said, was the only man who had influence with Mr. Carnegie, was called in to suggest a way to "stop Carnegie," and how the pioneer steel king was curbed, though greatly to his financial gain.

He explained that the steel business was threatened with several demoralizing forces when Carnegie's plans became known, and that Mr. Morgan and others became alarmed, fearing that way interests and steel prices. This was the situation described by Mr. Gates, himself a director in the Republic Iron and Steel company, when Mr. Morgan sent word to him through James J. Hill seeking a conference to determine what could be done. Mr. Charles M. Schwab was the one man who could influence Mr. Carnegie. Out of that came an all-night conference at Mr. Morgan's New York home, the outcome of which was the United States Steel corporation.

Everything upon which the name "DE LAVAL" is stamped must be of the best, and no system of inspection is too rigid nor too expensive to insure this. The result is shown in the unique posion of De Laval separators in the dairy world, where during thirty years their supremacy has never been No one has a better opportunity to determine the relative value of different separators than the creamery operator. He separates milk in large quantities and receives cream from a wide area in which every make of separator is used. Some years ago creamerymen as a class discovered through careful and often tests that the difference between De Laval separators and others was all the difference between profit and loss, with the result that the manufacture of factory size separators was practically discontinuing finement of the NEW IMPROVED DE LAVAL. The difference in manufacturing cost begins with the extra heavy tinware in supply can and covers and is shown in every scientific and mechanical detail of the separator, even to the special enamelling of the handsome frame and the box in which the complete by all but the De Laval Separator Company. Not only do 98 per cent of creamerymen use the De Laval exclusively, but they recommend its use by their patrons on account of the particularly smooth quality of the cream, together with the thorough work of the machine under all conditions, including the production Last year 15,000 users of inferior separators traded them for the De Laval. These men could have bought the De Laval in the first place for the same or less than was paid for the more cheaply-made machines. They have learned from costly experience that the claim that another is "as good" as the Le Laval separator does not make it so, and that a machine which delivers cream from one spout and skim milk from another is not necessarily a cream separator when measured by the De Laval standard. Read the following extract from a letter we have just received: "I know your machine well, having used your No. 1 for some time. Having need for a larger machine I wrote your company, but didn't get in touch with you right away, and in the meantime was led to believe that the M—— would fill the bill, and much to my disgust now find it won't skim a 30 per cent cream and do it perfectly. I have always taken especial care to have machine set perfectly level and on a cement foundation, though the manufacturer claimed it to be unnecessary." This man used the "just as good separator" 3 months, sacrificed $100 and bought a De Laval. There could be no greater mistake upon the part of anyone who milks two or more cows than to put off the purchase of a crea mseparator this year. Two cows and a De Laval will produce as much butter as three cows without the separator, and the labor will be less. If you keep only enough cows to supply your own table the use of a De Laval will give you butter to sell, the proceeds of which will go towards meeting current expenses. The De Laval pays for itself. which will go towards meeting current expenses. The De Laval pays for itself. It earns in cash every time it is used a part of its purchase price and may be

Your nearest De Laval agent will furnish you a machine of suitable size for free trial if desired and you will be at liberty to compare it in your own home with any other kind in case you may doubt the good judgment of creamerymen and almost two million De Laval users. ### VANISHED CIVILIZATIONS

Mexico and Central America, and especially the peninsula of Yucatan, present evidences of a vanished civilization to the secrets of which there is no trustworthy clue. Who the Toltecs, the Mayans and the Aztecs were, whence they came, why their civilization perished and at what date it originated is practically unknown. Antiquarians think they were distinct from the Indian tribes. They have left remarkable evidences of great progress. Thus in Yucatan there are remains of at least 40 cities, hidden for the most part in the recesses of tropical forests. The workmanship is such as indicates high architectural skill, an admirable knowledge of coloring, artistic taste and great facility in carving. he type of the buildings is somewhat similar to that of the Egyptians, a fact that has led some investigators to assume an ancient connection between America and Africa. The Mayans of Yucatan made a sort of paper from eaves on which they wrote in pictorial characters, binding the sheets in books with wooded covers. The pictures on the walls of the dwellings indicate that human sacrifices were offered to their gods. A peculiar feature of the country was the erection of large stone crosses throughout the country. These were so numerous that they reminded th: Spanish invaders of their home and they called the country New Spain. The roads were excelently built, being well paved, and they exist oday although centuries have passed since hey were last repaired as proof of the skill of heir builders. At the time of the Spanish inasion the Mayan civilization had not wholly disappeared, but there is little doubt that it had declined from its ancient splendor.

Aztec civilization had attained a high rank ong before the time of Cortez, and here also there is reason to believe that the race was already on the road to decay before the invaders came. The Aztecs were great builders, and their manners and customs imply a very great antiquity for their social organization. Some recent investigators are disposed to question the accuracy of the descriptions of Aztec civilization that have been popularly received and to which Prescott in his History of Mexico has given so fascinating an interest; but be this as it may, there is no question that the Aztecs represented a race and a culture dissimilar to anything to be found elsewhere in the world in the time of Montezuma.

The Toltecs are thought to have been a race which preceded the Aztecs and the Mayans. The name came to be regarded as a synonym for builders, and the supposition is that many of the more ancient structures in Central America owe their existence to these people. They are supposed to have come from he north and to have been driven southward by more warlike tribes, only to be displaced by Mayans and the Aztecs, who are also supposed to have come from the north. An atempt has been made to fix the date of these migrations, and they are all supposed to have occurred within the past fifteen hundred years, but there seems to be a good deal of difficulty about accepting either the chronology or the supposed course of events. None of the archaeological remains found in North America outside of Mexico and Central America suggest that a race of builders such as the Toltecs were displaced by the Aztecs and that these were displaced by the race ordinarily known as Indians. Neither does the time suggested for the occurrence of this series of events seem long enough to permit of their Apparently we shall have to rest content for the present at least with the knowledge that these civilizations existed and that they have vanished. Traditions innumerable cluster around these people and many have been the efforts to explain them. Some persons have even gone so far as to suggest that the origin of Egyptian civilization is to be found in Central America. But until some trustworthy clue to the Mayan hieroglyphics has een discovered, it is only possible to make more or less probable guesses at the origin and antiquity of these ancient builders.

When it comes to the consideration of the ivilization represented by the ancient irrigaon works of the southwestern states we are holly at sea. We only know that a people inderstanding the uses of irrigation, suffiiently advanced in engineering skill to instal great irrigation works for the storage and disribution of water and with a governmental organization of sufficient permanence to enable such works to be carried on, flourished there and have utterly vanished. The civilization of the Mound-builders has also absolutely perished. There are remains of human handicraft among the forests of Guiana for which no exlanation is known. No one has ever satisactorily explained the origin of the sculptured rocks of Lake Superior. We are, indeed, in America, face to face with archaeological problems of exceptional difficulty. In the case of Egypt, southwestern Asia and the islands and shores of the Mediterranean, there is a species of continuity in history which is wholly lacking in America. It is beginning to appear probable that this supposed continuity is not as certain as it once was thought to be. Many things that 50 years ago were supposed to be mere myths and mere poetic fancies are now being discovered to be merely perverted history. We statements that were rapidly coming to be regarded as fables. Take for example the Deluge traditions. There was at one time a disposition to bundle them all together as so much rubbish and reject them. To this followed a general explanation that there were several deluges local in their nature, but sufficiently widespread in their effects to be regarded as universal by the people who suffered from them. Now as ruins are being unearthed in all quarters of the world and as abundant evidence is being brought to light regarding vanished civilizations, we seem to be slowly but surely forced to the acceptance of an explanation based upon some great and general catastrophe, which overwhelmed a very large portion, if not the whole, of the human race and obliterated all the achievements which had been the result of uncounted centuries of progress.

OWNERSHIP

One admirable thing about the Socialistic ropaganda is that it encourages thought along fundamental lines. It leads to the consideration and discussion of such questions as the origin and nature of ownership in land, the origin and nature of ownership in things, the obligations attaching to ownership, the rights of non-owners, the relative rights and power of the state and the individual, the origin and nature of wealth, and so on. Statesmanship, diplomacy, legislation and jurisprudence deal with things as they are. Socialism endeavors to discover why things are as they are, how they ought to be and by what means they can be made to be as they ought to be. The weak point in the Socialistic propaganda lies in the fact that, as it is popularly advanced, it deals only with half the truth. It disregards the human equation, substituting theory for what is the paramount factor in human progress. With the ultimate aim of Socialism, namely, the promotion of the welfare of the individual, all persons must be in sympathy; but it is open to very grave doubt if there is anything permanent in the Socialist propaganda as it is carried on today, and the leaders of Socialist thought do not so claim. Collective ownership is not the ultimate aim of Socialism, but only one stage in the progress of mankind towards ideal conditions. "Collective ownership?" wrote Simons, editor of the International Socialist Review, "is simply the next logical stage in social evolution." What will result from it cannot be foreseen, because, as Mr. Simons says, the decisions of the majority and the progress of industrial development cannot be known in advance. Socialism, properly considered, is evolution, not revolution. But the Socialist propaganda, as it is now presented, deals with collective ownership as an end and not merely a means, as a conclusion and not merely a stage in progress, as a consummation, as something which of itself will ensure universal happiness.

If we could get an accurate account of the aboriginal conditions of mankind, we would probably find that the idea of ownership was not coeval in its origin with humanity, except so far as actual possession went, the sort of ownership which a dog has in a bone or in a sunny spot where he is taking a nap. Nothing belonged to anybody; the Socialist propaganda teaches that everything ought to belong to everybody, subject only to use by the person actually in possession. The logical conclusion from the latter would be a return to the former. Between collective ownership and no ownership there is no real difference in principle. Hence it is not surprising to find Socialist writers conceding that they do not profess to know what will follow collective ownership. Presumably individual ownership was first exercised in regard to chattels. There is no certainty about this, for we have no records to help us to a conclusion; but it seems reasonable to think that in the lower stages of human advancement the idea of individual property in land would not have been entertained. We know it is not entertained by people, who are now living in a low state of civilization. Tribal ownership is in a sense universal, for national ownership is only a development of it. At what stage in human progress individual ownership in land began to be recognized it is quite impossible to say, for we have no records that extend to a time when it was not acknowledged, and when it did not form the basis of social organization among peoples that had emerged from primitive conditions. We may theorize as we will about the injustice of it, but no one can hope to disprove that the whole fabric of modern civilization has been reared upon individual ownership of land, upon the fact that the right of possession gave an incentive to improvement.

We are frequently told that property in land, as it exists today, is a survival of feudalism.' So it is, in a sense; but feudalism was better than chaos, and without feudalism there would have been chaos. Here we have opened to us a retrospect, which ought to be a valuable guide to the future. In previous articles on this page attention has been directed to the distinction between English and Continental feudalism, and it has been pointed out that William the Conqueror claimed to be the personal owner of all the land of England, with the right to give it to whomsoever he chose. This is the basis of title to land in British countries, only as the Crown has come to be recognized as a trusteeship only for the people, ownership in land in British countries is really collective fundamentally, and this principle is demonstrated in the United States, where the seem to find ourselves driven to accept as facts ultimate title to all lands is vested in the State, and it is the people who constitute the State, not the land, nor the government, nor anything else than an aggregation of individuals acting in unison for mutual advantage. The principle of ultimate collective ownership less influenced millions of people long before is recognized in all our legislation, and is known as the doctrine of eminent domain. Individual ownership is subject to collective ownership, but there is at present no restriction upon the area of land which an individual may own. The Socialist propaganda seeks to restrict this capacity of ownership both as to area and as to tenure.

Ownership in the means of production is the outgrowth of inventive genius. Before the invention of modern machinery, this ownership was unimportant, because it was individual skill that counted in production. A good shoe-maker working in his little shop could make more and better shoes than a poor shoemaker. Machinery has changed this. Except in a few instances no one now makes a shoe wholly by hand. Machinery has largely taken the place of skill. But machinery without labor could produce nothing. Therefore the Socialist propaganda aims at the collective ownership of the facilities of production.

Such are some of the aspects of ownership about which hundreds of thousands of men are thinking deeply. There is not the least use in seeking to arrest this tide of thought by applying harsh names to the thinkers, mistaken in their conclusions and their methods though they may be. The protests of conservatism will be as unavailing against it as were the edicts of prelates against the Renascence. If those of us who are not Socialists are wise, we will begin to do a little thinking ourselves.

THE OBJECT OF PHILOSOPHY

II Kaut's second question was: What ought I to do? It is obvious that when he seeks to answer this question from the standpoint of philosophy, he must eliminate every consideration of divine or human commands. The Ten Commandments must carry no more moral weight with him than the most unimportant municipal by-law. He must seek to discover what is right in itself or, conversely, what is wrong in itself. The fact that a thing is prodence that it is wrong. We may see, as we most without parallel. follow the argument, that it may be wrong to violate human enactments, and that there is divinity behind law but primarily we must start out with the fact of human freedom of action, which cannot in the very nature of things be wrong. If man is not free to act, he can do no wrong, for that which is not freely done is done of necessity and because of inexorable law, and what is lawful cannot be wrong. On the other hand, if man is free to act, his exercise of that freedom in any way Wrongfulness is the misuse of freedom of

If we can imagine a person, who from earliest childhood has lived alone without knowledge of the existence of any other human being, it seems impossible that such a person could do anything wrong, and it is almost impossible to suggest what wrong an adult person placed by circumstances in absolute solitude could possibly do. It is, however, evident that, if this solitude were once broken by the coming of a second person, the possibility of wrong-doing would at once arise. The test between right and wrong would in such a case be whether any act done by one would injure or benefit the other, or would be a matter of indifference. If it would be a matter of indifference it would not be wrong; if it would be beneficial it would undoubtedly be right. Multiply the two persons by a thousand, and at once this elementary and simple test becomes more complicated, and artificial law would have to supplement natural law. Certain things that a man might lawfully do if alone, he might not lawfully do if another had to be considered, and in proportion as the number of persons to be considered increased, the restrictions of freedom of action would be increased, and to violate these necessary restrictions would be as wrongful as to violate the natural obligations, which each of two individuals in the supposed case owed to each other.

It is not suggested that the whole fabric of law was evolved in this simple and elementary manner. In all probability force had its share in its development. If mankind ever did live in an absolutely primitive condition, might must have been right at a very early stage in the development of human society. But in a philosophical analysis of the nature of right and wrong, considerations of an extraneous character must be dismissed. We must imagine man not only theoretically, but practically free to act, and when we have done this we will find ourselves driven to accept as the guide of human conduct certain maxims laid down as the result of human experience. We find one of these in the old saying of the Common Law, that we should so use that which is ours that we may not injure that which is another's, and also in the saying of Confucius, that we should not to do to others what we would not have them do to us. The Golden Rule laid down by Jesus of Nazareth carries the principle further than the Common Law or the philosophy of Confucius. It extends a negative obligation into a positive duty and tells us that we should do unto others what we would that others should do unto us. Here we have a distinct advance upon mere natural law. We have the introduction of a new principle, namely, that others have a right not only to our passive action had its origin with Jesus. It doubt-less influenced millions of people long before He clothed it in words. The principle in-volved in it is the direct opposite of selfishness. It is what the Great Teacher meant when He spoke of love as the fulfilling of law. It logically follows that as the perfect application of this principle would beyond all question make our relations to each other faultless, it is the fundamental principle for the guidance of human action, and as much a part of the estab-lished order of things as is the force which we call gravitation. Hence if the Universe is of divine origin, and what we call the laws of nature are of divine origin, so also the laws which regulate human action must also be of divine origin. The test then of what we ought to do is whether or not it is something, which if universally done, would advance the welfare of human society, human progress and human happiness. If it would, it is right; if it would not, it is wrong.

Stories of the Classics (N. de Bertrand Lugrin)

THE STORY OF CORIOLANUS

"And whereas others made glory the end of their daring, the end of his glory was his mother's gladness."-Plutarch.

There is perhaps not one among the ancient heroes of history who makes such a direct appeal to our sympathies, or who stimulates so powerfully our loftiest sentiments as this great Roman general, whose character, unlike that of most of his contemporaries, was not so many sided as to be of an inconsistent nature, but who, except for the greatness of his pride, which would never permit him to take half measures or to compromise, possessed no faults, whose motives were apparently always the highest, and whose accomplishments, both hibited must not be taken as conclusive evi- in the political and the military fields, were al-

And before we continue further with our story, let us recount the manner in which he received the surname of Coriolanus. He was born Caius Marcius, of the patrician house of the Marcii, in Rome. His father died while he was very young, and his mother was wholly responsible for his upbringing. The understanding between these two was perfect, their love for one another the tenderest of ties. From his earliest childhood the praise of his mother was the son's dearest reward. Hers was the he may prefer cannot of itself be wrong. first welcome which the young hero, returning from battle, sought; it was at her feet he laid the laurel and oak wreaths with which his valor had been crowned.

The Romans were at war with the Volscian nation, and had attacked their principal city, Corioli. The day was going against the besiegers, when Marcius, with a slender column, hurried out upon the field, and successfully engaged the enemy, at the same time calling upon the Romans to renew the attack, so inspiring them by his own courage and daring, that they were given a fresh impetus, and rallied to do battle with such energy that the Volscians soon retreated. Whereupon the Romans, urged on by Marcius, drove the Volscians through the very gates of their city and captured it. The next day, when Marcius, with the rest of the army, presented himself at the consul's test, Cominius rose, and having rendered all due acknowledgments to the gods for the success of their enterprise, turned next to Marcius, and first of all delivered the strongest encomium upon his rare exploits, which he had partly been an eye-witness of himself in the late battle, and had partly learned from the testimony of Lartius. And then he required him to choose a tenth part of all the treasure and horses and captives that had fallen into their hands before any division should be made to others; besides which he made him the special present of a horse with trappings and ornaments, in honor of his actions. The whole army applauded: Marcius, however, stepped forth and, declaring his thankful acceptance of the horse, and his gratitude at the praises of his general, said that all other things, which he could only regard as mercenary advantages than any signification of honor, he must waive, and should be content with the ordinary proportion of such rewards. "I have only," said he, "one special grace to beg, and this I hope you will not deny me. There was a certain hospitable friend of mine among the Volscians, a man of probity and virtue, who is become a prisoner ,and from former wealth and freedom is now reduced to servitude. Among his many misfortunes let my intercessions redeem him from the one of being sold as a common slave." Such a refusal and such a request upon the part of Marcius were followed by yet louder acclamations. . . . When the noise of approbation and applause ceased, Cominius, resuming, said, "It is idle, fellow-soldiers, to force and obtrude those other gifts of ours upon one who is unwilling to accept them; let us therefore give him one of such a kind that he cannot well reject; let us pass a vote, I mean, that he shall hereafter be called Coriolanus.'

At this time in Rome there was much hostility between the rich and the poor, or the patricians and the plebians, for the number of others have a right not only to our passive the latter was very large, due doubtless to the omission to do anything that will injure them, fact that war had called so many from the fields, that large tracts of arable land had been left untilled, and there was a dearth of corn. As is always the case in time of national poverty, there were not wanting numerous agitators who used the condition of affairs as a whip to goad the people. Coriolanus, one of the proudest of the patricians, became a target for most of the abuse, as, aristocrat to the backbone, he would tolerate no compromise, insisting that all the power should be in the hands of the senate, and that the office of Tribune, by which office the people were solely represented, should be abolished. Unlike most of his cautious associates, he did not hesitate to openly express his views, scorning the hostility thereby created among the plebians.

And yet he had lived such a brave and virtuous life that at the critical moment the populace wavered, being of a strong mind to elect him when he offered himself as a candidate for the consulship. As was the custom in those days, he had presented himself in the forum without his tunic, and only his toga about him. This garment so displayed his body that one and all might see the countless scars he had received in battle. He was no longer a young man, and when the people beheld him grown grey and battle-marked in the service of his country, they applauded him with a great show of emotion. But when they viewed his following, the pompous train of scenators and the crowds of solicitous patricians, perhaps they feared that his election to office might mean his usurpation of too much authority, and conditions worse for them than was the case at present. At all events he was not elected, and his defeat only spelt the beginning of his trials.

"Nonsense, my friend!" said the traveler.
"Tell me, do I look as if I'd lie for such a mere trifle as two-pence?"

The lift-man subjected the ticketless traveler's visage to a long and careful scrutiny. Then, after a mental summing up of its component qualities, he observed: "I'm afraid, sir, I must trouble you for two-

HERE AND THERE

Scottish Immigrants

In the past ten years the increase in the population of Scotland was only a quarter of a million. The previous decade the increase had been half a million. This state of affairs is due, it is contended to the large emigration and it is deplored by many loval Scotsmen in the home land. A more serious aspect of the case is that while the city population continues to increase the land is being gradually deserted. It seems strange that in the twen tieth century there should be an outcry against the emigration that was so conspicuous feature of the early part of the nineteenth. The descendants of these early immigrants form a very large part of the population of Canada and are to be found in every city of the United States. They form, on the whole, a very prosperous and enterprising people. The descendants of Highland fishermen and crofters are filling chairs in universities and are heads of great business and industrial concerns. They have been among the successful pioneers in every province. In every profession and in every legislature in Canada they fill honorable places.

The one dramatic speech of the day JUSTICE HARLAN situation. was made by Deputy Jose Aspe.

In introducing the president's letter of resignation, Deputy Aspe delivered one of the most brilliant oratorical efforts with which the chamber has ever rung. His voice was repeatedly drowned with applause and the floor fairly shook with the demonstration which followed his peroration: "President Porfirio Diaz is dead. Long live Citizen Porfirio Diaz." The speaker admitted that General Diaz had been called to account for his errors by a people who had progressed faster than the author progress had realized, but he declared the good that General Diaz had done would live forever in history and outweigh his mistakes.

After Judge Main had denied applications for change of venue to another county and for a continuance, the defence made an effort to show that the offered by Spanish aero clubs, proved case should be transferred from Judge Main's division to another department aeroplane has yet been subjected, and of the King county court. In support of this motion it was asserted that Judge Main's affiliation with the First Presbyterian church, of which Dr. Mark A. Matthews is pastor, would cause him to be prejudiced against Wappenstein. The defence argued that such bias would naturally arise from the fact that Detective J. Burns, who worked up the case against Wappenstein, was employed by Dr. Matthews. In overruling the motion Judge Main asserted that he was conscious of no bias; that he never permitted his religpattle in the ascent. ### ALL THE RUNNING

What a buck he gave at the paddock gate! And how did the gay crowd banter What a hold he took all down the straight, When I shook him up for a canter.

At the starting post he was quick as a deer; I never saw one that could match him; When the flag went down he was two lengths

And I knew they would never catch him.

Those two short lengths he had changed to Where the first fence crossed the hollow:

He topped the twigs by a foot or more With the ease of a flying swallow: Down in the dip he was eight lengths clear,

You could neither hold nor bind him;

The hoofs of the rest I could hardly hear

When the next fence flashed behind him. My tired arms ached as he tugged the rein In his slashing stride extended; The field strung out in an endless chain,

And the pace was hot and splendid. Faster and faster still he flew, When I felt his stride grow shorter, For the fence ahead was a fence he knew. And he knew that gleam meant water.

CHEETAH-HUNTING IN INDIA

"Alri!" And with a grunt I had turned over and was asleep again. But the faithful Yallo, imself a bit of a sportsman, cared for none of lese things. Slowly and methodically he ought me back to consciousness and to the act that for some reason or other I was to be

Ah! the cheetah-hunt. To the uninitiated suggests a jungle beat, with a fantastia of sackbut, psaltery, etc., at one end, and three four .500 express rifles at the other. In ality, it is a very different thing. The obctive is black-buck, and the cheetah plays the rt of pursuer. At one time every Indian ijah, with or without a penny to his name, pt a "kennel" of cheetahs for sporting purses, but now owing one cause or another, two establishments are kept up to the of my knowledge-those of the Gaekwar Baroda and the Nizam of Hyderabad; and to the former of these two native chiefs we were indebted for our morning's sport. cheetah is a very difficult animal to rear, he has all the cotton-wool propensities of greyhound or the racehorse. In fact, he is on much the same lines, endurance being ificed to speed. Like all wild animals in ptivity, he becomes more susceptible to dises, and especially chest complaints. He es not compare favourably with the panther personal appearance, for his skin is not so ght and the black spots are not nearly so ective as the larger black rings affected by is cousin.

was a dour morning for last night's eller. The prospect was uninviting—dark, old, and raw—a good eight or ten miles out to the country, and complete oblivion of havg made any arrangements overnight. And then to my rescue came that sweetest of anachronisms— a motor-car. Fancy going forth hunt the wily buck throught Indian jungle a motor-car! True, the last two or three miles had to be accomplished on ponies, as more in sorrow than in anger, had they attempted the last piece of the road. We arrived, to find an interested crowd surrounding a bullock cart, on which sat, sublimely indifferent, His Highness the cheetah. Little cared he for the polite attentions of the ladies or for the somewhat personal remarks of the men on his emaciated appearance.

Except for the hood over his eyes, he looked like an abnormal specimen of the domestic cat; every moment one expected to hear a gentle purr. And yet there are times when no one, except his stable companion a small boy some 10 or 12 years old, will undertake to manage him. Eventually, some twenty or thirty enthusiasts had assembled, and among them some ladies, whose sporting instincts had been weighed in the balance and found wanting. Have you ever seen a lady come out in a long skirt to walk up partridges after lunch? It is a piteous spectacle. One can picture so well the struggle that has taken place in Eve's mind, and how eventually fig-leaf vanity won the day. Today the primal curse has taken the shape of a number of white dresses, which must be visible to the most confiding of bucks at the distance of half a mile. However, after a severe reprimand from the M. C. (master of ceremonies, of cheetah hunt), they are permitted to follow in bullock carts at a respectful distance.

Gradually we emerge on to a good level. plain of jungle, well covered with babul, a bush much resembling our blackthorn in general appearance, but, if anything, even more tenacious. And here let me add, for the benefit of the uninitiated, that "jungle" does not mean vast impenetrable forest, with monkeys and parrots chattering overhead, and rank undergrowth, 8 feet to 10 feet high, beneath, with snakes working themselves into coils on the right, and panthers screaming for our blood on the left. It is a purely negative term; any uncultivated plot of ground, in fact, may be dignified by the name of jungle.

In this special preserve of the Gaekwar there was not a blade of grass to be seen; it. had all been burnt, according to the erroneous and strictly uneconomical native fashion, and yet large herds of these solely graminivorous animals could be fairly descried in the distance. The black skin of the buck could just be distinguished from the fawn-coloured doe, but as yet no horns were visible to the naked eye. And now a plan of campaign must be arranged.

Sun, wind, and cover must all be taken into consideration before the bullock cart can begin its slow perambulation. Smaller and smaller grow the circles, the buck still regarding the bullockcart with stolid indifference. Our friend the cheetah, still closely hooded, grows restless, and begins to sniff th ment has not yet come. The buck must be looking the other way, or unsuspiciously grazing imaginary grass. Now! "Spots" is unhooded, and after one look round, leaps quietly to the ground.

Who is there who has not spent a lazy hour watching a cat stalking some innocent wagtail disporting itself on the lawn; how well she avails herself of each vantage of cover, how flat and motionless she lies, when she sees her victim ill at ease? All this we now see on a grander scale. But the cheetah shows more impetuosity; maybe the pangs of hunger are to blame. Three springs and he is in the midst of the herd. North, south, east and west they scatter, and for one fatal moment our friend pauses in the midst of this embarras de richesses.

A nice three-year old takes his fancy, and off he dashes in pursuit: a beautiful, smooth, easy action, not unlike that of a greyhound. The buck with his long, thin legs covers the ground at immense speed, and quickly disappears behind a thick clump of bushes. The cheetah is fast closing with him. Poor buck! no more will he go a-searching for the newest and daintiest blades of grass, no more indulge in herce contest with a rival to the claims for fair Amaryllis-standing apart there in the shade. His hour is come-when suddenly the cheetah stops dead. What is it? There he was gaining a foot in every yard, and apparently as keen as ever hunter was.

Put a horse trained to 5 furlongs into a mile race; and where will he be? So with the cheetah, his powers of endurance are very limited, and he is of rather a sulky temperament withal. Without difficulty he is recaptured by his diminutive keeper, and brought back in disgrace, with the expression, "I shan't play," plainly written on his face. And now, poor fellow, he is the object of much anathematizing: "Did I get out of bed at four o'clock to see this rotten show"? "The sulkiest brute I ever saw," and so on. However, the morn is young; the dew still glistens; the whole charm of sport lies in the uncertainty thereof.

Another herd is soon sighted, and the same careful process of stalking carried out. But this time the cheetah makes no mistake. From the moment his hood is lifted, he has set his heart on one particular buck. This time, as good luck will have it, the chase is in the open. He gains in every stride-now he is running level, and now he has made a spring at his victim's throat. Over goes the buck like a ninepin, but unlike that innocent toy of one's childhood, up he gets again, and makes a last dash for liberty. But "Spots" is relentless; he has even the directors of the Dunlop Company never really loosened his hold, and in another sucking the life-blood from the victim's throat. And now a difficulty arises, for it is as much as a man's life is worth to try and take the buck from him now; he must be left in undisturbed possession for at least five minutes. Then one of two courses may be adopted. Either a long spoon is filled with blood, and is used as a lure, or else his attention is diverted to one of the hindquarters, which is quietly cut away from the rest, and he suffers himself to be led back again to the cart without casting a thought on the main body he is leaving. And so the sport ends. By this time the sun is high in the heavens and blazing fiercely, and during our return journey we are only buoyed up by the picture of a long glass, a long chair, and a long

The question which must inevitably crop up over the after-dinner cheroot is, "Is it really sport?" To which I reply, that if coursing is sport, then so is cheetah hunting. In this case the buck has more chance than the hare, for he has only one pursuer: also, if he can manage to keep up a hot pace for some distance, the cheetah will tire and give up the chase, for he is not a stout-hearted animal. To Indian sportsmen there is a certain novelty in taking sides with an animal which one is accustomed to regard as an enemy. But the real charm, which must be seen to be appreciated, lies in watching the subtle movements of the cheetah. First the crouching walk, then the silent trot, finally the break into a magnificent series of bounds which show off the long lithe body to perfection. There is a grim silence about his movements. Like the ideal good little boy, he is to be seen and not heard, not even in the moment of triumph when he makes his final spring. The chase finished, the fun begins for the cheetah, but ends for the spectator. Only such people as will always go a mile to see a man who has been run over, or a case of suicide, would care to linger over the final scene. Like his first cousin the panther, he first drinks the blood from the neck, and then sets to work with less refinement on the rest of the body. There let us leave him. May he live long, and pull down many another buck, before he himself be cut off by the relentless Fate. F. H. D. JOY, in Baily's.

A DRY-FLY PROGRAMME

The trouts which I shall catch this summer are all great fair fishes. They shall number a hundred and one and they shall weigh 250lb. My average shall thus be, not 21/2lb., because nobody credits these round figures, but two pounds and forty-eight one-hundred-andoneths, a figure which bears on its face the stamp of very truth. I shall eat of these fishes thirty-four, my wife another thirty-four, and of the remainder I shall send two-thirds to people that we love. The third shall be placed with discretion where they may best further my professional ambitions.

The greatest of my trouts shall weigh 4lb., for I would propose to Fortune nothing that is unimaginable, nor do I wish to overshoot my present furthest mark by any astonishing measure. I am still a comparatively young man, and the claims of coming years are not to be neglected. I profoundly pity that little boy, of whom one is always hearing, who takes a 14lb. trout while fishing for eels. He is by no means to be congratulated, for he has practically nothing to live for. He has caught his biggest trout. He had better take to golf at once. No, this summer I propose to do nothing which shall compromise my future. I will advance by no more than nine ounces. I shall take this fine fish under the following conditions: I shall find him on a morning in early May. He shall lie on the glide below Crab Hatch, and at first I shall take him for a small bed of weed. But as I look about for other fishes there shall come a little ring in the water and I shall catch the gleam of a great yellow side that turns in the sunlight, and I shall crouch, with my heart leaping against my ribs. Then shall I deliver a very perfect cast and he shall come up, and I shall miss him and he shall flee into the depths of the pool, and by and by I shall go on. Early May is the wrong time for the taking of great troutsthis is what I shall tell myself. "Not until une," I shall say, "not until June will I snare this fish." And on the morrow I shall be angling for him, but I shall not take him. And on the morrow. And on the morrow.

In July I shall slay him on a warm, moist afternoon following a week of great failure. For a week shall the smitten valley have swum in twinkling haze, for a week shall the wise cattle have dwelt all day beneath their elms, for week shall the fool angler have crawled fainting beside a stream devoid of fishes. And lo, towards noon of the eighth day a change shall come, a greyness, a mitigation of the intolerable glare. High overhead the blue shall grow all laced with filmy white. The downs shall recede, the birds begin to call. Hope shall whisper, "There is a sound of abundance of rain." And near two o'clock it shall come, softly, nor shall there be any thunder. And when I shall stand beside Crab ilatch the great one will be feeding and I shall take him at the first cast, and my soul shall sing while we battle in the heavy water of the pool.

I propose to take my second largest fish about ten o'clock on May I at the very bottom of the water and at my first cast. He is to weigh 3lb. 10z. Thus he will not be bigger would, have felt bound to burn their tyres, 25 yards he has dragged down his quarry, and very inauspicious opening, but sufficiently by the time we arrive he is already engaged in enormous to place me for my first day of fishing quite beyond the power of discontent. And I think that I will have a gallery; not a keeper, but a brother angler, some good fellow who shall unenviously rejoice with me while we go in search of his own first trout. I would nearly always be alone when I grass a fine fish, but most especially whenever I top my weight; for the triumph on these latter occasions should be altogether over oneself. It should be a pure and noble triumph, not to be muddied by that base joy which is inseparable from the act of landing a good fish before the eyes of another fisherman. But on May 1 I will have an angler beside me at the lower end. I would have that moment stuffed with every kind of pleasure, for last year I did not fish at all, and my appetite by May will be hard to glut.

This season I shall find that I have learned to distinguish between the rises of little graylings and those of personable trouts The sardonic dabchick shall dive in vain as I round the corners of my stream; the plausible vole no longer shall deceive my ear. And far up the stream I shall mark a break in the surface, and I shall only smile at the antics of a swift. And under the bank frogs shall burst with spite as I go unheeding on. Touching the graylings which I propose to kill, I am not very particular as to their number so long as it be above seventy, or their aggregate weight so long as it be generous. I put it roughly at 200lb., but I shall not complain if it be a little less. Nor do Linsist on any single fish of any stupendous size. A 5pounder will amply content me. The element of uncertainty (as it is called) is that which chiefly causes fishing to fascinate, and I were mad did I lay up a dull summer for myself by wholly rejecting this important feature of the sport. Thus on no day after June shall I go forth without owning the possibility of some great and unexpected triumph. I say after une, for I am quite determined that no grayings shall annoy me until they are takeable. There shall be no maddening five minutes' nursing back to life some fat, undesired, purple slug of a fish that has interferred between myself and my legitimate prey; no anguished speculation as to how much longer the big trouts can go on rising. Nor shall I sweat blood while I fight the temptation to knock the brute on the head and be done with it. There shall be none of that. On July 1 the graylings shall begin to rise. Till then let them chew duckweed and keep in their place. During August I will hold carnival among them. September shall find them still greedy. After that they may do as they please, for I shall

My best day shall happen in the end of June Three brace before lunch, one brace daping in the Still Backwater before tea, one brace in the three Meadows just before sunset, and one brace fishing the mill pool while the sedges sail black out of the afterglow. My creel shall not contain the fishes which I shall catch that day. As I walk home there will be a 3-pounder in each wader. And I shall have returned trouts that other men would stuff. The mention of my waders reminds me that on no occasion during the forthcoming season am I to step too deeply in the water. My waders shall not leak at any time, and my brogues shall not come apart. All my tackle shall stand by me valiantly. All willow tips shall come readily away. My scissors shall never forget to come fishing. There shall always be a red quill to my hand when I want one. The wind shall never disturb my flies over the surrounding meadow. My line shall never twist itself round the rod between the second and third rings, a feat which is so clearly impossible that I can never believe my eyes when it has been performed. For the weather forecast, we are to have soft airs nearly all summer from the south and west, high fresh weather. The big clouds shall troop slowly across the sky all morning, and then come to rest aloft to brood benevolently upon the valley. Such weather uplifts the soul, and my soul is by all means to be uplifted this season. In the evenings we shall have fine displays in the west, and I have arranged for a full moon every night. It is to be a great year for roses. The thyme on the downs shall blossom as never before. And some contrivance must be found for sending all the motor-cars by another road.

Rain shall fall mostly by night, and the lawn shall always be our dining-room. Tea shall always be ready when I come in for it. Always I shall find my waders turned of a morning Such men as come to angle shall do prodigiously. No neighbour shall call upon us. The newspaper shall never fail, nor the carrier, nor the water supply. The fowls, too, shall lay for their lives, and oh, the succulence that must distinguish the strawberries.-W. Quilliam, in the Field.

THE KING OF THE WEIR POOL

My first sight of him was on Whit Sunday, when I was lazing in a Canadian canoe in the weir pool with Jackson. We both saw him come out, a perfect leviathan of a trout. "He is fourteen pounds if an ounce!" said Jackson in an awestruck whisper; "we ought to have a go at him tomorrow." With confidence I answered: "We'll have him all right That fish is ours. When we are old men our grandchildren will talk of the monster 'trout that you and I caught in Burley Weir Pool." "Have you ever caught a Thames trout?" broke in Jackson brutally.

As a matter of fact, I never had. And in the innocence of my heart I imagined that you fished for them as for their relations of Dart or Tavy, while Jackson, base deciever that he was, thought the same. So we spent nearly the whole of Whit Monday flogging the weir pool with every pattern of fly we possessed, with big chub flies, with lures beloved of salmon trout. The result of our labors gave us three fair-sized chub, which, of course, we had to return; but of trout we saw never a glimpse. Tentative inquiries, veiled beneath an assumption of knowledge that neither of us possessed, revealed the fact that to secure Thames trout you must either use live bait or a spinning minnow. Whit Tuesday saw us back at the weir pool with three or four different patterns of phantoms, and a fierce resolve to bring the monster to

And here let me pause to sublimate a few pungent reflections for the benefit of the man who sold Jackson the spinning minnow that lured the giant to our undoing. Yes, Jackson did undoubtedly get into the monster. The fight may have lasted six seconds-long enough to give the startled Jackson a brief foretaste of what might have happened if that wretched phantom had played the game and allowed him to play the fish. His reel screamed-sweeter music than that wild fugue I know not-back came his line, at the end of it a useless, hookless phantom-at least, the flight of hooks was still there, minus every barb We swore. I know that there was no justification for such a lapse of good manners; but, I freely admit, we swore. And, of course, our friend, with six barbs in his upper or lower lips, would not come again for more, like Oliver, of distinguished memory. To secure a brace of little jack, that had to be returned, was small compensation for such a blow.

The next day Jackson had to go back to town, and I spent the whole of the next seven days in useless efforts to catch the great fish. got six jack one exening, and each time I struck home there came to me a tiny thrill that died on birth. "Is this he?" Of course, it was not. The sixth jack I murdered out of sheer savage rage. If there is a penalty for the crime, I will pay it cheerfully. Then I heard that a small boy fishing with roach tackle, with paste for bait, had secured a quite presentable trout of 31/21b., not far from where I had myself seen the monster rise. This fired me anew, and I once more set forth on the quest, with the result that I netted a chub, that had as much fight in it as a portmanteau, of about 11/2lb., and had the dubious satisfaction of seeing Master Leviathan again fling himself out of the weir pool, as though in derision at my puny efforts. Needless to say, I tried him with every imaginable kind of lure, with as much want of success as always.

And so time passed until June 16 came, and with it the opening of the course fishing, and a positive forest of rods all up the towpath from Richmond to Oxford, and I daresay beyond.

A Choice Selection of Rebound Novels

at 60c, Each

The Evolution of the Famous Reprints Which We Sell for 60¢ The reading public has ever shown a partiality for a good story as against any other form of literature. And the average reader is as anxious to keep in touch with the modern novel as ladies are to be in the fashion. The cost of new novels make their purchase a luxury. The circulating libraries came into being to meet this difficulty, but there are many things which have thrown libraries into disfavor-chiefly the trouble of getting just the book required and the questionable state of some of the volumes handed out. The problem of supplying a book worth buying to read and keep at a price less than half that formerly asked was finally solved by an enterprising firm of publishers. As a result they have jumped from obscurity to be, in point of sales, the leading publishers of the world. Just note the following list of the hundreds they publish, all illustrated, well printed and bound, and most of them in handsome wrappers:

The Riverman, by White. The Music Master, by Klem. Doctor Lavendov's People, by The Thirteenth District, by Deland. Comrades, by Dixon.

The Usurper, by Locke. Where Love Is, by Miller. She That Hesitates, by Miller. Like Another Helen, by Miller. The Scarlet Empire, by Miller. The Yoke, by Miller.

"Doc" Gordon, by Miller.
The Third Degree, by Phillip. Phillip. The Fashionable Adventures of Joshua Craig, by Phillip. When a Man Marries, by Mil-

A Husband by Proxy, by Miller. The Fortunes of Fifi, by Miller.
