The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) rightly pointed up the failure of the bill to provide municipalities with the sinews of war, the municipalities that are the front line in the battle with water pollution. This, I might point out, Mr. Speaker, is the very area in which, for the past 15 years, the Ontario government has been waging its principal fight by enabling municipalities to get capital at nominal cost to enable them to build and operate the sewage disposal plants and filtration plants that are the essential units of antipollution effort. I suggest to the minister that, if and when he ever gets around to trying to set up his joint control boards, he will find provincial and municipal authorities are already enjoying a wealth of experience and success in this field. He may even be forced to admit eventually that he and his army of experts have no exclusive jurisdiction when it comes to knowledge, ability and know-how.

• (4:30 p.m.)

This, of course, is one of the great weaknesses of a generally weak bill. Nowhere in it is the fundamental question of the financing of water control measures dealt with. Yet this is vital to effective action. The absence of this basic provision from the bill is sufficient reason in itself to withdraw it and have it completely redrafted.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault), who enjoys the odd distinction of being unknown to his own leader, talked glibly of the necessity of getting the co-operation of municipalities and provinces in putting the provisions of this bill into action. He should know, and his government should know, that this co-operation can only be forthcoming if the federal authority is willing to get down to brass tacks and talk about the financing of antipollution measures. This question will not just go away if it is not talked about. There is hardly a municipality or a province in Canada that is not away ahead of the federal government in appreciation of the menace of pollution and the need to fight it everywhere and all the time. But they know that effective action requires more than fine words and ringing slogans at a ministerial press conference, and more than a bill with more holes in it than a round of Swiss cheese.

They know that effective antipollution work takes money, tax money in massive amounts. They know, too, that they do not have that kind of money and little prospect of raising it from the share of the tax base at their disposal. I am afraid the minister and his colleagues are going to have to put their money where their mouth is if they expect to get the required co-operation from those who are already veterans of the fight against pollution.

The member for Burnaby-Seymour said at least one thing that made sense. He described this bill as "modest" and without any claim to being the instrument to "solve these problems". Perhaps we can persuade him to add his voice to the voices of those in this House who believe this bill to be completely inadequate and who believe it should now be withdrawn and redrafted.

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I think it is very difficult to evaluate the hazards due to water, air and soil pollution. As regards health, the present situation may be compared to a time bomb. In fact, the effects of pollution have just begun to appear but they will be felt more strongly within the next few years.

The wind may bring us foul smells, but it happens also that our rivers leave traces of dirt.

We, in the Quebec region, more particularly those of us who live in the St. Lawrence valley, have already felt the effects of water pollution, especially at the socio-economic level.

In fact, during the summer of 1967, commercial fishermen who had been fishing in the St. Lawrence river for several years and successfully earning their living and that of their family, had to give up their trade. In spite of the fact that two and a half years have passed since, many are still unemployed and have to be satisfied with social welfare allowances.

Fishermen enjoy a reputation of long standing and they are recognized as good workers. Those from the area of Quebec city and Trois-Rivières did not rely wholly on luck, because they were well equipped. They owned very modern material such as draw-nets several hundred feet long and enormous traps which change name according to areas and which are often made of various materials.

A fisherman does not really fish. It might be said rather that he draws up thousands of pounds of fish and, if all goes well, he may even assess his catch in tons.

Up to the fall of 1966 this was the situation in the centre of Quebec, on the St. Lawrence, between Orleans island and Montreal. Only in the fall of 1966 and in the spring of 1966 did it become tragic.

People who could manage with a salary of $5,000 or $7,000 a year saw this income reduced to nothing. In fact, all fish species—pike, doré, bass, carp and eel have vanished. And this is not merely a form of speech since the fish had been poisoned and was washed up by the sea.

We know that matters relating to water pollution are studied by the federal government in conjunction with the provinces.

However, since fish is disappearing from the St. Lawrence river, we must realize that the federal government and the Quebec government have never moved beyond the study stage. Highly-paid technicians are still pursuing studies; they do not exert themselves too much and they manage to justify their work in the eyes of the population by publishing a press release once in a while.

In my opinion, the most ridiculous step was taken in 1967 by the federal Minister of Agriculture. In the summer of 1967, if my memory serves me well, the Canadian government sent a pamphlet to the farmers in which it urged them never to dispose of old DDT containers in streams. They were asked to use any other means, for instance, to burn them or to bury them in the ground. All means except that one were good. The recommendation served to distract the attention of the people from the real problem, since, while the farmers worried about drops of DDT, the Expo Corporation was dumping into the St. Lawrence river thousands of pounds of rothane, a violent poison, commonly called DDD.

With the blessing of the federal and provincial governments this poison was used widely during the whole time of the building of the Expo site.

In the spring of 1967, 2,700 gallons of this poison, or 27,000 pounds, were dumped near the Expo site. And this criminal act was repeated regularly twice in 1966 and only once in 1965.

Today, Bill C-144 is before the House. To my mind, this bill could bring the government to take a stand. But why should the bill come to us so late, after the damage is done? Provincial governments are not assuming their responsibilities, and we know why: because of electoral funds.

For instance, when a lumber company wishes to obtain a timber concession from the government, all it has to do is give money to the electoral funds of political parties. To be allowed to dump plant wastes freely into our rivers, big industries maintain a conspiracy within provincial governments through contributions to the electoral funds.

In Quebec, companies must supply the provincial government with a water sample. It is strange, however, that the sampling should be entrusted to the companies' own technicians.

Now, the technician is smart enough to know where to get his samples so as not to cause his employer any trouble. No technician would take his sample at the mouth of the sewage system of the company that employs him.

It is clear that "troubled" water would cause "troubles". I dare say his position would be jeopardized. Provincial governments were in no rush to note the danger of pollution because, as I said, electoral funds blocked their eyes and their nose.

Some companies that are developing our natural resources were not more honest since while they were poisoning our lakes and rivers, by dumping their waste in them, they sent to the responsible department of the province of Quebec a sample of pure water that was taken at the source of the streams.

One paragraph of the bill says, and I quote:

(g) "inter-jurisdictional waters" means any waters, whether international, boundary or otherwise, that, whether wholly situated in a province or not, significantly affect waters outside such province;

Since the water dividing line has not been established yet, I am somewhat disturbed. Unfortunately that has encouraged laziness until now, for many aspects of this problem have not been clarified yet, as concerns the St. Lawrence, for instance.

In a certain area, a number of people were using that river as a dump, throwing old automobile bodies into it. Below Trois-Rivières, that practice went on until one municipality had the opportunity to lay a charge. So I sent a report to the provincial authorities who answered me that the matter did not come under their jurisdiction, since navigable waters fall within the competence of the federal government. I was therefore advised to apply to the federal Department of Transport.

So I wrote to Ottawa and got the reply that the matter did not come under the jurisdiction of the federal government, since it had to do with trash dumped along the shores or into shallow water. The only thing that matters to the federal government is that the channel be open to shipping. It is not concerned about waste.

Confronted with a man sentenced to death, Pontius Pilate washed his hands. Today, when it comes to dealing with the Canadian waters which are a source of life, some people find it possible once more to wash their hands of the whole thing.

The federal government knowing that Expo 67 was under preparation, during the years 1965-1966, confined itself, at the time, to conducting studies on the waters of the Great Lakes. Let me quote a question I directed then to the government, as it appears on page 7462 of Hansard for April 14, 1969. Here it is:

1. Did the Department of National Health and Welfare take water samples from the St. Lawrence River in the summers of 1967 and 1968?

2. If so, did the analysis of this water reveal that there was a danger for bathers in (a) Tadoussac (b) Quebec City (c) Trois-Rivières (d) Montreal?

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) gave this answer, and I quote:

1. The Department of National Health and Welfare has carried out water quality studies on the international section of the St. Lawrence River (from Kingston, Ontario, to Cornwall, Ontario), each summer since 1965. These studies were conducted under the aegis of a current reference to the International Joint Commission on Lake Erie, Lake Ontario and the International Section of the St. Lawrence River.

2. As the studies have been limited to the international section of the St. Lawrence River, water quality data collected cannot be interpreted with regard to conditions in the vicinity of (a) Tadoussac (b) Quebec City (c) Trois Rivières (d) Montreal.

Mr. Speaker, barely a few days before I asked that question, I wrote to Mr. Lessard, the Quebec Health Minister, as follows:

Dear Sir,

A Quebecer would be interested in the rental of a public beach is now considering the possibility of carrying out his wish at one of the two following locations on the shores of the St. Lawrence: Cap-Rouge or Anse-au-Foulon, Sillery.

[Mr. Godin.]

And I went on asking—

—for a copy of the water analysis at those locations during the summers of 1966, 1967, 1968.

On March 4, 1969, I received the following reply:

Dear Sir,

I acknowledge receipt of your letter dated February 25 last and I wish to advise you that last year, swimming was prohibited at the Anse-au-Foulon beach by the Department of Health due to water pollution.

As for Cap-Rouge, we should have to know exactly the spot where the quality of the water is of interest to you.

Mr. Speaker, I remember quite well that during the summer of 1969, the beach at Sillery was closed to the citizens of Quebec City. On the other hand, I also remember that at Cap-Rouge, a few miles from there, Mr. Roger Lemelin, a well-known author, could still swim, as could the hon. members for Louis-Hébert and Langelier (Messrs. Cantin and Marchand).

Mr. Speaker, we must see the situation in its true light. The water from the St. Lawrence, dangerous to swim in, is the drinking water of the people of Lévis. In fact, Lévis, Lauzon, Bienville, Saint-Romuald, Saint-David get their drinking water from the St. Lawrence River. While swimming is forbidden on the north shore of the river, it provides drinking water on the south shore.

I hope that Bill C-144 will clear up the problem. Of course, those are extreme cases and I believe that the residents of that region are entitled to know exactly what the situation is.

In my opinion, given the facts, Bill C-144 could be a good measure. Will it be properly enforced, or used solely for political purposes and to foster small quarrels with the provinces?

We are aware that in our industrialized world, waste of all kind is increasing, both at the manufacturing and at the processing levels, and that to achieve high quality products, we have to get rid of a considerable amount of indispensable material. And up until now, waterways were considered as ideal dumps. The dangers of such a practice are obvious, and some companies have recognized them.

I want to mention the efforts of some industries to curb pollution, and I am hoping for an increase in the number of those that will co-operate to keep up the fight essential to our survival. But as always one has to think of the cost. Co-operation from industries is necessary, but are all industries in good enough financial position to consider a water treatment program? Are all the municipalities which are considering an exchange program in a suitable financial position to fight pollution with means essential to the improvement of the present situation? This is open to question if we refer to a statement by Mr. Paul O. Trépanier, former mayor of Granby, who said that 75 per cent of Quebec municipalities were faced with bankruptcy.

Here is what I read on page 13 of this bill:

Water quality management agencies.

The objects of each water quality management agency shall be to plan, initiate and carry out programs to restore, preserve and enhance the water quality level in the water quality management area for which the agency is incorporated or named.

Mr. Speaker, that will be the great objective of the agencies which we intend to set up. Of course there are limitations. Here I take the liberty to read on page 16 of the bill a paragraph from clause 13:

Except with respect to loans related to the cost of incorporation of an agency and its operating expenses that are authorized to be made to it by the Minister or a provincial government, an agency does not have power to borrow moneys, to issue securities or to guarantee the payment of any debt or obligation of any person.

Mr. Speaker, in spite of the obvious dangers of pollution, the minister will be in a position to say no to corporations which, according to him, would not have the financial capacity to meet loans with a 10, 11 or 12 per cent interest rate. In short, we are looking at the "troubled" water but we cannot do anything to change the situation unless financial means are available.

That is the situation right now. Bill C-144 is another piece of legislation whose implementation will be restricted by the "buck". Let us imagine the case where we would let a forest fire spread just because of insufficient funds to fight it. That would be a ridiculous situation, but I think that it is precisely what would result from this bill unless we bring in some amendments.

Can we imagine a mayor who would let his town burn down just because he cannot afford any longer to pay the firemen? Can we think of a situation where a provincial premier would call back the workers sent to fight forest fires simply because financiers have turned him down for a loan?

Considering that the problem of pollution is a matter of life and death, the Canadian government should consider measures aimed at checking it and the first necessary step, I think, should be to secure the financing of the plans the realization of which are advocated by the bill under study. Just as the previous speakers, I suggest to the department to study the loans granted to foreign countries for such plans. Then, perhaps, the firms that are incapable of borrowing at 10, 11 and 12 per cent will be in a position to borrow at better conditions, that is ¾ or 1 per cent.

I am convinced that the federal government must assume its responsibilities towards the problem of water. The government should act with the financial help of the Bank of Canada.

• (4:50 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it often happens that an hon. member will rise in his place and say he did not intend to take part in the debate which is in progress but that he had been moved to do so. My own position is the very reverse of that. I intended right from the start to take part in this debate but my original intention was to make a full 40-minute speech. I have decided, because this debate has gone on for several days, and because most of the things which need to be said have been put on the record, that I will shorten my remarks to just—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCleave: That is the Lundrigan influence.

An hon. Member: Three cheers for Lundrigan.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Stanley feels a little grey after that.

There are two ideas I should like to express before we give second reading to this bill—there might be a sub-heading or two, but in the main there are two things I should like to say. In the first place, I think we delude ourselves when we talk about pollution being something which is likely to creep up on us if we fail to act now. A good deal of the discussion has been along the lines that we must take action now so that our waters, our air and our environment as a whole do not become polluted some time in this decade or in the near future. We should face the fact that we are already living in the age of pollution. The statistics and information which have been given to the House during the course of this debate certainly support the contention that our waters are far from pure at the present time and the same is true with respect to our air. What we have to begin now is not just a preventive job with an eye to the future but a cleaning up job as far as the present is concerned.

It is against the background of this situation, against the background of the fact that things are already serious that hon. members are perfectly justified, it seems to me, in urging that Bill C-144 is not strong enough. A friend of mine sent me a telegram a few days ago in which he suggested four things that a bill of this kind ought to do. I do not intend to read the telegram, but it does state the case succinctly. I shall accept my friend's four ideas as my own and I shall be happy to send him a copy of Hansard.

An hon. Member: One more vote.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He lives in Montreal.

In doing this, I shall keep the promise I made to myself to observe strict brevity. In the first place, the situation calls for tough, no-compromise federal legislation to ensure uniform, country-wide standards. There is a lot of water in this country which is clearly under federal jurisdiction. I maintain that the people of Canada would have no patience with any provincial premier or government that would fail to co-operate as far as provincial waters are concerned.

In the second place, there ought to be financial assistance by way of tax relief and write-offs of various kinds, as well as contributions, to encourage the development and use of pollution control equipment. Any incentives which can be put forward so that people will do even more than the law calls for are certainly needed because of the seriousness of the situation.

In the third place, there ought to be deadlines—and they should be included in the bill before us—respecting the implementation and completion of pollution control projects. Agreements with respect to such projects should be concluded with some of our large urban centres such as Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Vancouver and Halifax. Here, I believe, despite our two-level type of government, we are bound to bring the cities into the picture.

Finally, there ought to be tough, no-nonsense laws providing for heavy fines or imprisonment to give resource management agencies the power necessary to deal with offenders.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

It strikes me that these four suggestions bring into bold relief the fact that the present bill does not go far enough to cope with the danger which is with us right at this very time, for as I say, it is not one which will arise in the 'eighties, or a generation from now; it is with us today.

The other main thought I want to pass on to the House before we conclude the debate is this: I believe this question of the pollution of our waters and of our environment generally is part of a larger one having to do with the role of science and technology in our society. The day has come, indeed, it is long past, when we ought to have a minister and a department of science and technology in the government of Canada. After all, it is science and technology which are virtually making possible the kind of life we live today. We are aware of the things which have improved our lives. On the other hand, because of the impact of science and technology in the profit-making system under which we live, an awful lot has been done to despoil our lives. The whole question of what science and technology should do, or what they should bring into being, should no longer be one for private industry to answer but something which is a matter of public policy and public concern.

It is not good enough to have a Science Council of Canada on the side, with a certain conflict of interest to which attention was turned yesterday. Policy in the field of science and technology ought to be part of the concern of the Parliament and the Government of Canada. It is not enough to have a weak bill on water pollution control before us; we ought to be moving forward boldly in this whole area. Whether in the future we will have for our people a Canada to live in and enjoy depends not only on industrial progress, not only on what we do about building our great cities, highways and so on, but on how we channel our capacities, resources, intellect and scientific know-how in making life liveable for a decade, for several decades or for centuries in this country of ours.

I wish to conclude by reminding hon. members of two or three paragraphs on the last two pages in a book by Blair Fraser entitled "The Search for Identity" which I am sure most members will have read. We all remember this distinguished journalist who was with us for so many years and who a few years ago lost his life so tragically. As a matter of fact, the conditions under which he lost his life are rather significant in the light of these passages which conclude his interesting book. Let me pick out two or three paragraphs. These are the late Blair Fraser's words:

> It is commonplace to refer to Canada as one of the young countries of the world. In fact it is one of the oldest. Few others still look, as Canada does in about three quarters of its area, just as they did two hundred and perhaps ten thousand years ago.
> More than half of it is primordial granite, the great Pre-Cambrian shield rubbed clean of soil by the glacier of the latest Ice Age. Since the glacier receded the land has recovered, at least in the milder climatic belt that in the west runs as far north as the Yukon and the Mackenzie Delta and in the east dips to south of James Bay, enough shallow humus to support a coniferous bush. Shallow lakes are everywhere upon its surface—Canada is thought to contain about one third the fresh water of the entire world.

Then, Blair Fraser talks about this great area of our country that is largely untouched, an area which most people have not seen. But it is there, and to him it is a symbol of the future and the hope of this country. These are his last two paragraphs:

> Meanwhile "development" continues. Canada's standard of living, second highest in the world (by North American measurement), is in no danger of losing that proud position. Washing machines and television sets abound, as in no other nation save one. Superhighways devour uncounted acres of fertile land, and the second highest incidence of automobiles achieves, in the metropolitan areas, a second highest air pollution. Ugly little towns prosper, all calling themselves cities and all looking like faithful copies of Omaha, Nebraska.
> This is not a Canada to call forth any man's love. But just north of it still lies a different kind of land—too barren even to be thickly settled, too bleak to be popular like Blackpool or Miami. There is no reason to doubt that it will always be there, and so long as it is there Canada will not die.

Regardless of what has been said in this debate about the pollution that has already taken place and the cleaning up problems to which we must apply ourselves, the fact is we have a rich heritage in this country of land, forest, water and air. It is worth saving. It is worth protecting. Let us do it.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, my comments will be brief. The subject has been reasonably well covered. What strikes me, however, is that if ever there was a "milquetoast" bill presented to the House, this is it. The legislation contains no teeth. It does not contain things that are necessary if we are to reach a satisfactory conclusion to the problem. I will admit that the minister has taken a very timid step in the right direction. One recalls that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), when speaking on the just society, stated that some effective solution must be found for the control of air and water pollution and that we must move faster and more imaginatively in this area. I do not see much indication of that in this bill. No one will disagree with this statement, but the government brings in a bill which covers water pollution only and does nothing about air, soil or noise pollution. I do not know whether reference has been made to this in this debate, but I believe all of us owe a deep debt of gratitude to Rachel Carson, who has since passed away, for awakening us to the damage being done and our future position if things continue in the present manner.

It is interesting to note that people in several cities of the United States are drinking water from taps after that water has gone through city sewers. Now we come to the question: do we really need this bill. As I have said, it is a step in the right direction, but I wonder whether this bill, if it is not any better enforced than the fisheries bill in respect of our Great Lakes system, will accomplish anything. It has been shown that our fish in the Great Lakes contain levels of DDT above permissible levels. The government should have put teeth in that bill in order that something might have been done about the problem. I believe the minister said that the 70's will be a period when a move will be made in respect of pollution. Surely, we should have been looking after some of these things in the 60's. I am not blaming the minister. I am merely stating that in the 70's the government must move quickly. I am also thinking about the bureaucracy we may be building up by applying Parkinson's law. We may become involved in building up department on department and bureaucracy on bureaucracy.

How are the necessary arrangements to be made with the provinces in respect of setting up joint boards to deal with this problem? Surely, the ground rules will vary from province to province. What are these ground rules? Are all provinces to be brought up to a certain level? Who will decide what this level should be? The waters of the Great Lakes system touch the province of Ontario as well as the province of Quebec. The Ottawa River is the dividing line between the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec. Will the same rules apply to the villages and towns along the Quebec side as apply in the province of Ontario? What will be the working rule in this regard? Surely, there will be variations. The national board to be established under the Canada water bill should seek agreement from all provincial bodies in respect of what constitutes pollution and how much pollution is to be allowed. I believe we must realize, in our war on pollution of the air, water or land, that we can never hope to return to the time when waters were pure and the air was clear.

It has been pointed out by other speakers that DDT, which has proven to be a boon to the farmers, contains a particular hydrocarbon which retains its identity and decomposes very slowly. Some authorities put the rate of deterioration at about 20 per cent over a period of 20 years. This means it remains in the soil, in the water and in the fish and becomes cumulative. What provisions or thoughts are there in respect of providing something that will do a similar job for the farmers in their effort to produce the food we need? Has the government any idea what should be used in place of DDT? Has the government instituted any research on this? If such action has not been taken then it would seem to me that agriculture, which has been built up on the use of DDT, should be in some way compensated for its losses. There is also another problem. What will be done about the phosphates which are used in detergents and which cause damage?

Dr. Jones of the University of Toronto, I think last December, pointed out that there were chemicals now that would perform the same function as the phosphates and which do not have any deleterious effects. What has been done about this, and what is the time limit we are going to place on the manufacture of detergents? I suggest that we have a blank cheque. I hope when this bill goes to the committee something will be done about these problems because they exist all across Canada. The point of no return in respect of pollution is a lot closer than most of us care to believe.

I have not raised the genetic factors which might be involved as a result of pollution. I do not know whether other members have mentioned this, but it has come to my notice. There is a frightening illustration in the bird life of Canada. I think we have some 150 species of birds that are threatened with extinction. I propose to speak on this again when the bill comes back to the House from the committee. Before then I hope the committee will do something to set ground rules, and will decide how this measure can be made effective. In so doing, I hope they will deal fairly with industry and the municipalities.

In concluding I should like to quote from the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau):

> We are prepared to say it will be a crime to pollute the rivers or to pollute the air and to use the federal criminal power to force the industries or even the municipalities to do certain things. We wouldn't want to do it without provincial consent but we want to make people realize that when they make this choice it's going to be pretty costly because if you are going to send people to jail or make them pay fines, whether they be the chairman of the board of directors or whether they be a mayor of a city because they are sullying our water—

I see nothing in this measure that will make this a just society. What bothers me is that this measure does not go far enough. I hope when it comes back from the committee it will have some teeth in it and we will know the ground rules for controlling pollution.

The national commission which should be appointed will have to co-operate with their United States counterparts in the area of the Great Lakes, the waters of which are of importance to both sides. I hope this bill will be greatly improved when it returns to the House, otherwise this is an exercise in futility.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, like the two previous speakers I will attempt to be brief because I know the minister wants to make some remarks at the conclusion of this debate and before this bill finally goes to the committee. In the few minutes I have at my disposal I should like to comment on this rather flimsy document we have before us, and make a few basic points.

Since I am very pessimistic about pollution in general, I will probably be labelled as a crepe hanger by any of those jolly chamber of commerce types who happen to be in this House of Commons. I do not believe that legislators anywhere in North America are going to do anything effective to halt or reverse pollution until it is too late.

My second point arises from the first. The problem of even water pollution alone, leaving soil and air pollution out of it for the moment, is such a complex and gigantic problem that to do very much about combatting it in a positive way, virtually our whole value system and way of life will have to be reassembled and changed. Our way of life might have to be so dramatically altered that politicians would find little public support for the rigid measures necessary to overcome the pollution problem. I think I know a little bit about what the minister and the government face in dealing with a bill that would be strong enough to overcome water pollution.

Finally, having read the bill thoroughly, I am convinced it confirms what I said regarding my first two points in so many ways I am alarmed. It alarms me when I think of the future of those children being born today, because of the kinds of things they will have to face by the time they are as old as I am.

Everybody is in on the pollution kick today. Pollution is another motherhood subject. It has become such a popular word that everybody wants to get in on the act. But I am afraid Bill C-144 has about as much resemblance to any solution to the problem of water pollution as a stage backdrop has to real trees in the forest. I think the bill before us today is but a political response to justify the government in face of the public outcry for clean water. Regretfully, what we have before us is largely a snow job or, with deference to the minister, probably a "Joe" job.

The minister must be a little bit embarrassed in coming here to the House to smuggle the Canada water act past us masquerading as anything more than a government statement of pious hopes brought in belatedly to quell the clamour. There is probably a great gnawing fear on the part of the people of ultimate human extinction that certainly has not been focused on in this bill. Like the member who spoke before me, I hope the committee will severely tighten up a number of the measures in this proposal. I think perhaps if we closed our eyes, this problem of public concern, the public rumbling might go away, but I do not think the problem would disappear.

Population and pollution experts tell us that we may have at the most one generation, or by the end of this century, to find alternatives to the disasters we will face if we do not control our population.

World population is growing geometrically rather than arithmetically. We now have more than 3 billion people on this planet and by the year 2000 we expect to have over 6 billion. After another generation we expect to have, by anyone's guess, perhaps 25 billion. Some people say this will mean a population density in the livable parts of the earth of 120,000 people per square mile, which is about the population density of the slums of Hong Kong.

How do we handle this kind of density in the year 2025 when today, in a sparsely populated country such as Canada we have dead lakes, poisoned bays, fetid, stinking rivers so laden with solid effluent you almost have to equip the fish with football helmets in order that they may swim unbruised to their spawning grounds?

Pollution increases are usually a mathematical function of population increase and population density. The magnitude of this problem is so little understood by the world at large and the Canadian general public, yet so crucial to our survival, that if I were a newly married man today, because I love children, I doubt very much whether I would bring any into the world, knowing as I do what survival conflicts they are going to face by the time they are 30 years of age.

I said earlier that the population problems are so complex that to alter them fundamentally would mean a whole change in our value system. I should like the House to consider for a moment the interrelation of the following points, and I will not elaborate on them: population growth and pollution, which I dealt with earlier; increased chemical disposal and pollution; rise in expectations or standard of living and pollution; increased industrialization and pollution; increased world and domestic trade and pollution, and increased resource exploitation, mining, logging, hydro, thermonuclear plants and pollution.

I do not think anyone in this House, least of all the minister, can minimize the complexities of the problems facing us. Our task is to develop the kind of legal machinery and the kind of public attitudes that can cope with the problems, and I personally do not believe this bill is designed to do so. I believe it is theoretically possible to reconcile all of these conflicts of which I spoke, earlier but I do not think we are going to do it in time. I despair that we won't do it in time. But I think I have said enough to indicate and briefly document the serious threat to our survival that our present human behavior contemplates.

The concern for pollution should have a much higher priority in the government's scheme of priorities. It should be assigned a priority ahead of such things as the constitution and inflation, because what is the point in solving the problems presented by inflation and the constitution if by the year 2000 we are all going to choke on the air that we breathe, and drown in polluted waters? Life demands clean air and clean water for survival.

This brings me to something specific about Bill C-144. I am sure it has been touched on previously and therefore I will not elaborate upon it. It concerns the means of implementation of the provisions in the water quality and water resource clauses of the bill.

From time to time I speak to and communicate with municipal leaders in my riding. I represent parts of nine different municipalities. All or most of these municipalities dispose of their sewage directly into the Fraser River. I suppose they have the choice of contaminating the land or the river, and like most suburban areas they choose the easiest way, the out of sight way. These men have expressed the fear to me that even with the best will in the world, people living in urban areas cannot afford to finance the kind of treatment systems that will be necessary and effective to combat pollution.

My riding is on the edge of urban growth. We know the extent of urbanization in our country. If municipalities on the edge of urban growth, together with the major urban centres, cannot finance municipal treatment plants, and have no means to do so, all the legislation in the world is not going to assist them. Therefore, I think we should be looking for something more specific in terms of financial assistance in the Canada water bill.

What we have here in this bill is but a federal superstructure, an administrative superstructure, that is to be imposed upon what we have already, and God knows how many different agencies we now have to deal with pollution, even just water pollution.

The responsibilities for pollution control do not stop at the municipal level. The responsibilities for pollution control cannot be passed from the federal government to the provinces and then on to the municipalities. Nothing effective will be done unless we at the federal level are prepared to assist the municipalities to do the kind of things that they know now they must do.

I am confident hon. members on all sides of the House have taken advantage of this opportunity to take a swing at industrial polluters. I point out that municipalities, public bodies, are also polluting, but do not have the financial ability to avoid it. Now, we have before us a type of legislation which vaguely suggests that some kind of grants will be made some time in the future. However, at present when municipalities which want to do something about the matter apply for money through CMHC for sewage treatment financing they are told there are no funds available. That gives an indication of the kind of priority assigned by the federal government to pollution control.

It is a serious thing. As the hon. member for York West (Mr. Givens) so emphatically points out, urban growth and limited financial resources mean that the cities cannot cope with the problem without outside help, a great deal of help, and we have not examined nearly enough ways in which to help them.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that the provisions of clause 5(2) disturb me, because these clauses seem to say that if agreements for water quality fail to be reached between federal and provincial bodies then the federal government has a right to intervene. To me this indicates that there is no real confidence on the part of the federal government that the provinces can handle the problem by themselves. So, what the federal government gives itself here is an insurance clause.

Of course, the provinces cannot handle the problem by themselves. They have not been able to do so up until now, and there is no reason to expect that they will do so in the future. When this bill goes to committee I think we should look for some kind of financing formula similar to the Fraser Valley flood control formula, by which there would be a basic municipal, provincial and federal contribution for any treatment project approved. In short, Sir, I would like to see more of the preventive medicine type of thinking within the Canada water act. Let us not wait until we have to use the provisions of clause 5(2), by which time waters will have become so blatantly polluted that they are of national concern.

Why aren't we looking at these things in advance? Why are we not prepared to set up agencies to maintain water purity, rather than belatedly trying to reverse a process that may well nigh be irreversible? I am disturbed by the fact that in this bill water is emphasized solely as a resource. To me, thinking of water as a resource indicates that it is but something to be exploited. True, water is a resource but it is also an environment for life and this aspect should be reflected in this bill. Water is something crucial to our survival. It is necessary to life on this planet.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the reason I am pessimistic is that legislators do not tend to think far ahead. Most of us think about as far ahead as the next election.

Mr. McGrath: Shame.

Mr. Rose: Even some members from the province of Newfoundland might be thinking about the next election. I suggest that we may solve some political problem with the Canada water act before the next election, but we are certainly not going to solve our pollution problems by the time of the next election.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I wish to remind the House that if the minister speaks at this time he will close the debate.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I believe this is the sixth day that the House has spent on second reading of this bill. I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) referred to the length of time we have taken on second reading. I am not going to impute motives to anyone in respect of the length of time. I would point out that I did undertake in my opening speech that I would answer any queries either in my closing speech or in committee; I did undertake in my opening speech that we were anxious to hear of proposed solutions, to hear of methods of improving the bill and that in committee we would be willing to listen.

I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that at Westminster, and I believe even there the rules of the House are not working as effectively as they would wish, they have attempted to make the House work more effectively by refurbishing the rules and bringing them up to date. I believe that their normal and virtually inevitable practice at Westminster is to spend one day on second reading of a bill.

We have tried to reform our rules to make this House a more effective instrument. I believe that all of us who believe in this House and that it is in fact the strongest and the ultimate bastion of freedom and individual liberty, know that there must be a great reservoir of power here for use, when it is required, to preserve the liberty and the very bases of freedom.

But should we use the House at all times without consideration of its most valuable asset, namely time? I think it may be that we will so debilitate the power of the House to act in emergency that we will have done it a very great disservice.

Now, Mr. Speaker, many of the points raised here could have been very properly discussed, and I am sure will be discussed again, in committee through our strengthened committee structure.

I will say this—because I do not intend to impute motives in any way but merely to reflect upon the very length of the debate on second reading as compared to what would have taken place at Westminster. I do intend to attempt to the best of my ability to answer each individual member who has commented upon the bill. However, in closing this debate I should like to put on record that I feel it is not likely that this House will work as effectively as we would have it work if we speak as long as possible and as long as six days on the second reading of each bill.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka is rising on a question.

Mr. Aiken: Would the minister not agree that it has been stated publicly many times that this is one of the major efforts of the government in this session, the water bill, and that the minister himself has made that allegation? A good many private members would have liked to speak and it could have taken a lot longer.

Mr. Greene: I appreciate that fact, Mr. Speaker, and I have been reviewing the speeches very carefully. I hope I can demonstrate that belief either here or in committee by considering various arguments of the members who spoke. But many of the arguments were made time and time again, as I am sure my hon. friend will agree. I doubt whether in that regard this was, in fact, a debate. A debate is surely to bring points forward and attempt to answer them, not bring the same points forward ad infinitum. Certainly prior to Christmas many, many days were taken up on minor bills, which precluded this very important bill from coming before the House sooner—

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The hon. member for Comox-Alberni on a point of order.

Mr. Barnett: May I suggest to Your Honour, if I understand correctly that we are not on a point of order concerning the rules and proceedings of this House. The matter was particularly brought to my mind at the beginning of a debate, as it were, by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) when the minister was speaking about the procedure in the House. If I may say so, Mr. Speaker, while one can expect a few kindly words of admonition from time to time from a minister, the minister is discounting his own argument by the length of the procedural debate into which he is launching.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): I suggest to the hon. member that this is not the time to ask questions. We are not at the committee stage.

Mr. Barnett: I thought I made it clear that I rose on a point of order, and asked Your Honour to consider whether we should not be discussing the second reading of the bill rather than the procedures of the House of Commons.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I agree with the hon. member that we are actually on second reading of the bill.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I will heed the admonition of my hon. friend. Maybe we have all, including myself, spent too much time on this parenthetical reference of mine to the proceedings in the House. The words of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who dealt with the length of the debate, rather tempted me to move into this area but I shall move on with the concluding speech on second reading. May I say to the hon. members whose particular arguments I cannot meet in the short time allotted to me, that I undertake to discuss the points with them in committee if they are not reached this afternoon.

At the outset there are one or two things I should like to say in answer to several of the last speakers whilst the points are fresh in my mind. First of all, in reply to the hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Scott), who criticized the federal government for lack of action with regard to the Ottawa River and who indicated that he felt the governments of Ontario and Quebec were prepared to move when the federal government was not, I point out that the federal government offered, well over a year ago, to do a study of the Ottawa River at its own expense. This offer was not accepted by either province. I do not wish to rehash old problems because we want to move ahead in the future in a spirit of co-operation, but I do not believe it would have been fair to leave the record with the incorrect reflection that this allegation would have left.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made some criticism of science in general and, again, while this may be slightly off the subject of the particular bill, I think his criticism is one to be considered. He advocated a science department or a specific minister in charge of science. I would merely point out to him that while his reflections on the importance of science in the world into which we are moving are valid, I think his specific panacea for the cure of apparent difficulties of governmental structure in controlling the scientific and research endeavours of the future was considered by the OECD in a report specifically about Canadian Science.

This report advocated that there should not be a specific science department and probably this is because science itself is becoming so pervasive that it probably would be impossible to have science assumed by any one department or minister without having an all-powerful czar who would direct every governmental activity. Science comes into almost every facet of government and every department of government. It must be the challenge of those of us in this House who have some responsibility in this direction to see if we can find methods whereby we can co-ordinate the scientific activities of various departments.

Some of the structures that have been created recently such as the Science Council, the Science Secretariat and the Science Committee of Cabinet, are attempts to achieve the goal the hon. member referred to without creating new and monolithic structures and without placing ultimate and overly great power in one department or minister.

As I say, I have heard some very valid criticisms. When opening my speech, I said that we do not profess to have all the answers. But the officials of my department have studied this question at considerable length; they wanted to know how we ought to begin tackling the problem of water pollution. They have studied the application of the law in many parts of the world; have sought for precedents, and have, after a very considerable period of gestation I will admit—but it was a very necessary period of gestation—advised as to this bill which the government thinks is best for Canada at this time.

May I say that there is no perfect precedent. There is no country, I think, that has solved the question of pollution or water management. We have sought to learn from those who appeared to have had some success or acquired special knowledge, because we wished to learn from their example. I believe that this bill, with such help as we may obtain from members of the House when it goes to committee, will be the best possible bill and will be for the benefit of Canada.

In the first place may I point out that there has been possibly a fundamental misconception on the part of many hon. members with respect to the bill itself and what it purports to do. I point out that the bill is not an antipollution measure. That is not the purpose of the bill. This is not a single purpose bill designed to clear up pollution. We think that this bill goes farther than any other in the proper direction. This bill is for the purposes of totally managing and planning the use of our water resources in future. So far as the cleaning up of pollution where it exists—yes; that is one of the things this bill would purport to do. At least, it purports to create the instrument which will do that.

But this, surely, is not good enough. It is not sufficient for us to look forward at this time to a bill which merely says, "All we want to do is clean up the dirt where it exists." We are concerned with planning for the future use of waters in such a way that pollution will be minimized, yes; but we hope to manage these resources a good deal better than in the past so that undue pollution will not occur in future and, further, we are chiefly concerned that we achieve the optimum use of our water in the future. I think if we start with that understanding, with the understanding that this is not just a bill to clean up the harm that has been done in the past, we shall see that the purpose of the bill is to enable us to manage better this precious resource of water in the future.

I think the last speaker in the debate took umbrage because the bill refers to water as a resource. I make no apology for this. Surely, in the technological age we live in, if we are to achieve at least a minimal standard of living, let alone the best possible standard that I am sure we all want for those vast populations to which the hon. member referred, we must indeed use all the resources we have, or we will not be able to achieve that standard of well being. Water is one of the resources that we must use. Thence it follows that we must use this resource differently than we have been up to now, if it is to be of continuing benefit for those who come after us and for the increasing populations that have been referred to.

I should now like, Mr. Speaker, to refer to the main objections that have been taken to the bill and, in the short time available to me, I will try to cover most of those objections to the best of my ability and in some detail, and then leave specific comments to the committee, if I may, along with any other general approaches to the bill that the committee may wish to take. First, I think many hon. members objected to the bill because of its failure to prescribe national water standards. At first sight this may appear to be a shortcoming of the bill. When I started studying the subject I looked rather hopefully for some rather simplistic type of device such as national water standards which people would have to live up to and observe, and then, hopefully, our troubles would be over.

Further study on my part with the help of officials convinced me that clearly this was not a good approach. Let me illustrate this as simply as I can this way. If you had national water standards in this highly industrialized age and in this highly industrialized country then, surely, you could not expect to achieve for all our waters that standard of pristine purity existing in some of our pure lakes that have as yet not been touched by industrial development. I say that because if we were to adopt that as our national standard we could not, and neither could any other country that adopted these standards, have bodies of water as pure as Lake Louise or as the lakes in the north.

Not only could we not have that general standard, but we would not wish to have it. Water must be used for many purposes in industry; and if you are to have one national standard you would have to take into cognizance the fact that in certain industrial areas waters must be used for industrial purposes and that, therefore, it cannot be as pure as it was in the days before we became industrialized. If we are prepared to say that under our national quality standards all our waters must be only as pure as those say of Hamilton Harbour, where quite properly certain economic activities relating to steel production and other industries take place, we must also say, surely, that waters as pure as those of Lake Louise may be polluted up to the level of Hamilton Harbour because that is what we are saying if we accept that national standard, and I do not think that is what any of us wants. We do not want to pollute down, so to speak, to those levels where water is used for industrial purposes. On the other hand, if we say that under our national water standards all waters must attain the level of purity of Lake Louise then, clearly, we are proscribing the industrial use of many of our water basins. That would not be economically feasible, or possible, or wise. Waters used for industrial purposes could never be as pure as Lake Louise. At least, that is the conclusion that we came to, and we therefore said that this was not a good approach for Canada. We do not want to pollute down any of those areas that are still clean. We wished to avoid, wherever possible, having standards so high that they would make industrial activities which are very proper in certain areas impossible in the future. The bill does not attempt to do that, Mr. Speaker, and I think quite properly so. Instead it attempts to achieve the optimum standard. I stress that word, because that word is the key. The bill attempts to achieve the optimum standard in any large water basin.

What does this mean? In a water basin that is used for industrial purposes and the disposal of human waste, as many water basins are used, and where we may wish to preserve some aesthetic quality and where, also, part of the basin may be reserved for recreational uses, the optimum standard will be at that particular level of water purity which makes sense for that particular basin. In a basin where there is no industry and where good planning may indicate we should have a resort or recreational area in the foreseeable future, there will be a far different standard than the one applying to an industrial use of the water. In such a basin the optimum standard of water will be at a much higher level. In some water basins where the proper and best use of the water in the interest of the region, and of Canada in general, might be purely for industrial purposes or municipal waste, the optimum standard might be much lower. I do not see any specific areas where this would be the best thing. I think in all areas we can preserve some of the esthetic qualities and some of the recreational assets of our water.

I wish to emphasize the point that in our view a national standard would very definitely not have been in the best interests of having the optimum standards of water in various parts of Canada. In this variegated country, it is very seldom there is a simplistic answer for everything, that the same answer will do in all parts of Canada. In my view with water quality, as with many other things, we will have different standards in different water basins, but in each case there will be the optimum standard for the multi-use of water in that particular water basin.

The second general argument that was made, and hit hard was the question of financing. There seemed to be considerable ambivalence in my respectful view in this regard. Some hon. members indicated we should have a fund, a great big federal pot from which money could be used, to solve the problem of pollution in the various regions of Canada. At the same time and in the same speech some hon. members said, oh yes, but the polluters should pay.

I took the liberty of imposing on the very gracious lady, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) and asked her a question. The hon. member seemed to feel there should be a much greater federal financial input. I asked her whether in her view the polluter should pay and should that be the premise of the bill. If I understood her answer correctly it was, yes, the polluter should pay. With respect, Mr. Speaker, I do not think we can have it both ways.

I think the premise of the bill is quite properly that the polluter should pay to rehabilitate the water, at least to put it back in the condition in which it was found and, in many cases, to improve it. I think that is the proper approach because it induces improvement. It is an incentive to use the water in such a way that it will not be polluted. If the user knows he must pay in order to rehabilitate, he will set up his systems of production in such a way that he will not pollute.

There is a real incentive to non-pollution. If there is to be a large fund and the public is to pay for the cleaning of polluted water, I suggest there is absolutely no incentive to the improvement of industrial practices in the future. I do not think we can have it both ways, Mr. Speaker, by having this paid from the public purse and at the same time having the polluter pay.

The philosophy of this act is that the polluter should pay. This is quite properly a cost of production in the same way as municipal and school taxes. Just as in the many areas of public contribution that the private user of resources must make in the form of a stipend paid to the public purse, so in future will the cost of rehabilitating water be a very proper cost of production.

The other two main complaints that were made by most speakers were in the area of phosphates and the proliferation of committees. Because my time is about to expire, I undertake to the House that I will deal with these matters to the best of my knowledge and in whatever length and depth the committee feels necessary, as well as with the respective criticisms of individual members, in Committee.

I again refer to the question of finances. May I say I appreciate the municipal problem. There was and will be again the Central Mortgage and Housing fund to help municipalities, but I do not think we should skate around this too glibly. In the past municipalities have accepted the fact that disposal of their waste as well as providing water, education and roads, was a proper municipal charge. I think all hon. members will agree with this. Municipalities have said it is a proper charge that the homeowner pay for the disposal of his waste. There may have to be a reconsideration of the ethic at the municipal level to see whether disposal of the waste alone is to be a proper charge on the municipal taxpayer. Is not the disposal of his waste in such a fashion that it does not contaminate the water for future or downstream users, in the ethic of tomorrow, the proper responsibility at the municipal level? I know the municipal taxpayer may need help to finance the capital charges required. I suggest that the user at the municipal level, as well as the industrial level, is the proper place to put the responsibility for the maintenance of the quality of our waters and the improvement of that quality.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I undertake to answer the two further major points, as well as the individual representations of hon. members, at the committee hearings.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, January 22, 1970

The House met at 2 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It has to do with the order of business for this day's sitting. In view of the understanding, and I think it is common knowledge, that the hon. member for Athabasca will be proceeding with his motion under Routine Proceedings, I wonder if the Government House Leader would be willing to ascertain whether there is unanimous consent to the oral question period being called before we deal with that motion?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): I have already done so, Mr. Speaker, and I think the general feeling is that we should get right on with the debate to be instituted by the hon. member for Athabasca.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NIGERIA—FREEDOM OF JOURNALISTS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House to move a motion, which will be seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The urgency of my motion will be apparent to anyone who has watched television or read the newspapers in the last two days, and I will not elaborate on it. The motion is:

That this House requests the government to make immediate representations to the government of Nigeria urging that journalists representing news agencies, newspapers and television networks throughout the world be given full rights of access and full freedom to report facts and to file dispatches throughout the former secessionist territory of Biafra, and that in view of the appalling conditions of starvation revealed by journalists who have been in the area, calls on the government now to make a last desperate effort to secure the consent of the Nigerian government to the acquisition by the Canadian government of the available stocks of food at Sao Tomé, their transportation by air and their distribution within the area where this tragedy is taking place.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Greenwood. There can be a debate on the motion proposed by the hon. member only if there is unanimous agreement.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimous agreement; therefore I cannot put the hon. member's motion for consideration by the House at this time.

AGRICULTURE

STATEMENT ON 1970-71 CAPITAL BUDGET OF FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in order that plans may be made and programs developed for the fiscal year 1970-71, the government has now approved the capital budget of the Farm Credit Corporation. There are certain aspects of this budget that will be of considerable interest to members of this House and to farmers across Canada.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Adjustment of production practices is taking place all across Canada. In the prairie provinces many farmers are currently shifting or planning to shift to the production of livestock as an alternative to producing grain for direct sale. In other parts of the country dairy farmers and others are facing decisions of the same nature. Such changes of enterprise must be carefully planned, with due regard for the long-term market prospects as well as other considerations such as the provision of buildings, machinery, and the alternative of farm rotation to meet the changing pattern. Such changes must also be properly financed on a long-term basis. I wish to confirm that the Farm Credit Corporation may provide long-term credit to farmers who wish to adjust their resource utilization to better meet the market demands. The budget of the Farm Credit Corporation for the coming year has been adjusted to provide additional funds to meet the increase in demand which is expected for loans for this purpose in the coming fiscal year. The field officers of the Farm Credit Corporation can be a valuable source of information and assistance to farmers in these matters.

An additional feature of the new budget is that it will provide funds to permit farmers who find it necessary and desirable to refinance current liabilities. These loans will be made available to cereal grain producers operating viable farm businesses who under ordinary circumstances would be able to operate satisfactorily but whose ability to do so has been impaired by inability to market their grain and who thus may need to refinance short and intermediate-term liabilities over a longer term. Applications for such loans, of course, will be subject to the usual other criteria for loans from the corporation.

The corporation will take steps to inform farmers that this assistance is available to them.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, the statement of the Minister of Agriculture regarding the capital budget of the Farm Credit Corporation will certainly be studied with a great deal of interest by the agricultural industry across Canada.

His statement is very modest in tone when it says that "adjustment of production practices is taking place all across Canada." In essence what he is alluding to is the fact that the agricultural industry is staggering because of the lowest return it has experienced in its history.

Although the minister states that money will be made available for long-term loans for the provision of buildings, machinery and the alternative of farm rotation to assist in shifting production from grain to livestock, I think this program is weak. There are two apparent weaknesses which will be evident to the farmers immediately. First—and this concerns the west particularly—it is stated that loans will be made to cereal grain producers operating viable farm businesses who under ordinary circumstances would be able to operate satisfactorily but who may need to refinance short and intermediate-term liabilities over a longer term. This point will need some clarification on the part of the department because what the farmers need especially is not money to refinance short and intermediate-term loans but immediate operating capital. I hope this will be taken into consideration.

[Mr. Olson.]

The other weakness, Mr. Speaker, which I think is more apparent and is a major one, is the fact that the government is proceeding now to lend the farmers of this nation additional capital for the purpose of refinancing, which will put them further in debt. The weakness lies in the fact that the farmers of this nation are not aware of the long-term policy of the government regarding agriculture. It is of no value to refinance farmers with respect to a particular field of endeavour if it is long-term government policy to curtail the production of the essential products in which they are involved. It is a fact that many farmers have undertaken a tremendous amount of debt only to find there is no longer an economic market for the supplies produced and they are therefore unable to finance the debt.

Until the government is able to spell out its program in its entirety and say whether it is going to enter the field of supply management and under such a program curtail production to meet domestic requirements only, the Farm Credit Corporation will not be able to solve many of the problems farmers face today merely by granting long-term loans.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, this program is, of course, another ad hoc approach to the problem that exists in Canada as a whole and in western Canada in particular. If the Farm Credit Corporation makes additional moneys available to the farmers, undoubtedly some of them will borrow.

One bad feature of the announcement is that nothing has been mentioned about adjusting interest rates to meet the probable ability of the farmer to pay. Apparently he is expected to borrow money at high interest rates for a long term.

The second weakness I wish to point out lies in the fact that we know changes are taking place in production patterns in western Canada. Indeed, some provinces are already assisting these changes; Manitoba and Saskatchewan are two examples. If money is now made available these changes probably will be accelerated. What is needed is an assessment of the market situation and the demand for various farm products. Some people may have to go out of grain production on a long-term basis. The question is, how much land should they take out of production? In a recent newsletter the Department of Agriculture made an estimate of 20 million acres.

We have seen in the past crop year that a change in pricing and marketing practices has increased substantially the marketings of barley, a feed grain. What we need is an accurate assessment of the potential market for grain, feed grains and oilseeds in the years immediately ahead, and the probable absorption by the market of livestock production. Only on forecasts of this kind can the farmer make a rational judgment. That, of course, is the real basis of his problem. He must be able to make a rational judgment.

The government of Canada through the Department of Agriculture is making increased amounts of money available. If this money is utilized for types of production that will be in trouble in a few years, we shall not have solved the difficulty. Therefore I plead with the government and the Minister of Agriculture to get some people working on a long-range as well as an immediate-range program along the lines I have outlined so that the farmer may, hopefully, make intelligent decisions.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the minister's statement seems interesting in many regards. However, one should also refer to a statement he made in Quebec on January 29, 1969, and I quote:

> In many sectors of agriculture, scientific progress is just beginning to be felt and to promise for the first time revolutionary innovations. The history of mankind teaches us that technology—

"Technology" is a very big word, and already we have begun to suffer from it. The statement goes on:

> —is an international commodity. Gunpowder, a Chinese discovery, reached Europe like a train of powder, so to speak, and revolutionized the art of war.
> Improvements in the field of agriculture may be due to experiments in genetics carried out in Mexico, in a laboratory in the United States, in Europe or elsewhere. Whatever their origin, their effects will finally be felt in Canadian agriculture. It is precisely the high-geared pace of technological developments that makes it so complicated to devise an agricultural policy.

We are given another proof today that we are living in an extremely complex world, when we read the following part of the minister's statement:

> Adjustment of production practices is taking place all across Canada. In the Prairie provinces many farmers are currently shifting—

on the advice of experts I would imagine, > —or planning to shift to the production of livestock as an alternative to producing grain for direct sale.

• (2:20 p.m.)

In the eastern provinces, learned economists, those who come up with solutions when we are in a complete state of stagnation, have advised our processed milk producers to take the same course of action. They said: "There are milk surpluses. Produce alternate goods. Take up cattle ranching." Then, in western and eastern Canada, farmers are encouraged to raise cattle. And when there is a meat surplus on the market, farmers will be blamed and told: You are the most stupid, because you are all producing the same goods. You alone are responsible. You produce too much beef, prices fall, bear your rate patiently.

In advocating this policy, the minister necessarily wanted to create new debts. Indeed, to undertake a new kind of production, the equipment must be changed. The new production will have to bear the burden of debts accumulated during a deficit period. This change of program will be called debt conversion in order to prolong the martyrdom which is the fate of farmers already burdened with terrible debts, while an appeal is made to them to have patience in these words: Wait, exercise patience, the situation will improve.

The minister is well aware that to make sure that eastern and western farmers can live reasonably and enjoy a fair share of the national revenue, prices must correspond to production. The minister knows it very well because he said it often and I congratulate him. I hope however that his memory is good. He said that the problem in 1966 was one of "cost-price", and the problem is still the same. We are in a squeeze, we are choking and we are trying to get out of that.

In my opinion, if we really want to improve the condition of eastern and western farmers, interest rates will have to go down so as to reduce the production cost and leave the producers with a small profit. It is thus that, in my opinion, we will be able to give to farmers a fair share of the national revenue.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

TABLING OF REPORT BY ANDRÉ SAUMIER—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, on December 18 last, at the request of the Government Film Commissioner and Chairman of the National Film Board, I entrusted Mr. André Saumier with the task of making an analysis of the staff reductions planned by the management of the National Film Board as a result of the budgetary restrictions imposed by the government's austerity program. This appointment of a person outside the NFB seemed at the time to be the best way of studying the difficulties between the board's top management and its production staff arising from the reductions announced for December 15, 1969. The report was submitted to the commissioner on January 15 and I am tabling it today, together with the commissioner's comments.

The primary finding of the report is that the board is not threatened with imminent paralysis, as certain persons have given to understand during the past few weeks. It is true that its over-all production level for the 1970-71 fiscal year is to be reduced to what it was in 1964-65; nevertheless, this represents a net budget of $10 million, which is far from negligible.

[Translation]

In order to gain a proper perspective, the National Film Board's activities must be viewed within the broader and more realistic context of the government's activities as a whole in the field of cinematography; here I should like to emphasize the continuous growth in this sector and the unremitting attention given to it by the Secretary of State. The Board's present difficulties should not hide the activities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or of the Canadian Film Development Corporation. In 1964, the CBC spent the sum of $9,500,000 on the production of films for television; in 1970-71, this sum will be $13,000,000.

In 1964, there was no such thing as the Film Development Corporation; during its first year of existence (1968-69) it invested $366,639 in the production of 20 feature films and made awards amounting to $100,000. In 1970-71 it plans to invest a total of 2.5 million in Canada's film industry.

In addition to this, the government is negotiating co-production agreements with a number of countries with a view to helping Canadian films gain admission to the international market. Thus it is obvious that the government is taking an ever-increasing interest in the film industry as a whole, and that NFB activities must from now on be considered in this global context.

[Mr. Pelletier.]

The question that must be confronted is this: what should be the role of each of the institutions involved in this over-all activity and what relations should they have with one another? This question has been under consideration for several months now and we hope to offer an answer before the present session comes to an end.

Furthermore, the difficulties the NFB is now experiencing are forcing it to take a hard look at its structures and policy, having regard both to present-day realities in the realm of cinematography and budget restrictions. I feel certain that the Board will have no trouble finding its place in this new expanded context and that its contribution therein will continue to be essential. Obviously, the transition must take place with minimum delay while respecting the fundamental integrity of the organization itself.

[English]

It is also essential that following the present difficulties the number of inevitable lay-offs among the production staff be kept to a minimum. This objective has been given particular attention. I have been assured today by the management of the board that the number of lay-offs on the English production side, which was to have been 37, will be reduced to 32 and that 12 of those affected will receive a one-year termination notice instead of the usual three months. Following these lay-offs there will be 146 employees in the English production unit and 70 in the French production unit. It is therefore obvious that the National Film Board's vital creative staff will be maintained. Its development will be assured by a dynamic new definition of its role, and the unique contribution it has to make to the cultural life of Canada will also be assured.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, there are two initial comments I should like to make in connection with the Saumier report. The report came into my hands only just before the opening of the sitting this afternoon, so I have only been able to peruse it briefly.

On the basis of that perusal, I can say that it is an excellent report and one which goes far beyond the original terms of reference, which were to inquire into the dismissals at the National Film Board. Mr. Saumier has gone far beyond an examination of that immediate problem and in the process has given us a very excellent outline of the problems that beseige and beset not only the National Film Board operations but also the whole cinematography industry in Canada. Actually most of these difficulties were known prior to the tabling of the report because the problems were discussed as recently as a year ago by the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, which came to the same conclusions.

In addition to Mr. Saumier's outline of the broad problems in his report, he pointed out the immediate crisis which precipitated the demonstration on Parliament Hill by employees of the NFB, and which eventually forced the government to look into the matter, arose from the implementation of the current austerity program in a rather crude and blunt fashion. I am sure this same criticism can be made of the application of the austerity program in other departments and government activities.

Those of us who took the trouble to meet with the employees of the National Film Board when they were on Parliament Hill just before Christmas heard them outline the main difficulties that are again enumerated in the report. Mr. Norman McLaren, one of the most creative individuals not only in the industry in Canada but throughout the world, was one of the spokesmen on that occasion. The substance of the points made was that creative talents were going to suffer from the blunt application of government austerity. It was said that the English division of the National Film Board was going to be starved under the application of the austerity program. It was also said that there was an emphasis on management at the expense of production and creative talent in the National Film Board.

The report, as the Secretary of State has indicated, has reaffirmed these comments and criticisms made by representatives of the National Film Board early in December, and already some corrective action is to be taken to deal with this difficulty. With reference to management problems it is worth while to note that on page two Mr. Saumier emphasized that difficulty in these words:

> It should be emphasized here that the senior management of the board, located moreover far from the capital, had scant knowledge of the mysterious workings of government in Ottawa.

He is not the only one who has that difficulty, Mr. Speaker, because even those of us in this House could make the same observation. This statement indicates that the highly controversial move of the NFB in the 1950's from the capital to Montreal was a mistake, as many said at that time, and is perhaps one of the major reasons for the worsening position of that branch of government service.

The main difficulty, which should be emphasized in respect of the broad perspective, that is, other than the immediate crisis caused by austerity, has been pointed out in Mr. Saumier's report in these words:

> There does not exist at the present a comprehensive federal government policy with regard to information or cultural affairs.

He enlarges on that general criticism by saying that the major difficulty in the whole field of cinematography and audio-visual communications is that there is no comprehensive federal government policy regarding information on cultural affairs. This not only affects the operations of the National Film Board but also deeply involves the private sector of the industry. I remind hon. members that during a series of meetings of the committee last year it was pointed out to us that the whole audio-visual industry in Canada, the motion picture industry and the cinematography industry are in a state of crisis at the present time and as a result are forming a Canadian motion picture academy in an attempt to come to grips with the problem. Much more expeditious and vigorous action on the part of the government is required to find a solution than such palliatives as the establishment of the Canadian Film Development Corporation and some of the other measures the Secretary of State has referred to in his brief statement this afternoon. In particular we will have to deal with the invasion of the motion picture industry by that great republic to the south of us. This represents one of the main areas of difficulty.

Finally, Mr. Saumier also dealt with another aspect which I think is of primary importance. If the objective outlined by the Secretary of State is to be realized, namely, to make the National Film Board more visible, we must remember that one result of the present austerity program has been to cut out free distribution of National Film Board productions to community film councils. The NFB has been one of the main sources of adult education in the more outlying parts of the country. I urge the Secretary of State, as does the Saumier report, to review this matter carefully. It is quite possible that in this regard the government is being penny wise and pound foolish.

National Film Board

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the National Film Board, as members of this House know, has over the years built up an international reputation. It has won awards at film festivals throughout the world. It has built up a devoted following in Canada. Co-operatives, labour unions, home and school associations and community groups of all types have used National Film Board productions extensively. It is little comfort to the Film Board and its employees to be told by the Secretary of State that there has been an expansion in the production of films financed by the government through the CBC and the new corporation which finances film-making by private companies.

The Film Board is faced with a reduction in staff, despite the slight modifications announced by the minister, by 100 people in the next couple of months. Of these a very substantial number, in fact the largest percentage, will come from the English production division. In addition, the user fees which the Film Board has instituted as a result of the austerity forced upon it by the government will have a bad result. I know that hon. members and the minister have received representations from various groups in all parts of Canada that they cannot afford the user fees and will be forced to curtail sharply or discontinue completely the use of films they have been procuring from the Film Board. So we are faced with a further reduction in staff of possibly another 50 people who work in the distribution field if the use of films produced by the board is cut substantially.

Let me tell the minister that in spite of his kind words today there is panic in the National Film Board and morale has dropped to an all-time low with the result that people are going to leave just as quickly as they can find something else to do. It is an interesting commentary on this government that the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State, who came into public life with a reputation for being intellectuals and persons of culture, are in charge of a government which is going to preside over the virtual demise of the National Film Board and a very sharp reduction in the creative facilities of the CBC. That is something which ought to be noted very carefully.

There is one other point I must put on the record and I hope the minister will take note of it. In his report Mr. Saumier points out that as a result of the planned cutbacks in English language production the staff will be reduced to a level of 90 per cent of what it was in 1964-65 and that on the French language production side the staff will be 142 per cent of what it was in 1964-65. All of us in this group come from constituencies whose people are largely English-speaking. We have tried very hard to explain to our constituents and the people of Canada why the proposals of the government to increase the use of the French language and to make it easier for people whose mother tongue is French to work for the government and live in all parts of Canada are necessary in order to maintain this country as one nation. But I say to the minister that such an unfair cutback on the English production side will make it very difficult for us to explain that kind of policy to our constituents.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, in his statement to the House about Mr. André Saumier's report on the analysis of the staff reductions planned by the management of the National Film Board, the minister said:

> —The Board's present difficulties should not hide the activities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or of the Canadian Film Development Corporation.

The minister states clearly that three agencies financed by the government are concerned with the distribution of films produced in Canada and abroad. The minister added:

> In 1964, the C.B.C. spent the sum of $9,500,000 on the production of films for television; in 1970-71, this sum will be $13,000,000.

That means an increase of $3,500,000 in appropriations for production of films to be shown on television.

Mr. Speaker, anyone who looks at the television films produced by the C.B.C. and compares them to those produced by the N.F.B. can readily see how superior the latter are to the educational films made by the C.B.C. for the people of Canada. As a matter of fact, the N.F.B. seeks to educate Canadians, instead of brainwashing them as the C.B.C. does. Why, then, should appropriations for the C.B.C. be considerably increased while those of the N.F.B. are being reduced.

Each time I have had occasion to view a television film produced by the N.F.B., I was aware that it was of a highly educational nature. For instance, we are informed about the North-West Territories and various other areas of Canada.

And the C.B.C., what kind of film does it make in Canada? I will recall in that respect that, during the Christmas season, it showed a one-hour telecast produced in an Old People's Home in Montreal and during which Robert Charlebois swore like blazes for an hour, the whole program being sponsored by the C.B.C.

If one considers the type of films made by the C.B.C. about our own area, Abitibi, when we are shown uninhabited shanties to illustrate the poverty which is rampant over there, one concludes that there is no need for the C.B.C. to go to Abitibi in order to produce such feats. After all, it would be enough to cross the Ottawa River to see the rats over in Hull, and the poverty which is prevalent there. And how about the slums of Montreal! But, on the contrary, efforts have been made for too many years to show despicable films to the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, the government should not reduce appropriations to the N.F.B. but rather help this organization more generously than it does now the C.B.C. which does not fulfill its mission, which is to further the general welfare of the people.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in view of the conflicting reports coming out of Nigeria, whether it is his intention to make at least a brief statement to the House with regard to this matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must remind hon. members we are still on motions.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca) moved that the first report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development presented on December 16, 1969 be concurred in.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure that I propose that the House concur in the first report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It will be evident that any member of the House who has the honour to represent a northern territory such as mine has a special interest in the north. Our interest arises not simply because we who stand on Canada's last important frontier are aware of its vast potential but because we are aware of what can be lost through failure to act properly and prudently in the interest of all Canadians. By asserting Canadian sovereignty over the land and water of the north which traditionally has been considered as belonging to Canada we stand to benefit our own people as well as reassure them that we are firm in protecting their rights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: This is not a time for national timidity. The government's reluctance or tardiness in asserting Canadian sovereignty is doing great harm to our nation. Its pussyfooting can be construed by some nations as an indication that the government has some doubt whether that water and those islands are actually Canadian territory—

Mr. Nesbitt: Well put.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (2:50 p.m.)

Mr. Yewchuk: —and the longer we wait before asserting ourselves the greater this doubt will grow.

The claim for Canadian sovereignty is a matter which should be above partisan considerations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: This, I think is the case, as is evidenced strongly by the committee's recommendations which were unanimously agreed upon by members representing all parties in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: Canada owns the waters of the Arctic Archipelago and should be prepared to exercise complete sovereignty over them. We could rest our case on the principle of long-established claims without challenge by other states, and upon our long-established exercise of effective sovereignty in that area. However, there are many other points to be considered.

Members of all parties have expressed concern about this issue. Some Liberal members opposite have indicated that they are concerned. Indeed, it is of interest to read in the Vancouver Sun of September 16, 1969, an article by the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre). I would like to quote a few paragraphs from this article since he is a member of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development and a former vice-chairman of that committee:

There is a pattern of ship loss in Arctic waters. The losses occur usually when a ship becomes wedged and immovable in the ice. Pressure builds, either by tide or by winds. The ship is crushed and, when released, sinks.

The ecological disaster of a 250,000-ton supertanker spilling crude oil into waters of 27 to 30 degrees fahrenheit strains the imagination. It certainly exceeds our knowledge. The Canadian government, to its discredit, has not even yet undertaken tests of Prudhoe Bay crude oil action under these circumstances. Only during the recent visit of the parliamentary committee to the north did the Fisheries Research Board send its first researcher to those waters to make preliminary investigations.

The suggestions are that crude oil at temperatures below the freshwater freezing mark will form a gelatinous mass which, when deposited on shorelines, may remain for decades and possibly for a century. The lethal effects upon marine life (another subject on which our government remains ignorant and apparently indifferent) are beyond calculation. However, it is recognized that many crude oils contain substances as lethal as DDT. A quarter-million ton tanker could contain killing chemical substances of a scope never inflicted before on any ecology of the world. The Arctic skein of life is probably the least suited to withstand pollution on this gargantuan scale.

I pause here in the quotation to express concern for the people who depend on the land and the waters of the north for their very livelihood, to express concern for the native people, the Indians and the Eskimos who stand the risk of being exploited by commercial plunderers before they can be said to have even lived. Their living conditions are still wretched. They have the highest mortality rate among Canada's native people. Infant mortality in the north is four times the Canadian average, and the death rate of Eskimo children up to the age of four is 13 times the national average. The figures I have at hand show that even in 1964 the average age at death of the Eskimo was 32.2 years.

Are we considering these people? Are they to be part of a give-away? Are we bringing them into discussions regarding their own destiny? Is the Northwest Territories Council involved in discussions, or do we just intend to bulldoze over these people and leave them with the scars of commercial exploitation that already disfigure the permafrost and threaten to cut off survival of the wildlife of the north?

Let me read more of the comments by the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin—

An hon. Member: Who is making the speech?

Mr. Yewchuk: These remarks are very pertinent to the subject, and I said that we wanted to point out that members on the government side, in spite of the fact that the ministers do not favour it, have indicated that they are in favour of our sovereignty over the north.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: I do not apologize for quoting so much of the hon. member's article, which I thought was a pretty good one.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Don't get too sensitive, boys.

Mr. Yewchuk: I continue the quotation:

In her national interest—the prime concern of any nation's government—Canada must control any oil shipments through the Northwest Passage.

We could not deny the rights of innocent passage from one ocean to another if technology has made this possible. But the determination of what constitutes innocent passage must be ours. We are the nation vitally concerned. The determination of which ships are safe and which are dangerously unfit cannot be left to Humble Oil or any of the international companies. It cannot be left to a foreign power. It cannot be left to the United Nations. The Canadian Arctic is the concern of Canadians, unless we choose to abrogate that responsibility.

If enough Canadians know the facts, I don't think they'll choose to ignore this challenge.

We have ample right to claim the waters within the Arctic Archipelago as our own. We have rights of discovery, of continuous occupation, and we have rights by reason that this is a continuous archipelago of the Hinterland doctrine. Ours is not an ocean archipelago, comparable with Indonesia where international shipping has passed for millennia, beginning with Chinese explorers. The Arctic islands are an extension of the Canadian continental land mass and our internationally recognized control of the Labrador coast and of Hudson Bay extends logically and naturally into the High Arctic Islands.

We have further rights. The Arctic and Antarctic seas are not like all others. They are frozen for much of the year. The definition between land and water is sometimes detectable only by instruments. At least one authority has stated that a ship frozen in Arctic seas, far from land and communicating with land only by surface vehicle, is more effectively a part of the Canadian land mass than is a ship at anchor in one of our southern harbours.

For these and other reasons, I am convinced that the waters within the archipelago have been Canadian, are now Canadian and must remain exclusively Canadian.

As I mentioned before, Mr. Speaker, I am not the author of those words. They are the thoughts of the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin, expressed in an article.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: I am amazed at the attitude of the Government House Leader in his efforts to obstruct this motion and prevent a debate on such a vital issue. He has intimated that the committee did not wish the report to be considered by the House. That is absurd. The report was agreed upon unanimously and individually by every member of the committee. The report was written after hearing evidence by many experts, including Dr. Maxwell Cohen, and after study of an extensive research paper on the subject as well as a trip to the Arctic last summer.

I would like to read a paragraph from the first report of the committee:

Members of the committee, during their visit, also had an opportunity for discussion with experts in the oil transportation industry and talked with some of Canada's most expert icebreaker marine officers, as well as the transportation officers responsible for Panarctic's shipping operations in the Melville Island area where the loss of two Panarctic barges occurred in August. Members also had discussions with a leading Canadian marine biologist and ecologist investigating the effects of the Panarctic barge accident.

After the visit to the Arctic members of the committee met four times before producing this report. I would like to draw attention to a couple of other paragraphs on page six of the report:

• (3:00 p.m.)

Your committee rejects the suggestion that an international waterway exists through the Canadian Archipelago.

At page 7 the report reads:

Your committee recommends that the government of Canada indicate to the world, without delay, that vessels, surface and submarine, passing through Canada's Arctic Archipelago are and shall be subject to the sovereign control and regulation of Canada.

I should like also to quote from the testimony of Dr. Maxwell Cohen appearing on page 624 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence, No. 18, of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, dated April 18, 1969, where he states:

But if you add together the archipelago theory and the sector theory, I think that the Canadian case for total control over the water system between the islands is not unpersuasive.

He goes on to say:

But when you add to the sector theory the notion that the whole of the Arctic island system is a common archipelago, and as a common archipelago it is within the sovereign jurisdiction of Canada for all the reasons I have given, and you take the Norwegian Fisheries judgment as a further wrapping up of the doctrinal issue, I think you treat this as the Norwegian Fisheries case treated the Norwegian coast where all the waters between the fiords are now treated as inland Norwegian waters and not high seas. Therefore, subject to innocent passage, of course, subject to rights of passage through straits, one could make, I think, a reasonable case for the inland waters character of the waters of the archipelago.

I make reference, Mr. Speaker, to a research report made available to us. I should like to read two paragraphs from that to establish that Canada has made its presence known and has exercised sovereignty in that region for quite some time. The report reads:

In 1903, the Neptune patrolled the waters of Hudson Bay and the eastern Arctic islands to aid in the establishment of permanent stations for the collection of customs, the administration of justice, and the enforcement of Canadian law.

In 1906-1907, Captain Bernier in command of the C.G.S. Arctic, carried out similar operations. He proceeded to Albert harbour, North Baffin island, where he informed the whalers that they must take out licences under Canadian Whaling regulations; he landed at no less than 15 places, on different islands, and took formal possession of them in the name of Canada, usually by raising the flag, reading a formal document, erecting a cairn and depositing in it the document of possession.

The Government House Leader's dictatorial attitude simply reflects his disdain for Parliament and for the usefulness of committees.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yewchuk: In his efforts to undermine Parliament by means of the rule changes, he considered that he should occupy the minds of members by scattering them off into a corner somewhere to sit at a committee meeting and then forget about their work and forget about their committee reports.

Mr. Bell: Where is he now?

An hon. Member: Time you had a new House Leader.

Another hon. Member: Where is your House Leader?

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, your ruling to allow the motion was a major victory for Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yewchuk: It has given to committees a new sense of vitality and vigour.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the line of thought of the hon. member, but I think all hon. members will recognize that it is not in order to comment on a ruling of the Chair.

Mr. Yewchuk: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I thought it was pertinent to the issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yewchuk: I expect the Government House Leader might start juggling the rules again and I just wanted to indicate that we would not stand for it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: Participatory autocracy!

Mr. Yewchuk: Much of our concern for the Arctic involves the question of pollution. We now believe that Canada should be responsible for effective control in this area. It cannot be left to other powers or the United Nations. What do we know about the effects of pollution in the north? We may know something of its effects on the Ottawa River, though I really wonder, but even so, we do not seem to know how to provide the leadership to prevent this man-made mutilation of our environment which is happening on our doorstep.

But concern there is on pollution, and we need to know more. The Committee on Northern Development has made such a recommendation. I refer you to the sinking in Viscount Melville Sound on August 21, 1969 of the Panarctic barges, "Learmouth" and "John A. Norberg". The latter was loaded at the time with 470,000 gallons of bulk oil, mostly Arctic diesel. The Department of Transport reported a week after the sinking that:

> The diesel oil spilled into the sea is a relatively light distillate and as a result, long lasting pollution will not occur.

I quote now from the circular published by The Arctic Circle, Ottawa, dated November, 1969, which reads:

> Crude oil certainly makes a more obvious and unsightly mess than diesel oil. Reports indicate, however, that diesel oil is much more toxic than crude oil. For example, the Smithsonian Institution Centre for Short-lived Phenomena records (in Marine Pollution Bulletin, No. 16, October, 1969) that an estimated leakage of only 10,000 gallons of No. 2 diesel oil from the barge "Florida" off the coast of Massachusetts, on 17 and 18 September caused "extensive mortality to marine life—At least 24 species of fin-fish are dying in large numbers—scallops are hardest hit. Even in West Falmouth Harbour where there is no visual or olfactory evidence of oil, they are dying by the thousand."

It must be made clear that these Arctic waters and straits are Canadian and will remain Canadian. The Northwest Passage is not an international strait because there have been virtually no passages of the sort required in the past centuries to establish it as anything other than Canadian waters. It has been said before, and bears repeating, that the passage is not an international one because it is not customarily and cannot customarily be used as an international strait.

Without Canadian sovereignty we cannot control pollution, and we cannot guard against wicked exploitation of the north and its people.

At this stage I do not know what antipollution measures the government envisages for the north or how these will be controlled. It may be they have huge reserves of straw from the prairies just waiting to be used to sop up spilled oil. Perhaps a contract has already been signed for a ten-year supply of detergent. I just hope that if the Arctic waters are to be open to every Tom, Dick or Harry, the planned measures to combat pollution will be adequate.

The risk of a Torrey Canyon disaster hangs over all of our heads today and the best insurance policy in the world would not and could not possibly compensate for the damage to our environment if a disaster of the Torrey Canyon magnitude happened in the north. A disaster of that proportion would upset the delicate balance of nature in the north and may lead to complete ecological breakdown in the Arctic. It could reach out to every man, woman and child on this earth.

Sovereign control of the Arctic does not imply interference with innocent and peaceful passage. I want to make this clear, Mr. Speaker, that as far as I am concerned I welcome marine traffic through the straits as I think it will encourage development in that area. However, Canada must ultimately decide what constitutes innocent passage and must have the right to make and enforce regulations which protect our national interest.

Because of your positive and progressive ruling, Mr. Speaker, the committees of this House have been given an important role. Their reports are that much more important because of the close attention that these committees can pay to detail. These are committees of the House, and not instruments of government. We have before us the recommendations of one such committee which, I believe, expresses the concern of all thinking Canadians. To vote against this motion or to further stall its consideration by this House is a vote against Canada, a vote against claims of Canadian sovereignty in northern lands and waters rightfully ours, and a vote against humanity itself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Greene: Will the hon. member permit a question? I noted that the hon. member subscribed to the views of Professor Cohen with regard to the right of innocent passage. I wonder if he could let us know whether he subscribes to the initiatives of the Prime Minister namely, that any passage through the northwest passage shall be subject to Canadian rules and regulations with respect to the protection of the area's ecology and with respect to antipollution measures in the north?

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, that was a very nice speech by the hon. minister.

Mr. Greene: Would the hon. member answer the question?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I take it that the hon. member either cannot or will not answer the question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Why not discuss it at ten o'clock.

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this motion.

In both this report and this committee's ninth report presented during the last session of Parliament, the unanimous view was expressed by all political parties represented on that committee and by members of all parties that the Canadian government should move promptly and positively to make it clear to the world that the waters within the Arctic archipelago are Canadian.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Pierre: Although I was much heartened by the statement the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made on leader's day in the throne speech debate, I am, as I was last year, still impatient because further action has not followed these words.

Mr. Speaker, I should like in these remarks to make some argument for the Canadian position which I hope hon. members of the House will find persuasive, because it is my hope that this motion will carry unanimously in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Pierre: Before I do so, I should like to take a few minutes in order to expand on remarks I made briefly in the House the other day.

I am not convinced that the action being taken here is a wise one; I am not convinced that it will strengthen the position of committees, because I fear that it may have another result.

This is not in any sense a criticism or comment upon Mr. Speaker's ruling, and is not intended as such. I know that all hon. member's of the House hold Mr. Speaker in the very highest regard. We know that his decisions are made judicially and with nothing except the best interests of the House of Commons at heart.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Pierre: But, Mr. Speaker, I am dealing with the possible results of a decision.

It should be realized that this committee report, as well as the one brought down last year, contains more than a statement on Arctic sovereignty or what might be called a statement of principle; these reports were very detailed and committed the cabinet and the government to, among other things, the expenditure of money. I doubt very much the propriety of this course.

I do not oppose a movement towards a congressional system of government.

I do not oppose the adoption of a congressional system which would give greater powers to committees and which would bring many changes to Parliament. Nevertheless, neither I nor the Canadian people are prepared yet to abandon the idea of cabinet responsibility.

The committee may recommend the expenditure of money but is not charged with providing it. Only this House has the power to provide money and, according to my understanding, it is the cabinet that initiates such expenditures before the House.

Hon. members who have read this report carefully will no doubt note that it was not written in the usual style of committee reports, in which it is usually stated that "the government should consider the advisability" of doing this and that or, that the committee recommends such and such a general course of action. This report does not recommend that the government should study the advisability of do ng such and such a thing merely because the members of the committee believe it should be done in that way.

Let us see what the cabinet would be committed to by way of the expenditure of money if there were concurrence in this committee report. On page 210 of Votes and Proceedings of December 16, we find the following:

> The Committee recommends that appropriate agencies of the Government move immediately to conduct research in the Arctic to gather information on the following:

(A) Physical properties of crude oils and other hydrocarbons in cold waters, the dynamics of their dispersion, and their persistence in water and on and under ice;

(B) The toxicity of various hydrocarbons to plant and animal life;

(C) Methods for control of oil spills, removal or neutralization of pollutants and destruction of pollutant cargoes in cases of marine disaster—

Your Committee recommends—

(A) An operational research study to determine polution safeguards to be required of oil tankers and pollutant-carrying maritime traffic in Arctic and North Atlantic waters;

(B) A research project into the effect of oil and other chemical pollutants on the marine biology and ecology of the cold waters of the Arctic and North Atlantic Oceans;

(C) A supporting programme aimed at developing improved methods combatting pollution in low temperature waters.

In last year's report, the committee also urged the government to take prompt action to establish our Arctic sovereignty. There was no motion for concurrence in that report which also contained recommendations, I believe, with respect to increased government spending.

Although I do not have last year's report before me, I can recall that it urged the government to spend more money on certain matters. One was that it spend more money on Indian Centres.

May I say that I am not retreating from my previous position. I still think it was wise for this committee to recommend what it recommended. My mind has not been changed. Nevertheless, I urge members of this House to consider carefully what will happen if they give to committees the power, apparently, to put the Canadian cabinet in a straitjacket.

Mr. McGrath: Why do we bother with committees?

Mr. St. Pierre: To answer the hon. member, may I say that this committee report shows the necessity of our having committees. Perhaps I will be able to suggest a better answer later.

At present the committees have the power to amend legislation, which is important; the power to investigate, which is important; the power to recommend, which is important and the power to pass or, for that matter, stall legislation. This, too, is important.

May I consider for a moment the attitudes of our opposition parties on this national issue. Of course, I am not speaking of members of the opposition on the committee. In fact, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion the relations between members of the Committee have been excellent.

I feel that we have worked as a team.

I hope we have worked effectively.

While, of course, one ought not to single out any one hon. member in particular, I should like to mention two hon. members especially. One of these is the committee chairman, the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) who has been absolutely indefatigable in working on this and associated projects. I think it is appropriate, in a more narrow sense, to mention the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Simpson).

Following the trip of the subcommittee to the Arctic, my feeling was that we had accomplished all that we could. I was not particularly enthused about writing another report on the matter which would, in effect, be a repetition of the report we submitted last June.

In case the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) is concerned about this matter, I am not repeating conversations from the steering committee which were private. I am referring to the record of an open committee meeting.

The hon. member for Churchill felt very strongly that a report should be written.

I now wish to say that he was right and I was wrong. I think it should have been written.

I wish I could speak with as high praise of the actions of the opposition parties as I can of the actions of the opposition members on that committee.

This problem has been looming in Canada, Mr. Speaker, and growing by the week for a considerable time ever since the Prudhoe Bay oil discoveries.

Later in these remarks I intend to point out why I feel the Canadian government has not reacted to this situation as vigorously as it should have. I say the same of the opposition parties.

The opposition parties, Mr. Speaker, have a highly unusual opportunity of bringing matters of national importance before this House.

I am referring to opposition days, in which the choice of subjects is entirely theirs.

I do not know how many opposition days there have been since this Parliament commenced, Mr. Speaker, but on not one of them was this matter worthy of their attention.

What did they talk about?

Biafra!

Mr. Nystrom: Wasn't that important?

Mr. St. Pierre: That is what they considered to be of national importance to Canada, Biafra.

During the question period of the first sitting day of this Parliament I was astounded when the first question asked of the government of Canada concerned Biafra.

I thought I had been elected to a Canadian Parliament. I wondered if I had blundered by chance into some meeting of an organization of African states which would more properly be seized of that matter than the Canadian government.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. St. Pierre: I do not know why we should look abroad to find trouble, when we have government work here at home. Is that responsible opposition?

I just wish to put on the record, in connection with this subject, a statement made by an hon. member of the opposition who is now visiting that country, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson). The hon. member has cabled this message:

> Reports of starving millions have been victory for skilful propagandists.

I now wish to turn to the north.

An hon. Member: Yes, turn to the north.

Mr. St. Pierre: Yes, like a compass needle.

I wish to open my remarks with a statement that was made in 1963 to the Canadian Political Science Conference in Quebec. The quotation is from a speech by Gordon W. Smith and reads as follows:

> Canadians might be a little less complacent about the vast northern areas shown in bright red on Mercator's familiar projection if they appreciated fully the tribulations that accompanied the acquisition of it—

I want to underline these words as best I can:

> —and if they understood that with little more ineptitude, or a little less luck on our part, or a little more aggressive competition from some other statutes, they might not have become ours.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, he was referring to our land areas of the High Arctic, the Territories and the Yukon.

Until very recent years, these areas were our only real concern in the north. I do not think many of us were concerned about water.

We are by no means a xenophobic nation. I do not think anyone has ever wanted to seal those waters against the legitimate commerce of the world.

I feel we have not studied the fish resources adequately, but we have studied them to some degree. This study has not been extensive since the whalers moved out from their operations early in the century.

There did not appear to be such urgency in the declaration of sovereignty over the waters, providing we had full and untrammelled sovereignty over the land areas which, according to any authority I have been able to find, we have, and providing we had full access to the resources of the seabed which again according to any authority I could find, we do have.

Then, whether we liked it or not, technology overtook us and oil was discovered at Prudhoe Bay.

Another big pool has been discovered by Imperial Oil at the mouth of the Mackenzie and in the High Arctic there is the Panarctic consortium partially supported by the government and partly by private money. There can be little doubt that that consortium has a handful of kings and aces in its search for another pool of oil in the High Arctic.

This oil, as well as oil that will be found, must somehow be moved to market.

In the search for efficient transportation methods the Humble Oil Company, in association with some other companies, undertook a daring and welcome experiment.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think we can shrug off or evade the challenge of modern technology. We have to meet it head on.

I congratulate that company for its initiative in testing whether an ice-strengthened ship could operate regularly through the ice of the northwest passage.

This experiment has proven to be less than a complete success, although it has undoubtedly added a great deal to our knowledge of ice and Arctic conditions.

Perhaps I do not need to belabour this point because I think it is generally recognized by all hon. members—the perils associated with transportation of crude oil or any hydrocarbon through ice filled waters of the north verges on the intolerable. I do not suggest they are completely intolerable, because the problems technology presents to us in one form it can meet us with solutions for in another form. However, as yet it has not provided a solution to this problem.

The hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) quoted from an article which I wrote recently. The common peril of ships in the Arctic has always been to be besieged by the ice, to be crushed by the ice and to sink.

The S.S. Manhattan returned with a hole in her side large enough to drive a truck through, even though the ice conditions in that area were the easiest in many years. In connection with tankers moving through the archipelago, on the surface or under the sea, I might point out that there is a study under way and plans are being drawn which may or may not come to fruition for 40,000 or 50,000 ton submarine tankers operating under the ice.

• (3:30 p.m.)

The peril under the ice does not differ entirely from the peril to which surface vessels are exposed.

Someone must control this movement through the passage.

We must be satisfied that the ships are safe and that they are not designed in such a way as would permit them to be crushed, losing their cargoes.

Alternatively, we must be confident that technology has provided a means for the total neutralization of oil cargoes or their total destruction in the event of shipwreck. To the best of my knowledge, technology has not yet provided us with these means.

The important point—one which was well made by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) and I expect to hear it made again in the House today—is who will be responsible for doing this?

Logically, the responsibility not only on behalf of Canada but on behalf of the whole world community falls directly upon this nation and upon this government.

If we are not sufficiently concerned about the danger of the greatest ecological disaster in human history befalling the Arctic it is idle to expect that other nations will assume this concern for us. Their attitude will to a large degree be determined by our attitude, because these are our waters and our islands.

May I ask you how much time I have left, Mr. Speaker? I am sorry, but I have lost track of the hand of the clock.

An hon. Member: Take all the time you need.

[Mr. St. Pierre.]

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. St. Pierre: Thank you. Of course, we are not alone in our concern about the danger of pollution.

I am not suggesting that the United States or any other of our neighbouring nations are indifferent to it. In fact, it is my understanding that on the day following the address given by the Prime Minister on leader's day, the United States government communicated with our embassy in Washington expressing support for his views about the need for measures to control possible pollution in the north.

But again—and this cannot be said too often—the need for concern is primarily ours.

It may be suggested in some quarters that there is a reasonable basis for the statement by the Canadian government that no further pronouncements are necessary because, after all, these are our waters, and they are accepted as being ours by the world community as a matter of course. Unfortunately, it is not necessarily accepted by the world community as a matter of course, and in this connection I wish to deal for a few moments with an article which appeared in the White Horse Star and was reprinted in the Edmonton Journal.

The writer is Mr. Peter Calamai of the Southam News Service and the article is important because it reflects the attitude of at least one group of Americans who are concerned about this matter and the repercussions do not bode good for us. I shall read a few paragraphs.

> Boston. The controversial use of the Northwest Passage to ship oil from Alaska was discussed here Friday—without benefit of any Canadian participation and with only fleeting reference to the fears of a disastrous oil spill.
> U.S. and Humble Oil officials in the discussion panel at the annual meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science here also carefully skirted the question of Arctic sovereignty.
> Russell Venn, Humble vice-president who was aboard the tanker Manhattan for part of its historic September crossing of the passage, said he was sure Canada would not try to impose fees on U.S. oil companies making use of Arctic waters.
> In response to a question about ownership of the waters around Banks Island—a key piece of land in any Northwest Passage—Mr. Venn said the Canadian government was leary of publicly renouncing any claims on the waters because then the ownership of seabed mineral wealth would be calculated from the Canadian continental coastline rather than from the islands.
> Because Canada wanted to be able to export natural gas and other products to the United States without paying tariffs it was unlikely that the Canadian government would attempt to impose any economic restraints—

Mr. Venn told his audience that the Manhattan was visited by "a bunch of MPs."

"They were very worried about sovereignty; I figure that must have been among the more liberal ones in the bunch," he said.

Members of the Commons Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development greeted the Manhattan at Resolute Bay on Cornwallis Island.

There was no mention from any of the three speakers of the environmental threat of an oil spill in the Arctic. When an audience member raised the problem at the end of the three-hour session, Mr. Venn said Humble had done research on the techniques of cleaning up such a spill. "I think we can avoid them."

I have already praised Humble Oil for their initiative in making this scientific experiment and I do not retract those words. But what took place at that conference does not reflect the concern which should be felt for the preservation and safety of the Canadian Arctic.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Pierre: Officials of the Humble Oil Company do not speak United States government policy, I recognize this. But their approach is one more reason for the Canadian government to make an early statement on the matter in order that the attitude of any foreign companies may not stand up.

This casual, I might even say cavalier, attitude to the near-intolerable threat posed by tankers going through the passage calls out for a response from this country.

I should like to deal briefly with the position of the United States government on this matter.

It is not entirely clear to me.

I find that the statements made on the subject are sometimes a trifle conflicting.

Let me say this: I think the Americans might well ask themselves which nation in the world has been America's best friend for the longest time.

I suggest it is not in the best interest of the United States that the waters of the Northwest Passage should be regarded as high seas any more than such a declaration about the Panama Canal would be in their interest.

Do they want these waters supervised by their main trading partner, their military ally and faithful friend, or do they want them to become an international no man's land with all the security risks which might be entailed?

I hope that any American who might speak impulsively about the freedom of the seas in connection with this matter will first pause and consider the repercussions.

As to the Canadian legal position, I have more references here than time will allow me to read, but there is one to which I should like to draw attention because hon. members may not be familiar with it.

You may recall, Mr. Speaker, that the former prime minister, the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, urged that we should make a clear and direct claim to the Arctic, including the icy portions, not only because of the risk of foreign control but because he was concerned about the possibility of the establishment of IBM's on the ice to the detriment of Canada's position.

I intend to quote another speaker, one who can, I think, be considered an expert on this subject—Dean George Curtis of UBC. Dean Curtis is one of those who has represented Canada at international conferences on these matters.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Dean George Curtis was an adviser to the Canadian government in the early 1950's regarding the DEW line construction and matters concerning Canadian sovereignty.

He spoke briefly to the Canadian Bar convention here in Ottawa last summer.

He was not reported and what I give you is a paraphrase of his remarks. I can assure you that this is correct as I have checked it with him by telephone.

He made three points:

First, he thought the Norwegian decision as confirmed by the Geneva conference made it feasible for Canada to lay claim to the waters within a system of headland to headland straight base lines.

Second, he felt it was extremely important to do this in order to protect the ecology of the High Arctic and that this was a responsibility that Canada had in her own interest and in the interest of the world at large.

Finally, he said, and again I am paraphrasing him, that if this area were left in the realm of the high seas there would be no protection.

As to the extension of a state's power beyond its shores to control pollution or the threat of pollution, I refer to one current and one recent incident in the United States which indicate that the United States fully understands the necessity for this.

The United States has set one or two precedents.

One precedent, and this is a small matter, but significant, concerned the salvage of a Liberian oil tanker in January 1968 about 400 miles off the coast of Washington.

The Vancouver Island Salvage Company sent two tugs out to pick up an oil tanker which was on fire. The fire burned out but there was still some oil in her holds.

The Sudbury II and the Island Monarch were the two tugs.

As they brought her in, heading for Vancouver Island and nearing the United States coastline, the officers were informed by the United States through its coast guard that they could not bring that ship within 50 miles of the United States coastline.

I do not blame the United States in the least for making such a decision. I think that was quite wise. But it certainly indicates United States acquiescence to the principle that a coastal state has the right to such controls beyond what are normally considered to be territorial waters.

Let me refer hon. members to two bills, one before the United States House of Representatives and the other before the United States Senate. They are roughly of the same intent although there are some differences between them.

A joint committee of those two houses is now attempting to meld them into a single bill for presentation and presumably for passage.

If adopted they will give the United States the right to fine companies for pollution of sea water and to control the activities of vessels which might pollute these waters. This is quite a comprehensive piece of legislation.

The point which I draw to the attention of hon. members is that the United States by this legislation, if it is passed, does not adopt this right in terms of the 3-mile limit to which they adhere today in international discussions.

The United States legislation would apply to the 3-mile limit and the contiguous area; that extra nine miles, bringing it to an effective 12-mile limit.

If nothing else, I hope the Canadian government can move quickly to establish the 12-mile limit for Canada instead of the present 3 plus 9 mile limit. But it is possible, probable perhaps, that the 3 plus 9 miles is sufficient for our purposes after drawing the base lines. I regret I do not have time to pursue that matter.

There are one or two other matters which I may have time to bring to the attention of the House.

I should like to touch very briefly on the attitude of the Soviet government and quote from Mr. Lakhtine who wrote some time ago in the American Journal of International Law. He summarized his points as follows:

(1) Polar states wield sovereignty over sea regions covered with ice, according to their sectors of attraction.

(2) Littoral states wield sovereignty over land locked seas free from ice, and over gulfs and bays.

(3) Littoral states are entitled to a somewhat limited sovereignty over all remaining sea regions free from ice, as well as over territorial waters, maritime belts and waters between islands according to their sectors of attraction.

If action by the Canadian government should lead to a dispute in any international court I do not think the mighty Soviet Union would be in a very good position to oppose the Canadian government's position in establishing our sovereign control over the waters of the passage.

In closing, and for the sake of clarity, let me say I hope that nothing I have said here has conveyed the impression that I should like to see Canada seal the Northwest Passage.

Nothing could be further from my thoughts.

We, as Canadians, should look forward hopefully to a day when technology provides ships which will move much of the commerce of the world across the north of Canada.

However, Mr. Speaker, we must take the authority to control that shipping which we consider dangerous.

At the Geneva conference of 1958 there was adopted a definition of innocent passage, and innocent passage is certainly what we should offer to the world, together with our declaration of sovereignty over those waters.

Innocent passage may generally apply not only to territorial waters or to internal waters but may apply also to waters recently enclosed by base lines, such as in the Norwegian decision.

Generally, innocent passage provides that ships may pass through waters providing three things; they are not a threat to the security of the nation involved; that they are not a threat to the peace of the nation involved and, quite adequate for our purposes in the north, that they are not a threat to the good order of the nation involved.

There is no national court or body of the United Nations, in my opinion, that could possibly accept the notion that the spillage of a quarter of a million tons of crude oil in Canada's north would not be a threat to the good order of our country.

I maintain that our legal opinion, based on a number of references for recognizing authority, is sound and that our view should now be heard internationally.

I thank all hon. members for their courteous attention.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to congratulate the mover of this motion for concurrence in the report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I think he has rendered a genuine service to the House by insisting through his motion that this report from an important committee of the House be discussed. Reports of committees should be discussed and a decision should be taken on them by the House. I have long thought that there should be some change in our standing orders to the effect that all committee reports would have to be called within a certain period of time. The length of time that such reports might be discussed could be limited by allowing one speaker from each party, or by some other limitation. When they could be called might be established by the house leaders.

I might point out that if we allow, as we have been doing, the reports of committees merely to die on the Order Paper the work of these committees will become meaningless. The members who do not belong to those committees will have no opportunity to express their opinions regarding the matters which are contained in committee reports. The Prime Minister has talked a great deal about participatory democracy. If there is to be adequate participation in the democratic process by members of Parliament they must not only have an opportunity to discuss important public questions in depth, but must also be assured that the recommendations they make will be discussed by the House—not necessarily adopted by the House but at least discussed by the House and either amended, sent back to the committee or endorsed.

If I may, I should like to congratulate the members of the committee whose report we are now discussing for their ringing and forthright declaration regarding Canadian sovereignty over the Arctic Archipelago. What they have said needed to be said. I am glad it has been said in such forthright language. The whole kernel of our case is summed up in three paragraphs. I think I should read them. At page 6 the report reads as follows:

> Your Committee considers that the waters lying between the islands of the Arctic Archipelago have been, and are, subject to Canadian Sovereignty historically, geographically and geologically.
> The imminent prospect of maritime oil tanker traffic through the Arctic Archipelago and the potential threat such traffic poses to Canada's Arctic environment makes it imperative to Canada's national interest that the Government of Canada take whatever steps are necessary, consistent with international law, to assure recognition of Canadian Sovereignty by all vessels, surface and submarine, passing through the Arctic Archipelago.
> Your Committee recommends that the Government of Canada indicate to the world, without delay, that vessels, surface and submarine, passing through Canada's Arctic Archipelago are and shall be subject to the sovereign control and regulation of Canada.

A few moments ago while the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) was speaking a cabinet minister said "What is the debate for". The answer is simple. The debate is to give the members of this House an opportunity to endorse unanimously and enthusiastically this declaration of Canada's sovereignty over the Arctic Archipelago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I must confess, sir, it is difficult for me to understand the government's reluctance to have the report of this committee discussed and approved in the House of Commons. The problem of Canadian sovereignty over the Arctic will not go away merely by being ignored. Quiet diplomacy is not likely to bring a solution. As a matter of fact, it is more likely to raise a doubt in the minds of Canadians and to encourage those governments which are desirous of claiming some vested interest in the far north.

Canadians do not want another Alaskan panhandle and they do not want Parliament to refrain from making a forthright declaration of Canada's legitimate rights to the Arctic Archipelago. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald), in statements made outside the House, seeks to excuse his delaying action by the statement that the matter is under discussion by the government and that debate at this time would be premature. This government has been in office since April, 1963. Surely, by this time it has formulated a policy in respect of Canada's position vis-à-vis the Arctic regions. Previous administrations have been much more forthright. I will discuss later on the statement made by Canada in 1946 through Mr. Pearson, when he was ambassador to Washington. There was also a statement by Prime Minister St. Laurent which is found in Hansard for December 8, 1953 at page 700. He said:

We must leave no doubt about our active occupation and exercise of our sovereignty in these northern lands right up to the pole.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sharp: Did he say "lands"?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): That is what he said—"lands". I shall deal with waters as well. The minister points out that Mr. St. Laurent said "lands right up the the pole". Mr. Pearson, in 1946, talked about more than lands. I shall come to that in a moment. I think, in the new developing field of international law, Canada must assert its position and justify its claims. In an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of September 18, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) who just interjected, was quoted as saying:

—if it were (possible to obtain anything at all by unilateral declaration of intention) there would, of course, be international anarchy.

That is exactly the situation in the world today. With regard to territorial waters, only some 20 per cent of the nations of the world have established a 12-mile limit. More than 25 per cent still are on the 3-mile limit. Others have various figures. Three countries, Peru, Chile and Ecuador, have established a 200-mile limit for fishing purposes. What has happened in this new field of law of the sea has been that coastal states have made unilateral declarations. Those declarations, if objected to, have gone to the courts. As a result of the decisions in the courts, and as a result of conferences on the law of the sea, treaties and conventions have been established. The responsibility for making the assertion of sovereignty lies with the government of this country.

I should like to point out that Canada has good precedents in international law for its claim of sovereignty over the Arctic Archipelago. So far, no nation has ever questioned Canada's sovereignty over the islands between the mainland and the North Pole. The question at issue is whether the waters between these islands come exclusively under Canadian jurisdiction. I am not a lawyer, but through reading articles by lawyers in this field it becomes increasingly clear what happens is that out of precedents doctrines are built up and finally conventions are arrived at. There are three doctrines which to me as a layman make very clear the justification for Canada making a declaration of sovereignty. The first is what is commonly called the sector claim doctrine. In 1946, the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, who at that time was the Canadian ambassador to Washington, reasserted the sector claim which Canada had made as far back as 1908, which claim included all land, water and ice up to the pole. The Soviet Union still maintains this extensive sector claim which it first propounded back in 1926 and which it interprets as including not only lands within the sector but also ice, water and air space.

The other doctrine which has come to be recognized is the base line system, whereby a nation draws straight lines from headland to headland and claims all the waters within those lines. This system was first adopted by Norway, and was upheld in the well known fisheries case by the International Court of Justice in 1951. At the Geneva Conference on the law of the sea, this system was approved and incorporated in the convention of 1958, and has now become accepted as part of international law.

The third doctrine is that of the continental shelf, which was propounded by President Truman of the United States, who proclaimed that the resources of the subsoil and seabed of the continental shelf adjacent to a country's shores belonged to that nation. This principle was accepted and incorporated into an international convention at the United Nations Geneva Conference on the Law of the Sea in 1958. This convention specifies that a coastal state has the sovereign right to exploit the resources of its continental shelf lying adjacent to its coasts at a depth of 200 metres or less, and to a greater depth if exploitation proves feasible.

Some reference has already been made to the statements made by Professor Maxwell Cohen, the Dean of Law at McGill University. I noticed in an article which he wrote some time ago that he dealt with this matter, and I would like to quote just a paragraph from it:

And recent marine geology and cartography in the Arctic confirm that almost the entire archipelago and its waters are part of a shelf system within such average water depths except for one or two trenches and in deeper Lancaster Sound. There is therefore no doubt of exclusive Canadian control of the seabed beneath the entire waters area within the archipelago except for some limited geological aberrations where the depths exceed continental shelf standards. And even here there is a growing concept of claims to the continental slope to justify exclusive exploitation at greater depths.

I was glad to note that the committee, after examining the representations and the evidence given by Professor Cohen, had this to say in its report:

> Your committee rejects the suggestion that an international waterway exists through the Canadian Arctic archipelago.

And later on in its report the committee said:

> The waters of the Canadian Arctic Archipelago lie over the continental shelf; the Arctic islands and the continental shelf are a geological extension of the Canadian mainland and the North American land mass.

So, it seems to me on the basis of any one of the three doctrines, whether it is that of the sector claim, that of drawing the base lines from headland to headland, or on the basis of the continental shelf doctrine there seems to be an irrefutable case for Canada to claim complete sovereignty over the entire northern area from our mainland to the North Pole.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there are compelling reasons for Canada to assert its sovereignty, and for it to do so without any further delay.

First of all we must establish Canada's right to develop any petroleum or any other resources lying offshore from the Arctic islands. I think it is significant that the United States has never questioned Canadian sovereignty over these waters until recently. The only reason that our claims to sovereignty are being queried at this time is the oil discoveries in Prudhoe Bay, and from our point of view these discoveries have been followed by an even more important discovery of an oil well by the Imperial Oil Company in the Northwest Territories. These discoveries, along with other geological data which have been collected, give credence to the claim by many prominent geologists that the Arctic may well contain some of the largest oil reserves in the world.

Our failure to assert our jurisdiction at this time could mean that we might lose by default the right to develop vast resources which are so essential to the future development of Canada. The New Democratic party takes the position that Canada should clearly assert its right to its share of the Arctic continental shelf, and that we should get on with the task of discovering and developing the resources which are to be found there.

The second reason we ought to move, and move quickly on this matter, is that Canada must have jurisdiction over the northern waters in order to prevent disastrous and lingering pollution. As the committee pointed out, the sinking of two barges owned by Panarctic Oil Ltd. points up the danger of pollution in this area.

The Humble Oil Company of Texas, which is a wholly owned subsidiary of Standard Oil, has announced that it is studying the feasibility of constructing six 250,000 ton tankers, each of which would be twice the size of the Manhattan. Any mishap to a tanker of this size would have disastrous effects on the marine life of the Arctic. It will be noted in this morning's newspapers that over the past number of months some five super oil tankers have sunk in various parts of the world. Mr. Speaker, I contend that since Canada would be the main victim of any pollution which might occur from such a mishap, surely we ought to have the authority to exercise the necessary control to prevent such pollution from taking place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Certainly, if we do not exercise it, nobody else is going to exercise control. There have been suggestions by prominent figures in the United States that Canada, instead of exercising pollution control on its own, should be prepared to delegate this responsibility to some international body, or through some international agreement. I think this would be disastrous, and I agree with the committee when it says, as printed at page 5 of its report:

> Your committee is unimpressed with arguments that adequate pollution safeguards could be effected by international agreement.

Since it is Canadian terrain which would suffer the consequences of pollution I maintain that Canada has an inalienable right to exercise the necessary controls and to set the necessary standards which would hold pollution to a minimum.

The third reason I think we must move quickly is that only by the exercise of our sovereignty would Canada be able to facilitate and direct navigation in Arctic waters. These waters have never been part of the high seas and open to navigation. They are ice-locked for the major part of the year, and if they are used this can only be done with the navigational aids and the icebreaking services provided by the people of Canada. Needless to say this does not mean that we are suggesting that Canada should deny to any nation the right of innocent passage. On the contrary, we feel that the Canadian government should proceed with all haste to provide the navigational aids, pilot services, navigation standards and the icebreaker escorts which will make possible innocent passage through Arctic waters. But there must be no doubt about who controls the navigation of these waters. By drawing baselines between the islands Canada can make the Arctic waters subject to Canadian legislative control, and that should be done immediately.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I want to conclude by saying that in my opinion this is the time for Canada to make a clear and forthright declaration of its sovereignty over this great northern area.

The government's admission of uncertainty has been interpreted as weakness by our American neighbours. The government's diplomatic pussyfooting has merely demonstrated to other nations our lack of courage and conviction concerning Canada's claims to exclusive jurisdiction over the Arctic Archipelago and the continental shelf.

The Americans like straight talk and I think they would respect Canada for asserting its legitimate and long recognized rights in the Arctic. There is an old saying "Silence gives consent". If the government continues to waffle on this question, no one can blame the United States or any other nation for assuming that we are prepared to accept some compromise which would negate our ability to effectively control an area which is vital to the future development of this country.

The matter which the committee has brought to the attention of the House through its report is only one facet of a much larger problem, namely, Canada's diminishing control of its own affairs. The accelerating rate of takeovers by American corporations is eroding our economic independence. Attempts are being made to entice us into a continental energy policy which could well condemn us to be a nation of extraction industries, supplying raw materials and energy for the American industrial complex.

It is rather significant that the reports which came out of the meetings between the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and secretary Walter Hickel in Washington suggested that part of the total energy policy would be some type of guarantee of the Northwest Passage. We have not had any definitive statement from the minister on this question. If we are talking about merely allowing American ships to use that passageway, of course everyone would agree. But if it means some surrender of our sovereignty, some agreement to a bi-national control of that waterway, then we are giving up something which legitimately belongs to the people of this country, not only the present generation but for generations to come.

In addition to economic takeovers and in addition to a continental policy on energy integration, we are being queried on whether we have sovereignty over the Arctic waters at the very time when this area gives promise of being a veritable treasure house of resources.

The Canadian people are becoming increasingly concerned about the steady erosion of our sovereignty and the diminution of our economic independence. They are bewildered by the government's timidity and its continual waffling on matters which affect Canada's future as an independent, viable nation. I believe the decade upon which we have just embarked is crucial for Canada. I believe that we will emerge from the seventies either as a strong, united Canada with a potential for greatness or we will find ourselves absorbed as a junior partner in an American hegemony.

At the turn of this century a great Prime Minister, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, talked about the 20th century belonging to Canada. That vision has not as yet materialized but there are still 30 years to go, Mr. Speaker, so we still have time if we have the will, the courage and the energy we can make that vision come true and help Canada attain the destiny of which it is capable.

I want to appeal to the government—

Mr. Woolliams: There are not many there to whom to appeal.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I appeal to them not to use devious procedural manoeuvres to prevent the House of Commons from expressing itself on the report of this committee. I know, as does every member, that the government can talk out this motion. If no decision is taken by ten o'clock tonight, it will go into the hopper of government orders.

Mr. Nesbitt: With cobwebs on it.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): It will be smothered out of existence. The government can do that; it has the numbers, it has the muscle. But I ask them to think what this will do for Canadian prestige in the world, what it will do for the self-confidence of the Canadian people, what it will do in encouraging other nations, and particularly our friends to the south, to think that we are ambivalent and uncertain about our sovereign claims in the northern part of this continent.

I am asking the government to give the members of this House a chance to speak for Canada. Members of the committee in whose report we are now being asked to concur have spoken out with courage and have made an unequivocal and ringing declaration. That report was unanimous, endorsed by every party represented on the committee. I am asking the government to let the House endorse that report.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I am asking the government to give this House of Commons the opportunity of endorsing an all-party committee report, to tell the world that we are Canadians irrespective of our political, religious or ethnic differences, that we are determined to assert our sovereignty over the northern waters. If the government will allow Parliament to do that, I think the effects of it will be felt all over this country and all around the world. Give us an opportunity to make a ringing declaration for Canada. Only in this way, Mr. Speaker, can we let the world know that we Canadians have faith in our future and that we are determined to play our full part in world affairs as a free and independent nation.

[Translation]

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I want first to congratulate the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) for going ahead and putting the motion now before us.

Having not had the opportunity to go North with the committee on his study trip conducted at the time of the passage of the U.S. ship Manhattan, as I was sitting on the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, I was surprised by the government's reluctance to accept the report that the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development submitted on his return and which was tabled on December 16 last.

I have perused this report and found nothing in it nor in its recommendations which went against the present or future rights or needs of Canada in the Arctic Archipelago that we consider as being part of Canada. The members of this committee and apparently the opposition members and at least one Liberal member are all in agreement, which seems to indicate that the committee's recommendations are meeting with approval. In my view, the government should take it upon itself not only to accept these recommendations, but also to implement them.

Considering the recent developments that were preceded by the performance of the American ship Manhattan, we must make our position known today because it has become necessary to do so.

Several people are urging the Canadian government to take over the Arctic Islands, our northern shores and surrounding waters. The government should not however act in too great a hurry. Other countries, like Russia, have taken over neighbouring regions in a big rush. The development of Siberia had already begun by the time they realized they should have taken a closer look at it.

While the Canadian government should proclaim its sovereignty over the Arctic territories, however, it should not run the risk of committing some regrettable errors that would soon prove costly.

In my opinion, the Canadian government should assert its sovereignty on the Arctic for some reasons referred to in the committee report and also for others that are altogether worth studying.

In fact, we know that the Arctic islands are reproduction areas for some species of migratory birds which sometimes migrate as far as the United States. The American government as well as ours is keen on taking the necessary steps to prevent water pollution by ships inadequately fitted for Arctic navigation.

We also know that Arctic waters are breeding grounds for certain aquatic animals such as whales, seals, walruses, etc. This is why we must take certain preventive measures in order to avoid polluting Canadian waters. Scientists have reported that the icy waters of the Arctic are different from temperate waters or from the warmer waters of other oceans.

We know how difficult it was to fight the pollution caused by the oil tanker that went down near the coast of England, for instance, where waters are temperate. What would have happened if this incident had occurred in the icy waters of the Arctic? We shall have to insist that people who will someday navigate these waters take all the necessary precautions.

The report of the committee, as can be seen in Votes and Proceedings, at page 209, include this recommendation, and I quote:

> Your Committee recommends that:
> A) Panarctic Oils Limited should rely as much as possible on ice working cargo ships for supplies rather than entering the Arctic transportation business themselves, at least at this stage of its development. The discovery of oil in the Arctic Archipelago would call for a further reappraisal of Panarctic's transportation role.

This committee recommendation must not apply to Panarctic Oils Limited only, but too any shipping company that would want to take to the Arctic materials required for the development of the natural wealth to be found there, or to carry back to the South the riches themselves.

There are still other reasons why Canada should claim sovereignty over the Arctic territories. As a matter of fact, those lands abound with natural wealth which we can develop and process ourselves.

I would now like to mention oil, iron and other natural resources even though up to the present time exploration has been rather limited considering the vast expanse of territory to develop. Nevertheless we find in those places considerable mineral deposits and oil fields.

For the above reasons we should proclaim our sovereignty over these territories by effective occupation. To this end, we must help the companies wishing to carry out prospection in those areas. They must have all the necessary facilities for so doing.

To achieve this end, I think we should give our coast guard the necessary authority, because the inspections they have been submitted to showed their efficiency particularly in the Arctic. Of all the countries in the world, Canada is probably the one that has the longest coastline. From inspections of our coast guard, we have been pleased to find out how efficient they are.

The government should also establish research and development centres on the Arctic islands. Our university graduates, our technicians and our engineers would be happy to make use of their knowledge for the benefit of their country. When the Committee on External Affairs and National Defence conducted an investigation last summer within the Navy and the Army, it was suggested, and quite rightly, to set up guard stations that could be manned by members of the Canadian armed forces, in order to facilitate the movements of individuals in those regions.

Responsibilities should also be given to companies developing the natural resources of the Arctic, because it has unlimited wealth which should be worked.

It was said a few months ago that a mining consortium was interested in a ferrous deposit on Baffin Island containing, according to a preliminary study, 22 billion tons of 69 per cent pure iron ore. Apparently, such natural resources are to be found all over the Arctic islands and even on the neighbouring mainland.

Considering the development and research being carried out in all fields, water transportation for instance, it is obvious that if the government does not let opportunity knock in vain, the prospects are very good for the Canadian economy. I believe that it was the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre) who mentioned a little while ago the developments that would probably take place in the transportation of oil and iron ore by cargo submarines.

An editorial in today's Le Devoir, a Montreal paper, reads as follows:

> In a recent number of l'Actualité économique, there is an article by Mr. Michel Brochu about experiments carried out in Siberia. Placing a thin film of sand on the ice increases the action of the sun and makes the ice melt faster. Mr. Brochu believes that with the extended period of sunlight in northern regions during the summer, such a method, over several years, would permit the clearing of sea passages which could then be open to navigation each summer.

These experiments and research are being conducted now. It has not yet been possible to check whether they are conclusive, but we are continually being surprised by discoveries in all fields. I feel the government must immediately implement the recommendations of the committee whose report is before us today and take efficient though cautious steps in order to proclaim its sovereignty over the territories of northern Canada, and more specifically over the Arctic archipelago.

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention in the limited time I propose to take to deal with the subtleties and intricacies of international law with regard to the matter now before us, except to make some reference to the aspect which is of direct concern to me and for which I have some responsibility.

I refer to the conference on marine pollution held at Brussels in November of last year and which I attended as head of the Canadian delegation.

This matter is of considerable irrelevance to the subject we are discussing today because, in addition to the undoubted problems that have quite properly been raised during this debate with regard to pollution in the north, there is the fact that on a day to day basis, and on an almost immediate basis, we have a serious problem with regard to the waters around all of Canada.

It is my judgment, and I think I can support this by saying it is also the judgment of my department, that while we should not for a moment lose sight of the extremely important aspects of northern pollution, at the same time in terms of immediacy it is not as vitally important as what we do now with regard to all of the waters that surround Canada. I, therefore, do not think it is a deviation for me to touch briefly on some other matters regarding pollution for which I have a direct responsibility.

As some hon. members know, during the past week I had discussions with the United States authorities on questions such as jet pollution, the poisoning of our air by these new technological advances. We have also been very deeply engaged in studies on the amount of pollution that results from the emissions of automobiles. I am simply pointing out that while understandably the developments which I suggest were really triggered by the voyage of the S.S. Manhattan through the north are of supreme importance, nevertheless we ought not to consider these in isolation or be sidetracked in a sense to a total involvement on this particular question and this particular issue to the detriment of the kind of serious obligation that we ought to have on the whole pollution question.

With regard to the question of pollution of all marine environment, plus the air pollution as a result of the new type jet aircraft and as a result of automobile emissions, we are only starting to scratch the surface of what has become in these early days of the seventies probably the single most publicized subject. It is one which I think publicity reflects as being a real sense of concern not only to Canadians, but to people in many different parts of the world.

The totality of the effects of pollution is almost indescribable and in fact almost unbelievable. I came across some figures today which, although perhaps not completely relevant to the subject under discussion, may be of interest to hon. members. I ask Your Honour's indulgence for 60 seconds. These figures reveal that in terms of garbage, 250 indestructible bottles are abandoned every year by each person in the country, 135 tin cans, 10 gallons of sewage per day per person and 4 pounds of solid sewage wastes per day per person. A lot of this garbage is going into our modern environment. These items are direct contributors to pollution and I repeat the totality of these in some respects is a more serious and more immediate problem than the potentialities of pollution in our northern areas.

In effect, then, even given the greatest possible technological advances and even if the decision were made to employ ships for the transport of oil through northern waters it appears now it would be some time, perhaps years, before this could be accomplished.

We in Canada learnt a good deal from the so-called Manhattan experiment. Hon. members will, I am sure, agree with me that our coastguard demonstrated a world wide level of expertise in the work it did during that venture. I think it is safe to say that when it comes to any kind of navigation through ice and the like there is no country, with the possible exception of the Soviet Union, which could carry on such activities without Canada's assistance. I mention this, apart from the natural pride I have as the minister responsible for the coastguard, by way of reiterating my comment that while I do not minimize the gravity of this threat the more serious danger at the moment is, rather, that which might result from the huge tankers which are in operation right now. For example, Halifax in recent months has been visited by tankers having a capacity larger than that of the Torrey Canyon. At any moment of time, there are hundreds of tankers along our coasts, and it is because of this threat that we took the very hard line we did at the Brussels conference.

In this connection, in response to some of the comments which have been made about the wisdom and effectiveness of taking unilateral action, let me say there is no question that this is a strongly emotional and appealing approach. It is one which commends itself to people who wish merely to put something on record or to put something in the window. Having gone through the Brussels experience and seen, in terms of international affairs, the enormous number of conflicting viewpoints which are expressed on many of these issues,

I have had personal experience at least in learning how difficult it is to secure international agreement and also how futile it is in many ways to take a strong, unilateral stance in the face of overwhelming opposition from other countries.

At the Brussels conference it was our intention to move for an international agreement concerning responsibility for the prevention of oil pollution and the establishment of standard international rules with regard to carriers and the like. In the second place, we wished to define clearly where responsibility lay when one of these spills occurred on the high seas. Initially, back in June, I think, of last year, we introduced into the Canada Shipping Act a number of amendments, one of which was designed to pinpoint this responsibility more specifically than in the past. However, since the Brussels conference was opening at that time it was agreed, with the approval of opposition parties, that we would not press for the enactment of this particular amendment in the House because we wanted to wait to see what happened as a result of the international discussions. Since my return I have been awaiting a report from the delegates who represented Canada throughout the meetings in Brussels. I had undertaken to make a statement on motions in the House in connection with the outcome at that conference, but it seems to me that in view of the arrangements made for today's debate this might be an appropriate point to report on exactly what did transpire. In addition, I thought I might give some indication of what we propose to do.

The Canadian position at this conference was squarely grounded upon two aspects of our experience. For many years the Navigable Waters Protection Act has provided for the removal of wrecks interfering with navigation at the expense of the owner without limitation of liability or the requirement to prove fault. Responsibility for the removal of wrecks lay with the owners. Significant pollution incidents had occurred on our coasts even before the loss of the Torrey Canyon, and preventive measures were taken at the expense of the government in the absence of legislation providing for recovery. An amendment to the Canada Shipping Act proposed to Parliament early last year which would have gone some way to meeting this problem was, as I have explained, held over in the hope that the Brussels conference would provide adequately for such a contingency on an international basis.

Our stance at the conference, arising naturally from our own experience, had two principal policy objectives. The first was that the commercial movement of noxious cargoes, particularly oil, should in no way impose burdens upon innocent third parties or the states of which those parties are citizens. The second was that each form of transportation, should, so far as is feasible, bear its own costs—a principle laid down in the National Transportation Act. The government believes this principle to be necessary for the efficient use of our collective resources. In other words, what we asserted was that in the event of a spill on the high seas which affected the Canadian coastline in any way there should be no responsibility placed upon the aggrieved party, either the nation of Canada or some private person, as a result of something which was clearly no part of their responsibility.

Against this background, the conventions produced by the conference fell far short of what Canada considers to be satisfactory, particularly as to liability for pollution damage. We found it almost totally impossible to achieve any degree of unanimity among the countries concerned, and for a variety of reasons in which hon. members may be interested. For one thing, a great many of the oil producing countries possess very little coastline. Others have large shipping companies in which they are specially interested even though they may possess a certain amount of coastline. So there is no unanimity of concern, and, basically, most countries react subjectively in these matters.

However, the Canadian delegation gained the distinct impression that many of the delegations to this legal conference went there with the prime purpose merely of obtaining a determination of the legal and financial position of ship owners in the event of further incidents of the Torrey Canyon type. There is evidence that a nation which is a very important shipping nation has this as its primary concern, often because its coastline is decidedly limited, or, indeed—though this may at first appear somewhat curious—it may not have a coastline at all.

In these circumstances the Canadian delegation seems to have made some impact. I do not wish to exaggerate, but I feel we have made an impact which improves our situation and which may well do so in fuller measure in the future. This is because, as a coastal state with a limited merchant fleet, our attention was focussed on the substantive consequences of a major oil spill rather than on the legal rights of one of the parties. We were able to make the case strongly that in any such incident which might occur along our coastline we would likely be the sufferer, without any continuing advantages, because we are neither a large merchant marine owning country nor are we an exporting country to any large extent in terms of the use of tankers.

Among other things, the conventions declare the right of a coastal state to intervene on the high seas, place a requirement for proof of absence of fault upon the shipowner, nearly double the traditional amount of the limitation of liability for the shipowner and provide for compulsory insurance so that bankruptcy cannot be used to avoid payment.

Many of these points were included as a result of the urging of Canadian delegates, both at the prior committee work and at the conference itself. Since this is a rather complex subject I do not wish to labour it before the House but I will be pleased to provide a copy of this statement to interested members.

Even more important, the Canadian attitude at this conference encouraged the Belgian government to put forward a proposal and the conference to endorse a study of the establishment of an international fund, financed by a levy on oil cargos moved by sea, which would compensate victims of pollution before not covered by ship owner's strict liability. A conference is to be held in 1971 to consider the results of this study with a view to a further convention, which the House will note relates to liability to be placed on the cargo owner as advocated by Canada in addition to the limited liability of the ship owner. At the present time almost universally it is the ship owner who bears the brunt of the responsibility, such as it is, and the owner of the cargo being transported in that vessel, unless it happens to be one and the same organization, is more or less absolved of any responsibility. We think this is an improper situation primarily. In addition, it is not always possible for the ship owner to get the kind of insurance or related protection we feel is necessary if these massive spills and their effects are to be avoided.

We understand that some other governments are now contemplating national funds of this sort. Others are considering alternative means of achieving similar ends. I may say in terms of the Canadian position that we are now looking at the possibility of levying some form of assessment against vessels moving within Canadian waters to establish this type of fund against possible future spills because we think this will help in part to resolve the situation. I think we may expect increasing support from such countries which may now be considering the broader implications of this question.

Against this background, the government of Canada is now giving active consideration to interim measures in light of the Brussels conference. Clearly, we did not achieve what we had set out to achieve. It may be that we were too ambitious in the first instance or perhaps especially conscious and realistic enough to realize in advance that we were looking for more than we would achieve. In any event, we made the position very strongly as I have outlined to you here today. As a result, I believe there was more in the way of endorsation of our position than there might have been had we not taken this firm, and what some regard as extreme, stand. In any event, we are now examining possible interim measures.

This is, of course, part of the larger and more general question of pollution, including that from noxious substances other than oil and, pollution of coastal waters from sources other than ships. This, too, has become an increasing problem within the context of the outline at the beginning of my remarks concerning the totality of the pollution problem. There is the matter of oil drilling with rigs, and there are all manner of other sources which are now pumping potential pollution into our coastal waters. So, again it is not just a simple matter of saying if we cut off these sources of pollution at one particular point we can breathe easily. If I could mix a metaphor a little bit, perhaps we will not be able to breathe at all, unless we approach the whole subject and try to deal with it in some decisive manner. This is part of the over-all picture.

The proposals now being developed in respect of pollution from ships have as their objective the attainment of our goals at the conference to the extent that this is possible by one country acting alone. In other words, what we have said is, since we have not been able to achieve international agreement at this time on the question of how to control this type of pollution, we will take the same goals and set them as our objectives, then ask ourselves the question; acting unilaterally what can we do? Once we have arrived at those answers, then my intention is to introduce further amendments to the Canada Shipping Act. I am sure they will receive rapid response and endorsement by members on all sides.

At the same time, we will continue by seeking to ensure that our actions in respect of the various aspects of this total problem will conform to a consistent pattern. Interdepartmental discussions are now going forward with this objective in mind. As soon as these discussions and considerations can be concluded, I will be bringing forward proposed amendments and appropriate legislation.

I know this is a rather frustrating kind of position because what it really admits is that spilling can take place and there is always the danger that, in spite of everything we do, we will have a disaster of the magnitude of the Torrey Canyon incident or one even worse. We have to think about this when members are referring to the north and the potential problem there, and I put that word in quotation marks because we do have a particular reason in some areas to anticipate some of these things.

A potential problem in the north, however far removed it might be, taken against the real problem for example within the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the St. Lawrence seaway or at some point in our inland waters, is important. So, in addition to thinking about pollution and how to correct it to the best of our ability after it happens, equally as important—one might be prepared to agree that it is more important—is to put in the most stringent regulations possible so that these spills will not take place. This will involve standards for vessels that carry oil and our ability to ensure that vessels that do not meet these standards do not enter these waters over which we have control.

This again is a rather difficult problem but one with which we are coping through design standards and specifications. There is an international question here as to just how far, even with the new conventions to which I referred as agreed to in Brussels, we can go in terms of moving out into the high seas. Certainly, we would not be entitled in terms of inspecting a hull to determine whether it was adequate to meet our standards. There is also the question of navigable waters and a lot of other things to which carriers do not agree.

Perhaps the most pressing of all in many respects, because this is the insidious part of the problem, are the relatively small spills that take place either as the result of carelessness or "I don't give a damn" attitude on the part of certain carriers. In the last year we have stepped up our inspection activities considerably throughout those areas of our waters where it is possible for us to do so.

What I have touched upon is only a small part of the story, but I thought it might be helpful in light of this present discussion for hon. members to know something about what has transpired; first of all the position that Canada took, which is still our stand in this regard, and secondly how extremely difficult it is because of the variety of things involved to achieve international agreement on a question of this kind. In addition, to repeat what I said earlier, it is difficult when one takes unilateral action to be in a position to impose regulations in any meaningful way.

I do not believe in repeating something I said at the beginning, but simply having something in the window is not of very much consequence unless you have the means, the authority and the power, if you like, to enforce any regulations you might decide to impose unilaterally. But I believe many of these things are within our competence, and whenever it is, members of this House can be assured we will move ahead with the measures I have outlined today which I hope will take legislative form before too long. This will move us ahead significantly in what is a most crucial battle against this present day threat of pollution.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. minister permit a brief question? In view of the remarks he has just made, does he not think that if this House unanimously agreed to the report it would back up his and the government's position at the Brussels conference?

Mr. Jamieson: No, I do not. I do not think it would be of any real significance in terms of the matters discussed at Brussels.

Mr. McGrath: Would the minister permit another question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must draw the attention of the House to the fact that we have reached the private members' hour. I understand there has been some discussion in this regard and perhaps we could hear about that first and then continue, if I anticipate correctly.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, you seem to have anticipated what I wanted to say at this point. There have been some discussions, and on behalf of those who took part I should like to ask that by unanimous consent the House give up its private members' hour for today in order that the discussion on this important issue might continue. I believe there is such consent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before recognizing the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski)—Consumer Affairs—alleged misleading advertising by Imperial Tobacco Company; the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle)—Sports—Financial support for olympic games bids; the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton)—National Film Board—Request for statement on role.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

The House resumed consideration of the motion (Mr. Yewchuk) that the first report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development presented on December 16, 1969 be concurred in.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) would like to ask a question of the minister.

Mr. McGrath: Yes, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact this is the first opportunity we have had to hear a statement on government policy in respect of the Brussels conference, I should like to ask a question of the minister. What position did Canada take at this conference respecting the rather serious and continuing problem of tankers dumping oil ballast at sea?

Mr. Jamieson: This is not a matter that was discussed at the Brussels conference, which was a conference concerned wholly with liability in terms of the Torrey Canyon type incident. Nevertheless, there are other international meetings held under the auspices of IMCO. I hope the hon. member will not ask me to tell him what "IMCO" stands for. I am not certain.

There is a degree of consultation going on. My hon. friend will appreciate that with the oceans as vast as they are, policing is very difficult. The basic problem is incompetence, plus a devil-may-care attitude on the part of some crews. Where this brings about a detrimental situation we have the right to take action, but as I say it is a very difficult problem.

Mr. Hogarth: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit another question? Can he tell us whether Canada took any position at the Brussels conference, or at any other conference, in respect of preventing or impeding a declaration by the Canadian government that Canada has full sovereignty over the islands of the Arctic Archipelago, the waters lying between them and the waters adjacent to them to the east and west.

Mr. Jamieson: No, Mr. Speaker. There was no reference to any of the questions the hon. member has raised. We were dealing with international matters in terms of the global picture and there was no regional consideration at all.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must remind the hon. member I am trying to be as lenient as possible in accepting questions, but at this point I would prefer to recognize the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield).

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, in view of the last remark made by the minister to the effect that this conference did not have any connection to the subject under debate, why was this minister allowed to make a statement which he knew was out of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members will applaud my persistent effort to get the floor. This is a rather unusual debate. After listening to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) one would be afraid it might oe known as the debate of the red herring if ministers of the Crown persist in participating in this debate by discussing matters which have nothing to do with the issue before the House. I would not be surprised to hear a minister stand in his place and tell us about his heroic battle against inflation.

Seriously, this is rather an historic occasion, it seems to me because this discussion arises from an assertion by a member of this House in respect of the basic right of a member of this House to move such a motion against the wishes of the government on a matter of very vital importance to the people of Canada. This is perhaps an historic debate in this respect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: It seems to me there is a serious reluctance to concur in the report of the committee which is the substance of this motion. I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) for having moved the motion. I wish also to congratulate the hon. member for Coast-Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre) who, although he criticized me somewhat in the process, had the courage to take a strong position on the side of what he considered to be the right position, the concurrence in this report and the adoption by the government of the position taken by the committee in this report. I congratulate the hon. gentlemen.

The board chairman of the Humble Oil Company, a company frequently referred to in the course of this debate, in briefing the news media on the Arctic voyage of the Manhattan welcomed the gentlemen of the press to the world's largest and most expensive edition of the Ice Follies. He may stand to be corrected as to whether it will prove to be the largest and most expensive edition of the Ice Follies. He may stand to be corrected if this government does not indicate to the world without delay that vessels, surface and submarine, passing through Canada's Arctic Archipelago are and shall be subject to the sovereign control and regulation of Canada.

This, of course, is the view so eloquently expressed by the committee in its report. The committee made this recommendation after considering the potential threat of maritime oil tanker traffic through the waters of the Archipelago and the threat to Canada's environment in the north. Members of the committee had an opportunity for discussion with experts in the oil industry, with our own icebreaker marine officials, and with leading Canadian marine biologists and ecologists investigating the sinking last August of the two Panarctic barges off Melville Island. The committee states:

> However, your Committee shares the concern of most Canadians and of conservationists throughout the world of the dangers of pollution inherent in any future oil tanker maritime traffic through Canada's Arctic waters. Your Committee is convinced that the safeguards and pollution controls necessary to protect Canada's Arctic environment and ecology will neither be possible nor enforceable without an effective exercise of Canadian control over the waters and the ships using the waters of Canada's Arctic Archipelago.

That quotation is the heart of the recommendation of the committee and goes to the very core of the debate we are having here today. Following that, the committee further states:

> Your Committee is unimpressed with arguments that adequate pollution safeguards could be effected by international agreement.

Of course, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) certainly said nothing here today which would lead us to believe there is any immediate prospect of international accords to prevent the disaster happening which we are afraid might happen. It may very well be, and I assume it is, that the Minister of Transport had business to which he must attend following the termination of his speech, but even if I had nothing to do after making a speech in such an irrelevant way I, too, would have left the House very quickly.

An hon. Member: He is back.

Mr. Jamieson: Will you please correct the record, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanfield: Yes, he just left his seat, Mr. Speaker. I think we all recognize that in this area, the opening of the north, the development of oil resources there and the movement of oil and other substances, we are moving in the unknown. We have been reminded here today that even a vessel as strongly constructed as the S. S. Manhattan was five times caught in the ice on her trip. We have heard about the gaping holes in her side. We can visualize very clearly what this might mean in the event that such a vessel were loaded with oil. And yet again, as we have been reminded today, big though she is the Manhattan may well be dwarfed by specially built 250,000 ton tankers contemplated for the future Northwest Passage service.

• (5:10 p.m.)

In the December issue of the Imperial Oil Review it is stated:

> Humble Oil speculates that various companies will have 25 or 30 huge icebreaking tankers in the Passage by 1975.

It is all very well for the Minister of Transport to engage in international discussions, and we can encourage him in this, but surely in the light of this prospect Canada must be prepared to move to discharge her responsibilities to her own people?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much whether by 1975 we will have the answers to the ecological problems raised by these probes into the north. Certainly, there will be a real threat to our environment. Surely, in these circumstances we must assert our sovereignty. Of course, we must ourselves pioneer this area to see how best it can be used for the benefit of the Canadian people, more particularly of the native people who stand to lose all by an unfettered outside exploitation of their homeland.

Secondly, we must maintain firm control over the environment, not just for ourselves but in a very real sense for the whole world. I do not wish to exaggerate, but it may very well be that here our whole future lies in the balance, and that a wrong movement by the government, or the failure to make the right move merely to satisfy the economic interests of our neighbours to the south, or some timidity on the subject, may well contribute to the environmental breakdown of the world. Certainly, this is what many fear.

I say, Sir, that we have the political power to assert sovereignty, but what the government needs is the will to assert sovereignty. What we need today is a little bit of the guts that went into the making of Canada in the first place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: The government talks about pollution control. I think control of pollution in the north is practical, although I have not got very much confidence that the government would exercise the necessary controls even if it declared sovereignty. Certainly, if we are to judge by the Canada water act, we have not very much upon which to build confidence. Then, too, we have the mention in the committee's report of the failure of the interdepartmental committee to do anything effective with regard to the barge sinkings in connection with the Panarctic operations. It is time we acted. It is time we acted effectively, and if we don't we may be welcoming what will be, in fact, the world's largest and most expensive edition of the Ice Follies, and the chairman of Humble Oil may prove to have been wrong.

I welcome, in a sense, the information given us by the Minister of Transport with regard to international discussions and the tentative steps taken toward the achievement of some international agreement respecting pollution in international waters. That is a sort of side-effect to this debate. We have been trying to get a statement from the minister about what went on at that conference ever since it was held, but it took a motion such as this one and an effort to try to distract the attention of the House and of the country from the essential point in this discussion get this statement from the minister. Anyway, we are happy to have it and I think we still have plenty of time to discuss the relevant matters. I repeat that that statement has nothing to do with the case at all.

May I just draw the attention of the House to the fact that, even if there were any prospect that such an international agreement could be achieved in the immediate future, it would not be sufficient. The minister spoke about the sanctions. He spoke about firms and perhaps countries being required to make deposits so that those who suffered financially would be reimbursed. But, Mr. Speaker, financial reimbursement is not going to meet this problem in the north. This problem is not something you can fix up with money, short of enormous expenditures which would only go part way.

What we are so concerned about is the possibility of irreparable injury being done that cannot be compensated by money. So, Mr. Speaker, what the minister was talking about was completely irrelevant; first of all because it applies to international waters; secondly, because it shows no prospect of coming about in the near future; and, thirdly, because in any event it would be inadequate even if it came into effect in the very near future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: On October 24 last the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of Canada told this House:

> First of all, we will never sacrifice, in the name of progress, a clean and healthy environment to industrial or commercial development.

The only way that the government of Canada can prevent the sacrifice of the north, can prevent the sacrifice of this clean and healthy environment, is by claiming the power to exercise, and by exercising, effective control. Nobody else is going to exercise that control.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are various recommendations in the committee's report. The hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre) referred to them. He suggested that the adoption of the report might force the government to take measures involving the expenditure of public money. But surely, Sir, that is not so. Surely, that is another red herring. I say quite frankly that that has nothing to do with the case.

If the House adopts this motion, as I hope it will, the government is not committed to the expenditure of a cent, but it does express to the government the unanimous views of the members of the House. I do not imagine, Mr. Speaker, that the government will pay very much more attention to the views of the House as a whole than it does to the views of the Opposition as a whole. But in any event, it is not right to suggest that it is a poor practice to move this kind of a motion because it may involve the government in the expenditure of money. That is not so. It is perfectly proper for the House to adopt this motion expressing its view on the desirability of the government doing something, the desirability of it adopting some policies. That is what is being done here. The House is being asked to recommend to the government of Canada the adoption of certain policies.

What possible reason could there be for the government refusing to declare Canada's sovereignty over the north? What possible reason is there for the government refusing to carry out the basic recommendation of this committee? Any adequate reason has certainly not been disclosed. Certainly, I have not heard it. Evidently the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin has not heard it. None of us heard it.

There are obvious reasons why it is important that the government should move. Every day of silence on the part of the government increases the conviction of other countries about the doubts Canada may have of the validity of her claims. I think there can be no doubt about that. Secondly, every day that goes by increases the possibility that dangers and difficulties may arise for which we are not prepared, so it is urgent, sir, that we move. This resolution is not going to put the cabinet in a straitjacket, but it will indicate very clearly to the government of this country what members of this House feel on a matter that is essential to the future of our country. There is real urgency in view of the possibility of pollution, but there are longer term factors indicating the importance of Canada's claiming sovereignty over the waters between the Archipelago and the mainland of Canada. This is surely essential to the development of the north; it is not a matter of making this claim through any sense of imperialism. It is necessary to make it for ensuring the development of the nation.

The report refers to fishing. We cannot see at this time what the resources in the northern waters may be; we cannot see at this time who may wish to exploit these with the techniques that may be available in the future. It is essential for the protection of Canadian interests and the realization of Canada's destiny in the north, that the government stop fooling around and take the necessary position.

There has been a fair amount of discussion about precedents and a fair amount of discussion about innocent passage. I could go into all that, but I think the position is pretty clear and I will not worry the House with too many legal discussions. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, first of all, given that Canada has undisputed claims both to the Arctic Archipelago and the continental shelf extending from its northern shores, and that Canada has by exploration and other activities shown a concern for the polar area to the north, that we should declare our interests in that whole polar sector. This would not be done through any sense of imperialism or aggression but because Canada believed that its national interest must be protected from the devastating results that unrestricted activities in the area may produce.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, we must be alert to the dangers that may arise outside our territorial waters to the north. We must be alert to the colossal calamities that may take place within that polar sector and we must be prepared to take action. This is not only necessary in our own interests but I believe we have a duty to take such action if we are to discharge our duties to Canada today and in the future and, indeed, to the world. At the present time nobody else is going to worry very much about disasters that may take place in these waters.

In addition to this, the least we should do in accordance with existing legislative policy is draw base lines around the whole of the Arctic Archipelago, reducing the intervening waters to the status of internal waters. I take this to be the substance of the recommendation of the committee, notwithstanding the fact that some of the straits are twice the width of the Canadian territorial waters.

I suggest without hesitation that this is justifiable under international law on the grounds which have been referred to today and expounded in the Norwegian Fisheries question and the Convention on the Territorial Seas, and also having regard to the special nature of the waters concerned. In doing so, Canada does not deny that there might be a right of innocent passage through the Northwest Passage but we must, and again not for the purpose of asserting our rights but in order to discharge our responsibilities, assert that any claims to innocent passage or right to innocent passage is contingent upon the approval of Canadian authorities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: This is justifiable and legal for the following reasons. First of all, there is no customary international trade route through the Northwest Passage, unless there is a customary right of innocent passage, which certainly does not apply.

Secondly, it is in the interest of Canadian security to protect the resources of the area and to restrict certain categories of vessel, particularly tankers, from using it unless they can meet the standards set by Canada.

Thirdly, in view of the large investment, it will be necessary to provide navigational and meteorological aids, icebreakers, charting services, safety and rescue equipment. It may very well be necessary to levy charges for these services on vessels using the Northwest Passage.

Fourthly, in view of all this, the Northwest Passage possesses many of the features of an internal waterway, a fact which imposes severe limitations on the right of innocent passage.

I think members in all parts of the House must be very puzzled as to what is wrong with the government. What is really standing in the way of the government taking action which I think we are all convinced is necessary for the welfare of our country? Certainly, it is dangerous for the government not to do so, confusion thus being created and risks run. Certainly, if there are valid reasons, the government is keeping them very secret.

The member for Coast Chilcotin was rather critical of me. He did not mention me by name, but I think I asked the first question in this Parliament and it did relate to Biafra. The member felt there were more important things to discuss and rather suggested that this was not a matter that ought to concern this House. Mr. Speaker, I am going to make it very clear that I shall never apologize, either for asking that question or for my subsequent interest in what is going on in Nigeria.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: This, unfortunately, has been one of the great tragedies of our time, with millions dying and being permanently maimed by malnutrition. Surely, sir, no one need ever be apologetic for urging upon our country and our government a decent humanitarian role, which in this instance I would say ought to have been a role uninhibited by a concept of sovereignty. This should be irrelevant to the suffering and the dying. I am not speaking of interfering improperly in the affairs of another country, but surely the concept of sovereignty ought not to have been allowed by this government to interfere with the succour it offered to the maimed and dying. Surely, it is a proper interest for the government and Parliament of Canada.

In that instance, as I have said many times, I felt the attitude of the government was legalistic. I believe the government itself finally came to the conclusion that it was wrong, but only on the eve of the termination of the war.

Mr. Sharp: That is not so.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport spoke about pollution control in the international area. A growing number of Canadians are concerned about pollution within our own country but here the government seems to have a hang-up in connection with the constitution. In Biafra, it was the concept of sovereignty; in connection with pollution, it seems to be the concept of our constitution. Surely, in the light of this it is a little ironic, if it were not so serious, that a government which has used the concept of sovereignty to prevent it from doing something in connection with Nigeria, namely, rendering help and succour in an adequate way to the dying, uses the constitution in connection with pollution. It is rather ironic that in this connection it is so reluctant to make a declaration of sovereignty which is essential if we are to protect the north and protect our country. I am a lawyer by training.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: Apparently the hon. member agrees with General Gowon.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I invited the minister to make a statement on Nigeria this afternoon. I should be very happy to discuss this matter with him this afternoon, tomorrow or at any time. I am making the point that the government seems to become embroiled in legalistic considerations. It seems to become hung up on legalistic considerations, no matter whether they relate to the concept of sovereignty in one connection or with some view of the constitution in another. Here, again, the government seems to be hung up on some legal fears relating to the interpretation of the law.

These are legalistic concerns. Surely the government is wrong in its interpretation of the law in this case. There is no real reason for the government to have the slightest concern about international law with regard to this claim. Surely, even if there are a few doubts, which I do not admit, it is the duty of this government to state the only position that can protect the north, the only position that can preserve the environment of the north.

The Minister of Transport told us what went on in Brussels, but all he did was reinforce the idea that if anyone is to protect the north, it must be Canada. Canada can do that only by asserting control. In order to assert control, Canada must claim sovereignty. I therefore hope that the House will endorse this resolution and, after that has been done, that the government will somehow or other summon enough fortitude to do what must so obviously be done in the interests of Canada and, indeed, of the world.

Mr. Hogarth: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It has been suggested that questions should not be encouraged because there is a long list of hon. members anxious to take part in the debate. Perhaps the hon. member might be allowed one question.

Mr. Hogarth: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member stated that the government pays no attention to his views and, also, that base lines should be drawn.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

An hon. Member: That is not correct.

Mr. Hogarth: May I point out that in late October or early November during the question period there was an exchange in which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) asked the hon. member specifically if he would put forward his views as to where the base lines ought to be drawn. My question is: Did the hon. member at any time give to the government his views or those of his party as to where the base lines should be drawn in the Arctic Archipelago?

Mr. Stanfield: Oh, the poor government: it depends on suggestions from the opposition. Of course, it does not take any notice of them. If the Prime Minister wants to consult me on any matter, I will be very happy to give him the benefit of my advice and I hope he will follow it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, for more than seven years I have been present here on opposition days, budget days and leaders' days, but this is the first time I have ever been present on a backbencher's day. I say that because when today's debate began it might have been called a backbencher's debate. I suggest that when the problem of the far north has been forgotten, Your Honour's ruling will be well remembered because it has set a new precedent for this House, this government and, indeed, the parliamentary system. That, really, is the significance of this debate. We have in Your Honour's ruling a check which must weigh in the balance against the more powerful rules that have given the government perhaps too much power without the sanction of the whole House.

Mr. McGrath: Hear, hear.

Mr. Otto: I submit that to some extent the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre) has been browbeaten, because he said he did not wish to take part in the debate but continued arguing along lines begun by the government House leader who said that in a responsible system of government we cannot afford the luxury of giving some responsibility to the backbenchers. I have taken issue with the House leader on this matter.

Mr. Woolliams: Then why does the hon. member vote with the government all the time?

Mr. Otto: The institution of Parliament is undergoing change and the House leader must realize that the government is not abdicating its responsibilities when it allows reports of committees which are dominated largely by Liberal members to be considered by the House. I think he and others are far behind the times when they say, "If we allow backbenchers to initiate government policies, how can the cabinet, when it goes to the people, explain its actions?"

The fact is that the cabinet does not go to the people. It is the party that goes to the people, and the backbenchers of this party also have a sense of responsibility. We are no longer here merely for two or three months of the year; we are full-time members. The fact that this debate has taken place will not hinder future government planning but will make ministers realize it is high time a backbencher's position meant something, and that they and officials of their departments must consult with members of committees and advise them of government plans and policies. Before action is taken, hon. members of this House at least should be listened to. I do not for a moment agree with the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin when he says this is a bad day. I think this is a good day for the government.

An hon. Member: It will shake up the mandarins.

Mr. Otto: Much as I hate to do so, Mr. Speaker, I must side with the government as to the contents of the report.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Feet of clay!

Mr. Otto: I think hon. members will realize that this is most unusual for me.

An hon. Member: The hon. member once said he was fair-minded.

Mr. Woolliams: He always votes with the government.

Mr. McGrath: He has just ruined his speech.

Mr. Otto: I cannot understand the government's reluctance to concur in this report, because notwithstanding what has been said, the report says that the government should immediately consider certain recommendations.

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member has been his own heckler.

Mr. Otto: It does not say that the government should adopt any measures; it merely says that the government should consider giving immediate consideration to certain recommendations. There is nothing wrong with that. Both the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) have said they are giving consideration to the matter. What, therefore, is the great objection to adopting this report? We have had debates on the question of the continental shelf, inland waters, the right of innocent passage, and so on. When we get to the essence of the report, what is dealt with? It is pollution—plain, ordinary, simple pollution.

We are not concerned with any matter other than this brand new danger which has never in the past been discussed with other nations. Indeed, many other nations are not even concerned with the subject matter. Therefore, why does Canada have to declare sovereignty? If it declares sovereignty, how will it express it? Will it do so by using an icebreaker? Against whom will it express sovereignty? Who is challenging the sovereignty?

Mr. Woolliams: Why deny it?

Mr. Otto: Nobody denies it. The government does not deny sovereignty. The government says there is no necessity as yet to put our foot down and say we are the king of this little castle. As hon. members opposite have said, it is recognized that the archipelago, the islands in the north, are Canadian territory. Who is questioning this? Why do we have to say at this time that we are the sovereign rulers of this land and of this channel? What we are really concerned about is the danger of pollution.

Why do hon. gentlemen think the United States are less concerned about this matter than we are? Surely no one would suggest that the United States would be glad to have this channel recognized as international water. They certainly would not want to see Russian or Chinese ships in this channel. We have explained our position. We have received consideration from the United States government and the corporations that are developing the oil reserves. I am sure we can come to some agreement.

As the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) pointed out, it does not have to be an international agreement, because other nations are not concerned; they do not care. The Minister of Transport admitted at the Brussels conference there was not much likelihood of an international agreement. But why do we need an international agreement? Why can we not have a dialogue with the other country concerned, the United States? Surely we can come to a rational agreement whereby the United States will recognize our problems and our apprehensions, and will come to an agreement if necessary whereby a fee can be charged and we will have some insurance against pollution caused by oil spillage.

I have no doubt that the United States would also agree that Canada should have a much stronger voice, and possibly the majority voice, in the administration of regulations and the surveillance of the construction of ships to ensure that there is less likelihood of danger. It seems hon. members opposite are not expressing their apprehension as to the danger involved but want to make absolutely sure there will never be any spillage. This is impossible.

If Canadians want the north to be opened, we cannot say that we want the passage to be opened at absolutely no risk to ourselves. We have to take some risk. We have to ensure that if ships, are allowed to go through, we have the final say as to their construction, not necessarily unilaterally but we should have a strong voice in indicating the type of ships we will approve and the type of navigation we will accept to at least protect ourselves from the possible dangers of pollution.

Until now we have been speaking entirely of oil pollution, but there is nothing to guarantee that at a later time nations which have a problem in disposing of nuclear garbage will have to transport it great distances. That in itself would create a problem. All these problems are unforeseen now, but we cannot say we will not allow anyone to go through this passage unless we are absolutely sure there is no danger. This is nonsense. We cannot do it. We must say that we want the north to be opened up and that we want development there.

The Canadian government has a great interest in the Panarctic and we expect to have more. United States businessmen have put over $800 million into part of their territory in order to explore it and obtain oil. They also have responsibility as well as rights. Why do we have to concern them and the world by saying, "This is our territory. We are the sovereign power and you cannot do anything unless you ask us and abide by our terms"?

An hon. Member: It is time to tell them.

[Mr. Otto.]

Mr. Otto: My good friend to the left says it is time to tell them. Let us suppose we did that, and that a tanker went through, anyway: what would we do with the coast-guard cutter or icebreaker? Would we sink it and pollute our own waters? What is the hon. member talking about? Who are we to say we control this whole territory? As long as there was no confrontation, we would look foolish. We would look like Peruvians if we said we were going to declare a 15-mile or 20-mile limit. We agreed internationally that there would be certain limits for fishing, defence and commercial purposes. This is the first time we have encountered the pollution problem. If we act unilaterally, we will get nowhere.

An hon. Member: We did that on the west coast.

Mr. Otto: Yes, one Russian trawler was brought in. Korea took advantage of the very crucial international situation and brought in a United States ship from a distance of 28 miles. Unilateral action would not make us mature. Maturity depends upon recognizing the fact that we have a problem, and that throughout history the United States has never tried to hurt us. The United States government would not suffer embarrassment merely because of the action of some oil companies. That country has oil galore. I think this problem can and should be solved, but to do so unilaterally would be wrong.

I am not going to deal with the continental shelf argument except to say the report also suggests that the government of Canada should take whatever steps are necessary consistent with international law. The report contains many items which certainly will not be recognized under international law. I agree with the hon. member who this afternoon said that international law is quite confused. Indeed, there is very little international law today in the terms in which we once knew it.

The Minister of Transport commented on some of the problems in dealing with other nations. It was pointed out that other nations are not concerned with pollution, which is a new problem. They are not concerned with the pollution of Arctic waters when there is no possibility of cleaning the water or disposing of the pollution.

The Canadian government failed to obtain international agreement at the Brussels conference I think they should get together with the only other nation concerned and reach agreement as quickly as possible to control this pollution and to find ways and means of obtaining money, whether by fees, tolls or otherwise, to research the problem and lay down the law. If the United States proves that it does not want to do this, that would be the time for our own government to lay down the law specifically as to pollution control.

Nothing else should be done, because nothing else is bothering us at the moment. We should also recognize that the Manhattan project was a failure. I think it is generally admitted it was not a success. This should make us even more apprehensive and careful about the type of regulations we should put into effect.

I shall end my remarks soon because I want other hon. members to have the greatest possible opportunity of taking part in the debate. May I summarize my views as follows: I am glad this report was brought down, and I think it is good that a motion was made to concur in it. I congratulate the committee on a report which was prepared entirely by its members. Far too many reports appear mysteriously from nowhere, completely typed and printed, approved by the steering committee and so on, yet no one knows where they originated and there is a great suspicion they come from the department concerned.

I am happy that the report with which we are now dealing is not one of those. It is vital to a successful committee system that reports should reflect the views of the steering committee and of the committee generally. Although I disagree with parts of this report, I admire the calibre of the men who sat on the committee which was responsible for it—the chairman, and especially the hon. member for Coast-Chilcotin who led this fight from the beginning, almost from the day he arrived in the House. He assumed to some extent today the role of minister without pay. He led the debate; he organized the speakers. I am glad his efforts have been recognized. I recognize him as a man who holds very strongly to his views. If more of us were like him, we would not have nearly as much trouble in obtaining recognition.

Having said this, I regret very much that I cannot agree with the body of the report. The Prime Minister made a clear statement when he said, in effect, that we ought not to become emotional about this issue, because being emotional would do no good; that we should be practical, and give attention to the problem while recognizing that it is futile to take action unilaterally if that action is unlikely to be successful, or if it is not necessary. My right hon. friend also stated, and I agree, that we should realize there are others concerned who are not our enemies but, rather, friends who by and large face the same problem in Alaska and around their coasts. We are not alone in this dilemma.

Nevertheless, I shall vote for the report if it comes to vote. Of course, it will not come to a vote. That is not the way in which these things are done: Indeed, it would be hypocritical to suggest that this motion will ever come to a vote. In the circumstances, I believe the government should give careful and immediate attention to these recommendations. I believe the nation desires these suggestions to be considered—hon. members certainly do—and for my part I urge the government to do so.

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) stated this afternoon that Parliament was living a historic day. I share his view entirely. The House has indeed, with the present debate, set a precedent, thanks to the awareness and courage of the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) who moved concurrence in this report.

Parliament has won an important victory over the executive power. The principle recognized by the Chair reinforces the rights and privileges of hon. members to participate in major government decisions and to do so with all the objectivity which must preside over this debate.

Several government members agree with us on this important matter. This is clearly indicative of the fact that all Canadians are most interested in this question. They are tired of the government's shilly-shallying and the time has come for it to forget its reluctance and make the sovereignty statement which is called for.

We shall probably have tonight the occasion of hearing the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp). I ask the minister to show his courage by telling the House what the government thinks of this matter and I hope that he will make, on behalf of the government, the sovereignty statement we have been expecting for so long.

If we refer to the report under study, Mr. Speaker, we realize that the committee is worried by the possibility that oil tankers will very soon be plying the waters of the Archipelago and by the inherent hazards.

I congratulate all the members of that committee for the enormous task they have accomplished in connection with this question and for the undeniable value of their report.

In the committee's view, the prospect of oil tanker traffic makes it imperative for the government to proclaim that surface ships and submarines sailing through the Archipelago will be subject to its control and to the regulations which it might adopt.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Faulkner): As it is six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned at six o'clock I was saying that the matter under discussion is extremely urgent if we want to ensure the security, welfare and future of the Canadian population.

But it seems that our ever so wise government wishes to ignore the report tabled in the House. It is rather strange that the government should disregard the report of one of its committees in view of the ever increasing importance of the functions of the committees since parliamentary reforms were enacted. This can only be explained by the fact that the conclusions of the committee are in direct conflict with the government policy in regard to Canadian Arctic waters.

And if, by chance, the government should, with the help of its majority or some contrivance, determine tonight to give this report a first class funeral, this would mean that it does not trust the work of the committees and that when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) talked about parliamentary reforms, it was simply a smoke screen.

Should the government decide tonight, owing to its majority, not to implement the recommendations of the committee, there would be only one thing left for the members of the committee to do, and this, in order to protect the rights and privileges of all hon. members who sit on committees of the House: all of them should, in one gesture of solidarity, resign from the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Thus they would prove to the people that the government disregards the committee reports which are submitted to its attention.

I was saying at the beginning of my remarks that we are living a historic moment, because the House, pursuant to the Chair's ruling, has set a precedent. The government rarely takes objection in the House to the presentation of a committee report. Should it persist in refusing the reports presented by committees, it will be severely judged when the time comes by public opinion.

By refusing to assert Canada's sovereignty over the Arctic waters, the government shows clearly that he understands neither the importance of the interests at stake nor the seriousness of the situation.

The government believes that by negotiating an international agreement against pollution, it will assert our sovereignty. Far from asserting our sovereignty, such action will not even succeed in protecting Canada from water pollution in this area. Such a position is particularly illogical and dangerous because how can we enforce an agreement concerning an area which we are not even sure to possess? Any protective measure against pollution is impossible and inapplicable if Canada does not exercise effective control over the waters of the Canadian archipelago and over the ships that will use them. The need for a declaration of sovereignty does not arise from the simple fact of a recommendation to this effect by the committee.

The immediate declaration by the government of the Canadian sovereignty over the waters of the continental shelf is called for the following reasons: first, in order to be effective, any international agreement aimed at removing the danger of pollution in the Arctic waters demands, first, a declaration of sovereignty. The simple fact that some countries are already studying the use of the Northwest Passage for commercial transportation and that large companies are carrying out their activities in these regions should encourage the government to state right now and unequivocally its sovereignty over this region.

Canada cannot afford to wait for universal consensus since two ships of the Panarctic Oils Limited, one of which was carrying oil, have already gone down in this area.

We must first of all realize that there is no danger of pollution in the Arctic waters. Much is at stake for Canada, for the Arctic waters are a hunting ground for Indians and Eskimos, 8,500 to 10,500 of them respectively.

Humanitarian and economic considerations are therefore involved.

Does the government refuse to proclaim our sovereignty in the Arctic for fear of certain legal consequences?

Obviously, if Canada allows other countries to move in—I now refer to the international aspect—it may be far more difficult in the future to prove our sovereignty before the competent tribunal. But if the government took concrete steps immediately, and moved into the field we already hold, it might be easier to refute the claims of other countries, including the United States and to refute legal arguments before the international Court.

I still wonder why the government is reluctant to make that statement; I suspect they may fear its legal consequences.

If they really want to test that sovereignty, let them do it now and let the countries that want to dispute it make out their case before the International Court of Justice.

One must realize first of all that much of the natural resources in the Arctic waters are only partially developed and that they are priceless. It is a must for Canada to establish effectively, for future generations, her sovereignty as well as navigation security in that area.

As desirable as international control of water pollution could be, it is but one of the consequences of a statement on sovereignty, as I said a while ago. The delicate ecological balance in the Arctic must be preserved, for the sake of its population and its animal life.

The Manhattan's journey through the Northwest Passage has opened a new era. The economic development of that area, the oil and ore resources of its maritime subsoil and their development depend first of all upon a vigorous statement of sovereignty if Canada wants to remain in the race. This country cannot afford to jeopardize the future of her citizens, her animal and plant life and her natural resources.

The Canadian people have a right to expect efficient measures from the government, for their future is at stake. A firm and clear statement of the Canadian sovereignty over the Arctic waters is the first step to take before formulating a policy on Arctic waters.

Such a statement on sovereignty should obviously be tied in with the passage of several pieces of legislation not only to uphold the occupation of Arctic territories but also to state precisely the legal question as to that very important problem.

The need for a statement on sovereignty, as I said a while ago, is also urgent. Indeed, the fragile ecological balance of the Arctic is already threatened. On Melville Island, where Panarctic Oils Limited is conducting explorations, there are thousands of empty oil drums scattered about the island. The delicate wildlife of the island has already fallen a victim to the machinery in use there.

This is only the first problem, for Canada will certainly very soon discover oil and other minerals. As we know, companies are busy exploring in this area.

The government should realize that pollution is only one of the problems that should induce it to solve, right away and for all the world to know, the problem of sovereignty.

In its eagerness to have the people take part in the administration of the country, the government is gradually leading us to believe that the country is run by rumours coming from everywhere.

Concerning this important question, there have been rumours abroad to the effect that Canada had established strict control in the area of the Arctic waters, but these were just pompous statements of policy; no positive steps were ever taken.

Canadians are beginning to wonder seriously about the failure of this government to assume its responsibilities when it comes to firmly asserting the sovereignty of our country over its national heritage.

We know there are, in this area, many resources which need to be protected—and here I am talking to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp)—even if we have to exchange with the United States some strong and straight forward arguments about what we believe to be our sovereignty over this area of the country.

I think that the Canadian government and the Secretary of State for External Affairs are mature enough to formulate themselves the foreign and domestic policy of Canada without having them being dictated by Washington.

If this problem is set out in clear and specific terms, the Washington government will be able to understand our position and it will be the first to recognize that we have taken a concrete and strong action which will be respected not only by our neighbours to the South but also by all the other countries which get some benefit out of their presence in that area.

We know that the Canadian people are greatly concerned about this problem. I would also submit that Quebecers do not remain indifferent to the harmful effects that the pollution of the Ungava and New Quebec areas would have.

We are entitled to know the opinion of the government in that respect and I hope that tonight the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs will make it known to us. The only way to deal with the matter would be for a member of the government or the Prime Minister himself to make a clear and precise statement with regard to our sovereignty over the Arctic waters. Should the Prime Minister refuse to abide by the wish of the committee and of most hon. members in that respect, he would indicate by his action that he leads a monolithic government which has no consideration for the opinion of the majority of hon. members.

• (8:20 p.m.)

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first I wish to congratulate the committee on its excellent report.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sharp: It has brought to the attention of the government, of this Parliament and of Canadians generally the importance of taking timely action to preserve and protect the Arctic environment against the danger of oil pollution. Nor is there any particular objection on the part of the government to this debate, so far as substance is concerned. However, I think I should say that in view of the very heavy backlog of business before the House one must regret that we are taking a day now to debate this report when there will shortly be an opportunity for exactly the same subject to be debated when the government introduces its legislation on this subject, as forecast in the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. Nesbitt: We have heard Throne Speeches before.

Mr. Sharp: This was one of the reasons why, when the motion was made, the government expressed some misgivings. I hope that the Opposition, in understanding this, will hereafter assist us a little more than they have in the past to get through the great backlog of legislation that is facing us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Asselin.]

Mr. Sharp: It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) also did some disservice to his own report by insisting upon this debate, although I must say that in terms of quality it has been an excellent debate.

Mr. Woolliams: Up until now.

Mr. Sharp: The report, as I said, is an excellent one. It is straightforward, clear, constructive, and most significant of all, it is unanimous.

Mr. Monteith: Then why were you ashamed of it?

Mr. Sharp: I am not ashamed of it.

Mr. Nesbitt: Why don't you move concurrence in the report, if you like it so much?

Mr. Sharp: I will deal with this point presently. The hon. member has put his finger exactly on the point at issue here. The report is a very good example of the way in which committees can be used to contribute to public understanding and to the understanding of this House on matters of such difficulty and complexity. However, under our parliamentary system of responsible government it is not the function of committees to usurp the responsibilities of government.

While it is true that the report of the committee is only a recommendation to the government to take certain action, and concurrence of the House cannot change its essential nature, to ask the House to concur in a report which makes so many specific recommendations requires the members of the government who are members of the House, if they take their responsibilities seriously—as I hope we all do—to express the points upon which they may differ from the committee even if they find the general tenor of the report to be valuable and acceptable.

To vote against the report could, on the other hand, be interpreted as a vote against the principle of Canada's sovereignty over the waters lying between the islands of the Canadian Archipelago. While the government may be generally sympathetic to the views of the committee, it may in the exercise of its responsibilities believe that it is necessary to adopt a strategy different from that advocated by the committee in order to attain the agreed objectives. I think the House will agree that this is understandable.

The committee does not have the responsibility of government. It does not have to weigh one objective or one priority against another. The committee cannot answer for the consequences of its own recommendations. On the other hand, the government must answer for the consequences of all its policies and all its actions. It cannot blame a committee, even if it accepts its findings, for mistakes which may result from the acceptance of the committee's report. I can assure the House that the recommendations of the committee will be given the most careful consideration by the government in framing the legislation to be proposed to Parliament.

What the government has been doing goes further than the approach suggested in the committee's report. We have not hesitated or delayed in determining our basic objectives, or in announcing them to the House and indeed to the world. These objectives were stated in the Speech from the Throne and in the Prime Minister's address in the Throne Speech debate. They are to encourage the development of Arctic navigation and to ensure the preservation of the Arctic environment. I am certain there is agreement on all sides with these objectives.

To translate them into practical terms, however, and to incorporate them into detailed legislation requires time and much study. We have taken our time and we have given the most careful thought to the process of implementing the basic policy which we have already stated, because the interests involved are of the greatest importance to the country. Mr. Speaker, the government has almost finished its work and we will be submitting the results to the House in the near future.

There is, I believe, no fundamental difference between the views of the government and of the committee as to the extent of Canada's sovereignty in the Arctic region. There is certainly no difference of view as to the necessity of taking action to control pollution. How best to reinforce Canadas' claims to sovereignty, and how best to use that authority to control pollution are problems of a different order. It is not sufficient, for this purpose, simply to make declarations and lay claims. I am sure those members of the House who are much more learned in the law than I will agree with this. This is a practice they follow in their own profession. These declarations may be challenged; these claims may be resisted. It becomes then of the utmost importance to proceed in such a way as to maximize the chances of acceptability and success. As in so many other fields, timing is of the essence.

As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said on October 24 of last year:

> There is not now, nor is it conceivable that there will ever be from any source, challenges to Canadian sovereignty on the mainland, in the islands, in the minerals lying in the continental shelf below the Arctic waters, or in our territorial seas. This happy situation is the result of quiet, consistent policies on the part of all Canadian governments. The present government pledges to be equally consistent. Those policies will reflect Canada's proper interest not only in the preservation of the ecological balance ... but as well in the economic development of the north, the security of Canada, and in our stature and reputation in the world community.

To judge from some articles in the press and from various statements and speeches one would almost be led to believe that the Manhattan discovered the New World with the Nina, the Pinta and the Santa Maria. This, of course, is not the case.

Canada was present and active in the Arctic and the Arctic waters for a century and more before the voyage of the Manhattan. The Manhattan project would not have been possible without the preparatory work, the scientific research, the investments, and the pioneering activities which successive Canadian governments have encouraged or undertaken over a vast area of the north. I refer to the systematic mapping, the hydrographic charting, the geophysical exploration and the sea-ice studies carried out by this country. Canada is not a newcomer to Arctic navigation. Canadian skills go away back and were demonstrated in historic voyages of the St. Roch and the Labrador. They were demonstrated again last fall when the John A. Macdonald escorted the Manhattan through Canada's northern islands and repeatedly freed her from the ice.

We are not unprepared for developments such as the Prudhoe Bay oil discoveries, the exploitation of Canada's own offshore Arctic resources and the commercial navigation of the Northwest Passage which may follow. We are ready for the opening of the Canadian Arctic for development, and that development is one of our great national objectives. It is with this in mind that we have stressed the desirability of keeping the Arctic waters open for innocent passage. We will do what is necessary for this purpose.

At the same time, however, we have also recognized that the danger of pollution by ships in the Arctic is particularly grave. Ice is the chief obstacle in these waters, but other Arctic features are also a great hindrance, such as the extreme cold, the almost continuous fog and overcast, the 24-hour darkness in winter, the magnetic disturbances and deviations, the absence of distinctive landmarks and the need for extensive aids to navigation. Not only is there a high risk of accident, but the pollution damage resulting from an accident involving a supertanker could have a catastrophic effect upon the fragile ecology of the Arctic because of the slow workings of the biological processes which in more temperate areas effect a natural cleansing and healing operation. We do not know enough about some of these problems, but we are keenly aware of the potential dangers and we are determined to do what is necessary to minimize and avoid them.

Much has been said in this debate about international law with reference to the Arctic waters. The Prime Minister and I have both had something to say on this question on a number of occasions and I will not repeat all our previous observations here. I only wish to reaffirm a few points. The law of the sea is indeed a complex subject involving political, economic and security interests which are both national and international in scope.

This body of law has changed a great deal over the centuries with the growth of technology and shifts in the relations between states. It has undergone particularly rapid change in recent years, and Canada has made some contribution to its development to our national advantage. The Arctic seas represent a spec al situation which has so far received insufficient attention. There are obvious differences between ordinary water and water in its frozen state. Men can walk on the ice. Some people I am told can walk on the water, but generally speaking they can walk on the ice; they can shoot polar bears on the ice; they can commit murder on the ice. We all know that the flag state has jurisdiction over a crime committed on board a ship 60 miles from shore. But who has jurisdiction over a crime committed on the ice 60 miles from shore? The Canadian courts have provided effective answers to this question without feeling a need to refer to some stirring manifesto.

With respect to the Northwest Passage, one thing seems clear. As I wrote last September in an article in the Toronto Globe and Mail:

> Heretofore, no one, be he Arctic expert, international jurist or government spokesman, could allege that the Northwest Passage is already an international strait under international law. If that were the case, we would not require now the massive effort which we are witnessing for the purpose of forcing one ship and two icebreakers through the passage. In other words, we are not talking about established sea lanes or straits. We are talking about an area covered by solid ice through most of the year in some places and all of the year in others.

One last and most important point with respect to international law is this: I have already emphasized the importance the government attaches to keeping the Arctic waters open for innocent passage. We do not believe that the passage of ships which threaten the destruction or deterioration of the coastal environment can be considered innocent under any interpretation of international law. We have made clear to the world that while Canada welcomes the use of the Arctic waters as a transportation route for the vessels of all flags, the Canadian government will ensure that these waters are used for peaceful purposes and by ships complying with required safety standards.

In his statement of October 24 on the Throne Speech debate, the Prime Minister declared that Canada would not permit the pollution or artificial deterioration of the Arctic environment, either in the name of freedom of the seas or in the interests of economic development. He emphasized that we were determined not to bow in the Arctic to pressures of any state. With respect to the course of action proposed by the government he said:

> Canada will propose a policy of use of the Arctic waters which will be designed for environmental preservation. This will not be an intolerable interference with the activities of others, it will not be a restriction upon progress. This legislation we regard, as a contribution to the long term and sustained development of resources for economic and social progress.

The special objectives we intend to achieve are known. The concrete action we intend to take will be spelled out in the legislation soon to be submitted to the House. I can assure the House that our proposed legislation will afford the protection required for Canada's vital coastal interests in the Arctic. It will not be a sterile exercise in chauvinism, blindly disregarding Canada's real interests and international responsibilities. It will, however, represent an affirmation of our right and our duty to use and control our national heritage. And it will vest in Canada the maritime jurisdiction which is essential for this purpose.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian north is beginning to undergo a period of rapid and profound change. We are disturbing its eternal silence and challenging its forbidden emptiness. At the same time, we are creating new problems and seeking to resolve them in new ways, with new techniques, new attitudes and new laws. The future of the north is the future of this country. The government is dedicated to that future, to the development of the north and to its preservation from the ravages which man has inflicted upon his environment elsewhere.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I listened with very close attention to the extraordinary and, I might say, soporific remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp). For a few moments I could not help feeling that I was in the middle of one of the chapters of "Alice in Wonderland." If all of the members of cabinet are so much in agreement with the proposals expressed in this report, I fail to understand why we have had to take up a day of valuable government time in discussing the matter. It just does not make any sense.

Mr. Sharp: That is right.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, we have to look at what has been going on, never mind the red herrings and smoke-screens put up by government members. The Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development drew up a report. It was drawn up by government members on the committee—

Mr. Crouse: A majority of government members.

Mr. Nesbitt: A government majority, of course, and it was unanimously concurred in by all members. It did not seem in any way controversial, and it was placed before the House. When anything is tabled in this House, Mr. Speaker, it is the property of the House and not of the government. Why was a move not made to concur in this report in the ordinary, routine way? It is all very strange. Members on this side of the House took no steps in that direction because we thought the chairman of the committee, on behalf of the government, would probably move concurrence in the normal way. We waited, but nothing happened. Although one cannot pay attention to all one hears around Parliament hill, there is usually no smoke without some fire, and we did hear things. We began to realize that the government, for a reason which has never been explained in spite of all the fancy today, did not like this report.

What is it in this report that in any way ties the government's hands in regard to details of legislation pertaining to domestic matters or international negotiations? Nothing. Parliament has had presented to it in a committee report certain general principles with which I am sure all Canadians, including members of the government, must agree. This whole performance is incredible.

Mr. Orange: So is the hon. member's.

Mr. Nesbitt: I hope the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange) will support this report, because if he does not it will look very strange to his constituents. As I say, Mr. Speaker, our having to debate this matter seems incredible. The vice-chairman of the committee had to move concurrence in the report. Surely there can be no argument about this matter. The government is complaining that it cannot get its legislation through Parliament. It says it has so much to do, and then refuses to accept this report. I ask, what is all the argument about?

Mr. Orange: We are waiting for the hon. member to say something.

Mr. Nesbitt: The hon. member for Northwest Territories will have his chance to speak in due course, and we shall be very interested to hear what he has to say. Shakespeare had a word for nearly every situation one can imagine, and in this case, having heard the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), the Secretary of State for External Affairs and one or two other government supporters, I am reminded of Lady Macbeth's words:

> All the perfumes of Arabia will not sweeten this little hand.

All the explanations that may be presented here—and believe me they are phony explanations—cannot rub out the knowledge that the government does not like the report and its principle. It contains a statement of principle, and nothing else. All the foolish and phony explanations do not hide the government's thinking. Let us take a good look at this whole business, Mr. Speaker. We have had so many red herrings drawn across the trail that the Grand Banks, where they fish them, must be pretty well depleted. We have seen a very good smoke-screen put up.

What is the basic problem here, Mr. Speaker. The matter of concurrence in this report brings to mind two very important principles which are before the House. That is why this matter has received so much attention from the public, the news media and others. The two principles are quite obvious. The first is the substance of this report, the principle expressed in it for which concurrence is sought from members of the House. The second point has to do with the whole purpose of our parliamentary system as seen in theory by the government and as put into practice.

We know that when this government came into office, it came in on a wave of slogans like, "Participatory democracy" and, "We are going to give the backbenchers a real chance to take part in the proceedings of Parliament and to help the government." We heard a lot of talk about that, Mr. Speaker.

What have we had since? As one government supporter said, and I agree with him, no government should be obliged to accept every recommendation of every parliamentary committee. Nobody who has had any experience around here would suggest otherwise. However, in view of all the trumpeting about how much democracy there was going to be around here, the government might on occasion—perhaps not very often, but on occasion—consider adopting some of the recommendations of some of the committees. Unfortunately, there has not been the slightest sign of that taking place.

Consider, for example, the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. It was sent to Europe, at great expense to the taxpayers, to look into matters pertaining to NATO. I was a member of the committee at that time and I recall that members, regardless of party, worked extremely hard drawing up recommendations. Immediately upon our return we sat down to work on our report. What happened? Before we had a chance to present the report requested by the government, the government announced what it was going to do.

Why was there all this waste of the taxpayers' money and of members' time? Goodness knows, members of the House have enough duties to perform relating to constituencies, committee meetings, work in the House and elsewhere. Why should they waste their time, at the request of the government, only to have the government make its decision before the report could be presented or even drawn up? The same sort of thing happened in the Transport and Communications Committee and on the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The latter committee was discussing the question whether the voting age should be lowered to 18 years, and before it could complete its work a cabinet minister rose and said, "We have made up our minds." The same sort of thing happened with the Committee on Agriculture. In fact, it has happened with almost every committee of the House.

Mr. Orange: Stay with it!

Mr. Nesbitt: I know the hon. member for Northwest Territories does not like this, but I am afraid he will just have to listen. He can answer in due course.

An hon. Member: He has not been able to be recognized.

Mr. Nesbitt: I thought he said he would speak.

Mr. Orange: The hon. member can sit down any time he wants.

Mr. Nesbitt: If the committee system of this House is to work, some attention must be paid to Committees' reports. The government should have the good grace not to announce that it has made a decision before the matter the committee is investigating has been reported on. If this policy is continued, hon. members—I do not care in which part of the House they sit—will get damn well fed up and will not go to committees. Frankly I do not see why they should, if this policy is continued. It is useless for the Secretary of State or the minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) to rise in the House, as happened this afternoon, and say that the committee was not apprised of all pertinent facts when it drew its report.

If the government had been paying attention to what was going on in committees, and if it knew that committees were not receiving all the information they should have had before them, all it had to do was use its good offices and request, perhaps through committee chairmen, that certain witnesses from departments of government and elsewhere present evidence. We can take the instance referred to this afternoon: the evidence sought might pertain to the Brussels conference, or it might pertain—the Secretary of State for External Affairs referred to this tonight—to some of the problems we are facing in international situations. If the committees are not being properly informed, it is the government's fault. If the government has information that it wants to present to committees so that those committees may draw up reports, there is nothing stopping the government making that information available.

I think members on all sides of the House will agree that there has been remarkably little partisanship in committees. Most committee members, no matter where they sit in the House, have tried to do useful work and to bring out useful and helpful reports. But whenever the mandarins in the government do not like something—although the term "mandarins" usually refers to senior civil servants, we must remember that some of them have graduated to the cabinet—they merely say, "We are not in favour of this and we will not have it." Apparently they like to use the system that was used some years ago by members of the Capet family and kings of France such as Louis XIV. If they did not like something, they just tossed it out.

Just consider the remark the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) reportedly made to the inhabitants of Banff Park and Jasper Park. Apparently he said that if they did not like things as they were, they could get out. This is just like ordering the peasants off the property. That is symbolic of the attitude of the government, although I am careful to say that this remark does not apply to a very large number of government backbenchers. The other matter that has come before the House is the substance of the committee report. This question has been dealt with at great length by a number of hon. members including the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), the Leader of the NDP and others.

I do not intend to take the time of the House to repeat what has already been said, particularly with respect to international law. I would like to make on thing clear because it may be raised at a later date by members of the government, that is, that members of the opposition are not anti-American in some of the views we have taken. I will not take second place to any member of this House in being accused of being pro-American. I am not ashamed of it. I have always had the greatest respect and admiration for our great neighbour to the south. The Americans are hard bargainers when looking after their own interests, and I do not blame them one bit for that. That does not mean we should not express our interest and views.

A great many conclusions have been drawn from the strange attitude of the government. The government is adopting a sort of Uriah Heep posture toward the United States. Canada is so humble; the government is saying, "We do not want to interfere with you." I do not go along with the government when it says it is ever so humble. I do not think the United States has any respect for us in adopting that kind of attitude.

I heard another strange argument from a government member this afternoon, the hon. member of the legal profession. He was inquiring why the government should assert its sovereignty over the Arctic at this time. Other members must have been as stunned and astounded as I, in view of the background and training of the hon. member. I am sure the member must know that the doctrine of laches applies. If you do not assert your authority over certain territories and rights, they will lapse. In the same way, if you own a piece of property and allow people to cross the corner of it without objecting, you lose that portion of your property. This law, of course, applies internationally as well as nationally.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Douglas) pointed out that in 1908 we asserted our right under the sector principle which extends to the North Pole over ice, water and land. This was again done in 1946. In view of the great interest in the Arctic at the present time because of oil and possible transportation outlets, we should once again reassert our authority. Approximately a year ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said in this House that he was in favour of the assertion of our rights in the Arctic. This is why I find it so difficult to understand why the government is so bashful about now reasserting its rights over the Arctic. I understand this is also the feeling of many government members.

There have been many editorials, news items and remarks about this subject. There is only one conclusion any reasonable person could come to, that is, that the government has some doubts about whether we in fact have sovereignty over the Arctic areas and whether we should enforce this sovereignty. It seems that our sovereignty over the Arctic areas has become a negotiable matter. This has never happened with any previous government of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Orange: That's your view.

Mr. Nesbitt: I only hope, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Orange: Face up to it.

Mr. Nesbitt: I wish the hon. member for Northwest Territories would control his temper. He might be frightening the people in the galleries. He is frightening me. I wish he would control himself.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs intimated this evening that he will in the near future give us concrete assurance in the form of legislation or perhaps an announcement of government policy. If we assert our sovereignty over the Arctic areas in unequivocal terms, I am sure the fears and misgivings of many of us will be removed. I hope the minister will do as he intimated this evening. I hope it does not mean what the government usually means when it says "in the near future", that is, next year or the year after. I hope the assurance will be given in the next couple of weeks.

Mr. Sharp: I hope we will have some co-operation from the opposition.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have heard many amusing remarks this evening, Mr. Speaker, but the latest interjection by the Secretary of State for External Affairs really takes the cake.

Mr. Orange: You made a few, too.

Mr. Nesbitt: I will conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, because I know many members are waiting with bated breath to hear the words of the hon. member for Northwest Territories, who is just itching to speak. We would love to hear what he is going to say.

Mr. Orange: You have taken 20 minutes. Why don't you let me have a chance?

Mr. Nesbitt: The hon. member is concerned there will not be time for him to speak. We are each allowed 40 minutes to speak in this debate. I am sure in the next hour the hon. member will be able to give us his views on the matter.

In conclusion I wish to pose some questions to the government. If in fact the government approves the general principle—and I say again that is all there is in this committee report—why is there all the fuss? Why has the report not been concurred in in the usual manner and allowed to go through? Why take the time of this House? What has the government to hide? What does it not like about this report? That is all we want to know.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nesbitt: I hope other government members will reassure us there is nothing in fact to hide. We are waiting to be convinced of that.

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, before dealing with the contents of this report, which I hope at least in principle will have the support of every member of this House, I wish to place on record some of the background of the report.

The Arctic sovereignty question was raised and pursued in this House at the beginning of 1969 by the hon. member for Coast-Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre). As a result of that hon. member's opportune action, the Indian Affairs and Northern Development Committee took up the subject and last April heard expert testimony from Dean Cohen of the McGill University faculty of law.

In August, 1969, when the timetable for the Manhattan became fixed, the committee indicated its wish to welcome the Manhattan to the Canadian north. This fact is significant, Mr. Speaker: the committee was in consequence furnished with a Canadian Armed Forces' aircraft for that purpose. The committee's primary concern was that our Arctic environment and ecology could be protected only by rules and regulations formulated and enforced by Canada.

The implementation of controls and regulations for the use of these waters is, of necessity, an exercise of sovereignty. The nature of the Manhattan's voyage, with no formal request for permission for its passage having been addressed to the Canadian government, at least in the minds of the committee members presented a challenge to Canadian sovereignty, a sovereignty which I regard as being solidly based historically, geographically and geologically.

We felt a strong gesture was essential to meet what seemed to be a deliberate attempt by the United States government to skate around the sovereignty issue. A subcommittee of 10 members of the Standing Committee went north on September 3, 1969, fully aware of the significance of the gesture they were about to make.

Soon after the committee arrived in Resolute on the evening of September 3, the ten members sat down together and in the course of the most completely non-partisan discussion I have ever witnessed between members of an all-party committee thrashed out not only the wording but the tone of the message of greeting we were to send to the Manhattan as she entered the waters of the archipelago. A condition of agreement on the wording of the message was that there would be unanimous support for the message after it had been delivered, and I am happy to say there was. The clearest possible language was used to express the Canadian position: "Welcome to Canadian waters—Bienvenue dans ces eaux canadiennes".

Mr. Speaker, I am not an extreme nationalist, nor am I a flag-waver, nor do I believe in sovereignty for sovereignty's sake. However, I am totally convinced, as I know were the other nine members of the committee and as I believe are most hon. members of this House, that in order to regulate and control pollution dangers to our Arctic environment we must exercise the full sovereign powers of Canada.

Our report alludes to possible international control. We rejected a reliance on international regulations for protection because up to now, at least, their laxness has been such as to cause concern. Oil spillages, deliberate or accidental, have already reached an intolerable level in some of the temperate waters of the world, and these are the waters in which crude oil is dissipated most readily.

It is becoming increasingly clear to scientists that permissible levels of oil spillage under the present IMCO agreements may be much too high. The IMCO, as I am sure the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) found out during his voyage to Europe a short time ago, is dominated by countries whose shipping lobbies are very powerful. These shipping lobbies are in turn subservient to their most important clients, the international oil interests.

International agreement on stricter control of oil and chemical pollution by international marine traffic remains a highly desirable objective, and it is in the interest of Canada to use maximum diplomatic pressure to achieve these goals. But can we take a chance on the adequacy of international regulation when thousands of miles of Canadian Arctic coastline are menaced, and when an ecology and an environment which are probably the most delicately balanced on this planet may be irreparably damaged? The answer must, of course, be no.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has already indicated that the government of Canada will take whatever steps are necessary to protect the Arctic environment in this regard. The committee has made clear what it feels these steps should be. It states that vessels, surface and submarine, passing through Canada's Archipelago are, and shall be, subject to the sovereign control and regulation of Canada.

The urgency which is stressed in the committee's report is not exaggerated. A few days ago General Dynamics Corporation announced it had offered to build six 175,000-ton submarine tankers for oil companies with interests in the Prudhoe Bay area. The offer was made complete with prices and delivery dates. I asked in the House the day after it was announced, and I ask now, whether this company has consulted with anyone in the Canadian government on the subject. I suspect the answer is no. Canada, and Canada alone, must determine whether surface or submarine maritime traffic can be safely tolerated in the Arctic Archipelago. All of us hope it can, but it is Canada's sovereign prerogative to decide whether the answer shall be yes or no, to declare one design satisfactory and another unsatisfactory.

I should like to ask the minister responsible for the National Research Council just what assessment and evaluation capacity we possess in Canada which would enable us to decide independently which surface or submarine vessel design is acceptable or unacceptable. I can assure the minister responsible for the NRC that some time within the next few months our committee will want to hear from the NRC just how Canada is prepared to evaluate the safety of these proposed gigantic surface and submarine oil tankers.

Returning briefly to the report, I should like to comment on two points which apart from the sovereignty recommendations I deem to be the most important. The committee believes that innocent passage for ships of all nations should not be interfered with. It states clearly:

> The committee believes that innocent passage for ships of all nations through the waters of the Canadian Archipelago is compatible with the protection of fundamental and essential Canadian interests in her Arctic waters. However, the committee takes the position that any passage which poses a danger to Canada whether this danger takes the form of a threat of pollution or otherwise, is not innocent.

We have here simply taken the realistic position that any ship from any nation can use this passage as long as it does not threaten Canada. If an unsafe ship is using the passage, it is threatening Canada and Canada has an absolute right to control it.

The second point I want to stress is this: the committee urged the government to take whatever steps might be necessary, compatible with international law, to deal with this problem in the Arctic. It is significant that the committee used the phrase "compatible with international law", and I draw the attention of the House to this.

I should also like to place on record my position with regard to the motion presently before us. I, of course, support the motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Watson: Why then, Mr. Speaker, did I not move concurrence as chairman? The opposition knows, as does everyone else here, that I was not so instructed by the committee and that the practice, until the ruling of Mr. Speaker on Tuesday, was that a committee chairman did not move concurrence without an explicit direction from the committee.

I do not think I am breaking any rule if I say that during the three committee meetings which were held in camera, the members of all parties represented in the House and present at the meeting held to consider this question stressed again and again the delicacy of the sovereignty issue and the importance of avoiding phraseology which might lend itself to deliberate misinterpretation on the part of various interests opposed to the assertion and exercise of Canadian sovereignty over the water of our Arctic Archipelago.

Its objective was to put on record, not only for the government of Canada but for foreign governments, a unanimous, all-party expression of concern with regard to the imminent oil-pollution danger facing Canada's Arctic environment. There was an equally unanimous conviction and recommendation that the government of Canada should act urgently to indicate to the world—and I am repeating what the recommendation said—that shipping, surface and submarine, passing through these waters is subject to the sovereign control and regulation of Canada.

Mr. Speaker's ruling of Tuesday last was a dramatic procedural development and one which I on balance support, although in this particular case it presents some very special difficulties for the government. Normally, if the government had any reservation about any part of a report it would vote against it. In this instance the government really does not have that opportunity, because a vote against this report would conceivably open the way for a foreign power to use this as proof that there exists some doubt in the government's mind as to whether we actually have sovereignty in that area. It is inconceivable that the government could vote against this report. In this particular case the government is more restricted than it otherwise would be.

I did not receive any instructions from the committee to move for concurrence and the question was not even raised in the committee by members of either the government or opposition parties. The progress which is implicit in the committees' system and which will be the result of the ruling on Tuesday augers well for the rights of backbenchers. We can only hope that the Committee on Procedure and Organization will heed the Speaker's recommendation that immediate consideration be given to developing—I do not think the Speaker used these precise words—guidelines for committee reports. From now on chairmen will move for concurrence in their reports as soon as they are presented; they will not wait around for opposition members to move concurrence. This is very obvious. However, we will be faced with new problems in respect of time allocation. I strongly urge the committee on Procedure and Organization to heed the Speaker's recommendation in this regard.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question. I listened with great interest and approval to what he just said. Since this report has been moved and has been recommended to the government, particularly to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), is it the government's intention that this matter come to a vote and be unanimously approved? No doubt the hon. member approves the terms of reference of the committee and the recommendations of the report.

Mr. Watson: In response to that question, Mr. Speaker, I am in support of the motion, and if it does come to a vote I will vote in favour of it. That is my answer to the question.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, as one of the members of the northern affairs committee I considered we were asked to make recommendations affecting 40 per cent of Canada's land mass comprised of the Yukon and Northwest Territories. Because many members of the committee had never been there, we decided to fly to Resolute and at least look at part of this area. This land is so vast that many rivers and lakes are nameless. It is a land of muskeg, permafrost and in some areas perpetual ice.

Along the fringes of the Arctic icecap marine life abounds. There is plankton, tiny crustacea, fish, seals and polar bear. On land the caribou and muskox in their thousands feed on the Arctic moss. Lemmings, the Arctic fox and hare are part of the scene. It is a land where winter holds sway for nine months of the year and where men fear the bone-snapping cold.

For centuries men have tried to force the Northwest Passage or otherwise explore the Arctic. It was necessary to await the technology of the 20th century to properly assess this vast area. With the advent of the aeroplane, helicopter, Bombardier and huge icebreakers, transportation in the north has become a reality. Even yet, however, it is fabulously expensive.

Geologists suggest that there is more of the sedimentary-type rock in the Arctic than there is in Alberta and Saskatchewan. This includes the tarsands discovery on Melville Island. Rich deposits of iron on Baffin Island await development. I saw with my own eyes samples of ore with free gold and silver showing in them. The key to this storehouse of natural resource is transportation.

The trip of the Manhattan is now history, but history will not stop here. There is more to come. I should like to read a short item from a newspaper quoting Yellowknife as the source. It states:

> Prime Minister Trudeau should declare Canadian sovereignty over the waters surrounding the Arctic islands, the Northwest Territories council agreed yesterday.
> The council also expressed concern over Arctic pollution, and requested Territorial Commission Stuart Hodgson to seek a means of having representation at any pollution talks between Canada and the United States.
> "Occupancy is nine-tenths of the law," said Duncan Pryde, sponsor of the resolution asking the council to support a federal standing committee on Indian affairs and northern development recommendation for Canadian sovereignty in the Arctic.

We have the approval of the commission in the Northwest Territories, or at least part of that group, in this regard. We have at least caught the eyes of some of the people responsible for government in that area. This is a voice to which we should listen. The article then states:

> Mr. Pryde, elected member for the Western Arctic, said Canadian Eskimos have occupied sea ice between the Islands for centuries.
> "These are Canadian Eskimos, not American Eskimos or international Eskimos," he said.

I suggest that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made a political mistake when he did not speak out firmly on this issue when it first came up. Had he done so, the argument we have heard several times in the last few months would not have been made. I think, too, that the Prime Minister made a political mistake in the sense that this is one issue in respect of which he might have the support of all Canadians. The fact that the members of the committee from all parts of Canada were unanimous in agreement on this subject indicates that there is unanimity among Canadians on this subject. The Prime Minister missed the boat on this matter.

It would appear that the United States is challenging us on this issue. Why does it not challenge the Russians about the Russian sector of the Arctic? Why does the United States not ask the Russians whether that sector of the Arctic waters is open to international transportation? I suggest the answer is that they know it is not, and dare not ask.

I do not want to belabour the point about the continental shelf because it has already been made today, but I have an item from which I would like to read briefly. This is to be found in The Canadian Forum in an article on Arctic sovereignty. It states in part:

> The first principle is the concept of the continental shelf. The second is the utilization of straight "baselines" to designate the limits of the domestic or internal waters of a state. The continental shelf doctrine achieved prominence in 1945 when President Truman proclaimed that the resources of the subsoil and seabed of the continental shelf adjacent to a country's shore belong to that nation.

> This principle was incorporated in an international convention at the United Nations Geneva Conference on the Law of the Sea in 1958.

I shall leave it at that. The reason I mention this matter is that it is one the United States authorities have promoted. They have promoted this idea, and that is one reason for claiming this area for Canada. I suggest it is not enough for the Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development or the Prime Minister to declare that these waters are ours. This should be demonstrated by a more visible Canadian presence in the area.

Duncan Pride of the Northwest Territories Commission suggested that occupancy is nine-tenths of the law. I suggest this is the way the United States authorities consider the issue. If we were to look at Oregon in an historical sense, one might argue that it should be part of British America. The Americans moved into this area and because of the right of occupancy it became part of the United States. A similar thing happened in respect of California and New Mexico.

If the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) believes the United States people are always fair in dealing with their good neighbour to the north, he should read Bruce Hutchison's book "Struggle for the Border". In that book he would see what Mr. Hutchison has to say concerning the argument about the Alaska panhandle. I do not think the hon. member would then be so happy about this situation. I suggest the Canadian presence could take the form of Canadian icebreakers, merchant ships and naval ships using these waters. Accurate charts of water depths, currents and ice movements should be made. Navigational aids should be installed and kept operational. Bases should be enlarged and expanded. The larger ones should be converted to family-type communities with houses, schools, and so on. In this way we would in effect be saying: We are here now, to stay.

For the immediate present the armed forces might demonstrate a visible presence. Troops returning from NATO exercises could profitably learn how to navigate and manœuvre in Canada's conditions of ice, tundra, muskeg, mosquitoes, mountains, and so on. The navy could learn how to navigate in Arctic ice and winter conditions.

I feel it is regrettable that the government with the northern vision in 1958 decided to stop naval patrol of the Arctic. I think that had we had continuous naval patrols in the Arctic we might now be more operational in respect of safeguards for the ships we have there. We might also have completed our study of the area, for which there is need. I think it is regrettable that we do not have a constant naval program there now.

I did not hear the interjection of the hon. member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange), but I would ask him what our navy is doing patrolling the Caribbean when it does not know how to manoeuvre in Canadian waters. I would suggest, in dealing with Arctic sovereignty, that perhaps our Air Force transport services should be updated. The army engineers might be used to build temporary wharf facilities, airports, and so on. I recall ships being unloaded at Resolute Point. They were 200 or 300 yards out in the harbour and barges were being used to transfer supplies to shore. I wonder whether the army might have provided a more reasonable type of wharf facility in this area. Perhaps it would be of a temporary type, but it would be more effective than the facilities there at the time of our visit.

These are our suggestions. Perhaps there is some argument about their effectiveness. At any rate, they are my opinions. I believe the facilities would be useful and that the army would pick up some useful experience in northern conditions. Armed forces reserve units might spend some time in the Arctic on a rotating basis, perhaps taking the Arctic survival course as part of their training. These bases, communities, mines, oil companies, and so on, are in a particularly exposed position in respect of supplies in the event of international turmoil. Therefore, I believe these waters should be treated as inland waters and that freight should be restricted to Canadian shipping only.

Freighters for this service should be equipped for navigating and plowing through ice. They should also have rapid unloading facilities and equipment for cold weather. Much of the cold weather equipment is inadequate. Clothing, weapons, lubricating oil, engines, metals, ships, and so on, could be improved. Therefore, the Department of National Defence in co-operation with the Department of Northern Affairs, the National Research Council and industries concerned should be encouraged to continue research into improved services in these areas.

I should like to stress one point which I believe was made by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) this evening. I refer to the fact that we do not need to hesitate standing up for ourselves regarding shipping in these waters, because ships of other countries cannot use them without our support services. The land around these waters is ours. If there should be any pollution there, our land would be polluted. For this reason, also, we should take firm action. If there are military ships in this area, whether of a friendly or less friendly nation, Canada either directly or indirectly should exert all its authority to make certain nothing untoward happens and then, whether we like it or not, we will be involved.

I realize there are other members who wish to speak. I do not wish to labour my points, and therefore I shall yield the floor.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. R. J. Orange (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I hear from the other side of the House some voices in the wilderness saying "question". Two or three minutes ago the official critic of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition suggested that the hon. member for the Northwest Territories might have a word to say about this whole matter of Arctic sovereignty.

Now confusion is reigning supreme on the other side. In the beginning, as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development—

Mr. Woolliams: As it is now and ever shall be.

Mr. Dinsdale: World without end, amen.

Mr. Orange: The prayer boys are at work. As a member of the committee and having visited Resolute Bay as well as having participated in the Manhattan expedition recently, and having had some considerate interest in the north in the past 15 years, I believe the committee report makes a great deal of sense. As a member of the government and the Liberal Party I support the committee report.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Orange: During the course of the debate this afternoon and evening I could not help being impressed, as a northerner living in the south at the moment, by the sincerity with which Canadians and Members of Parliament who represent many other people in this country expressed concern about northern Canada. Probably there is no issue today in the minds of the Canadian people that reflects more greatly the true feelings of nationhood in this country than the question of Arctic sovereignty.

• (9:30 p.m.)

I believe we have finally recognized that this is a nation which does not stretch from the Atlantic to the Pacific, but from the Atlantic to the Arctic and on to the Pacific. Less than 20 years ago the islands of the Arctic Archipelago were a mysterious and forbidding land which concerned Canadians not at all and interested them even less.

Following the start of the Dew Line, the Distant Early Warning System, somewhere around 1953, and with the changes which governments have brought about since then, including the establishment of the Department of Northern Affairs, this massive land mass in the north and the people who live there are now truly a part of the Canadian conscience.

This year we in the north are celebrating our 100th year in the Canadian Confederation. In 1870 the government of Canada bought back Ruperts Land from Britain, an area which included the present provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and all of the Northwest Territories. For 80 years the northern part of that land continued to lie dormant. But in the last 20 years the people of Canada, through their government, have participated in the life of the north to make it truly part of our nation. In the north there is a feeling that the Canadian Confederation is the most important thing to us as Canadians. It is finally apparent to northerners that the people who live in southern Canada are concerned about the north.

This is demonstrated by the manner in which Members of Parliament talk about the north and ask that more emphasis be placed on northern development. This area north of the 60th parallel comprises more than 40 per cent of our land mass, but has a very small population. Hopefully, it holds those resources that will make this country truly Canadian in the years to come.

Today we are spending some time debating the question of Arctic sovereignty. What do we do about it? What do we do about the passage through Lancaster Sound, Barrow Strait, and the Prince of Wales Strait to make sure that we as Canadians have a right to say which ships can pass, and can control them so they will not destroy the tender but vital life of the Arctic?

As members of Parliament we face a dilemma. We could unilaterally say—emotionally I believe we should, although intellectually I am not too sure—that these are Canadian waters. We could display our jingoism and all the other things which make headlines. But how do we do it effectively? Do we suddenly stand up and say that all these waters belong to Canada?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Orange: The people across there say yes, but how are we to stop other nations bringing their ships through? This is the dilemma.

Mr. Crouse: You tell them that these waters belong to Canada.

Mr. Orange: We tell them?

Mr. Crouse: Yes.

Mr. Orange: More jingoism from the other side. Can we go to the World Court and say these waters belong to us? We can. Maybe we will win, and maybe we won't. How can we enforce this? What gunboats do we have? The Bonaventure is now for sale. Can we break off diplomatic relations with the major nations which insist on pushing their vessels through there? We can stand up, shout and scream, but can we stop them? This is the dilemma we face. Somehow we as Canadians must take the necessary steps.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Orange: At the end of my speech.

Mr. Lewis: It is related to what the hon. member has just said.

Mr. Orange: Mr. Speaker, I think our coast-guard, our Department of Transport and our science research facilities should start to look at ice dynamics, the processes of ice, and what happens to ships in ice waters. We know very little about this subject. We know very little about the effect of ice dynamics on a ship of 250,000 tons, or even on a ship of 10,000 tons. We do not know what happens to such ships caught in the Arctic ice during the long Arctic night, and during Arctic storms.

An hon. Member: What has this to do with sovereignty?

Mr. Orange: I believe in the sovereignty of this country. We have established our sovereignty on the islands. We have established sovereignty on the polar shelf. We also control the only Northwest Passage there is, between Banks Island and Victoria Island through the Prince of Wales Strait because of the two islands known as the Princess Royal Islands, which lie in this area and which are Canadian territory. To try and sail any other way is impossible. If a ship goes beyond Banks Island it hits the polar ice pack, and there is no way the Manhattan or even a bigger ship can get through the polar ice pack.

As Canadians we control the Northwest Passage. It is ours. We can say which ships can pass through it. We can set the standards. We can ask the Department of Transport, the Science Council and other groups to make recommendations whereby we can control possible pollution and preserve the ecology of the region, compatible with the principles we have set down.

Mr. MacInnis: You are going against your own principles now.

Mr. Orange: One of the problems we face is with respect to our neighbour to the south. Like most Canadians, I have relatives and friends down there. I have started to wonder about some of the reactions coming from our powerful neighbour and I cannot help but be concerned about their lack of recognition that there is a sovereign Canadian nation which has interest in the Arctic islands, and which has an interest in protecting those things which are part of this sovereign nation.

In recent months I have read editorials in American newspapers concerning the transportation of oil through these Arctic waters, waters which may be in dispute internationally so far as our sovereignty is concerned.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Woolliams: But does anybody dispute it? That is what I would like to ask.

Mr. Orange: Mr. Speaker, I should like to read into the record, in support of my concern about the United States approach to this whole matter, a document written by Mr. Howard W. Pollock, Congressman for the State of Alaska, to the chairman of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, the Hon. Edward A. Garmatz, Member of the House of Representatives. This document is a matter of public record and it is a report of Mr. Pollock's trip on the Manhattan. I think it is an indication of the lack of recognition on the part of our neighbours to the south of the use, control and ownership of these waters. I think it is a matter that should concern all Canadians. I shall not read the entire letter, which is rather long. The first paragraph deals with the trip into Alaskan waters and the second paragraph reads as follows:

> Unquestionably the s.s. Manhattan is the largest, most powerful icebreaker in the world, and it performed spectacularly under most rigorous ice conditions. It sliced through enormous ice pressure ridges up to an estimated forty to sixty feet in height with no roll, no sway, and no shudder. The powerful ship outperformed the escorting Canadian and United States Coast Guard icebreakers. The performance exceeded all expectations. First and second year ice proved to be no problem whatever to negotiate; however, the dense, hardpacked, older multiyear polar ice floes periodically created massive side pressures that would impede forward motion and temporarily imprison the worthy vessel in the ever-changing ice pack.

Going to another paragraph, it continues:

> In my considered opinion, Humble Oil will ultimately make the management decision to build a fleet of supertanker icebreakers in the 250,000 deadweight ton class, with a very substantial relative increase in horsepower—perhaps a magnitude of 85,000 to 100,000 horsepower. Today no shipyard in the U.S. is capable of doing this.

Then further on it reads:

> Ultimately, 30 or so 250,000 ton supertanker icebreakers could be built by industry for the commercial trade of the Arctic, with 35 day round trips programmed (including a 3-day buffer for delays due to ice conditions), with 48 hours programmed at each end for total turnaround time loading and unloading.

He then goes on to point out the limitation of the U.S. icebreaker Northwind. He acknowledges that a little old Canadian ship under Captain Fournier, the Sir John A. Macdonald did perform a very useful service for the Manhattan, and I believe this is the heart of the letter. He continues:

In light of our strategic, scientific and economic goals in the polar regions, it is obvious that we have insufficient icebreakers available to carry out our national requirements. The U.S. icebreakers in these polar regions have long outlived their usefulness. Icebreaking, with its repeated shocks, stresses and strains, causes metal fatigue and heavy engine wear, the combination of which aggravates deterioration and hastens breakdown.

With the immediate potential of increased commercial activity, it is necessary that serious consideration be given now to providing modern, powerful icebreakers to meet our polar objectives. With ship transportation feasible for exploitation of mineral resources, a national commitment must be made which will establish a very high priority for building and commissioning the finest icebreakers in the world.

Mr. Speaker, when I first read this letter I was a little shocked. When I looked at it the second time I was a little frightened that a Congressman of the United States—

An hon. Member: Look at it again.

Mr. Orange: —would produce this kind of letter without recognition that these waterways do not belong to United States of America. I have other quotes including some from the president of the United States Chamber of Commerce in an address delivered in Halifax last summer, when he virtually warned Canadians not to be concerned about the Northwest Passage. The whole import of the speech was, "You know, we can get along. We can be friends. We can work something out." I do not believe that this is good enough; it is not what Canadians want.

When the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) announces the approach that this government will take, I hope it will be the type of approach that will make Canadians recognize that these waters, be they not Canadian at the moment—

Mr. Dinsdale: They are.

Mr. Woolliams: They are Canadian.

Mr. Burton: Resign, if that is all you can say.

Mr. Woolliams: How can you say that and be the member for Northwest Territories?

Mr. Orange: Mr. Speaker, the voice in the wilderness once again asks how can I say that and be the member for Northwest Territories.

Mr. Dinsdale: Physician, heal thyself.

Mr. Orange: I would ask him to look at the map. Look where these waters run. We are talking about total control over all these waters. There is no way in international law, no international precedent by which we can say all these waters are ours. I am talking about the mouth of Lancaster Sound to the McClure Strait.

An hon. Member: A sell-out.

Mr. Orange: Oh, a sell-out! Just look at the map.

Mr. Woolliams: You should see the face of the minister now.

Mr. Orange: In the past few days the Council of the Northwest Territories, which is presently meeting in Yellowknife, has taken a very substantial look at the question of Arctic sovereignty. They have expressed concern on this matter and put together a resolution which was unanimously carried. The resolution reads:

Now therefore, moved that this Council add their support to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development in their recommendation to the Prime Minister of Canada that the waters around and between the Arctic Islands be confirmed to be under Canadian sovereignty.

I should like to quote a statement that Mr. Michael Simonie made. He is an elected representative on the Northwest Territories Council and represents the eastern Arctic. I wish to read his words because they have a bearing on what we are talking about, and particularly on the Eskimo people. On that occasion a motion pertaining to Arctic sovereignty was before the Council. Mr. Simonie said:

Mr. Commissioner, I support this motion. I am the seconder of this motion. In the night-time you see in the Arctic the northern lights up in the sky. Also, you see phosphorous in the Arctic water in the night-time. I feel the Arctic water should stay right where it is in order to have the animals live in the water. I am the seconder of the motion because I like to hear what has been said on the motion so in particular we live in Canada as northerners and we should have the full right to all of northern Canada and therefore I support this motion, on behalf of my people living off the animals. We don't grow anything up there as people do down south in Canada. We only live on the animals year around. I support this motion.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Harding: Sit down and let us vote unanimously in favour of the motion.

Mr. Orange: I believe that as we look at the question of Arctic sovereignty we must also consider, after the Northwest Passage has been thoroughly opened, matters pertaining to extraction of the resources of the area, be they oil from Prudhoe Bay or the Panarctic, iron ore from the Milne Inlet or copper deposits of Strathcona ND. Whatever we do, we must make sure that the Eskimo people who wish to do so can continue living off the animals of the area, and that ships plying the passage will obey rules and regulations designed to protect the ecology of the area. We do not want that ecology disturbed unnecessarily. If we do these things, I think we will be doing what is best for the north. It is not beyond the ability of science, aided by modern technology, to clean up any spillage that may occur, in a way that will not harm the ecology of the area. I believe that the people of the area must be able to retain, if they want to, their way of life.

Before I resume my seat I think it would be well for us to acknowledge our debt to the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre). If it had not been for the work of that backbench Member of Parliament this issue may not have assumed the proportions it has. I am delighted that he has been instrumental in bringing it before us, as are hon. members on all sides of the House. Because of the hon. member's work we have been made aware of the meaning of Arctic sovereignty. Having an understanding of the matter—

An hon. Member: Let us vote.

Mr. Orange: —the hon. member took it upon himself to convince his colleagues in the House that we have a responsibility in determining the question of Arctic sovereignty. If it had not been for the chairman of the committee and the advice of some members of the opposition, in particular that of the former minister of northern affairs (Mr. Dinsdale) and the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Simpson), the committee would not have gone north to meet the Manhattan.

Mr. Woolliams: Only a few minutes more.

Mr. Orange: Many editorial writers in this country sneered at us last August and September; they looked down their noses at the parliamentary committee which was flying into the Arctic. Hon. members need only look at what has been printed.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Orange: However, the committee believed in what it was doing and I believe we established our point.

Mr. Nesbitt: The hon. member is talking the motion out.

Mr. Orange: We went north with a specific purpose. We as a parliamentary group were concerned about our Arctic sovereignty, and for that reason among others we went north to meet the Manhattan.

Mr. Harding: Why does the hon. member not permit the House to vote?

Mr. Orange: We as a committee accomplished something which has been seldom accomplished in the House of Commons.

An hon. Member: One more minute.

Mr. Orange: Opposition members seem to be pretty anxious.

Mr. Harding: Let us vote for Canada. Sit down and let us vote.

Mr. Orange: Mr. Speaker, I have been asked to speak and, hopefully, I intend to finish my remarks. I think that when we went to Resolute Bay to visit the Manhattan, what we did was pretty important for Parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) rising on a point of order?

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that since the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange) has almost completed his speech, we might continue the debate a little longer. We should be most agreeable to not seeing the clock for a few minutes, if thereby we might reach a decision.

An hon. Member: Let us have the vote.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 40, a motion to adjourn the House is deemed to have been put.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, you have not asked the House to make its decision.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith) is suggesting that I inquire whether there is unanimous consent on the part of hon. members for the debate to continue. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Borrie: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, before the matter comes to a vote I should like to have the opportunity of making some remarks. I was a member of the committee which brought down the report.

Mr. Speaker: There must be unanimous consent for continuing and there does not appear to be such unanimity.

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, am I to understand that an objection came from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp)?

Mr. Woolliams: It did.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is after ten o'clock—

Mr. Dinsdale: What price Canadian sovereignty!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is after ten o'clock and it is the duty of the Chair to inform hon. members that under the provisions of Standing Order 40, a motion for the adjournment of this House is deemed to have been put. According to the standing order, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) now has the floor.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ALLEGED MISLEADING ADVERTISING BY IMPERIAL TOBACCO COMPANY

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I hoped that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) would be in his place this evening because I wish to bring before this House a matter of concern to all Canadians and of particular interest to the minister and his department. I hope his absence does not indicate a lack of concern, because I am sure the minister is well aware of the issue being debated this evening; I am certain that he was given notice of it.

The problem I wish to raise is posed by certain forms of advertising and sales promotion which tend to mislead consumers. The majority of these advertisements and promotional stunts may be so carefully phrased as to be within the limits of legality. However, regardless of how they are worded and presented to the public, the end result is to mislead the consumer in varying degrees.

I first raised this matter in the form of a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs on January 15. The question was in reference to recent events which occurred in Alberta. These events evolved from the promotion of a new brand of cigarette, Casino, by the manufacturers, the Imperial Tobacco Company of Canada Limited. By means of advertising, consumers were invited to buy Casino cigarettes and thereby have a chance of winning cash prizes by playing a game called Casino, details of which were enclosed in each package.

It is not my intention this evening to go into detail about the rules and method of play. It will suffice to say that a number of consumers who bought the product and played the game according to company rules are still waiting for the promised prize payment. In some cases these claims for payment amount to as much at $20,000 or $30,000. It is not my intention to make a charge that the advertising was either false or misleading in its origin and early application. However, I do say that it becomes both false and misleading the moment the manufacturer fails to honour claims for prizes won in accordance with the rules as advertised.

Furthermore, I submit that it becomes very questionable when an organization spends huge sums of money on advertising and promoting not only the cigarette but the game, through television, radio and newspaper and then finds itself in a position of having to withdraw from the game and does so simply by placing a small and insignificant advertisement on the back pages of the daily newspapers.

This may not constitute misleading advertising, but I strongly suggest that it constitutes a deprivation of information to the public and consumer, particularly to those who bought these cigarettes in good faith on the strength of the company's advertising and adhered to the rules and regulations that were stated on the package. The rules which were quoted stated that prize claims must be postmarked no later than July 31, 1970, in one series and in another series indicated that the deadline for claiming a prize was December 31, 1971.

I submit that actions of this sort do very little to dispel the anxieties and apprehensions of caveat emptor. This is clearly a matter within the jurisdiction of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

My understanding is that some time after the new brand was launched in the Alberta market, the company discovered a flaw in the game of Casino that made it possible for buyers to win more easily and to win greater amounts of money than had been anticipated. I believe that on December 4 the product was withdrawn from the market and all promotion ceased. On December 13, Alberta newspapers carried advertisements announcing this and stating that the company would honour no applications for prize money if they were dated after December 12.

I would also point out, Mr. Speaker, that notwithstanding the fact that the company announced withdrawal of the product from the market, it was still available in retail outlets in Smoky Lake, Alberta, as late as January 9, 1970.

It is my understanding that one or more of these claims will shortly be contested in the courts. In any event, many consumers in Alberta believe they have just claims for prize money which have not been satisfied. I cite this as an example of the type of thing that is happening in many fields involving consumer affairs. It is my firm conviction that this aspect of consumer affairs should be of prime interest to the minister and to his department whose chief job, we have been told, it is the protection of the interests of the Canadian consumer.

Far be it from me to say that the company in this case is necessarily at fault. I do say, however, that the circumstances are such as to fully warrant a thorough and complete investigation by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. If this department is not prepared to initiate an investigation, it might well be a matter for the Department of Justice to deal with. I understand from the questions and answers in the House yesterday that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) and the officials of his department are familiar with this matter.

Advertising is the chief method of promoting sales to consumers and moving consumer goods. It is obvious, to me at least, that it should therefore be one of the main areas of interest to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I believe the question I raise tonight clearly falls within the department's jurisdiction, and I urge the minister to meet the challenge by examining this and similar matters at once.

Mr. Paul Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the officials of the Combines Investigation Act Administration are aware of the question raised by the hon. member and his remarks will be referred to them.

SPORTS—FINANCIAL SUPPORT FOR OLYMPIC GAMES BIDS

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East): May I at the outset, Mr. Speaker, congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro), and indeed his entire staff, on their positive and constructive approach to Canadian sports development and physical fitness.

Assigned these responsibilities a relatively short time ago, the minister and his staff have established an excellent record. My question relates to the amount of aid which has, in fact, been pledged by the federal government to the sponsors of Canada's Winter Olympic Games application and the amount of aid, if any, pledged by the government to the sponsors of the Montreal Summer Olympic Games application. I suggest that some urgency exists and we must have the facts. The picture is confused, and contradictory statements have been made which do nothing to assist either application.

As hon. members know, both in the Vancouver-Garibaldi winter games bid and the bid by Montreal for the summer games relate to events scheduled for 1976. However, right now, this very day, representatives of the International Olympics Commission are, I am advised, examining the bids within their national organizations in preparation for the critical vote which will take place in Amsterdam on May 13.

It is no secret that only extraordinary circumstances permit a country to bid successfully for both the winter and the summer Olympic Games. Canada has established an outstanding reputation for winter sports facilities. The mountains of western Canada were built-to-order for the winter Olympics competition. The Vancouver-Garibaldi Olympics Commission has worked tirelessly since its establishment in 1960 to bring the winter games to the west.

There have been keen disappointments along the way. Their 1961 bid was rejected because of lack of road facilities. In 1966 the provincial government opened a paved access road. The obstacles have been cleared away and Garibaldi is ready.

A remarkable amount of co-operation has been realized. Together with the enthusiastic support of the sports community there has been widespread citizen support as well as pledges of financial support from both federal and provincial governments. Until recently all indicators pointed to a successful Vancouver-Garibaldi bid. All Canada was convinced that this nation had a good chance to win the winter Olympic Games and that the games would be held at Whistler Mountain in the Garibaldi area.

However, Mayor Drapeau of Montreal elected to enlist the support of public opinion for the summer Olympic Games in Montreal in 1976 by making statements to the public through the media—statements, Mr. Speaker, which I suggest may not represent the facts and indeed could be very damaging to Canada's bid for the winter games.

I respect the enthusiasm and energy of Mayor Drapeau, but the eyes of the sports world are on Canada and it is vitally important to Canada's prestige as a winter wonderland that the Vancouver-Garibaldi Olympic Committee receive the support of all Canada—the kind of overwhelming support that all Canada gave to Expo '67 in Montreal.

In the Montreal Gazette dated January 15, 1970, on the front page a full-column story appears, part of which reads as follows:

> Mr. Drapeau appeared both confident Montreal will win the games and convinced the city is fully capable of hosting them.

The impression left with readers clearly was that he had the blessing and support of the federal government. I am advised that the same gentleman also spoke to members of the Olympic Games officials in terms which left little doubt he had been assured of federal government support. In competitions of this kind support usually means financial grants. It is therefore vital to Canada's success in its bid for the winter games that the record be put straight, without delay.

Because of the excellent facilities already available at the Whistler Mountain area, the Vancouver-Garibaldi competition will have a net cost of $25 million and I am advised that the federal government has graciously agreed to pay a portion of this cost. I am advised that the Olympic Summer Games in Montreal could cost a minimum of $200 million, and possibly up to $300 million. There may be a time in the future when an expenditure of this magnitude could be justified. If such is the case, I am confident that I can assure Mayor Drapeau he will receive the wholehearted support of Canadians. But, Mr. Speaker, there can surely be no justification for making a commitment at this time.

The Vancouver-Garibaldi Olympic Committee's bid for the Winter Olympic Games in 1976 is a "first" for Canada. It will provide a meeting place for young people from all over the world generally and from all over Canada in particular. People from the Canadian east will visit the west in droves, as those from the west visited the east in Montreal during Expo '67.

In closing, may I express to the federal government the sincere gratitude of Canadian winter sportsmen from coast to coast for its support in assuring a successful bid being made by the Vancouver-Garibaldi Olympic Committee.

Mr. Paul Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) on January 15 concerning federal financial commitments for Montreal and Garibaldi in support of their bids for the 1976 Olympic Games, I would like to say that Montreal did not request direct financial assistance and therefore no commitment has been given to them. It is understood, however, that Montreal will be seeking indirect financial support under either existing legislation or legislation that might exist in the future concerning urban renewal and public housing. It is understood that any cost-sharing program applied for would have to be justified in its own right without consideration of its association with the Olympic Games.

In the case of the Vancouver-Garibaldi bid, the federal government was asked to participate financially and the federal government has agreed to a grant of $75,000 to help defray their promotional expenses in furthering the bid. That represents one-third of the total promotional money. The other two-thirds have been supplied by the province of British Columbia and the city of Vancouver.

The federal government has further agreed to provide a fixed grant of $10 million toward the deficit of a non-profit corporation to be established for the staging and operation of the games. This grant is conditional upon the corporation obtaining from the government of British Columbia and the city of Vancouver an undertaking in terms acceptable to the federal government that either or both the government of British Columbia and the city of Vancouver will pay the balance of the deficit of the corporation, and that the federal government be satisfied that adequate provision has been made for the recognition of its role in the promotion and staging of the games and in the ceremonials and elements of publicity employed in connection with them.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, the city of Montreal did not initially apply for and has not received from the federal government a grant for the purposes of staging the Olympic Games; nor has the city of Montreal to date applied for funds from any other government cost-sharing program in relationship to the Olympic Games. The city of Vancouver applied for assistance, and if the aforementioned conditions are met, will receive an outright grant of $10 million for the purposes of staging the 1976 Olympic Games.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ROLE

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, on December 17 I directed a question to the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) in which I asked whether he would make a statement concerning the future role and status of the National Film Board. The National Film Board is an agency of which all Canadians can be proud. It has an international reputation and has an essential role to play in continuing educational programs. Concern has developed all across Canada—and I can cite many examples in my province of Saskatchewan—concerning the future of the National Film Board. This concern has resulted from the lay-off of employees, particularly in the production staff, and the announcement concerning user charges which range from $3 for a 24-hour period to $12 for a 24-hour period.

Prior to the Christmas recess, Mr. Saumier was appointed to investigate the situation in respect of the National Film Board. This report was tabled today and the minister made a statement. He indicated there had been lay-offs in the English production staff and that the figure should be 32 rather than 37 as previously planned. As my children would say, "Big deal". To compare the performance and plan today with the 1964 situation is not adequate. The minister also lauded other film work growth, namely in the CBC and in the Canadian Film Development Corporation. We want to know about the Fiim Board. Why does the minister not clear up doubts in this area and utilize this established agency to the full, because it is an agency which has done so well?

The report which was tabled today shows there is reason for concern. It observed in part that there does not exist at present a comprehensive federal government policy with regard to information or cultural affairs. It states that federal government agencies with responsibilities in these fields—the National Film Board among them—accordingly feel somewhat at a loss when faced with problems that cannot be solved logically or effectively without making fundamental choices which would normally proceed from a known order of objectives and priorities. Later on in this report we read the following:

It should be emphasized here that the senior management of the board, located moreover far from the capital, had scant knowledge of the mysterious workings of government in Ottawa.

Further on it states:

This largely unseasoned team immediately found itself confronted by the expected but none the less acute crisis of identity and growth which faced the board at that time.

That was in mid-1967. The report goes on to emphasize this fact:

It was all the more critical because of the fact that the board was left without a chairman from March 1966 until early July 1967—

Still later on the report points out:

It was in these circumstances that the board's management was suddenly confronted by budget directives that were as depressing as they were unexpected, and was forced into decisions that were dramatic in terms both of their scope and of the speed with which they had to be reached.

The report then makes some further observations and notes:

The production side (English and French) has been hit very hard... This may seriously affect the future of the board.

Then it says:

At the same time, any objective analysis of the dismissals for this group is rendered impossible by the absence of a long-term policy respecting the board, the vagueness of the profitability requirements which some would like to apply to this sector, the inadequacies of procedures for assessing creative personnel, and the absence of an adequate financial information system.

In conclusion, Mr. Saumier said:

It therefore appears that the National Film Board management, confronted by a situation which they could not resolve objectively or subjectively, were led to make a series of decisions which, although inevitably arbitrary, are none the less convergent. It appears, once again, that an underlying policy is implied in any major body of decisions—

He goes on to discuss this subject and then says the solution must be found——in the co-ordinated and conscious definition of objectives and priorities from which the board, as a whole, will be able subsequently to derive a consistent and intentional, rather than accidental, set of decisional rules.

The Commissioner of the Film Board in his comments goes on to state that the very future of the board is at stake. Subsequently, user charges were announced. There was no word from the minister today regarding this particular feature. It is of much concern in my province of Saskatchewan where this program has been used extensively. These user charges will mean a reduction in the use of the films which the board produces.

I have received representations from the Catholic Family Services in the city of Regina in which they say that the films have been very important to their organization, and that the films on family life education had been particularly useful as resource material. I have also received a letter from the supervisor of a local church boys group which says they make extensive use of National Film Board films, but that if these user charges are instituted they will no longer be able to use the films.

The council of the city of Regina has protested. The Wheatland regional library, which serves central Saskatchewan, has protested. This library used 723 films in its branches in the first 11 months of 1969, in spite of the difficulty it had in obtaining Film Board catalogues. Other agencies have also protested. I recommend to the government that it reconsider the imposition of these user charges.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I regret to tell the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) that due to unforeseen circumstances the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) is unable to be here this evening. I will take it upon myself to make sure he receives the hon. member's representations and give them all the consideration they deserve.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.26 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, January 23, 1970

The House met at 11 a.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO PROHIBIT PHOSPHATE COMPOUNDS IN DETERGENTS

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-180, to amend the Criminal Code (phosphate compound in detergents).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to prevent further pollution of Canadian lakes, rivers and other waterways by banning the manufacture, distribution and sale of detergents containing phosphate compounds, this legislation to take effect from January 1, 1972.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

DIVORCE ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ORDERS FOR CUSTODY AND COROLLARY RELIEF

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-181, to amend the Divorce Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, the bill sets forth two amendments to the Divorce Act. The first amendment is so technical that I shall not trespass upon the time of the House. It cannot be explained briefly but the explanatory note with the bill puts the argument totally and fairly.

The second amendment would allow courts in provinces to which a successful party has moved to examine orders. If a person has obtained in Newfoundland an order for corollary relief and has moved to British Columbia, instead of putting those concerned to the expense of going back to the court in Newfoundland the order could be reviewed in the courts of British Columbia.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—INCREASE IN TRUCKING RATES BY QUEBEC TRANSPORTATION BOARD

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance relating to the policy of restraint and arising from the decision by the Quebec Transportation Board authorizing substantial increases in Quebec-Ontario trucking rates. Is it government policy that the increases in rates made under this order of the Quebec Transportation Board might well violate the government's restraint program or is it the policy that such increases would not violate any such program because they are authorized by a duly constituted authority?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in these cases, and there was another case yesterday, I believe, with respect to telephone rates, the regulatory body itself generally only authorizes increases in rates that are based on increases in costs. With respect to the instance to which my hon. friend refers, I have asked for additional information about the increases, what they are based on and so on, and officials are trying to obtain this information for me.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Did the Minister of Transport or any representative of the government of Canada make any representations to the Quebec Transportation Board seeking a postponement of any authorized increases in view of the efforts the government of Canada is making with regard to restraint?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, the increases did not come to my attention until they were announced. As I said to my hon. friend, I have asked that further information be requested from the Quebec Transportation

Board in order that we may know whether the increases are based purely on increases of costs involved.

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. During the talks that the Minister of Transport and the president of the CTC had with the various provincial transport authorities, did the Quebec Transportation Board indicate that this increase was going to be requested? If so, what did the chairman of the CTC say, and what was the minister's position with respect to that request?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, no reference was made at all to any prospective or likely increase during those meetings.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the Minister of Finance actively considering a program of attempting to persuade the trucking companies which have been authorized to charge these increased rates to defer any such increases at least until after the meeting next month proposed by the Prices and Incomes Commission?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, that decision has not been made, pending the receipt of information as to the basis on which such increases were authorized.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TRANSFER OF NERVE GAS FROM OKINAWA TO UNITED STATES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister about the decision of the United States government to have five ships transfer nerve gas from Okinawa to Bangore, there to be transferred to 700 boxcars for transport to Hermiston army base. Since these five ships will pass through Juan de Fuca Strait and be unloaded only 60 miles south of Vancouver Island, may I ask whether the United States government has advised the Canadian government of this transfer and whether any representation has been made by the Canadian government with respect to this matter?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that any request has been made, but I shall make inquiries.

[Mr. Benson.]

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Inasmuch as Governor McCall of Oregon and Senator Hatfield have both appealed to the President of the United States to have this nerve gas, which has already injured some 24 people who were handling it in Okinawa, detoxicized before it is shipped, will the government of Canada consider making similar representations to the government of the United States?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if any aspect of this matter falls within our jurisdiction, I will consider the suggestion.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POSSIBLE CLOSING OF CERTAIN RADAR STATIONS

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence.

Would he tell the House whether his department is considering making important changes to Canada's radar system or closing certain radar stations?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Not at this time, Mr. Speaker.

INDUSTRY

POTASH—CONVENING OF MEETING OF WORLD PRODUCERS

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is the federal government actively assisting the Saskatchewan government in the convening of a meeting of potash producers of the world this summer in order to bring some order to this depressed industry?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I do not think we have been asked, in this particular instance, to co-operate in the negotiations that Premier Thatcher is now conducting.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—SUGGESTED MEETING OF PRIME MINISTER AND LABOUR LEADERS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the most recent reiteration of their position by Canada's top labour leaders that they have no intention of complying with the request and urgent suggestion of the department and the Prices and Incomes Commission to hold wage increases within agreed guide-lines, is the Prime Minister now giving serious consideration to meeting personally with these top labour leaders to try to convince them of the great necessity of agreeing to this action so that inflation control in Canada can have a chance of being realized?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): That is a very constructive suggestion, Mr. Speaker. I will take it into consideration if it becomes apparent that a meeting would be useful. However, at this stage I believe it wise to let the Prices and Incomes Commission continue its negotiations in that area as it has with the business area of the community.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATION FOR INQUIRY INTO CONTRACTORS' CLAIMS

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Will the Minister of Transport say whether he intends accepting and acting, and if so, when, on the unanimous recommendation of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications of December 11 for the establishment of a one-man inquiry to consider the claims of the Great Slave Lake contractors?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I am prepared to accept the recommendation in principle that some inquiry should be held. Some doubts and problems have been raised about the nomination of a single person to do this job. I am looking for alternative ways of carrying out the same objective and recommendation of the committee.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFF OF RAILWAY PERSONNEL RESULTING FROM MASTER AGENCY PLAN

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In light of the widespread concern of hundreds of agents and other railway workers in western Canada because of the proposed lay-off of many personnel as a result of the master agency plan, can the minister say if this matter has been brought to his attention and will he review this serious situation with his colleague the Minister of Labour with a view to preventing these widespread lay-offs?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I will be glad to do what I can, Mr. Speaker.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS FROM ALBERTA INDIAN CHIEFS RESPECTING POLICY

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): My question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Has the minister received any representations in the last day or so from the assembly of all the Indian chiefs of Alberta?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have received no letter or communication recently from the Indian Association of Alberta.

[English]

Mr. Nesbitt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the position just taken by the assembly of all Indian chiefs of Alberta, will the minister immediately suspend any further implementation of the government's new Indian policy until genuine meetings and consultations take place with the leaders of the Indian people of Canada? Also, will the minister take immediate steps to arrange such consultations?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, since June I have had the opportunity of meeting almost all the Indian leaders in Canada to discuss our Indian policy, and I am always ready to meet them.

I had occasion to visit Alberta three or four times since June and I have always made myself available for discussions with the Indians. Unfortunately, the leader of the Indians of Alberta has not deemed fit to meet me.

RESEARCH

PARTICIPATION WITH UNITED STATES IN SPACE PROGRAM

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): My question is to the President of the Treasury Board. Given the current concern of scientists in Canada about the direction of Canadian science policy, can the minister indicate to the House whether the United States government has requested the Canadian government to participate in a $10 billion space research program? If so, what has been the response of the Canadian government?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I also read that newspaper article. I think the indication there is rather that it is speculated that the United States will invite Canada. It has not as yet and no such invitation has been received.

Mr. Broadbent: Will the minister assure the House that if such an invitation is extended the government will bring the issue before the House prior to reaching a decision?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that the hon. member's supplementary is purely hypothetical.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question. Is it the policy of the government to consider actively the advisability of Canada seeking a role to play in a joint space program with the United States?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, an interdepartmental committee has recently been formed to study this particular question.

NATURAL GAS

POLICY RESPECTING REGULATION OF WELL-HEAD PRICE

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): My question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, Mr. Speaker, and it arises out of the prolonged hearings, now in their third month, being held by the National Energy Board concerning the future policy of the board governing the export of natural gas. With a view to shortening these hearings and resolving the present uncertainty in this important national industry, would the minister make a statement concerning the government's policy with respect to the regulation of the well-head price of natural gas?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The board, in holding these hearings, is acting in its quasi-judicial capacity and I do not think it would be proper for me to interfere with it in any way. Certainly the evidence coming out before the Board is extremely useful, and I am sure it will be taken into consideration by the government in the formulation of policy.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

NATIONAL PRESS CLUB

ADMISSION OF WOMEN TO MEMBERSHIP—SUGGESTED CHANGE IN PLACE OF MEETING

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the President of the Privy Council in his capacity as Leader of the House. In view of the fact that the National Press Club is to hold a meeting tomorrow for the purpose of discussing the constitutional question of the right of women to be known as persons, will the Leader of the House see whether arrangements can be made for the meeting to be held in this chamber? Will he also see whether arrangements can be made for Members of Parliament to take their places in the Press Gallery so this important meeting can be given full coverage by press, radio and television?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker. It sounds as though there has been an attack of nerve gas on the National Press Club. I will consider that suggestion and also the probability that there would be a much higher standard of reporting under those circumstances.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

TRANSPORT

ARGENTIA-NORTH SYDNEY FERRY—INCLUSION OF ST. PIERRE AS PORT OF CALL

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): I have a question for the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister in a position to inform the House whether a decision has been made on the application by Canadian National Railways to include the French island port of St. Pierre as a port of call for the Argentia-North Sydney ferry?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No such application has been made, Mr. Speaker.

HARBOURS

PROPOSALS FOR CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION OF PORTS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister say when the proposals for changes in administration of the national ports will be ready? Will the minister assure hon. members affected that they will have an opportunity to see these proposals, preferably in the Transport Committee, before anything is finally done?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): As to the first part of the question, it will be within a month at the outside. As to the second part, definitely yes, and in addition to the members of the Transport Committee, any other groups that may have a related interest in the matter.

WATER RESOURCES

SURVEY IN NORTHERN ONTARIO BY U.S. ARMY CORPS OF ENGINEERS

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): My question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has he made inquiries as to why the United States Army Corps of Engineers is hiring Canadian citizens in northern Ontario to record statistical data concerning stream flow rates, the thickness of ice on lakes and rivers, and so on?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I keep getting information from the hon. member about these elusive and mysterious engineers who are prowling around in the north. As I have told him before, the only study being done in the area is a joint study by Ontario and ourselves to co-ordinate information, and work together. My instructions are that at our end there is no Corps of Army Engineers. If the province of Ontario has retained any, I am not aware of the fact.

Mr. Penner: Will the minister undertake to investigate and report to the House as soon as possible as to the reasons for the activity of the Army Corps of Engineers in northern Ontario and under whose authority they are acting?

Mr. Greene: It may be I can put my colleague the Solicitor General and his minions to work in this regard.

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Is the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources aware of the fact that this type of investigation is being carried out by the American Corps of Engineers by letter and that the citizens of northerwestern Ontario who are taking these measurements are not engineers? Would the minister undertake to get in touch with his colleagues in the provincial department in Ontario to co-operate with them in finding out the purpose of this type of investigation?

Mr. Greene: I will be glad to do that. I am glad to hear it is being done by letter because I know that the information will be delivered promptly.

NATIONAL PARKS

KEJIMKUJIK—PLANS FOR COASTAL SATELLITE PARK

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the minister's statement that 12 public hearings will be held on national parks plans, with details to be revealed in Halifax on January 27, can the minister indicate whether plans have yet been finalized for the construction of a coastal satellite park for Kejimkujik?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that the question might be placed on the Order Paper. If the matter is one of urgency, it can be considered at the time of adjournment.

AIRPORTS

TORONTO—STATEMENT ON PROPOSED SITE

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Does the minister propose to make a statement to the House on the plans for the location of a large new airport in the Toronto area, a matter which has greatly disturbed a number of people in that area?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I had intended to do it some time ago but in the interest of getting as much involvement as possible at both the municipal and provincial level in Ontario there have been subsequent meetings among various groups. I am awaiting reports from them, and I hope that as a result of these meetings it will be possible for us to get agreement at all levels of government to obtain the maximum amount of disclosure, which is my desire in any event.

STE-SCHOLASTIQUE—DISCUSSION BETWEEN OTTAWA AND QUEBEC

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Transport whether he is in a position this morning to give the House a progress report on his discussions with the Quebec Department of Municipal Affairs with regard to the Sainte-Scholastique airport?

Inquiries of the Ministry

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): There have been preliminary meetings between myself and the Minister of Municipal Affairs of the province of Quebec. These have led to meetings of officials which have been going on during the past week, and I can report happily that they are going very well, amiably and most productively.

Mr. Valade: I have a supplementary question which I should like to put to the Minister of Transport. Is there any question of changing the site or will the site chosen stay as it is?

Mr. Jamieson: The site has been chosen and will stay precisely where it is.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

LENNOX ISLAND RESERVE—
ACCESS TO MAINLAND

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): My question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It relates to a question I asked him on December 5 with regard to inadequate transportation facilities between the Lennox Island Indian reserve and Prince Edward Island. Unhappily, since that time there has been another death involving a young married mother as a result of poor transportation facilities. Since the minister promised to look into the matter at that time, can he inform us as to what immediate steps are being taken for this winter season when there is still a likelihood of further accidents and the dreaded possibility of drownings because of the very unsafe transportation link to the mainland?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the lack of communications between Prince Edward Island and the island where the Indians in question are living. I know that the means of transportation are inadequate, and officials of my department have begun discussions with representatives of the Prince Edward Island government in order to determine whether some improvement would not be possible through the construction of a small causeway or of a bridge, but to date no decision has been reached.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the minister has indicated the right action toward reaching a permanent solution to this problem and I am glad to hear him indicate it to the House. But in view of the fact that it will take at least one year or perhaps two to complete a solid link to the island—and I hope that the causeway will be more successful than the previous one—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon member kindly ask his supplementary question.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I was getting to it. What steps are envisaged by the minister's department for this winter season, and will there be some kind of vehicle provided, which would be better than nothing, as the boat is not able to operate until there is full clearance of ice?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Evidently, Mr. Speaker, this is a very thorny problem and we are endeavouring to make available to the Indians the best means of transportation between that island and Prince Edward Island. However, navigation has always involved certain risks, but I deeply regret the recent drowning. The department officials are doing the best they can to provide the inhabitants of that island with the best possible means of transportation.

INDUSTRY

GOLD MINING—POLICY RESPECTING GRANTS

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether his department has completed its investigation into gold mining operations and is now prepared to make a statement as to the intention of the government in relation to the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act?

Mr. Speaker: I would expect this kind of statement to be made on motions. Perhaps the minister might indicate whether such a statement will be made in due course.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the study is not complete and we are not yet prepared to make such a statement on motions.

HOUSING

CONFERENCE ON USE OF WOOD PRODUCTS IN CONSTRUCTION

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry whether, in connection with the international conference to be held on the west coast having to do with the use of wood products in house building, and because of the very special interest in some cases, it is his intention to invite provincial governments to contribute some members to the Canadian delegation or at least to have them attend as observers?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): The answer, Mr. Speaker, is definitely yes.

POLLUTION

WATER—ANNOUNCEMENT BY U.S. PRESIDENT—INQUIRY AS TO SIMILAR ACTION

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether in relation to the water bill now being considered the minister will soon announce the government's commitment for combating pollution, similar to the action taken by the President of the United States yesterday?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): We do not have a presidential form of government here, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure the announcement will not be made in that way but in the normal parliamentary fashion.

[Later:]

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, in view of President Nixon's statement in his State of the Union message yesterday that he intends to put teeth into the U.S. anti-pollution drive by putting up $10 billion to finance it, does the government intend at the appropriate time, as the minister indicated it might do some time, to announce a comparable provision of money to put teeth into the Canadian bill?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I think there are teeth in the bill.

An hon. Member: False, though.

Mr. Greene: I think there are teeth in the government's anti-pollution and water management policy. I will be very pleased to send the hon. member my speech in closing the debate on second reading. I think he will then be assured—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the minister but I suggest he should not revive the debate which ended yesterday regarding legislation that is before the House at the present time.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Has the minister noticed that these teeth he talks about are nothing but gums and are not working very effectively?

Mr. Greene: I can assure my hon. friend they are not store teeth; they are real teeth.

GRAIN

UTILIZATION OF LAKEHEAD TERMINAL SPACE

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Wheat Board but in his absence I will direct it to the acting minister or to the Minister of Transport. In view of the concern expressed by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool that the Lakehead terminals will not be filled by the opening of navigation and there may not be sufficient stocks of clean grain in a shippable position to take advantage of possible boat loadings, will shipping plans in respect of western grain be reviewed in order to ensure that this situation will not develop?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the premise in the first place. I recall the Minister without Portfolio saying exactly the opposite. I will nevertheless bring the question to his attention when he comes back from the west next week.

TRANSPORT

ATLANTIC REGION—REFUSAL OF CERTAIN TRUCKERS TO REDUCE RATES

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he can indicate to the House what action he is taking with regard to the refusal of trucking firms, other than Day and Ross, to reduce their rates and pass them on to the users of such services in line with the Atlantic Regional Freight Assistance Act?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): In the first instance, Mr. Speaker, the subsidies were paid to the trucking firms because this was the fastest way to get the project in operation. In answer to my hon. friend I would suggest that the trucking firms will get the message that if they do not take action which results in lower costs to users we will quickly find a technique to put the money directly in the hands of the shippers.

JURISDICTION OF PROVINCES IN RESPECT OF RAIL AND TRUCK RATES

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I failed before to ask the Minister of Transport whether he will take an opportunity now or later to clarify the constitutional uncertainty about the capacity of the provinces to act in respect of both trucking and rail rates, and to indicate whether the government intends as a result of meetings to move into these fields?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understand the hon. member is inviting the minister to make this kind of information available to the House by way of a statement. I assume that statement would not be made now.

Mr. Bell: I appreciate your admonition, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister merely indicate that the government may be moving into these fields as a result of these meetings?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker; I expect that we will proclaim part III of the National Transportation Act within a matter of weeks.

POLLUTION

HALIFAX HARBOUR—SOURCE, REMEDY AND COMPENSATION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether his officials have been able to determine the cause of the most recent pollution of Halifax harbour, particularly the eastern side? Have they determined the cause and have there been any penalties imposed on the guilty parties?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as a result of earlier representations by the hon. member I have asked departmental officials to send me a full report on the investigation. I have not received it yet, but as soon as I do I will be glad to pass it on to him.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Government House Leader, on behalf of those of us who have a special interest, whether he would indicate the business of the House for today?

[Mr. Jamieson.]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the business will be as announced last Thursday, namely, the four financial institution bills. While I am referring to this matter perhaps I should also indicate that on Monday and Tuesday of next week we will have the debate which has already been referred to on the motion to set up a joint parliamentary committee on the constitution of which notice will be given later today. On Wednesday of next week it is intended to call the three fisheries bills, the bill to repeal the Deep Sea Fisheries Act, the bill to amend the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act and also the Saltfish Corporation bill, for the purpose of dealing with them on second reading.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, if the House makes sufficient progress today on the financial bills and there is time, will the House leader bring in the fisheries bills, especially Bill C-175?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker. My colleague the Minister of Fisheries will be ready to bring on the package if we do make progress on the financial bills.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, do I gather from listening to the House Leader that the question of Arctic sovereignty has been permanently shelved and talked out by this government?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, Mr. Speaker. We will be bringing forward the legislation referred to in speeches yesterday, and perhaps the question can then be discussed in a more effective way.

TRADE

PRODUCTS DISPLAYED AT FLOATING FAIR ABOARD "SUNRIVER"

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, since the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is sponsoring a seagoing food fair in the Caribbean, which is called a floating fair in the department's press release, on board a ship named the Sunriver, and in view of the fact it contains many samples of Canadian foods and also wines, liquors and tobacco but has apparently very little emphasis on cereal grain products, will he undertake to review the list of products in order to ensure that all possibilities for developing markets for cereal grains will be explored?

INCOME TAX

REBATE TO ASSIST MUNICIPAL TAXPAYERS

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Finance a question.

Will he give favourable consideration to the suggestion of the chairman of the Executive Committee of Montreal, Mr. Saulnier, about granting taxpayers a federal tax rebate in proportion to the municipal taxes they pay, to help them as well as the municipalities?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, not at the present time. Any changes in taxation proposed by the government would be brought forth during the budget in the normal way.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, my question was whether the minister was going to consider a possible rebate in his future budget?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, in preparing a budget one considers a great many possibilities.

Mr. Valade: But not this one.

PENSIONS

RETIRED CIVIL SERVANTS—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING INCREASE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the President of the Treasury Board whether he can tell us that we may expect fairly soon the introduction of the legislation forecast in his welcome announcement of December 19?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think the House Leader will shortly be discussing with his counterparts the legislative program for the balance of the session.

ACQUISITION OF CANADIAN COACHWAYS BY GREYHOUND LINES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, on January 14 I directed a question to the Minister of Transport regarding approval by the Canadian Transport Commission of the takeover of Canadian Coachways Limited by Greyhound Corporation of Chicago. The minister said he would be prepared to read the transcript and decide whether or not the government should exercise the authority it has under legislation to stop the takeover. Has the minister had an opportunity to look into the matter and has any decision been reached?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Not so far as a decision is concerned. Yesterday I obtained a copy of the judgment from the CTC and I will undertake to read it quickly and give an answer probably next week.

GRAIN

MOVEMENT BY RAILWAYS

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Would the minister also pass on to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board the information that many western farmers have no confidence in the ability or willingness of the railroads to move the required amounts of grain in the balance of this crop year?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GREECE—PROTEST RESPECTING TORTURE OF PRISONERS

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Shortly before the Christmas recess I asked the Prime Minister if the government would look into reports by an impartial committee in Europe which indicated there has been systematic torture of political prisoners in Greek prisons, and if this were found to be the case would he consider issuing a protest from the government of Canada. At that time he said he would look into the matter. I wonder whether he has done so.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I did look into the matter and I discussed it with the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is my impression he commented on it in the House since the last time it was raised. If not, I will check to see whether something can be done.

POLLUTION

DUMPING OF OIL AND OTHER WASTE IN GREAT LAKES

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport when the statement he promised on December 5 he would make on the matter of waste and oil pollution caused by freighters in the Great Lakes will be given in the House?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I do not recall having made such a promise. I believe I was speaking of the Brussels conference. I referred to such a statement yesterday. I will make a copy available to the hon. member. He can study it and then if there is some further information he requires he can ask me.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, would the minister be agreeable, with unanimous consent, to table the statement to which he referred yesterday?

Mr. Jamieson: I would be agreeable.

Mr. Speaker: A suggestion has been made that a document referred to by the hon. member for St. John's East mentioned yesterday by the Minister of Transport should be tabled. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, if the minister will look at Hansard for December 5 he will find that he gave such a commitment to a member from Ontario.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

TRUST COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING INCORPORATION, OPERATION AND ADMINISTRATION

The House resumed from Friday, December 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray (for the Minister of Finance) that Bill S-8, to amend the Trust Companies Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, four such bills have been taken off the list of private members' bills and have been transferred to government orders with the result that these companies will be brought under the jurisdiction of the Superintendent of Insurance. This raises a number of points which should be seriously considered by hon. members of the House. Most hon. members did not seriously consider the implications of many bills passed during private members' hour, but I believe there is a considerable role to be played by our financial institutions other than banks or near-banks. I believe the trust companies, small loan companies and insurance companies fall into that category because a large amount of money is held in trust by these various agencies which operate for the Canadian public.

A great deal of this money is never returned to the people whom we feel should obtain the benefits of it. These are mainly the people who have to issue debentures for municipal, provincial or large social capital expenditures. This money in the main has not been available. For this reason we believe the proliferation of trust companies, insurance companies and small loan companies really cuts into the role which I think all Canadians believe should be played by the banking institutions. The role of these companies has not been supervised to the degree certain other financial institutions have been. These companies have had difficulty in getting their bills passed and the government has taken the easy way out and has now provided for their incorporation by letters patent. Therefore the Superintendent of Insurance will have a great deal more responsibility than he had before.

These trust companies have operated under a certain set of regulations. They have been supervised in the past, but when we establish such new companies by letters patent I believe we should give some consideration to the operations of the existing companies and consider whether or not new companies are needed. Nowhere in this bill do I see any power given to the Superintendent of Insurance that would allow him to make such a decision. It is a fact that a small, private trust company is set up it will come back to the Superintendent of Insurance in a year or two asking for an increase in its capitalization. In two or three years it might even be able to afford a $5 million capitalization.

These trust companies have grown at an alarming rate over the years. So whether or not we should incorporate other trust companies becomes very important, considering the role they play in the financial structure of Canada, the role they play in relation to lending institutions and the role they should play in respect of lending money for long-term social capital purposes such as the building of private homes, hospitals and schools. This role has been limited so far as the trust companies are concerned. It is obviously limited as far as the interest return rate is concerned. But there are many fields in which the trust companies have jurisdiction over administration, such as with respect to estates, bankruptcies and business operations run by a third party, where they would be able to invest the large sums of money they have in stable investments.

I am very pleased to note that under the terms of the new legislation we will allow the trust companies to invest in such things as the Industrial Development Bank. We are allowing them to make loans under the terms of the small loans legislation. We are allowing them to make loans to farmers under farm credit legislation. In general we are allowing them to make loans in those fields in which the government assumes some responsibility for the repayment of loans. In this way we are broadening the role of the trust companies.

I am sure there are many Members of Parliament who do not really care one way or another what a particular trust company does. Many of us are not too interested either in what a particular insurance company does. But, Mr. Speaker, we should be concerned about what these companies do in the aggregate. As Members of Parliament we have not been pleased about some things that have happened in individual trust companies and insurance companies. For instance, in my experience Allstate is about as close to being crooked as it could be. People who submit claims to Allstate sometimes find they have to wait four or five years to have their claims settled. This is not generally true of insurance companies. While I am interested in this particular insurance company for that reason, I am more interested in the broad spectrum of insurance companies. The same is true with respect to a trust company which may have mismanaged a bankruptcy. It attracts our attention.

Insurance companies, trust companies and loan companies are playing an increasing role in our society. They affect many people who are not at all involved with estates, the administration of estates, bankruptcies, and the administration of bankruptcies. The difficulty the individual has is in arriving at a reasonable personal role in his relationship with these institutions.

I have mentioned one particular insurance company. I do not think the House should be concerned with the actual methods that insurance companies use, but when a complaint about one company comes to the attention of a Member of Parliament he must wonder if this situation applies to all insurance companies and whether it is not the tip of an iceberg, the tip of one huge problem about which something should be done. I would like to see Members of Parliament become much more interested in the over-all operations of trust companies and in the role they play in the daily life of our communities.

It seems to me that the House is being asked to pass these four bills in order to end a problem that I helped to create. I make no apology for that, Mr. Speaker, even though on a number of occasions we used incorporation bills, and in some cases may have abused them, for a definite purpose. I think our purpose has been accomplished. However, I would not like to see this bill pass without saying that we had no intention of chasing all the financial institutions into the department of the Superintendent of Insurance.

Over the past ten years we have had close relations with the Superintendent of Insurance. I have known very well both of the gentlemen who in recent years have occupied that position and have found them to be very capable people. However, I am well aware of their limitations with respect to staff and organization which may prevent that department from carrying on the type of supervision that, hopefully, people thought would be done when incorporation bills were being examined by Parliament. I know that most members of the House never looked at incorporation bills. In fact the Senate did a heck of a lot more work than the House in supervising incorporations, even though in many cases it did so for the wrong reason, because Senators were to be on the boards of directors of the companies seeking incorporation. Anyway, at least the Senate took a look at incorporation bills, but most members of the House did not stay in the chamber when such bills were being discussed.

I am scared that we are giving the Superintendent of Insurance a responsibility which I think he cannot exercise, a responsibility which I think he does not want, and a responsibility which I do not think we should make him exercise. He will now have to look at these bills in the light of the public good. That is a loose form of wording. We used to have it in most union constitutions. At the end of our meetings when there was nothing else to discuss we wound up discussing the good of the union, found out who were the sick people in hospital, sent them flowers and arranged for somebody to visit them. Maybe we should do that now in terms of some of the financial institutions that will be incorporated through letters patent.

We may quite easily find that another 100 or 200 trust companies will be incorporated. If this happens we will find 100 new offices on Sparks Street. Such companies always seem to have a great deal of money for elaborate offices. You see them giving away little cars or silverware in order to attract new depositors who agree to leave their money on deposit over a long period of time. Each time this happens it means that that much money is not available in the form of normal savings subject to the control of the Bank of Canada.

That money will be spread out over many companies, as is the case now with insurance companies, so that in the end it will be difficult to consider it as savings of the public. It will not be a viable resource which one can spend or borrow against, as can be done in the banks. I wonder who will look after that. In its wisdom both Houses of Parliament used to scrutinize proposed incorporations bills on their merits. Now we are turning them over to the Superintendent of Insurance and giving up our responsibility, and I do not see that this bill provides any protection through powers given to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) or to other ministers who are concerned with financial institutions.

If we say to the Superintendent of Insurance, "It is now your job, you have to supervise this," I think he will be hard pressed to do so, and I think he will be very unhappy trying to do it, although I am sure he will do the best job he can. I think the government should be prepared to write in some protection for the public and provide guidelines for the Superintendent of Insurance by which he can make the decisions that we will now be asking him to make. I have read the bill and I know there are a number of worth-while changes in it. However, I think the philosophic problems of our financial institutions should not become a pawn in my objections to some of the bills submitted in Private Members' hour. I suggest that the minister may find us very sympathetic if he is willing to provide the type of protection that we had hoped for, and were working towards in the Private Members' hour, for trust companies and the public from abuses apparent in the past and that in the future will be multiplied tenfold.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I understand the previous speaker, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) was speaking primarily to item No. 44 on the order paper, resuming debate on Bill S-8. My comments, which will be very brief will be dealing with items 42, 43, 44 and 45, the four financial bills concerning insurance companies, trust companies and loan companies.

In making a general statement which will be applicable to all four items, I might say that these bills are significant and important pieces of legislation. The role of the insurance companies, trust companies and loan companies in the financial and commercial life of Canada is such as to affect every Canadian in his lifetime and is a most important part of the private sector of the Canadian economy. In another sense, however, they are housekeeping bills. The changes that have occurred in the corporate structure, in the organization and in the function of the various kinds of financial houses in recent years, require that we review, revise and up-date our legislation on such companies in the light of these changes and in the light of the relationships between these companies and the citizens.

Basically, therefore, the only principle at issue here is the need for modernization of the laws defining these corporations. The same principle that was applicable to our loan companies and chartered banks is applicable to our general laws on corporations.

All these bills can best be considered in committee where the highly technical changes can be examined with the help of public service officials and private citizens. Generally, these changes can be said to broaden the power of these companies and also the power of government to control the affairs of the companies. It is in this area that we intend to scrutinize these bills thoroughly in committee to ensure that in granting such powers to private industry and government, and in balancing these powers one against the other, the over-all balance is struck in the public interest.

I have one other observation to make, Mr. Speaker, which is irrelevant in the immediate sense I admit, but very relevant to the business of the House. All these bills went through the other place in the last session and at least two of them then appeared on the Order Paper in this House. All of them died before being passed at the close of the last session and this session they had to be reintroduced. It seems to me that some thought might be given to changing our rules to provide that within the life of a Parliament a bill might go over from one session to another, maintaining the place on the order paper in the new session that it had on the prorogation of the previous session.

That is all I have to say at this moment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

LOAN COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING INCORPORATION, OPERATION AND ADMINISTRATION

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister without Portfolio) moved that Bill S-9, to amend the Loan Companies Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I should like to make clear that I did not make use of my right of reply at the end of debate on second reading of the previous matter, and with the accord of the members of the House with respect to the second reading of this bill and the two that follow, I propose to forgo my forthcoming right of reply in order to expedite the business of the House. However, I wish it to be understood that it is my intention to deal with points raised by hon. members when these bills are before the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs for study. At this time, I wish to put on record an outline of the amendments to the Loan Companies Act intended by the bill now before us.

The Loan Companies Act is an act that applies to companies that might be more accurately described as mortgage loan companies. Their essential characteristic is the making of mortgage loans on real estate or the investment in such mortgage loans. The funds for this purpose are raised by the sale of debentures to the public or by the acceptance of deposits. At the present time, there are 12 such companies active in Canada having total assets of about $1.5 billion and liabilities to the public of about $1.3 billion. The extent of their involvement in real estate mortgages is illustrated by the fact that more than 80 per cent of their assets are of this type.

The principal amendments contemplated by this bill fall into four categories. Firstly, the amendments would effect certain changes in the investment powers of loan companies generally in the direction of expanding such powers and bringing them closely into line with powers of life insurance companies. One of the most significance perhaps would be an amendment to enable companies to make investments and loans within their own discretion up to a maximum limit of 7 per cent of the total assets of the company. This corresponds to the so-called basket provision that has been in effect for life insurance companies for some years. There has been a basket provision provided in the legislation for mortgage loan companies but this was limited to 15 per cent of the company's capital and surplus.

Companies would be empowered to invest in real estate for the production of income, not only where the real estate is leased to a company whose stocks are eligible investments, but also real estate that qualifies on an earnings test. Also, the size of individual parcels of real estate that might be purchased would be increased from 1 per cent to 2 per cent of a company's assets. These changes would bring the powers of loan companies into line with those for insurance companies with respect to investments in real estate for the production of income.

The requirement for a minimum statutory margin with respect to collateral loans would be removed and companies could determine their own margin, subject, however, to their having sufficient collateral to cover the amount of the loan on a market value basis.

Companies may now make mortgages subject to the limitation that the amount of the mortgage is not to exceed 75 per cent of the value of the real estate. They may lend in excess of this amount, however, where the excess is guaranteed or insured by a governmental agency. An amendment is proposed that would permit excess mortgages to be made if the excess is insured under a policy of mortgage insurance issued by a registered insurance company.

The power to make investments and loans in corporate securities would be expanded to enable a company to invest in such securities outside Canada in any country in which the company is doing business. A company would be required however to maintain assets in Canada at all times at least equal to its liabilities in Canada. The power of companies to own subsidiaries would be expanded to enable a loan company to operate a loan company subsidiary in a foreign jurisdiction and to incorporate a subsidiary investment company for the purpose of selling mutual fund shares. It would also be able to own subsidiary companies for the purpose of carrying on any business reasonably ancillary to that of a loan company. The power to own subsidiaries would be subject to terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Governor in Council.

The existing prohibition against loan companies making loans on the security of promissory notes would be repealed, thus enabling companies to make consumer loans within the limitation prescribed by the basket provision should they so desire. There has been some interest in this possibility by some loan companies, particularly those in the business of accepting deposits from customers, many of whom have been asking if this kind of loan could be made to them.

The second principal amendment, somewhat related to investment powers, is one that would expand the existing prohibition against loans to directors or officers to prohibit loans to or investments in any major shareholder. Also, loans to or investments in other corporations would be prohibited if a director, officer or major shareholder had a significant interest in that other corporation. These amendments are for the purpose of expanding the existing prohibitions against investment transactions that may involve a conflict of interest on the part of persons who are in a position to control or direct the investment decisions of the loan company.

The third main category relates to changes in the system of supervision and control, particularly with respects to companies that may find themselves in financial difficulties. At present, the minister has power to insert conditions or limitations in a company's licence when it is renewed, from year to year, and he may also withdraw the licence if the superintendent reports that, in his opinion, the assets of the company are insufficient to enable it to continue in business. There is, however, no intermediate step between inserting conditions in the licence and withdrawing it.

The amendments propose that the superintendent be required to report to the minister in any case where he thinks that a company is getting into financial difficulties or where it has exceeded its borrowing limits. The minister would then be empowered to take one or more of three steps. He could impose conditions in the company's licence; he could prescribe a time within which the company would be required to remedy the defect or he could direct the superintendent to take control of the company's assets.

In any case where the superintendent has control of the assets of a company, the minister could request the Attorney General to apply to a court to direct the superintendent to take control of the company for the purpose of its rehabilitation or he could request the Attorney General to apply to a court for an order winding up the company under the Winding-up Act.

Where the superintendent has control of a company for rehabilitation or has control of the assets of a company he would be empowered to assess expenses incurred by him in this connection against other loan companies.

The superintendent would be empowered to take control of a company's assets temporarily in any case where he found there had been an improper accounting of the assets. This could be maintained only for a period of seven days at the discretion of the superintendent. Any longer period would require ministerial authorization.

These changes are proposed with a view to providing a more flexible system of supervision and control in cases where companies are in financial difficulties and where action requires to be taken to protect the interests of depositors and debenture holders.

The fourth category of amendments deals with changes in the system of incorporating companies and amending existing charters. At present, mortgage loan companies may be incorporated federally only by special act of Parliament. Amendments to existing charters may also be made only by special act. The proposed amendments would adopt a letters patent system for incorporating new companies and for amending existing charters. It is also proposed to enable provincial companies to change to the status of federally incorporated companies by a letters patent procedure subject to concurrence of the home province. As in the case of the proposed amendments to the Insurance Companies Act and the Trust Companies Act, the letters patent would be issued by the Corporations Branch of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, subject however to the concurrence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). Investigation would be made by the Superintendent of Insurance in the manner now followed in respect of private bills and public notice would be required in the Canada Gazette for application for incorporation.

The letters patent would be in standard form as provided in the bill, but enough flexibility would be permitted to enable the letters patent to be adjusted to meet special circumstances. In particular, if the persons proposing the incorporation so desired, letters patent could contain restrictions on voting rights or on share ownership. Similar restrictions could be put in the charters of existing companies if the application were approved at a special general meeting of the company and if the Minister of Finance concurs.

The amendments would provide that before a new company can be authorized to transact business it must have a minimum capital of at least $500,000. At present, the minimum initial capital is set in each private bill and thus considered on a case-by-case basis by Parliament.

Apart from the four main categories just described, there are a number of other amendments of significance. I shall touch upon the principal points.

A proposed amendment would require notice to the superintendent in case of a major transfer of shares. This proposes that no transfer of a block of stock in excess of 10 per cent would be permitted until after 30 days' notice to the superintendent including information as to beneficial ownership. Such notice would also be required in cases of transfer of lesser blocks where the result was change of control. This would not grant a veto power to the superintendent or the government but would ensure that supervisory authorities have adequate notice of significant changes in share ownership.

The Governor in Council would be authorized to adopt regulations dealing with the safekeeping of securities and the bonding of directors, officers and employees. It would be intended under this provision to establish procedures designed to improve the care and custody of assets of companies.

At present, companies are limited in the amount of money they can accept on deposit and borrow on the issuance of debentures to a maximum of 15 times their capital and surplus. The amendments would raise this limit to 20 times subject to approval by the Minister of Finance on specific application by the company.

To use words similar to those I used in opening debate on the amendments to the Trust Companies Act, this amendment would make it possible for these companies to make more money available for mortgage lending. An important part of the lending business, as I said with respect to the Trust Companies Act, is in the field of lending for housing purposes. As I indicated with respect to the trust companies, the minister responsible for housing has told me that companies of this type have been contacting him and stressing the importance of approval of these amendments if their mortgage lending is not to be curtailed and if they are to be able to respond to the minister's requests that they allocate more funds for lending for housing.

The present liquidity test would be revised to require companies to maintain a reserve of at least 20 per cent of their demand deposits and debentures falling due within 100 days in the form of federal or provincial securities or cash.

Quarterly reports would be required from companies showing their assets and liabilities in order to enable the supervisory authorities to keep a close check on liquidity and semi-annual reports would be required showing the changes in investments and loans.

It is proposed to insert an age limit of 75 on eligibility to be elected as a director. This would take effect from January 1, 1972 and is similar to a change made in the Bank Act a few years ago.

A number of changes are proposed in the auditing requirements, principally for the purpose of specifying the qualification of auditors. This is made the same as in the Bank Act. The act presently contains a provision permitting companies to issue share warrants, that is warrants enabling the holder to convert the warrant into a registered share if he so wishes. These are not the same as share purchase warrants, since the warrant concept here is one that enables the bearer to have the share delivered to him on presentation of this warrant. This is not used by any company at the present time and would create certain difficulties with respect to the control of transfer of shares to non-residents. It is proposed, therefore, that this be deleted from the act.

Certain changes are proposed in the provisions restricting non-resident ownership with a view to clarifying the wording and providing for the preservation of voting rights of non-residents where these rights were acquired while a company was exempt from the restrictions. The requirements for issuance of preferred stock would be somewhat simplified as would the requirements having to do with the adoption of by-laws. At least three-quarters of the directors would be required to be Canadian citizens resident in Canada rather than only 50 per cent as at present. This change would follow a similar change for the Bank Act and one proposed for the Trust Companies Act.

A number of other amendments are proposed for the purpose of modifying wording and correcting a few administrative procedures. A number of changes would be made transferring certain other discretionary authority from the Treasury Board to the minister as a consequence of some of the reorganization changes within government departments.

Part II of the Loan Companies Act refers to the licensing of British loan companies to transact business in Canada. There are in fact no such companies and this part has not been used for a great many years. It is proposed, therefore, to repeal the part.

I will be pleased to attempt to respond to more detailed questions when the bill is before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. It is considered that approval of this bill, like approval of the bill to amend the Trust Companies Act, will assist in widening the supply of funds available for mortgage lending and will widen the ability of federally incorporated loan companies to provide services to the public as well as widening the degree of protection available to depositors and others who lend money to these companies under federal incorporation and supervision. I ask for the support of the House at this second reading stage of the debate on this bill.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the minister? How does he come to the conclusion, as he did in the last remark he made, that this bill will increase the capitalization available and the rate of expansion?

Mr. Gray: The law provides that companies can seek deposits from the public only up to a certain proportion of their net assets and the volume of loans they make are linked with the deposits they are able to attract. They are loans by way of mortgage. Obviously, when they are as at present approaching or at the ceiling on borrowing from the public, the power that they have to make loans to the public by way of mortgages is thereby limited. If the authority they have under the act to seek deposits is increased, then to the extent they attract deposits, it will follow that their opportunity to make loans to the public by way of mortgage, which is their principal business, will be increased.

[Mr. Gray.]

Mr. Saltsman: I have a couple of questions I want to ask the minister. Is it not equally true that they could increase the amount of money they attract by increasing their capitalization, even under the present legislation? Second, if they are going to attract this extra money to put into mortgages, where is it anticipated this money will come from? Will it be new money that is being created or money drawn from sources now in use?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I think that detailed questions of this type might be better discussed when the bill is before the Finance Committee. I will attempt to respond to them by saying it would appear preferable to follow the pattern that has been used in the past, that is to use the formula whereby the amount of money that they can seek in deposits is linked to a certain number of times their net capital and certain other assets. This provides a greater measure of control by the Minister of Finance because the formula provides a minimum ceiling that can be increased at the discretion and authorization of the Minister of Finance. It is proposed the ceiling be increased from the present discretionary limit of some 15 times up to 20 times.

With respect to attracting funds, these institutions are basically competing with other financial institutions which may not be directing or investing their funds toward quite the same mix of investments. I think if they are better able to compete with other institutions and generally better able to attract savings from the public because of the present pattern of lending by these institutions, it would follow that the funds likely would be put into investments by way of mortgage loans following the presently existing pattern.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, we do not wish to prolong this debate because, as the minister has pointed out, there will be an opportunity of raising some of these questions in committee. The purpose of our questions and interventions has been to point out that there are some very great difficulties involved in this whole matter. To the present, there have not been any satisfactory answers from the government side.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal government has placed a great deal of stress on the need for priorities in carrying on public affairs and in the programs that it presents to Parliament. It has attempted to make a considerable show of its own sense of priorities and to create the image which portrays this sense of priorities. It has also tried to impress upon the public, and other members when they try to get their own way in Parliament, the necessity of making sound rational choices when dealing with public business and public affairs. That is all very fine. Of course, it is like motherhood.

Let us put these particular assertions to the test. Where is the government's sense of priorities in relation to the amending of the Loan Companies Act which is now before us? I point out, Mr. Speaker, that the government has placed this bill ahead of many other far more urgent measures on the Order Paper or which have been announced by the government for introduction at this session. Originally this bill was placed ahead of the Canada water bill for consideration, but that was changed after some opposition interventions in the debate on the four finance company bills. Therefore, the Canada water bill has now passed second reading.

The government has placed this bill ahead of measures to bring about a measure of economic stabilization and in order to ensure that we would not have a considerable unemployment problem this winter. It has placed it ahead of measures to help pensioners, to help veterans and to help distressed groups throughout Canada. I refer to western agriculture, problems of the Maritimes, problems of the cities, unemployment which I already mentioned, and the problems of the Indians and Metis. There are other problems I could also mention.

The government placed this bill ahead of the Canada Development Corporation bill which, of course, is a measure that could be used very effectively, if the government so chose, to deal with some of the problems involved in the large degree of foreign ownership of the Canadian economy. This bill is being placed ahead of the Combines Investigation Act revision which has been announced; the motor vehicle safety bill; the labour code amendments which were supposed to come before us, and other labour legislation. It has been placed ahead of the marketing agencies bill which is important to the agricultural industry as a whole; it has been placed ahead of the revisions to the Canada Grain Act, so badly needed to improve our basic marketing situation, one which has caused a great deal of frustration to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) during the past year. The hon. gentleman seems to be experiencing a sense of frustration at this very moment during my recital of all these items which have been placed lower on the list of priorities—

• (12:30 p.m.)

Mr. Pepin: Not at all, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Burton: This bill has been placed ahead of the co-operatives bill which has been promised by the federal government for years. None of these things has been dealt with during this session so far, but the government has insisted that this bill be dealt with. The loan and trust companies legislation had to go forward. The government felt obliged to satisfy the needs of its friends first; it had to make certain that the financial institutions, who already possess a great deal of power in the economy, obtain even more power and privileges.

There are some curious contradictions in government policy at the moment. On one hand, the government is making a great show of its anti-inflation drive and the need to curb unnecessary spending. It is attempting to set a good example—without any great success, I might say—by following a program of restraint. In the process it is restraining some worth-while and necessary programs. On the other hand, through this legislation, it is increasing the power of loan companies to accumulate funds for further investment; it is giving this extra power to the loan companies whose decisions will be based on considerations of commercial profitability and the corporate well-being of the firms concerned rather than the public good. There is no need to tell members of this House that these two things do not necessarily coincide; it is obvious that the direction of private investment decisions does, in many instances, ignore the public interest in addition to ignoring the government's pleas for restraint. This does not deter the government from proceeding blindly with a bill which will further increase the economic power of these financial institutions. It will certainly have an inflationary effect in present circumstances; it will certainly contribute to the inflationary psychology which government spokesmen have referred to so often as being a major obstacle to be overcome.

These trust and loan companies play an important role in the development of Canada within the framework of our present economy. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics noted recently that in the second quarter of 1969 trust companies increased their investment in mortgages by $125 million to bring their total investments in mortgages at mid-1969 to $2.9 billion. Mortgage companies invested an additional $75 million in mortgages during the same period to bring total mortgage holdings at mid-year to $2.3 billion. It is reported that deposits in credit unions, which are also involved on the total picture of the financial institutions, increased in the second quarter of 1969 by a modest amount. Sales finance companies increased their sales finance paper by $172 million during the quarter bringing total holdings of sales finance paper to $4.7 billion. Mutual funds showed sales of shares to investors amounting to $64 million during the quarter.

As the minister indicated when introducing the bill before us, there are some 12 companies operating under the provisions of this legislation at the present time, and, of course, the Superintendent of Insurance has to report on the activities and financial position of these companies in his annual report. I was interested to learn from the Annual Report of the Superintendent of Insurance for the year 1968 that, as the minister pointed out in his remarks, the total admitted assets at book value of the loan companies in Canada incorporated under federal legislation was slightly more than $1.5 billion in 1968, an increase over 1967 amounting to almost exactly 10 per cent, which is certainly an appreciable one. I was interested to learn also that the two largest corporations which make up the bulk of the total figure are the Canada Permanent Mortgage Corporation, with total assets of some $629 million, and the Huron and Erie Mortgage Corporation, with total assets of some $536 million. There are only two other companies whose assets amount to more than $100 million; the others are relatively small in size, the smallest having assets of only $392,000.

What interested me particularly, looking at the operation of the loan companies, was a table in which an attempt was made to classify mortgage lending on real estate on the basis of provincial distribution. Of a total outstanding at the end of 1968 amounting to some $1,235,000,000, more than $588 million—almost half—was invested in the Province of Ontario. This should be noted in the light of the Prime Minister's criticism of the government of Ontario for failing to take adequate steps to deal with inflation. Perhaps some of that criticism was justified. At the same time, here are these loan companies carrying on their operations in a completely unrestricted way and, of course, we cannot fail to see that there is an extremely high concentration of their mortgage lending in Ontario, the province in which it has been suggested by the federal government that there is the greatest degree of inflationary pressure.

These companies, as we have seen, are able to carry on their operations completely free from the need to pay any regard to considerations of the public interest when making decisions concerning capital investment and spending across Canada. We know very well that much of Ontario has developed into what might be called the industrial heartland of Canada, and, of course, there is a tendency, when there is no restriction on private investment, for an increasingly large proportion of capital investment, particularly private capital investment, to become concentrated within such an area.

Then again, an extremely complex structure develops in time among these corporations and the financial institutions with which they are related. There are many links between these corporations and companies. Looking at the lists of directors of the two largest corporations to which I referred a few moments ago I find that many of these people are businessmen, well-known Canadian industrialists and financial leaders, who have close interests in many other corporations and areas of economic activity centred in Ontario.

There are regulations, now concerning the investments of loan companies. Loan companies may lend money on certain types of security, such as their assets, up to a total of 20 per cent of the value of securities issued by the company. The borrowing powers of the company are also subject to certain regulations. Up to the present time, the company could obtain money for lending purposes by issuing bonds and debentures and certain other securities or by receiving deposits up to an aggregate of the capital stock of the company and the cash on hand.

I was very interested to take note of some of the remarks of the minister who introduced this bill with respect to the expanded investment powers to be granted to loan companies. Again, it seems to me that the unrestricted expansion of these investment powers comes into direct conflict with some of the other enunciated objectives of the federal government in dealing with our present economic situation. The loan companies are to be given the power to invest in real estate. Their borrowing powers are to be extended, and, in addition, amendments are proposed that would facilitate the amalgamation and purchase of similar companies. This of course can lead to a further concentration of economic power in Canada. We also note that the capacity of the company to borrow or to accept guaranteed trust funds is to be expanded from 15 times the excess of assets over liabilities to 20 times that amount. Again, it seems to me that the unrestricted expansion of these powers comes into direct conflict with the federal government's policies and objectives at the present time.

One other item of which careful note should be taken is the matter of interest rates. This matter of course has been the subject of extensive study by the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs Committee of the House. It is likely that they will be bringing their report before the House in the near future. But it seems to me that this legislation should also be considered in the light of interest rates as they affect the Canadian economy. The fact is that there are many businesses throughout Canada which are finding it difficult to finance with the present rate of interest rates, and those people who are in a weaker economic position find the present situation most trying and difficult. The fact is that large corporations, when they find it necessary to go beyond their own internal sources of funds, when they find that the funds that they can generate internally are now inadequate for their purposes and they have to go to the market in order to borrow money, have a very much easier time in many respects in dealing with their problems and in carrying out the necessary financing than people who do not have a large degree of economic power.

The minister gave an outline of some of the changes that are to be made in the legislation, and one of the items to which he made reference was the change to be made in the incorporation of loan companies. This item has already been commented upon in the debate on the trust companies bill, but I think the point should be emphasized again in dealing with loan companies. I think it is inconceivable that we should have, on the one hand, legislation that gives these companies even more powers than they have at the present time while, on the other hand, we take away from Parliament the power to examine their operations and to examine the proposed corporate structures before giving them the authority to carry on their operations within the Canadian economy. As a matter of fact, before letters patent are granted, if I understand the sections of the bill correctly, there is no requirement to disclose who is involved in establishing a new loan company with the exception of listing the five provisional directors. No doubt other information will be elicited when the company attempts to apply for incorporation, but it seems to me that we need to have a great deal more information, we need to have many more checks and controls, before this power of incorporation is taken away from Parliament.

We also find that there are to be changes with respect to the election of directors. We find now that directors can be elected at the annual meeting rather than by ballot of shareholders. This, of course, will further enable certain people and shareholders with large blocks of shares to obtain even greater power within the scope of these companies' operations. One of the provisions that the government will no doubt try to underline in some discussions is that three quarters of the directors must be Canadian residents and citizens. I think this is certainly a very feeble attempt to deal with the storm of protest that is arising concerning the problem of the foreign ownership of many sectors of the Canadian economy. Certainly, it will not deal with the problem adequately.

If I understand the provisions of the bill correctly, the powers of these companies are to be extended with respect to their ability to make investments in foreign loan companies. It seems to me that this is a point of some concern, because in dealing with the problem of foreign ownership in the Canadian economy one of the problems with which we have had to contend has been the considerable leakage of Canadian capital into other countries and away from Canada. Of course, this increases our need to resort to foreign sources of capital in order to bring about an acceptable level of economic development in Canada. Here we are giving these companies more powers to spend Canadian money and Canadian savings abroad than they possessed previously.

Other restrictions are also being removed. I already noted that the lending ratio is to be increased from 15 to 20 based on the excess of assets over liabilities.

There are a few other technical changes which are also proposed in the bill, but it seems to me that this bill, as it is presented by the government, is totally inadequate within the framework of the situation facing the economy at present. I suggest that there are five areas of amendments that apply to this bill, and which I think should be considered by the government, before we can consider this legislation to be acceptable and to be anywhere near adequate to deal with our present problems.

The first requirement is that all financial institutions must be brought under the jurisdiction of the Bank of Canada. Second, we also need to give the Bank of Canada authority to alter the lending ratio of companies. Third, we need to ensure that the public interest is considered adequately by having a government appointee on each board of directors of these companies. Fourth, we should ensure that a certain percentage—possibly 15 per cent, which is one figure to which reference has been made—of the lending and investment funds of these companies be under public policy direction. Fifth, the Bank of Canada should have the power to regulate the rate of return and interest rates.

With respect to the rate of return, I was interested to note in the report of the Superintendent of Insurance that while the paid up capital stock of the loan companies at the end of 1968 amounted to slightly under $45 million, their gross profit during the year—that is before income taxes—amounted to $16,856,000, and that the dividends declared for the year amounted to $7,149,000.

It certainly seems to me that this is a handsome rate of return on the investments shareholders have made in these companies. It seems to me that we need to consider this legislation within the over-all framework of the needs and the problems faced by the Canadian economy at the present time. I have already taken note of the curious set of priorities exhibited by the Liberal government in introducing this piece of legislation ahead of many other items. It seems to me there are certainly some very serious contradictions involved. This represents a great change from the image the Liberal government tried to portray at one time.

Just recently a correspondent in my constituency sent me an advertisement that had been placed in the Country Guide in June of 1944. This advertisement was placed in the Country Guide by the government of Canada. It is entitled in very large letters, "I Had a Nightmare". The text of it reads:

I dreamed that I paid $5.00 for a haircut and $50.00 for a pair of cardboard shoes. I dreamed that we had no wartime controls on prices, profits or wages, and that we hadn't had the sense to organize the distribution of supplies all the way down the line—

I dreamed that because everyone was making more money and spending it, prices were skyrocketing.

—all the stores looked like "fire" sales—with people scrambling to buy before prices went still higher—

—panicky people were buying things they didn't need, and hoarding everything they could get their hands on—

I dreamed that everybody had to fight to get more money—and that in this mad race, wages and salaries were falling behind.

I dreamed the hand of everyone was against his neighbour, with each of us blaming the other fellow for his troubles.

—with everybody for himself—no matter what it cost in the long run—and no matter how it hurt the war effort.

Of course, each one of these statements was accompanied by a very suitable and appropriate cartoon. Then, in large letters again, his advertisement read, "Then—thank goodness—I woke up!" The text went on:

—to realize with relief that I live in a country where things are sane and stable—where the cost of living has been kept within bounds.

—to realize that prices and wages—production costs and selling prices—are inseparably linked together.

—to realize that without the safeguards that have headed off inflation, my nightmare might have become a reality!

—to remind myself that the danger is still pressing and that we must continue to hold firm—and that means everybody must play fair and do his part by not trying to get some temporary, fancied advantage at the expense of his fellow Canadians.

That is the conclusion of the text. Then, at the bottom we find this:

This advertisement is one of a series being issued by the Government of Canada to emphasize the importance of preventing further increases in the cost of living now and deflation later.

The Liberal government has come a long way since that time. I do not think, in many respects, that this has been to the advantage of people in Canada, but that is the type of image the government tried to portray at that time. I am sure some of the ministers opposite must blush now when remembering this type of ad that their own government inserted in newspapers and publications across Canada.

I could go on to discuss some of the very serious problems that face Canada in respect of foreign ownership. Just recently Professor Abraham Rotstein of the University of Toronto, Department of Political Economy, appeared before a committee of this House.

Let me quote from the Globe and Mail of January 21, 1970 as follows:

> Prof. Rotstein noted in testimony before the Commons Committee on External Affairs and National Defence that by 1968, U.S.-based, multi-national corporations had amassed $40-billion in long-term investment in the Canadian economy—80 per cent of the over-all foreign investment.

He went on to state:

> "The volume of U.S. investment is growing at a rapid rate and we can no longer allow the issue to be decided by default on our side."

He goes on to give an even fuller outline of some of the problems faced by Canada in dealing with the problem of foreign ownership and the fact that such a large proportion of Canada's industry, Canada's economy and Canadian resources are owned and controlled not by Canadian people, either publicly or privately, but by foreign interests.

Of course, there is no necessary criticism of foreigners, whether they be from the United States or some other country, for having come into Canada to invest their money, if we allow them to do so and place no restrictions or conditions on their entry to this country or on the manner in which they carry on their operations. We are the ones who are at fault. We are the ones who made the mistake. And we are the ones now who are going to have to correct some of the errors of the past.

It is quite evident in the legislation before us that the government is not prepared to take even the first small step necessary to regain control of our economy. It has been stated by many people from time to time that in the long run Canada will only be an outpost of the United States economic empire if this trend continues. This is a matter that should give us serious cause for concern within the structure and framework of the operations of the United States industrial empire. We will be somewhat comparable to some sections of the United States mid-west or far west. We will be in a situation comparable to some of the New England States where in fact they are falling behind the over-all rate of U.S. economic development.

Of course, if we allow this trend to continue, we will simply be one of the smaller hinterlands; one of the small outposts bound within the framework of this vast industrial structure. Thus, we do have to give serious consideration to this problem. We do have to reverse the trend. I suggest the only way to reverse this trend is through public action and through government action and intervention. The fact is that today it is necessary to take stronger action to deal with this problem and to bring it under control than would have been necessary during the past decade.

I have a few more comments I should like to make on this particular matter. Therefore, I should like to call it one o'clock.

Mr. McGrath: Take all the time you want.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, prior to the adjournment at one o'clock I had spent some time discussing some of the provisions in the bill. I am in accord with the remarks of the minister when he stated that some of the details could be discussed at the committee stage. Of course, there are a number of housekeeping provisions in the bill which can be considered quite adequately at that time. Basically, these are provisions in respect of which we have no objection. Our basic objection to this bill is in respect of the context and framework within which it was introduced. This is the reason I want to place before Parliament our point of view. I am the only member of the New Democratic Party who will take part in this debate on this bill at this time. I believe it is necessary that we place our stand on the record. However, I have no wish to prolong the debate. I understand there is a desire in some quarters of the House to proceed with the debate on the proposed Salt Water Fish Corporation. This, of course, is a measure with which the members of our party are in full accord.

This is one example of orderly planning of our economy and our economic activities. It is very much parallel to the type of thing I have been talking about in respect of this bill; that is, the need for a basic change in the direction of our economy. This is the way we must move. When representatives of the various financial institutions appeared before the committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, I found it interesting that they were unanimous in saying they do not want any controls or any further controls. Why not? From their point of view and the point of view of the profitability of their operations I can understand their saying this, but when they urge this course of action upon the House and the public I become suspicious. It is up to us to decide whether the people of Canada and members of Parliament are to be suckers and follow the line they advocate. I suggest the government is blind to the implication of the policies it is following and which are implied in the legislation before us. No attempt is made to exert any brakes on the growing corporate control of our economy and the growing foreign control of our economy which will affect Canada's future existence. In general, the economy of Canada cannot survive if we do not change our direction.

The economy in the world today is different from the past. A market economy approach is inadequate. The question now is who will manage and control the economy, and is there an alternative to the private corporate control. Is there to be a large measure of foreign control or will influence and control be exerted through government and a variety of other institutions? It is already pretty late in the day. The Barber commission report noted a number of implications in respect of farm implement costs and the control exercised over the farm machinery market. A relentless pressure results from advancing technology which makes it even more easy for larger corporations to obtain an even greater stranglehold on the economy. The government has the power to influence the situation if it has the guts. This bill leads members of this party to the conclusion that the government has no guts when it comes to safeguarding Canada's future welfare. The government is abdicating its responsibilities and the people of Canada will hold it to account for failing to live up to the responsibilities with which it has been entrusted.

Motion agreed, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUGGESTED CHANGE IN ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, before the next item of government business is called I wonder if there might be a general disposition on the part of the House to bring on government order No. 56, which is Bill C-175, an act to establish the Canadian Saltfish Corporation?

• (2:10 p.m.)

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, it was my understanding that there was a disposition to bring on this item after the four bills dealing with the amendment of legislation governing trust and loan companies, as well as insurance companies under federal supervision, have received second reading. I thought the idea was that the measure the hon. member referred to would come forward once this group of four bills had been dealt with by the House.

Perhaps I am in error, but in any event I do not see the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) in his seat as yet. If it is the disposition of the House to proceed with second reading of the bill to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act and the companion bill to amend the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, and hon. members are interested in continuing to restrain their desire to debate to the extent that they have already, I am sure we will this afternoon get to the item in which the hon. member is interested.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING INCORPORATION, OPERATION AND ADMINISTRATION

Hon. Herb Gray (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill S-6, to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act and other statutory provisions related to the subject-matter of certain of those amendments, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put on the records of the House an outline of the amendments to the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, which are intended to be considered through this bill, with a view to providing material which can be the basis for discussions in the Finance Committee. Again, let me say the fact that I am not responding in detail to points raised by hon. members in the course of second reading of this and the preceding bills should not be interpreted in any way as implying that there are not things I have to say to deal with these particular points.

The Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act governs the activities of federally incorporated Canadian insurance companies and of British insurance companies transacting business in Canada. The main part of the act applies to Canadian companies, and most of the amendments in the bill before you relate to such companies. Where appropriate these amendments are also made applicable to British companies subject to the act.

At the end of 1968 there were 129 Canadian insurance companies subject to this act and 68 British insurance companies. In addition, the act applied to 14 fraternal benefit societies. The Canadian companies had assets amounting to about $14 billion at the end of the year, and the British companies had assets amounting to $1.4 billion in trust in Canada to cover their Canadian liabilities.

This bill deals with three principle matters, namely, a change in the system of incorporating new companies and amending existing charters, the establishment of a better and more flexible system of controlling companies that are in financial difficulty, and the expanding and broadening of existing prohibitions against investments and loans where there may be a conflict of interests.

Dealing with the first matter, it may be noted that at the present time insurance companies may be incorporated federally only by special act of Parliament, and as a consequence any change in existing charters must be made by amending the special act. It is noted that because of pressure on parliamentary time in recent years, this requirement has resulted in delays from time to time in the making of decisions with respect to applications for new charters and the amendment of existing charters.

The bill proposes the adoption of a letters patent system of incorporating companies and also a letters patent system for amending charters whether the charters are granted by letters patent or special act. The letters patent would be issued by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) under his seal and office, thereby making use of the existing machinery for this purpose. However, before this could be done, the concurrence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) would be required. This will enable the application to be investigated by the Superintendent of Insurance in the same manner as is followed now where a private bill for this purpose is presented to Parliament.

Companies so incorporated would be incorporated pursuant to the authority granted in this amendment, and would be subject to the Canadian and British insurance Companies Act. This means that although the letters patent would be issued by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs there would be no change in the existing position whereby insurance companies find all their governing legislation under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act rather than under the Corporations Act.

It is also proposed to establish a letters patent procedure whereby a provincially incorporated company can be continued as a federally incorporated company subject to the concurrence of the home province.

Generally letters patent will be in a standard form as described in the bill, but it is proposed to permit enough flexibility to enable the applicants for a charter to provide restrictions on voting rights and maximum limits on share ownership if they so desire.

At present, initial capital requirements for insurance companies are specified in their own acts of incorporation and thus are considered by parliament on a case by case basis. With the proposed letters patent system of incorporation it is also proposed that a minimum capital and surplus requirement be included in the act. The requirement for a new life insurance company would be $2 million, and for a new fire and casualty insurance company would be $1.5 million.

The second main amendments would establish a more extensive and more flexible system to control companies that are in financial difficulties. The present provisions permit conditions to be inserted by the minister in a certificate of registry on renewal, and also provide for withdrawal of a certificate in certain extreme circumstances. The proposed amendments would be more flexible in that they would permit the minister to impose conditions in defined circumstances without waiting for the expiration of an existing certificate. It is also proposed that the Superintendent be required to report to the minister in any case where he considers that a company is in financial difficulties or where its condition is rapidly deteriorating.

The minister, if he concurs in the Superintendent's report after giving the company a chance to be heard, would be able to take one or more of three steps. He could insert conditions in the company's certificate; he could grant the company a period of time to remedy the defect, or he could instruct the Superintendent to take control of the company's assets.

In any case where the Superintendent has control of the assets of a company the minister would be empowered to request the Attorney General to seek a court order requiring the Superintendent to take control of the company for rehabilitation for winding up. In the event of control of the assets or control of a company by the Superintendent, the expenses incurred by him would be assessed against companies registered for classes of business similar to those transacted by the company in question.

In addition, the Superintendent would be empowered to take temporary control of a company's assets in any case where assets are missing or are not properly accounted for.

The third main amendment would bar investments and loans where there might be a conflict of interest on the part of those who are in a position to influence the decision of a company with respect to its investments. This amendment would prohibit investment in or loans to major shareholders in addition to existing prohibitions against loans to officers, directors, and their immediate families. Furthermore, investments in or loans to any corporation would be prohibited if an officer, director or a major shareholder has a significant interest in that other corporation.

This amendment is sought in order to give more protection to policyholders against the possibility of investment decisions being influenced by other interests of persons in control.

Another important amendment would expand the power of life insurance companies to own subsidiaries for the purpose of enabling them to establish mutual investment funds and corporations that might carry on business ancillary to that of the insurance business. This will enable the life insurance companies to expand their services and to establish a reasonable competitive position with certain other financial institutions.

The power of life insurance companies to operate segregated funds would be somewhat expanded to increase the flexibility of this power.

Other important amendments would provide for a modified market value method for valuing securities of fire and casualty companies and would grant authority to Governor in Council to pass regulations dealing with the safekeeping of securities. Provisions would be included requiring a formal audit by auditors having similar qualifications to those under the Bank Act. This has not previously been in the legislation but in practice all companies have followed audit procedures.

[Mr. Gray.]

An amendment is proposed that would require notice to the Superintendent of Insurance of the transfer of ownership of any block of stock of an insurance company in excess of 10 per cent of any transfer of stock that would effect a change in control. This requirement would not confer a veto power on the transfer but would require 30 days prior notice together with full details concerning beneficial ownership.

Mortgage loans with respect to those paid by insurance companies are now limited in any particular case to a maximum of 75 per cent of the value of the property on which the loan is made. This limit may be exceeded at present if the excess is insured through a government agency. An amendment is proposed to permit the limit to be exceeded if the excess is insured through a policy of mortgage insurance issued by an insurance company registered under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act or the Foreign Insurance Companies Act.

Another amendment would effect a transfer from Treasury Board to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) of certain discretionary authority and also from the Minister of Finance to the Receiver General of responsibility for the custody of securities on deposit.

Another amendment would establish an age limit of 75 years on eligibility to become a director of an insurance company. This parallels a similar amendment inserted in the Bank Act a few years ago. An amendment is proposed concerning the restriction on non-resident ownership of shares which would preserve the voting rights of a non-resident if those rights were acquired while a company was exempt from the restrictions. An amendment would change the definition of actuary for purposes of the act to require fellowship in the Canadian Institute of Actuaries. A number of other amendments are proposed to effect changes in wording and changes in a number of administrative procedures.

With respect to British companies, such of the foregoing amendments as are appropriate in the case of non-resident companies doing business in Canada would also be made applicable. In addition, there is a special amendment applicable to British companies in connection with investments of the assets of segregated funds. Segregated funds are established by some companies in connection with the issuance of variable contracts, that is, contracts that provide for a variation in benefits in accordance with the value of the assets in a segregated fund. A proposed amendment would give British companies broader investment powers than at present with respect to the investment of assets in such segregated funds in order to put them in an equal competitive position with Canadian companies. Specifically, they would be able to invest in foreign corporate securities as well as Canadian corporate securities.

In general, the proposed amendments will improve the system of control and supervision of insurance companies for the protection of policyholders. They will also give some expansion in the powers of insurance companies to enable them to better serve their customers in their particular fields. The amendment concerning incorporation of companies and changes in charters will hopefully save parliamentary time and provide a simpler and quicker system for dealing with these matters but one which will continue to require the investigation and recommendation of the Superintendent of Insurance.

The bill also proposes amendments to three other acts. These are, in some respects, consequential upon some amendments that had been proposed to the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. The first deals with the Canada Student Loans Act. It is proposed in the bill to enable insurance companies to make loans that are guaranteed by the government pursuant to the Canada Student Loans Act, the Farm Improvement Loans Act, and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. Amendments were introduced at the current session to the last two of these acts to enable insurance companies, trust companies and loan companies to be designated as organizations that could make such guaranteed loans. It had been proposed to effect a similar amendment to the Canada Student Loans Act through this bill. However, the House will recall that an amendment for this purpose is also contained in the bill to amend the Canada Student Loans Act which was considered before Christmas, and which is now awaiting further consideration here after the committee hearings on it. This bill covers the same area, so when the Finance committee considers it the Committee may wish to make an appropriate change to avoid overlapping.

Amendments are also proposed that would affect the powers of banks subject to the Bank Act and Quebec savings banks subject to the Quebec Savings Banks Act. At present, both chartered and Quebec savings banks may make mortgage loans, but mortgages are limited to a maximum of 75 per cent of the value of the real estate where the mortgages are other than the National Housing Act mortgages. An amendment is proposed in this bill that would enable chartered banks and Quebec savings banks to make mortgage loans in excess of the 75 per cent maximum where the excess is insured under a policy of mortgage insurance by a registered insurance company.

I, therefore, ask the support of this House for this Bill at this second reading stage.

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, the legislation before us in the form of Bill, S-6, concerns amendments to an act governing the British Insurance Companies Act. The amendments are both technical and detailed. It is my feeling that we can hardly deal with the details of this proposal without first taking a look at them.

I note that this bill has, among its many parts, reference to insurance against accident and death and it also deals with other than life insurance. But, Mr. Speaker, I intend to speak for a few moments today on a phase of insurance which presents the greatest problem and frustration to Canadians.

Car insurance has been well described elsewhere as a service with 120 million dissatisfied customers. Indeed, this very week in the House there have been proposals from members on this side that the government should investigate the continual increase in car insurance rates. A few days ago the hon. Leader of my party, the New Democratic Party, raised a question with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) as to what consideration was being given to intervention in the car insurance field with the idea of setting up car insurance as a federally operated business.

I should like to put a few points on record now that we have this insurance legislation before us. In my opinion, car insurance is an integral part of the over-all national picture with regard to traffic safety. I say this because we have 150,000 traffic casualties a year in Canada, including no less than 5,000 fatalities. This means 100 Canadians are slain every week. The economic toll of highway traffic injuries and repairs amounts to about $1 billion every 12 months. Of this $1 billion, car insurance costs about $600 million. That is the amount Canadians spend every 12 months to protect themselves from the war on the highways.

Regarding car insurance premiums, of every dollar spent Canadians recover only about 67 cents. I think that one of the first matters which the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs should investigate in the field of insurance is car insurance rates. In my mind there is no doubt at all that the importance of car insurance goes far beyond the realm of private profit and that it should, as are car licence and traffic regulations, be handled by the public for the benefit of drivers and pedestrians.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I quote briefly from a recent Canadian press story that deals with the insurance business in Saskatchewan. It says that the Saskatchewan government's insurance plan has never lost money since its inception in 1946. The plan was passed in the Saskatchewan Legislature by the CCF, predecessor of the NDP. In 1968 the surplus for that year was over $150,000. At any rate, a great surplus has been accumulated since the plan began in 1946. The present Minister of Highways in the Liberal government of Saskatchewan, Dave Boldt, is no supporter of the NDP, I am sure; but he stated recently that the insurance office pays its own taxes and grants and that private insurance firms in Saskatchewan have been asked but have never tried to submit a better plan. Before resuming my seat, I urge the government to examine all matters pertaining to car insurance rates and to see whether there is a possibility of operating the car insurance business under some sort of federally established agency.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, some comments I made on an earlier bill also apply to insurance companies. I was most interested in the changes the minister outlined, and I agree that most of those changes are worth while. But he has not touched on the major problem of ensuring that moneys accumulated by Canadian citizens in the form of insurance, and held by insurance companies, shall be used for the advantage and benefit of Canadian citizens. Insurance companies hold vast sums of money which has been contributed by Canadian citizens, and unless this money is used for the benefit of, and to the advantage of, Canadians we cannot really say that insurance companies in this country are acting as agents of the Canadian people or in their best interests.

There are incorporated in this country under federal or provincial charters probably between 1,000 and 3,000 insurance companies, many of them operating in exactly the same fields as other companies. I think the minister will agree when I say that there seems to be little competition in this field. Many different companies provide the same type of insurance. It seems that every time a new company is incorporated you see less rather than more competition in the insurance field. Why do I say that, Mr. Speaker? Let me explain.

If there were two insurance companies in the country, both offering the same kind of insurance, you could go to Company A or Company B, and their rates would be competitive. But when you see a proliferation of companies, all involved in the same basic field, it seems that those companies join together and set rates. There is nothing the insurance buyer can do about it. Their rates appear to be exactly the same. When I go to my insurance agent and want to buy fire insurance, he opens the drawer in which he keeps the files of 50-odd companies. He appears to have some kind of unwritten agreement with those companies under which he will work through his files from front to back and, when he has reached the back of the drawer, return to the file in front. Some buyers of insurance will be interested in what happens to their insurance premiums although most will not, being only interested in buying an insurance policy. Frankly, it does not matter to me with which company the agent may place my insurance because the rates are all the same, as are the benefits.

Insurance companies in this country do not insure us against all risks. By that I mean if you want to buy insurance to cover a unique risk, you will have to go to Lloyds of London. If you plan on holding a large outdoor barbeque and want to insure against the possibility of rain, you will have to go to Lloyds of London because no Canadian company will accept the risk. Our insurance companies may say that they are willing to provide coverage against all sorts of new risks that arise, but they do not do that.

The government also has the obligation of informing the Canadian public what insurance is really essential. It must to some extent help to change the public's attitude towards insurance. With the advent of social benefit programs, the Canada Pension Plan and other pension plans, certain types of insurance have become less and less valuable. The government must tell our people just what is the role of the insurance industry, and what the role of the private entrepreneur in this field is. I say that because in this country we seem to be working at cross purposes. Let me cite an example, Mr. Speaker.

A few years ago a man working in a northern mine died and left a widow who was either 46 or 47 years old and two children aged 13 and 14. He left her an insurance policy worth $5,000. What happened? She could not obtain mother's allowance because she had too much money; also, because she had too much in the bank she was not eligible for certain social security benefits. She was told to use up her $5,000. That is what she did; as a matter of fact, her money will run out this month. In the meantime, her kids have grown up. They are beyond the age at which she will be eligible for mother's allowance. That $5,000 did her no good. If she had not had it she would have been eligible to receive benefits under provincial and federal schemes; she would have received additional allowances for her children and, after her children were grown up, no doubt would have been eligible to receive further benefits under welfare schemes.

As things now stand, she will have to apply for municipal welfare. Clearly, that $5,000 has been subtracted from that family's standard of living. By that I mean, Mr. Speaker, that if the husband had not left this $5,000 insurance policy his wife and family would not have had to forgo forms of social assistance which would have been available to them. The wife therefore lost both ways; she lost while the husband was saving to pay the premiums on the policy, and she lost after he died because the $5,000 precluded her receiving the benefits I have mentioned. Clearly, the needs of our people in a changing society are different and I should think that any insurance agent who tries to sell endownment policies is not being quite fair.

While there is still a great need for term and other insurance, the government, having gone into this matter, has an obligation to relate what they do in that field to the whole field of insurance. The minister is very interested in protecting shareholders. He is also interested in protecting loans and in having them secured. If you have money that you can invest in an insurance company you do not have to worry because having stock in an insurance company is the same as being able to print money.

What about the people who have to be protected? My colleague mentioned the matter of automobile insurance. Is it not time this government looked into the field of automobile insurance, at least to the extent of taking a look at third party liability automobile insurance? If two cars are involved in an accident and a pedestrian is struck, it cannot be said that the pedestrian had anything to do with the accident. He was merely a third party. The government should make it mandatory for everyone to carry this third party liability insurance. They may not be interested in protecting the vehicles involved, but innocent third parties should be protected.

In many fields we have not given any consideration to these people, but have left this up to the insurance companies. Some automobile companies have been autocratic. I wish to refer to one. When I mentioned the name of Allstate Insurance this morning I was asked if I was being fair. I wish to refer to two letters and let members judge whether I am being fair. They raise a problem not dealt with by the minister in this bill. This is the problem. If an insurance decides it does not want to pay, it says to the customer, here is your money back; you are no longer insured with us and you were not insured at the time of the accident. However, there is legislation to the effect that the company has a partial liability if it cancels a policy.

Mr. Osler: Will the hon. member permit a question? I am not quite sure to what the hon. member is alluding, but is it not a fact that insurance companies have to give so many days statutory notice by registered letter before cancellation?

Mr. Peters: That is not correct, Mr. Speaker. I will read the letter because I think it explains the situation better than I can. If you have carried insurance with a company for a period of time it is true they must give you 30 days' notice of cancellation. It can be cancelled for many reasons. It can be cancelled on moral grounds.

Some hon. members will recall the famous cow case which was discussed at great length for a number of years. The government had a problem with a certain farmer. This farmer fought back in many ways, including threatening the health of the then Minister of Justice. After reading some of these reports, the insurance company decided to immediately cancel the insurance on the farmer's barn. The usual 30 days' notice was not given because the policy was being cancelled on moral grounds. The policy was eventually reinstated because the company did not have the right to do this.

The argument of the insurance company was that the farmer was going off his rocker and, as a result, might burn his barn. This could have been a possibility. However, the barn could also have been struck by lightning or children could have set it on fire. The risk was no greater then than it had been the day previous. The Superintendent of Insurance eventually forced the company to reinstate the policy.

Mr. Osler: May I be permitted to ask another question? Why was the Superintendent of Insurance permitted to do so? It seems to me the only grounds he would have for action would be the statutory conditions in the policy to which both the company and the man who held the policy subscribed at the time the policy was issued. It is a formal contract. Those statutory conditions will vary from province to province, but in the cases of which I have heard relating to automobile insurance, which is what the hon. member is talking about at this time, there is a condition that a registered letter must be sent so many days prior to cancellation. If not, I suggest any province that has been so lax in its duty should be checked up on that subject.

Mr. Peters: This is probably true, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Osler: I know it is true. I was in the business for 30 years.

Mr. Peters: The member says he knows it is true because he was in the business for 30 years. I presume he represented somewhere between 1 to 50 companies. I am not referring to all insurance companies at this time because they do not all react in the same way. Most contracts are standard. The agent buys the form and goes into the insurance business, but they do not all act in the same way.

Mr. Osler: That is why you need a broker, not an agent.

Mr. Peters: That may be true. Possibly we should get rid of the agents. I am only dealing with the problem as I know it. I do not even know the name of the company with whom I have my fire insurance. I pay a premium once every three years, and that is all I know about it.

I own an old building on the highway, a former school. It has become an eyesore. It does not have much value, but it would be expensive to tear it down. When I purchased this school from the school board I felt I should insure it because I was of the opinion that if you owned something of value it should be insured. I spoke to my insurance agent about this. I suggested he decide the amount for which the building should be insured and the premium. He said he would not insure it because if it burned down, then people would say that I burned it down and there would be a lot of trouble. He advised me not to insure the building. I have had the building for ten years now and it still is not insured. Individual circumstances have a great deal to do with what happens.

I wish to quote from a letter written in 1969 to the Superintendent of Insurance in Toronto. I quote:

> In August 1953 I was involved in a two car accident on Highway 11, just south of Trout Creek, Ontario. The other car was driven by a Mr. Archie Haggerty of Aitikokan, Ont., and he had as a passenger his sister-in-law, Mrs. Nellie Haggerty of Kirkland Lake, Ontario. Some time after this the plaintiffs wrote to me through their lawyer, Mr. G. Wallace of North Bay, asking for an out of court settlement of $35,000. Allstate Insurance with whom I carried a P.L. and P.D. policy for $100,000 sent a "very friendly" man around to see me and get me to sign statements. Soon after this I received a cheque from Allstate Insurance for the full amount of the premium that I had paid, with a statement to the effect that they were not covering me since I had made a false statement when I applied for the insurance.
> I immediately contacted a lawyer, Mr. P. B. C. Pepper of 320 Bay St. Toronto. Mr. Pepper told me that I should have talked to him before talking to the adjuster. Mr. Pepper then told me that he would send the cheque back to Allstate and that as far as I was concerned there was no false statement. Also he said that the insurance company was bound by law to pay a basic $11,000, the amount that the Unsatisfied Judgment would otherwise have paid at that time, if I had carried no insurance.
> I had bought insurance from Allstate when they first came to Canada, with Simpson Sears. There was a front page news article in the Toronto Star telling of Allstate selling insurance at large discount prices. People were lined up in Simpson's basement and the salesmen were filling out the forms as quickly as possible. When asked if I had been involved in any accidents I mentioned them, they were minor accidents. In the rush I forgot to mention a small accident for which I was not to blame, but for which we had settled 50-50 on the advice of the insurance company with whom I was insured at the time. Since the accident occurred in Sudbury it would have been more expensive to pursue the case than to fix the car.
> Allstate then appointed a lawyer, Brendan O'Brien Q.C., 101 Richmond St. West, Toronto. They also had a Toronto doctor in Court in North Bay, where the action occurred in 1955, to testify that the injuries sustained by the plaintiffs would not leave any permanent disabilities. Before I took the stand in court Mr. O'Brien made a statement to the effect that I had no reason to conceal the truth in my evidence since I was fully insured with Allstate.

Incidentally, he was Allstate's lawyer.

The judgment was for $19,400 against me. I was sure that Allstate would pay that amount. Mr. Pepper did not attend this court hearing. He told me that it would not be necessary since he was sure the lawyer for Allstate would work as hard as possible to keep the amount of judgment as low as possible.

I do not remember hearing anything more of this case until 1957. At that time the plaintiffs sought to have me examined as a judgment debtor. Mr. Pepper appeared in court and refused to have me examined on the grounds that I was insured and that the insurers had paid a sum of money into court and that the plaintiffs accepted that sum of money. I found out through my present lawyer, Mr. Dalton Dean, Q.C. of Haileybury, Ont. that the plaintiffs sued Allstate some time after the court judgment case, and according to Mr. Dean were given some $11,800 as partial payment.

The next time I heard from Mr. Pepper was by letter about the end of 1958. He said 'it is almost a year now since I last heard from the plaintiffs' and he believed in letting sleeping dogs lie. He enclosed his account at that time. Mr. Dean has that letter.

The letter continues:

I heard nothing more about the matter. Actually I had forgotten the whole thing. But last August the sheriff from the Haileybury court came here to serve me with a paper to appear at a special examiners court as a judgment debtor. I was attending a teachers' course in Toronto at the time. My wife called me there and I attempted to see Mr. Pepper.

The letter goes on to describe how he was served with papers to appear for examination and so on. It ends:

I feel I was not fully informed of all facts and was misled. I also think I should have been a party to the court action taken against Allstate, since the judgment was against me. Now Mrs. Haggarty's lawyer says that the amount of money paid into court was accepted as partial payment. But according to Mr. Pepper's letter of January 6, 1958 they accepted moneys paid into court by the insurers—no mention of partial payment.

A friend who is an insurance adjuster suggested I write to you for advice. He could not believe such a case could develop until I mentioned the word Allstate. I am enclosing some of the correspondence concerning the case.

A considerable amount of correspondence was enclosed. I raise this matter now because it is typical of three or four cases of a similar nature which are brought to my attention every year. The Superintendent of Insurance can become involved—I agree he has some say—but these cases always raised problems after an accident had occurred. After an accident has occurred, a company will often say: We cancelled your insurance on moral grounds, or because of a false statement, or because of an omission to supply certain particulars; here is your money back; you are no longer insured. When this happens, of course, it is difficult, if not impossible, to be insured with anyone else.

I remember that when Allstate came to Canada I applied for insurance with them. They were inviting applications, but they sent them all back with the comment: We cannot accept your application for insurance because you live in northern Ontario. They were really saying that they did not intend to insure anyone in northern Ontario. The difficulty is that having received a letter of this kind from Allstate, it becomes much more difficult to get insurance from another company. We have been supervising this insurance field as well as we can, I suppose. It is, of course, essential that every driver should be insured. It is essential that everyone who drives a car should know that the other guy has satisfactory insurance. So, insurance will have to be compulsory. It may be that the federal government should enter the field of automobile insurance at least to the extent of reinsuring motorists. It might set up some agency which would make possible the balancing out of car insurance costs across the country. This is an essential service and members of Parliament should interest themselves in this idea in order that we might devise some sensible solution to a vexing problem.

The decision has been made to impose safety standards in connection with the manufacture of automobiles and it is my hope that this principle will be applied to snowmobiles as well. Since in so many cases the requirement to be adequately insured is mandatory, I believe arrangements should be made for insurance to be provided at a reasonable price to all.

It is my opinion that the committee should take a close look at some of the difficulties which have arisen in the insurance field, bearing in mind certain of the judgments which have been handed down. No doubt the difficulties to which I have drawn attention are capable of solution. Some companies do not create these difficulties. Others do, yet all these companies are covered by the same legislation. Changes could be made to eliminate the unfairness against the individual which is sometimes shown. I hope the minister will discuss with the Superintendent of Insurance some of the steps which could be taken to make the provision of insurance much more equitable. As I say, insurance is, in most cases, mandatory. Most of us cannot dispense with it. We should therefore be able to carry satisfactory insurance at the lowest possible cost and with the least possibility of abuse.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING REGISTRATION, OPERATION AND ADMINISTRATION

Hon. Herb Gray (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill S-7, to amend the Foreign Insurance Companies Act be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: This bill might be considered as a companion to Bill S-35. It is applicable to foreign insurance companies transacting business in Canada on a branch basis.

The effect of the act is to apply the same requirements to foreign companies as are made applicable to British companies pursuant to Part VIII of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. The amendments proposed in Bill S-7 are in every respect parallel to those made applicable to British companies pursuant to Bill S-6. They represent, therefore, appropriate adaptations of the amendments proposed in connection with Canadian companies, supplemented by an expansion of investment powers in connection with the operation of segregated funds in order to give foreign companies the same powers in this respect as Canadian companies.

The important amendments are those which expand the power to operate segregated funds and give greater and more flexible control to the Superintendent in the case of companies which are in financial difficulty. These would enable the Superintendent to take control of the company's assets in Canada on direction by the minister and would enable application to be made to a court for authority by the Superintendent to take control of the company's business in Canada for the purpose of its rehabilitation or winding up.

Changes in the investment powers of Canadian companies would be paralleled in this act by changes in the types of assets which may be held in Canada to cover Canadian liabilities.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

[Mr. Peters.]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We will now proceed to government order No. 17, second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry of Bill C-133, an act to repeal the Deep Sea Fisheries Act.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUGGESTED CHANGE IN ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Would the House agree to proceed with government order No. 56, second reading of Bill C-175, an act to establish the Canadian Saltfish Corporation? I will tell you the reason for making this request, Mr. Speaker, before the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gray) jumps to his feet.

There is urgency in getting this bill on its legislative way, because it is now January 23 and the industry is almost in a state of suspended animation pending the consequences that would flow from this legislation. I can assure hon. members that there is urgency attached to getting this bill out of the way and I ask that the House consent to dealing with it now. Hon. members might also be willing to give unanimous consent to forgoing private members' hour, thus allowing us two full hours for debate of the bill.

Mr. Anderson: I oppose that suggestion, Mr. Speaker. There are three bills coming forward in a certain order. We certainly have time available this afternoon, and I hope it will be possible to pass all three before five o'clock. The other bills are of equal importance to some hon. members, and I object to changing their order.

Mr. McGrath: Where is the minister?

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

DEEP SEA FISHERIES ACT

PROVISION FOR REPEAL

Hon. Herb Gray (for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry) moved that Bill C-133, to repeal the Deep Sea Fisheries Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We will now proceed to item No. 18 on the order paper, second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry of Bill C-134, an act to amend the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUGGESTED CHANGE IN ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, but you moved so fast on Bill C-133 that I did not have time to make some comments on it.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, I think it is only logical that we should wait at least a moment or two until the minister gets here.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not know whether I can do very much about what has happened, but I am certainly prepared to follow the wish of the House.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. A short time ago the minister was in the House until the luncheon adjournment at one o'clock. His parliamentary secretary was also here for most of the sitting. Both hon. gentlemen are absent from the House, notwithstanding the fact that these three important bills are up for discussion. I think the minister should be here.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The minister has just arrived. Bill C-134 has been called.

Mr. Crouse: No, Mr. Speaker, we have not yet had an explanation for bringing Bill C-133 before the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have followed the traditional procedure, long established in reading the title of the bill and calling for its approval or otherwise of this House. No hon. member rose at the time, and I am afraid the matter is disposed of.

Mr. Crouse: I then ask that the matter be not disposed of at this time, because to some 11,000 fishermen on the east coast it is a very important matter. The Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) was not in the House at the time and no explanation was given for introducing the bill in this manner. I submit that the House is entitled to an opportunity to comment on the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. There is, of course, an avenue open to the House at the moment. If all members of the House give unanimous consent, the House can revert to an earlier point in our proceedings. This matter is entirely up to the House. So far there has been nothing untoward with the procedure we have followed. On the suggestion of the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse), I am prepared to put the question to the House to revert back to a previous item of business, but it would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is it so agreed?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Crouse: The Minister of Fisheries and Forestry cannot move the motion; he was not in the House to give an explanation of this particular measure.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I can clarify the matter. Bill C-134 has been called as the next order of government business. I am about to put that motion, which is the standard practice. I will put the motion unless there are points of order, which I am prepared to hear points of order on this question. If it is a question of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) commenting on the bill, perhaps that matter can be raised when the motion has been put. That seems to me to be the correct procedure.

Mr. Monteith: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would have thought the minister would have comments to make on Bill C-133.

An hon. Member: It was passed by the House and has now gone to the committee.

Mr. Barnett: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, relating to the business of the House. Earlier today the government leader announced that three bills concerning fisheries matters were to be dealt with next Wednesday. Then, as I understood it, one of the members from Newfoundland raised the question that if the finance bills were dealt with today, we might proceed with Bill C-175.

I may have misunderstood him, but at that point agreement was indicated by the government House leader who said that if the finance bills were completed we could proceed with Bill C-175 today. No reference was made to dealing with the other fisheries bills. Perhaps this is the reason for the confusion which appears to have arisen. Apparently, just before I came into the House one of the three fisheries bills was dealt with and passed without debate. Some of us were not aware that these bills were going to be passed and were caught off balance on this account.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on the point of order which has been raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett). As I recall the sequence of events, this morning a request was made by members of the opposition to take up the fisheries bills, and it was stated by the House leader that if the House were to dispose of the financial bills we would be in a position this afternoon to move on to the fisheries bills standing as items Nos. 17, 18 and 56 on the Order Paper. The financial bills were disposed of, and item No. 17 on the order paper was called. That bill was passed without debate. It was called while the minister was in the House and it was passed without debate and sent to the committee.

Mr. Peters: The minister was not in the House then.

Mr. Deachman: The House then moved to order No. 18, in logical sequence, and that is the bill we are taking up now. With regard to the protest against the passage of Bill C-133 without debate, there is nothing in our rules that calls upon us to debate a bill if the House agrees to carry it, which is what the House did.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have dealt with that matter and I do not think we can do other than what I attempted or do on behalf of the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse), namely, seek the unanimous consent of the House to revert to where we were in respect of the business of the House. That request was rejected by the House, so there is no question of discussing Bill C-133 now. If there is any question about our order of business at this point, and there is discussion in which the House would like to engage, I am prepared to allow some latitude. But as hon. members know, the government has the prerogative of calling the order of business.

From time to time the order of business is negotiated between the House Leaders. As I understand it, unless a member of the government is prepared to say something to the contrary, the government has called Bill C-134. It seems to me that the only course of action available to the Chair at this point is to put the motion, and if there is discussion arising out of it that would be the normal procedure. I do not see that I am entitled to do anything other than put the motion. Does the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) wish to rise on a point of order?

Mr. McGrath: Just to set the record straight, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) was substantially correct in the point of order he raised. I did specify in my request that the House deal with government order No. 56. I went on to state that government order No. 56 was in fact in reference to Bill C-175. There was general agreement by the government to that proposal. The government is now trying to pull a fast one on us. That is substantially what has happened.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think at this point I must put the motion that has been called by the government.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Crouse: Yes, I am rising on the point of order that has been raised. The hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) in his earlier comments agreed that following the passage of the business for this afternoon we would deal with the Saltfish Corporation, Bill C-175.

I think if Your Honour will check the record he will find that this was the understanding given hon. members by the hon. member for Windsor West in reply to questions that we raised earlier in the day about the order of business.

The passing of Bill C-133 without debate was totally unexpected. I submit that Your Honour moved in a manner that did not give us an opportunity to comment on that bill.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I am speaking on the point of order. The minister of Fisheries was not in the House at the time; neither was his parliamentary secretary. There are 11,000 fishermen in Atlantic Canada who would like to know why this fishing bounty is being removed without just cause. Those of us who represent these fishermen would like to express on the floor of this House our views regarding the arbitrary manner in which this measure has been brought forward.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Crouse: There has been no explanation by the minister and no chance for us to debate the proposal.

An hon. Member: You got up too late.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: You were not listening.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Crouse: We were listening to the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gray) who agreed to deal with Bill C-175.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gray) rising on the same point of order?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Newfoundland—

Mr. McGrath: For St. John's East, and it is pronounced "Newfoundland." It rhymes with "understand."

Mr. Gray: I am glad the hon. member has said that because I feel he will now be able to follow the point I am trying to make in what I hope is a conciliatory fashion. When I responded to the first point I was not aware that there was a series of three bills on the Order Paper, one after the other, dealing with fisheries matters. I was not aware of the exact sequence.

It was not my intention to suggest to the House that it necessarily proceed with order No. 56, a measure to establish the Canadian Saltfish Corporation, before the other two. I regret that I may have given that impression, but it was not based on a complete recollection or understanding of the state of the Order Paper. Perhaps this is why there is some difficulty or misunderstanding. If I contributed to that misunderstanding, I certainly apologize.

With respect to these bills, I appreciate the desire of hon. members to say something about these two measures which precede the one on the Canadian Saltfish Corporation. On this, however, I can only refer hon. members to the consideration by my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis), and other hon. members of the House as well as the considerations raised by the Chair in respect of the rules.

Mr. Comeau: Mr. Speaker, every time we try to save time, we waste time. I wonder whether the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) would have any objection to our dealing with Bill C-175. Perhaps we could dispose of it this afternoon with co-operation from this side of the House. Perhaps we could waive private members' hour and deal with Bill C-134 next week, or this afternoon if there is time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair is in a rather difficult position. All I can do is proceed with the item that has been called. That is the limit of my responsibility, and that is as far as I am prepared to go. If the government wants to change the order of business, that is its prerogative under the Standing Orders. Unless I am advised to the contrary or am given evidence to the contrary, I shall put the motion that has been called.

Mr. Davis: Perhaps I should say a word, Mr. Speaker. My understanding all along was that the bills would proceed in the order in which they appear on the Order Paper, namely, Bill C-133, Bill C-134 and Bill C-175. I see no reason for changing that order now. These matters will be going to a committee of the House of Commons, on which hon. members of all parties will be represented. The bills will then return to the House. If hon. members have any questions or want any further elaboration or modification of the bills in any way, they will have ample opportunity to express their views.

Mr. McGrath: Do without the House of Commons altogether; that is what you are asking.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Crouse: Are we on Bill C-134?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am about to put the motion called by the Table, Bill C-134.

Mr. Crouse: I wish to speak on Bill C-134.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When I put the motion I will recognize the hon. member.

Mr. Crouse: This is what happened in respect of Bill C-133; we did not get a chance to speak on it.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

COASTAL FISHERIES PROTECTION ACT

INCLUSION OF SERVICE AND SUPPLY VESSELS

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry) moved that Bill C-134, to amend the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

He said: Mr. Speaker, like the preceding bill this measure involves a very minor change in our fisheries legislation. This act will include in the definition of fisheries vessels, supply vessels. The main concern here is to ensure that fisheries supply vessels, for example those supplying large Russian, Japanese or East German fishing fleets, will come under the same scrutiny as other fishing vessels when they come into our Canadian fishing ports.

I know there is real concern, in a number of our east coast ports, notably St. John's, Newfoundland and Halifax, Nova Scotia, that this amendment to the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act will limit the access that foreign fishing fleets have to our ports and cut off, therefore, that business in respect of supplying foreign fishing vessels on our east coast. This is not the case.

There is no intention, nor has there ever been, of cutting back on this important source of livelihood of many people, particularly those at our east coast fishing ports. We do have a problem, and the reason for this legislation relates to that problem on Canada's west coast. It is possible for supply vessels to come into the port of Vancouver, for example, and leave again without in any way coming under the provisions of our Coastal Fisheries Protection Act.

If we have the authority to exclude such vessels, and we may or may not exclude them, we will then have a bargaining lever we can use with Russia and other countries which operate large fishing fleets, much as the United States now has. The bargaining lever is this, "If we allow you to use our ports to obtain fresh water, fuel and food, we want you to stay off certain fishing banks which you have already overfished," and so on. We do not have this lever on the west coast at the moment, but we would like to have it.

I repeat that the bill is not designed to in any way reduce the service functions provided by many of our east coast communities, but is designed to give us some leverage in bargaining with foreign fishing fleets on the west coast. Were we to endeavour to limit our supply function on the east coast, we would be exposed to the danger of foreign fishing fleets moving on, for example, to St. Pierre and Miquelon. We would be vulnerable in that respect. We think the best thing is to leave our east ports open to perform this supply function. I hope hon. gentlemen on both sides will realize this is a relatively minor issue. We are proposing an amendment, a minor amendment to an important act which governs the action of large foreign fishing fleets off our west coast.

[Mr. Davis.]

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the explanation given by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) in outlining the reasons for the introduction of Bill C-134, to amend the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act. Although the wording of the bill is very brief, its application will have a considerable effect on a large number of people and at the same time will establish a new concept in international relations.

In my view this action to amend the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act is nothing more than a government move without any principle. This is simply another piece of window-dressing, a piece of paper which is designed to confuse and delude the public into the belief that the government is doing something and is taking swift and stern action to protect the fisheries resources on both coasts. Nothing could be further from the truth.

This type of action is not new to this government. We heard the same thing away back in 1964 when the then Secretary of State for External Affairs was speaking on a bill to establish Canada's Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act. Upon the passage of that legislation the government promised the immediate establishment of geographical co-ordinates along our coasts and the drawing of base lines protecting our shores and sealing off the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the Bay of Fundy as conservation areas for the development of our fishery resources.

No one could make promises in more convincing tones than the Hon. Paul Martin, then Secretary of State for External Affairs. On May 20, 1964, as reported at page 3409 of Hansard, he said:

> First, the bill establishes the fishing zones of Canada at 12 miles from the coast line. When it is passed by parliament and proclaimed, Canada will have a fishing zone in the 3 to 12 mile area off our coast line. This, in the view of the government, is a fundamental achievement of the bill. It is not enabling legislation in this respect. On proclamation, the 12 mile fishing zone will be established. I must emphasize there is no doubt, and there can be no doubt, about this point.

There may not have been any doubt in the minister's mind when he made that statement, and now that he is resting comfortably in the other place we know that all his doubts and fears have vanished and he could not care less about our depleted fishery resources. But I would point out to you, sir, that we are now in the year 1970 and the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the Bay of Fundy on the east coast, and Dixon entrance and Queen Charlotte Sound on the west coast are not yet closed to foreign fishing fleets.

In all sincerity, Mr. Speaker, is it any wonder that our fishermen look with mistrust and suspicion at any proposals put forward for their benefit by this Liberal administration? The record of broken promises, hopes raised and destroyed, fishing resources depleted as a result of Liberal procrastination is there for everyone to see. The record of the Liberal administration since 1963 in relation to our fishermen and their problems is abominable.

What did the present Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) say as recently as November 2 when speaking in the Throne Speech debate? He warned this House, as recorded at page 414 of Hansard, that the North Atlantic fisheries resources of Canada are in grave danger of "overfishing" by foreign fishing fleets. He said:

> The total fishing effort, the international fishing effort in the North Atlantic, has more than doubled over the past decade.

He also told us that just beyond the 12-mile limit off the west coast of Vancouver Island he saw during the past summer a Russian fleet of 40 giant trawlers, every one of which was bigger than a British Columbia ferry. The minister painted a graphic wordpicture of the danger that the east and west coast fisheries resources might soon be completely destroyed by foreign fishing fleets.

This is a serious economic problem covering vast sections of our nation on both the east and west coasts; it is a problem which affects the livelihood of large numbers of our people, who by reason of their location and education are unable to move or qualify for any employment other than fishing. Faced with this serious situation, what does the government plan to do? It proposes to enact Bill C-134.

Let us look carefully at this proposal. Under the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act as it now stands, no foreign fishing vessel may enter Canadian fisheries waters unless authorized to do so by regulation under the act, by any other law of Canada, or by treaty. No person from a foreign fishing vessel may buy supplies in Canada unless similarly authorized.

In essence, the act has two methods of protecting Canadian fishing grounds. The first, or chief method is by preventing foreign fishing vessels from entering Canadian fishing grounds, or, alternatively, permitting them to enter but making them subject to Canadian fisheries laws or otherwise restricting their methods of operation. The second method is incidental to the main method, which is forbidding the foreign fishing vessels from coming into Canadian ports for the purpose of selling their catch or buying provisions or water.

In my view, the proposed amendment is an insipid and questionable attempt to strengthen the means of control. No one will deny that it is highly desirable to have the fishing operations of foreign fleets curtailed on both coasts. But there is a right way and a wrong way to do it, and in my opinion the method proposed will do nothing to alleviate the present situation and may well, in fact, compound the problem.

The government apparently interprets the wording of the act as meaning that a supply ship of a foreign fishing fleet is not and cannot be classed as a fishing vessel, and therefore it has the right, under maritime law, to come into a Canadian port and take on supplies for a foreign fishing fleet that is despoiling Canadian fishing grounds, without the necessity of getting a permit or being subject to being refused a permit.

The government now asks this House to amend the meaning of "fishing vessel" as defined in the act to include a supply ship of a foreign fishing fleet. By this action the government hopes to prevent or control the complete destruction of our fisheries resources by refusing to provision supply ships of foreign fishing vessels, or perhaps get them to agree to observe our conservation laws in return for provisioning them.

This measure can only be classified as a childish solution of what is in effect a man-sized problem. The proposed legislation reminds me of the actions of a disgruntled little boy who takes his bat and ball and walks out of the ball game when he does not get his own way. This type of action never has worked, and it will not work now because the ball game will still go on.

In my opinion, the government is using this amendment as an excuse for its inaction in establishing over-all base lines around our coast and as an excuse for its inaction in dealing with international fishing problems which have a considerable bearing on the well-being of Canadian fishermen.

I believe the present wording of the act which defines "fishing vessel" is sufficiently wide to class a supply ship of a fishing fleet as also a fishing vessel. After all, the present definition is not exclusive or exhaustive. It says that a fishing vessel "includes"—not "is" or "means"—"any ship or boat or other description of vessel used in or equipped for fishing or processing or transporting fish or marine plants."

• (3:30 p.m.)

Surely, a supply ship of a fishing fleet is a vessel that is necessary and incidental to a number of fishing vessels, and can therefore be classed as a fishing vessel. After all, a supply vessel has merely more water-tanks and more storerooms than an ordinary fishing vessel.

The corresponding conclusion that could be drawn from the government's interpretation is that fishing vessels that are watered and provisioned by a supply ship are not really fishing vessels because they do not carry adequate water and provision facilities with which to complete their voyage. What nonsense, Mr. Speaker!

On its face, the amendment would mean that the present restriction as to the granting or the refusing of permits will apply to all supply and auxiliary vessels sailing with foreign fishing vessels off Canada's east and west coasts. But, Mr. Speaker, there has been a long tradition in east coast ports of supplying visiting fleets. Trade with these fleets is estimated to run as high as $10 million or $12 million in St. John's Newfoundland, and some $3 million in Halifax and Sydney, Nova Scotia.

This tradition is based on two facts. One historic fact is that the North Atlantic fisheries were fished for at least three centuries before confederation, by fishing vessels sailing out of Europe, and during this period eight nations have established recognized fishing rights in the North Atlantic fisheries. In fact, these eight nations are granted greater fishing rights than Canadian fishermen on our own shores. The fishermen of Spain, Portugal, Italy, France, Norway, Denmark, the United Kingdom and the United States have the right to fish up to three miles from our coastline, while Canadian fishermen must pursue their fishing operations 12 miles from shore.

This was one of the promises made by the former Secretary of State for External Affairs speaking on May 20, 1964, on Canada's Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act, when he said that the fishing operations of the eight countries I have mentioned would be phased out. More than half a decade has passed since this promise was made. The Liberal government stands today indicted and condemned by our fishermen for its inaction on their problems, because fleets from these eight countries have still not been phased out and they still operate up to three miles from our coast. Yet on November 3 last the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) stood in his place in this House and said that those who are familiar with fisheries laws—I am paraphrasing his words—now know that we in Canada have an exclusive 12-mile limit. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister, exclusive to whom? Certainly it is not exclusive to Canadians. It may be exclusive to the eight fishing nations I have mentioned—exclusive to the fleets of France, Italy, Spain, Portugal, the United Kingdom, the United States, Norway and Denmark, but it is not exclusive to Canadians. Let that be put on the record now, and let us hear no more of this double-talk until the government takes action on this really important problem.

Second, Mr. Speaker, if Canada refuses to provision the fleets which are destroying our fishery resources we will not achieve our objective because alternative sources are awaiting the opportunity to supply them. At the present time the common market countries are building a huge supply base on the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, and even without this gunboat policy the fleets of other countries will soon be getting the major portion of their supplies from St. Pierre.

This amendment, therefore, should not be applied to our east coast ports as a prohibition against the provisioning of foreign supply ships or fishing vessels, because it will only anger the countries concerned without limiting their fishing activity on our shores.

It is my understanding that on the west coast there are no such fishing traditions. However, if we refuse to supply the Russian and Japanese fleets with water, I do not believe we will seriously cripple their operations because they can readily turn to American ports to the south such as Seattle, Everett, Olympia and Bellingham. In fact, the Russian fleet must pass Bellingham in order to get to Vancouver. Alternatively, the Russian fleet could get water and supplies to the north of us at Ketchikan, Juneau in the American Panhandle, or at Petersburg and Wrangell. Therefore, a prohibition on the supply of water, as stated in this amendment, for application to the west coast would have little meaning. According to my information, Russian ships take on only fresh water in Vancouver, but no provisions or fuel, and since fresh water is available elsewhere this amendment is pointless and futile.

As with the east coast situation, the west coast problem—toward which the minister said this amendment is administratively directed—will not be cured by small-boy scare tactics. Even more than the east coast, the west coast fisheries are in imminent danger. Unlike the east coast, the continental shelf on the west coast extends seaward only 11 to 46 miles, if the information is correct which was given to the Fisheries Committee when it met in that area. The fishing grounds, therefore, are tremendously concentrated and extremely susceptible to overfishing and destruction. Already there are fishing fleets there from Japan, Russia and South Korea, and there is no reason why they will not be joined soon by fleets from the Philippines and other nations of southeast Asia.

In my view, the tactic of striking at the supply ship is itself an admission that Canada agrees to the presence of these foreign fleets, that Canada intends to take no rational action to protect the fishing grounds off its shores but simply intends to harass these fleets—and by harassment anger the nations which send them.

This amendment is useless as a solution to the preservation of our fisheries resources. I say this because it attacks only the incidental problem, which actually is not a problem at all if the main problem is solved. In my opinion, this amendment will only annoy those nations that fish our resources on the east and west coasts and will in the final analysis prevent a proper approach to the problem. This approach must, and can only be made at the negotiating table. It must be made by Canadians talking common sense to their opposite numbers.

The common sense approach would be to point out to all concerned, at an international conference on the conservation of our fishing resources, that there are only so many fish on the fishing grounds of the North Atlantic and the west coast. These resources can be ruined for years or completely destroyed by overfishing or by the use of destructive fishing gear. It must be pointed out that these resources can be preserved for ourselves and for future generations only if we agree to conserve them in our time—and our time is now. In my opinion, it is mandatory that this action be taken through international negotiation and agreement.

I cannot help but wonder why this bill has been brought in by the Minister of Fisheries. Here we have a problem which concerns many of our European allies in NATO, some of our European trading partners and the great fleets of Russia and Japan; but instead of getting our External Affairs Department to cope with it, we see the Fisheries Department trying to implement a childish, gunboat policy which it is incapable of enforcing on the nations concerned.

We cannot help but wonder what is happening in our External Affairs Department. Have we no friends left in the world? Have we sacrificed all our integrity on the altar of recognition of Red China, to the exclusion of all our former friends and allies? I am beginning to wonder who stands up for Canada. And when the going gets tough and rough at some future date, I wonder who will stand by us.

Could it be, since we have backtracked on our word to the free Chinese on Taiwan, that no one trusts us any longer, that we are looked upon as fickle and inconsistent in the role we play in international affairs? Surely the amendment before us will not reduce the strength of the fishing fleets on our east and west coasts by one ship or one lifeboat. It certainly will not win us any friends at any future international bargaining table where ultimately the problem of our diminishing fishing resources will have to be discussed. What frightens me, Mr. Speaker, is that on its record the government seems incapable of talking common sense to other nations, and to some nations it cannot talk at all. It has scored debating points, but it has never arrived at agreements.

In my opinion, Bill C-134 may win the battle of the supply ship but it will cost us international agreement on measures to preserve our fisheries resources. Having stated our concern over this measure, it is not our intention to move any amendments at this time because there may be a movement for a particular province to take advantage of the bill in its present form. We therefore look forward, Mr. Speaker, to a more detailed explanation of the specific impact of this bill in certain areas when it comes before the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry for study.

Mr. Bell: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In order to help with our progress this afternoon, and in view of the fact that we will have to make a decision at four o'clock, I have spoken to some members on this side and some on the other side and hope this proposal may meet with Your Honour's approval.

There is a desire to get Bill C-175 through, and I appreciate there may be one or two more speeches on Bill C-134. However, if everybody shortened his speech we could pass Bill C-134 and get on to Bill C-175, and if there was agreement to dispense with private members' hour we could have half a dozen short speeches on Bill C-175 and agree to sit until it was finished which would probably be after five o'clock but certainly before six o'clock. The three bills would be through and everybody would be happy. However, if we give up private members' hour we would like the assurance that everyone will make an effort to co-operate.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I would appreciate that very much indeed.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, as my private member's motion is likely to be forgone as a result of that suggestion, I agree it should be done provided we end discussion of this particular bill at four o'clock and decide at that time to carry on with Bill C-175. I think that would be agreeable to all sides of the House.

The Deputy Speaker: This is a multi-faceted proposal before the Chair but there seems to be one common thread to all proposals, namely, to dispense with private members' hour. Unless there is disagreement on that point, perhaps the refinements or extensions of the proposal could be agreed upon informally among members and we could have a second proposal later. Is it agreed that we shorten speeches and, more specifically, that we dispense with private members' hour?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I did not rise on the point of order, but I appreciate the effort of the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) to bring some sort of order into our proceedings this afternoon. I rise in light of the fact that we have before us in Bill C-134 a proposed amendment to the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act. I wish this act included the protection of our coastal fisheries from the Liberal government, and in particular the Liberal House leader.

I was somewhat annoyed earlier today when the government House leader lightly dismissed the idea of dealing with fisheries matters by suggesting that we pass three bills next Wednesday afternoon. I shall not enter into the procedural hassle we had earlier, except to say it is very awkward when one is preparing, in good faith and on the strength of the word of the government House leader, to deal with a certain bill only to find that we have passed one other bill and that the next order of business is another bill entirely.

I once rather annoyed a former Minister of Fisheries by stating in the House that the government tended to treat the Department of Fisheries as the Cinderella of government departments. The events that have taken place today seem to indicate that this is the disposition of the present Liberal administration. Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I suppose I should proceed to make some comments on the substance of the amending bill that is before us.

In his few remarks the minister indicated that he did not consider this to be a bill which would end all the problems faced by our seacoast fisheries. I concur in his sentiments in this respect. This bill may be a step in the right direction, but I think it warrants further examination in committee because it is a little difficult to understand how it will act as a lever in regard to negotiations on operations of foreign fishing fleets off our coast.

I appreciate full well that the situation in regard to the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act and the operation of foreign fishing fleets off our coasts is not identical on the west coast and on the Atlantic coast of Canada. The approach that one takes in respect of the need for this amendment may, therefore, be slightly different depending on the point of view of the member who represents a coastal constituency.

The question that immediately comes to my mind is that of the operation of a large fleet of Soviet vessels offshore on the west coast and, in this last season, offshore of my own constituency at Vancouver Island. I think I can see some relationship between what is proposed in this bill and the operation of that fleet, although I am not sure that I understand how this measure will provide any protection from it.

If the minister makes any remarks in closing the debate on second reading, he should clarify this matter; if not, it should be clarified in committee as it relates to certain remarks of the member who preceded me and referred to Russian vessels calling at American ports to take on water.

My impression has always been that they were not permitted to do that, and that this amendment would have the effect of precluding Soviet supply vessels coming into Canadian ports to take on water or other supplies to assist in the maintenance of their offshore fleet. If this is correct, then as far as it goes I can understand the minister's logic, and in principle at least I find myself ready to support the position he takes.

The minister is as aware as I of the mood of the fishermen of the west coast at the present time and in particular of the west coast trollers. Some of them may have remarked to him, as they have to me, that if they find Soviet vessels in their way in the future, as they have in the past, they will take potshots at the pilot-houses. I have suggested to them that this would not solve the problem and in fact, it might have the reverse effect.

If one relates this bill to the question which I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) a couple of days ago in regard to the plans of the government to provide protection against fleets such as the Soviet fleet of trawlers and, in particular, the government's views on a proposal placed on the Order Paper by a British Columbia member—that is, Bill C-91—one realizes that the bill is only calculated to deal in a very minor way with the problem faced by the fishermen of the west coast as a result of the activities of foreign fishing fleets.

I think the remarks made by the previous speaker concerning the traditional activities of foreign fishing fleets off our Atlantic coast, activities which pre-date the establishment of Canada as a nation, bear out what I put to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the form of a question. I hope the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) or the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who is in the House, will clarify this point before the bill passes.

If the government is not of the view that Bill C-91 is a proposal which would solve this problem, I should like to know what the government has in mind as an alternative to Bill C-91 which would declare that we have jurisdiction over fishing resources to the edge of the continental shelf. The statement of the Minister of Fisheries in this connection indicates that he believes we should be able to manage our fisheries up to the edge of the continental shelf, but he has not said we should bring these areas within our own fishing zones.

This area needs to be clarified. It is not dealt with in the bill, and the minister's remarks bear out the fact that the bill does not solve the kind of problems that are involved in the present and future depletion of our fishing resources on the Pacific coast. We must keep in mind that in the North Atlantic there is an international agreement or convention to which Canada is a party together with most of the nations which fish in that area. While I suppose one could agree that that does not provide complete protection of fishing stocks in the North Atlantic, one could say that the legislative machinery working with regard to the continental shelf area of the Atlantic Coast is completely absent on the Pacific coast.

I am quite willing to go along with the suggestion that we give this bill and Bill C-175 second reading this afternoon and refer them to committee. For that reason I shall not prolong my remarks on this bill. I sum up by saying that my impression of the bill at second reading stage is that it is a minor effort in the right direction, and so far as it goes I am willing to support it.

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, as has been mentioned, this bill is limited in scope. The remarks of the preceding speaker, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett), I think indicated that it is designed mainly to permit the Canadian government and the Department of Fisheries to deal more effectively with Soviet and other fleets operating off the west coast of Canada. It will not solve all the problems which were enumerated by the previous speaker and the minister.

It is, none the less, a desirable piece of legislation. It is a first step, small though it may be, which I hope will be followed shortly by an announcement on the completion of the base lines system off the west coast of British Columbia and then, in a third and final stage, by the enactment of legislation along the lines of Bill C-91, to which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni was kind enough to refer. That bill would have the effect of extending exclusive Canadian fishing zones to the edge of the continental shelf.

I think that the measure in Bill C-134, in conjunction with the completed base lines system and such measures as are proposed in Bill C-91, will probably be adequate to protect the resource which at present is being very seriously depleted.

It is not generally known that perhaps the largest community on the west coast between Victoria and Prince Rupert is the Russian fishing fleet, a floating town of about 5,000 men at the height of the season. This is an indication of the extent of the exploitation of halibut, ocean perch and herring which is now taking place. The incidental catch of salmon in the area is also said to be considerable.

Reference has been made to the Pacific Trollermen's Association which is, I would say, in the best position to know what the situation is in these waters. Time and time again the association has brought to the attention of hon. members who represent west coast ridings, as well as to the minister, the tremendous depletion of groundfish resources and the large incidental take of salmon which is going on at present. I commend the association for its efforts, and hope it will not cease until there is satisfactory protection of fish stocks in this area of the Pacific.

I think the minister is correct in starting off by attempting to plug one small hole in the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act, but I hope that the present action will be followed up in the near future by legislation or Orders in Council which will assure that we complete the base lines system and extend the exclusive Canadian fishing zone well outside its present limits. Because I understand that the Saltfish Corporation bill is to be the final bill the House will deal with this afternoon, I shall conclude my remarks by asking hon. members from Newfoundland to be brief, as we expect a vote on that bill this afternoon.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

CANADIAN SALTFISH CORPORATION

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT—REGULATION OF INTERPROVINCIAL AND EXPORT TRADE

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry) moved that Bill C-175, to establish the Canadian Saltfish Corporation and regulate interprovincial and export trade in saltfish, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I move second reading of this bill, secure in the knowledge that it will receive support from all corners of the House. I know there will be a few minor amendments proposed in committee. Some of them may be necessary to improve the act, but basically this is a sound piece of legislation—one which will be universally welcomed, particularly in the Atlantic provinces.

We have needed a Saltfish Corporation for more than a century. I am sure of this, because it has been recommended by numerous royal commissions and special committees set up over the years to look into the problems and prospects of the saltfish industry.

The saltfish industry, as everyone knows, was the first industry in Canada. It was the first industry on our shores and certainly the first industry the white man knew in North America. In some ways it is still an antiquated industry. Certainly it can stand a good deal of improvement.

The bill to establish the Canadian Saltfish Corporation in effect puts the credit of all the people of Canada behind the saltfish industry, which is now mainly concentrated in Newfoundland, along the north shore of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, Quebec, and on the coast of Labrador. At one time it encompassed all the Atlantic region of Canada and much of the New England coast as well. It contracted in size as the fresh fish and frozen fish industries developed. It is now limited in great measure to small, remote communities along Canada's east coast.

It is served by inshore fishermen, with limited means and small boats, who often do not go out beyond the sight of land. These people live in modest circumstances. They are enterprising, God-fearing, hardworking people prepared to take great risks, including risking their lives. One hundred thousand of these people have very limited opportunities in their own local areas. They live in communities which range in size from a few houses to several hundred. There are approximately 1,000 communities in this category which depend almost exclusively on the production of saltfish, primarily the catching and manufacturing of salt cod which can be shipped anywhere in the world and will retain its quality for months, even in the hottest climate. This industry is being carried on in small, remote communities and around those communities there is little opportunity for other gainful employment.

One thing that impressed me very much is that the opportunity for employment in the forest industry, particularly in Newfoundland, is more limited today than it was ten years ago. Approximately half as many people work in the forests of Newfoundland as worked there in the mid-fifties. More men are in fact engaged in the inshore salt fish industry in Newfoundland because there are half as many jobs in the woods. This situation calls for dramatic action by the federal government to help these fishermen gain not only a larger share of world markets but a better price for their product.

I am convinced we can add considerably to the income of these fishermen merely by bringing into being a fish development marketing organization. But we will do more than market fish. Through rationalization I am sure we will be able to improve the facilities available to these fishermen in order that they may improve their product, upgrade it for the markets of the world, tailor the qualities and grades to market requirements in order to improve their sales prospects and in turn improve their income. This is the main objective of the development corporation.

The corporation will be a single-desk selling agency selling on a worldwide basis. It will be selling in the Caribbean and Mediterranean countries principally. It will be selling in a market for saltfish which has been surprisingly stable for several decades its volume has remained almost constant. What has gone wrong from our point of view is that Canada has been left with a smaller and smaller share of that relatively constant world market. If we put the accent on quality, meeting market requirements and upgrading the product so that it is more acceptable to foreign buyers we will be able to considerably improve this fishery.

We have a parallel piece of legislation. Members are familiar with the establishment of the Freshwater Fish Market Corporation last year. This corporation will operate in much the same way. In May of this year I hope to announce the schedule of prices for saltfish so that fishermen will know at the beginning of the season what their product is worth. They will be paid as they deliver their fish, rather than having to wait until the end of the year to receive any income whatsoever. They will know what they are going to receive in terms of income and will be able to plan with some confidence for the future.

At the end of the year the corporation will take whatever surplus it obtains as a result of this selling exercise, and pay it out to the fishermen in proportion to their catch and sales. This corporation will be the sole buyer of saltfish throughout the Atlantic region. It will have that power because all the provincial governments have indicated that they are interested in our national legislation. They will provide the necessary provincial power to make the corporation function effectively.

I think most hon. members opposite and many on this side of the House are familiar with the problems of the saltfish industry and the inshore fishermen. I can think of no single factor that can contribute more to his income and feeling of accomplishment than the passing of this bill which, at long last, will make the saltfish industry the fisherman's industry as well.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the minister's statement concerning an act to establish the Canadian Saltfish Corporation and regulate interprovincial and export trade in saltfish. I have a few comments to make on this legislation.

The marketing of saltfish and the regulating of interprovincial and export trade in this commodity is a problem that has for many years been troubling the industry in Atlantic Canada. We on this side therefore approve in principle the government's bill and will do everything within reason to expedite its progress through committee. However, there are some questions concerning the method of operation of the corporation which we would like answered. Hopefully, our doubts in this direction will be satisfied by the minister and his officials when they appear before the committee; if not, we have amendments which we are prepared to put forward in order to strengthen and improve the bill.

For almost 500 years fishermen of many countries have reaped the codfish harvest of our North Atlantic fisheries. In return, the North Atlantic has exacted its price in the lives of those fishermen, in the loneliness and widowhood of their wives and in the orphaning of their children. The history of the people of the Maritime provinces, Newfoundland and Quebec, is interwoven with the history of the fishing industry.

Treaties with foreign nations concerning the right of their nationals to land and dry codfish on the shores of these provinces are part and parcel of Canada's constitution and inheritance. In fact, the trade of these provinces in salt cod with the West Indies, South America, Spain, France, Portugal and Greece has established ties of friendship and trade with these countries which are older than Canada.

For some years past the salt cod industry has been relatively unimportant in terms of gross national product because the fishermen who live by that industry have, despite their efforts, been unable to earn sufficient income to make a contribution to income tax revenues.

It would appear that the salt cod industry is a special craft industry of individuals and families which should now be collectivized and organized in the hope that this action will bring about its continued survival. I sincerely hope this bill represents the answer to the Canadian saltfisherman's problems. However, in my opinion this collectivization or organization should not be so ruthless or so intent upon efficiency that it forgets to take into consideration the human factors involved.

The dislocation of the lives of these fishermen and their families where it occurs—and it will occur—must be softened by a spirit of compromise and adjustment on the part of the government as well as by the compromise and adjustment that will be demanded of the fishermen. With this thought in mind, I believe that the chairman and president, as well as the directors of the corporation and the members of the advisory committee should in the best interests of this corporation be from those provinces which participate in the administration of the act, a fact which is not spelled out too clearly in this bill.

As I understand it, the purpose of this bill is to bring greater economic benefits to the primary saltfish producers in Atlantic Canada. This is a worthy objective, and in light of the low annual income recorded for this area it is a very necessary and worth while project. In fact, attempts to make the saltfish industry profitable have for many years occupied the attention of five provincial governments and the federal government.

Whatever remedies have been brought forward and tried, the salt-cure fishermen have, prior to this legislation, lacked a regional corporation with power to control the interprovincial and export trade in saltfish, a corporation with capital sufficient to acquire modern methods of assembling, curing, grading, processing, packaging, storing, selling and engaging in market promotion. The phasing-out of traditional but inefficient methods of curing, a reduction of duplication in costs which should bring increased returns to the fishermen, are ends which I hope will be realized under the proper management of the corporation proposed by this legislation.

The minister said the objective of the corporation at the outset is to increase the income and improve the living standards of producers. We hope that in pursuing this objective—and it is a proper one—the corporation will not lose sight of the fishermen of Labrador, of the Quebec Gulf and North Shore, of Prince Edward Island and of Nova Scotia who also are in vital need of assistance.

It is a regrettable but necessary provision of this bill that fishermen who fail to meet the terms and conditions imposed by the board will not be able to sell to the corporation. In effect, they will not be able to sell in the interprovincial or export markets. This will result in the unemployment of those unfitted by experience for any other employment. Processing plants which are dependent on the catches of these men will go out of business. However, it would appear this is the price which must be paid if the saltfish industry is to survive and if a proportion of the fishermen are to enjoy a reasonable standard of living.

In view of these facts, the corporation should not operate, in my opinion, strictly within the narrow confines of this bill. I believe the corporation has wider responsibilities. Once it is established it should alert, as early as possible, the various agencies of government, both federal and provincial, to these foreseeable disruptions. I say this in order that employment facilities, retaining facilities, pension and welfare facilities and financial aid by way of government loans to small businesses, be made known to unemployed fishermen, the employees of redundant fishing plants and to the small businessmen who operate these plants.

As I stated earlier, the five provincial governments of Atlantic Canada have in the past given much thought to the problems faced by the saltfish industry. In fact, on October 29, 1964, the Atlantic Salt Fish Commission, headed by Mr. Finn, tabled its report outlining a summary of its conclusions and recommendations after consultation with the producers and processors in Atlantic Canada. This is a very interesting report, full of salty phrases and saltfish problems, and the commission's final conclusion was that the saltfish industry was not then ready for a saltfish marketing board.

According to the commission's report, the basic difficulty was the low productivity per unit of the fishermen involved. If that conclusion of the commission holds true today, the marketing corporation proposed in this bill may, in fact, do a good deal of damage. Indeed, the damage done might well offset the amount of aid provided unless the corporation proceeds with compassion, acting in close consultation with the rehabilitation and social agencies of the federal and provincial governments in the Maritimes, Newfoundland and Quebec. I say this knowing that the provinces I have mentioned already have the highest unemployment rates in Canada and the lowest standard of living. We must always be mindful of this situation and careful to do nothing by way of legislative action which would compound their problems.

These fishermen need help, and hopefully the corporation to be set up under the bill before us can give it to them. However, the problems which this new corporation will face are likely to differ entirely from those faced by the management of the Fresh Fish Marketing Corporation. I would remind hon. members that the latter corporation has a virtual monopoly of fresh fish and can therefore control its quality, its rate of delivery and its price in our major market, the United States.

This is not the situation which will face the saltfish corporation. When it is set up, this corporation will be in a position to control the export trade in saltfish as it relates to production in Canada, but when it comes to selling saltfish abroad it will not benefit from a monopoly because it will have to compete in world markets with other great saltfish-producing nations such as Iceland, Norway, Spain, Portugal and Denmark.

This presents a challenge to our Atlantic coast fishermen inasmuch as the success or failure of the corporation to be set up by this bill will depend in great measure upon the quality of the saltfish products which it can offer in world markets. This means the corporation must be headed by men who are knowledgeable with regard to the saltfish industry and its markets, men who are willing to work in closer co-operation with the fishermen, the primary producers, than has been the case in the past.

As I stated earlier, some salt codfish fishermen in Atlantic Canada may become unemployed as a result of the board's consolidation of effort. Although it may succeed in providing continuous employment and a higher standard of living to some, the board must always be conscious that it will have failed in its over-all objective if its operations raise over-all unemployment figures still higher, lowering further the present low standard of living.

In his speech of November 3, 1969, on fisheries matters, the Minister of Fisheries said many things with which I agree. He also expressed many anomalous views with which I disagree, though I shall not now debate them with the hon. gentleman. For example, he omitted to mention the tremendous build-up of the Canadian fishing fleet, with the resultant prosperity of our shipbuilding and processing plants brought about by the constructive programs initiated during the Conservative administration under my right hon. friend for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker).

The minister went on to mention the plans for the fishermen proposed by his own government and, as reported at page 411 of Hansard, he listed the various bills to be considered. He then stated that the government also proposed to change the Unemployment Insurance Act, commenting that the question of unemployment insurance was of great interest to our fishermen.

This, of course, was the understatement of the year. Unemployment insurance is a subject of great interest to the entire industry, including the processors. There is nothing in this bill to indicate the stand which the government plans to take with regard to this important matter. As the minister is aware, fishermen are now classed as being self-employed, as sharing in a joint venture. Will this classification still apply to fishermen landing fish for the Canadian Saltfish Corporation? If not, what changes is the government planning along the lines referred to in the minister's speech? The answer to this question would be very helpful. I hope the government gives an early indication of the changes it proposes to bring about in this important field.

In conclusion, I express the hope that once this corporation is established it will achieve all its objectives so that our primary producers, the men who must work in the saltfish trade under great hardship, with only faith at times to sustain them, will secure under this legislation more of the fruits of their labour.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, in his opening remarks the minister said that "at long last" this bill would bring to an end the system which meant that the salt codfish producers of Newfoundland were prisoners of the merchants and the storekeepers. It was a timely phrase and it brought to my mind my visit to the province of Newfoundland in 1955, at which time many people were telling me that they would like to see legislation of this kind brought about.

I may say that I found myself to be a member of what was then the marine and fisheries committee of this House, shortly after my first arrival here. As a result of that, and because I had personal knowledge only of the fisheries of the Pacific coast, I embarked upon a trip to Newfoundland one fall and spent four weeks in that province. It was one of the most delightful and interesting experiences of my life.

I spent most of that time visiting the people in the small fishing villages, or outports of what was then considered to be quite a new province of Canada. I was regarded very largely as a curiosity from the mainland. The fact that I was a Canadian made me somewhat different in the eyes of many people.

Mr. Lundrigan: That was an easy conclusion to draw.

Mr. Barnett: I came back to this House, and as a result of communications which I received from many of the friends I made there I found myself occasionally getting up on the opposition side of the House and asking questions about Newfoundland matters. That was a great novelty in the House at the time because there were no members on the opposition side who represented a riding in that province. This situation does not prevail at the present time. As I recall it, the information that was given to me at the time I visited Newfoundland was that the average cash income of an inshore Newfoundland fisherman was about $600 a year.

Mr. McGrath: It is now $800.

Mr. Barnett: I was going to refer to a publication which was issued by our Department of Fisheries and Forestry quite recently, Fisheries Reports No. 11, in which one of the footnotes points out that in a report made in 1964 a detailed study established the income of the fishermen at less than $1,000 per year, inclusive of transfer payments, which makes the interjected figure of $800 somewhere close to the mark.

I mention this to underline that when the minister said that this piece of legislation is being brought in "at long last," there is certainly no quarrel from this part of the House that the economic situation of most fishermen in Newfoundland leaves much to be desired. I noted that the minister emphasized this situation in his remarks on this bill, and for that reason there is perhaps relatively little controversy in the House in dealing with it.

If I understand it correctly, the genesis of this bill stems from the Federal-Provincial Fisheries Conference which was held in Ottawa in January of 1964. Certain events have flowed from that conference. The minister mentioned one of them, the Freshwater Fish Marketing Board, and suggested quite rightly that in some ways this is a companion piece of legislation dealing with another of Canada's fisheries.

I made some reference back to the presentations which were made to that conference in 1964 by the government of Newfoundland, in which they indicated that they were proposing something along the lines of the bill that we have before us. At page 32 of the presentation to the conference by the government of Newfoundland, dated January 20, 1964, the following statement appears:

> The programs necessary for the strengthening of the Newfoundland fishing industry can be divided under three general headings:
> 1. Marketing and price stabilization.
> 2. Inspection and quality control.
> 3. Rationalization and development measures.

The marketing of saltfish in Newfoundland has a long history. If I recall correctly the picture which was painted to me at the time I was in that province, it indicated that while there was a form of co-ordinated fish marketing at that time, the real control still rested in the hands of what were often referred to as the great merchants of St. John's. One of the things about which we require assurances—an assurance which is not found in the bill—is that the enactment of this legislation will in fact represent a transfer of power from those financial interests in St. John's, which have traditionally controlled the fisheries and kept the fishermen at a subsistence level, to the fishermen themselves.

The idea of a marketing board is one that all of us in this House can easily support. The brief of the province of Newfoundland refers back to the days when the Canadian Wheat Board was established, as the first piece of legislation providing for the orderly marketing of a product. But one of the things this bill does not clarify is whether in fact the fishery of Newfoundland will be under public control and under the control of the producers, or whether it will be left in the hands of what in the terms of the wheat farmers would be called the Winnipeg Grain Exchange. This question is not clarified in the bill.

This board is set up as a Crown Corporation. The officers and the directors are to be appointed by the Governor in Council with one appointee from each of the participating provinces. There is to be an advisory council which says that two thirds of the members shall be connected with saltfish production. But whether in fact this legislation will at long last bring about a transfer of control into the hands of the producers of Newfoundland depends entirely upon the approach which the government takes to the administration, the approach which the government takes to the appointment of the people who are going to form the board of directors of this corporation.

In committee we will require an explanation as to the emphasis to be placed on having the Crown corporation become an agency for the processing of fresh fish, and the emphasis to be placed on maintaining the existing structures for the processing of fish. I recognize there is a complex pattern throughout the industry and that the existing machinery for marketing cannot be done away with overnight. However, I think this is the kind of assurance those of us in this party want. We want assurances that in fact the operation of this measure will be such as to ensure to the fishermen the maximum return possible for their product.

We know that, even at best, the return to the fishermen for saltfish will not be anything magnificent, given the present situation with respect to world markets and the price levels that prevail. Those of us in this part of the House insist that this should be made clear as far as the people in the Atlantic fisheries are concerned.

I was glad to hear the minister say, if I heard him correctly, that all the provinces involved in the production of saltfish have indicated their desire to participate in this program. I was glad to note that one of the things to be achieved is the solution of a problem of concern to many people in Newfoundland, and I presume indirectly to fishermen in some of the other provinces; that is, this body will operate as an interprovincial corporation and will bring to an end the unceasing warfare that existed in previous days regarding the marketing of fish through the authority of one province or another. This was a matter of concern to the fishermen of Newfoundland when the province entered confederation. It was a matter of concern in respect of the marketing of Newfoundland fish products during the early years Newfoundland operated within confederation.

This bill meets, in part, a concerted desire of the people of Newfoundland in particular, as expressed to the former leader of the Liberal party, as far as it parallels the kind of marketing board that has been developed for the marketing of Canadian farm products, particularly those from the three Prairie provinces. If the Minister of Fisheries has not already taken note of this, I should like to refer him to a letter which the Premier of Newfoundland wrote to the former Prime Minister on February 13, 1963, when he was Leader of the Opposition.

Parts of this letter were quoted not once but twice during the proceedings of the conference in 1964. The concluding sentence of the statement made to Mr. Smallwood by Mr. Pearson when he was speaking as Leader of the Opposition is that we should have the following:

> —a federal-provincial program for fishery development to be founded on the principle that national action for fisheries should parallel the action already being taken, and action to be taken, for agriculture.

Perhaps this bill is in part a fulfilment of that pledge. I am not suggesting it is the complete fulfilment. I mention this to the minister because he admits himself it has been a long time coming. I made a special trip to Ottawa before the opening of the session of Parliament in 1964, full of hope and optimism that out of that Federal-Provincial Fisheries Conference we would have introduced during that session of Parliament interprovincial marketing legislation. I suppose it is always better to have something late than never. In this respect I find myself echoing the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when he comments on matters relating to pensions. It seems that it takes a long time for ideas to penetrate the heads of members of the Liberal government.

Mr. Lewis: And their hearts.

Mr. Barnett: One of my colleagues says it is their hearts.

Mr. Lewis: As well as their heads.

Mr. Barnett: I have never been able to decide whether human action is generated primarily from the heart or the head. I am inclined to think it is a combination of the two and that neither functions very well without the other. Whether the fact that Liberal ministers have been inclined to pride themselves on being hard-headed has in fact meant that they are also hard-hearted, I do not know; but perhaps this is the reason for the dilemma to which some of my colleagues have referred in their interjections.

I am glad the minister is taking action on matters of this kind. I hope that his heart is soft, while his head is hard, and that this measure when it is enacted will be administered in a manner which will fulfil the promises it contains. I hope it will in fact herald the beginning of a new day for the fishermen in the Atlantic region of Canada, and that those who sit in this House ten years from now will be prepared to admit that it was a wise and useful piece of legislation.

We will have questions to ask when the bill is before the committee. We may have some suggestions when we examine and discuss the measure in detail, in order that it might be improved and strengthened. Let me refer to one such suggestion. This measure is too ambiguous as to whether those who are clearly fishermen will have any voice in the policy development of this body. This is a matter that should be clarified before the committee. If necessary, amendments will be proposed to clarify the situation. This will enable the bill, when passed in its final form, to come closer to fulfilling the hopes I have expressed.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us, in so far as many of us are concerned, is a milestone in the history of the ancient saltfish industry. I have waited for this legislation for a long time, like many other people in Newfoundland.

At long last we see in this bill what we hope will be the fulfilment of the expectations of the Newfoundland fishermen who have waited 20 years to see the fulfilment of the promise of Confederation with Canada. I could not help feeling a little disappointment today as I listened to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) when he spoke on second reading of this bill. I was disappointed the minister made light of the subject and missed the opportunity he had to sum up the historical factors leading up to and indeed directly influencing the legislation now before us.

I am also disappointed that the bill is before us at a time when members are getting ready to leave for the weekend and when it is obvious we have only a few hours at our disposal. If we had the time which this legislation warrants, I or others who may be able to do it much more adequately would be able to tell this House the heartbreaking story of Canada's most ancient industry, the saltfish industry. However, the minister did not choose to have this debate on another occasion. I am sure his motives were good. As a matter of fact, I feel he did not expect to have to deal with this legislation today.

The minister knows better than I do the importance of getting this legislation on its way. Until this bill receives royal assent he knows the industry, which is suffering the disastrous consequences of last year, is in a state of suspended animation. The longer the delay in the passage of this legislation which received first reading on December 19, the greater the opportunity, for those who are critical of the bill, to tear it down. Justice delayed is justice denied.

So we are prepared to get this bill on its way and before the committee. I may be forgiven, however, if I make a few brief observations. Other remarks I would have made at this time I shall save for the committee stage, the report stage or third reading of the bill. Before I do so I would make a suggestion to the minister. He may not think it is really relevant.

With the passage of this legislation and the setting up of this corporation, carrying with it as it does the final recognition of the importance of the role in our economy of the inshore fishery, we hope there will be the ancillary result of making the iniquitous and unjust centralization program redundant. This is a cruel, unjust and inhuman program of moving the people of Newfoundland from their ancient homes to centralized ghettos which will have as its only effect the facilitation of the administration of welfare.

We hope the passage of this legislation will carry with it a recognition of the importance of the industry in spite of what Mr. Finn in his report and others have said through the years about the inshore fishery having no future and there being no future in saltfishing. As a result of this bill we hope that cruel program of centralization of which we have heard so much and about which the Canadian people have heard some disturbing reports will no longer be necessary. I say this notwithstanding the fact that the administration of the program has now passed from the minister of fisheries to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. We hope this bill will spell the end of that program.

There are in the bill a number of things which concern us. The minister referred to them as being minor amendments. We consider them to be major amendments. We consider, for example, the provision in the bill whereby the corporation will be empowered to make loans to fishermen to be a major item and one which in fact does not go far enough. If this bill in fact destroys the feudal system under which the saltfish industry is conducted in Newfoundland, it must by definite legislative steps eliminate the economically crippling credit system which is now the hallmark of the saltfish industry and which deprives the fisherman in many instances of a fair return for his labour.

We consider this to be a major item and hope the minister will heed the suggestions we will make in the committee in respect of the provision of a special fund which would be self-revolving to ensure that, regardless of whether the fishermen had a good or bad year, they would not have to suffer the consequences of the manipulation of interest rates and the imposition of a stricter credit regulation by the corporation. This corporation cannot, and indeed must not, function as an ordinary commercial corporation.

I make no apology, and I am sure no one from the province of Newfoundland would make any apology for saying that. We hope there will also be provision for the setting up of a fund of at least $1 million. I have not pulled this figure out of the hat. It is a figure suggested to me by those who should know what they are talking about. I believe $1 million or $2 million should be provided for this revolving fund to ensure that the fishermen at the beginning of each season have guaranteed, adequate funds with which to outfit themselves, and that there will be proper regulation and a fair and just rate of interest.

Only in this way can we ensure that there is and end to the feudal system whereby the fishermen in return for being outfitted in the spring of the year are obligated to give their entire catch to the merchant without knowing how much they might expect in return. This is what is known as the iniquitous open-receipt system of buying fish. We consider this a major item. Even though we consider this a good bill, and even though we commend the minister for introducing it and think he is a good minister, we are also sure he is anything but infallible.

We could have preferred if he had taken some of us into his confidence so that we could have given him our constructive suggestions in a more informal way, rather than having to make them in debate in this House or through the formal technique of amendments in committee.

We would also like to see an expression of intent spelled out in the bill, if for no other reason than to ensure that the corporation does not conduct itself as a purely commercial corporation. The philosophy of the bill should be spelled out in the preamble. It was quite adequately spelled out by the minister in a statement which he made at St. John's, and I quote his words:

> Immediate objectives of the proposed corporation are to improve and stabilize the earnings of primary producers of cured cod fish. This would be achieved by maximizing returns from the trade and minimizing costs in assembling, processing and marketing operations.

We would like to see that in the preamble of the bill. The minister may not occupy his portfolio in two years' time, and we should take steps now to make sure that those who follow know what was the intent of Parliament when this bill was passed.

The bill provides for the appointment of five directors. The appointments will be made by the Governor in Council, which in this case means the Minister of Fisheries. It could conceivably happen that the five directors could come from Bay Street, or the equivalent street in Vancouver. The president could come from the west coast and the chairman of the board from Montreal. Unless they knew what Parliament had in mind when it passed the bill, they could forget that its primary purpose is to maximize returns to the primary producer, the fisherman.

I would not want the impression to be created abroad that this bill is merely establishing a marketing board. If it is to fulfil our expectations, it must be much more than that. This is not to suggest that marketing is not one of the principal functions of the corporation.

Because of the ancient system of marketing in the trade, we have been losing our main markets to competitive countries such as Iceland, Denmark, Norway, Portugal and Spain. Exporters have failed to recognize the changes that are taking place in our principal markets for cured fish. Those markets are now more sophisticated than ever. Here I speak of our principal markets in Jamaica, Barbados, Trinidad and Puerto Rico. Salt codfish, which is their principal source of protein, is now sold in local supermarkets with the aid of attractive packaging. Our exporters have failed to compete in this manner. They have failed to take account of the fact that in many of our principal markets salt codfish is a political football. A marketing board will be in a better position to deal with governments than individual exporters.

We feel that the corporation must have a presence in our export markets; it must have representatives in those markets. Indeed, it may have to build cold-storage facilities close to those markets in order to ensure that the product is adequately safeguarded. Notwithstanding the minister's opening statement, it is a perishable product and on occasion has suffered the consequences of being left on wharves in the West Indies for long periods of time. For this reason it will be necessary for the corporation to enter into agreements with the governments of Jamaica and other West Indian countries to build cold-storage warehouses in which the product can be stored.

We must do a better job in our principal markets by the adoption of new marketing techniques, new packaging and the elimination of the middleman. In many cases these principal markets have become fragmented, to the detriment of the saltfish fishermen.

The corporation will also have to determine in advance market requirements so that fishermen in future will not produce and cure fish on a hit-and-miss basis. At the beginning of a season the corporation will have to determine the grade of fish the Jamaican market will require. Then, as the sole purchaser of fish, it will be able to go to the fishermen and say, "We will require so many quintals of such a cure of fish for this market." The fishermen will know exactly what they have to produce, and they will produce it. This will bring some order into the chaotic situation that now exists in the industry. Without exception, improvements can be made in every one of our markets. They have to be made if we are to eliminate the archaic thinking that has caused so much damage to the industry.

[Mr. McGrath.]

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I note that the bill calls for the setting up of the corporation's head office in St. John's, Newfoundland. I suggest that this is the obvious place for the corporation to have its headquarters because St. John's will be the principal centre of its operations.

• (5:00 p.m.)

I also suggest that the president of this corporation be a resident of the area in which the corporation is located, and somebody who has an active knowledge of the industry. Above all, Mr. Speaker, it should not be a political appointment. I leave that suggestion with the minister.

We look forward to studying this bill in committee. Many people have made representations to us and in committee we will be passing many of them on to the government. We hope the committee will get together very soon and deal with this legislation.

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, like my colleagues on this side of the House, I welcome this legislation. I commend the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) for the initiative he has shown in tackling it and, we hope, putting an end to the old feudal system that has for centuries been the curse of the fishing industry of Newfoundland.

Those of us from Atlantic Canada, and especially from Newfoundland, have been looking forward with great anticipation to the legislation which we are now debating. We realize how important this legislation is to the fishing industry in Newfoundland and, indeed, to the other Maritime provinces. We also appreciate the minister's willingness to pay attention to the suggestions and arguments we have advanced in favour of this board and the corporation as outlined in the bill.

The minister is well aware of the representations made to him and the government, and the consistency of our efforts to impress upon them the absolute need for greater government involvement in the saltfish industry of Atlantic Canada. He is also aware of the pressing need for an organized effort by the government to regulate the processing and marketing of our salted cod.

One does not need to be a prophet or to possess divine inspiration to predict what will happen to the saltfish industry of eastern Canada without this type of legislation, without active participation by the government in the processing and marketing of the product.

It is regrettable that it has taken so long to have this board established. As my colleague from St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) said a few moments ago, Newfoundland has been waiting for this opportunity since confederation, and we have lost 20 years. Let us hope that the board will function to the advantage of the people for whom it is intended, that is, the producer—the fisherman himself.

The average fisherman has been too long the victim of the old feudal system. The history of the fishing industry in my province has been one of exploitation, hardship, and in too many cases near-starvation for those engaged in it. For too long were we content to accept what always appeared to be inevitable as far as our fishermen were concerned, that is, they must learn to roll with the punches, take it on the chin and be satisfied to accept a standard of living far below the national average and one that would not be tolerated by people in any other part of this nation. A moment ago I said that our fishermen had been exploited for centuries. Of course, the reason is obvious—the system under which they have been compelled to operate lends itself to abuse and exploitation.

Can you imagine, sir, the people engaged in the fishing industry selling their catches on an open-receipt basis? Can you imagine any person today, engaged in any other industry in Canada, working all summer and not knowing what he will earn? But that situation has existed in Newfoundland for decades and, possibly, for centuries. Men fished all summer; they shipped or took their fish to the exporter and were given an open-receipt without knowing how much they would get. They took potluck, and come fall they hoped to obtain enough money to square their bills with the merchants and have a few dollars to spare.

If one were to compare the life of the average Canadian with that of the Newfoundland fishermen, it would be very interesting. The fisherman of Newfoundland has an average annual income of $900 or thereabouts. For that he must work during the fishing season from before daylight until after dark. He must constantly face the hazards of the seas, and is forced to run risks when battling the elements that would terrify the average Canadian. He must conquer his fears and overcome the fury of the Atlantic. Total dependence on his own ingenuity and resourcefulness has instilled in him a fierce sense of pride and independence. The average fisherman is by nature a rugged individualist who works hard for his living. He would much rather battle the elements than accept social welfare.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this legislation will have the effect of improving the lot of the average fisherman of Atlantic Canada, and especially of Newfoundland. I am therefore delighted that it has been brought in. We have suggestions to make in committee which we hope will improve the bill.

There is one thing I must say, because it has a bearing on the success of the fisheries in my riding and in most other parts of Newfoundland. I hope that the government will go a step farther and not merely stop with the establishment of the Saltfish Corporation. I believe it will be necessary for the government to make sure that adequate facilities are provided whereby fishermen can land and process their fish under sanitary and proper conditions. If the fishermen are to take full advantage of this legislation, adequate facilities must be provided for them.

If our fishermen are to comply with regulations pertaining to quality and sanitation set out in the bill, facilities must be provided. Those facilities should include landing and processing facilities, community wharves and the like. When the bill comes before the committee I hope the minister will indicate that my suggestions will be incorporated in the government's program, which is designed to encourage the saltfish industry. We must make sure that our fishermen derive the fullest benefit from the proposed corporation.

I also think the minister should look at the herring fishery, especially in Newfoundland. People who are eminently qualified to speak on the subject have suggested to me that we should consider prohibiting the use of large herring seiners in our bays. These seiners move in like giant vacuum cleaners and sweep up everything that is there. Their large catches of herring are reduced to oil that I understand is used for industrial purposes.

I have been informed that an unlimited world market exists for this very high-protein food. I am told that 95 per cent of the herring caught are used for oil rather than human consumption. I think this industry would perform a much greater service to humanity if greater emphasis were put on the nutritional and protein value of herring as food for human consumption, rather than reducing an estimated 95 per cent of the catch to oil.

I hope the minister will give thought to providing facilities which the fishermen want, and that consideration will be given to a certain group of people in Newfoundland. The hon. member for St. John's East mentioned a moment ago that these people have been dealt a great injustice by having their way of life destroyed by the federal government and the government of Newfoundland. I refer to the people who have been relocated under the joint federal-provincial housing resettlement program. These people have been moved from their traditional fishing areas and properties and resettled, in many instances, in places completely unsuited to them and which lack even the barest facilities needed to successfully prosecute the fisheries.

I ask the minister to give serious thought to providing facilities in the areas where these people have been relocated. I know of two or three in my riding. I could refer to Placentia. The minister is well aware of the problems that exist there. More than 200 families were moved into that town from outlying areas where previously they had adequate fishing facilities. They now find themselves in the same position as the proverbial fish-out-of-water; they are in a settlement completely unsuited to their carrying on fishing.

I could refer to a number of other places in my riding where facilities are lacking, such as in St. Mary's Bay and St. Mary's itself. I repeat, that unless provision is made to provide adequate facilities for the fishermen, they will not receive the full benefits that could be derived from this legislation.

I know other hon. members want to speak on this measure, so I will conclude my remarks. I compliment the minister on his setting up the Saltfish Corporation. I hope he will accept our advice regarding fishing facilities. We look forward to discussing this bill further at the committee stage.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): I do not wish to take up too much time of the House, Mr. Speaker. I hope to make my remarks in five minutes. I have reservations about this bill, not because it is a bad bill but because I am opposed to the principle of Crown corporations generally. I can support it because I know it is of tremendous importance to the fishermen of Newfoundland. If in this way we can help that province, I am certainly in favour of the bill. These are the fishermen most affected by this legislation. I do not think too much benefit will be derived by the fishermen of Nova Scotia. I hope it will not be detrimental to the fishermen and industry of Nova Scotia.

When it comes to any type of measurement applied to the Atlantic provinces generally, I invariably notice that only the province having a Progressive Conservative government suffers. The other three provinces will benefit more from this proposal than will the province of Nova Scotia.

My objections to the bill stem from the fact that there are a number of plants, particularly in my riding, specializing in certain processes. For example, I can think of four or five plants specializing in pickled, boneless cod. There are the Smith people at Shag Harbour, the Sable Fish Packers at Clark Harbour, the Co-operative in East Pubnico, Hopkins in Wood Harbour and others involved in processing boneless cod process. The process has been developed through the drive and initiative of these people. They have experienced marketing problems in the past, and they may do so in the future, but I do not think the market is bleak at the moment. It does not seem to me that the bill will be of any benefit to a specialized industry of this type.

I hope the operations of this corporation will not create unemployment by putting some of our private enterprises out of business. It is important for any area that it should maintain small, local industries. If the establishment of a corporation means that some of these smaller fish plants will suffer, I hope the minister will proceed carefully and be prepared to amend the legislation later if necessary.

I ask the minister what is meant by clause 22 on page 10 of the bill. I hope it means that certain businesses in some areas will not be touched by the operations of the corporation if it is felt they would be detrimental to them. I have in mind the type of business I have just mentioned, or any other specialized parts of the industry. I do not wish to see the employees of these businesses laid off, particularly the women who have acquired a certain skill.

I wonder why the highly energetic Premier of Newfoundland has not introduced a provincial bill along these lines, especially as this measure affects Newfoundland fishermen for the most part. My colleague says he has. The reason it is not working may be that the federal government is involved in exports. If that is so, I wonder why the government does not bring in a bill which would affect only a certain area, if this bill is detrimental to some parts of Canada. We will see how this legislation works. As I mentioned, I hope the minister will be able to amend the legislation if it does not work.

I understand, also, that provinces can opt in or out of this plan. I would like to caution the minister about the expense incurred by Crown corporations. As I stated at the beginning, I do not look favourably on Crown corporations, and I hope the minister will be cautious and will ensure that this board will be operated effectively and efficiently. I want to raise just these few points. I might have more to say when the legislation comes before the committee.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to add my comments on Bill C-175 to establish the Canadian Saltfish Corporation, not only because, as most of my colleagues have said, it is a good bill but because I feel it may be the answer to many of the problems which exist in the fishing industry in my district. I commend the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) for the positive approach he has taken since taking over the fisheries portfolio, and for the legislation he has already put forth since taking office. However, as is the case with most legislation, there are bound to arise many unforeseen human errors. I am sure the minister would agree that this is true with regards to some of the past programs which were instituted on behalf of the fishermen.

The bill to establish the Canadian Saltfish Corporation is a good one but I, along with others, have some reservations and I would like to point out some weaknesses, not to criticize for the sake of criticism but in order to offer positive suggestions which have arisen out of my assessment of the weaknesses in most of the past legislation and programs which were designed to cure the ills of the fishermen. There are peculiar problems in various parts of the Atlantic region, which necessitate a special appoach.

If I may make a general over-all criticism arising out of my short experience of politics, in assessing the fishing industry I believe it is a weakness in correlating and providing a system or plan whereby all the various programs support one another. If I may offer an example, I supported wholeheartedly the deficiency payment program. That was a good program but it seriously missed the boat in my district due to certain unforeseen factors. The deficiency payment program was an interim measure intended to compensate for the extraordinary situation which depressed the fishermen's income in 1968, and to avoid its recurrence in 1969. Payments will be made after February 1 on various grades of fish classified as to quality and character, such as light-salted, heavy-salted and split fish. I spent two weeks during the summer visiting many of the fishing villages in my riding, and in not one case where I inspected fish could I find any distinction made as to grade. Fish was purchased as one grade whether it was prime, maderia medium or small. Naturally, the fishermen lost out because they were paid according to the whims of the buyer. So again fishermen suffered because there was no grading or culling of fish. When they get the 50 per cent difference between the 1968 price and the target price, they will lose out on the greater difference which would exist if they had sold their fish by grade.

This emphasizes the fact that you can have all the programs you want, however good they appear on paper and however sincerely they are prepared—and I assure the minister that he has all my commendation for his sincerity—but what was the good of the deficiency payment program to the fishermen of the northwest coast of Newfoundland, when they were deprived of their livelihood because of the weak restrictions on fishing limits by the foreign draggers who appeared for many months in last year's fishing season?

As admirable as the deficiency payment program was, what is the point of deficiency payments when there are no fish to be caught? What good are deficiency payments if there is no culling and the fishermen are not given the advantage of trying to produce a better product, which the experts say should be done? We can have all the individual programs we want, and we can produce them on paper until they fill all the offices on Parliament hill, including the House of Commons, but we will never succeed unless we support the programs not only with money but by factors involved. This takes into account the fishing grounds, the facilities required and, most important of all, the guidance and leadership which we have not given the fishermen up to now. Equally important, we must have confidence in the fishermen who have the practical knowledge necessary and need our help.

Let me speak about some of the better programs which have been introduced through the initiative and good intentions of the government. Let us look first at the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, whereby an individual fisherman or a group of fishermen can get loans up to $25,000 at a preferred rate of interest in order to buy a boat or to purchase fishing gear or equipment. They have ten years to pay it back.

This is a good program because it gives the fisherman—on paper, mind you—the opportunity to get a loan at a bank or other lending institution, which he might not get under normal banking regulations, because it is guaranteed by the government. This program is designed to give fishermen with resourcefulness and initiative an opportunity to get themselves started in a competitive way in the fishing business. This is truly a wonderfully program, on paper. Just try to get a fisheries improvement loan in the province of Newfoundland! Just ask the many hundreds of fishermen in my district of Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe about this!

During my two years in politics I have found that only two fishermen in the whole province were granted loans under this program, and in order to find those two I had to take the word of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), after reading the list produced by his department. The staff of the office of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) is aware of the number of times I have asked for material on fisheries improvement loans to send to my constituents because of my faith in the program. Of the many hundreds I have sent out, only one man indicated he was able to get a loan from the bank in his area. He got the loan, but not through the plan under which he applied as laid down in the act. He was granted a loan which he could have obtained anywhere, and was charged 11.9 per cent interest instead of having the advantage of the preferred rate under the act. This is why I say we must have some confidence in the fishermen who are supposed to be encouraged. As far as Newfoundland is concerned, the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act is not worth the paper on which it is written.

Unless these matters are investigated and leadership is given to support the fishermen, we will never give them a decent start. Perhaps the loans offered under this legislation will overcome the serious lack of trust in those for whom its benefits are intended. I certainly hope that is the case.

The resettlement program is also good on paper but leaves much to be desired when put into practice. This emphasizes a lack of proper appreciation of its intention. The main weakness here is the lack of infrastructural logistics in providing the public facilities required in growth centres, in order to properly receive those who are relocated. We can designate growth centres for as long as we want, but they must be capable of providing the necessary facilities to allow a new resident to get the new start in life which the program is designed to give him. Again there is a lack of intersupport for the program.

I could give members many examples of frustration in this regard, but the one that sticks in my mind refers to a man who came to see me about welfare. He started out in one community with two motor boats, a horse, a truck, 23 sheep and his own garden in which he produced all the needs of his family. He enjoyed life.

After making three moves, he ended up a stone's throw from the community from which he started and is receiving $112 a month in welfare for himself and a family of five. Without dwelling on all the other good programs, provincial and federal, such as the Fisheries Act, the Coastal Fisheries Protection regulations, the fishing vessel indemnity regulations and the fisheries loan boards, I suggest there must be an interrelationship with other departments of federal jurisdiction such as Public Works and Regional Economic Expansion.

I become a little tired and frustrated when I receive the same stock answer to requests for breakwaters, community-stages and other facilities which the fishermen must have in order to derive any benefit from this new corporation. In answer to the many requests I make of the Department of Public Works, I receive a similar tale of woe. I am told that on investigation it was found that due to the fact that the number of fishermen is decreasing over the years, and that the fisherman's income is decreasing, it is found uneconomical to accede to my requests.

I ask the minister how he expects the number of fishermen to increase, or their income to increase, if in the first place they do not have the necessary facilities. Let me refer to one example in the community of Anchor Point. I quote from a letter received from the provincial member of the district, who is also the provincial Minister of Public Works:

> With reference to Anchor Point, this, as you know is one of the most prosperous settlements in St. Barbe North with some of the best fishermen on the whole northwest coast—

I have been endeavouring for the past few years to get a breakwater and combination community stage and freezer, as well as a haul-up and fish drying area ... I do hope you will do your utmost to try and secure these requirements during your term of office.

Well, I have tried. I am sure the Minister of Fisheries, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand), as well as the district directors, know that I have tried for the past 18 months. I receive fine answers of agreement but then I hear the familiar tale of woe. I am told that departmental investigations reveal that about 52 fishermen operate 44 boats and use the public wharf facility. They say they agree there is a need, but unfortunately funds are not available; or that it is the view of the department that a community-stage, a fresh fish holding unit or a bait-holding facility are not required. I ask when they will be required. Are we waiting for the fishermen to become so discouraged that they go on welfare?

I hope to have an opportunity to deal with my misgivings about the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and its responsibilities in relation to the fishing industry in Newfoundland. But in the desire to complete the debate today I shall leave this question until I have another opportunity. I hope the authority vested in the Saltfish Corporation will be a means of overcoming the problems regarding loans. I hope the attitude of the banks in denying fishermen with initiative and resourcefulness an opportunity to obtain a loan to improve their lot as fishermen will not be adopted by the corporation. If I might be so bold, I would suggest that the criteria used for granting these loans must not be on the basis of the fisherman's security, because he has not been given the opportunity to build up any security due to the failure of past legislation to protect him and his industry.

I should like to make one final comment in respect of liaison and communication. There has been a complete lack of communication, by officials below the level of district officer, with the fishermen. I hope when the advisory boards and advisory committees are appointed we will realize the extreme importance of consultation with individuals or groups in all areas. This must be done even if it is necessary to enlarge the committees. I hope there will be no skimping in respect of staff, and that the officials will go to the fishing communities to explain the benefits under the act and to give the guidance and leadership required in order to produce a better quality of fish and so improve the income of the fisherman. There is also great need for communication with the many development associations which have sprung up and are becoming involved in the problems of their communities and districts. They are there to help, and I hope we will listen to the grass-roots advice they offer for the good of all concerned.

I hope that every section of the province will be represented on the advisory committees, because of the peculiar problems that exist in their communities. Let us forget political appointments and screen-out the capable and the devoted rather than the patronized.

I join others on this side of the House in support of this bill, Mr. Speaker. I hope the minister will take the suggestions in the spirit in which they are intended, to produce the best legislation possible and to build a base out of the resources that have been staring us in the face for hundreds of years. Let us by co-operation and good will gain the respect and the confidence of the fisherman in the Atlantic region by showing him that he is deserving of equal opportunity with all other Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, this bill is of great interest to the fishermen of the Gaspé district and of the Quebec North Shore. As it is nearly six o'clock, I will be very brief as I would like the bill to be referred to the committee as soon as possible. Besides, I will have an opportunity to discuss the matter when third reading of the bill is moved.

[English]

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my appreciation to hon. members for their patience and courtesy in working overtime this afternoon, listening mainly to members from Newfoundland talking about fish. But it is Friday anyway, so it is appropriate.

I do not oppose the principle of Bill C-175, an act to establish a Saltfish Corporation and saltfish. I, along with my colleagues from Newfoundland, welcome it and we congratulate the Minister. We congratulate him for at least trying, which is more than many of his predecessors appeared to do.

This measure is being hailed in some quarters as the end of all the problems for the fishermen engaged in the saltfish industry, or to use the $5 word, the panacea for all their problems. I am afraid I do not share in this enthusiasm. I wish it were so, but it is just not so.

As a Newfoundland fisherman would say, the minister has "a noggin to scrape," meaning a very difficult task, if this new corporation is to be instituted and truly used to improve the lot of the fisherman. We have seen many plans and schemes come and go which were ostensibly intended to aid the fishermen but ended up as the means whereby those other than fishermen could afford winter holidays down south, palatial homes and Cadillac comfort. I hope that this is truly the start of a real breakthrough for our Atlantic fishermen engaged in the saltfish industry. For the new corporation to be successful I think we must constantly remember its duties expressed in clause 23(b) as "increasing returns to fishermen." I think this is the line that should stand out. All members of the corporation should be aware of it at all times.

I am concerned that in the bill I see quite a large part devoted to inspection and policing of its provisions, including quality control, but no provision is spelled out whereby assistance and advice are given to our hundreds of small producers of saltfish, to help them produce a product as efficiently and as sanitarily as possible, ensuring that it will pass a rigid inspection and consequently result in the highest possible return to the fishermen. It is not enough to have an army of inspectors turning thumbs down. The reasons for such rejections must be pointed out, steps taken and assistance and advice given to correct them.

I do not think a grant limited to $100,000 to be spread over the five participating provinces, for the initial establishment of the corporation, is very generous at all. Surely, this corporation for which almost everyone expresses such great hope and enthusiasm, could have a little better send-off than this. Surely, the minister's colleagues who hold the purse-strings could be convinced to share a little more in the minister's enthusiasm.

For centuries, Mr. Speaker, the marketing of saltcod produced in Newfoundland has been done by sloppy, slipshod, hit-and-miss methods. I am delighted that a serious attempt is to be made in the area of controlled marketing including packaging, etc., with regulations by the corporation governing all export and interprovincial trade in saltfish. Rigid quality control coupled with aggressive, imaginative marketing could raise the lowly saltcod to the prominence which such a delicious, nutritious and valuable food deserves.

Mr. Speaker, apart from our export trade in saltfish, it never fails to amaze me that so many people right here in Canada have never heard of Newfoundland saltcod. They do not know what they are missing. I blame the government of Canada and the government of Newfoundland for not promoting this delicacy and introducing it to our fellow Canadians across the country, as well as the export trade.

I remember last year, while the Standing Committee on Transportation was visiting St. John's, Newfoundland, the committee members were invited to the home of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) to enjoy the hospitality for which the Jamiesons are famous. There was a magnificent spread, Mr. Speaker, turkey, ham, hot dishes, cold dishes and God only knows what else. The Kelligrew's soirée had nothing on it. But the dish which really appealed to the members who were representative of all Canada was the traditional Newfoundland fish and brewis. I took particular note of the way the 20 or 30 mainlanders savoured this delicacy. It may be that their appetites were a little whetted by the stimulant known as screech, but the fact remains that they did go back for second and third helpings. While the Jamiesons may have had ham and turkey next day, I doubt if they had "fish and brewis".

I hope that one of the first things the corporation does, along with promoting export trade, is aggressively promote the sale of saltcod in our own country and the rest of North America. If the name must be changed from saltcod to some fancy-sounding name, and if it must be dressed up in a candy-striped package to appeal to our discerning and advertising mesmerized fellow Canadians and fellow North Americans, then let's do it. We in Newfoundland are a captive market, Mr. Speaker—half a million souls who produce nothing that I know of that our fellow Canadians consume. From the time we turn down our Quebec-made bedcovers in the morning, step out of our Quebec-made pyjamas, use our Ontario-produced toothpaste in a bathroom equipped from Ontario, and through the livelong day, everything that we put on, rub on or spray on comes from another part of Canada.

We are a captive market and I feel there should be some reciprocal trade. In that way, Mr. Speaker, not only would we be getting the goodwill of the Canadian people with regard to our produce, but I think we would be showing our export markets that indeed we have a good product—it is fit to eat because we eat it ourselves. I do not blame the people of Canada but, as I said before, I blame the government for not long ago adopting an aggressive and imaginative program for putting this product on the local market. There may then be such a demand from world markets that we would be surprised. Canadians are very well respected, and I am sure our saltfish would be too.

Of course, I also hope that demand for saltfish will be strong and that we may be able to keep up with that demand. I am very serious about this and would like to see local markets promoted and see the product enjoy some respect.

I know the minister must be given some time in order to close the debate, so I will say no more. May I indicate, however, that I shall have some questions when we come to the clause by clause consideration of the bill in committee.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I will not say very much in this debate, other than applaude the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Cyr) and his constituents. I could make many observations and talk longer on this subject than other members of the House, because in my constituency more people will be affected by this legislation than those in any other constituency. I think I can say that without fear of contradiction.

We are happy with this legislation. Even though all hon. members will not benefit to the same extent as I and my constituents, I am glad to see they are supporting the legislation, the credit for which must go to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) and not the Premier of Newfoundland. I shall have more to say about that in committee.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, may I first thank all hon. members here who have contributed in the debate, and, more particularly, those who have resisted speaking at some length this afternoon with a view to making a solid contribution in committee later. As hon. members know, the best work is done in committees. I am glad to be able to get the saltfish legislation before our committee next week.

I wish to say very few words. We are talking about approximately 20,000 fishermen and, if you include their dependents, 100,000 people, all of them resident in the Atlantic region. By and large they are on the bottom rung of the income ladder in this country and yet they are among the hardest working people in Canada. Obviously we owe it to them to provide the best legislation we can. As some hon. members have said, this is only a beginning and, as others have said, we must integrate this legislation with other legislation which exists now and which is to be brought along. I agree with both comments.

The main objective of this particular piece of legislation must be the improvement of the incomes and the lot of those engaged in the saltfishery. Some remarks earlier may have left the impression that some of the people who produce saltfish in the Atlantic region will not be able to sell their product. That is not true. This corporation must buy all saltfish offered in the areas which come under the act. In other words, all saltfish offered for sale will be bought.

Of course, the corporation must have some discretion as to quality and it will increasingly put emphasis on high quality and pay top prices for that quality and reduce the price for the poorer qualities. To repeat, anyone offering saltfish will be able to find a market for his product. The area within which the corporation must buy the saltfish offered will include, I believe, all the territory within the province of Newfoundland and Labrador, all of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. So far as the province of Quebec is concerned, I understand that only the north shore along the Gulf of St. Lawrence will be included in the legislation passed by the province of Quebec, but not the Gaspé. One of the reasons I believe is that saltfishing in the Gaspé is relatively prosperous. It has concentrated on very high quality; the Gaspé cure is famous and the area's product sells principally in the United States. This shows, of course, why the saltfish corporation should stress quality and what it may do in future in promoting saltfish in the markets of the world and promoting a product of which we will be proud.

There was reference to a crown-owned corporation backing out private enterprise. My impression of the industry really is that we need all the enterprise that we can get, not only the enterprise of the fishermen but also all the enterprise of the existing trades. There is no problem here except perhaps in southern Nova Scotia. The Nova Scotia government has agreed with us that several qualities of saltfish, for the time being, will not be included under the act, those being principally the boneless saltfish produced in southern Nova Scotia principally for markets around New York.

It is possible under the act to exclude any grade or quality of saltfish. A province may exclude particular areas, if they wish, from the ambit of this corporation. It is my expectation that in Nova Scotia the boneless product will not be included under the act. It will be brought in by a change in regulations, but the province would have to concur in this. I think one of the worries of the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) is removed in that connection.

I think I can end where I began. The fisherman has been looking forward to some action along these lines from government at both the provincial and federal levels. This corporation, if well managed, will give him a price for his product which he deserves and which he will earn. We must have other related programs in the Department of Fisheries and in the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. I believe the Saltfish Corporation is a good start. It is a sound idea. It is a corporation in which I have confidence and which I believe will be well run. I look forward to hearing constructive suggestions in committee next week.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being after five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m.

At 5.55 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

PROCEDURE ON MOTION TO ESTABLISH JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as announced last week the business for both today and tomorrow will be a debate on the motion to establish a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the constitution, which stands in the Prime Minister's name which is now under government notices of motions and which it is assumed will be transferred in due course to government orders today. There have been discussions among the parties as to the procedure for handling this matter and I think there might be found to be general agreement for a special order to deal with this debate.

The first characteristic of it would be that the ordinary time limits provided under Standing Order 31 would be suspended, that an initial spokesman for each of the parties would be entitled to speak for 40 minutes and that thereafter speakers would be entitled to speak for 20 minutes. Second, the debate would be a two-day debate and all questions necessary to a decision on the motion would be put immediately before the ordinary time for adjournment on the second day.

There has also been a suggestion, and unfortunately I have not had full opportunity to consult on this point, that on each of the two days private members' hour might be suspended in order to allow maximum opportunity for participation. I wonder if that might be agreeable and if that could be a special order of the House?

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of the subject and the wish of many hon. members to participate, although the terms of reference relating to this matter are somewhat complex we feel that in the interest of the widest possible debate this is the proper course to follow and would be perfectly agreeable to it.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we have agreed to this procedural motion.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed? Is it so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HUMAN RIGHTS

STATEMENT ON RACIAL DISCRIMINATION ALLEGED BY CERTAIN STUDENTS FROM WEST INDIES

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, January 19, the hon. member for Hamilton West directed a question to me and to the Prime Minister regarding allegations of racial discrimination in Canada. I should like to thank the hon. member for giving me the opportunity of making a statement on this important matter and of expressing what I hope is the view of all hon. members of the House.

Since the incident which occurred at the Sir George Williams University computer centre in February, 1969, various statements have been made, both in Canada and in the Caribbean, by some of those accused of offences in connection with that incident and by other persons with an interest in the matter, alleging that Canada has a racist society and pursues racialist policies. As hon. members are aware, such statements are without foundation. The fact that the Canadian government does not engage in, and will not tolerate in any department or agency for which it is responsible, policies which involve discrimination on grounds of race, creed, colour or ethnic origin is well known. Furthermore, as an adherent to the United Nations Declaration on Human Rights, and a signatory of the international convention on the elimination of all forms of racial discrimination, Canada has affirmed its opposition to such discrimination. The government reiterates its fullest support of these principles and objectives.

Racial Discrimination

Since the events of February, 1969, I have met on several occasions with a number of people interested in the Sir George Williams University incident. At one such meeting with a group of students and professors, I gave them the government's assurance that the events at Sir George would in no way affect Canadian government policy with regard to the admission of Caribbean students or the functioning of Canadian educational assistance programs. I have also met twice with diplomatic representatives of the Commonwealth countries of the Caribbean, when I assured them that our immigration regulations and policies would not be altered as a result of these events. I also expressly made the point that the incident at Sir George Williams University should not be allowed to damage relations between Canada and their countries.

Racial discrimination is a cancerous growth which gnaws away the humanity of society and is an example of what Robert Burns called "man's inhumanity to man". Canada is not free from racial prejudice. In this, as in all countries, there are people who practise racial discrimination. Racial discrimination arises from ignorance and fear. It cannot be eradicated by Acts of Parliament or regulations, although these can and do restrain its more extreme manifestations.

The Canadian government is opposed to racism in any form and is working to create the conditions in which our society will be free of it. The government cannot carry out this task alone. It calls for the best efforts of all Canadians of good will. Parents and teachers, who form the attitudes of the young, bear a special responsibility.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I am sure I speak not only for members on this side of the House but all hon. members who are concerned about the problem of discrimination because of race, creed or colour when I say I am pleased that the government has stood up to be counted throughout the world for the benefit of those who have the attitude that our eyes continue to be closed to the ultimate results. This has now been discounted. Unquestionably there are many in our great country who continue to practice acceptance of a man on the basis of race, creed or colour. This must stop.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: We have seen the results of such an attitude in other countries which I need not mention. Those who continue to adhere to this philosophy must realize the harm that can come to this country. We must maintain our good relations with the West Indies because there is mutual benefit from such a relationship.

I am pleased to see that the House generally has accepted the spirit of my question. I am also pleased that Canada has stood up to be counted as a country that welcomes all people, regardless of race, creed or colour, who want to come to this country in freedom and take part productively by becoming an actual and viable force in the mainstream of Canadian life.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, we welcome the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. We have always supported the international conventions of the United Nations and of the International Labour Organization. Canada itself has fair employment practices legislation and the Bill of Rights on its statute books, and we support the principles enunciated in the minister's statement.

We welcome particularly the statement that despite what happened at Sir George Williams University the government has no intention of altering its policy under which Caribbean students have been admitted in large numbers to study in Canada.

Without expressing any view on the trials now in progress, or on some of the things which happened at Sir George Williams—indeed, it would be improper for me to comment on the trials at this point—I express the hope that when the trials have been completed and the students have paid the penalty, if any, meted out by the courts, the government of Canada, through the Department of Manpower and Immigration, will avoid taking a very legalistic approach to this matter. I trust it will not arrange for the automatic deportation of these people as it has a right to do when crimes have been committed and convictions obtained.

There is one further point I should like to make, though it does not relate directly to the responsibility of the federal government. It seems to us that the decision of the university to bar from registration this year the students who have been charged, before they have been convicted or given an opportunity to defend themselves and explain what happened, is wrong. To a certain extent at least they have, in fact, been tried and found guilty by the university, and for this reason we believe the course taken is wrong.

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank sincerely the Secretary of State for External Affairs, on behalf of my colleagues, for the statement he has just made in respect of racism.

I appreciated the statement made by my hon. friend, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). May I say that I am proud of his participation in the business of the House, because, once more, I repeat, once more this proves that any person, regardless of his race or his color, can take an efficient part, not only in the business of the State, but also in the administration and the operation of a State.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the real issue is not simply a matter of race, colour or creed, but rather a problem of individuals. Since Canada throws her doors open to all sorts of individuals, the presence of a certain foreigner in Canada at this time is worrying a lot of people, especially some ministers of the province of Quebec. I rather think it is in that field that Canada should enforce strict supervision in order to prevent some trouble makers from infiltrating into our country.

IMMIGRATION

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE ON PROPOSED RESETTLEMENT IN ALBERTA

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I promised the hon. member for Saint-Denis last week or the week before that I would table correspondence on the subject of the proposed resettlement of certain immigrants in Alberta, and if I have leave I will table that correspondence.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

On the order: Government notices of motions:

That a Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be appointed to examine and report upon proposals, made public, or which are from time to time made public by the Government of Canada, on a number of subjects related to the Constitution of Canada during the course of the comprehensive review of the Constitution of Canada, which review was agreed upon at the Constitutional Conference of the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premiers and Prime Ministers of the Provinces in February, 1968, and alternative proposals on the same subjects;

That twenty members of the House of Commons, to be designated by the House at a later date, be members of the joint committee on the part of this House;

That the committee have power to appoint, from among its members, such sub-committees as it may deem advisable or necessary;

That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House;

That the committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers, and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting Their Honours to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems so advisable, some of its members to act on the proposed joint committee.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of Standing Order 21, this notice of motion is transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders later this day.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

NORTHWEST PASSAGE—ASSISTANCE TO "MANHATTAN"

Question No. 89—Mr. Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley):

What is the estimated Canadian Government expenditure in assisting the US-owned oil tanker Manhattan in its navigation of the Northwest Passage?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Costs that are clearly identifiable as related to the Manhattan operation amounted to approximately $23,700. These comprise consultants fees, salaries, travelling expenses, rental of equipment and expenses concerned with press representation.

The CCGS John A. Macdonald would have been employed in Arctic waters for approximately the same time even if she had not accompanied the Manhattan and there is no realistic way of determining what extra costs were incurred in the Manhattan operation. If any, they were offset by a certain amount of fuel supplied at no cost by the Manhattan.

An increased programme of aerial observation of ice conditions was carried out over that normally undertaken. The Manhattan benefitted considerably from this but it was also of very great value in increasing our own knowledge of Arctic ice conditions and this was largely due to the loan of specialized electronic sensing devices not possessed by the Department at no cost by the Humble Oil Company. Here too there is no way of finding a realistic apportionment of cost.

POLICY DEVELOPMENT BRANCH, CTC

Question No. 134—Mr. Skoberg:

1. Has the Policy Development Branch of the Canadian Transport Commission been disbanded and, if so, for what reasons?

2. What has happened to each of the staff members of the Policy Development Branch as a result of this action, and in particular, its Director, Mr. J. A. Macaluso?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. No.

2. N/A.

GRANTS TO INDIAN ASSOCIATIONS

Question No. 143—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

1. For the fiscal year 1969-70, what is the (a) operational and (b) organizational grant being awarded to each association of Indian people, by name, in Canada?

2. What are the anticipated grants for the fiscal years 1970-71, 1971-72, 1972-73 and 1973-74?

3. For the fiscal year 1969-70, what is the salary and operational expense for the new section in the Department of Indian Affairs responsible for the implementation of the government's policy for native people, under Dr. David Munro, the newly appointed assistant deputy minister?

4. What are the anticipated salary and operational expenses for this new section for the fiscal years 1970-71, 1971-72, 1972-73 and 1973-74?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Per capita operational and organizational grants to Indian organizations.

Association	Payment
National Indian Brotherhood	$61,000
Union of New Brunswick Indians	4,156
Lennox Island Band (P.E.I.)	4,418
Union of Nova Scotia Indians	4,452
Indians of Quebec Association	25,376
River Desert Band (Maniwaki)	926
Ontario Indians	42,981
Iroquois & Allied Indians	10,000
Manitoba Indian Brotherhood	33,358
Federation of Saskatchewan Indians	33,852
Union of B.C. Indian Chiefs	46,046
Yukon Native Brotherhood	2,562
Indian Brotherhood of the N.W.T.	6,082
Indian Association of Alberta	27,322 (money available but refunded by Association.)

While the above funds are available, partial payments only have been made in most cases pending approval of Indian Bands to release balance to Associations.

2. 1970-71, $315,000 total, with $63,000 allocated for the National Indian Brotherhood, calculated at the rate of 25 cents per registered Indian in Canada; and the remainder payable directly to Indian bands at the rate of $1 per registered Indian band member. (The Bands will then disburse the grant funds to whichever organization they wish to support.) 1971-72, 1972-73 and 1973-74. Similar grants are anticipated, subject to discussion with the Indian people, and subject to Treasury Board approval.

3. Salary and operational expenses for seven month period $700,000.

4. Estimated for 1970-71, salary and operational expenses $1,250,000. There have been no approved projections beyond the fiscal year 1970-71.

PROPOSED AIRPORT SITE, TORONTO

Question No. 176—Mr. Brewin:

1. Has the Department of Transport participated in any way with the Toronto Harbour Commissioners in the preparation of plans or studies for a projected airport at or near the filled-in lands on the lakefront South of East end of the City of Toronto?

2. If so, what is the proposed site of the airport, the projected capacity and size?

3. Have any studies been prepared by and for the Department of Transport or the Toronto Harbour Commissioners as to noise pollution that might be affected by the construction and operation of the airport?

4. Have any studies been prepared by or for the Department of Transport or the Toronto Harbour Commissioners as to the likely traffic to and from the airport, the flow of passengers, visitors and employees that would use such an airport, and whether there would be satisfactory accessibility and parking accommodation?

5. Have there been any correspondence or communications between the Department of Transport, and (a) The Toronto Harbour Commissioners (b) the Province of Ontario (c) the Municipality of the City of Toronto (d) the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto or each or any agency or representative of the four named authorities and, in particular, have the Councils of the Municipality of the City of Toronto and the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto been consulted (all of the above) in relation to the projected airport?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The Department has received a proposal from the Toronto Harbour Commissioners that an airport be constructed in the waterfront area. This proposal is currently being evaluated.

2. The proposed site is approximately four miles east of the existing Island Airport, on land to be reclaimed east of the eastern spit. The projected capacity would accommodate a peak hour load of approximately 40-50 aircraft movements. The size of the development would be approximately 700 acres of land.

3. Noise studies for the proposed site are not yet completed. This site is being evaluated along with others in the Toronto area by a Project Team charged with the task of site evaluation. Noise is a major consideration in the evaluation.

4. Traffic studies covering all aspects of this question are now in progress.

5. There has been extensive communication with the Province through a joint committee dealing with airport site evaluation, and limited communication with the other named agencies. When all relevant data has been assembled to permit meaningful discussion and evaluation, all levels of government concerned with the waterfront location will be directly involved in the deliberations.

URBAN RENEWAL AND PUBLIC HOUSING PROJECTS

Question No. 218—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Since the government announced its freeze on urban renewal and public housing projects, how many projects of each type have been approved by the federal government in each province in Canada?

2. (a) What amount has the federal government agreed to contribute to each project (b) what is the population of each province to which grants have been made (c) what is the percentage of the total population of Canada in each of the provinces to which grants have been made (d) what is the percentage of money approved for each province?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): 1. Three urban renewal projects have been approved by Governor-in-Council for implementation since the announcement on August 14, 1969, curtailing urban renewal activity. However, as I indicated in my statement in the House of Commons on December 18, 1969, negotiations are underway respecting a number of other projects in eight provinces to which all three levels of government have a degree of commitment. A "freeze" was not placed on public housing projects.

2. (a) The federal government's estimated gross contributions to these urban renewal projects are: London, Ontario, $1,879,416; Cloverdale area, District Municipality of Surrey, B.C., $334,225; Port Coquitlam, B.C., $143,873. (b) 1966 Census population figures for Ontario and British Columbia are 6,960,870 and 1,873,674, respectively. (c) The percentage of the population in Ontario to the total population of Canada is 34.8 per cent and in British Columbia, 9.4 per cent. (d) The percentage of such funds approved in Ontario is 80 per cent and in British Columbia, 20 per cent.

AIR CANADA—SALARY INCREASES

Question No. 346—Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West):

1. What was the date of the last general salary and wage increase granted to all major separate categories of Air Canada personnel prior to April 1, 1963, its effective date, and what was the percentage increase?

2. From April 1, 1963 to date, what have been the dates (both of publication and coming into force) of any general salary and wage increase for all major separate categories of Air Canada personnel and what was the average percentage for each such increase?

3. What cumulative average percentage increase does the salary and wage level to all major separate categories of Air Canada personnel as at present date reflect when compared to the relative salary and wage level of April 1, 1963?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1. The major separate categories of Air Canada personnel are: (a) pilots, represented by the Canadian Air Line Pilots Association (CALPA); (b) flight attendants, represented by the Canadian Air Line Flight Attendants' Association (CALFAA); (c) maintenance, station services purchases and stores, represented by the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers (IAMAW); (d) sales employees represented by the Canadian Air Line Employees' Association (CALEA).

Category	Effective date	Percentage increase
CALPA	January 1, 1962	2.0
CALFAA	January 1, 1962	5.0
IAMAW	July 1, 1962	4.0
CALEA	September 1, 1962	3.0

July 30, 1969	August 1, 1969	September 30, 1971	16.0

* Previous contract had a wage re-opener clause dating back to July 1, 1963.

3. Cumulative increase in Wage Awards from April 1, 1963 to present: Pilots *: (a) General increase, 39.0 per cent; (b) automatic wage increase, 20.0 per cent; (c) total a + b, 59.0 per cent; flight attendants, 42.0 per cent; mechanics, 56.0 per cent; passenger agents, 49.0 per cent.

* Pilots receive two forms of wage increase: 1. Negotiated wage increases. 2. Wage increases produced by their pay formula when they fly more productive aircraft. This formula is based on weight, speed of the aircraft, etc.

CNR—SALARY INCREASES

Question No. 347—Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West):

1. What was the date of the last general salary and wage increase granted to operating groups and non operating groups of the Canadian National Railways employees prior to April 1, 1963, its effective date, and what was the percentage increase?

2. For April 1, 1963, to date, what have been the dates (both of publication and coming into force) of any general salary and wage increase for operating groups and non operating groups of the Canadian National Railways employees and what was the average percentage increase for each such increase?

3. What cumulative average percentage increase does the salary and wage level to operating groups and non operating groups of the Canadian National Railways employees as at present date reflect when compared to the relative salary and wage level of April 1, 1963?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows:

1. Operating Employees

	Effective date	Percentage increase phased over life of contract
Locomotive Engineers	May 1, 1961	6.5
Locomotive Firemen and Hostlers	April 1, 1961	6.5 Passenger service 4.0 freight and yard service

Questions

ADDITIONAL EMPLOYEES, PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION

Question No. 384—Mr. Coates:

1. How many additional employees have been taken on strength by the Public Service Commission since the date on which the government austerity program was announced by the Prime Minister?

2. What is the total amount of the annual salaries of the additional personnel that have been taken on strength?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: 1. Since the date on which the government austerity program was announced by the Prime Minister the Public Service Commission has taken on 95 additional continuing employees. These employees were appointed to the Language Bureau which is not restricted under the austerity program.

2. The total amount of annual salaries for the continuing employees is $870,058.

DISPOSAL OF NEWFOUNDLAND RAILWAY PASSENGER CARS

Question No. 418—Mr. Marshall:

1. What is the intention of the government concerning the retention or disposal of railway passenger cars of the Newfoundland Railway?

2. If a decision has been reached for disposal, have any offers been made to purchase the cars and, if so, (a) by whom (b) at what price?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. Subject to the requirements of the Canadian Transport Commission Order No. R 5185, it is the intention to eventually dispose of all of this equipment.

2. One offer received. Till any disposition is made it is felt it should be kept confidential.

CONVERSION OF POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT INTO CROWN CORPORATION

Question No. 424—Mr. Fortin:

1. What is the present status of the studies by Kates, Peat, Marwick, and Co. on the conversion of the Post Office Department into a Crown Corporation?

2. When did they receive their terms of reference and when is the report due?

3. Will the report be tabled in Parliament so that Members may study the advantages and disadvantages of this new form of administration?

4. Does the government intend to apply this formula to the management of the following government services (a) operation of airports (b) Canada Pension Plan (c) Canadian Government elevators (d) Unemployment Insurance fund?

[Mr. Loiselle.]

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): 1. Completed.

2. (a) December 6, 1968; (b) Due on September 15, 1969, received on November 20, 1969.

3. Yes.

4. (a) (b) (c) This is a matter of government policy which would be announced in the usual way. (d) The Unemployment Insurance Commission is already a Crown corporation according to Section 76 and Schedule B of the Financial Administration Act.

PROPOSED CNR TRAIN SERVICE WITHDRAWALS—EMPLOYEE LAY-OFFS

Question No. 448—Mr. Orlikow:

How many employees will be laid off by the Canadian National Railway in each region if it is permitted to discontinue the train operations it has proposed to the Canadian Transportation Commission?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: The filing of applications for discontinuance of uneconomic passenger train services is a procedure which the Railways must follow under provisions of the National Transportation Act of 1967 to obtain decision from the Canadian Transport Commission as to the individual services that may be terminated and those which must be continued. It is only after a decision is made by the CTC that it will be feasible to trace through the seniority rights of the employees engaged in these services and estimate the number, if any, who will suffer loss in employment. Of those affected, many will find work in their own craft (engine and train crews), some will be transferred to other employment and others will be absorbed by normal attrition.

SUBSIDIES TO PRIVATE ENTERPRISES—RECEIPT OF SHARES

Question No. 465—Mr. Fortin:

1. Is it the policy of the government to require that all private enterprise receiving subsidies remit the equivalent in common or preferred shares and, if not, does the government intend to adopt such a policy?

2. Was such a policy applied in the case of Panarctic Oils Ltd.?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development as follows: 1. (a) No, (b) No.

2. By agreement tabled in the House on December 12, 1967, the Government made a grant of $9,022,500 to Panarctic Oils Ltd. in respect of which the Government received 900,000 preferred shares of Panarctic at par value of $10 each and 225,000 common shares (without par value) valued by Panarctic at 10 cents per share. Other participants subscribed $11,027,500 in respect of the issue of 1,100,000 preferred shares and 275,000 common shares. Thus, the Government holds a 45 per cent interest in Panarctic directly proportionate to its grant.

CN FREIGHT SERVICE OPERATING COSTS

Question No. 479—Mr. Laprise:

What was the 1968 operating surplus or deficit of the Canadian National freight service on the folowing runs (a) Montreal-Chambord-Chicoutimi-Dolbeau and Quebec-Chicoutimi (b) Quebec-Senneterre-Cochrane and Montreal-Harvey-Senneterre-Rouyn-Noranda (c) Parent-Senneterre (d) La Tuque-Parent?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: Canadian National does not analyse its freight traffic on a train run or geographic basis since such a breakdown has no managerial significance. Statistics are taken off from time to time in the case of thin traffic density branch lines which are considered to be uneconomic and the system revenues derived from traffic originating and terminating at stations on the line under study are compared with the system avoidable costs incurred in handling this traffic in accordance with Section 314B (3) of the Railway Act.

In view of the type and volume of traffic being handled on the runs in question such a detailed analysis does not appear justified at this time and to extract the data would entail considerable time and expense.

CNR TURBOTRAINS

Question No. 504—Mr. Laprise:

1. How much did the CNR turbotrains cost?

2. Were they withdrawn from service and, if so, for what reasons and is it intended to return them to service?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. The turbotrain was constructed by United Aircraft Corporation and is owned by that Company. No capital investment in the cost thereof has been made by the Canadian National. Original estimates by United Aircraft Corporation of the cost of the five trains was $10 million.

2. The trains were withdrawn from service to permit undertaking modifications of some components which gave difficulty during operations. Some of the modifications require a considerable amount of research and engineering which is being undertaken by United Aircraft. When this work is completed and is proven to perform well under field testing, consideration will be given to returning the trains to service.

TELEGRAM AND CABLE TRANSMISSION

Question No. 509—Mr. Orlikow:

What are the results of the investigation into CN-CP telecommunications regarding the delays in the transmission of telegrams and cables as mentioned by the Minister of Transport in Hansard, July 16, 1969 on page 11288?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows. The delays in telegaph message handling resulted generally from the necessity of training new staff and those being absorbed into the new one-company managed message points. The problems have been overcome and the cause for complaint is felt to have been eliminated.

As to the handling of cables; in general the overseas cable operators depend on the telecommunication companies to handle distribution of their messages in Canada. Due to circumstances over which this Company has no control many of the cables are delayed outside of Canada. However, earlier in the year some problems were encountered in the Company's computer operation which occasioned delay in transmission of cables from Toronto.

Every available resource was marshalled in order to return the standard of service to normal. Traffic studies indicate that this has been accomplished and acceptable service provided over the past several months.

NEAR COLLISIONS, AIRCRAFT

Question No. 537—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many "near collisions" between aircraft flying in Canada have been reported to Airport officials and/or the Department of Transport in each of the years 1966, 1967 and 1968?

Questions

2. Have any additional safety precautions been ordered by the Department of Transport in the last three years and, if so, what are they?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The number of "near collisions" which have been reported to the Department of Transport are as follows: 1966—39; 1967—33; 1968—47.

2. (i) Positive Control of Canadian Airspace above 23,000 feet was introduced in 1966.

(ii) In the interest of improving flight safety in terminal areas, Extended Terminal Control Service was implemented at Toronto International Airport on 1 January, 1968.

(iii) Positive Control Zones have been established at 35 airports across the country.

(iv) Military Flying Areas have been designated in various locations to segregate military traffic from civil operations.

(v) There has been an increase of approximately 20 per cent in the amount of controlled airspace in the low level structure.

(vi) Seven short range, high definition radars have been installed at major terminals.

(vii) Six Scan Converted Radar Displays have been installed in control towers at major terminal airports.

(viii) Special operating procedures have been introduced to ensure separation of high performance aircraft from slower traffic.

(ix) In the interest of safety, Ab Initio Flight Training has been banned at the Vancouver, Winnipeg, Montreal and Toronto International Airports.

(x) In order to reduce collision hazard, aircraft are required to operate at reduced airspeeds flying below 3,000 feet within 10 miles of the centre of a controlled airport.

(xi) Since 1966, 13 new control towers have been opened at various airports across the country, and six mobile control towers have been supplied.

(xii) A computer which is capable of confliction prediction, has been installed at Gander Area Control Centre.

INCREASES AND DECREASES IN AIR FARES

Question No. 594—Mr. Harding:

Were there any increases or decreases in air fares allowed by the federal government for passenger services to any of the airlines in Canada during 1969 and, if so (a) when were the increases or decreases granted (b) which airlines received them (c) what was the percentage (d) what was the reason given for each increase or decrease?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Tolls for transportation by air carriers are not subject to approval by the Government or any of its agencies. However, the Canadian Transport Commission advises that a large number of tariff changes involving increases and decreases were filed during 1969 by air carriers with the Air Transport Committee of the Commission and are available for public inspection in accordance with the rules governing the construction and filing of tariffs.

LIQUID AND GAS PIPELINE SAFETY

Question No. 635—Mr. Mather:

1. Has the Department of Transport the responsibility for (a) liquid pipeline safety (b) natural gas pipeline safety?

2. What responsibility have the provincial and local governments in these fields?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Transport and the National Energy Board as follows: 1. No.

2. When a pipeline is located wholly within the boundaries of a province, the province has complete responsibility for pipeline safety.

AIR CANADA REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE OR CERTAIN ROUTES

Question No. 637—Mr. Roy (Timmins):

What was the revenue and expenditure for each year 1966, 1967 and 1968 of Air Canada on air routes (a) Toronto-North Bay-Earlton-Rouyn-Val D'Or and Ottawa (b) Toronto-Sudbury-Timmins (c) Toronto-Timmins?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Air Canada advises as follows: Air Canada's international system of allocating operating revenues and expenses does not make possible an answer in exactly the form requested. However, there is a breakdown for the Northern Ontario and Quebec service which includes all three of the routes mentioned, which can be provided:

	Operating Revenues	Operating Expenses
1966	$2,913,000	$4,070,000
1967	3,297,000	4,464,000
1968	4,198,000	5,512,000

The above revenues reflect traffic carried over the local routes without revenue for the carriage of any of this traffic onward over other routes of the Air Canada system. The operating expenses are the result of a fully allocated costing system (in accordance with procedures established by the Air Transport Committee) so that company overhead and indirect expenses are included as well as the local expenses directly involved.

SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT TAX RECEIPTS—PAYMENTS TO MEDICAL PLANS

Question No. 672—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

1. What is the estimated amount of money that the federal government will receive from the 2% Social Development Tax for (a) 1968 (b) 1969 (c) 1970?

2. What are the estimated amounts of money paid or to be paid by the federal government to the various Provincial Medical Plans for (a) 1968 (b) 1969 (c) 1970?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of National Revenue and National Health and Welfare as follows: 1. (a) Nil. The Social Development Tax was first levied in respect of 1969. (b) $501 million. (c) No estimate is available for 1970.

Newfoundland	—	$ 9.5 MM	$ 12.3 MM

SYDNEY-HALIFAX-MONTREAL RAILWAY SERVICE

Question No. 686—Mr. Corbin:

In answer to Question No. 1,353 on page 6675 of Hansard, 1st Session, 28th Parliament, to whom was Canadian National Railways referring when it refused requested information, on the basis that such information could be useful to its "competitors".

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: As a general rule information regarding specific traffic handlings or movements on a particular point to point basis can be useful to other carriers, i.e. airline, bus, truck, etc.

OPERATING COSTS OF CERTAIN DIPLOMATIC OFFICES

Question No. 701—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What was the total cost of operation of the diplomatic office of Canada in the Dominican Republic during the past fiscal year?

2. What was the total cost of operation of the diplomatic office of Canada in Ecuador during the past fiscal year?

3. What was the total cost of operation of the diplomatic office of Canada in Uruguay during the past fiscal year?

4. What was the total cost of operation of the diplomatic office in Berlin during the past fiscal year?

5. What was the total cost of operation of the office of the resident High Commissioner for Canada in Nicosia during the past fiscal year?

Questions

6. What was the total cost of Canadian offices associated with the International Joint Commission in Laos and Cambodia during the past fiscal year?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council):

	External Affairs	Industry, Trade and Commerce
1. Dominican Republic	130,470	40,588
2. Ecuador	80,503	Nil
3. Uruguay	97,549	16,401
4. Berlin	57,318	Nil
5. Nicosia, Cyprus	197,036	Nil
6. (i) Cambodia 105,894 / (ii) Laos 123,887	229,781	Nil

Note: Offices in Cambodia and Laos are associated with the International Commission for Supervision and Control in Indo-China.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT TRAVEL BUREAU

Question No. 717—Mr. McCleave:

1. Has the Canadian Government Travel Bureau a machine which answers requests for information by people about Canada?

2. In feeding the machine with the answers to inquiries, how many statements are available for selection?

3. What are the first three of such statements?

4. Have any complaints been received that the replies of the Bureau are incomprehensible or have avoided the question or have otherwise puzzled the letter recipient?

5. Is any part of the machine programmed to answer complaints concerning previous letters it has written?

6. Does the computer apply the signatures of human persons to its letters?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. The Canadian Government Travel Bureau uses a computer system to type letters in answer to requests for travel information about Canada. Trained personnel first review all such requests, to determine whether they may be answered through the computer system, utilizing prepared letters or a selection of prepared paragraphs stored in the computer memory bank, or whether the enquiries require individually dictated replies. Of the 2.2 million travel enquiries received by the Bureau in 1969, 1.4 million were answered by letters typed by the computer system.

2. The computer has available to it a memory bank of some 60 prepared letters, (e.g. a letter exclusive to hunting in Canada, another specific to camping) and 240 prepared paragraphs. These latter are on particular aspects or topics related to travel in Canada, (e.g. Border Crossing into Canada, Accommodation, Hunting and Firearms) and can be used in combination as directed by travel counsellors to answer a compound enquiry.

3. The first three of the list of 60 prepared letters concern acknowledgment of requests for specific Kits of travel literature. The first three of the range of 240 prepared paragraphs relate to the acknowledging of requests for detailed information that will assist the enquirers in completing their Canadian travel plans.

4. Complaints have been negligible in number. It is possible that, because of a mistake in judgment, a travel counsellor could select the wrong combination of standard reply paragraphs, or the wrong letter. It is also possible that the counsellor's instructions to the computer could be incorrectly transcribed or acted on in the preparation of the punchcard which activates the computer printer.

5. No. Any such letters of complaint are answered individually by staff.

6. The computer printer does not apply any signatures to the letters it produces. Auxiliary printing equipment adds the signature of the Director, Canadian Government Travel Bureau, to all letters produced by the computer.

AIRCRAFT LANDING CHARGES

Question No. 728—Mr. Reid:

1. Has the Department of Transport increased its charges for aircraft landing at DOT airports in Canada within the last two years and, if so, when and by how much each time?

2. What is the charge now by aircraft category and what has been the increase each time over the past two years for rated aircraft?

3. (a) Each time these rates have been increased, what has been the drop in air traffic by aircraft category, at DOT airports—Ottawa, Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg and Calgary (b) what has been the drop in traffic in charter aircraft at the airports given above since each increase in rates?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport):

1. No.

2. The landing fees are based on aircraft weight, except in the case of flying training. The schedule of landing fees is attached.

3. Since there has been no increase in landing fees within the last two years question 3 would not appear to apply.

Schedule of Landing Fees

Flying Club or Commercial Flying School: For each hour flown by the aircraft, $ .30.

Domestic Flights: 1. For each 1,000 pounds or fraction thereof of aircraft where weight is not over 45,000 pounds, $ .20. 2. For each 1,000 pounds or fraction thereof where weight is (a) over 45,000 but not over 100,000, $ .25; (b) over 100,000, $ .30. 3. Minimum fee payable regardless of weight, $1.00.

International Flights: 1. For each 1,000 pounds or fraction thereof of aircraft where weight is (a) not over 70,000, $ .25; (b) over 70,000 but not over 147,000, $ .35; (c) over 147,000, $ .50. 2. Minimum fee payable regardless of weight, $1.00.

Trans-Oceanic Flights: 1. For each 1,000 pounds or fraction thereof of aircraft where weight is (a) not over 90,000, $1.33; (b) over 90,000 but not over 125,000, $1.40; (c) over 125,000 but not over 150,000, $1.46; (d) over 150,000, $1.51.

AIR SERVICE, WABUSH-MONTREAL

Question No. 754—Mr. Peddle:

1. Has the Minister of Transport received a copy of a brief from the Labrador West Chamber of Commerce to the Chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission and the Chairman of the Air Transport Committee requesting that Eastern Provincial Airways be given traffic rights between Wabush and Montreal, or as an alternative, Quebecair be directed to provide daily non-stop service between Wabush and Montreal?

2. Will this request be acceded to and when will the new service commence?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Yes.

2. The matters referred to in the Brief are under consideration by the Air Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission.

"INDIAN SUMMER"

Question No. 766—Mr. Burton:

1. How many copies of the publication "Indian Summer" were printed by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

2. What was the total cost of preparation of this publication?

3. What distribution is being carried out of this publication?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. 10,000 English; and 5,000 French.

2. $7,806.00.

3. It has been distributed to all members of Parliament and the press gallery, key personnel within the Department, a few interested people outside the Department, and to a number of federally-operated Indian schools.

AVERAGE DAILY COLLECTION OF INCOME TAXES

Question No. 799—Mr. Mather:

In 1960, 1965 and 1969, what was the average gross collection of federal income taxes per working day?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister of National Revenue): Fiscal year 1959-60, $13.6 million; Fiscal year 1964-65, $19.2 million; Fiscal year 1968-69; $30.4 million.

Collection figures are maintained on a fiscal year basis. The figure given includes federal income and old age security taxes but excludes provincial income taxes collected by the federal government.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

LICENSED CIVILIAN FLYERS

Question No. 662—Mr. Robinson:

1. How many licensed civilian flyers are there in Canada?

2. How many were licensed in each of the years 1960-1969 inclusive?

3. Does the federal government subsidize the licensing and training of civilian flyers and, if so, to what extent and what was the cost in each of the years 1960-1969 inclusive?

4. Is it the intention of the federal government to continue a program of flying assistance grants for civilians?

5. Is the program open to men and women and, if so, at what age can they apply and receive federal government assistance?

Return tabled.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—MAINTENANCE OF AIRCRAFT

Question No. 710—Mr. McCleave:

1. What moneys have been expended in each of the fiscal years from 1963-64 on maintenance, repair and overhaul of aircraft of the Department of National Defence by private industry and, what amount is contemplated for such in the current fiscal year?

2. How many man-years of work have been provided in each of these years or will be provided during the current fiscal year?

3. Per year, how many man-years of work, have been or will be provided Fairey Canada Limited?

Return tabled.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Government House Leader when I may expect an answer to my question of November 20, No. 516?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I cannot respond offhand but I will be glad to check and respond on Wednesday.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRADE

POSSIBLE BRITISH ENTRY INTO ECM—REPRESENTATIONS TO PRIME MINISTER WILSON

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Prime Minister has not made any statement concerning his talks with the Right Hon. Mr. Wilson yesterday and today, are we to assume that there is really nothing to report, or were any conclusions reached? Specifically, will the Prime Minister inform the House whether he made any representations to Mr. Wilson concerning the position of Canadian products, including wheat, in the event that the United Kingdom should enter the European Common Market?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we did discuss many subjects, including the last one mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition. We talked about Nigeria, we talked about east-west relations, we talked about disarmament, and we talked about the SALT talks. We also went into the question of Britain's entry into the Common Market, and the ministers present, particularly the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, pressed several questions upon Prime Minister Wilson concerning the consequences for Canada of Britain's negotiations to enter the Common Market.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Did the government of Canada take any specific position with regard to Canadian trade in the event that Britain should enter the European Common Market? In other words, did the government of Canada present a specific proposition to the government of Great Britain with regard to this matter?

[Mr. McCleave.]

Mr. Trudeau: Specific, Mr. Speaker, only to the extent that we pressed on the Prime Minister the importance of keeping Canada informed about the negotiations as they proceed and as they affect Canada. It was difficult to be more specific than that on specific items for the simple reason that the Prime Minister himself avowed that he did not know how the discussions would proceed. Therefore until the British government itself has had further contacts with the members of the EEC, and until it has formulated its position and stated it, it is impossible for Canada to enter upon specifics.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, did the Prime Minister not outline the specific and important areas of Canadian trade which would be very adversely affected if the Commonwealth preference was lost in the event that Britain entered the common market? Did the Prime Minister not ask for and receive assurances regarding Canadian trading arrangements with Great Britain in order that these important trading arrangements can be maintained and protected?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we pressed upon the government of the United Kingdom and the Prime Minister the importance of the specific aspects of trade with Canada. I repeat, we could not draw any conclusions from the Prime Minister as to these points because, as he emphasized, he himself had not actually begun negotiations yet. So far as Canadian representations are concerned, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and myself did emphasize aspects of Britain's entry which would be very important to us.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister intend to send the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to Great Britain very soon to ask for these specific assurances he was not able to receive from the British Prime Minister?

Mr. Trudeau: We doubt whether the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce could get from the rest of the British government assurances that the Prime Minister himself asked us to wait a while before receiving.

Mr. Hees: Could he not try?

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question regarding possible changes in trade if Britain should enter the Common Market, and I address it to the Minister of Agriculture. Will he inform the House whether his department is being kept fully informed as to the position of Canadian exports if such an event should take place and I have in mind agricultural products? Is the department studying the possible effect on Canadian farm exports?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I have nothing to add to the explanation the Prime Minister has already given, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gleave: I have a further supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Calgary North but if the hon. member has a further supplementary question perhaps he should be allowed to ask it.

Mr. Gleave: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister give the House some assurance that his department will be very deeply involved in this matter?

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that Great Britain has been a traditional purchaser of Canadian western wheat and in view of the fact that in the European Common Market French wheat is subsidized and ours is not, was there any discussion of that point with Prime Minister Wilson, or is there any thought of sending trade commissioners and other departmental officials to Great Britain, as another hon. member has suggested, to discuss these problems?

Mr. Trudeau: For one thing, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Wheat Board is always in touch with its trading partners. For another thing, we did reiterate our desire to send representatives to have bilateral discussions which, of course, are always welcome in Britain. It would be futile, however, to attempt such discussions until the British themselves know a little bit more about what their eventual partners in the EEC will be demanding of them. As the hon. member states, the EEC has as one of its basic tenets a common agricultural policy which would be a very important aspect in regard to Canadian agriculture. As the Minister of Agriculture has just said, we are following this matter with great interest but we are not in a position to press any specific demands on Great Britain beyond the general one until the British government knows what its eventual partners may request of it.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Were the conclusions of the Barber Commission report discussed with the Prime Minister of Great Britain and, particularly, did he receive any assurance from Prime Minister Wilson that his government would take action to stop reprisals by British tractor companies against British agencies that sell tractors directly to Canadian farm organizations, especially since such sales would seem to be mutually beneficial to both countries?

Mr. Trudeau: I was assured, Mr. Speaker, that this question had already been raised with the British government at the level of officials and for that reason I did not reopen it with the British Prime Minister.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that in previous discussions about Britain's entry into the European Common Market the British had expressed the opinion that one of the things it would seek to retain in the bargaining was the Commonwealth preference, may I ask the Prime Minister whether the British government is still prepared to attempt to retain the Commonwealth preference as it enters into these bargaining arrangements?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, my understanding of the previous attempt of the British government is that it gave no specific guarantee to Canada of that kind. Indeed, the Treaty of Rome precludes specific guarantees of that kind. The British Prime Minister certainly took the position that he could not promise in advance anything specific along these lines at this time any more than he could on the previous occasion.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NIGERIA—REPRESENTATIONS TO PRIME MINISTER WILSON RESPECTING DISTRIBUTION OF RELIEF SUPPLIES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister in relation to his conversations with the British Prime Minister. In view of the British government's specific relationship with the Nigerian government, was the Prime Minister able to suggest on behalf of the Canadian government ways in which the British government might use its influence to effect a more effective distribution of supplies in the eastern region of Nigeria, particularly the region formerly known as Biafra, and was there any suggestion by the British Prime Minister concerning the possibility of the airstrip and air transportation being used to alleviate the very serious situation there?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I had very extensive talks with the British Prime Minister about the Nigerian situation. As he said during his press conference following his meetings with us, both the British and Canadian governments are willing to offer help in any way that would be useful.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister indicate whether any formula was worked out which might alleviate the transport situation? Also, in respect of the invalid Biafran currency is any program being suggested with regard to exchanging Biafran currency for usable Nigerian currency in order to provide the destitute people in the region with the money to purchase the food available there?

Mr. Sharp: These are questions which should be directed to the Nigerian government rather than the British government. As General Gowon has made clear, it is the Nigerian government's responsibility to look after the welfare of its own people.

Mr. Speaker: Might I suggest that we go on to another question.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—ACTION RESPECTING PROSPECTIVE GAS RATE INCREASES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the statement by the President of the Canadian Gas Association to the effect that a number of gas companies intend to make applications for increases in gas rates, is his department looking into this matter and has he ascertained whether or not there is any collusion or pricing arrangement between the gas companies? If so, what action does his department intend to take in respect of this matter?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the statement to which the hon. member refers. I presume he must be referring to applications which might be made to the National Energy Board under the Act and on which the board would have to rule.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the fact that these applications are not for the export of gas but concern rather consumer gas prices, which come under provincial jurisdiction, I ask is there any question of price fixing or collusion in respect of price fixing, and is the department looking at these applications which, if granted, would have an inflationary effect upon prices for natural gas?

Mr. Basford: As I have said, I have not seen the statement to which the hon. member refers. I shall have a look at the statement to see whether or not my department is involved.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, does the minister not feel he should be aware of what is going on and should be looking at these matters more closely rather than pleading ignorance as an excuse?

IMMIGRATION

ENTRY OF DANIEL COHN-BENDIT

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Has he received from the Quebec Minister of Justice a request for the deportation of Cohn-Bendit and if so, has he given it some consideration?

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I did receive a communication from the Minister of Justice of Quebec involving the granting of an extension to Mr. Cohn-Bendit in respect of remaining in Canada. I replied to the Minister of Justice of Quebec by telling him I would consider any evidence he might have that Mr. Cohn-Bendit was a prohibited person under the Canadian Immigration Act and any opinion he might have that his continued presence in Canada would lead to serious public disorder.

DEPORTATION OF JAMES AUTRY

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Can he advise whether last September officials of his department, either directly or indirectly, in writing or verbally, requested that United States officials ask for the deportation of James Autry under the Visiting Forces Act so as to avoid political controversy?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is referring to a situation which, according to the way the question was asked, dates back some months. I wonder in these circumstances whether it might not be the type of question which should be placed on the Order Paper.

Mr. Baldwin: With respect, Your Honour, I would point out that proceedings are contemplated in this country and are in process in the United States. The answer the minister may make is of some essence and in that regard is urgent.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have to tell my hon. friend I will be happy to advise him on this question later. Inasmuch as the Visiting Forces Act is under the administration of the Department of National Defence I should like to discuss the situation with my colleague.

Mr. Baldwin: Would the minister have this discussion and be prepared to make a statement later?

Mr. MacEachen: I will undertake to answer the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, when the minister is making a statement on this matter, would he deal with the suggestion that when Mr. Autry applied to have his case heard by the Immigration Appeal Board his request was refused? Would the minister also ascertain why he was refused the right to have a lawyer represent him?

Mr. MacEachen: I would be happy to deal with these points in my later answers.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is addressed to the Minister of Justice in respect of the same case. Would he look into whether Autrey's arrest and subsequent handing over to the United States military authorities under the Visiting Forces Act was illegal in light of the decision of the British Columbia Court of Appeal in another case, and will the minister determine whether a question of reparations may be involved in this case?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I will consult with my colleague.

ACTION TO LOWER TRACTOR AND COMBINE PRICES

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister. It arises out of remarks that the Minister of Agriculture made in the House a week ago today in referring to the recommendations of the Barber Commission on farm machinery. The Prime Minister also referred to this matter a few moments ago in reply to the Leader of the Opposition. As recorded on page 2530 of Hansard the Minister of Agriculture said, in regard to Dr. Barber's recommendations:

> He also recommends that discussion be held with counterpart officials in the United States and in the United Kingdom. This has already been initiated.

Farther on he said the following with regard to the preliminary report or position paper written by Dr. Barber for the agricultural congress last March:

> During the intervening period a number of actions have been taken—

I understand that Prime Minister Wilson held a press conference during which a question on the export of tractors by Great Britain was asked, to which he replied—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member put his question, please. It seems to me the preface is rather long.

Mr. McIntosh: My question is with regard to the reply by the Prime Minister of Great Britain that this matter was not currently under discussion between the two governments. Can the Prime Minister clarify the situation and say whether the subject is now to be considered closed and forgotten?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot make any comment on the specific point made by Prime Minister Wilson, if he was correctly quoted. I know, and the Minister of Agriculture has confirmed, that some of our officials have been in contact with British officials, but it is possible that the British Prime Minister was not briefed on this matter because he might have felt that, since the discussions had begun, there was no need to put the matter on the agenda as a specific item. For that reason he may not have been prepared to discuss it.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that tractor prices were not discussed by the Prime Minister and Mr. Wilson over the weekend, what action, if any, does the government intend to take with regard to the great disparity in tractor prices between Great Britain and Canada?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as is pointed out in Dr. Barber's report, there are a number of recommendations. One is to have discussions not only with the U.K. government but also with officials of the U.S. government. In addition, Dr. Barber recommends that we start discussions with the farm machinery manufacturing companies. We are setting up these discussions today because the machinery companies have now had a copy of the report for a little over a week and we think that now is the appropriate time to call them in and have a discussion with them. So far as other recommendations are concerned, I am sure the hon. member will recognize that a sequence of actions is outlined in the report and that the government has proceeded on several of them.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. After these discussions have taken place, does the government intend to take action in this regard?

Mr. Olson: It would be impossible, if not improper, to predict what we would do until we have ascertained the attitude of the farm machinery companies toward the findings and recommendations contained in the report.

An hon. Member: It is not hard to predict.

[Later:]

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): I wish to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he can tell the House when the Barber Commission will report on the cost of farm machinery repairs since charges for such services are even more exorbitant than the prices of new machines?

Mr. Olson: Dr. Barber has indicated that he will bring in his final report, which will deal with those aspects of his inquiry, some time this summer. I was trying to remember whether he said it would be in mid-summer or late summer, but I am not quite sure.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

REFUSAL OF MEMBERSHIP TO WOMEN—SUGGESTED VIOLATION OF BILL OF RIGHTS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice arising out of his responsibility under the statute of 1960 known as the Canadian Bill of Rights. In view of the fact that the National Press Club has taken a stand—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am sorry, but this is serious. In view of the fact that the National Press Club has taken a stand against the admission of women to its membership and in view of the fact that the club occupies quarters in a building owned by the government of Canada, will the Minister of Justice look into the question of what he should do about this apparent violation of the Canadian Bill of Rights?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, because a delicate issue is involved here, I would like to have an opportunity to study that proposition.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): While the minister is studying the question, will he also examine the propriety of the members of this House of Commons being made honorary members of such a club, that is, all of us but one who happens to be a woman?

WOMEN

INQUIRY AS TO ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I wish to direct to the right hon. Prime Minister. Can he indicate to the House when the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women will be tabled in the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my answer is the same as it was last week. The Royal Commission has not taken me into its confidence with regard to the rapidity of its procedures, perhaps because the members have some cause to believe that I am not the right person to whom this can be told.

GRAIN

ACTION RESPECTING ILLEGAL FEED GRAIN SALES

Mr. Robert Borrie (Prince George-Peace River): In the absence of the Minister without Portfolio responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, could the Minister of Agriculture assure the farmers in the Peace River area of British Columbia that Canadian Wheat Board inspectors will investigate and charge firms and individuals who have sold off-board feed grain illegally?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, if it can be established that this has been done illegally. However, I should draw to the hon. member's attention the fact that it is not an illegal act to sell grain within a province or, indeed, to sell it to a feed mill which might then sell it to another farmer.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister discuss also the very serious question involved in the picketing now being carried on by members of a farmers' union in British Columbia to prevent farmers in the Peace River section of Alberta from hauling grain to elevators in respect of which they have lawful licences and permits?

Mr. Olson: Yes, I will draw that to the attention of the minister who answers for the Canadian Wheat Board.

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture. Would he also investigate the propriety of putting restrictions on the sale of feed grain within Canada?

Mr. Olson: It has been a long and well established law in Canada that the movement of feed grain across provincial borders, grain which is not sold and bought from the Canadian Wheat Board, is an illegal act.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether he has been asked by the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Wheat Board to start a thorough investigation into the bootlegging of millions of bushels of grain in western Canada as a result of the rigidity of the Wheat Board which does not allow trading between provinces even though the farmers need money?

An hon. Member: That is the regulation.

Mr. Woolliams: Change the regulations.

Mr. Baldwin: Change the government.

[Translation]

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—POLICY RESPECTING TWO-PRICE SYSTEM

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

Could he tell the House whether he was stating government policy when he said in Vancouver that he was in favour of the two-price system for industrial milk, that is $3.60 per cwt. for the industrial milk subject to the quota system and twice that amount, depending on market conditions, for surpluses?

Mr. Speaker: The question as put is not in order. However, the hon. member may, under Standing Orders, ask the Prime Minister whether the statement made by the minister in question expresses the policy of the government.

[English]

INFORMATION

APPOINTMENT OF MINISTER TO DIRECT OPERATIONS OF INFORMATION CANADA

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Has a member of the cabinet been appointed to direct the operations of Information Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Information Canada has as yet no real existence as a specific project. I explained to the House the other week that we did have officials preparing a statement on government policy and the government position, and that the cabinet had been discussing it. However, until we announce the setting up of such an agency, a minister naturally will not be appointed to operate an agency that is as yet not legally in existence.

Mr. Hales: Could the Prime Minister advise the House when he intends to make a policy statement on this matter?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think it will be soon; that is to say, within a matter of a week or two.

IMMIGRATION

PROPOSAL BY FRENCH IMMIGRANTS TO QUEBEC DESIRING TO MOVE TO ALBERTA

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Could the minister tell us whether he studied the proposal of a group of French-speaking immigrants to Quebec to establish a co-operative, vertically-integrated farming complex before referring the group to the Unemployment Insurance Commission or to local welfare offices?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have studied the proposal. There is no policy now nor has there been a policy to undertake a mass movement from one part of Canada to another.

Mr. Bell: Walter Gordon tried it.

Mr. MacEachen: In this case there was no evidence forthcoming to justify such claim that 10,000 families were involved. In any event, we offered to this group all the services available to immigrants to Canada and all the services available to Canadians from the department. It was when I received a letter stating that there were certain individuals urgently in need of assistance that I recommended in order to meet the situation, if it did exist, that such people should make use of the Canada Manpower Services or the welfare services of the provinces. In all our dealings with this group we have attempted to be helpful but also realistic.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker I have a supplementary question. What steps does the minister intend to take in view of this group's charge that immigration brochures distributed by Canadian embassies and consulates contain "lying propaganda" and that this group was lured here by false promises about a golden land of opportunity?

Mr. Woolliams: They do not like the cold weather.

Mr. MacEachen: I believe that one has to analyse the group, Mr. Speaker, and know what numbers belong to it before one can answer the question. There is some doubt that it does represent a large number. We do attempt to give a realistic picture of what immigrants will meet in Canada, and I believe the experience of immigrants since the last war does not justify the claim made against Canada in this particular instance.

Mr. Baldwin: Did you tell them about inflation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Since we will shortly be running out of time I have to seek the co-operation of hon. members regarding supplementaries.

[Mr. Thompson.]

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON REPORT BY GLENDON COLLEGE STUDENTS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development I should like to address a question to the Parliamentary Secretary. Inasmuch as the government has just received the report and study commissioned by it from a group of students at Toronto Glendon College about the attitude of students toward the native Indian, would the government, through the minister, be prepared to make a statement in a few days with respect to the recommendations contained in that report?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I shall discuss this matter with the minister.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TRANSFER OF NERVE GAS FROM OKINAWA TO UNITED STATES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs in reference to a matter I brought to the attention of the Prime Minister on Friday. Has the minister been advised by the government of the United States that they expect to move five shiploads of nerve gas from Okinawa through the Strait of Juan de Fuca to Bangor, Washington, for shipment to Hermiston army base, and have representations been made asking that this nerve gas be detoxicized before being moved?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have had our ambassador in Washington make inquiries. I have not yet received a report but as soon as I do I shall inform the House.

SKIM MILK POWDER—ACTION TO REDUCE SURPLUS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if he would take the first opportunity on motions to outline to the House what steps his department plans to take to dispose of the very large quantity of skim milk powder at present on hand in Canada and which has been overhanging the Canadian milk market for a long time?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I shall make a better suggestion and that is that the hon. member spend some time at the meetings of the Standing Committee on Agriculture which has been studying this question for two or three hours twice a week for the last two weeks.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary. I am simply asking the minister to say what the department intends to do. As he knows, at the last meeting of the Canadian milk producers he had no answer whatsoever and could tell them nothing. He said absolutely nothing.

An hon. Member: Learn the rules.

Mr. Hees: He knows absolutely nothing.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PHASING-OUT OF MARINE DIVISION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. Is it the intention of the government to phase out the marine division of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and, if so, how soon will this take place, within the next few months or over a longer period of time?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker, there is no such intention but I shall try to bring forward some further information on the subject if the hon. member wishes.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for his statement that there is no intention to do away with the marine division of the RCMP.

TRANSPORT

REPORTED INCREASE IN SHIPPING COMPANY RATES

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker I should like to ask the Minister of Labour if he has any information that shipping companies are increasing their rates because of the real danger of labour difficulties on the west coast when the 90-day cooling-off period will end on February 5?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, negotiations are proceeding normally. I am rather surprised, however, that management would raise the rates in anticipation. I think this would be an inflationary move on their part as they have no way of knowing what the increase will be. Perhaps they should be good Canadians and wait before raising the rates.

COMBINES

REPORTED COLLUSION BY BANKS, FINANCE COMPANIES AND AUTOMOBILE DEALERS AFFECTING BUYERS

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Can the minister inform the House whether his department is investigating reports of collusion between banks, finance companies and auto dealers affecting car buyers so far as Canada is concerned?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are always interested in such reports and if the hon. member will send us the report she is referring to I shall look into it.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

LAC LA BICHE NEWSTART PROGRAM—RESUMPTION OF OPERATIONS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): My question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister in a position to inform the House if operations have resumed on the Alberta Newstart program at Lac La Biche? While the minister is on his feet, perhaps he could tell the House what the future of this experimental program is across the country?

Mr. Speaker: I would think the second part of the question should be answered by way of a statement on motions.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the reply to the first part of the question is negative.

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO WHITE PAPER

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs when we may expect the white paper, or a white paper, with respect to the government's foreign policy? I ask this question, Mr. Speaker, because the study has been going on for some two years. I recognize, of course, that the government cannot determine its defence policy until it determines its foreign policy.

Mr. Baldwin: If any.

An hon. Member: So said a famous Canadian.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the white paper on foreign policy is in draft form and as such has been before the cabinet. I hope it will not be long before it is published. It is our intention to publish it in the present session.

ACCEPTANCE BY VATICAN OF FEMALE CANADIAN DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATIVE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, to go back to the question of discrimination against women, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether, in light of the Vatican's recent refusal to accept the credentials of an official from the government of West Germany, he can inform the House if the Canadian government, during the negotiations to establish diplomatic relations with the Vatican, undertook to appoint only men as high diplomatic officers?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. I would hope that the Vatican, in light of the ecumenical movement that is going on, will in due course accept women whom I regard, as I am sure my hon. friend does, as the equal of men in all respects.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Tell that to the press.

ISRAELI-ARAB CONFLICT—REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING DIRECT NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I apologize for not giving him notice of it. In view of the announcement by President Nixon of additional arms aid to Israel, reminding the world of the constant and dangerous escalation of the arms race in the Middle East, is the government making representations with a view to bringing about direct negotiations between the parties to the conflict in the area?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the policy of the Canadian government with respect to the conflict is to support the operation of resolution 242 which we helped to draft, and until it is clear that there is no possibility of reaching agreement under the terms of that resolution we have no intention of changing our policy.

DAIRYING—EARLIER ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLICY

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

In view of the fact that the Canadian Dairy Commission always announces its new policy just before April 1, which is highly inconvenient for the dairy industry, could the minister inform us whether this year he will ask the Commission to announce its policy earlier?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I hope that we can announce the policy somewhat sooner. As the hon. member knows, we have invited not only the standing committee of this House but indeed the whole of the dairy industry to assist us in formulating and designing a program that will meet some of the surplus problems which have been raised during the past 12 months. It seems to me it would be a disservice to the industry if we were to announce the programs before we had received their recommendations. If their recommendations are received in time to allow us to consider them carefully so that we can announce the policy a few days before April 1, we will certainly follow that course. On the other hand, I think we shall have to wait—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate.

UNITED NATIONS

WORLD FOOD PROGRAM—MODIFICATION OF CANADA'S EFFORTS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Does the government plan to heed the request of Francisco Aquino, Director General of the World Food Program, that Canada's efforts under the program should be modified and that we should send different types of commodities?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think this information ought to be given to the House by way of a statement on motions inasmuch as the subject matter is very general. I would think the hon. member might wish to give some thought to that.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture because the Prime Minister obviously does not know the answer. May I ask—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. No matter whether the hon. member asks his question of the Prime Minister or of the minister directly concerned, I suggest that he should limit his question to inquiring whether a statement might be made.

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, my original question was whether the government was going to modify its effort under this program. It was a very simple question.

Mr. Speaker: In that case it could be placed on the Order Paper, I suggest.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister) moved:

That a joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be appointed to examine and report upon proposals, made public, or which are from time to time made public by the Government of Canada, on a number of subjects related to the Constitution of Canada during the course of the comprehensive review of the Constitution of Canada, which review was agreed upon at the Constitutional Conference of the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premiers and Prime Ministers of the Provinces in February, 1968, and alternative proposals on the same subjects;

That twenty members of the House of Commons, to be designated by the House at a later date, be members of the joint committee on the part of this House;

That the committee have power to appoint, from among its members, such sub-committees as it may deem advisable or necessary;

That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House;

That the committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers, and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

Thet a message be sent to the Senate requesting Their Honours to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems so advisable, some of its members to act on the proposed joint committee.

He said:

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it is a question of considering the motion standing in my name on the order paper, but I think that hon. members will want to take this opportunity to discuss the whole process of constitutional review. Indeed, at the time of the last public federal-provincial conferences on the constitution, the House deemed it appropriate to discuss the process of constitutional review, and following the December conference, leaders of all parties agreed to initiate this debate on the constitution.

[English]

We are faced, in a sense, with a paradox when we face this motion. The presence of this motion on the order paper is indicative of the interest of all parties in debating the process of constitutional review in this chamber. Indeed, parties of the opposition have pressed the government for many months, and even over a period of two sessions, to set up this committee. I believe that this reflects on the part of hon. members a very great desire of participating in the constitutional debate taking place in this country. But I spoke of a paradox, because at the same time there is a feeling in certain provincial quarters, and even in the country at large as expressed by members of provincial legislatures and, indeed, perhaps by some members of this House, that there is basically nothing wrong with the present constitution, nothing at least that would put it very high in priority on the order for action.

There is a feeling indeed in some quarters that this government is a little bit hung up on constitutional matters, that we are giving them too great a priority, that we are spending too much time on the constitution and too little on other things, and that the debate is taking too long. We have even heard in some quarters, and I am merely repeating that in this operation we have in mind only Quebec; that the rest of the country is not very interested in the process of constitutional review. I say this is a paradox, Mr. Speaker, because if we examine the origins of the constitutional debate we will see that it really began at the instigation of the provinces, indeed, of all the provinces. It would be fair to say that they started the process of constitutional debate. They are the ones who embarked the country on this long and important process. I say this as much to their credit as to their debit because I believe that the process of constitutional review is an important process.

It is necessary, however, in order to explain this paradox, to remind ourselves once again that it began at the November 1967 conference, convened by the Prime Minister of Ontario, Mr. Robarts, and which was attended by the premiers of all provinces, barring that of British Columbia which was represented by its attorney general. The provinces at that time pressed the federal government to participate and I think members of opposition parties will recall that they, too, were pressing the government to attend the Confederation for Tomorrow Conference in Toronto. They chided us and urged us to get into the constitutional debate.

Notwithstanding that that was the position of the opposition, the federal government took the contrary view. Not only did we not participate in the 1967 conference, but in the years prior to that we had taken the very clear position that the constitution was not the most urgent thing to be dealt with, that there were many problems facing Canadians which could be dealt with under the British North America Act. Although we were not prepared to discuss the subject, we urged the provinces and the public at large to regard these exercises with a certain amount of deliberation.

I think the change in attitude on the part of governments is easy to explain, Mr. Speaker. The provinces realized in 1967 that new power relationships were being developed between the federal government and the provinces. It is perhaps natural that they wanted to insert these power relationships into a constitution which would be redefined. Hon. members will recall that around that period the provincial responsibilities in financial terms were increasing at a very fast speed compared to those of the federal government.

Statistics show that between 1954 and 1964 federal expenditures increased 56 per cent. In that same period provincial expenditures, including municipal expenditures, increased 204 per cent. This is evidence of these new relationships that were developing, Mr. Speaker. It is precisely because of that that the federal government was preaching against haste in upsetting the constitutional relationships between the federal government and the provinces until a fair amount of preparatory work had been accomplished.

We realized that once a questioning of the consensus on which the country was built, began, and once it was agreed upon by Canadians to reopen the fundamental law from which all authority and power flowed in this country, it would be impossible to close that issue until we had dealt with it thoroughly. This was the position taken by the government under the leadership of hon. L. B. Pearson. It certainly was the position of many members on this side of the House.

I, personally, went on record as saying that of all the urgent problems facing Canada, in my view the constitution had lowest priority. In September, 1967, a couple of months before the Confederation for Tomorrow Conference, I was speaking to the Canadian Bar Association in Quebec city. I told them we should be very careful before opening the basis for all law, order and authority within the country, that we should do our homework first. I emphasized the need for preparation in order that changes in the basic and fundamental law would be orderly and progressive and not arrived at piecemeal, bit by bit. That is why I proposed on that same occasion, with the approval of the government of that day, that we begin with a discussion of a fundamental Bill of Rights in order to ascertain the values which united Canadians before going on to issues which might divide them.

This is the paradox that has to be explained, Mr. Speaker. We should not forget the urging on the part of the provinces and, I repeat, of the opposition, for the government to get on with writing a new constitution for Canada. We remember all the cliches of those days; that the constitution was 100 years old that it did not read well; that we should have a more inspiring document for our centennial, and that the previous government was lax in its desire to get on with this review. Nevertheless—and this is the paradox, Mr. Speaker—in addition to these pressures, we began to hear more and more from the provinces and other quarters that this whole constitutional thing was a hang-up of the federal government; that the present government was too concerned with these matters and should be getting on with other things. How does one explain this paradox?

In my opinion, this can be explained first by the fact that the provinces, after the period of euphoria during which they became aware of their increasing powers, have reached a point where they realize that they have much to do, under the present constitution, that many problems must be solved now, and that the solutions cannot wait until a new constitution is drafted.

This process of increasing provincial powers was foreseeable. We live in a civilization, in an industrial society, whose industrialization rate tends to increase. I feel it is true to say that Canada is perhaps one of the countries with the fastest industrialization and urbanization rate in the world. And I think that urban growth has caused a great number of problems, particularly at the municipal level. We have witnessed, for example, problems relating to welfare, slum clearance, air and water pollution in the cities, housing, urban transportation, fire and police services, water supply, telephone and communication systems, even recreational activities which have brought cities to provide more parks, more recreational centres and more libraries. These problems all emerged at the municipal level and therefore were also of provincial jurisdiction. I believe that after several years of debate on constitutional matters some provinces and municipalities realize that they really have much left to do and that all these problems must find a solution before the constitution is to be revamped. I think this is the reason why the provinces and municipalities very frequently suggest that the constitution is really of relative importance and that the federal government should not spend too much time considering it.

On the other hand, we cannot, at the federal level, take that position, because we are, by the very nature of federalism, elected to deal with national unity. Indeed, we are commissioned to consider the problems that might lead to the disruption of Canada as a whole.

It might be advisable at this time to quote a letter that Sir John A. Macdonald wrote in 1886 to the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia. This will help explain that at that time as it is today, it was normal for federal members of Parliament to concern themselves with constitutional matters more than would be the case for members of the Legislative Assemblies. Here is the letter:

• (3:20 p.m.)

[English]

Should your ministers found their advice for an early dissolution on the ground that they desire an immediate expression of the will of the people as to their remaining in the confederation, you will, I have no doubt, feel it your duty as a Dominion Officer to decline to allow that subject to enter into consideration at all. The representatives of Nova Scotia as to all questions respecting the relations between the Dominion and the Province sit in the Dominion Parliament and are the constitutional exponents of the wishes of the people with regard to such relations. The Provincial members have their powers restricted to the subjects mentioned in the British North America Act and can go no further.

The quotation is to be found at page 379 of Pope's collection of the correspondence of Sir John A. Macdonald.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that quotation explains that at that time as well as today, it was natural for the federal members to have a greater interest in constitutional issues because they have as it were the prime responsibility to ensure that this country is going ahead, all the while maintaining unity in every part.

As to national unity, Mr. Speaker, it is important to mention that it is not only a problem which affects the province of Quebec, and which deals mainly with language issues. Indeed linguistic differences between the French-speaking and the English-speaking communities raise a problem insofar as national unity is concerned. The government of the right hon. Lester B. Pearson as well as ours have always squarely tackled the study of this problem. The solutions we have recommended in the field of bilingualism and the legislation of this session are recognized, I believe, as a major contribution towards maintaining national unity.

Admittedly, national unity also involves certain economic aspects: disparities between regions and between the various classes of society can contribute to destroy national unity just as much as linguistic issues can. This is why our government has taken important initiatives concerning regional economic expansion and its powers to spend, not only as regards the overall power to spend through which we transfer certain financial resources to provincial governments by way of equalization payments or otherwise, but also as regards the power to pay certain allowances directly to less fortunate people in order that the more affluent Canadians be more adequately taxed, which will contribute to maintaining a regular income for Canadians.

Another aspect of national unity has to do with the very geography of the country and the scattering of the population; today, as in the time of Sir John A. Macdonald, we have to tackle straight off the problem of communications. At that time, it had to do mostly with the railways, and then the telegraph. But we realize that today the problem of communications covers a much wider field. In fact, not only people, but messages and information have to be conveyed to their destination. It will be with that in mind that this session will have reviewed the policy of the government in this connection.

Finally, national unity is embodied in the federal-provincial relations I dealt with earlier and which brought this government to take on still more energetically constitutional matters. The point is not to believe that the federal-provincial meetings on the constitution alone tackle the problems of national unity. In fact, the federal government took it upon itself to call a conference next February—that is in three weeks—not on constitutional problems but on federal-provincial relations in non-constitutional fields.

Surely, these are as many facets of the more general problem of national unity. While considering them, we can see that if a country is to survive, it should solve the constantly recurring problem of national unity.

[English]

In other words, the unity of a country can only be built up on the basis of a consensus of the people, on the desire of the people to live together within the boundaries of the same country. I think modern history has shown us that there is really no other basis for national unity than this. It is impossible to hold that countries are the product of boundaries which are given by nature and which cannot be moved, and that the people living within those boundaries must forever form a country because those boundaries were destined to the people by the laws of nature and of God. We have only to look at our own boundaries, at the 49th parallel or the Alaskan panhandle, to realise that there is nothing written on the surface of the globe which says that this country was obliged to have these boundaries and that the people living within them were bound to form one nation.

I think it is true, also, to say that speaking the same language is not in itself the foundation of one nation. We know there are nations separated by artificial borders whose inhabitants speak the same language and, conversely, we know there are certain nations within whose boundaries two, three and even four languages are spoken.

It is neither geographical boundaries, nor language, nor, indeed, history which determine the existence of a nation. We are aware that nations are not eternal and that history has changed them all over the centuries. We are, therefore, forced to the conclusion that the only basis for a nation is a consensus, a willingness of people to live together. People choose to form a nation. There is a nation if the people want a nation to exist. In this sense, the French philosopher Renan can describe a nation as "un plébiscite du peuple de tous les jours"—a plebiscite of the people every day, not in a literal sense but in a literary sense. The people have to be willing to recognize that the nation exists in order that it might continue to exist. This means, in reality, that all major groups, all important participants in a nation, have to feel that they are better within the nation than outside it. So long as we cannot ensure the continuation of this consensus, so long as the institutions of a country and, singularly, the constitution of the country, does not correspond to a desire of the people to stay within a nation, its basis is very frail indeed. It is this principle which guided federal action and, indeed, federal strategy in its whole approach to the constitutional question.

It was our belief that the nation could only be based on such a consensus that guided us in the process of constitutional review. First, we took as a principle that there was a great deal of preparation needed before the constitutional review should be embarked upon. Indeed, as early as 1966 the federal government was setting up a special section and engaging the services of specialists in order to get on with the preparations for a constitutional review.

The second principle was that the review should not begin until there was both a recognition, and a desire on the part of enough Canadians that the review should not only begin but that the whole area of federal-provincial relations should be re-examined. This, too, explains in part the fact that the federal government made haste slowly in embarking upon the process of review. In our view it would have been a mistake to open the constitution for debate if there were not a widely shared desire on the part of the Canadian people, and of all parties in this Parliament, to embark upon such a review.

Third, it was important that the review only proceed within a country which was fairly stable, and by that I mean at a time when the federal government and the provincial governments were both strong. As far as we were concerned at the federal level, we always made it a condition that the whole of the constitution could be re-examined but that two basic principles had to be maintained.

The first was that Canada would continue as one federal country. By this we meant that the federal form of government should be preserved. The second principle was that we did not want to see the development of any constitution which would create forms of special arrangements whereby the members of Parliament from one part of the country would have, at the federal level, less power than the members of Parliament from another part of the country. This did not mean that the federal government could not in the future, as it had in the past, embark upon certain specific special arrangements with one province or another.

But any move towards the so-called special status, Mr. Speaker, a move which would have ended with the setting up of a federal form of government wherein at least one province had much stronger powers or jurisdiction than the other provinces, would inevitably have resulted in a situation where the federal members of Parliament from that province could not speak in the federal government with a voice equal to that of members from other provinces. Inevitably, that would have led to a downgrading of the federal presence from that province. Thereafter the people of that province would have been less interested in their representatives in the federal government, and in its ways and procedures, because their representatives would have less power and less significance than members from other provinces.

I repeat that that is why we always stated as a precondition that the debate on the constitution only be opened at a time when the federal government was sufficiently strong to be able to assert what was needed in order to maintain essential federal powers. But apart from these two principles—that of the maintenance of one federal country, and the other that the central essential powers be maintained—we agreed that all aspects of the constitution should be considered. Indeed, it is important that Canadians realize that we are discussing all of the aspects which are of immediate concern to them, questions which have to do with the responsibility for the cities, for pollution, for poverty, for education, and for Indians. These precise questions are part of the constitutional review upon which we have now embarked. There has always been a willingness, indeed a desire, on the part of the federal government to get into these discussions but this was contained until we had been assured that the new constitution would emanate from a stability and a consensus freely arrived at rather than from violence and revolution.

The fourth principle, Mr. Speaker, is the importance of looking at all aspects of the constitution, but having respect to the two principles I just mentioned.

The fifth is the insistence on the part of the federal government—and I repeat that this is part of our approach, and no doubt one on which the opposition parties will wish to comment—that the debate begin on the values that deal with people and with subjects which unite people rather than divide them. It is this principle that explains why our agenda for the constitution began with a discussion of a fundamental Bill of Rights to be written into the constitution. We felt this was a proper vehicle for all Canadians to discuss the questions of value which unite them.

From there, the next step was to discuss the institutions of government themselves—the authorities and the legal entities set up under the constitution to look after people to preserve their rights, and to defend their rights under the law. This led us to consider the second broad aspect of the constitution.

Only following consideration of these two aspects did the provinces and the federal government feel it wise to place on the agenda the specific issue of the division of powers. We felt, and I believe it was also the feeling of the provinces, that rather than start with a debate of the division of powers between federal and provincial authorities it was important to debate first those values which united Canadians. Fundamentally we believed that Canadians were interested in being well served by all their governments, whether federal or provincial, and that only secondarily were they interested in quarrels regarding authority and influence between these levels of government.

The sixth principle is one of controlled development of the constitution, and I suppose this is a way of explaining why the whole process takes time, Mr. Speaker. There are certain circumstances where a constitution must be written fairly quickly. After a revolution, when anarchy exists, when society has no authority by which to govern itself, it is necessary to get on rather quickly with the constitution, that is to say, with the definition of the power relationships among the various authorities within the country. But we wanted to do it not after a revolution, and indeed not after the founding of a new country. We wanted to take a country which existed and which had desired to take another look at itself, a second century look at itself, and to re-examine the consensus upon which it existed. We were trying to devise a new constitution for a nation in a period of peace, without upsetting the consensus, without giving cause for violence, or for violent upsurges within the country. This, inevitably, takes a long time to complete.

If the consensus is to be continued, it is certain that all the aspects of the constitution can only be discussed and examined within a process of development which is controlled, which is not haphazard but which is well planned. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the adjustments to the new power relations, if there are to be any in Canada's new constitution, have to be gradual. If the adjustments were to be rapid, it would mean the upset of old power relationships, of institutions and of views, and this is the way of revolutions. Obviously the transfer of any influence, power or authority has to be gradual or otherwise it will not have the consent of the people who believe in the democratic way.

The seventh principle is that, while this long process was continuing, one fundamental principle had to be observed and respected: that was that during the whole process of constitutional review the constitution had to be obeyed.

If the provinces or the federal government had found themselves authorized to say that, the constitution was up for a new deal, that we were rewriting the fundamental law of Canada, that in the meantime the federal or provincial governments could usurp whatever powers they wanted because this was the way they saw the new constitution in the future, then obviously we would have had chaos. It is for this reason that the policy of the federal government was to insure, as far as it was concerned, total respect of the constitution during the process of constitutional review. We have repeated often enough that the only basis for liberty, freedom and order in our country is the constitution, and that if the constitution is not obeyed by provincial and federal governments there is no reason why citizens should have to obey federal and provincial statutes and laws. That is why, though some quarters have indicated impatience with the federal government's position, that we have always said that until the constitution is changed, and until we agree on a new constitution, this government intends to obey the present constitution.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

This leads me to the eighth principle, Mr. Speaker, and this is the last one I want to mention. It is obvious that, during this long process of constitutional review, other priorities must be met. It is important that the people of Canada realize that as far as the government is concerned no program has been delayed because of the constitutional review. I am not saying that there are not some things that we, as the government, have not done because of the constitution. On the contrary, because of the constitution we have not done certain things which we felt were not within our jurisdiction, but we have not delayed any programs on the pretense that the constitution was being debated and we were not sure that we should proceed with them. There are many examples which I could give but which I must shorten. Whether programs concerned minority rights, pollution, Indians or, indeed, many others, we have always taken the position that the federal government would and should discharge its responsibility under the present constitution and would continue to do so until the constitution was changed.

Nor has the process of review precluded federal-provincial meetings on other subjects. This is why the federal government took the initiative of inviting the provinces to the forthcoming February conference where we will be discussing non-constitutional matters.

I reach the end of my intervention at this stage, Mr. Speaker. We are to vote on a motion to set up a parliamentary committee. Let me make three brief points on that motion.

We believe it is the role of the parliamentary committee to review and judge the actions of this government and the position it has taken on the constitution. I think this is a welcome development and it is all the more imperative because of the need for consensus that I was discussing earlier. It will be important for all parties in this Parliament, and indeed, for all people in Canada to review and to judge the actions of this government in the constitutional review.

Legitimacy of a constitution cannot be founded, and will not be founded on force in this country. It can only be founded on consent, and it is this consent that we think can only be the result of a widespread debate on the positions which have been developed by the federal and provincial governments. The parliamentary committee will provide a forum where the Canadian public can learn about and discuss federal proposals. As the terms of reference appear on the order paper, it is apparent that we are encouraging the committee to hold hearings across the country and to become a fundamental part of this process of education of Canadians. I mean by this education, not in the sense of proposing particular principles for government, but education in the sense that people will be invited to evolve for themselves their notions of the principles and consensus on which they want this country to be based.

We know that certain provinces have set up parliamentary committees of their own to examine the proposals put forward by provincial governments. We feel it is quite proper for the federal parliament to have that kind of a parliamentary committee and that kind of a forum. From what I have said, I think it follows that no one expects early results. The committee's work will, I presume, take as long as the review process itself. It is impossible that the committee will be expected, even at this session, or even within the next, to bring in a final report. I take it that the committee, and this is authorized in its terms of reference, will prefer to make periodic reports on specific aspects of the constitution that it has been examining.

Those are the few points I was anxious to make on this subject. I believe that the committee's terms of reference result from the very matters agreed upon between federal and provincial representatives for the process of reviewing the constitution. Should this recommendation be adopted by the House, as I hope it will, the committee will definitely have to assume heavy responsibilities not only toward the House, but also toward the whole country.

And all Canadians, as well as ourselves members of Parliament, will have to exercise great courage, patience, far-sightedness and dedication. We are certainly at a crucial point in the constitutional development of the country, and the eyes of the nation are upon us.

[English]

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister would permit a question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I thought the hon. member was rising at this time to participate in the debate. The time allocated to the right hon. Prime Minister by order of the House earlier today just expired. Perhaps the hon. member could be allowed to ask a question with the unanimous agreement of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I was very interested to hear the Prime Minister theorize and hypothesize as to what sort of forces hold a country together. I wonder whether he feels that this theory has been upheld by the recent events in Nigeria?

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we just listened to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) discussing the problems of the constitution very earnestly and very quietly. I do not know that I will be able to be quite as quiet as that all the time, but I want to assure the Prime Minister and members of the House that I have never believed in injecting any partisan controversy into a discussion of the constitution. On the other hand, if we are to make progress I think we have to talk to each other quite frankly on occasions such as this.

I enter this debate with quite a strong feeling that this is an occasion of some considerable historic significance. I do not know how many times in recent years or in the past the House has engaged in a full and wide-ranging debate on the constitution. Be that as it may, I think we are holding this debate at a time when the constitutional discussions initiated by the Government of Canada, through a series of federal-provincial conferences, have bogged down. It seems to me it is not exaggerating at all to say that the successful development of constitutional discussion in this country will depend in a very real way upon the workings of the committee of the House we are about to establish.

Federal-provincial meetings have demonstrated practically no progress. If progress is to be made, it must be made by or at least with the assistance of this committee. I believe we have gone much too far in the direction of turning our constitutional discussions into something so complicated, and perhaps so colourless and lacking in immediate relevance to our people, that even the most important constitutional questions excite very little or no public interest except when they stir some emotions. Of course, when emotions are stirred this does not make it any easier to reach a new consensus. During the past number of years there have been many federal-provincial conferences dealing with attempts, some of them successful, to make fundamental changes in the structures and ways by which we govern ourselves. But these federal-provincial conferences have been carried out by heads of government, both provincial and federal, or by persons delegated by the heads of these governments.

Never have Canadians as a whole or as groups been involved in this process; nor have the representatives the people of Canada have elected, either in Parliament, the legislatures or in the local councils, been involved in any meaningful way. So, I hope this committee will give a voice to the views and the actions of the Canadian people. I hope the committee itself will provide opportunities to Canadians everywhere to make their views heard and have them considered and publicized rather than filed away and forgotten.

Today marks the beginning of a change in our approach to constitutional reform in this country. The Prime Minister almost suggested that we entered this process, if not by accident, at least without fully intending to do so. Certainly, the constitution is too important to be left to lawyers, prime ministers and provincial premiers. The change I suppose is not very startling in terms of the experience in other countries. It simply lacks the involvement of the Canadian people to a considerable degree in the constitution and rephasing of our constitutional procedures.

Why should the constitution be significant to the average Canadian? After all, he probably cannot tell one very much about it. So, why not leave it to the constitutional lawyers, the premiers, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) who sometimes professes to know what is best for us. Political authority in a modern state must include more than providing the possibility of using our collective strength to clean up our environment or improve our standard of living or health, important as these matters are. Surely, the political process is the means by which we make the hardest choices we have to make collectively. Quite simply political authority is a life and death affair and our constitutional process is the one workable way we in this country have developed to make sure this life and death authority is organized on terms favourable rather than unfavourable to the Canadian people. This is the reason the constitutional proposals made by the government of Canada cannot and should not be decided upon simply on the basis of government.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Our ministers must not alone decide everything about the way in which we are to be ruled. In any event, it is painfully evident to all of us that the present method of approach outlined by the Prime Minister, that of federal-provincial conferences—federal-provincial conference after federal-provincial conference—is not working. Bringing the public into the discussions through a parliamentary committee might just break this log jam. For some years our party has been pressing for the establishment of such a parliamentary committee on revision of the constitution. It has always seemed to us absurd that serious discussion of constitutional revision should be taking place almost everywhere—not primarily everywhere but any place—other than in this House of Commons and in Parliament. This after all, as the Prime Minister has reminded us, is the only institution which is entitled to speak for all Canadians.

Various provincial legislatures have had either parliamentary committees or citizens committees studying and reporting on constitutional matters. There was a Confederation of Tomorrow conference in 1967, a series of federal-provincial conferences beginning in 1968, the Etats Généraux of Quebec and a great many other privately sponsored conferences and studies of constitutional ideas. But the federal Parliament surely has been left out of this process. Last year the Prime Minister refused to co-operate in the establishment of a committee such as this. I regret this, but am delighted he has changed his mind in the meantime. Obviously, we welcome and will support the motion to set up the committee. It is sad indeed that the committee was not set up long ago, but this can be said: The need for the committee obviously is greater now than the need has been in the past. We have always seen this role as being not just one of study and discussion of various constitutional ideas. It has been our thought and hope all along that the parliamentary committee and, through the committee, Parliament itself might be used as a means of reconciliation and a means of arriving at a national consensus.

I was very interested that the Prime Minister took the time he did to develop the thought that the consensus must lie at the very basis of nationhood. I believe this is so. There is not a consensus in this country today with regard to the constitution. I think we must face this. It has been our hope that a parliamentary committee of this sort, made up of elected representatives representing the various parts of the country and the various ways of life in this country, could help the Canadian people achieve a consensus with regard to the constitution. Let us see if the people's elected representatives, consulting each other, consulting other members of the House and listening to and drawing in the people themselves, can begin the task of overcoming the differences and divisions from which obviously the government of Canada and the provincial governments have suffered in the discussions which have taken place at the federal-provincial conferences. I think this can be a useful way to build an understanding about the basic issues which will knit Canadians together and not divide them.

This means the committee must hear groups and individuals from all across the country. The committee evidently has this power. The results of public hearings and consultations with the people sometimes are somewhat painful and a little surprising, but whether this be so or not these public hearings and consultations are necessary to the process of building a real understanding of the problems. There is one important group of elected people who, besides members of the House of Commons, have been almost entirely left out of constitutional discussions during the past number of years. One very serious result has been that the federal and provincial governments together have not been nearly as diligent about confronting some of our most serious problems as they should have been. I am referring to the absence of municipal representatives from these discussions.

I am not arguing that they should necessarily have the authority to attend federal-provincial conferences ex officio, but we have suffered from the fact that they have not really been able to take part in the discussions at any level. It is my hope, and the hope of those who sit with me in this House, that the parliamentary committee will provide for the representatives of our cities, towns and counties precisely that forum and that public platform which has been denied to them through the past quarter century with regard to this matter. Indeed, I would go somewhat further and suggest that if the committee is to have some resource people to help it, it should consider consulting the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities in the course of selecting some of its personnel, because I think it is only in this way that our members of Parliament can be assured that the interests of both the great metropolitan centres and the bustling frontier communities are properly taken into account.

All this will not be possible if the government adopts toward this committee a narrow, partisan approach. Individual members of the committee ought to have the maximum freedom to consider and discuss ideas, to present their own ideas and to convince each other of the merit of these ideas. Let us keep the whips away and, if I may say so without offence, let us all agree that this is no place for the sometimes hamhanded interference of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald).

I think the committee should be representative in every sense of the regions and the people of the country. There should be a co-chairman representing the official languages, and I think consideration should be given to one of the co-chairmen being a member of one of the opposition parties.

The terms of reference and their interpretation must not be restrictive. The wording of this resolution is a little curious, but I think that is mainly because of its parentage rather than for any other reason. It is a vast improvement over the first draft that I saw on Friday which seemed to have the effect of confining the committee to the consideration of matters that have already been proclaimed by the federal government. This would have had the effect of preventing this committee from considering on its own the proper way to approach constitutional matters. It would seem to confine the committee to staying in locked-step with discussions at federal-provincial conferences. As I see it, this defect has been removed, and the resolution that is now before us would permit the committee to consider all matters which the federal and provincial governments agreed to discuss as constitutional matters back in 1968, which, I believe, includes just about anything that one is likely to want to discuss.

It is certain that this committee must consider its method of approach to constitutional matters. It may very well decide that the method chosen by the Prime Minister and the government, and outlined by the Prime Minister this afternoon, is not working and that another method of approach, perhaps one quite substantially different, might well produce results.

The Prime Minister has said that the role of the committee is to review and judge the job which, in effect, the government of Canada has been doing with regard to constitutional review. I would put it differently. I think the job of this committee is to review what has happened in connection with constitutional review, but also to decide what is the best method of proceeding with constitutional review and what method is most likely to produce the results that we want in this country.

If there is any doubt about the interpretation of the motion or about the ability, capacity or authority of this committee, then I would certainly want it corrected because it must be admitted that the approach taken by the federal government and imposed on federal-provincial conferences has so far been a failure. If there has been any progress, it is hardly measurable. The Prime Minister referred to this when he said that discussions had commenced with an outline of the program concerning human rights. As the Prime Minister has reminded us, the government put this forward as a measure for uniting rather than dividing Canadians. Yet, last December the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) had to report to the federal-provincial conference that there was no progress, or, to put it more accurately, he had no progress to report after almost two years of discussion.

In the spring of 1968, the federal government brought down, practically on tablets of stone, its white paper on international relations. I felt that that white paper was somewhat over-simplified and ignored some of our history, but certainly on the basis of that, no progress at all has been made toward the solution of one of our long standing constitutional problems. I refer to the question of how it would be possible for us in this country to sign treaties which involve, in whole or in part, implementation by provincial legislatures. There has been no progress in this regard. The whole matter seems to have become a contest between the government of Canada and the province of Quebec. This does not seem to have been resolved, either. Certainly, there has been no progress in filling in some of the great gaps in our constitution regarding matters of great importance such as, for example, the right to sign treaties involving implementation by provincial legislatures.

The white paper seems to be rather useless with regard to any of the policies of the federal government, which so far it has been unable to enforce. Indeed, I am a little puzzled about this whole thing because on reading some of the Prime Minister's earlier works I noticed that he quoted with approval F. A. Angers. This is what he wrote:

> I cannot express it more concisely than F. A. Angers who said: "In general, the Canadian state is not the central government, but the central and the provincial governments taken together... In matters of education the Canadian state is the provincial state, and none other."

I am puzzled as to the bearing of that statement on, for example, the authority in this country to sign treaties involving areas that call for implementation by provincial legislatures.

Mr. Trudeau: Do you disagree with the quotation?

Mr. Stanfield: No, I just said I am puzzled.

Mr. Trudeau: May I ask the hon. member a question? The hon. member obviously quotes me as though he did not approve of what I said. Does he disagree with the quotation?

Mr. Stanfield: I do not necessarily disagree with it. It may be right with regard to domestic matters, but I am puzzled at the deduction which the right hon. Prime Minister would draw from this quotation with regard to external relations and, for example, treaties relating to this. This is what puzzles me in the light of the government's white paper on this matter.

The failure of the constitutional conference was summed up rather succinctly by Professor Denis Smith in the Toronto Star last Friday, January 23 as follows:

> And so, as the meetings go on, the country is faced with one failed federal proposition after another: the reconstitution of the Senate and Supreme Court; the entrenchment of a bill of rights; the proposal for maintaining the federal role in social services such as it is, against the intransigency of Quebec; the claim for federal "paramountcy" in the field of pensions. The Prime Minister's claim that this is progress cannot be taken at face value; one can reasonably argue that Mr. Trudeau's constitutional program has collapsed in shambles.

That is why I think the work of this committee is going to be particularly important. I have taken the position all along that the responsible course for the loyal opposition to take in matters of constitutional review is to give the Prime Minister and the government of Canada time and full opportunity to proceed as they think best. I think members of the House will agree that we have done nothing to interfere or deepen in any way the difficulties of the government with regard to constitutional review.

In our desire to give them plenty of time and opportunity to put their approach to the test, we have taken a non-partisan approach. This is not because I regard myself as a knight in shining armour riding a white horse, but because I recognize the great difficulty of achieving a consensus in this country with regard to a revised or a new constitution. I recognize also that such an achievement will require the co-operation and best efforts of us all. This has been our attitude. Our attitude is also that should the Prime Minister and his government be able to achieve agreement with the provinces and arrive at a new or revised constitution satisfactory to Canadians generally by following their own approach and on their own terms, well and good. We would support this, but so far it is clear that the government has not been able to achieve it. I say this in an objective way: so far there is nothing but failure to show for the methods followed. Parliament and the country have to be concerned about the implications of this failure and about the consequences of continued failure and deadlock.

As to the implications of failure, I am much more concerned than the Prime Minister seems to be. In fact, I am not sure what the Prime Minister considers to be the implications of failure because he has contradicted himself a little on this subject several times. In the House on February 14 last, speaking of urban renewal, housing and urban transport, he said:

> Until the constitution is brought into the twentieth century in some of these respects, governments are to a large degree powerless to solve the problems either by acting alone or in co-operation with other levels of government.

In other words, we need a revised constitution before we can tackle some of these important problems confronting the country. Two months later, on April 24 last, the Prime Minister said in an interview that:

> —Most of the fundamental issues in this country could be settled under the present constitution through co-operation between the federal government and the provinces.

That statement of course was made when the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) resigned as Minister of Transport, and was made in reply to an accusation by the former minister that he resigned because we did not then have an adequate housing policy in Canada. So, the Prime Minister's theory of confederation does not allow the federal government to deal effectively with the modern problems facing this country. This, Mr. Speaker, was a dispute within the government. This was certainly the basis of the resignation of the former Minister of Transport and it seems to be the basis of the grievances of the hon. member for York West (Mr. Givens).

I want to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that I do not consider the Prime Minister reluctant to assert federal authority in constitutional discussions with the provinces in certain areas. It seems to me the question is, rather, which areas has the Prime Minister chosen for an assertion of federal authority? This government has been quite aggressive in constitutional discussions in certain areas vis-à-vis the provinces, notably in the field of welfare as the most recent example. Certainly, this government has pushed to increase the constitutional authority of the federal government with regard to pensions. It may very well be, and I suggest it is, that because of the aggressive position of the federal government in these areas it is neither exercising nor seeking adequate authority in other areas where federal leadership is generally considered to be required today. Insofar as the subjects mentioned by the Prime Minister himself are concerned, pollution and urban problems for example, presumably he does not wish to be regarded as a thorough-going centralizer.

I want to emphasize that I believe the federal government has the necessary authority, in co-operation with the provinces, to tackle problems such as pollution and urban problems. But perhaps the Prime Minister believes that there is no such authority. We have not seen any indication in constitutional discussions of a desire on his part to seek an enlargement of the federal role.

Mr. Trudeau: The Canada water act.

Mr. Stanfield: I do not think that is a constitutional matter, Mr. Speaker. I am not quite as confused as all that. I think we should ask some questions, and I think the committee should ask itself some questions.

Why is it more important for the federal government to increase its constitutional authority in the area of welfare rather than to increase its constitutional authority in a way that could help to cope with the pollution problem in the country?

Mr. Trudeau: We have not discussed that yet.

Mr. Stanfield: That is right, they have not discussed that yet; they are bogged down.

Mr. Trudeau: Welfare, for instance?

Mr. Stanfield: Yes, welfare. Is the Prime Minister particularly aggressive in the field of welfare, I ask, because the province of Quebec attaches more importance to exercising authority in the field of welfare itself?

Mr. Trudeau: Are you suggesting that we should not have tackled welfare?

Mr. Stanfield: No, but this is where the question of urgency arises. Why use welfare to seek an increase in federal authority rather than pollution? Is this the subconscious manifestation of the policy of confrontation? The Prime Minister has indicated that he welcomes the confrontation apparently developing in provincial politics in Quebec. Is the government of Canada consciously or subconsciously seeking a confrontation by following these methods?

Mr. Trudeau: Does the hon. member believe that welfare is less important than pollution?

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I shall deal with this as I go along.

Mr. Trudeau: Go ahead.

An hon. Member: Stop laughing John Turner.

Mr. Stanfield: I do not know why my hon. friend should get so upset. I am putting forward quietly my presentation of a point of view. The only reason I can understand for the Prime Minister and the gentlemen alongside and behind him becoming so agitated about it is that they think there might be something to it, Mr. Speaker.

Certainly the federal government is engaged in a protracted struggle to preserve—not only preserve, but to increase—the federal authority in some fields. To date, however, it has been negligent in other areas where difficulties are arising as a result of technology and modern developments. The government has been neglecting areas where most Canadians would argue jurisdiction is pretty important, both as to the exercise of jurisdiction and as a clarification of any doubt existing as to the ability of the federal government to exercise that jurisdiction.

My point is that I would like the committee to consider the practicability and the possibility of some adjustment in the direction of federal thrust. I should like the committee to consider whether it is possible that the federal thrust for additional authority might be changed, and whether this might not lead to the prospect of a genuine reconciliation, as well as to the prospect of the federal government having the authority it needs to deal with national problems. It is not a question of reducing the ability of Parliament or the federal government to serve Canada. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I am suggesting that the committee may well consider methods which would show how the usefulness of the federal Parliament and the ability of the government to serve the Canadian people would be increased. This is something the committee should be prepared to consider.

It is said by some that the Prime Minister and members of the federal government are going through the exercise of constitutional review merely to prove how impossible it all is. I have to say, after having listened to the Prime Minister this afternoon that it seemed to me as if his heart was not in it. He seemed to feel that it was unfortunate somebody else had started the process because, certainly, the Prime Minister's heart was not in it.

Mr. Forrestall: His heart cannot be in it because some allege he has no heart.

Mr. Stanfield: I wonder whether the Prime Minister intends to show us that, since the federal government and the provinces have failed to agree, the provincial premiers can go back to their offices reconciled to the workings of the present constitution. Would it really be as easy as all that, Mr. Speaker? Could we really say, as the Prime Minister has suggested,—forgetting for a moment what has just happened—that we cannot drop this matter until we have fully explored it but, once we have fully explored it and shown that we cannot reach agreement, we should forget about it?

Mr. Trudeau: When did I say that?

Mr. Stanfield: That was the suggestion. The Prime Minister said that, having put our hand to the plow and having started this thing, we must explore it fully. But he did not indicate at all whether he would be really concerned if the process failed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Stanfield: Oh, oh; listen to the hon. gentlemen groan. The point I wish to make is that I gravely doubt whether it is as easy as all that; I gravely doubt whether our future as a country would be so serene.

Mr. Trudeau: And just where, did I say that?

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister asks where he said that. Let me say this: If the Prime Minister is convinced that a failure of this procedure would have very serious consequences for the country, why did he not say that? Why did he say that we must pursue this process to the end?

Mr. Trudeau: Because I do not think there will be a failure, that is why.

Mr. Stanfield: If this constitutional conference fails, and if the constitutional process fails then, surely, we will be a lesser country. Surely, that will be demeaning to our self respect as a country and undermine our capacity for achievement as a united nation. Surely, such a result will be destructive to any spirit or hope of unity. And, Mr. Speaker, I pause before I say this but I think I must say it, our days as a nation would be numbered.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. gentleman is saying that.

Mr. Stanfield: If, as Canadians we are unable to agree on a consensus relating to our constitution and unable even to agree upon how to amend it at home, I ask, what would be the consequence in the Prime Minister's home province of such a failure? Would it have a settling effect, or the opposite? Would such failure strengthen those who believe in Canada or would it strengthen those who do not?

Some seem to think that the way to resolve the issues in Quebec is by some sort of high-noon confrontation between the theories of the Prime Minister on the one hand, and the theories of Rene Levesque on the other, with the winner taking all.

Mr. McGrath: A shoot out.

Mr. Trudeau: You people seem to want it.

Mr. Stanfield: Some of us do not like the idea of gambling with the future of Canada in that way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: So, instead, you people are wishy-washy about federalism.

Mr. Stanfield: To put it bluntly, some of us think Canada is bigger than the theories of the Prime Minister and Rene Levesque put together.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: We think that the way to build for the future of Canada is not by causing confrontation but by seeking reconciliation. We also think that there are so many serious problems facing the people of Canada that Canada just cannot afford the luxury of this continued stand-off, this constitutional deadlock, between the federal and provincial governments.

Mr. Trudeau: That is why the hon. member's party came up with the concept of special status.

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister made his speech, Mr. Speaker, and I am now trying to make mine.

Mr. Trudeau: But the hon. member is attacking me. I did not attack him.

An hon. Member: He is becoming nervous and excited, and cannot help it.

Mr. Stanfield: Although the Prime Minister has misrepresented my position in the past after I have spoken, this is the first time he has done so before I have finished my speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: I suggest that this committee must question some of the current dogmas of the federal government and explore other methods of reaching a constitutional consensus. I assume that in order to achieve such consensus, to achieve an arrangement that is in the best interests of the country, there must be some modification or redistribution of powers. There must be, on the one hand, a clarifying of and expanding of federal powers in some areas and, on the other hand, a clarifying and expanding of provincial powers. Some may say this would not lead to agreement or consensus and that if the federal government yielded any powers to the provinces related to any areas of dispute, more would be demanded of the federal government.

But I say that we must try, Mr. Speaker, and we ought not to accept defeat or failure before we try. For example, is it essential to good government in Canada that the federal government should claim all the constitutional authority in the field of welfare and of the related field of pensions. It asks for this in its white paper on the subject and that would bring about an increase in the power of the federal Parliament as compared with existing power. This government has said it is going to get out of a number of shared cost programs such as the hospital plan, the medicare plan and a number of other federal programs. These plans relate primarily to health; but they also relate to welfare and to income maintenance. The government has its own reasons for wishing to get out of these programs; and, in getting out of these programs the government will be reducing the authority it will be exercising in these areas. Nevertheless it seems to take the position that it is in the best interests of the country for it to do so.

This indicates that in the view of the government there is nothing really sacrosanct in maintaining the federal government's role in welfare and income maintenance at precisely its present level. Of course, it does not follow that the position put forward by the province of Quebec should be accepted, although the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) for one said sometime ago that it should be. There may well be some ground in between that is acceptable, and I should like to see the committee explore that. I mentioned two areas as examples.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired unless there is unanimous consent for him to continue.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Stanfield: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I will be as brief as I can. Instead of hanging on stubbornly for more constitutional authority in this area, the committee should consider whether an increase in federal authority would be more useful in other areas. The committee should also consider whether some restricted form of delegation between the federal and provincial governments might play a useful role in reaching a consensus. I know the Prime Minister used to be against this. I do not know his current views. There is nothing new in this.

The late Angus L. Macdonald, the distinguished former Premier of Nova Scotia and federal cabinet minister, advocated some form of delegation as a means of overcoming certain problems in our federal system. Twice in the last decade, the federal and provincial governments have virtually reached agreement on the principle, although not on the details. I think the committee should address itself to this question.

The Hon. Walter Weir, at a federal-provincial conference in February, 1969, put forward a formula in some detail which contained five classifications of legislative power. It made some provision for a delegation. This is an approach that should be considered, with the power of delegation being clearly defined and restricted. I ask the House and the committee which this House will appoint to bear in my mind that we do not have all the time in the world to arrive at some workable arrangement.

The Prime Minister spoke about the length of the process, but the situation in Canada today is such that the people across Canada are becoming increasingly impatient and frustrated by the apparent preoccupation of the federal government with constitutional questions. The Prime Minister may think this is not exactly fair and perhaps it is not. But the impression in this country is that the federal government is unable or unwilling to take effective action with regard to other problems.

The Prime Minister recognizes that the government appears to have a constitutional hang-up and Canadians are becoming fed up with this. On the other hand, if the situation in Quebec has not deteriorated it certainly has not improved in the last year or two. The people of Canada want to see an end to this constitutional deadlock, a break in the log-jam, so that they can have answers to their questions and action on their problems.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that nothing is much easier than announcing a policy that is uncompromising, immutable and utterly irreconcilable with other points of view. Nothing is easier and more popular at certain times, but countries survive and grow, just as families get along together, by way of adjustment and honourable accommodation. Far from being a sign of weakness, honourable accommodation is the most successful and civilized kind of leadership. It serves to reconcile and unite rather than polarize or devise. It serves to overcome pettiness, suspicion and animosity. Successful and honourable accommodation and compromise summon from the people of a country, as is required from members of a family, the best of tolerance, generosity and understanding that is in them.

In that spirit, there is greatness for a country. In that spirit I trust this committee will examine, with open minds and in an objective way, all the possibilities for a consensus of understanding, that the committee will work for reconciliation and seek a national consensus so that the present deadlock may be broken and governments can get on with their jobs.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to underline at the opening of my remarks on behalf of my colleagues and myself that, although I share the disappointment that I am sure all hon. members feel at the slow pace at which the constitutional conference is proceeding, I am not prepared to contemplate failure of that conference and I am not prepared to discuss the evil consequence of such failure. Despite my political disagreement with many leaders of governments in Canada, I believe that they and the people of Canada have a determination to make this country work, make this country great and, with that determination, failure should not be contemplated at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Nor is it possible, Mr. Speaker, for any reasonable person to believe that such a thing as constitutional review can take a short time and be completed within a year or two. We all fully expected that the process would be a long one and that the discussions might take quite a few years. It is not the length of time that the discussion takes which is important, but the manner in which the discussion is being carried on; whether from step to step there is a greater understanding on the part of the various representatives of the people of Canada or, on the contrary, whether there appears to be a worsening of the situation, a reduction in understanding and co-operation and willingness to achieve a fruitful result.

My unhappiness about the conference is not the time it has taken, but as I sat as an observer at all the meetings of this continuing conference, I wondered whether the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and others were right in calling it a review of the constitution or whether I was present at an auction of power seekers trying to find the particular place where they can exercise more power without defining the purpose for which that power is to be used. It is a sense of competition between the federal government and the provinces. It is a sense of auctioning parts of Canada between the federal and provincial authorities. This is what makes me sad about the constitutional conference and makes me worry about the future, not of that conference alone, but the future of my country.

The Prime Minister spoke today. I am not making a personal remark when I say with great respect that the Prime Minister seems to misunderstand the reasons and forces throughout this constitutional review. If he does understand them, and he is an intelligent man, he certainly does not tell us. He spoke today about the increasing powers of the provinces, le pouvoir croissant, as I heard him.

They are not increasing the powers of the provinces, Mr. Speaker. They have not increased their powers under the constitution. It is not a question of power between the federal government and the provinces that confronts Canada. It is the development of the industrial urbanized society which has forced upon the provinces expenditures way beyond anything contemplated 100 years ago. That is the problem that faces Canada.

It is the exercise of the present constitutional powers by the provinces, often with the encouragement of the federal government along lines which I and my hon. friends support, which has substantially increased provincial expenditures. The Prime Minister gave us a figure of 204 per cent for the increase in those expenditures between 1954 and 1964 as against an increase of 56 per cent in the same period by the federal government. I say to the Prime Minister that it was not by any good husbandry on the part of the federal government that the increase at federal level was held to this proportion. The extent of the provincial increase is accounted for by the fact that the responsibility for education, for road construction, for health and welfare services and for dealing with the consequences of a modern technological society lies constitutionally on the shoulders of the provinces. This is why provincial expenditures increased by 204 per cent as compared with 56 per cent for the federal government.

I do not know why the Prime Minister mentioned those figures. I hope he did not intend to wag a finger of admonition at the provinces; I hope he understood there is nothing in those figures about which he, or we, can boast. It is the present constitutional set-up which produced them.

New developments in society cry out for a revision of the distribution of powers and responsibilities in our country and for a fresh consideration of the fiscal capacities of the several levels of government. This is known to everyone; I am not being original when I say this. I would remind the House that the powers now given to the provinces and municipalities, as well as the magnitude of expenditures, cannot be exercised or carried out by them. The burden is too great for them unless there is some kind of federal participation on an effective and substantial scale.

Everybody talks about urbanization and the effects of urbanization. The fact is that this is the source of the demand for a review of the constitution. Canada today is no longer what it was in 1867, a country with a small population the greater part of which was rural, a country in which education was merely a luxury for those who could afford it, a country where health was something to be left to God and the environment, because little else could be done about it. We are no longer that kind of country. Seventy per cent of our people are now living in urban areas and by 1980, 80 per cent will do so. All the problems the Prime Minister mentioned this afternoon, urban transportation, housing, urban renewal, recreation—particularly for the children in these huge agglomerations of high-rise apartments and choking streets—pollution and so on, have descended upon our society and will become more evident as we continue. Many of them do not recognize provincial boundaries—water pollution is one example. Many of them are beyond solution by local people, whether their representatives be municipal or provincial. What is required is the kind of national approach which the present government has refused to take, as I shall show in the course of the next few minutes. This is another reason why the need to reconsider the powers of the various levels of government and the financial capacities of those various levels became essential in the 'sixties and remains so in the 'seventies.

Another development in our society which made it necessary to examine our set-up and try to find ways of improving confederation is the tendency—one which perhaps my hon. friends and I welcome more than others in this House—for an increasing degree of government intervention in the economy, and toward an increasing provision of welfare and the benefits of a good society to our people. Whether they welcome this or not, I am sure hon. members in all parts of the House recognize this tendency. We feel, moreover, an obligation to continue collectively to provide for the welfare of the people of Canada. This has involved a much larger degree of participation by government at all levels in the development of the country and in bringing costly amenities of life to our people. It has involved, particularly at the federal level, a search for means whereby these obligations of government in a modern society can be fulfilled.

There is a fourth development which has demanded an examination of our constitutional set-up. There is ever-increasing acceptance by people of all parties that there is a collective responsibility to achieve equality not only of opportunity but also of condition for all people in all areas, and not merely in one's own country but all over the world. This was not accepted years ago. When I first became active politically some decades ago in Montreal, I recall having to debate with people who held that if we provided unemployment insurance it would simply make people lazy; that if we gave them pensions it would destroy their souls; that if they walked in shoes with holes in the soles they were great people because they could be proud of the fact that the holes were their own. This was the attitude taken not only in Canada but in societies all over the world.

It has now been discarded, and increasingly people all over the country are demanding that governments in Canada should provide greater equality for all our citizens from coast to coast. The difficulty which arises is: how can all this be achieved; which level of government can best provide for bringing about equality of condition as between the people of Newfoundland, Ontario and British Columbia; which level of government has the means, the authority and the fiscal capacity to bring about the economic, cultural and educational development of any area? This is a pre-condition for giving the people in the disadvantaged areas of Canada an opportunity to hold their heads at least as high as those Canadians who, by accident of birth or by immigration, live elsewhere in our nation.

Mr. Lewis: These are the reasons for reviewing the constitution, and if they are not the reasons, that review is a waste of time and a futile exercise which we ought to stop right now. It is the failure of the Prime Minister and the federal government to set before the constitutional conferences these basic and human reasons which in my opinion have been responsible for the marketplace haggling which is a characteristic of these conferences instead of genuine co-operation among those who seek a common goal for all Canada.

The fact is that we have not made much progress at these meetings.

[Translation]

The constitutional conference is now entering its second year of proceedings and does not seem to have made very substantial progress. In fact, the situation tends, it seems to me, to become more serious in many fields. The problems which the conference must face are obviously complex and difficult. It is not my intention to blame anyone for this lack of progress. However, I would say that in several fields the position taken by the government and the attitude of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) reveal a lack of flexibility which puts obstacles in the way of the difficult discussions which must be carried on by the heads of governments in Canada.

To my mind, the Prime Minister's refusal, as emphasized by him this afternoon, to admit that Quebec is confronted with particular problems calling for special solutions is and will always be an insuperable obstacle to the constitutional review.

Mr. Schreyer, my colleague who is premier of Manitoba, mentioned this fact to the conference and also to newspapermen. Obviously, the whole system of shared cost programs as well as the problems concerning housing, urban renewal, pollution, manpower training and some aspects of social welfare, for which federal initiative and participation are required, are in danger. In my view, that is due to the obstinate refusal of the Prime Minister to discuss such problems with Quebec in a different way than with the other provinces.

I do not mean by that that we should give in every time the Quebec government makes requests to Ottawa. I agree with the Prime Minister that Ottawa should not concede, as Quebec wants, that the federal government must never allocate funds for social security programs concerning Canadians living in that province.

Evidently, it is essential that Canadians throughout the country enjoy the services of the federal government and that they maintain direct relations with its institutions. It is therefore also important that Quebecers, just like the citizens of other provinces, make use of Ottawa's special services, in order to judge the importance which the federal government attaches to their problems as well as to those of other Canadians.

But to insist on this basic principle in a federal state does not mean to deny some special problems and an unfaltering will to solve them by special means. I can hardly understand how someone like the Prime Minister who has the future of Canada so much at heart and who has a thorough knowledge of our constitutional history can remain so impervious to things that are essential to our country.

It is unfortunate that another problem, bilingualism, seems to be getting worse. Two years ago, one could see real progress towards the recognition of bilingualism in Canada. Some provinces had made considerable efforts in that direction and everywhere there was a growing interest in the advantages to be derived from bilingualism, not only for greater unity but also for increased fairness and wealth in Canadian life and culture. Regretfully, linguistic quarrels and a few unfortunate events in Quebec created an unhealthy atmosphere that threatens the spread of bilingualism in the other provinces. I should like to give an example which is rather distressing for me. I was educated in Montreal in the English language, and I am aware of the rights I enjoyed, as are my friends and colleagues. Today however in the province of Quebec, people are wondering whether those rights will continue to exist in the future. Not only the extremists' position in Quebec is to be dreaded, but it seems evident that at the administrative level, the attitude of the Quebec government is making the problem worse.

The members from Quebec know, I am sure, that there is a new procedure in that province with regard to higher education. When a student graduates from a secondary school, he must attend a junior college for two years before being admitted to university where he has to study another three years in order to obtain a B.A. or B.Sc. degree.

I have learned from reliable sources that presently, there is only one English-speaking college in Quebec. Now, to be recognized, such a college must get approval from the Provincial Department of Education, and I am told that so far, they have refused to approve the creation of other English-speaking colleges.

The result, if such information is accurate, is that next fall, about 3,000 English-speaking high school students will be unable to be admitted to a CEGEP, and consequently they will not be able to take up university studies.

This is an unfair situation unlikely to serve Quebec's or Canada's interests. Such a policy only aggravates the situation and reduces the hope for a united Canada and the development of bilingualism throughout the country. We must face this situation as openly as possible, because today, higher education is no longer considered a luxury for the young, but a necessity for economic and social progress, in these times of technological revolution.

[English]

I deliberately cited this example of retrograde behaviour on the part of the government of Quebec to underline the difficulties which are now being created, and to underline the feelings which I have that far from improving the situation in Canada the exercise of reviewing our constitution, not the exercise as such but the situation despite this review, has resulted in a great worsening of the attitude of one community to the other in this country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to emphasize that we in this party, as I have already said, are not concerned about the time the review may take, but we are quite concerned that despite the brave words of the Prime Minister today, and on some other occasions, the constitutional review be not used as an excuse for inaction in any areas in which this country needs action immediately. The Prime Minister says that although the exercise was really initiated by the provinces they now seem to be a little less interested in the constitutional review, and that some newspaper editorials underline their lack of interest.

Let me say to him that I am not surprised at that. Let me say to him, I hope without presumption, that he is misunderstanding the attitude of the provinces and most of the writers of newspaper editorials. They are not disinterested in constitutional review. They are in despair at the failure of the federal government to deal with the problems which press upon the provinces, the municipalities and the people resident in them while this review is going on. That is the reason for their disinterest. It it not a rejection of the need to review and rewrite our constitution that our Prime Minister is witnessing. It is a cry from the heart that the Prime Minister stop fiddling, which is the way they look at it in this context, while their issues and problems mount or while Rome burns.

For example, how can the leader of any federal government expect that the provinces will look at constitutional review with open hearts and minds when right in the middle of that review they hear from spokesmen of the government, and I am not exaggerating even though I am not quoting, that as soon as it is possible the government intends to withdraw from the cost shared programs—perhaps not all of them but a good many of them? Just imagine what that means for the provinces. They are induced to come into the program because of the federal participation and then they are told, a year, three years or five years after that, the federal government is going to withdraw. It is true the government will make provisions for certain financial returns, but it intends to withdraw and from then on the responsibility will be entirely upon the provinces.

How does the Prime Minister expect a representative of any government in Canada to sit with him and discuss the allocation of powers under the constitution when the premiers or Prime Ministers of the provinces see the federal axe hanging over them, over the residents of the provinces, over the treasury and over the entire program of social security which has been so painfully built? It is this attitude of the federal government I condemn, not the time they are taking or that the Prime Minister is taking in getting these conferences going because they cannot be done fast.

At the same time that this review takes place, the federal government makes threats about withdrawals from programs which are the very lifeblood of the provinces and which attack the basic welfare of the Canadian people from coast to coast. How can the Prime Minister expect representatives and the Prime Ministers of provinces to feel at ease and leisurely consider the many complex legal and social issues involved in constitutional revision when every one of them knows that in the large cities they have programs for urban renewal. While there has been some research done, the federal government and its minister responsible for housing sit in offices reviewing, reviewing and reviewing but obviously becoming more confused daily. The more the minister reads and the more he reviews the less he apparently knows of the problem. The provinces and municipalities sit with the Prime Minister and demand that something be done about urban renewal in the large cities of this country, yet they are expected to come to a constitutional review in a leisurely way to sit and discuss constitutional problems as though there were not very urgent matters pressing upon them at home. What we resent and think is a betrayal of the needs of Canada and the Canadian people is that we are constantly being threatened by this government about our system of social security. We do not know what the result will be but we hear about task forces investigating the total system of social security and reporting. We hear statements from the government about the need for selectivity instead of universality. I am certain that every representative of every province in this country is wondering what this means for the various programs which the people in the provinces enjoy and which they share in many cases with the federal government.

How can anyone expect the Prime Ministers from the disadvantaged provinces of this country to come to the table to discuss constitutional revision when the gap between the income of their people and the income of the people in other provinces increases while this constitutional review is going on? In spite of all the reorganization of the federal government and the establishment of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, the fact is that the gap in income and welfare between the people in the Atlantic provinces and the people in Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta has increased in the last few years. This has not narrowed. How can any Prime Minister representing a province in dire need like the Atlantic provinces are, and like the province of Manitoba is to some extent, come to the table and sit with the federal government in a leisurely manner discussing the social and legal implications of constitutional review?

These are the problems that make constitutional review appear irrelevant to the representatives of the provincial governments. These are the problems that make the constitutional review misunderstood and perhaps irrelevant to the people of Canada. These are the problems that make the constitutional review irrelevant to so many people in the province of Quebec. I say to the Prime Minister and the federal government that if they are serious about the unity of this country, and serious about building a new constitution as the basis for that unity, they have to tackle these problems immediately, with some verve, some imagination, some heart and some generosity.

I say that history is full of examples that when people sit down to write a document, a constitution, an agreement, a contract or whatever it may be for something in the future while they ignore or appear to ignore the problems that choke the people at present, the documents are not going to be written or if they are written are not going to be any good, and to the extent that they are any good, will not be worth the paper they are written on because underneath them will remain social bitterness and social misunderstanding and a great deal of regional resentment that will not allow any constitution to work.

The solution is not easy. This cannot be done overnight, but I say that the solution to the constitutional problem of Canada will not be found by merely writing a new constitution and not by merely modernizing the division of powers, but it must be based in my view and the view of my colleagues—I am sure I speak for them—on action now by the Parliament and the Government of Canada on the problems I have indicated and the many more that are well known to the Prime Minister. This should be done while this constitutional review is being carried on so that the representatives of the provinces will be sitting down with a federal government which recognizes these problems and is doing something about them. They will then, perhaps, see a better future for the citizens of the provinces and will then be willing to discuss constitutional review in a much better mood than is now the case.

I am not going to attempt to give a blueprint of the kind of thing that the committee ought to discuss because I do not think this is the purpose of this debate today. We support the setting up of this committee not only because it will enable members of opposition parties to participate in discussions on changing the constitution, but even more important, as far as I am concerned, this is the only way in which the people of Canada, through their various organizations, can be heard on the subject of constitutional change.

I am not saying this in terms intending to belittle anyone of the provinces or anyone of the governments, but you sit at these constitutional conferences and watch 11 men who have been thrown up by the accident of election with the duty and the obligation—

An hon. Member: You better amend that now.

Mr. Lewis: I am not amending it. This applies to my friend Mr. Schreyer as it does to the Prime Minister of Canada. By the accident of election 11 men, some with one view of Canada and some with another, some thinking they are Gods and some thinking they are demi-Gods, but no one less than that, sit there settling the future of my country. These may be the people in Canada to do it, but all of us will have some doubt about some one in that group of 11.

• (5:10 p.m.)

An hon. Member: Particularly one.

Mr. Lewis: I do not know what the alternative is. There probably is none, but as I said there is a serious question about 11 men who are there by accident of election—11 men, no more. It is true there is a cabinet, but essentially the present system means that it is the Prime Minister who settles the constitution and the future for all the people of Canada. By this means I feel there is no opportunity, except in an election or in elections, for the people of Canada to express themselves and to take part in the process of constitutional discussion and constitutional change. This is the reason we, like members of the official opposition, asked a long time ago for a parliamentary committee. If I remember correctly, my colleague the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) asked for this back in 1966 when the present Prime Minister was minister of justice, and at the time the justice minister rejected it as he later rejected the request of opposition members.

I suggest to the Prime Minister that he was wrong. It may be that the Prime Minister and the premiers, 11 of them, sitting in the constitutional conferences might have behaved differently than they have behaved if the people of Canada had been given an opportunity to appear before parliamentary and legislative committees across the country and have their say about Canada and its future instead of leaving it only to the Prime Ministers. This committee will provide an opportunity for appearances by the Federation of Agriculture, the National Farmers Union, the Canadian Labour Congress—

An hon. Member: The CMA.

Mr. Lewis: The CMA, if that association has anything to say and the Canadian Bar Association if it has anything to say that concerns the welfare of the people of Canada. All these organizations and many others will have an opportunity to appear before us and participate in this historic event.

We in this party object—and we so informed the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald)—to a joint committee on which the Senate is represented. Personally, I love every Senator individually but do not want to sit with them on any committee such as this despite my love for them individually. Aside from our opposition to the Senate as an institution in this Parliament there is another reason why in this case I object to a joint committee. I do not intend to move an amendment in this regard but I wish to place this on the record. They were not elected by the people. They do not represent the people of Canada. They were appointed by some prime ministers over the years. Many of them are defeated candidates.

Mr. Trudeau: Whom are the members of the CMA elected by?

Mr. Lewis: They at least represent the doctors. If you want the Senators to appear before the committee to present their case for the Senate, we will hear them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: It is their presence on this committee to which we object. However, I shall not say any more about that. In any case, my time I believe is about up.

The second point I wish to make is that made by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). I am probably wrong, but I was under the impression that an earlier draft of the motion contained in it a provision giving the committee permission to hire counsel and other experts. I regret very much the omission of such a provision and I hope, after the committee is established and meets, that it will come back to the House of Commons and request and receive authority to hire whatever experts and whatever assistants members of the committee may think necessary.

Some others of my colleagues will speak in this debate and will indicate some things we believe might be done immediately, such as the inclusion of a provision for delegation of power which might solve present problems without the necessity of waiting for the total revision of the constitution.

Since the clock tells me I must, I shall conclude by saying this not very original thing to the House. I agree with the Prime Minister that countries and nations are not, despite what some people think, ordained by God and are not the result of any tablet from Mount Sinai. They are the historical development resulting from many things which it is difficult to indicate. When I wrote an article for a Canadian magazine about three years ago I said, when in certain circumstances I was asked why I was going back to Canada after I had finished my studies elsewhere, that this is rather difficult to answer and that I can only say, like Gertrude Stein, my country, my country is my country. But it is a great country; it is a tremendous country; it is a beautiful country. It is a country which has great riches underground, in the forests and in the waters. It has a great people, not greater than any other but just as great as any other people in the world.

We have the possibility of building a model society for the peoples of the world to see. We have a duty to build it because we have the resources with which to build such a society. The leaders of governments in Canada will go down in history as destroyers of human hopes if they do not succeed in this constitutional revision. The people of Canada will never forgive them if the result of this revision is not a better constitution serving the interests of the people of Canada, and indeed of the people of the world, better than our constitution has served us until now, although it has served us. As has been said, historically we face an important task. I hope and pray we are able to fulfil it with distinction and with justice to the people of our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher)—Post Office—assignment of new productivity executive; the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow)—Manpower—adult retraining and educational programs—alleged wasting of money; the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding)—Pollution—dumping of oil and other waste in Great Lakes.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Trudeau:

That a Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be appointed to examine and report upon proposals, made public, or which are from time to time made public by the Government of Canada, on a number of subjects related to the Constitution of Canada during the course of the comprehensive review of the Constitution of Canada, which review was agreed upon at the Constitutional Conference of the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premiers and Prime Ministers of the Provinces in February, 1968, and alternative proposals on the same subjects;

That twenty members of the House of Commons, to be designated by the House at a later date, be members of the Joint committee on the part of this House;

That the committee have power to appoint, from among its members, such sub-committee as it may deem advisable or necessary;

That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House;

That the committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers, and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting Their Honours to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems so advisable, some of its members to act on the proposed joint committee.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to say a few words this afternoon on the motion introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for the setting up of a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to study the constitution and amend it slightly if need be.

Under the circumstances, we support the appointment of that committee which will enable us, first of all, to update our constitution, which is over 100 years old with a view to improving it and repatriating it, patching it up or renewing it if necessary. Indeed, that agreement has too often been bandied around by federal administrations which could not see beyond their centralist limits.

Today, when he came to the house, the Prime Minister did not agree with the constitutional review. He finally reconsidered his decision, and I congratulate him on it, and allowed the creation of the present committee to study our constitution.

This review will be most fruitful at the coming federal-provincial conferences. I am convinced that it will depoliticize the conferences and encourage various groups, and even some responsible individuals, to give up their personal concepts and adapt themselves to the aspirations of the majority. Finally, it will enable us, members of this House, as well as all other responsible people at the provincial level, to hear opinions other than those of our respective governments and, for once, to have views from Canada as a whole.

One must not be afraid to face reality squarely, to find out why some provinces interpret the constitution differently. For instance, why should I, as a Quebecer, fight for ideas which some of my colleagues do not share?

To review briefly the history of the constitution, Mr. Speaker, allow me to go back to 1867, the year it was born. In 1867, Canada comprised Upper and Lower Canada. The constitution was drawn up merely in an attempt to do justice, on the one hand, to Lower Canada which was mostly made up of French Canadians settled on an area larger than present-day Quebec and, on the other hand, to Upper Canada, which territory was mostly occupied by English-speaking people.

When I hear the Prime Minister say that Quebec may not claim any more than the other provinces, I simply do not agree. Had Quebec, as a province, not been different from the others, the present constitution would have been entirely different; it might even never have existed.

History teaches us that our constitution owes its origin to the existence of Quebec. In fact, without the French Canadians in Lower Canada this country today would be administered by a single government, and there would be no need for Confederation.

Under that agreement, the provinces concerned agreed to form a central government, whereas up to then, every one of them had managed to administer itself. It must be kept in mind that the federal government owes its power to the provinces.

The numerous quarrels we have had for so many years are due to the fact that federal governments believed they had founded the provinces. We will achieve Canadian unity only if those provinces remain strong, with free government that respect the union, and only if the central government respects that agreement in order to facilitate its negotiations with each of the provinces and to be able to take more effective action in areas of national interest.

I said at the outset that the Prime Minister first opposed a review of the constitution, contending that the present one was adequate to enable the Canadian people to live in harmony. I do not disapprove altogether of his idea because regardless of the snags it ran into, our constitution adequately safeguards the rights of the provinces.

Of course, the central government is highly responsible for those snags which could have probably been avoided had it co-operated more with the provinces instead of always trying to play cat and mouse with them.

In the field of taxation, what has been done? The provincial fields of jurisdiction were first encroached upon and if this continues, some day they will be taken over by the federal government at the individual, municipality and school board levels.

We oppose precisely this evolution, we of the province of Quebec, just as the citizens of other provinces should oppose it. In view of the feelings in some provinces, they remain indifferent because they profit by this attitude, while we, in the province of Quebec, have to fight against this new invasion of our provincial rights. Besides, as was mentioned by the previous speaker, as long as it is not understood that Quebec has requirements that are different from those of other provinces, we shall say that Quebec cannot give up in order to administer and to do justice to its people. We shall hold on until the end in order to stop this process.

During the study in committee, we will have surprises. Some Quebecers will come and testify impartially without indulging in politics or sentimentality, to speak frankly, like Canadians. I know that several other provinces, as mentioned by the previous speaker, are ready to recognize that Quebec has certainly got something that other provinces have not. This must be well understood.

The constitution was made because of Quebec. Quebec has its Civil Code and the other provinces their common law. It is not the same thing at all.

I could enumerate many other things. We are not like the others in Canada but this does not prevent us from being good and perfect Canadians. However—

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Will the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Gauthier: Certainly.

Mr. Trudeau: Does the hon. member assume that the members elected in Quebec are unable to represent and speak for this province in the same way as the members elected in other provinces speak on behalf of those provinces?

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the question put by the Prime Minister. It is indeed possible to represent the interests of one's province and I am here to do so. I sought election in order, to better defend the interests of my province, but in an orderly way.

People come and say that Quebec cannot manage its own administration. We are confronted with a problem: it has to be solved. Taxing powers are not evenly distributed. The federal government is boasting of surpluses and the provinces are registering deficits. The balance should be restored and this, in my opinion, should be done at the committee level. Why is the balance upset? It is because of the intrusions of the federal government in the fields coming under provincial jurisdiction.

There have been all sorts of reasons given for that. War, for instance. War was given as an excuse for encroaching upon three provincial fields of taxation: real estate tax, personal and corporation income tax and estate tax. The federal government maintained that these steps were unavoidable.

It was but an excuse, for the problems were solved through some other means. It was just an excuse to trespass on the provincial jurisdictions in order to get hold of the money in Quebec.

They promised, however, to return it as soon as the war would be over. The war has been over for a long time now but the money has still not been wholly returned. It is taking a long time and meanwhile the federal government goes on collecting money in the provinces. That is how the provinces have been deprived of their three main sources of income.

What can the provinces do in the meantime? They lack money. They also have a right to develop, as pointed out by the Prime Minister and other members. The provinces must keep pace with progress, and for that purpose, they need money which they do not have. The power to accumulate capital for administration purposes was taken away from them and they could not get it back, in spite of promises to that effect.

That is not what the provinces need, and especially Quebec. Quebec should be allowed—and it has this right—to raise the money it needs to survive, instead of getting it from a third party.

There lies the greatest cause of injustice. Today, the same system is still being implemented. Full powers of taxation are enjoyed and all the money required is sought in the provinces.

It is wished to establish an industrial development committee. I am very happy about it. Under the circumstances, we cannot have the whole loaf, only crumbs. The establishment of this committee will enable the federal government to give something to provinces. Therefore, the provinces will obtain money tc promote education and to give assistance to the municipalities, the school boards and ever to individuals.

However, if you consider the whole issue closely, you find it is a dangerous infringement on the part of the federal government in fields coming under provincial jurisdiction.

Why? Because the federal government has all the necessary authority to lay hands on the money earned by the workers in the various provinces and to distribute it like a good father. This is not what the provinces want. They no longer want a federal government which interferes in the fields of provincial jurisdiction.

The committee should recommend that the federal government let the provinces have exclusive jurisdiction in matters coming under their competence, while granting them the rights corresponding to their duties. Are not, health, road safety and education within the competence of the provinces?

Let us give the provinces the means to raise the money required to administer, for instance, the areas connected with health or education in the province of Quebec. Then there will be peace and the province of Quebec will have the money required to cope with the situation in the areas of education or health. Thus the province of Quebec would not always have to beg the central government in order to obtain what the latter has hypocritically stolen from that province.

It was a hypocritical agreement that was entered into during the last war. The province of Quebec had been promised that its powers of taxation would be handed over right after the war. That was a piece of hypocrisy.

Today, the money required to administer the province of Quebec is still taken away from the workers. Some seem astonished—in a hypocritical way—that the Quebec government is clamouring for its revenues. What a joke!

• (5:40 p.m.)

First you take away a man's clothes, throw him naked on the street, then have the police arrest him because he has nothing on. Such is the situation of the province of Quebec, to whom they say: you need our help because you cannot administer some of your departments. But what do they do? They simply hand over to the province the money which already belongs to it. The committee should finally be able to understand the situation.

I went out West, and I met honest people there. I had talks with them and I believe life would be more worthwhile if rights were respected.

Mr. Speaker, is it conceivable that the municipality should tell the father, the wage-earner: "Turn your salary over to me and I will give you as much as I please. You will eat what I choose."?

Yet that is what is taking place between the federal government and the provinces. Little wonder that Quebec is in a turmoil, and we have not seen anything yet. If the federal government does not put a stop to this thrust, I cannot answer for anything in Quebec, a province well known to me because I travel through it all year long. And let nobody think that only a small minority of 3 or 4 per cent is involved.

The unrest brought about by all this disunion today is due to the hypocritical interference of the federal government in Quebec. Having been stripped, the citizen is covered with a piece of cloth and told: "You're lucky! I am honest and generous since I cover you with a cloth". That is not what Quebec wants. It simply wants to recover its taxation rights, in order to give its people what they need in the fields coming under its jurisdiction.

I do not know if this is clear enough and if I can be understood today by most members. I am so anxious that this review prove useful. I hope my words can convince some sincere members from the other provinces. I do not think any member would purposely do wrong. If he does, it would be because he is misinformed.

The problem has never been put properly. We have had to learn false histories of Canada and now we are being told false economic stories. As I said at the outset, we must face the facts if we want to do constructive work in committee. If we Canadians want to get along with each other and cooperate. I am sure we shall have made a first step towards Canadian unity.

The policy of the federal government in the western provinces has been clearly explained, and the citizens have understood. We do not wish to take anything away from anybody, but we want at least to be allowed to keep what we have to live, like all other Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, had I known that I was going to speak today, I would have prepared my speech and would have been able to make a clearer presentation. I may however have that opportunity if I am appointed to the committee, although I am already sitting on some others.

I am confident that the members of the committee will get to the grass-roots and will discuss the matter without bias. If, for once, this is done within the committee whose sole aim would be to ensure Canadian unity, then the committee will be doing a good job.

It is essential that this review be made democratically and that the witnesses, wherever they come from, be heard with an open mind. The report of the committee should be submitted to the provinces, so that they may be in a position to discuss the future of the country without forgetting that the main point to be considered is national unity.

Mr. Speaker, I would have liked my intervention this afternoon to be better prepared, but we do not control the circumstances. I hope that my comments will lead hon. members towards this unity we are all hoping for. Let us co-operate to reach that common goal and everyone of us should apply his intelligence and his goodwill to that task.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. Is the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson) rising to ask a question?

Mr. Thomson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) would permit a question. In transferring taxing powers to the federal government, in the opinion of the hon. member did the province of Quebec lose more than any other province of Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can answer the hon. member who wanted to know whether Quebec had endured greater losses than another province in the adventure of Confederation. Even if I tried to do so, I would not have all the statistics. I told the House about the principle of taxation. Those who work want only one thing: to get their pay directly at the end of the week and not through a third party.

Provincial governments have responsibilities to which correspond the right of access to three taxation fields which hopefully will be given back to the province of Quebec, provided it is willing to deal with them. It must be recognized once and for all that Quebec has that right.

[English]

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, when this motion was put on the Order Paper I had high hopes that the debate would be a departure from the federal-provincial discussions on the constitution. I hoped that, perhaps by co-operation among members of the House, we might be able to break the deadlock that has taken place in federal-provincial conferences and reach a consensus as members of different parties. I hoped this would be done in a non-partisan way. I still hope we can do this and that we can make a real contribution in this respect.

However, this afternoon I was a bit disappointed, and that is why I just said that I hoped all these things would be done. When the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) rose to speak, he also said he would be non-partisan, then immediately made derogatory remarks about the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) and questioned the order in which the agendas had been drawn up. He wanted to know why the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had not dealt first with the problems of the cities instead of with welfare. I found all this a little picayune. I suppose if we had started with the cities, we would have been accused of not starting with welfare. The fact is that from the very beginning the Government of Canada under the former Prime Minister set out a program of action for these federal-provincial conferences.

All the proposals of the government have been set out quite clearly in the constitutional booklets. The first booklet dealt in a general way with the proposals for constitutional reform and the sociological and political implications that were necessary for making the changes. The next booklet dealt with the charter of human rights. Other booklets are entitled, "The Constitution and the People of Canada", "The Federal-Provincial Spending Power", "The Taxing Powers of the Constitution" and "Federalism and International Relations". We then went into the division of powers. The first matter dealt with in the division of powers was welfare and income maintenance.

I hope the parliamentary committee, comprised of members of all parties, will co-operate in developing a consensus on the Canadian Constitution and will break the deadlock that has taken place in the federal-provincial meetings. I agree this committee may be able to do things that the federal-provincial conference has not been able to do, because we have not only representatives of the four parties in the House but representatives of the different regions in Canada in a way the government does not. The Conservatives have strong representation from the Maritimes and the Prairies. The Creditistes have strong representation from rural Quebec. The New Democratic Party has representation from the Prairies as well as some of the cities. I am optimistic; I think we can work to accomplish something that will bring about a constitution befitting this great country of ours.

In addition to the usual witnesses from the intermediary bodies, trade unions, the CMA and other groups that have been mentioned, I hope we will meet members of the legislative assemblies of the provinces, not only government members but opposition members. I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that we should meet representatives of the cities either through citizens' associations or the city councils. A committee of this House did hear the chairman of the executive committee of the city of Montreal when we were dealing with the Company of Young Canadians.

I think it would be well for us to hear the representations of the cities in this matter. I believe now is a good time for us to take this initiative. We cannot be dogmatic in this regard. Perhaps it should have been done before, or maybe it should be done later. In any case, we are doing it now and this is a good time because frustration is building up among some Canadians because of the lack of progress resulting from the constitutional conference. It appears to them the conference is not resolving anything.

As the Prime Minister pointed out, the provinces which started this process to a great extent have not put forward their proposals in the same precise manner as the Government of Canada. An exception to this is the province of Quebec, which had an all-party committee of its legislative assembly. The province of Quebec put forward specific proposals, but the other provinces have not been so specific. They have discussed the proposals but have not replied specifically to them. Some provinces have from time to time tried to act as broker between the federal government and the government of Quebec, but they have not spoken in specific terms in the same way as the federal government in its seven constitutional papers which have been very specific on the points put forward for discussion today.

Many people, in their frustration, are beginning to say they have had enough of this constitutional discussion and we should get down to discussing some of the problems of Canada which have a higher priority, such as pollution, inflation and the problems of the cities. When dealing with problems such as those I have just mentioned, we must not forget that they are very much related to the constitution. Very often we cannot act in the way we would like to act, because of the constitution. This is natural. The constitution was drafted 100 years ago at a time when technology had not developed to the extent it has today. These problems have grown up around a new technology and new type of society. The legislative categories in the constitution are just not adequate.

We have been successful in doing some of these things through co-operative federalism. This process of co-operative federalism originated in the United States and we have used it for the last ten years. Problems do not fit easily into categories of legislation. No matter how perfect a constitution, if we are to do a good job it is obvious that all levels of government must co-operate and use their different areas of jurisdiction to deal adequately with problems.

Unfortunately, the division of power under our constitution is in many respects out of date. This matter is under review to help us deal with problems more expeditiously and with greater vigour. I do not think it can be said that we have not acted in areas where we have jurisdiction, nor that we have not taken initiatives where the jurisdiction is not clear. An example of that is the Water Act. One might argue that the jurisdiction in this area is not clear, yet the federal government, following the Resources for Tomorrow Conference, took the initiative and tried to do something about a very real problem. No matter how perfectly we set up these divisions of power and categories for legislative competence, we will still need a spirit of co-operation, a creative federalism, if we are to have a smoothly-run country.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, immediately before supper I was discussing the division of power under the present constitution and I said that the powers which the federal government and the provincial governments now exercise are not adequate to meet the technical and social realities of 1970.

It seems to me that under the present constitution legislative powers are too inflexible and too exclusive. In my view it would be better if we made greater use of concurrent powers such as those now used in respect of agriculture, immigration and pensions. These powers belong to both levels of government, though should conflict arise the right of paramountcy is given to one of the jurisdictions. In other words, both governments are free to legislate, but if there is conflict the constitution states which jurisdiction has paramountcy.

A solution along these lines was put forward in the recent white paper on the constitution, dealing specifically with income maintenance. I believe that an arrangement of this kind would result in a more flexible and functional constitution. I also believe that in certain cases we should consider favourably a proposition giving one level of government the right to delegate its powers under the constitution to another level of government.

Several problems have arisen in recent years directly related to the constitutional situation. One of them has to do with conditions in our cities. Some people have criticized the federal government on the grounds that it is not concerned with the cities; that it has done nothing to legislate for them. Such statements are inaccurate. We have passed a good deal of legislation which affects the cities—measures dealing with transportation, housing, health and welfare, labour, manpower, and so on. This legislation has had a great impact on the cities. The fact is there is no comprehensive power vested in the federal government under the present constitution which permits the federal government to legislate directly for the cities. The comprehensive powers under section 92 of the BNA Act belong to the provinces.

If we were to legislate unilaterally in a comprehensive way, we would be violating the present constitution and, moreover, doing so at the very time we are trying to negotiate a new constitution with a new division of powers. Were we to take such a course, our proposals at these constitutional conferences would simply not be credible. We cannot legislate unilaterally in areas which belong to the provinces, while supporting an entirely different principle at constitutional conferences. Again, such a course might be taken as a licence to the provinces to intervene in areas which are specifically federal.

This leads us to the field of external affairs. Some provinces have been seeking to conclude agreements with other countries with regard to matters over which they say they have jurisdiction. Nevertheless, as has been well set out in the white paper dealing with international relations as they concern the constitution, if this were permitted, unfortunate consequences might follow. For example, Canada might be following a general foreign policy with respect to, say, Rhodesia or South Africa which included a boycott. At the same time, a province might decide to carry on a teacher-exchange program or an apprentice training program in co-operation with the country concerned, stating that such arrangements fall within the jurisdiction of its department of education or department of labour.

It is evident that the federal government cannot permit arrangements of this kind. Even in areas of provincial jurisdiction, relations outside Canada must be carried on under the umbrella of the federal government. It seems this question is coming to the fore once again: over the weekend it appears there has been a breakdown of the entente between Ottawa and Quebec with respect to this sphere of responsibility. I think the federal government will have to adopt a much tougher attitude in respect of intrusions by the provinces into this area of jurisdiction. Certain sanctions will have to be imposed.

The federal government will have to put its foot down if Quebec or any other province continues to intervene in external affairs. I would go so far as to say we should revoke the Canadian passports of individuals who blatantly disregard federal jurisdiction in this field. We should refuse visas to officials of foreign countries who wish to come to Canada under arrangements of which the federal government does not approve. If necessary, we should sever diplomatic relations with the countries concerned. In fact, it will probably not be necessary to do these things but we should let it be known that this is the type of sanction which the federal government has power to exercise. Let us make it clear that while we intend to respect provincial areas of jurisdiction, we do not intend to allow them to intrude into federal fields; we shall try to negotiate these matters with the provinces, but if they insist on intruding into federal fields of jurisdiction, sanctions will be brought to bear.

There are other items I should like to discuss, one of which was referred to by a speaker from the New Democratic Party. He mentioned the frustration expressed by the Premier of Manitoba at the close of the last federal-provincial conference. The premier stated in an interview that Quebec had a special set of problems which called for special arrangements. When asked whether it needed a special status, Premier Schreyer replied, "Those are not my words. I said 'special arrangements' ". Well, some have stated there have always been special arrangements for Quebec and for other provinces, too. That is true, Mr. Speaker, but these special arrangements have not been in the area of legislative powers.

In Quebec we have the Civil Code; we have special arrangements with respect to French education and English education. There has always been the right of using the two languages in the legislature. There have been other special arrangements which apply to the province of Quebec, but there have been no special legislative powers which Quebec has and which, for other provinces, belong to the federal government.

It is all right to suggest special arrangements, but I do not think we can expect that one province will have the power to legislate in certain areas that, for other provinces, come under the jurisdiction of the federal government. If we do that, as has been suggested many times by the Prime Minister we may end up with a situation where a great many members of this House will not have the same power as other members who sit here. Special arrangements, yes—and let us be specific about those special arrangements—but special powers, no.

There has been quite a bit of discussion with respect to the proposed charter of human rights, and as an English-speaking person from the province of Quebec I see a great need for this particular item, especially because of what happened in St. Leonard and what might happen in other parts of Quebec. I think we must be certain that our civil liberties are protected in a way which cannot be derogated from or taken away by the federal government, provincial governments, municipal governments or school boards. I believe that they should be protected in the constitution through a Bill of Rights or in some other way which would require special legislative power to effect their change.

I do not accept the argument of those who say these rights are protected by the courts. They have not been protected by the courts. If we had such a charter of civil liberties, the people of St. Leonard would not have had their right to education or language taken away from them, and many years ago the people of Manitoba might not have had their right to education in French taken away from them.

With respect to the proposals relating to a special or revised Supreme Court of Canada, I believe it is extremely important that we have one section of the Supreme Court to deal with civil law cases coming from the province of Quebec, and that civil law cases are not decided by judges trained in the common law. Having practised in that area of law for many years, I can understand how a court dominated by common law judges can often twist the civil law or put an interpretation on it which a civil law judge would not.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, there is one area that has not been discussed and which we must consider for constitutional change, and that is the House of Commons itself. Last year we made a lot of changes with respect to rules of the House, but in my view there are many other problems which will have to be dealt with in a constitutional way.

We talk about whether this Parliament and the House of Commons are really relevant to the demands of the day. In many ways I do not think the House is relevant to those demands. I think the only way we can make it relevant is to change its constitutionality. Mr. Speaker, some of these suggestions have already been put forward. I do not think they suggest we are going to the republican system, but they borrow some things from that system. For example, I feel we should have a set period for a Parliament, a four-year period or a five-year period. The government would continue in office during that period whether or not its legislation was defeated.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am afraid his time has expired.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in 20 minutes there is not too much that can be said about the constitution but I would make some statements which may be of some use at this time. Following the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand), I have just one or two comments to make about his speech. He said something about changing the House of Commons constitutionally. I, of course, would point out that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is trying to change it constitutionally.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: He is doing his best to sterilize it at the present time. The hon. member also said something about concurrent powers, and he particularly mentioned agriculture. As I look opposite and see the amiable and distinguished Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), I think that while he is operating only under concurrent powers he has made such a mess of trying to do things for the people of western Canada that he could not do any worse even if he had full power. Therefore, I do not see that concurrent power would really be of any assistance.

I am very interested in this motion, Mr. Speaker, because about five years ago I put on the Order Paper a private member's notice of motion along very much the same lines. I went a little further with mine. I think that one or two years later the motion was put on behalf of this party. I was fortunate in the draw, and we had quite an interesting debate on this issue. This was in 1965 or 1966.

I proposed the establishment of a committee of this kind because I believed then, as I more strongly believe now, that only through a mechanism of this kind can we bring before the people of Canada, in a simplified way, the extremely important issues which are involved.

I was rather amused by the Prime Minister, who said everything had been very carefully planned. The right hon. gentleman indicated that all the steps were taken one by one, all according to a deep-laid plan, and that everything was coming out just as he had anticipated. I cannot accept that for a moment.

The Prime Minister was engaging in playing a nice little game. He had his constitutional experts locked up in one little room and his economic experts locked up in another little room, and he was running from one room to the other having a great time. Suddenly the Prime Minister of Ontario called the Conference for Tomorrow, and from then on the federal government and the Prime Minister were kicked into this issue and were compelled to take steps which I do not think they had the slightest intention of taking. I do not think there was the careful preparation to which the right hon. gentleman referred. I think that is so much hogwash, Mr. Speaker—certainly the results would so indicate.

With respect to the terms of reference, this is a rather peculiarly worded motion. I hope that once the committee is functioning there will be no attempt to prevent its canvassing fully all the problems and all the suggested alternatives of our constitutional difficulties. I will take one minute to enlarge on this theme.

I have read the motion. It refers to the conference of February, 1968. At that time, Mr. Speaker, there was a series of subjects laid out for the continuing consideration of the constitutional conference. These subjects covered the waterfront. From that time until now this government has put forward a number of proposals, some of which I agree with and some of which I do not, dealing in one way or another with all the questions which were first outlined in the agenda and in the report made in February, 1968.

I would take it from that—and I did not understand the right hon. gentleman to indicate anything to the contrary—that when the committee is given jurisdiction in this matter after the motion has been passed, there will be no attempt to inhibit the committee from the fullest and most complete discussions.

I have said something about the various conferences which have taken place. There is no question about it—my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) has made this quite plain—that there has been a complete failure so far as the conferences are concerned. I think this was almost inevitable because of the way in which they were developed. All we have had is a confrontation among adversaries, among 11 governments all seeking to hold the power they have within their respective establishments, and if possible to add to that power. I do not fault them on that score; I think it is perfectly natural and what one might expect of the type of conference and discussion that has taken place. But this is not good enough. We shall not get anywhere if we continue this type of meeting.

Conferences must be held, of course, to capitalize on and consolidate the gains which are made in other ways. However, to the extent to which we hoped in the past that a series of constitutional conferences of heads of government would produce workable changes and reforms in our constitution, we might just as well realize that this will never take place in that way.

Mr. Olson: What do you suggest?

Mr. Baldwin: If the minister will wait a while, he will hear some excellent suggestions, although on the basis of our experience with agriculture I do not know that he will listen to them.

Mr. Speaker, I want to conclude my remarks before my time expires. I should like to see this committee take a view that is as non-controversial and objective as possible. I do not expect that politics will not be involved. Of course they will, and that is to be expected, but I hope the hon. members who comprise that committee will approach the subject matter in a frame of mind which will be more conducive to light than to heat.

I should like to see the committee composed of members of this House and members of the other place who will travel from place to place in Canada. I do not expect we will have a repetition of the famous confederation parade which took place in 1964 and 1965, but I think we can absorb something from that. After all, this is not a means by which we are going to settle conflicts between governments immediately.

The more than 21 million people in Canada are now engaged in the process of looking at the world they live in and should be coming to a decision on how they want to rearrange the powers of government at the various levels. In the first place, it must be abundantly clear that these are simple issues. The constitution as discussed by lawyers may become quite complex, quite difficult and very learned; but there are a number of simple issues which must be put to the people of Canada.

Do they desire, for example, to continue the same kinds of government in the questions involving transportation, education, trade and commerce, and so on and the new problems that have arrived on the scene regarding pollution, our cost of living and inflation? I suggest these problems will continue to be with us for many years. We must consider the problems of our Indian people. They are demanding rights which have been taken away from them. We also have problems in respect of the urban situation. As one hon. member said, 70 per cent of the people of Canada living in urban areas are seeking houses, solutions to the problem of juvenile delinquency, urban reclamation, and so on.

These are problems which have emerged. The people of Canada want to know where the jurisdiction lies and what is to be done about them. I think it is as simple as that. I hope this committee will be able to reduce these problems to simple terms. I suggest to the news media, the press, television and radio people that this will provide a magnificent opportunity for them. We will shortly be dealing with the whole issue of television and radio coverage in this chamber, in committees of the House and places in this building where the electronics media may have access to members for clarification. I hope they will be allowed to play a very important and significant role in reducing these problems to the most simple terms possible for placing before the people.

The committee will be the master of its own destiny. It will indicate what procedures it wishes to follow. I suggest that the committee give serious thought to not only permitting but encouraging radio and television production of its proceedings, so there will be available to the people of Canada an explanation of what is going on and what are the issues. In that way we will do what I think is essential. We will fulfil a condition precedent to the settling of these problems by letting the people "in" on a great national debate. In this way all the people of Canada who are interested will be able to see what issues are at stake and express their points of view. I think only in that way will we arrive at solutions.

Whether the people live in Quebec, Ontario, Peace River, Vancouver or Victoria, they are all Canadians. When the people see what is involved and how these issues have been reduced to simple terms, they will in due course exert pressure on the respective governments to bring about answers to problems. Not too much time will elapse before that situation comes about. They will not seek the answers of the Government of Canada or the answers of the governments of Saskatchewan, Newfoundland or Quebec; they will seek the answers that they want. I suggest to the members of the committee that will be formed that this is one way in which these questions can be brought home, simply and easily, to the people of Canada in order that they may have a chance to participate. This chance has been denied them up to the present.

Let me take just a minute to deal with some of these questions. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) quite properly chastised the Prime Minister because, as he said, he was hung up on the constitution and many of the problems I have mentioned. The federal government has ample authority under the constitution to deal adequately with the serious problem of pollution. What will happen if we accept the government's position on this question? We may wait two or three years before the government comes to a conclusion, if it ever does, as to what authority it has. Only then will we consider legislation. Consider at the weak, pitiful water bill we have been debating: even the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene), with his usual eloquence, was hard put to it to promote a suitable defence to the criticisms from this side of the House.

The government has jurisdiction under the Navigable Waters Protection Act which prohibits the pollution of water. It has jurisdiction under the Fisheries Act, which contains similar provisions, the Shipping Act and the Migratory Birds Convention Act. These four pieces of legislation, enacted by the federal Parliament, contain definite and categorical sanctions against the pollution of water. We are compelled to put up with this monstrosity conceived by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and his colleagues.

The same thing applies to urban matters. There was a Supreme Court decision not long ago to the effect that rapid transit arrangements in large metropolitan areas are the subject of federal jurisdiction. This is true in respect of housing, and so on. For years the federal government has been involved, with no suggestion that it has been usurping a jurisdiction which belongs to the provinces. It has been involved in these programs. There are such problems as juvenile delinquency, urban renewal and other measures related to the cities. The federal government has a very substantial measure of jurisdiction today. I am not suggesting, in breach of certain obvious rights which exist in the provincial governments, that this federal government or any federal government should rush in hamhanded and deal without consultation and co-operation with these questions. However, there is jurisdiction which can be exercised. I suggest that the right hon. gentleman, the Minister of Agriculture and their colleagues have been using the constitution as a smokescreen. They have been afraid.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: There are a number of areas in which the federal government has jurisdiction to act and in which it could have acted. I do not suggest it should do so without adequate consultation. At the same time, this does not mean there are not a great many areas in which the provincial governments must not only retain but to some extent change or even increase their jurisdiction.

A federal entity comes about because by reason of geography, economy, culture, race, and so on. There are natural divisions which should retain their particular identity. There is nothing wrong with that. I think all people who speak about Canada say it is a great country because it is unique in its diversity. Why should there not be diversification in so far as the provinces are concerned? British Columbia, sheltered behind the Rocky Mountains, is quite different from Alberta. Alberta and Saskatchewan, both carved out of the same rib at the same time, went different ways after a period in which their history was approximately the same. One had a government under the premiership of my hon. friend from Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) and the other had a Social Credit government. Both were as different, ideologically, as can be, but were created at the same time.

That there should be diversity is a fact. Some of us who have been involved in municipal government know that under a common municipal act there may be 20 municipalities, each operating under the same legislation but which because of the people involved and because of certain divergent and distinctive characteristics are different kinds of municipalities. I think I would be going contrary to the views of the political party to which I have the honour to belong if I did not say I believe in diversity individually and with regard to provincial governments, and that there should be every opportunity to continue to develop the peculiar distinctions between the different provinces of this country.

I see my time is running out, and there is so much more I should like to say. However, there is one other important item with which I shall deal. The federal government now has an opportunity to seek some redress in these constitutional problems. The Supreme Court has handed down decisions which would seem to take away some of the jurisdiction which might have belonged to provincial governments or the federal government from time to time. It may well be, in light of existing conditions, that these decisions should be different.

A recent case in the Supreme Court of Canada, Regina v. Binus, laid down, not as obiter dicta but as part of the judgment, that the principle of stare decisis did not apply. In other words, the Supreme Court of Canada can hand down a decision in constitutional cases different from that which it has handed down in the past. Over the last six or eight years it seems to me the federal government should have been reviewing some of these constitutional cases in collaboration with the provinces. Constitutional history has set governments on paths different from those intended by the Fathers of Confederation.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are growing impatient so I shall await another opportunity to make the few more comments I wanted to make.

Mr. D. Gordon Blair (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think one of the most striking features that emerges in any debate on our constitution is the difference between what the constitution actually is in practice and what the people of this country believe it should provide for and what it should be. When I look over a range of national problems, I see the vast divergence between the constitution as it is and what the ordinary person in this country thinks it should be.

At this time of inflation, the average Canadian thinks the federal government should have power, if it wishes to exercise it, to control rents, prices and the cost of living. We know it does not have that power. The average Canadian thinks the federal government should have greater involvement in housing and in the control of policies concerning urban planning, major labour disputes and agricultural prices.

The average Canadian increasingly in this day and age believes the federal government should have a good deal more to say about foreign intrusion into our economy. Although I do not like to disturb any sacred cows, the average Canadian of my acquaintance also believes there is and should be some federal responsibility in the field of education. I am sure I am not the only person who has constituents who moved across the length and breadth of Canada and found, each time they moved, that their children lose time in school and some became discouraged to the point that they dropped out of school altogether.

One of the serious problems we face in this country—it is not a technical or legal problem but a serious, practical one—is the difference between what our constitution in fact is and what the ordinary person thinks it should be and wishes it were. The average person is confused by the lack of connection between his idea of who should govern the country and what actually happens. He wonders why the governments of this country are paralyzed in respect of major decisions.

The average person says, and with truth, that the present system lends itself to buck-passing, to the ducking of responsibility and to a patent inability to deal quickly with major problems. I say to all of us in this honourable House that these are things we cannot ignore. They are problems which exist and with which we must be prepared to deal. We cannot deal with them in the traditional way, whereby the provinces blame the federal government for what is wrong, or vice versa, and one party lists a great number of things it thinks another party should be doing or talking about.

When we say we have a constitutional problem, believe me we should mean it, because we have. We should be prepared, together in this Parliament and indeed with all our fellow legislators across the country, to bring about some kind of solution. The confusion about the meaning of our constitution would seem to be the best possible reason for the type of public inquiry which is now envisaged by this resolution. One thing this inquiry might do, as my hon. friend just suggested, is bring the issues out in the open. It will have an educational function.

I hope, however, no one is under the illusion that it is only the public which must be educated. It seems to me that the people who require education the most are those who represent us collectively in these dominion-provincial discussions of our constitution and other matters of joint concern. We have 11 governments, one federal and ten provincial, which meet to discuss a great variety of issues. I am sure I am not the only person who believes that perhaps they should listen more to the public and less to themselves in some of these discussions.

Who speaks for whom at these conferences? If, for example, the federal government and the province of Ontario were in conflict, which of the two would represent my constituents? Is it true that they would be represented in this conflict, if it existed, by the province of Ontario? Not always. Certainly the problem which has emerged is that the various governments, whose position is established by law, translate it into the belief that they speak for the people where any of their interests are concerned. I say that this is not so, and what we should attempt to do in the work of this committee first and foremost, is find out what the public really think about their constitution. Surely you can make them more interested by the use of television and by all the other modern means of communication.

I think that this committee would fail in its duty if it did not go out actively to try to find out what the public think. This cannot be done by the kind of formal presentation where one interest group or another comes before the committee in a small room. Why do we not use imaginatively and definitively the means which we now have at our disposal? Let us have polls taken and surveys conducted in an attempt to ascertain the attitude of the people about their constitution and about the authority which they feel should have the main and the leading role to play in the various matters of contention between the federal government and provincial governments.

The present discussions, as many speakers have indicated, have been going on now for a period of two years, and obviously they have not taken the course that some people thought they would. My friend, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), referred today to the fact that sometimes they are like public auctions. But he knows better than I do that these discussions have less of that quality than any previous discussions among the federal government and provincial governments.

I am sure that some provinces came to these discussions with the belief that all they had to do was to state their terms and more money and authority would be given to them. But for once we have an honest discussion of the problems of our constitution where something is asked for by the provinces and equally something is asked for by the federal government.

There is a great need in this country to expand the federal power in many important areas of our life. I think that what has been surprising in these constitutional discussions is that they have not been what my friend referred to as a sort of public auction of the tax rights or authority of the federal government. Rather, they have turned into an honest discussion of how we can functionally rearrange our constitution to make it a more fitting instrument in this twentieth century. The discussions have been far-ranging, from a proposal to entrench a Bill of Rights, to the recreation of the Supreme Court, to treaties, and the old subject of the distribution of power between the federal government and provincial governments.

The reception that has been accorded the federal proposals is one which we should have expected. There have been a variety of responses. Some provinces like some proposals and dislike others; some political parties like some proposals and dislike others. Some people say, as has been said today, that there should be a really dramatic declaration by the federal government in these discussions, and they follow that by saying, "But we must not have a confrontation". We should not be afraid of a constitutional discussion and we should not be afraid of controversy that might develop at those constitutional discussions because they affect the future of all of us and of our country.

I would like to make one or two specific comments about the work of this committee. The first comment is one which at least the members of my profession in this House will understand. It is that it is completely beyond the range of possibility to develop a perfect constitution. Even if tonight it were possible for us in this chamber to write down in black and white, indeed in letters of gold, a constitution which would solve all the problems of this country, we know that tomorrow something would crop up somewhere which would make that constitution out of date.

The codifiers, from Justinian to Napoleon, have found out to their sorrow that one cannot legislate perfection in the law or in constitutions. Therefore, we must recognize that any constitution worthy of its name must be one which is capable of sound application by the various levels of government and of sound interpretation by the courts.

I would like to speak for a few minutes about the application of the constitution. If I may adopt a colloquialism I would say, "Don't knock the BNA Act," because it has survived 100 pretty strenuous years. Notwithstanding all the difficulties which may have arisen in applying it, the collective good sense of the Canadian people has always prevailed in difficult situations. We have emerged from the little, rural type of country which we were 100 years ago into a great, burgeoning industrial nation—and we have the same written constitution as we had then. Any constitution, whether it was written in 1867 or is written today, must be one that can be applied in the same way to developing circumstances and to new conditions.

One of the great things that has happened in recent years has been the systemization of federal-provincial relations. The criticism which has been levelled at all these federal-provincial meetings, which have been so important in the recent history of our country, is that they were held in secret. That criticism can be met, or at least blunted, by the appointment of this type of committee which will throw this process open to the public view and which, I hope, will encourage all the participating governments to express their opinions openly.

In speaking about the application of our constitution to the problems of our day, I am bold enough to make one suggestion: what one might call the major, sweeping problems facing this country can never be made the subject of the sole jurisdiction of either the provinces or the federal government. At the present time, as I have said, matters such as housing, welfare, pollution, economic growth and the like are primarily subjects under provincial jurisdiction, but really they are under the joint jurisdiction of the federal government and provincial governments.

No matter how the constitution might be rewritten, it is my opinion that major problems of this kind will continue to be jointly under federal and provincial jurisdiction. Therefore, we must be prepared to carry on, as we have in the last few years, in a joint approach of the federal government and provincial governments toward the application of our constitution to the major problems of Canada.

My hon. friend from Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), at the conclusion of his remarks spoke about the interpretation of the constitution and about the new doctrine expounded by the Supreme Court of Canada, that it is not bound by its previous decisions in every instance. In my opinion we have not used our constitution in the same dynamic, testing sense as the Americans. I think that a modern federal constitution requires to be tested in the fire; it requires to be continually used, to be expounded and used as a probe to determine where and by whom jurisdiction in new areas can be exercised. We have not done this, neither the provinces nor the federal government, to anything like the extent of the United States.

I think that in the future, no matter what has been done with the constitution, we will find it necessary to subject it more frequently to judicial interpretation. This will emphasize the role of the Supreme Court of Canada. To me this also signifies that one of the most important areas for consideration in amending the constitution is the proposal which has been made for the reconstitution of the Supreme Court on lines which will make it more acceptable to the provinces of Canada.

Mr. Horner: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question, Mr. Speaker. We are arriving at a decade which suggests that the individual should be more important than all other things which may concern his administration. The hon. member is suggesting that the whole administration of the individual should lie within the realm of the Supreme Court of Canada. I ask for clarification on that point. Is he really suggesting that the jurisdiction of the freedom of the individual should rest solely with the Supreme Court of Canada, rather than under Parliament and the freedoms which Parliament should grant in a democracy?

Mr. Blair: Mr. Speaker, I accept the hon. gentleman's statement that that is a question. I was speaking about the interpretation of the constitution in terms of assessing the distribution of power as between the federal government and provincial governments. I was not addressing my remarks to the other, equally important question of the protection of human rights. I have not time to deal with that matter but I can say, very briefly, that it is important and long overdue that we entrench a Bill of Rights in our constitution. I think, following the example of our neighbours to the south, that we can have every confidence that this would enhance the freedom of Canadians and more particularly is it important in an era wherein there is increasing government intervention in every aspect of the life of the community.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I should like to express some views on specifics which I think are important in dealing with the constitution. Repeating what I said at the beginning, I am concerned that in our country people expect the federal government to play a leading role, most particularly in the development of the Canada economy. I think it is quite apparent at the present time that because of our constitutional arrangements, the federal government cannot play the role it should in the development of Canada and the Canadian economy. It is true that it has wide powers—taxing power, spending power, control over currency, banking and international trade, control over transport and communications—but it is not able to exercise powers in important areas affecting the life of the citizen. It has limited powers in terms of national planning. It has, as we know, limited powers in housing, control of economic growth and to exercise, when need be, firm economic controls on inflation. As I said earlier, if there is any meaning to the questions raised about foreign intrusion into our economy, the federal government has very little power to deal with this problem. It is hampered in its approach to harmful business practices—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am afraid his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member be granted leave to continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Blair: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I merely wish to add that the federal government is hampered in its control of harmful business practices, as was pointed out in the recent report of the Economic Council.

In conclusion, may I say that the appointment of this committee is an important development in our growing knowledge of our constitution and the problems it creates. I hope the committee will become a positive force in indicating to not only the members of this House but to all people the scope we have to make our country operate successfully under the present constitution by agreement, by novel interpretation, by experimentation and by amendment.

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, if there is a general feeling that our constitution should be examined with a view to changing it, I believe that the proper first step is to have this examination carried out by a committee of Parliament. But I remain convinced, as I was when this matter was before the House last February, that there is no urgency about this matter. Certainly it should not be given precedence in Parliament over much more pressing national problems.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair) covered the waterfront in his remarks when he said that the federal government should be strengthened and the provincial governments should be strengthened. I just worry about what the citizens of this country will do.

I agree that the hon. member is correct in his assessment of the constitution, because I am also convinced that the constitution as it stands today, 103 years after its coming into effect, is quite adequate to meet the demands made upon it, no matter how complex and difficult our public affairs become. It has proved to be flexible and adaptable to a very wide range of national crises from world wars to worldwide depression.

As long as Canadian leaders and statesmen have utilized our constitution in good faith, it has proved more than adequate. Unfortunately, in recent years we have had clear evidence that even such a basically sound document as the British North America Act is not proof against the manipulation of an unscrupulous Prime Minister. Its strength lies in its use, its weakness in the fact that it can be bypassed. In my view it lacks the vital provisions that would curb the assumption of unlimited and irresponsible power by the executive.

If we are to amend our constitution, the first and most urgent change we should make is to write into the constitution curbs on the taxing and spending powers of the federal government and the ability of the Prime Minister to ignore Parliament and the constitution. The record of the government immediately past, and of the present one, is appalling in respect of trampling on the constitution, slighting the rights of the provinces and concentrating power in the hands of the central government at Ottawa an ever larger share of total spending and total government taxation.

Taxation in this country has risen steeply until today it has reached the dangerous pinnacle of more than one-third of the gross national product. This is beyond the point which economists and historians claim it is safe for any society to go without running the risk of complete economic and social decay. We should provide a constitutional check to ensure that all governments stay within a fair and proportionate share of the national economy.

Whatever political theorists may say, or whatever political opportunists may claim, we are still a federal state, not a unitary state and not a state with a very strong centre and very weak parts. In Canada it should never be a question of a central government that is stronger or weaker than the provincial governments, or vice versa. Our constitutional problem should only be to preserve a fair balance between the two types of government. Our constitutional basis provides, and for very good and proven reasons, for certain matters to be handled by a central government and certain others to be administered by regional or provincial governments.

The essential thing is to ensure that each type of government is guaranteed the freedom and the financial muscle to discharge its constitutional responsibilities. I am one of those who is hopeful that the proposed committee will be able to make the existing constitution work without change or, at least, with the minimum of change.

I have mentioned that recent governments have abused our constitution and that Prime ministers, in particular the present one, have assumed extraordinary powers. To me, one of the most obvious and damaging examples of this abuse of the constitution is in the deliberate exclusion by a variety of means of the monarchy from our processes of government. Let me emphasize strongly that when I speak of the monarchy I speak of it only as an institution, a constitutional device that happens also to be the core of our particular system of parliamentary democracy.

I believe it is wrong and would merely be misleading to argue, as many do, for or against the monarchy on grounds of sentimental attachment or emotion. It is not the person of the monarch we must be concerned about, but the institution of the monarchy. The only question to be asked about the monarchy is this: Is it a sound and useful piece of political and constitutional machinery; is it effective in governing a modern state democratically and in freedom; and is it as good as, or better than, other expedients available?

The fact is that our system of government is laid down in our written constitution. The British North America Act, in section 17, under part IV entitled "Legislative Power," says:

> There shall be One Parliament for Canada consisting of the Queen, an Upper House styled the Senate, and the House of Commons.

So, whether we like it or not, the sovereign is constitutionally an integral part of our government. To slight or ignore the sovereign, as successive Liberal governments have done in recent years, affects the sovereign but little; it merely demeans and weakens our system of government and the nation. I am convinced that the oblique attacks on the monarchy in this country have less to do with political and constitutional requirements of a modern state than with anti-British sentiments and emotional resentment of pomp and ceremony. If I am correct in that, I think this is an even weaker and more dangerous argument than is sentimental attachment to the royal family.

If you take the trouble to read the story of the birth and early times of confederation, I am sure you will discover, Mr. Speaker, that there were very few colonists in North America of that day who held any sentimental attachment to Great Britain or any love for things or people English. The colonies of those days, the colonies that banded together to form Canada, were settled by many people who had little cause to love England. There were Scottish immigrants driven from their ancestral homes by English influence. There were communities of people who had fled England for religious freedom. There were those of French descent only recently losers in a war against England.

Even the United Empire Loyalists, who had come to the British North American colonies to get away from the new republicanism to the south, had done so more because they preferred British-style government and British institutions than because they loved England. One has only to read of the Loyalists who went to England, instead of what is now Canada, to realize the bitter feeling between the two groups.

[Mr. Schumacher.]

Also, we should never forget that one of the chief movers and front-line fighters against the British government in the Lower Canadian rebellion of 1837 was not a French Canadian but a direct descendant of United Empire Loyalists, Dr. Wolfred Nelson.

The facts of the matter are that it was not ties with England and sentimental attachment to that country that prompted our ancestors to opt for the monarchical system of parliamentary democracy. It was shrewd and unemotional assessment that British methods and institutions of democratic government were preferable to the available alternatives.

Recent history has borne out this contention, I believe. In Britain's former colonies, some of which have detached themselves completely from the mother country while others have maintained varying kinds of loose association, British forms of government and British institutions have been retained and cherished. It is significant that India, a country that apparently had little cause to indulge in any sentimental tie with Britain, retained a British form of parliamentary democracy and a judicial and other governmental systems identical to those introduced in the days of British rule.

It is true that India abolished the office of Governor-General and recognizes the sovereign only as the head of the Commonwealth, but she retained the substance of British parliamentary, democratic government. The only real change was to substitute a president as head of state rather than the British reigning monarch. In my view this is no advantage. A president must be chosen. This means the office immediately becomes a political one, no matter how restricted the powers of the president may be. This, to my mind, destroys one of the chief advantages of hereditary monarchy, namely, that it provides a truly non-political figure at the head of government.

I happen to believe we should retain the system of government that incorporates a hereditary and non-political monarch. I do so, however, on grounds of constitutional effectiveness, not because I am misty-eyed about royalty. I also believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is essential today that the question of retaining or abandoning the monarchy be brought out in the open and debated dispassionately on grounds of its worth as an institution and its entrenched position as an essential part of our system of government. I think it is damaging to our social and political stability to stand by and watch a few determined anti-monarchists destroy the effectiveness of the institution by ridicule, innuendo and unconstitutional trickery. I think it particularly damaging because I believe this is being done strictly on grounds of anti-British sentiment and for political expediency.

It is my hope that this point will be one of the principal ones discussed by the committee that is proposed. As for curbing the first minister's appetite for dictatorial powers, I believe this, too, must be given priority before Parliament is relegated to the role of a constitutional museum and this country sinks into authoritarian socialism. It would be amusing, if it were not so tragic, to hear people crying for a greater degree of centralized governmental power when this trend runs so directly opposite to the political slogan of this government, "Participatory democracy". The more power is centralized in Ottawa, the further government is removed from the people. This is not peculiar to the federal scene. It occurs at all levels, including provincial and municipal. But it is a fact of modern life that our young people have recognized and against which they are protesting.

We believe that if democracy is to mean anything, everyone must have the opportunity to be heard and to sway government policy to the best of his or her ability. Canada is a union of regions and cannot be remolded at this stage of development into a unitary state. If the pressure for centralized power persists, it will shatter confederation and fragment its parts beyond reuniting. The Fathers of Confederation knew this well. They recognized this basic fact and wrote the constitution accordingly. All that is needed today is some of their practical common sense and a genuine desire to make our constitution work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Schumacher: Decentralization, not more centralization, is the only apparent way of adequately protecting regions and minorities in this country and of giving these regions a fair and reasonable voice in their own and national affairs. It is the only manner in which Canadians can be given the chance of close participation in their own affairs.

We have heard a great deal about the concept of the "global village" and that Canada is shrinking in on itself because of great advances in the technology of transportation and communication. The truth is that it is not a homogeneous whole and probably never will be. As for technological advances, if they are so dramatic, how is it that it takes a simple letter ten days to be delivered to Alberta from Ottawa?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Schumacher: The hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) has advised me that it took 16 days for a first-class parcel post package with $5 postage to be delivered from Toronto to Moncton.

My idea of Canada is a national government politically, constitutionally and financially, strong enough to discharge its constitutional responsibilities and, when necessary, to assist in keeping the various regions in economic balance—and no more. With this concept I see regional governments equally strongly situated to discharge their regional responsibilities. I say regional rather than provincial because it may well be that amalgamation of one or more provinces will eventually make better economic sense in this country.

If total government spending were limited to a percentage of the gross national product, all governments would then have to work for policies which would increase the size of the pie for all if they were desirous of increasing their spending, instead of the present situation where all they do is increase their slice of the pie at the expense of the citizen. To achieve this balance of power and strength between governments, I believe it has now become necessary to bolster it with constitutional provisions that would effectively prevent encroachment of the federal government on the regional governments.

One of the great areas of federal excess has been not only its own profligate spending but the pressure exerted on provinces to spend. This has been apparent in many so-called "national" programs, such as medicare where a combination of federal manipulation and political blackmail forced many provinces to commit themselves over their financial head.

I believe that one of our great troubles today is that those who enjoy power do not understand our constitutional heritage. They in fact appear to despise it and would change it, without any reference to the Canadian people, by subtle and unconstitutional means. Having no regard for the constitution, it has been easy for them to find ways around it.

This fact alone has caused me to change my mind to a certain extent and to now believe that some constitutional safeguards for the constitution itself should be incorporated. We must aim at making it impossible for anyone to bypass the constitution and Parliament. If we do not, Canadians will find themselves in the classic position that bred the United States revolution and the twin "taxation without representation". Our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) may yet enter the history books as the twentieth century's George III, a slimmer Gallic version of Lord North.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, I welcome the establishment of a parliamentary committee as a means of adding another dimension to the discussion surrounding our constitution, because in the discussions so far it is apparent to me that some of the provinces for one reason or another are not standing up for their rights as they should be.

I hope the committee will be useful in persuading the government that what is needed in this country is decentralization, that the provinces should be allowed to discharge their responsibilities in respect of education, health services including the ever-expanding problem of mental health and urban transit, and that it is no longer acceptable for the federal government to treat them like beggars.

What I have suggested, Mr. Speaker, really amounts to ways and means of ensuring adherence to our present constitution and to the necessary minimum required to keep Canada together by giving our people a continued feeling of confidence in our nation, a feeling which I think we all believe is beginning to be questioned in many areas of the land.

Mr. Alastair Gillespie (Etobicoke): Mr. Speaker, in rising to contribute to this debate tonight, I do so as a non-expert. I make no apologies for not being a lawyer. I speak as a former businessman and I think I speak for concerned citizens through the land.

I feel the big debate in the next ten years will be on how we at the centre of power will use power or find the power to deal with such questions as pollution, foreign ownership and regulating our economy. Today's citizen is very much aware of the fact that the world as he knows it may not exist in 50 years time because of man's capacity to destroy it through his industrialization. He is aware of the fact that the automobile, through the discharge of exhaust fumes, may in the next 20 years raise the carbon dioxide content of the air to such a level that the temperature of the earth will rise by ten degrees and in so doing the ocean levels will rise six feet or more. Once this happens, it becomes an irreversible process. I suggest to hon. members this is something of considerable and enduring concern to the citizens of Canada.

The Canadian citizen is concerned about foreign ownership and the fact that if we do not find some way to deal with this question we may have no country and no identity by the end of the century. He is concerned about what he thinks are King Canute methods of dealing with the question of inflation. He does not understand that the call for voluntary restraint is no more than a call to those who are most sensitive, to those who are most responsible and an opportunity for those who are less responsible.

He is not convinced that by asking people to show restraint the tide of inflation will somehow abate. He is concerned that the federal government does not have the power, or so it seems to him. Why else would we be speaking purely in terms of voluntary restraints? Why, for example, does not the federal government have the power to deal with consumer credit? Why does it not have the power to deal with wage, price and dividend restraint? Why does the approach have to be by way of voluntary restraint?

As a member of this House I am impressed, as I know others are impressed, by the initiatives shown by the federal government with respect to the need for constitutional change. Since this government took office there has been a substantial dialogue. As the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) mentioned this evening, seven papers have been published dealing with constitutional matters. The last conference, held not very long ago, was attended by certain municipal representatives. This is the first time for a long time that a municipal representative has been included as a member of a delegation; on other occasions municipal representatives have been included as observers. I, for one, hope that future constitutional conferences will see municipal representatives included as members of provincial delegations. In this way, it seems to me, the cities can be included in the dialogue between the provincial governments and the federal government concerning this important area of constitutional change.

Citizens, as we all know, will come to us and say, "I really do not understand the problem. Governments are to serve the interests of the people, and you people argue that you do not have the power; the provincial governments have the power. I go to my provincial member, and he says, 'This is not a question for me; it is a question for your federal member.'" We have all run into this kind of difficulty. We have all been told we are overgoverned and overtaxed. I think the citizen today has begun to wonder increasingly about the nature of the distribution of powers. He is asking the question more and more, "Does the federal government lack the power?" If it lacks the power, let it say so as representative of all Canadians; and let us remind ourselves that we are the only institution in Canada which is representative of all Canadians.

As I say, I do not bring to this debate the knowledge of a constitutional lawyer or of an expert, but there are certain areas to which I should like to draw attention. It seems to me that one of the first principles when solving any problem is to find out whose responsibility it is and then to ensure that there is commensurable authority to go with it. At least, this is the way business deals with problems.

It seems to me that what we lack today is power at the centre. A few moments ago, the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher) said what we needed in our constitutional arrangements was greater decentralization. I believe the application of power should be decentralized, but I do not think this is inconsistent with there being greater power at the centre, particularly when dealing with economic matters. As the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair) said a short while ago, this is an area wherein we lack substantial power.

Looking at the motion which has been presented to us, I am happy to see that the committee is to be given the power to call witnesses. I am concerned, however, that it does not appear to have the power to hire staff. I hope this is nothing more than an oversight and that the committee will be given power to hire staff. In this connection, I hope, too, that more assistance will be forthcoming to the caucuses. I speak as a member of the Liberal caucus who would much appreciate the kind of assistance which is available to many hon. members opposite in terms of research staff. If the committee system is to work effectively, we must supply committees with the necessary staff.

I hope this special committee will call for a projection of the spending intentions of the provincial governments and the federal government collectively over the next five years and then ask, of qualified witnesses, just what revenue would be forthcoming to the provinces and to the federal government if there were no changes in existing levels of taxation at either the federal or provincial levels.

Let us get this information and place it before the public and members of the House of Commons. Unless we possess information of this kind, the whole question of spending and taxation powers becomes, in part, an academic exercise. If we are to consider the distribution of powers, we must have this information.

The committee should ask the question: Does the federal government possess the authority it needs today to deal with the various threats to our survival? For example, does it have authority to deal with pollution?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Gillespie: It has made a start in the Canada water bill. But what about air pollution? Has it all the authority it needs to deal with pollution from automobiles?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Gillespie: Has it the necessary authority to deal with industrial pollution? Let us make absolutely clear to all citizens of Canada where the responsibility lies.

Let us consider the field of foreign ownership. The British North America Act, if it was designed to protect the land mass against United States annexation, has been eminently successful. But if it was intended to protect the ownership of our natural resources, it has been a failure. The provincial governments, and particularly the provincial premiers, could not care less, it seems to me, about who owns our natural resources. I suggest that the federal government does not appear to possess the authority to regulate this essential aspect of our national affairs.

Third, with respect to regulating the economy, surely it is time we transferred power to the federal government to regulate consumer credit. Surely it is time we transferred standby powers with respect to the regulation of capital spending. Surely it is time we transferred the necessary power to deal with wages, prices and dividends in times of inflation. If we duck the opportunity presented by the conference coming up in two weeks time, we shall have done a great disservice to ourselves and to this nation. I trust the committee will direct itself to these questions.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, to my mind the Canadian Parliament is debating an extremely important matter. The official opposition has repeatedly requested, since 1965, the appointment of a parliamentary committee on the Canadian constitution. We did not do so to embarrass the government in power but because we were convinced that this was both urgent and necessary.

Four stands have been adopted to date in the face of the Canadian constitutional crisis.

The first, that of the status quo, does not meet the objectives of the provinces; this was quite obvious at the last constitutional conference at which time the provinces demanded immediate amendments. As we know, the powers are not well divided. There is duplication in the activities, and the present constitution does not meet the needs of our modern times.

The second, which is as extreme as the first and, obviously, just as unacceptable, advocates total decentralization of powers in favour of the provinces. This attitude was advocated especially by certain Quebec groups and would require the creation of associate states. Let us face the facts: this tenent is unacceptable because it would mean the end of Canada. In fact there would be two states, or more if other provinces took advantage of the right to decentralization.

The third, we also reject: it is that of the present government. It consists in the centralization of powers, and denies the provinces the possibility of playing a dynamic role within the Canadian confederation.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Finally there is the fourth, which I shall describe in a moment. It seems logical to us, members from Quebec, because it does not treat the provinces as agencies of the central government, but as useful, active and responsible members within the Canadian confederation. That principle has been advocated repeatedly, as well in Quebec as elsewhere. It strikes us as much more acceptable.

That is the way Quebecers now see the constitutional crisis, and how the majority of them feel it can be overcome.

It must be admitted from the start that Quebec is not just another province. This has been proclaimed for the past hundred years. Five-sixths of Canada's French-speaking population live in Quebec and that is what makes it different from the other provinces.

Other differences could also be mentioned, resulting from Quebec's geographic position, commanding the main route of communication toward the interior of the continent. It could also be said that Quebec is different because of its immense untapped reserves of natural resources. Merely taking into account that it is different because its population is primarily and predominantly French-speaking, it must be recognized that Quebec can enrich Canada, if it is to be different from its southern neighbour.

On many occasions, French-Canadiens have expressed dissatisfaction about their status within the Canadian confederation. In fact, one only has to read the report of the Tremblay Commission, the report of the Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, and the statements from all the Quebec premiers, Liberal or Union Nationale, at the constitutional conferences, and more especially since 1960, to become aware of the continuity in Quebec's demands.

This government has always claimed to be sympathetic to Quebec's requests, but so far, it has done nothing about them. It may say that it has passed an official languages bill, with our consent. Yet, everyone knows very well that both languages have been recognized and protected in Quebec for a long time, and that the government passed that bill, after several years of delay and hesitation, much more to favour French-speaking Canadians outside Quebec.

The government has therefore done nothing to allow Quebec to follow its cultural vocation. Quebecers are more and more conscious of the role they can play in Canadian life, or of the lack of it. Unless they are allowed to take an active part, it is to be feared that they might decide to leave Confederation.

Separatism is a dreadful threat. And that is something Quebec members have to live with every day. Even though we know that separatism could have harmful effects on both Canada and Quebec, it still remains a possibility.

To realize it, it is enough to consider how Quebecers are getting more and more indifferent to federal politics. At the last election, the percentage of the Quebec vote was the lowest in the country; 72 per cent, compared to 78 per cent in 1963.

The government should not either bow to Quebecers' claims just to cajole them, to keep them of its side; that would be hypocritical.

The requests of Quebec must therefore be given the importance they deserve, because we are convinced that Quebec has its place within the Canadian confederation and that its particular charasteristics can play a precious role. It is by acknowledging these characteristics of Quebec that Canadian unity will be achieved, on the basis of equality of the two founding nations, whatever word may be used to designate the two ethnic entities which exist in Canada. The main thing is to realize that Canada has two majority groups which are sociologically different. Contrary to what the Prime Minister said during the election campaign, it does not mean that there are two countries within a single state, because that is not what the people of Quebec want. Since they want to live in a single country, the majority of Canadians must also recognize the differences which may benefit confederation.

It is not enough to recognize that the province of Quebec is different; it must be recognized also that it is in a position to discharge a very large part of the responsibilities issuing from that difference. In the area of culture, we see that these last few years, the province of Quebec has increased its connections and its relations with the French-speaking world. Because its main group is of French culture, the province of Quebec must allow that group to live more intensely in French, and to add to its culture.

How can we expect five million French-speaking people, on a continent inhabited by 220 million English-speaking people, to be self-sufficient insofar as culture is concerned? To the extent that the human body needs fresh air, the French-speaking civilization needs sources on which to feed.

But whenever Quebec tried to improve its relations and enter into agreements with French-speaking countries, the federal government showed its displeasure and opposed any such move. Don't we French Canadians from Quebec have every reason to wonder why in the course of the last 60 or 70 years the federal government did not choose to strengthen its contacts with French-speaking countries in order to meet the cultural requirements of the Quebec people as well as those of other French-speaking Canadians?

There is no doubt that Quebec has greatly benefited and still benefits by these agreements with French-speaking nations. Let us mention for instance the numerous exchanges of teachers, students, technicians and experts as well as the increase of French investments in Quebec.

If Quebec benefits from such exchanges and agreements, the rest of Canada is in no way deprived. By increasing such exchanges with the French-speaking world, Quebec does not deprive anyone of anything. We should, rather, rejoice that Quebec benefits so greatly from them.

Besides, no objections were ever raised against Ontario having offices in different countries, in England for instance, because this could promote its culture and its interests. The federal government did not raise any objections either when Ontario instituted in its Department of Education a Cultural Exchanges Division and signed agreements, with France amongst others, for exchanges of students and professors.

However, Mr. Speaker, if Quebec dares take some steps in this direction, the central government first objects, to agree later on, as was the case for the conferences of the Education Ministers of French-speaking countries; on the other hand, if it does not agree to it, it intimidates the countries which would like to have relations with Quebec as was the case when diplomatic relations with Gabon were broken up.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, these are unpleasant facts to hear but the truth has to be spoken before our English-speaking Canadian friends, here in this sanctuary which is the House of Commons.

It is not just in the field of culture that Quebec needs to take steps in order to fulfill this characteristic. There is the field of social welfare, the field of immigration, the field of education which belongs to Quebec and to the provinces, but where the federal government continues to withhold the amounts Quebec would need for its administration, under the pretense that in its opinion, these amounts must be used for university education.

However, university education does not come under federal jurisdiction, at least in our opinion. The Quebec government is quite able to look after its education system properly and to decide what amounts of money must be allocated without any conditions being set by the central government especially in matters such as education or health which, under the constitution, come under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces.

Therefore, why deny Quebec the right to have specific needs, when the premiers of Ontario and Manitoba have stated, following the last constitutional conference, that they had no objection to Quebec having special arrangements within the Canadian Confederation, in order to meet all the needs of that majority of French Canadians who live now in this beautiful country that we call Canada?

Mr. Speaker, that is the question that we must put to the government. Why this obstinate refusal of the fact that Quebec is not a province like the others? It is only a question of thinking of a new constitution in which jurisdictions will be negotiated and Quebec could be a part of a federation by playing in it a dynamic role and by meeting its own particular requirements. The federal government must not only allow Quebec to play a role in meeting its particular needs, but they should also, if they want to keep Quebec within Confederation, do all they can to enable Quebec to achieve its aims.

Mr. Speaker, it is not a concession that must be granted to Quebec and Quebecers are not asking the central government for gifts when they speak in this way. I say that Quebec has a right to demand these realities which enable Canada to be a great country because it is a bicultural and bilingual one.

Mr. Speaker, we have reached a point where a clear and precise decision must be made. We must no longer expect that time will settle things well because it will not do that from now on, in Quebec. Indeed, Quebec has been patient. It put forth its point of view on many occasions. It will keep on doing it for some time but there are limits to its patience—I repeat, there are limits to its patience.

It should be made quite clear that when Quebec is asking for special arrangements, it does not mean to deprive anybody in any way. We hope the federal government will show good will and understanding. In order to help it arrive at a fair decision, the members of the Progressive Conservative party again suggest to establish a parliamentary committee on the constitution which, in my view, should enjoy very extensive terms of reference, enabling it to consider the reform of both the Senate and of the Supreme Court.

It should also be entrusted with the task of considering the establishment of a constitutional court where the differences between the provinces and the central government could be better settled than by the Supreme Court of Canada whose decisions, in the past, have often been challenged by the provinces.

Moreover, a parliamentary committee on the constitution should study the whole question of the monarchy and that of the establishment of a presidential system. Those are questions asked by the young people nowadays. I am not saying this in order to promote one system more than the other, but to bring forward the ideals of the young Canadians who call for a constitution, not only for the present but for the future of those who wish to keep on militating in the Canadian Confederation.

Mr. Speaker, I see you are getting ready to tell me that my time has expired but I will take only a few more minutes.

Since 1965 we have called for the establishment of this committee but in vain. We are happy today that the government put that question before the House. We are ready to do our share so that a sound dialogue may begin between all parts of the Canadian federation, so that a new constitution may soon be drafted, which will meet all the needs and ideals of all the Canadian people.

[English]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in 1964 Members of Parliament from the New Democratic Party proposed the establishment of a House of Commons committee to discuss and study the problems involved in amending or changing the constitution. At that time the proposal was rejected by the government and has consistently until today been rejected.

We endorse the idea of a committee to study the constitution and needed changes to it, because we recognize the tremendous difficulties which have occurred in this country since the constitution was written and adopted more than 100 years ago. One hundred years ago when the British North America Act was enacted, this country was essentially rural. Today, a substantial majority of the people of Canada live in the cities.

When the constitution was adopted, the federal government allocated to itself those powers and responsibilities which it considered important and left to the provinces those responsibilities which at that time it considered to be much less essential and important to the people. The judgement of the federal government at that time probably was correct, but the urbanization of this country has made a tremendous difference. Therefore, we now find that some of the most important functions in respect of the day-to-day life of the people of this country have been left, under the provisions of the constitution, to the provinces.

The provinces, in turn, over the years have given a great deal of that responsibility to the cities which are entirely creatures of the provincial governments. This government and its Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) have until now taken the position that our constitution is essentially a good constitution; that if we are in trouble it is because the federal government has not stuck to its jurisdiction and the responsibilities given it under the constitution and that the provinces, similarly, have not stuck to their responsibilities under the constitution.

The major field in which the Prime Minister feels the federal government must have responsibility, and the one thing which he has wanted to discuss with the provinces in respect of changes in the constitution, concerns the French-speaking people of Canada. The Prime Minister feels that regardless of where they live, they must be given equal rights with English-speaking Canadians in the use of their language in all parts of Canada.

We in our party have agreed with that part of the proposition put forward by the Prime Minister. We have done so even though many of our constituents have not understood what the Prime Minister was talking about and what we were trying to do. We have agreed with this because we feel it essential that if this country is to survive as one country, the French-speaking people must be given the feeling they are equal citizens. However, the people in English-speaking Canada and in French-speaking Canada need more than the right to use the English or French language in any part of Canada; they must start dealing with the many problems of modern-day life with which they have not had an opportunity to deal.

If there is criticism of the approach of this government and the Prime Minister in many parts of Canada—and there is—it is not based on partisan, political reasons. I should like to point out to members of this House what I am sure they already know. There is no harsher critic of the government and the Prime Minister in respect of the approach taken to the constitution than the Liberal Premier of the province of Saskatchewan. If I were to use some of the language he has used, I am certain the Chair would call me to order for using language which is unparliamentary.

We all know that the former minister of transport and deputy prime minister resigned from the cabinet because of his feeling that if we accepted the views of the Prime Minister about the constitution in respect of problems such as housing, it would be impossible to deal with the problems of the cities and find a solution to them.

I could spend more than the time I have in putting on the record the point of view of the Liberal member for York West (Mr. Givens), a former mayor of Toronto, who outside this chamber has spoken repeatedly about the failure of this government and its Prime Minister to face up to the responsibilities which a federal government must assume if it is to meet the problems of the cities. It is because of my feeling that this government is taking too narrow and too legalistic a position in respect of amending and changing the constitution that I rise today to speak in this debate.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

POST OFFICE—ASSIGNMENT OF NEW PRODUCTIVITY EXECUTIVE

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, prior to the Christmas recess I asked a question of the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans), the Minister of Communications or whatever the father of our new jet-age postal system now styles himself. It went without answer, and that it is the reason I am discussing it at this time, because it touches on the sad state to which a fundamental public service has degenerated. The question had to do with the announcement that the minister had appointed a senior productivity executive to his staff. As I understood the minister's announcement of this appointment, the prime duty of this extra official would be to combat inflation in the workings of the Post Office Department.

This struck me as a classic example of putting the cart before the horse. The minister had set the process of unrestrained inflation in motion long before hiring someone to control it. I am talking about the minister's great reform, the imposition of primitive and crippling new postal rates on the Canadian public. His stated reason was to enable the Post Office Department to operate like a healthy private business concern at a profit. He has not yet explained from whence he received his mandate to turn a vital public service into a private money-making proposition.

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Nesbitt: They ought to put him in the CBC.

Mr. Schumacher: What we need in his department is an official to bring back our fast and reliable postal service and to reduce excessively high postal rates, not a man to draw a very large salary for tilting at windmills.

Ever since 1840 when Sir Rowland Hill introduced the first cheap and effective public postal service in Great Britain, the Post Office and its work has been recognized as a basic public service for which the taxpayer was willing to pay something in support out of the public funds. It had two aims—to carry the mail as cheaply as possible and to be as reliable as possible. These have since been the aims of almost every civilized country in the operation of their postal services.

But this was P.K. I do not mean pre-Cambrian, but pre-Kierans. Now we have a new apostle and a new creed: To the devil with what people want and in support of which they are willing to pay taxes. We know better. We will make this service pay even if it means fewer mail deliveries, long delays, and much higher rates.

The minister worshipped too long at the shrine of private industry as president of the Montreal Stock Exchange, without learning anything. He is infatuated by profit for the sake of profit.

The questions I pose this evening are simply these: When will the Postmaster General stop destroying the identity of countless small localities by closing down post offices? When will he and his army of efficiency experts restore the reliability of our mail delivery system? When will he come to his senses and lower postal rates to make the postal service once more a public service and not a luxury? When will he stop trying to "snow" the public with science-fiction press releases, and get his department back on the track?

[Mr. Schumacher.]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) I must express his regret that for personal reasons he cannot be here this evening.

The purpose of re-examining the productivity of the Post Office is for the very reasons that the hon. member has stipulated, namely, to improve the productivity of the service is to bring the cost down—a simple economic fact. Any action which the Post Office takes to reduce over-all costs in any area of activity will naturally have an effect in rate-setting. The proposition seems to me to be as simple as that, and it seems to be the most direct answer to the hon. gentleman.

MANPOWER—ADULT RETRAINING AND EDUCATIONAL PROGRAMS—ALLEGED WASTING OF MONEY

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, on December 5 I brought to the attention of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen) the charges made in a report prepared for the Association of Colleges of Arts and Technology of Ontario that the manpower training program operated by the federal government was inefficient, wasteful, and was not doing the job of training people who are out of work, which it was set up to do. Manpower training began in 1961 under the former Conservative government as a joint program financed and administered both by the federal government and the provincial governments. In 1967 the manpower training program was taken out of the hands of the provincial governments. Schools coming under the jurisdiction of the provinces are used for the training of manpower, but the entire responsibility for the program now rests with the federal government.

Because the federal government has the sole responsibility, and because there has been a lamentable lack of co-operation with the provincial governments and the local schools in which the manpower training programs are conducted, the colleges to which I have referred made a report which deserves to be discussed and will be discussed in detail when the estimates of the department come before the appropriate parliamentary committee.

The report says that the manpower training programs have become not really training programs but primarily programs designed to put people to work as quickly as possible whether they have the training required for permanent work and whether the available jobs are suitable or not. The main responsibility undertaken by the department seems to be to put a person into a job, a slot, if that can be accomplished. It is only after the person repeatedly fails on a job that the department considers an adequate program of manpower training. The report charges that the bureaucracy and red-tape have multiplied to such an extent that the people who need the training, simply become discouraged and give up.

What are some of the problems? One is the decision that no manpower training program may last more than a year, 52 weeks. But a large percentage of our population, the Metis people in particular but also people from many of the rural areas of Eastern and Western Canada, have only grade six or grade seven education. They cannot fit into existing training programs and apprenticeship programs. The one year for which they are paid a training allowance sometimes brings them only to the grade eight, nine or 10 level of education. What they need is the equivalent of grade 12. But for those unfortunate enough to live in areas that do not provide facilities—and this is all too true of many areas in this country, and probably in no province is it as prevalent as the minister's province of Nova Scotia—all the 52 weeks' training does is bring them to grade eight level. It simply does not give them the background necessary to take the technical training that they require.

The other thing, Mr. Speaker, is that the Manpower Department has built up its own organization and there is little co-operation between the department and the school facilities. There are counsellors working for the Manpower Department and counsellors working for the education authorities, but according to the report to which I have referred, the co-operation between them leaves a great deal to be desired. Those who suffer are the people taking the training.

One other aspect to which I have referred again and again in debates about manpower training is this: The counsellors employed by the Manpower Department have virtually life and death power in respect of the program. They decide whether a person shall take a job or shall take further education; they decide whether a person shall take the training in his own city or in another, and they decide how long he shall be entitled to the training. According to the report, the co-operation between the manpower counsellors and the school counsellors is minimal, to say the least.

Mr. Speaker, for all these reasons I would urge the minister to study the report made by educational people who have had long experience in working with those needing education and who are in day-to-day contact with this problem. I ask that the difficulties referred to in this report, which are dealt with in much more detail than I could hope to do, be studied objectively and without partisanship.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has referred to a report that was issued some time ago and he bases his statements on the contents of that report. At the time the report was issued, and before a copy had been delivered to me, there was extensive reporting in the newspapers. At that time I made a public comment indicating that in my view the report did not represent a very fair or balanced picture of the operation of the Canada Manpower training program. The report itself is under review in my department, and the findings up to the present time give us no reason for changing the original analysis or reaction to it.

My hon. friend has mentioned a relatively large number of issues which I cannot deal with in a couple of minutes. We co-operate with the provinces. The successful operation of our program depends on close co-operation and collaboration with all provincial governments. Last week my deputy had meetings with all the deputy ministers of the provinces to consider how the program could be improved and how the process of consultation could be enhanced. Also, the hon. member should know that recently we had a meeting with ministers from the province of Manitoba, and part of the agenda dealt with ways and means of increasing co-operation in order to make the program more effective.

I had a meeting with the Minister of Education of Manitoba and we reached a good understanding as to how the program might be applied in that province to meet the particular needs of various communities. So, to suggest that there is minimal co-operation is inaccurate. We could not contemplate spending so much money in training the large numbers of people involved without having the close co-operation of the provinces.

We have conducted extensive cost-benefit analyses of the results of this program. We have followed up the employment histories of individuals who have taken the course. We know that while there are ways in which we can improve the program, the returns to the economy are about threefold when compared with expenditures made under the program. We know that the chances of employment of individuals are increased considerably and that their earning power is increased as a result of the training program. I shall welcome further questions based on the report at a later date when our review is complete, and we shall co-operate with the hon. member in finding ways and means of improving what I think is an effective program that can be improved and increased in respect of its services.

POLLUTION—DUMPING OF OIL AND OTHER WASTE IN GREAT LAKES

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on December 5, almost two months ago, I directed the following question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene):

> Having regard to the fact that the United States government recommended two days ago to the Canada-United States International Joint Commission that a moratorium with respect to oil drilling in Lake Erie be imposed because of the dangerous pollution possibilities, would the minister indicate whether the Canadian government intends to make a similar representation to the International Joint Commission?

I welcome this opportunity to give a little more background to my question and trust that we will hear from the minister tonight whether the Canadian government has also recommended to the Canada-United States International Joint Commission that a similar moratorium with respect to oil-drilling in Lake Erie be imposed.

It seems to me that in the mad search for resources the various levels of government often failed to take into account any adverse effects which the development and use of the resource might have on our total environment. In many instances permits for exploration and development are granted without proper safeguards being insisted upon by the governments involved. Frequently we find that governments have completely overlooked the possibility of major ecological damage being done and certainly have not weighed these chances, however remote they may be, against the over-all return from any given resource. A good example of this lack of foresight is found in the oil-drilling permits which have been allowed in Lake Erie.

In a news story in the Toronto Telegram of December 4, 1969, the following report appeared:

> The United States government recommended to the United States-Canada International Joint Commission yesterday a moratorium on oil well drilling in heavily polluted Lake Erie.
> Kenneth Bigland, Director of the United States Federal Water Pollution Control Administration's Division of Technological Support, said both planning and methods of dealing with oil spills on the lake remained limited. He said the moratorium should extend to natural gas drilling where such wells are likely to produce crude oil above specified levels, but he said the moratorium would not necessarily affect gas production which is already under way on the Canadian side of the lake.

Other interesting points have been raised in connection with oil-drilling in Lake Erie. It has been pointed out that one of the greatest dangers posed by drilling would be an accidental leak of the salt brine used. Apparently experts have warned that a spill of salt brine from an oil well would be one of the greatest natural catastrophes that could strike the Great Lakes. However, this is one aspect of pollution about which we have heard very little.

The main point I would like to make this evening, is that the recent IJC hearings clearly demonstrated that we do not have the facilities in the Great Lakes area to deal with a possible major oil well leak, or a major spill of oil from a sinking tanker. It would be utter catastrophe if a major spill of oil took place in any one of the Great Lakes. The hearing has pinpointed the fact that there is conflict between the federal and provincial jurisdictions as far as responsibility is concerned.

It appears that we have no contingency plans to deal with possible major oil well leaks such as the one off the coast of California last January. It appears that the lack of proper co-ordination between the federal and the provincial authorities is very much in evidence. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this problem should be tackled without delay. I feel the federal government should also recommend that drilling for gas and oil in Lake Erie be suspended until we can practically guarantee that these recreational areas will not be permanently destroyed by a major oil spill.

We have huge reserves of oil all over this nation, and there is no need to jeopardize Lake Erie or any of the Great Lakes which go to make up the greatest body of fresh water to be found anywhere in the world. This is a precious heritage to be protected. We cannot afford to take a chance on it with the apparent inadequate facilities and safeguards now available to us. I urge the minister and the government to re-examine this problem and, in this instance to go along with the United States government in recommending the discontinuance of drilling until adequate safeguards are available.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member. I had notice of the earlier question, but while my hon. friend was speaking I was writing. I was not aware I was expected to answer his question. I apologize and assure the hon. member that I will answer him at a later date.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, January 27, 1970

The House met at 2 p.m.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—EXTENT OF LAY-OFFS OF EMPLOYEES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the growing number of lay-offs in the automobile industry and the great economic importance of this industry, I ask the minister what information he has from the automobile industry as to the extent of the lay-offs this winter in the Canadian aspect of this industry?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have recently had meetings with the heads of the automobile industry and reference was made to this in our discussion. It is well known that there is a levelling in growth in that industry at this time. The lay-offs that have taken place in the recent past have been justified either by internal restructuring or by the need to reduce excessive inventories.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister any estimate of the extent of lay-offs to be expected and has he any assurance that the lay-offs that are effected will be fair and pro rata under the automobile agreement as between Canada and the United States?

Mr. Pepin: I believe it is so, Mr. Speaker, but I cannot be very specific today. I will look into this matter more closely and will give a more precise answer Thursday.

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister attempted to get an assurance from the heads of the automotive companies that they will give advance notice to workers who are going to be laid off of not less than two months before such lay-offs take place?

Mr. Pepin: I understand the practice has been to that effect in recent times in the automobile industry, but I will have another look at the record.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question. Will the minister take this problem into account in the negotiations in connection with the Canada-United States automotive trade pact and attempt to reduce the differential in prices in order to reduce inflation and provide for greater possibility of sales?

Mr. Pepin: All these factors and many others are being taken into account in our negotiations with the United States. If one is concerned with differentials, one should be encouraged by the progressive reduction in the prices of automobiles and in the reduction in the productivity differentials that existed between the two industries at the time the pact was negotiated. One should be rather satisfied with the progress made in these areas.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is on the same subject. In his examination of the problem, will the minister look at the agreement to see if there are any guarantees that the Canadian government could invoke under the agreement to prohibit the export of unemployment in view of the fact that there are many reports of very extensive lay-offs in the automotive industry in the United States?

Mr. Pepin: We have used all the guarantees that were available in the agreement and in the letters given by the companies to the government in 1965. The general idea is that these guarantees now constitute a floor under which production cannot be allowed to fall. However, as hon. members know, there is no guarantee as to employment; it is by increasing the Canadian value added that further employment is generated.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The minister will appreciate that since decisions in these matters are made in Detroit, the volume of production, either here or in the United States, is subject to decisions made outside Canada. That is why I am drawing the minister's attention to this question of a guarantee in relation to the non-export of unemployment. May we have a statement on this particular aspect at the first opportunity?

Mr. Pepin: On this particular subject the presidents of the automobile companies in Canada have assured me that decisions being taken in this industry in Detroit or anywhere else are now made on the basis of economic returns. This is cheering information, because it was one of the purposes of the automobile agreement that decisions should be made on such a basis. The hon. member smiles, and I can understand why he does so. We try by every reasonable means available to us to make sure that decisions are taken on the basis of economic return; we insist as much as we can—sometimes even more.

AIRCRAFT—POSSIBLE LAY-OFFS—HAWKER-SIDDELEY APPLICATION FOR FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I direct a supplementary question to the minister with respect to possible lay-offs in the aircraft industry. Has the government made any decision with respect to the application of the Hawker-Siddeley Company for financial assistance to enable them to put into production the DHC-7 which could put Canada in the forefront in exports of this particular type of aircraft? Has any decision been reached in this regard and, if not, when will one be taken?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): A decision was made some time ago, Mr. Speaker, and a program is now in progress in my department to encourage the next phase in the development of the DeHavilland and the STOL aircraft. However, the company has experienced some difficulty arising from the slow development of the use of the STOL aircraft in the world. As hon. members will appreciate, production has to be tied to the use of this aircraft, particularly in the United States; we can only go as far as markets are available for this aircraft. There is in my department now a rhythm of implementation of this program which ties in with the development of potential markets. I am well aware of the importance of this development in terms of the well-being of the aircraft industry in Canada.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Has the government decided whether or not to accede to the application for some part of the $50 million needed to put this plane into production if feasibility studies warrant it?

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Pepin: I say yes to that, Mr. Speaker, but the figure is wrong—it is not as high as that.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe the hon. member for Calgary North has a supplementary.

PUBLIC SERVICE

LAY-OFFS OF SENIOR EMPLOYEES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): My question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Would the minister make a statement soon as to the number of senior people in the public service employed in western Canada in the national parks branch and other departments who have been laid off? Will he also tell us how many of these people will be transferred to other jobs?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think the House is aware that there is a very active program in an endeavour to find alternative positions in the Public Service for those in particular jobs which have been declared redundant. This program is continuing and will continue. Whenever a man's position is declared redundant another position will be sought for him if one is available. There will be no termination of this program. Therefore from that point of view I am not able to say how many will be laid off or how many will be found alternative positions.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, after hearing the minister's answer do I take it that his policy is to try to find alternative positions but if there are none then even these senior public servants who have served this country will be laid off permanently?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The supplementary question as asked appears to be argumentative.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I rephrase it. I did not mean to be argumentative.

An hon. Member: It comes naturally.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, could the minister give us a statement within the next few days as to the number of people who at this stage have not been placed in alternative jobs and have served as senior public servants in this nation?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I can make a statement as to the number of senior public servants for whom positions have not been found and who have been laid off if the hon. gentleman would indicate to me what he means by senior public servants.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONTRACTS AWARDED TO RCA VICTOR—INTEREST CONFLICT OF J. B. HOULDING

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence arising out of an answer he provided yesterday to a question which appeared on the Order Paper. The answer revealed that RCA Victor Corporation of Canada has received 493 contracts from the Department of National Defence since 1962. Will the minister assure the House that he will investigate the conflict of interest position of Mr. J. B. Houlding who is simultaneously the president of RCA Victor of Canada and a member of the Defence Research Board.

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, technically speaking the contracts referred to here were not given by the Defence Research Board.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put my question to the appropriate minister who is responsible for awarding such contracts.

[Translation]

TRANSPORT

INQUIRY RESPECTING SALE OF ICEBREAKER "C. D. HOWE"

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Transport but in his absence I will ask his parliamentary secretary to give the answer.

Could he tell us if the ice-breaker C. D. Howe was sold to Marine Industries Ltd. or to any other company?

If so, what was the sale price?

Mr. Speaker: I would like to suggest to the hon. member that this question could easily be placed on the Order Paper.

Mr. Dumont: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The C. D. Howe is equipped with hospital facilities which cost one million dollars. Before scrapping her, it would be time for the minister or his parliamentary secretary to tell the House whether she has been sold.

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not have the information requested by the hon. member, but I shall ask the department and keep him informed about this matter.

[English]

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

BENEFITS PAID RETIRED COAL MINERS—PURCHASING POLICY

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the first minister. Has the right hon. gentleman received a written complaint from the retired coal miners pensioners union at Sydney Mines regarding the manner in which benefits are being paid? In view of the constant complaints, and knowing the Prime Minister has a particular interest in this problem, would he cause an investigation to be carried out into all the ramifications of this subject?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no indication that I have received such a complaint but it is conceivable that it has arrived at my office and has not been delivered to me. I will take the question as notice and if the complaint warrants such an investigation I will consider the matter.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask whether, when investigating this particular set-up in Devco, the Prime Minister would also investigate the purchasing policies of this crown corporation?

WATER RESOURCES

SURVEY IN NORTHERN ONTARIO BY U.S. ARMY CORPS OF ENGINEERS

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is he prepared to ask the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works to look into the activities of the United States Army Corps of Engineers in northern Ontario?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I do not control this, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking a question which has already been asked in a number of forms in recent days.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[Later:]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, because of the strong reaction in northern Ontario against the agency reporting on ice and water conditions, will the chairman of the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works undertake to call before the committee representatives of the United States Army Corps of Engineers to ascertain whether Canada can formally supply the information required?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again I have the impression that the question asked by the hon. member relates to one asked before. I do not like to be unfair to the hon. member for Thunder Bay who asked a question which I suggested had been asked previously. The minister might like to reply to both questions at this time.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I do not control the procedures of the committee, but I certainly see no objection to the committee requesting their presence. I am sure that through the good offices of the Department of External Affairs we could determine whether or not the engineers would be willing to appear before the committee to clear up any problems that might exist.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I should also like to ask the minister if he would be prepared to have called before the committee some of the persons who brought this matter to his attention so that further information might be obtained?

Mr. Greene: I would certainly have no objection to that.

GRAIN

RAPESEED—PROVISION OF BOXCARS FOR ADDITIONAL QUOTA

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I should like to direct my question to the Minister without Portfolio who is responsible for the Wheat Board, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the Wheat Board has recently announced an additional five bushel quota for rapeseed, have efforts been made to provide boxcars to handle this quota at places where rapeseed is available?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the program for boxcars involves the demands not only for rapeseed but other grains. Due consideration is given to the demand for cars for rapeseed at the ports in deciding the allocation of boxcars.

[Mr. Speaker.]

UTILIZATION OF LAKEHEAD TERMINAL SPACE

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister without Portfolio. Following the debate on available space at the Lakehead terminals in which the opposition pointed out to the minister the necessity of assisting farmers in their financial difficulties by filling the space as soon as possible, has the minister come to any decision in this regard?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the decision in regard to filling space was clear before the opposition made any point of the matter. The space will be filled methodically and effectively and is being filled at the rate of several million bushels of grain a week.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question to the Minister without Portfolio is a follow-up to the question I directed to the acting minister last week in the minister's absence. Has he now had any consultations with the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool in view of the concern expressed by that organization that space at the Lakehead would not be filled by the opening of navigation and that this would hinder the loading of boats for export?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I have been speaking to the president and other members of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool on other matters and we did give some attention to this issue as well, including the ability of the Wheat Pool to handle the number of boxcars programmed for it to the end of the period. It appears they are confident of their ability to handle cars in accordance with the schedule. Reports of loading indicate that the number of cars from Saskatchewan has increased rather markedly recently and this will be reflected in unloadings available for the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool terminal.

PROVISION OF ONE-BUSHEL QUOTA

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Wheat Board. How soon may all those points—nearly half of the delivery points on the prairies which are still on the unit quota—expect to receive a one-bushel quota?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to put a specific date on it but the movement of grain from the unit quota points is very rapid and I would expect to see the opening of the one-bushel quota across the prairies very quickly, as well as a move to two fairly rapidly thereafter.

Mr. Horner: It could have been two months ago if you had filled up the terminals.

FINAL PAYMENTS FOR 1968-69 CROP YEAR

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of recent statements by the minister to the effect that "there is no reason at all for farmers to be optimistic about receiving a final payment", is the minister in a position to announce whether there will be a final payment and, if not, when will he be making this announcement to the House?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I do not have anything to add at this point to the discussion of a few days ago about the wheat pool. However, I think I should add, for the benefit of the hon. member for Crowfoot, that we could hardly fill the space available for grain before it was empty and 44 million bushels of grain were moved out in December.

UNITED NATIONS

WORLD FOOD PROGRAM—MODIFICATION OF CANADA'S EFFORTS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister or the Minister of Agriculture. Would the minister indicate what steps have been taken by the government to accommodate the request by the Director General of the World Food Program that Canada modify its $30 million effort in terms of the type of commodities to be provided to this program?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's interpretation of what Mr. Aquino said is completely inaccurate.

Mr. Lundrigan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Despite my voice being a bit raspy I rise on a question of privilege. The minister has made the allegation that I have interpreted something inaccurately. I did not interpret anything. I simply asked the minister whether the government planned to modify its contribution to the world food program inasmuch as the Director General has been asking for a modification of Canada's efforts. The minister has implied that I am misrepresenting the facts.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

OIL

TYPE OF APPOINTMENTS TO ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON POLICY

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Does the government intend to make further appointments to the advisory committee on oil policy in order to offset the heavy representation of international oil companies on that committee?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there is no intention at the present time of changing the make-up of the committee which has a balance of people who have very expert knowledge in the fields of production, transportation and marketing of oil products. It is a highly expert committee. Other interests will be considered, of course, outside the scope of the advisory committee, but we feel it is very well cut out to do the job required, that of giving expert advice from the private sector to ourselves in the area of possible policy-making.

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Speaker, would the minister consider appointing additional independents to that committee as quickly as possible?

Mr. Greene: There are, of course, representatives of the independent oil industry specifically nominated by IPAC on the committee.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, would the minister advise why six, I believe, of the ten members of that committee are citizens of countries other than Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the question as asked is argumentative.

POLLUTION

ALLEGED OIL CONTAMINATION OF LAKE ERIE BY CANADIANS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the very serious differences of opinion between the United States and Canada regarding oil pollution by Canadians on our side of Lake Erie, would the minister state whether or not he has been in contact with the United States authorities on this question?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

TAX RELIEF AS INCENTIVE FOR REMEDIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, since we are dealing with pollution and in view of the fact that many industries have announced programs involving millions of dollars in the battle against pollution, is the minister giving serious consideration to the granting of tax relief as an incentive for such programs? I ask the question particularly because in Hamilton an announcement has been made by Stelco and Dofasco that they are making commitments in respect of this type of program to the extent of $68 million.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that the hon. member is asking the minister to make a policy statement which perhaps should be made on motions.

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that I thought I had indicated in my question that I was seeking a statement on motions, I would ask now whether the minister would be prepared to make such a statement on motions?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I think that the policy of the government is very clear within the ambit of the Canada Water Act, that is, that the polluter must pay.

Mr. Alexander: No fines, no standards, no nothing.

Mr. Speaker: The minister cannot make a statement now.

DISTINGUISHED SERVICE AWARDS

REFERENCE OF INTERDEPARTMENTAL STUDY TO COMMITTEE

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): In the absence of the Secretary of State perhaps I may be allowed to direct my question to the Minister of National Defence. Has any decision yet been taken to refer to a standing committee of the House, either the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs or the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, the results of the study being carried out by the interdepartmental committee on distinguished service awards?

[Mr. Rynard.]

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): May I say, to reply to the question directly, that the answer is no.

Mr. MacLean: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister assure the House that decorations of a given grade will not under any circumstances, solely by reason of being uniquely Canadian, take precedence over Commonwealth awards that have been awarded to Canadians in the past?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, may I say, to the extent that I can speak about the Canadian awards that are now granted, that they do not take precedence, for instance, over the Victoria Cross or the George Cross. I believe it is to be assumed that whenever the new awards are recommended a classification will be made. I am sure that the precedence of the awards now in existence and worn so proudly by veterans and military personnel will not be altered.

Mr. MacLean: I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, and I will be very brief. In other words, the minister is saying that Commonwealth awards will not be categorized as foreign awards?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NIGERIA—ALLEGED MISTREATMENT OF BIAFRANS BY NIGERIAN SOLDIERS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

In view of his exchange of views during the past few days with the British Prime Minister, is the Prime Minister in a position to confirm, deny or comment on reports of theft, looting and rape of Biafrans by Nigerian soldiers?

[English]

POLLUTION

ARCTIC WATERS—COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING HYDROCARBON POLLUTANTS

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can he tell the House what action his department is taking in accordance with the report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development which urged immediate investigation and research into the action of hydrocarbon pollutants in the Arctic waters?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The research in respect of pollution in the north is carried out by my department, by the Department of Transport and by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Department of Fisheries. Certainly the subject matter to which the hon. member refers is very much under our surveillance at the present time.

Mr. St. Pierre: I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Can he advise us what action his department is taking as a result of that committee's recommendations?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will recognize that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources referred to the fact that a number of departments are concerned. I do not think it would be in order to direct a separate question to each minister concerned.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the questions that have been put by the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin and other hon. members this afternoon to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, would the Government House Leader consider bringing forward government order No. 62 with all due expedition, to wit, this week?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): I answered that question last week by indicating that we could undoubtedly deal with this matter more effectively in the form of legislation.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): In view of the fact that members of all parties are so anxious for this matter to be brought to a vote, would the President of the Privy Council reconsider his decision?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I have to bear in mind the fact that so many people in this country are anxious for us to get on with our legislative program.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): This is our legislative program.

Mr. Baldwin: We dealt with seven bills last Friday.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There have been a number of supplementary questions on this subject and many members are anxious to ask questions.

FISHERIES AND FORESTRY

REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF LICENSING PROPOSALS RESPECTING SALMON

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I have a question for the President of the Privy Council which I am sure will not interfere with the legislative program.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): What legislative program?

Mr. Barnett: In light of the fact that the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry is holding its organization meeting later this afternoon, would the minister agree to an immediate reference to that committee of the licensing proposals with respect to Pacific coast salmon, to which proposal the Minister of Fisheries indicated his agreement last October 30?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): It seems to me that the first items of business to be dealt with are the three fisheries bills to which second reading was given last week. However, I will take the suggestion of the hon. member under consideration.

TRADE

REASON FOR LOSS OF ORDER BY DAVIE SHIPBUILDING COMPANY

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the loss of an order to build some 24 freighters worth $50 million, which involved the employment of 1,000 people by the Davie Shipbuilding Company Limited of Sorel, could the minister explain to the House why the Export Development Corporation could not provide the financing?

Mr. Speaker: I think this type of information should be given by way of a statement on motions.

Mr. Hales: May I reword my question, Mr. Speaker? Is it a fact that the Davie Shipbuilding Company lost this order for 24 freighters?

Mr. Speaker: I do not want to be difficult but certainly the question as asked is still not in order. However, perhaps the minister might like to give the House the information sought by the hon. member.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): It is a difficult question to answer because the Export Development Corporation is very much master of its own decisions. In this particular case they have assessed the project and have found it impossible to accept on economic grounds as well as in view of "standards", on "prevailing philosophy" which exist in the world on matters such as the quantum of financing; the level of interest.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to have to interrupt the minister but the minister's philosophical reply makes it evident that my interpretation of the situation was correct and that the question should have been asked in some other way.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—INCREASE IN TRUCKING RATES BY QUEBEC TRANSPORTATION BOARD

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question for the Minister of Finance but in view of his absence, which I regret very much, I will direct my question to the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for Windsor West. Has he anything to report to the House following the undertaking by the Minister of Finance last week that he would check into the increase in Quebec-Ontario truck rates authorized last week to see whether any representations could be made by the government in light of the government's policy of restraint?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister without Portfolio): I will take this question under advisement and attempt to provide an answer for my hon. friend at an early date.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF PUBLIC HOUSING POLICY

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): My question is for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing. In light of recent reports that in Metropolitan Toronto alone some 15,000 families are on the waiting list for public housing and there are probably as many more in need of housing, is the minister going to announce soon the government's policy in respect of expanding the stock of public housing?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): In 1969 through our two low-income housing programs we are committed to 27,659 self-contained units, which was twice the figure of any previous year's performance. If I can book time with the House Leader I will be making a statement on the 1970 capital budget of CMHC early next week. I can tell the House in advance that it will show even further emphasis on the provision of low income housing during 1970.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MANPOWER

SUMMER EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM FOR STUDENTS

Mr. D. Gordon Blair (Grenville-Carleton): My question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and it arises from answers he gave earlier when he indicated that the results of the summer employment program for students last summer were being studied. Is the minister in a position to say whether he can make a report on motions on this important matter and, if so, when we may expect to receive such a report?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I believe I promised the House some months ago that I would make such a statement, and I will try to make it as soon as possible.

INDUSTRY

GOLD MINING—POLICY RESPECTING GRANTS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Is he in a position to indicate to us whether gold mining grants will be renewed or increased in an effort to help mining regions attain economic and social stability?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as this matter comes within the purview of my colleague the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, may I suggest that this question be directed to him.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether or not the minister has understood the question. Is he in a position to indicate to us whether gold mining grants will be renewed or increased in an effort to help mining regions attain economic and social stability?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, this matter is now under consideration by the officials of my department and I have not received a report yet.

[English]

TRANSPORT

MOVEMENT OF GRAIN—RETURN OF CANADIAN BOXCARS FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport who, according to the roster, was to have been present today; in his absence I will direct it to the acting minister. In view of current reports from the United States that the tremendous grain boxcar shortage may result in legislation to rectify the situation, can the minister advise the House what steps, if any, he is taking to make sure that Canadian boxcars now in use in the United States are being returned to Canada within the prescribed time limit?

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice. The minister, who is presently in Newfoundland on business, will answer the question when he returns to the House, probably on Thursday.

[English]

Mr. Southam: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the Parliamentary Secretary is advising the minister would he also transmit this question to him? Would the minister consider a materially increased daily rental or demurrage charge on Canadian boxcars being used in the United States in order to ensure the speedy return of our rolling stock?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF PURCHASING POLICY

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, since union correspondence with the government indicates that the purchasing policy of Devco in some cases is creating a safety hazard, if there is a responsible minister will he investigate this matter in view of the Prime Minister's lack of interest in his just society?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Churchill.

POLLUTION

ACTION RESPECTING CONTAMINATION OF SASKATCHEWAN RIVER BY MERCURY

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In view of the minister's statements concerning the source of pollution in the Saskatchewan River, in which he attributed the source of the pollution to the Interprovincial Co-operative downstream from Saskatoon, and in view of the statements by a representative of this industry that it is not the source of the pollution—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should ask his question. We are running short of time.

Mr. Simpson: Has the minister anything further to add to the statements which he made?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen any statements attributed to company representatives. However, I have seen confirmation of my statements from other sources.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR POLITICAL ASYLUM BY POLISH SEAMEN

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Would the minister say if he is ready to report to the House as to the disposition of the Polish sailors who jumped their ship in Halifax before Christmas, seeking political asylum in Canada?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have examined these cases and in light of all the circumstances have decided to permit these seamen to remain in Canada under minister's permit.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

Mr. Paproski: As a supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might wait until tomorrow to put a supplementary question because there are so many members of the House who wish to ask questions now.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I just wish to thank the minister.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, before asking my question may I also thank the minister very warmly for his decision on this matter.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NIGERIA—POSSIBILITY OF CANADIAN PEACEKEEPING FORCE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. As the result of a government decision is the Department of National Defence now preparing a potential peacekeeping force for Nigeria from Mobile Command's complement at Camp Petawawa?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Forrestall: As a supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North. I apologize to the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East. I realize he has been trying to ask questions, and on reflection perhaps I should allow him a supplementary.

Mr. Forrestall: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would not have thought ill of you if you had not. May I ask the Minister of National Defence what was the purpose of the immunization process, the needle process, that members of this group were subjected to if it was not for them to go to Biafra-Nigeria?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of National Defence. It is related to the question of my colleague from Dartmouth-Halifax-East.

I would like to know whether the Canadian government has made or is making representations to the United Nations to have a peace corps formed and sent to Nigeria, more particularly to Biafra. If so, would Canada be a participant?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that the matter has been considered and I must say that it does not seem necessary to me. To my mind, the civil war is really over.

[Mr. Speaker.]

FISHERIES AND FORESTRY

RETENTION ON STAFF OF DR. K. J. KOLLER

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Has his department been able to find a method by which Dr. K. J. Koller, who came to Canada at the time of the Hungarian revolution and was a research scientist in his department, can be kept on staff?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question should be placed on the Order Paper.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

EFFECT OF CLOSING OF VETERANS LAND ACT OFFICES OUTSIDE BIG CITIES

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. It deals with the decision to close full-time offices of the Veterans Land Act administration branch which have been helping veterans in the field outside the big cities. Does closing the full-time VLA office at Drumheller, Alberta, and the drastic reduction of services there represent a decision by the minister to reduce the amount of help that the government is giving veterans generally across the country?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question should be placed on the Order Paper.

Mr. Schumacher: Ten o'clock.

AIRPORTS

STE. SCHOLASTIQUE—APPOINTMENT OF WORKS CO-ORDINATOR

Mr. George Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Could he tell us whether the head of his Montreal regional office has recently been appointed works co-ordinator for the Sainte-Scholastique airport and would he give us a definition of the duties of this person?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question could also be placed on the Order Paper.

[Later:]

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, I would ask you to repeat the reasons why my question was ruled out of order, since I did not hear them.

Mr. Speaker: The suggestion I made to the hon. member for Sainte-Marie was that his question should be placed on the Order Paper. If there is some urgency, the hon. member could notify me and the question could be discussed at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Valade: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

In my opinion, there is some urgency, because construction of the airport in Sainte-Scholastique is about to start, as recently announced by the government, and since it is quite an important item of the estimates, I think that the House is entitled to receive an answer.

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR REFERENCE OF QUOTA SYSTEM CHANGES TO COMMITTEE

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the fact that the minister has established a committee to formulate changes in the quota system for grains marketed through the Canadian Wheat Board, will he refer the proposed changes in the quota system to the Standing Committee on Agriculture?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): I will certainly give consideration to that representation, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on a point of order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the three fisheries bills which the Government House Leader had slated for consideration either tomorrow or Thursday were disposed of last Friday—parenthetically I might say that this happened when he was away; in fact, we did seven bills on Friday—could the minister tell us what we will be doing tomorrow?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the first question that comes to my mind is how is it possible to do seven bills in one day but only one bill in six days?

Mr. Baldwin: It depends on the bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister was away.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): May I remind hon. members that I was away on several of the other six days as well, but not—

An hon. Member: Not enough.

Mr. MacInnis: Why are you away so much?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am prepared to undertake to be away from the House if this is the only thing that prevents the opposition from getting down to business.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, for tomorrow we will call the second bill dealing with the Company of Young Canadians, and I understand there is a disposition to pass it in one sitting day. Following that I propose that we might call on Thursday—and it is for this reason I sent a note to the hon. member suggesting a House Leaders' meeting later today—government order No. 14, the report stage and third reading of the Railway Act amending bill, to be followed by government order No. 19, the amendment to the Canada Student Loans Act, to be followed in turn by government order No. 12, with respect to the Small Businesses Loans Act, and this to be followed in turn by the amendment to the Quebec Savings Banks Act. The business to follow would be the motor vehicle traffic safety legislation.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Oxford rising on a point of order?

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order and wish to direct my remarks to the Government House Leader. So that a number of hon. members will not have to spend unnecessary time and labour on reports, can the Government House Leader assure the House that, in view of the fate of the recent report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the forthcoming report of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, which is studying the proposals of the Minister of Finance, will not suffer the same fate?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I must say—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate rising on a point of order?

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, perhaps it is a point of order. When replying to a question earlier today about the world food program the Minister of Agriculture, perhaps inadvertently, left the wrong impression with the House, that impression being contrary to what has been stated by the Director General of the World Food Program. I am wondering if the minister would make a statement on motions in order to clear up the situation so that the House may be aware of the actual truth?

Mr. Olson: Replying to the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the question I raised had to do with whether or not Canada had been specifically requested to change the content of its aid. That, of course, refers to commodities. The reason I said there had been an inaccurate interpretation was that there was no specific request to Canada to change the content.

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that perhaps we should go on with orders of the day, but if the hon. member wishes to rise on a point of order I will recognize him.

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Speaker, my point of order has to do with the very important matter of pollution of the Saskatchewan River.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I trust that the hon. member will indicate to the Chair the point of order he proposes to raise. Perhaps he ought to refer to the Standing Orders of the House.

Mr. Simpson: My point of order, Mr. Speaker, is based on the fact that the minister responsible assured the House that in the opinion of his officials the particular plant referred to is the principal, if not the only, source of mercury pollution in the Saskatchewan River. Reports indicate that the plant has denied—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I cannot, with respect and after allowing all charitable considerations, to prevail, allow the hon. member to pursue that matter as a point of order. If every hon. member who disagrees with a reply given to him by a minister raises a point of order we could spend the better part of our time discussing such points of order. To my mind this is a matter for debate and should not be raised as a point of procedure, or if the hon. members wishes to he can raise the matter again at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Simpson: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

The House resumed from Monday, January 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Trudeau:

That a Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be appointed to examine and report upon proposals, made public, or which are from time to time made public by the Government of Canada, on a number of subjects related to the Constitution of Canada during the course of the comprehensive review of the Constitution of Canada, which review was agreed upon at the Constitutional Conference of the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premiers and Prime Ministers of the Provinces in February, 1968, and alternative proposals on the same subjects;

That twenty members of the House of Commons, to be designated by the House at a later date, be members of the joint committee on the part of this House;

That the committee have power to appoint, from among its members, such sub-committees as it may deem advisable or necessary;

That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House;

That the committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers, and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting Their Honours to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems so advisable, some of its members to act on the proposed joint committee.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes at my disposal yesterday evening I tried to make the point that we are having tremendous difficulty in amending our constitution partly because of the fundamentally different approach to the matter adopted by this government under the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the provinces, and this remark applies to all provinces regardless of the political party that forms the provincial government. There is an impression abroad that the Prime Minister is interested in changing the constitution only so far as that change will spell out the rights of French speaking people of Canada and give them an equal opportunity to use their language in all parts of Canada. It seems to some that that is the only aspect in which this government is interested. The provinces are tremendously interested in a whole range of priorities and in financing programs for which, under the provisions of the BNA Act, they are responsible.

The hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher) who spoke last night suggested that in amending the constitution we might consider limiting the taxing powers of the government and the amount of money it can spend. In his introductory remarks yesterday the Prime Minister pointed out that between 1954 and 1964 the expenditures of the federal government had increased only by about 56 per cent, while the expenditures of provincial governments increased by some 204 per cent. The expenditures of my province, Manitoba, between the years 1958 and 1968 rose, under a Conservative government, from about $80 million annually to over $350 million annually, an increase of about 400 per cent. I am not criticizing the former Conservative government headed by former Premier Roblin for being a spending government. The money had to be spent simply because the Conservative government of Manitoba realized that it was necessary to bring Manitoba into the twentieth century in such fields as education, health and welfare, the building of roads and other important fields under provincial jurisdiction.

Not many years ago most young people in this country, and particularly those living in rural areas, did not attend high school. Today, the program under which young people may attend high school extends to almost all parts of Canada. Indeed, there has been a fantastic increase in the percentage of our young people attending universities. In this field the provinces must play an important role and face tremendous expenditures. I am certain that most provinces would be more than happy if the federal government were prepared to take over either the responsibility of financing university education or make available sources of taxation which the provinces could use to finance education. As yet, however, there is no indication that the federal government is interested in even discussing this matter with the provinces.

We have seen an astronomical increase in provincial expenditures and responsibilities in the fields of health and welfare. Every province of Canada now has a provincial hospitalization program under which hospital expenses are paid by the province and not the individual who must go to hospital. Similarly, in the very near future every province in Canada will be participating in the medicare plan proposed by the federal government and financed jointly by the federal government and the provinces. All this has meant, and will mean, a tremendous increase in provincial spending. The provinces will need more money and they cannot help but be disturbed by the almost casual announcement the Prime Minister made, an announcement that was echoed by some of his ministers, that the federal government is thinking of getting out of programs in which it persuaded provinces to participate. There are similar problems of urban blight, urban renewal and the provision of housing for people in the low income brackets, people on welfare and, indeed people in middle income brackets who are finding that their incomes today are not sufficient to enable them to purchase a house using the normal methods of financing.

A few moments ago, in answer to a question put by my colleague the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Andras) in charge of housing reported that last year the federal government had financed the building of approximately 29,000 public housing units. That, Mr. Speaker, is just over 10 per cent of the total number of houses built last year. Only 10 per cent of the houses built last year were for the people who needed them most. People earning $6,000 or $7,000 a year cannot purchase a house and must rent accommodation. These are the people who require public housing, yet the minister has announced that just over 10 per cent of the houses built last year were of this type.

I suggest the people who are in the income bracket between $12,000 and $20,000, and sometimes in excess of that, can wait for housing. They already have adequate housing. The people to whom I am referring are earning under $6,000 a year and are living in the central cores of the cities in dilapidated housing. These people require more than 10 per cent of the total housing being built in this country. How will this requirement be met when the federal government under the present Prime Minister, believes that the problems of the cities are a provincial responsibility, that the federal government should not take a leading role in such problems as building homes and rapid transit systems so that people can move to the centre of the city where they work. How can we get the federal government to accept this responsibility? Because the provinces do not receive the required leadership from the federal government, they are not too concerned about constitutional conferences to be held in the future. They are not interested because the federal government is not dealing with the problems which are of primary concern to them.

One problem which has come to the fore and is being discussed in the press, on television is pollution. The problem of pollution is one in which the jurisdiction is divided between the federal, provincial and municipal governments. During the question period today, the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Simpson) directed a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) about the pollution problem in Manitoba. Fish in Manitoba lakes have been found to contain mercury poisoning. This mercury was dumped into the rivers in Saskatchewan, carried into lakes in Manitoba and is now poisoning the fish in Lake Manitoba. This is an interprovincial problem which requires participation by the federal government. Even though a couple of weeks ago the minister made a very good speech when introducing the bill on water control, there is not much indication that the federal government intends to move into this field.

The provinces are concerned about air pollution which can vary from one province to another. They are also concerned about pollution of our rivers and lakes by the cities which have not provided for the adequate treatment of the water dumped into these rivers and lakes by their sewage disposal systems. I spoke of this problem a few days ago, Mr. Speaker. I again want to put on record that the city of Montreal, with a population of 2½ million, dumps 93 per cent of its sewage into the St. Lawrence River in an untreated state. Quebec city, which is represented by one of the leading ministers of this government, dumps 100 per cent of its sewage into the St. Lawrence River in an untreated state. Halifax follows a similar procedure. I am certain the municipal authorities of the cities to which I have referred are just as concerned about polluting the waters surrounding them as the mayors and representatives of other cities in Canada.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

These cities are faced with tremendous financial problems. The proper treatment of sewage in the city of Montreal would cost approximately $100 million. We are all aware of the financial crisis being faced by the city of Montreal. This city has tremendously high local taxes and cannot afford to do the job which is required. This government has not shown any signs of introducing a program of grants or low cost loans to the city of Montreal to finance adequate sewage treatment facilities. I feel this is an illustration of this government's approach to the problems of the cities. No matter how important their problems are, they must be kept at arm's length from the federal government.

I was amused when I listened to the hon. member for Etobicoke (Mr. Gillespie) last night. He suggested that representatives of the municipalities should be present at these constitutional conferences. I think this is an excellent idea, but the hon. member should consider how that suggestion fits in with the Prime Minister's view that the cities are solely the creatures of provincial governments and, therefore, they have no right—indeed there is no need—for them to be present at federal-provincial conferences. Of course, they can attend these conferences if the provinces make arrangements for them to be part of their delegation, but the municipalities have no constitutional right as far as the Prime Minister and the federal government are concerned.

The problems which concern the people of Canada are the day to day bread and butter problems of work, housing, environment and a better life, qualitatively and materially. These are the problems which this government has put into the background. Although the legislation that we are being asked to deal with is important, it is not designed to improve the living conditions of the people of Canada. It is for this reason that there has been a lessening of interest in the constitutional problems of this country.

I urge the government to reconsider its position and to come to the constitutional conferences with the provinces with specific proposals. The people of Canada are not concerned whether the problems are solved by the federal, provincial or municipal governments. They are desirous of their problems being solved, their needs being looked after and not being put off to another day or year because one government or the other disclaims responsibility.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) told us yesterday that we have to talk to each other quite frankly. I hope to follow his guidelines and speak as frankly as I can about the constitutional position which he put forward yesterday on behalf of his party and, to use his words, to do so without offence.

I must say that the performance of the Leader of the Opposition yesterday was curious and unconvincing. As a statement of his party's policy on the constitution, it was contradictory and self-defeating. Indeed, at times his contradictions verged on the brink of incoherence. He complained that Parliament had not been consulted on the constitutional reforms, the revision of the constitution. Well, Parliament is being consulted now. After he spoke, the nation was no wiser as to where his party stood on the great question of the constitution. It is regrettable from the point of view of reaching a consensus in the House that, having heard the Leader of the Opposition, no one is any wiser as to the stand taken by his party on essential constitutional issues. What has happened to the party of Sir John A. Macdonald, of Borden, Meighen, Diefenbaker, when it is silent in this great debate and has no stand to put before the House?

We thought this debate would afford us an opportunity to hear the views of the opposition. We thought the Leader of the Opposition would grasp the occasion to outline the position of his party. The fact is, we now know less than we did before. We thought we knew where he stood before he spoke, but after he spoke we were no longer certain. At one point he stated he was "not as confused as all that". His followers seemed to be grateful for this assurance, because that remark brought the first burst of applause from the opposition benches.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): I don't hear the Prime Minister applauding you.

Mr. MacEachen: In spite of the speech made by the Leader of the Opposition or, indeed, because of it, I am convinced the government has followed the right course, first, in opening up the subject for debate at the urging of the provinces and, second, in seeking a national consensus, as well as in its assessment of the results achieved to date.

The debate has been going on for two years. It has been made a public debate because of the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) insistence that the people be made aware of what is going on. The Leader of the Opposition shouts: "Bring in the people." Well, the people have been in on this debate from the very beginning through the medium of television. For some reason, the Leader of the Opposition seems to be unaware, not only of the significance of the constitutional process, but also of the fact that the debate itself has been an open and continuing one. Now, he is showing a curious reluctance to grasp the fundamental issue before the House.

Parliament is being asked, or it will be later in the committee, to pronounce its views on vital issues concerned with constitutional reform and affecting Canadians from coast to coast. This is an opportunity for the Leader of the Opposition and his party to put on record their stand on these great issues.

All we heard from the Leader of the Opposition was a lugubrious lamentation. No doubt, this statement of his will be known as the "our days are numbered" speech. Matters of language rights, social rights, the distribution of powers, relations between senior levels of government, shared-cost programs, powers for dealing with regional disparity—these, together with a multitude of other considerations, have been brought out during the debate in a search for a national consensus. Surely, the process of bringing these issues before Canadians on the part of the Prime Minister should not, in the name of constructive criticism, be arbitrarily described, as it was by the Leader of the Opposition, as a total failure. The hon. gentleman stated that the federal-provincial meetings had demonstrated practically no progress.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: The Leader of the Opposition made an important statement yesterday. He said important things—important and wrong things. Anyone who has attempted to follow the progress of the constitutional discussion is bound to reach the conclusion that progress has, indeed, been made.

Mr. Baldwin: Backwards.

Mr. MacEachen: I want to place on record for the benefit of members of the House and, I hope, of the public a list of what I believe to be important areas of progress since this process began.

Canadian Constitution

1. There has been agreement between the Government of Canada and the provincial governments to enter upon a complete review of the constitution. At the first conference, in 1968, there was agreement to examine highly important questions including the official languages, fundamental rights, the distribution of powers, regional disparity, amending procedures, the mechanism of federal-provincial relations, and so on. Later, at the second conference, it was agreed to undertake a comprehensive review of the constitution of Canada, including the possibility of adopting an entirely new constitution.

2. A second step, and one which I believe to be of great importance, was the establishment of the machinery necessary to undertake this review. It was brought about by setting up a continuing conference composed of the Prime Minister and the premiers, together with a continuing committee, or secretariat, of officials to assist them.

3. The third item I would place before the House is the adoption of a firm position on language rights. Hon. members will recall the atmosphere in which the conference of February, 1968 was held, and I was relieved, as, indeed, many people were, including the participants, when the conference agreed to recognize, as proposed by the Commission on Biculturalism and Bilingualism and as a matter of equity, that French-speaking Canadians outside Quebec should have the same rights as English-speaking Canadians in Quebec. The late Daniel Johnson attended that conference and I remember his comments following the adoption of that principle by the conference.

4. There has been agreement that reduction of regional disparities is an objective of confederation. There was agreement that the federal government should have the power to alleviate regional disparities as they affected the income of individuals, the quality of economic development and the standards of public services. Undoubtedly this agreement for the inclusion of the objectives of the elimination of regional disparities should be made part of the preamble to the constitution. There was an agreement further, as I read the proceedings, that if the difficulty of effecting the supremacy of Parliament and judicial review could be overcome, there would be an obligation imposed to achieve the goal of the elimination of regional disparity.

Remember, too, what the premier of Nova Scotia said of the conference when he discussed this issue. I looked it up last night. He was debating, at the conference, the inclusion of this objective in a new constitution. He said as follows:

> I believe the inclusion of a type of statement in the preamble we have been talking about, (namely the eradication of regional disparity) as an objective of confederation is a great step forward, accompanied by providing powers which would enable that objective to be followed and pursued. We have certainly got something in the constitution we have never had before or will have when we have that new constitution.

That is the view of the premier of Nova Scotia and his colleagues from the Atlantic provinces as well as elsewhere in Canada who felt that the inclusion of this goal in the constitution was an objective of paramount importance. When it was achieved, the premier of Nova Scotia said it was a great step forward. I wonder how he feels now that his one-time colleague from Nova Scotia describes his efforts as practically no progress at all. That is number four.

5. Number five was an agreement at the constitutional conference that the national capital should reflect the two cultural groups of Canada. That is rather important to many people, including members of this House of Commons. It was agreed in February 1969 that steps must be taken to ensure that the two official languages and the cultural values common to all Canadians were recognized in the capital region, so that all Canadians may have a feeling of pride, participation in and attachment to their capital. This was a step forward.

6. Number six was agreement in principle on powers of taxation. This has been totally ignored in the debate so far, but the working session of the constitutional conference in June 1969 generally agreed on the principle of access by both federal and provincial governments instead of the principle of allocation. There was general agreement on powers of taxation reached at this conference.

7. Number seven was agreement in principle on the spending powers of Parliament. It is surprising that the Leader of the Opposition did not speak of the very definite movement toward reconciliation on this important issue of the use of the federal spending power in fields of exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

I read the proceedings again. There was a definite movement towards a consensus and it was agreed, even by Quebec, that Parliament should have the power to make conditional grants to provinces, subject to a formula to determine a consensus and for compensation to non-participating provinces.

Mr. Baldwin: Even a glacier has movement.

Mr. MacEachen: Well, that is a very important movement. No wonder the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) is so sensitive because he, too, joined last night in the unfounded allegations of his leader that no progress had been made. Even that progress would justify these conferences because it does provide a developing consensus on one of the issues that has bedevilled, at least in the minds of many, the whole field of federal-provincial relations.

The federal government, through its spending power has moved into fields of exclusive provincial jurisdiction with shared cost programs. Here is a method proposed by which a consensus could be reached before that power would be used. That is number seven.

8. Number eight was at the last conference, an initiation of consideration of income security and social services. That began with the third conference in December 1969 and will continue. I want to come back to the question of social services and income security. It is surprising that the members of the NDP would suggest that there has been no attention to social needs when the first document in the field of the distribution of powers was directed to the whole question of how the power in the field of income security and social services should be exercised between the government of Canada and the governments of the provinces.

The NDP accuses us of not dealing with social needs at the constitutional conference. The Leader of the Opposition asked, "why have you chosen welfare?" We have chosen it, however, and I want to say something more about it.

9. The ninth achievement that I would lay down is that, as in all processes involving bargaining, there have been a lot of issues clarified and a lot of positions placed on the table. Positions have been taken by the provinces and by the federal government. The federal government insofar as issues already dealt with, had made its position fully known, the Quebec government has made its position known totally, and many of the provinces are laying their positions on the table as well.

To suggest, as has been suggested by the Leader of the Opposition and the member for Peace River, that no progress has been made in this effort is to fly in the face of the facts and to take a position that can only be based on total misinformation or blind partisanship. No one else has done that. Certainly no premier. Most certainly, the premier of Nova Scotia, would not line up behind the opposition and say there has been no progress at all.

The Leader of the Opposition came close to suggesting that the federal-provincial conference, as an instrument of constitutional revision, should be junked altogether, that the provinces should be left out. This seemed to be what he suggested in one or two places in his speech. It may be, he said, that the committee will decide that the method chosen by the Prime Minister and the government is not working and that another method of approach, perhaps one quite substantially different, might well produce results. It is evident to all of us, he said, that the method of federal-provincial conferences is not working, and he invited the committee to junk it and find something else. I read the speech not once, but twice, and it left an area of doubt as to whether the Leader of the Opposition really believed that the provinces should be included at all in this whole process of constitutional reform.

I conclude this part of my speech by asking the Leader of the Opposition if he believes that the nine areas I have discussed are meaningless, useless and trivial, and that no progress at all has been made?

The Leader of the Opposition moved on to ask why we selected welfare rather than pollution, for example, for discussion at the constitutional conference. I am sure that if we had selected pollution as the first item in the field of distribution of powers, he would have asked why we had not chosen the important field of social welfare.

I want to move into the subject a little bit by asking the Leader of the Opposition whether he is an adherent of the school of the instant constitution, and that someday there will arrive on his desk by some miracle a full blown constitution with all subject matters delineated perfectly for him. Does he believe that the re-writing of the Canadian constitution involves a consideration of each subject matter, a discussion of each power and a decision on each power as to whether it ought to be exercised exclusively by the federal or provincial governments, or concurrently, or in some other manner? If that is the answer, as I think it is, then one must start somewhere and choose among the many important and complex areas such as income, security and social services, economic growth, pollution, housing, urban transportation, the credit system, the financial markets, education, resources management, labour relations and manpower, culture and communication, to mention some of the issues that have to be resolved in this process.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. minister but I am afraid his time has expired. Is there unanimous consent to allow the minister to continue?

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, let me say on a point of order, as one who has become involved with the number of speakers for today, that we are going to run into extreme difficulty. We have a long list of important speakers. May I suggest that each speaker be allowed to take one or two minutes to complete his remarks or finish a sentence or two, but no more. I appreciate that this courtesy was granted yesterday, but I feel we will be in trouble if we allow more than an extra minute or two.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All I can do at this point is ask whether there is agreement to allow the hon. minister to continue. The minister might bear in mind the recommendations of the hon. member.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I agree that there is a time limitation. I thank hon. members for their courtesy in granting a minute or two, but I believe I should rest my case at this stage and let other hon. members, possibly some of the leaders in the opposition, indicate what their position is on some of these points.

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, when one enters the debate at this stage one finds himself in the rather unenviable position of having to discuss matters which have already been very thoroughly discussed by the speakers who have preceded him, all of whom are very knowledgeable on the subject matter of the resolution. I am not quite sure at this point whether I should include the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen) in that category. I must say I was very disappointed because I thought, as a minister of the crown, he would make some valuable contribution to the subject matter of this resolution rather than devote all of his time to a criticism of the points put forward yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield).

I listened yesterday with a great deal of interest to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). As he led off this debate, I was forced to come to the conclusion that this resolution is on the order paper today and is being debated in this house now, not because the Prime Minister of Canada has any burning desire to present a revised constitution to the people of Canada, but rather and perhaps only because oppoisition parties in this House and many of the premiers in Canada have been pressuring him now for many years to do this very thing. It is only now, at this late date, that he has got around to doing it. Let me quote in support of that proposition from his speech of yesterday. We find at page 2811 of Hansard that he is recorded as having said:

> Indeed, parties of the opposition have pressed the government for many months, and even over a period of two sessions, to set up this committee. I believe that this reflects on the part of hon. members a very great desire of participating in the constitutional debate taking place in this country.

He does not point out that he has any great desire to press this matter or to take part in this debate.

Again, at page 2812 of Hansard, in speaking of the conference called by Premier Robarts, the Prime Minister is recorded as stating:

> Not only did we not participate in the 1967 conference, but in the years prior to that we had taken the very clear position that the constitution was not the most urgent thing to be dealt with, that there were many problems facing Canadians which could be dealt with under the British North America Act. Although we were not prepared to discuss the subject, we urged the provinces and the public at large to regard these exercises with a certain amount of deliberation.

To me, that is a very clear indication that had it not been for pressure put on the Prime Minister and the Government of Canada by opposition parties in this House, and had it not been for the pressure put on him by the premiers of Canada, this resolution would never perhaps have appeared on the Order Paper, or at least not for a long time. I suggest that the Prime Minister of Canada need not be afraid of constitutional amendment as such, and he particularly need not believe that by introducing amendments to the constitution he is breaking new ground.

History tells us, if we examine it, that during the years from 1774 to 1867, during the period that Canada was under British rule, the British Parliament saw fit to adopt four different constitutions. From 1774 to 1791, we had the Quebec Act. From 1791 to 1840 we had the constitutional Act. From 1840 to 1867 we were governed by the Act of Union, and from 1867 to the present time we have been governed by the British North America Act. Let me point out to the Prime Minister through you, Mr. Speaker, that since the British North America Act was enacted in 1867 we have had at least 30 constitutional amendments.

The constitution is not an eternal document and it was never intended as such. It is indeed an important document, and certainly one which we must adhere to and respect while it is in effect. But there is nothing so sacrosanct about it that it cannot, and indeed should not, be changed when it ceases to fit in with the needs of the times, or when it ceases to do the job it was originally intended to do. Things have changed since 1867. For example, the relationships between the federal and provincial governments have changed, and at least certain elements of the constitution by reason of these changes are now in need of review.

Yesterday the Prime Minister said that a great deal of preparatory work must go into this matter of constitutional change and amendment. I agree with that statement. This is certainly not a job which can be undertaken lightly. All aspects of constitutional change must be looked at and looked at very carefully, but they need not all necessarily be looked at at once. I suggest that priorities should be set up.

I agree that the British North America Act is a rather closely knit document and that one section of it is more or less interrelated with the other, but that does not necessarily rule out the advisability of first considering those parts of the document—and there are some—which already have been the source of discontent between the provinces and the federal government. One of those sources of discontent, and perhaps one of the more prominent ones, is the spending power of the federal government—the power of the federal government to make grants of any kind in areas considered exclusively provincial jurisdiction.

For example, I have in mind health and welfare, education, roads and things like these which are ordinarily considered to be matters exclusively within provincial jurisdiction. There is an element of uncertainty as to whether or not the federal government has the power to grant money to the provinces for these particular things. This uncertainty must be clarified as quickly as possible in respect of any constitution which may be drawn up. I suggest that the spending powers of the federal government must be clearly and unequivocally set out so that there can be no question but that the government of Canada constitutionally is free to help the poor provinces financially.

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration said this is now mentioned in the preamble. He made a great to-do about how much had been accomplished so far. I would point out to the minister that these matters have been pressed on the federal government by the premiers of the provinces of Canada now for some three or four years, and up until now no concrete action has been taken by the government of the country to bring these matters before the House of Commons. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration even bragged about how much this government has done in the line of constitutional amendments. It must be very definitely set out that this Parliament will have the power constitutionally to make grants to the poorer provinces of Canada even in those areas which are now considered to be areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

Sections 91, 92 and 93 of the British North America Act enumerate the respective exclusive powers of the Parliament of Canada and the provincial legislatures. Sections 92 and 93 specify and detail the matters upon which this Parliament may not legislate. Section 91 sets out those matters upon which the provincial legislatures may not legislate. Section 91, for example, reserves to the Parliament of Canada—and this is specifically written into the section—such matters as post offices, defence, fisheries, banking, the criminal law and so on. As a matter of fact, there are some 28 items enumerated in that section as being the exclusive right of the Parliament of Canada. Sections 92 and 93, on the other hand, reserve some 20 or more items to the provincial legislatures only. Right now the battle between the provinces and the federal government—and there is a battle—is over the distribution of federal subsidies to the provinces. I suggest, in the interest of the provinces, especially the poorer provinces, this is a matter which must first be clarified; that is, whether or not the government of Canada has the right to divert money to the provinces in respect of matters which under the British North America Act are now matters of exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

Section 91 1A reserves to the Parliament of Canada the right to make laws respecting public debts and property. This has been interpreted by the Supreme Court of Canada as giving to Parliament the power to grant sums of money to the provinces. That decision was appealed to the Privy Council. The Privy Council cast some very serious doubt as to whether, under our present constitution, the Parliament of Canada may divert money for these purposes. I should like to read very briefly from the judgment delivered by the Privy Council. It is found in 1937 Appeal Cases at page 366. This is what the Privy Council said:

> But assuming that the Dominion has collected by means of taxation a fund, it by no means follows—

Listen to this:

> —that any legislation which disposes of it is necessarily within Dominion competence. It may still be legislation affecting the classes of subjects enumerated in Sec. 92 and, if so, would be ultra vires. In other words, Dominion legislation, even though it deals with Dominion property, may yet be so framed as to invade civil rights within the Province or encroach upon the classes of subjects which are reserved to provincial competence.

Interpreted strictly, this decision means that Parliament absolutely cannot legally make grants of any kind in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. This is what the Supreme Court decision says.

Mr. Lewis: Surely not; that is not what it says.

Mr. McQuaid: That is what it says. It says, for example, this would mean, if we go by the provisions of the British North America Act and the decision of the Privy Council, that strictly speaking federal funds cannot be diverted, for example, to education, welfare, highways and civil rights. I agreed that this is being done, and certainly the provinces are not taking any exception to it. I am afraid, however, that if this is not clarified immediately in our constitution, some day some government—I am not suggesting this government—may say, "We do not need to give you any money because the constitution says that, strictly speaking, we should not give it to you". This would be very much to the disadvantage of the poorer provinces of Canada.

Let us not forget that today we live in a federal state. All of us, no matter in what province we may happen to live, are Canadians. Each of us is entitled to enjoy the same essential public services that are being enjoyed by other citizens of Canada in the richer provinces. Unfortunately, however, the tax raising potential of our provinces differs greatly and this difference arises out of the marked difference in the level of income across this country.

[Mr. McQuaid.]

I should like, if I may, to cite one or two examples to show that this is actually the case. Listen to this. The average weekly wage in Canada is $114. In the Atlantic area it is $91.37. I wonder how many members know what it is in Prince Edward Island. In Prince Edward Island, it is $75.97, which is $38.06 below the Canadian average. This compares to the Canadian average of $114. Every winter in my province between 15 per cent and 20 per cent of the people are unemployed. These figures are from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. Half the farmers of Prince Edward Island have a gross income—not net—of $2,500 a year. As an indication of how heavily dependent we are on Ottawa I wish to point out that right now 62 per cent of our gross provincial revenue comes from the government of Canada.

Certainly, as one of the poorer provinces of Canada we cannot take any chance in respect of whether or not the Government of Canada has the constitutional right to transfer funds to the extent of 62 per cent of our revenue in order to help us. We have a total direct and guaranteed debt in Prince Edward Island of $107,635 thousand. That is a per capita debt of $970. This is one of the highest per capita debts in Canada. I suggest, in considering amendments to the constitution, the preservation of linguistic rights, revisions of the Senate and Supreme Court, the incorporation into the constitution of a bill of human rights and all such things are tremendously important, but there is nothing more important to the constitution than a guarantee that all the people of Canada will be able to enjoy the same essential public services irrespective of the provinces in which they happen to live. Canadian society must have no second class citizens. We cannot afford to have second class citizens in this country.

In the examples I cited I set out very clearly I think that we in the Atlantic area, by reason of the fact that we do not have the same means of earning income as people in other parts of Canada,—not that we do not want to or are not anxious to work—cannot contribute to our provincial treasuries to enable them in turn to provide us with all our essential public services. We must have financial help from Ottawa, and I say that this help must be guaranteed in our constitution. Let us leave no doubt about it. I would suggest also that in considering amendments to the constitution we must give high priority to ensuring that there is absolutely no doubt that the Parliament of Canada has the right to transfer to the provincial governments money that can be used for things which are ordinarily matters under provincial jurisdiction. This is part of regional development.

We hear the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) making a big to-do about all that this government will do on behalf of regional development, but nothing has been done yet. Action must be taken immediately by his department or by some department of the federal government to reduce the gap between the rich and the poor provinces of Canada. This is a national problem and there is need for a national program to correct it. This is the reason I say that one of the highest priorities must be given to amending the constitution in such a way as to allow the federal government unequivocally, and without any doubt, to transfer moneys to the provinces. Therefore, I say that in any new constitution the spending power of the government of Canada must be clarified to provide, without any shadow of doubt, the federal government with the right to help the poor provinces. The federal government must retain that power to help the poor provinces.

As I said before, there must be an equalization of opportunity for all Canadians, irrespective of the province in which they live. There is no room in our Canadian society for great disparities between the opportunities available to individual Canadians no matter where they live. Reasonable standards of living for all Canadians must be maintained, and in amending our constitution we must make sure of this.

This principle was recognized by our former prime minister, the Right Hon. Lester Pearson when in 1968 he addressed the federal-provincial conference. This is what he said:

> We believe that the government of Canada must have the power to redistribute income, between persons and between provinces, if it is to equalize opportunity across the country. This would involve, as it does now, the right to make payments to individuals, for the purpose of supporting their income levels—old age security pensions, unemployment insurance, family allowances—

There is no question about that because they have been provided by the constitution. He went on to say:

> —and the right to make payments to provinces, for the purpose of equalizing the level of provincial government services. It must involve, too, the powers of taxation which would enable the federal government to tax those best able to contribute to these equalization measures. Only in this way can the national government contribute to the equalization of opportunity in Canada, and thus supplement and support provincial measures to this end.

The whole point I am attempting to make is that our constitution must guarantee to the federal government the right to do these very things which the Right Hon. Mr. Pearson outlined to the conference in 1968. This is a matter of immediate urgency, one that must be attended to at once. I, therefore say, despite what the Minister of Manpower and Immigration said a few minutes ago about all the preambles in the constitution and about how much debate there has been on this matter, let us get on with the job immediately. Let us draft a constitution which will ensure both a strong federal government and also strong provincial governments, each with access to sufficient fiscal resources—and this is important—to meet their proper responsibilities, and each operating in a fashion that does not impair the freedom of the others.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, among the tasks we have to perform and the challenges we shall have to meet in the years to come, finding solutions to constitutional problems is of paramount importance. I have deemed it to be normal, and indeed my duty as a French-speaking Canadian, to participate in this debate, without claiming to bring final solutions, but solely with a view to offering my services.

As a federal member from a Quebec riding, I have long been interested in constitutional matters, and although I have had the honour of sitting in the nation's Parliament for less than two years so far, I believe it is possible for us to sit at the same table and, notwithstanding our political affiliations, to find a harmonious and effective solution agreeable to all Canadians.

Institutions are, in a sense, the mirror of the times when they are born and brought into operation. They reflect the various forms that man gives to society, according to his concept of organized life and of the objectives which should be aimed at. Because institutions reflect ideas and needs more or less linked with certain periods in history, they are constantly exposed to changes, as are the realities which inspired their creation.

Federalism does not escape that law of evolution. One can even assert that owing to the greater participation of citizens in public affairs, which is demanded by the complexity of its structures, the federal system is, more than any other type of political society, aware of the economic and social evolution, and it is also more apt to find the necessary solutions.

Federalism varies with times and countries, offering a wide variety of solutions consistent with its basic needs. The 19th century, which saw the rise and strengthening of the first modern federal systems, offers more than one form of federalism.

At the present time, a score of states, among which seven of the eight largest countries of the world are to be found, live under a federal system. There are only two with an identical constitution. However, it is a fact acknowledged by all: namely that Germany and the United States, which at present have a federal system, enjoy the world's highest standard of living. It is therefore easy to conclude that, by itself, federalism can be a source of wealth or poverty according to whether people accept or refuse to apply it as it should be applied.

Federalism is certainly not beyond the reach of violent crises because some federations have broken up during the last decade. However, thanks to the close relationships which the parties to a federative state normally maintain between themselves, they can generally find before it is too late the solutions likely to prevent the downfall of their association. As long as an institution is successful in adapting to new realities and operating efficiently, without going against its character, it has every chance of overcoming internal conflicts and surviving changes imposed by circumstances.

I believe the time has come for us to stop throwing words around and to take concrete action. As Canadians of various ethnic origins, are we willing to co-operate and to accept each other as equal partners? It is not incumbent only on me or on my colleagues to answer, but on the whole population.

For some time, I have been hearing from some opposition members innuendoes which would indicate that they do not look favourably upon French-speaking Canadians actually assuming their part in Parliament. I would like to know what they think exactly. I wish they would stop talking about Quebec and French-speaking Canadians. What I am interested in is what they think and what means they are ready to take to save national unity.

We French-speaking Canadians have given clear proof of our willingness to work to the limit of our strength to preserve this country, but we are not ready to go on unless we are regarded as first class citizens. I feel that most hon. members, on the government side or in the opposition, would like such effort to be made by all equally, but I do not appreciate the innuendoes of some of my colleagues in the opposition, who should speak their minds. If they are not satisfied with this government, if they take offence because French Canadians are playing a leading part and if they do not trust them, they should say so. But if, on the other hand, they are really willing to work, they should give us some proof to that effect.

Yesterday, my hon. friend the member for York South (Mr. Lewis) mentioned, as an example, an incident which occurred in Quebec and from which certain people might draw erroneous conclusions. He said that the Quebec government had refused English-speaking Canadians another English school. I wish to say to my hon. friend that if, following his example, I tried to find out how the minorities of other provinces have been treated, I would have a lot to say. As a matter of fact, my hon. friend, for whom I have great respect, is intelligent enough to recognize that, in Quebec, the minorities are better treated than anywhere else, and that, if all minorities in Canada were treated like the ones in Quebec, the problems facing us today would not exist.

It may not be wise to be forever looking back to the past instead of looking forward to the future, but one must remember that confederation, as history teaches us, has not been, like the Proclamation of Independence of the United States, the dramatic result of a fight for liberation, but rather the outcome of hard discussions carried out during more than three years by parliamentarians who were not threatened by any war, either at home or abroad.

In Upper Canada, which was the inspiring centre of the system inaugurated in 1967, people had been complaining for a long time about the powerlessness of the two majorities system created by the Act of 1840. They were complaining all the more bitterly since the population of Upper Canada, indifferent to the rights of the majority as long as its population was lower than that of Lower Canada, suddenly awakened, as soon as it had the majority, to the democratic seductions, that of the greatest number. The political leaders of Upper Canada were also concerned about the rise of the American power. They could not think of any other way to face this peril except by uniting in a single Dominion all the British colonies scattered in North America.

As a matter of fact, what presided over the drafting and the signature of the confederative pact? On this point, history does not say much, but I think that I am expressing the truth in saying that English-speaking Canadians felt that on the main points they had kept what was essential to them, especially the guarantee of a strong central government. French-speaking Canadians on the other hand were convinced that they had preserved for the future what in their view could not be left to the care of a central government.

To both sides history has brought many disappointments. Those who had dreamed of an all powerful central government were to be deceived for instance by some decisions of the Privy Council which tended to confirm and to extend the sovereignty of the provincial governments and by the everlasting vitality of a strong autonomist movement in Quebec.

Those who had dreamed of a central government respectful of the authority of the provinces and of the rights of minorities often had to face one which dared not fulfil its constitutional duties towards minorities and which much too often was unscrupulous regarding the sovereignty of the provinces.

The present government is the first one, it seems to me, that really concerns itself about the protection of the rights of minorities, the recognition of biculturalism and bilingualism and the defence of provincial rights. If the present government seeks to protect those fundamental rights, we must not be satisfied with temporary conditions.

We want—and I think that I am thus expressing the views of the majority of French-speaking Canadians—those conditions to become permanent, we want them to be written down, in order to prevent the recurrence of past events.

It was the wish in 1867 to merge two separate wills in a new one. Sir Georges-Etienne Cartier had spoken in this connection of a new political nationhood. The strongest community invited to unite its political destiny did it unreservedly. The weakest community, however, did not adhere to the new plan without some reserves, being almost equally divided between two currents of thought. The tendency in favour of a full commitment in the federal experience has generally won during the past century the support of French Canadians at federal elections.

The other tendency, with various degrees of intensity, has found its main center of action in Quebec. This ambivalence has certainly been detrimental to Quebec and often delayed progress in Canada.

I am the first one to recognize that Quebec has failed to appreciate federalism. Hon. members from Quebec have the responsibility to show federalism under its true light and to make French-speaking Canadians understand that this system is in a position to help them provided they accept it fully and not half-heartedly.

It is well to blame those who do not try to make federalism better known but I think that it is up to us as members of political parties and members of the House, whatever our political affiliations, to make real federalism known.

That is what we are doing now in the province of Quebec. Hon. members from Quebec are touring the province to explain, to the young in particular, the advantages federalism is likely to bring them.

We agree that federalism is not perfect. I was listening recently to a member from the Ralliement créditiste talking about the Liberal party. I wish to point out to him that this idea has not been authored by the Liberal party and that if he wants to join us, he would be welcomed, but on one condition—if he is able to accept it—that he will not turn the future of the country into a political issue and that he will truly deal with the things that unite us instead of the ones that divide us.

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member for Lapointe allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. Marceau: Gladly, Mr. Speaker, provided it is not too long.

Mr. Dumont: Would the hon. member give the names of those who travel throughout Quebec and Canada explaining the nature of the constitution?

Mr. Marceau: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend, whom I hold in high esteem, does not read the papers, although I see one before him just now. If he looked for information, he could easily find out that there is nothing secret about what we are doing. Good Liberals travel throughout the province in order to inform people and if he wants to find out their names, he can easily do so.

Mr. Dumont: How many of these people are there? What are their names?

Mr. Marceau: Mr. Speaker, I feel that it would not be appropriate to mention the names right now but after my speech, if the hon. member wants to come to me I shall be pleased to give him the names of those involved in this work.

Mr. Dumont: They are all Liberals.

Mr. Marceau: Naturally.

Mr. Dumont: Naturally.

Mr. Marceau: Mr. Speaker, we are in power and naturally, we are supposed as a responsible government to come to the aid of the population, and that is what we are doing. My hon. friend cannot blame us for that situation, and hon. members of the opposition cannot rail against the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) because he has personal views on the constitution. Were the members of the opposition to have views as original and as constructive as the Prime Minister's, the problem would perhaps be settled more easily. I find it somewhat odd to see people blame a man for showing leadership, expressing views, and building something, by saying precisely that he has no inventive ideas.

Of course, when one has no original ideas to offer, one can merely criticize those who have.

In the few minutes at my disposal, I would like to outline what our constitution should hold and express briefly a few basic ideas.

To my mind, the preamble to the Canadian constitution should outline a certain number of principles typical of its spirit and define its nature and aims so as to facilitate its interpretation. The main purpose of the constitution of a country is not merely to establish political structures and a form of government. It should also have an educational value. It must instil in the whole population feelings of pride and loyalty, be conducive to understanding and friendship, and favour full cooperation in the pursuit of a common ideal. It should be founded on certain essential premises—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Marceau: Mr. Speaker, I regret, of course—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hon. member cannot continue his remarks, unless he gets unanimous consent of the House.

[Mr. Dumont.]

An hon. Member: Go on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member be granted leave to continue his remarks?

An hon. Member: For two minutes.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Marceau: I thank my hon. colleagues. I wish I could discuss this subject at length. I hope I shall have the opportunity to do so in the proposed committee I would like to see established.

Before concluding I should like to say that I have faith in the new committee, that will be set up to offer my full co-operation and, above all, to ask my English-speaking colleagues, whom I trust entirely, to have talks with us and to work for the unity of this country of which we are proud and which, we must recognize it, is envied by many others.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, in early fall when the session began I had the opportunity of asking that a debate be held on the constitution during this session. Today I am very glad to take part in this debate.

I have no hesitation at all in telling the House that I am in favour of a constitutional review. This is also an excellent opportunity for any member to voice his opinion, make suggestions and shed light on the problems and the difficulties confronting us. Having a better knowledge of these problems, I think we shall be more likely to solve them.

First of all, I should like to mention that the constitution of 1867 is at times not satisfactory. It therefore has too often been a source of misunderstanding and conflict rather than an instrument of cohesion and harmony. It seems to us that respect for the fundamental law of the country is one of the first requirements of Canadian life. But the constitution must be such as to command this respect, as well through its nobility of thought as its clarity.

For the first time in their history, Canadians are undertaking to give themselves a wholly Canadian constitution, made in Canada, for Canadians. From this great undertaking must result, not only government institutions and regulations that are perfectly adapted to the present needs of our country, but also a new spirit and new habits of co-operation and solidarity.

As a member from Quebec, I might be inclined to speak more particularly of the Quebec responsibilities or difficulties within that federal system. I hope the other members do the same for, to my mind, it is their duty to do so.

Quebec, which in our vast country is considered by the Laurendeau-Dunton Commission as the home of the French Canadian nation, has not only the right but the duty to find means of emancipation. Just as the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) did so brilliantly a moment ago, I invite all the members from Quebec to express their views that there might be a better understanding of the wishes and aspirations of Quebec as well as the means to which Quebecers can resort to feel secure in this large country and confident they are first-class citizens.

There have also been some things said about federal-provincial conferences. I believe such conferences are necessary even if they have not given so far the anticipated results. I hope their number will increase as they give the provincial premiers an opportunity to meet one another, to know and understand each other better and to accept more willingly the disparities that exist between the various provinces and regions.

Our position in the province of Quebec shows easily enough the special situation of French culture in Canada and in North America. If the French Canadians were a minority everywhere in Canada, including Quebec, cultural equality would be difficult to reach and the present concept of French Canada would be much different from what it is now.

The fact that 83 per cent of French-speaking Canadians are living in Quebec, where they represent 81 per cent of the population, allows them to develop their own institutions as well as an environment that suits their particular culture. That is where the chances for achieving cultural equality spring from, as indicated in the report of the Laurendeau-Dunton Commission, namely in subsections 83, 89 and 90.

Such equality is possible since a French Canadian society managed to be born, to thrive and to develop and also to acquire the distinct traits and institutions which contrive to make a true people—which cannot be said of any other ethnic minority in Canada.

While all governments should, to various degrees, do their best to bring about such equality, the demographic reality and the political and historical development of Canada will still invest the government of Quebec with special responsibilities in this respect, whether we like it or not.

Obviously, the fact involves, for the future, recognition of a special status for the province of Quebec. However, Quebec should have all the necessary powers and means of action to go on assuming its responsibilities towards the French Canadian nation.

Nonetheless, Quebec does not object to the other provinces enjoying the same powers and means of action if they wish. The notion of a special status will appear only if the other provinces or some of them prefer to entrust the central government with or to discharge jointly with it the tasks that the province of Quebec must take upon itself by reason of its particular situation.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said yesterday that courage, patience and dedication will have to be exercised. I think that all hon. members are courageous. Patience, in the case of some of them, has limits. Dedication is called for, I think, when such a question is under discussion.

I have nevertheless the courage to talk about a certain political climate and to deal with the dissatisfaction of the people in my province. Dissatisfaction could also exist elsewhere.

On account of the economic conditions which are sometimes unfavorable, unemployment in Quebec has done great harm and is the cause of some discontent. It must be frankly said that such discontent is perhaps due to the reluctance of the Canadian Parliament to bring in certain amendments to the constitution.

This wavering on the part of Parliament has, in the last several years, prompted a number of Quebecers to believe that the separation of Quebec from the rest of the country would be advantageous for their province. I am not convinced of that, but I think it is necessary to tell things as they are, and we are already assured, on account of the dissatisfaction that prevails in Quebec, that when the next provincial election comes around, 10 per cent of the people will vote in favour of separation. This position reveals the extent of the need to review the constitution in order to enable the people of Quebec to believe in a better future and opportunities for emancipation, for the French Canadian nation and for all other Canadians, because such a future can be found in confederation.

The committee will certainly have to assume responsibility for making this Parliament aware that special arrangements will be necessary for Quebec, and for other regions as well. I feel sure that the committee, after consulting with representatives of all the provinces and with people who carry heavy responsibilities within certain municipalities, will recognize how important it is to obtain the participation of the people of Canada in order to determine the kind of constitution best suited to meet the requirements of all Canadians.

Hon. members should be asked not to be shocked when they hear from time to time that the province of Quebec intends to retain its French character.

Actually, they should stop being concerned when they hear that Quebec wants to establish French as its working language.

• (4:30 p.m.)

I readily recognize, as do all other Quebecers, that in Ontario English is the first language because the situation in that province demands it. French is being recognized as a second language.

The same situation prevails in Quebec where we want to keep our French language and increasingly to improve it. We are also prepared—as many Quebecers have proved it—to accept English as a second language.

These things must be said in the House, and I think that with a great deal of sincerity, we will finally convince not only most Canadians but all of them to accept the fact that the province of Quebec represents the French element in our bicultural country and that the other nine provinces will always keep English as their first language but will accept French as a second language, which makes me very happy.

The hon. member for Lapointe mentioned earlier that the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) had made about us what I would call an unpleasant reference. Having taken note of it I realized that I had not been the only one to notice it. Yesterday, the hon. member for York South said that in the province of Quebec, some people were concerned about the fact that, next year, 3,000 English-speaking students will be unable to be admitted to CEGEPs. I object to that statement and I cannot help but state my views in that respect.

The hon. member for York South stated, and I quote:

> I deliberately cited this example of retrograde behaviour on the part of the government of Quebec to underline the difficulties which are now being created—

Certainly there are difficulties in the province of Quebec but they are surely not due to any ill-will on the part of the government.

[Mr. La Salle.]

I know the present premier of Quebec too well to say that he can be charged with preventing, through ill-will, the English-speaking students of Quebec from being admitted to CEGEPs.

Of course, since 1960, there has been in Quebec, in the field of education, such a rapid expansion that the government has been unable to build enough schools. But, in my opinion, if some English-speaking students of Quebec find it difficult to be admitted in the schools, the French-speaking students have as many difficulties when they want to register at the universities.

I have to make these remarks about the speech of the member for York South because I am convinced that the province of Quebec does not intend to do any harm whatsoever to the minorities. Far from it. Indeed, the past shows that Quebec always had much respect for its minorities and that it has always proved that all the minorities were welcome in Quebec.

I would like to mention especially that the committee should not forget to consult, first, the provinces. This practice of appointing commissions or committees for various inquiries has shown too often that the provinces were not taken into account and the central government has often been blamed, unfortunately, for taking decisions without previous consultation with the provinces.

The relations the government of Quebec has entered into now and then with some foreign countries, are also causing concern, as was mentioned yesterday.

To my mind, since Quebec is the home of the French Canadian nation, it must absolutely have contacts with some French-speaking countries. I suppose this could be done in co-operation with the central government, which should show some understanding in this regard and recognize that a province such as ours ought to negotiate and sign agreements with the other French-speaking countries.

For years, members from Quebec and the government of that province have been asked what they really wanted. I think that for quite a while Quebec has been clear and precise about its intentions and its needs. In its recent brief on the constitution, it explained why it considered essential that the provinces have sole responsibility over social security. The coexistence of two governments prevents efficient planning in the field of social security, gives rise to the establishment of inconsistent programs and leads to administrative overlapping and wasting.

The whole social security provisions bear a direct relation to the culture of the people and enable them to express themselves collectively. The Quebec community can no more be deprived of its social security system than of its legal or educational systems.

The assigning of the entire responsibility of social security to the provinces can, through proper financial mechanisms, be consistent with a fair redistribution of income and the mobility of workers throughout Canada as well as with efficient economic policies.

The mechanism for the delegation of powers, the establishment of which has been proposed, will enable the provinces wishing to do so to entrust the central government with the discharge of some of those duties.

Quebec has no right to commit its future according to the wishes of a majority. Besides, I was blaming its authorities for leaving to the central government all responsibilities for the future of the French Canadian people.

The principles which must guide the originators of a healthy federal constitution are first the rational allocation of powers, then a joint action, with the possibility of exceptions, when the jurisdiction is not readily obvious, or when the motives of the various member states do not result from the same requirements or the same priorities.

That implies, on the one hand, a review of the allocation of exclusive jurisdictions under sections 91 and 92 of the present constitution, and, on the other hand, the establishment of a concurrent list on taxation and the distribution of public funds, with the possibility of exception for any province.

It will be enough to mention that such a notion of a federal constitution, while safeguarding almost the whole list of present federal powers, institutionalizes certain practices adopted until now by our governments, practices which, under foreseen conditions, seem to be much better juridical formulas than those found elsewhere, because they recognize, on the one hand, the principle of autonomy and, on the other, the principle of participation. Proving this would be beyond the scope of that section and, to be sure, only an entirely new constitution can reach this objective.

The constitutional documents of certain countries contain first class texts on the various subjects that have been mentioned. Germany, a federal state, has adopted a basic declaration of great interest. Italy, a unitary country with deeply-rooted regionalism, enshrines the principle of decentralization in her constitution. The USSR, a federal country with centralizing aims, grants her federated republics the acknowledgement of their cultural values in a manner probably unequalled in other texts. Australia, a federal country, offers an original formula for financing the states. The treaty of Rome, which may give rise to a federation, provides, from an economic standpoint, arrangements mostly derived from federalism while others represent interesting progress.

Mr. Speaker, I see that you are about to remind me that my time is up, but I still have one minute left.

The big advantage of a major overhaul of the constitution is that we shall be able to benefit by everything that has been done elsewhere, to digest it, to shape it to our own liking and to submit it to the nation for approval while adhering to the best principles and to the most efficient procedures. If Canada is not able to make very soon this effort of reflection and adaptation, it will have betrayed its past and gravely jeopardized its future.

The constitutional amendments which the committee will have to examine more closely may be classified into four categories of reforms: a clarification of the fiscal powers, in the light of the tasks with which the Quebec government must deal; the cultural equality between Canada's two linguistic communities both within the federal institutions and within those of the various provinces involved; the new distribution of powers between the government of Canada and that of Quebec which will enable the latter to fulfil its mission as the collective mainstay of the French Canadians and, by that very fact, to find once for all the link between Ottawa and Quebec; the formal acknowledgment of the rights of Quebec to conclude international agreements, after consultation with the government of Canada, in fields of provincial jurisdiction, and to participate in the work of the UN institutions specialized in those fields.

In reviewing the text of our constitution, we should take advantage of the occasion and express in modern language the general objectives of Canada, the jurisdictional basis for its administration and the distribution of powers between the two levels of government.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that we will effect these constitutional changes immediately which would contribute, if we act wisely, to the building of a fantastic country with well organized provinces where the emphasis is on co-ordination rather than federal centralization.

So, as the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) has pointed out, let us stop talking but let us work together and build a beautiful country.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

• (4:40 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. John Roberts (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, like other members who have already taken part in this debate I welcome the establishment of this committee. I welcome it particularly because it marks the recognition that constitutional reform is above all a political question and it must ultimately be settled by political processes. Constitutional reform is not simply a question to be left to bureaucrats, to legal experts, or even to governments. It is a process which must involve the participation of the Canadian people as a whole. At the root of this question is the formation of our political institutions, the decision-making institutions of our government. That involves elaboration of the kind of values which we wish to have guide our community in taking decisions. It is pre-eminently a political question and not one that can simply be left to experts.

When I say this is a political question, that is not to say it must necessarily be dominated by partisan political considerations. I was a little dismayed yesterday in the House when it seemed to me there was a disposition on the part of some members taking part in the debate to look for fault, to try to find out where errors were, to search for places where they could stick something unpleasant on the government or opposition as the case might be. It seems to me that if the committee is to work well it must search for the common ground. It must pursue the question of the constitution with attempts at understanding rather than by making points in a partisan way.

Nevertheless, it is the political system which must represent, and the parties which must represent, the various views which can be taken of constitutional reform. This is the way in which the question must be taken to the people.

It is understandable that we should now be considering this question very seriously. It is platitudinous, but nevertheless true, that after 100 years the British North America Act is not particularly suitable to the needs of this country. It has been a constitution which has been less flexible in adapting to changing circumstances, partially because it has no formal amending procedure and partially because it has been subjected to court review, or constitutional review—taking place in a context far from this country—which has often led to decisions which could, at best, be described simply as bizarre.

We now face, at least in my part of the country, some impatience with the process of constitutional review. I think this is eminently understandable because, in an age of instant coffee, and instant television, people often demand instant solutions to complex problems. We must explain, and I think it is the obligation of political parties to explain, that these are rather complex questions, that there are divergent views in various parts of the country on how they are to be resolved and that there are no quick and easy solutions to complicated problems.

I hope the committee will get down to involvement with people. It is, I understand, to travel throughout the country and I hope that political parties will take this opportunity of clarifying where they stand on some of the fundamental questions. One of these questions is often described in short form as the question of "special status", but more accurately should be described as a question of whether one province or some provinces are to have substantial legislative and administrative powers which are different from those of the other provinces. I think the government party has taken a fairly clear position on that. The other parties, it seems to me, have not. There is the whole question of what the relationship of the federal government should be to the urban communities, the urban governments in our society. It seems to me the government party has not taken as clear a position, and has not explained as clearly as I would have liked, its position on that constitutional question. Obviously, that is going to be of enormous importance as we go throughout the country and find out how people in the cities regard the role of the federal government in relation to the municipal governments.

There is also the question of the Bill of Rights which, it seems to me, we often simplify enormously by pretending it is only a question of protecting the fundamental rights of our citizens. In fact, it is a question of transferring to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court an enormous power of interpretation in many areas of fundamental political importance to our society. We must ask ourselves, as men in public life, whether it is the proper function of the courts to come to a determination on what are essentially political questions. It may very well be so, but we should be clear in our minds that in discussing a Bill of Rights we are also discussing a transfer of political power to the Supreme Court.

Yesterday, as always, I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) who described the participation of the various politicians who took part in the constitutional conference as participation of men of good will. He went on to say that really we were wrong in looking at this question as one of competition for power between the provincial governments and the federal government. It is not, he said, a question of power between the federal government and the provinces that confronts Canada. In all respect, Mr. Speaker, that is exactly the question. It is a question of the basic distribution of powers between the federal and provincial governments in this country which is at the root of the constitutional question. And in the constitutional conference we discuss these powers not simply in the abstract; it is not powers in some void about which we are talking. It is the powers which the politicians who are discussing the issues themselves hold at this particular point in time.

It is very difficult in those circumstances to have politicians not suspicious about the presentation of points of view by the other politicians who are sitting around the table. There is a story, Mr. Speaker, of two Renaissance cardinals, both great schemers. One of them was unfortunately carried away by the plague. When the news was reported to the other cardinal he said: "Dead; I wonder what his motive was". Now, politicians are not quite as suspicious as that, Mr. Speaker, but they are nevertheless very suspicious of the kind of powers and the claims to powers which other politicians make. It seems to me, this fact redoubles the emphasis we must give to this committee, to the involvement of the public in the question of constitutional reform. For in the end I suspect that the politicians, naturally sensitive to their own position, are not going to come to any easy agreement about what the proper distribution of powers among them is. It will take involvement of the public, and a view by the public as to what those powers should be—and eventually some attempt to find out what the public feels in an explicit way,—to give the moral authority to constitutional change which we require. It is, in other words, a process that cannot be left simply to politicians. We must in an active way find out what the viewpoint of the public is.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that we should not face this task, which is a long task and an arduous task, a difficult task, with any sense of dismay. To my mind this country has, through the decade of the sixties, been going through a process—not so slow,—of the real birth of the Canadian identity and the Canadian community. It is a decade in which the country has begun to come to terms with itself. During our past 100 years we have often been able to escape our political problems. We have been able to concentrate on the development of our resources, and when groups and classes in society have been frustrated they have been able to move to other parts of the country and start life anew. But in the last ten years we have had a coming together, and a recognition therefore of the problems that we face in the coming together. We are, it seems to me, finally developing a really sound political structure, one which takes into account the necessity of reconciling the views, often divergent views, of the various parts of our country.

The formation of a new constitution is part of this process, a process which will give perspective and form to decisions of government, one which will ensure that in coming to its decision the government will take into account various viewpoints and various parts of this country. That is the task in which the committee will be engaged. It is a task which they should pursue with optimism and hope.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, if we had been discussing the constitution as short a time as a year ago, I might have found myself in agreement with those who lean toward amending the constitution to make a strong central government even stronger. I would probably also have been among those who felt changes in the constitution were unnecessary. But since that time I have seen the government's intent spelled out in legislation, and heard it expressed in speeches and statements of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and others. I have seen something of the economic confusion and hardship that has followed upon a strong, aggressive central government determined to force its will upon the various regions of this country.

I saw at first hand, as an official observer for my party at the recent federal-provincial conference, something of our Prime Minister's purpose. It is obvious that he wants a strong central government—not strong in the sense commonly understood in the past, but strong in the sense of a dominant and domineering central government that would control, not only the various regions of Canada but individual Canadians to a great extent in every aspect of their social and economic life. This is apparent from the federal government's demands and its reaction to the attitude of the provinces at recent constitutional conferences. It is also apparent in legislation passed and pending in Parliament.

It appears to me to be a strong possibility at least that, using the combined provisions of the Estate Tax Act already passed, and the proposals in the white paper on tax reform yet to come, the government will effectively reduce individual Canadians to easily controlled and easily manipulated economic units. The net effect of such a combination of legislation will be to eliminate small businesses and small businessmen, and to prevent the creation of any reservoirs of individual capital so necessary for small business and power.

Other legislation, notably the proposed measure dealing with investment, will shackle business to government so that business decisions, even decisions concerning future investment, would be at the control of the central authority. When that day comes, Canada may well be, in everything but name, an authoritarian socialist state. There will be little purpose then debating the constitutional balance between Ottawa and the provincial capitals. Canada will be a monolithic unitary state, no matter what the constitution says or provincial governments may claim. To phrase it bluntly, Mr. Speaker, I believe that if the plans of this government are realized we will have a very strong central government authority verging on dictatorship.

To achieve this, Parliament may be progressively downgraded and pushed aside and the provinces bound even more closely in Ottawa's web by means of forced economic dependency, while individual Canadians would be reduced to ciphers. The country is to be governed by a small group of non-elected and non-responsible people, dominated by the Prime Minister of the day.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

There has been some talk recently about our adopting the United States form of presidential government. If we are not careful, we will be beyond the point of being able to exert a choice. Before we know it we could end up having a president, with all the powers of the United States president but without any of the checks and balances that restrain the holder of that office from exercising wilful and tyrannical power. I have said I believe this is the aim of the government. I would like to emphasize that I did not mean this was necessarily the aim of the government party as a whole. I speak only of the executive.

It has been obvious, almost from the time of the 1968 election, that many members of the government party were unhappy with the manner in which they were being led. Today, we are hearing more and more the voices of dissent from government ranks. In the circumstances, this may be the very worst time at which to discuss constitutional change. We may find ourselves asking who speaks for whom? However, if it is the will of the House to establish a committee to study this question, there are two areas that I would like to see given priority. These are constitutional safeguards against excessive assumption of power by the executive and safeguards to ensure the provinces the means and the exclusive right to deal with matters within their stated jurisdiction.

Such safeguards should also ensure that never again can a central government in Canada use economics as a means of imposing its will on defenceless provinces. We must make it impossible for the federal government to use financial coercion and turn the weaker provinces into financial peons. The unfortunate fact today is that the federal government, in one way or another, has saddled the provinces with a variety of welfare, health and educational programs that are poorly framed, ill-timed and vastly expensive to operate.

This might be one thing if our national economy had continued on the up-beat without soft spots or pauses. But with inflation ravaging the national economy, trade in many basic areas in the doldrums, unemployment and the cost of living soaring, the provinces are in trouble. Today, we are seeing the law of the jungle operating in the field of public finance. The battle, as ever, goes to the strong. The federal government has grabbed the lion's share of tax revenue, leaving the provinces and their dependent municipalities committed to huge expenditures and payments with only an over-burdened and inadequate share of the tax base upon which to raise the funds necessary.

I believe our constitution should provide safeguards against such dog-eat-dog economics and ensure fair shares for all levels of government commensurate with their degree of responsibility to the people of Canada. The more I see of our country today and the more I consider our current problems, the higher goes my regard to the Fathers of Confederation. They were shrewd, practical men who brought a minimum of emotion and a maximum of ingenuity and common sense to their task of providing a constitutional base for a new nation. Their assessment of Canada holds good today in my judgment. It was a nation of regions then and it is a nation of regions today.

Because they appreciated this fact, they provided that matters of the greatest regional concern be administered by regional or provincial governments. This was no accident. This was no compromise. This was not something confined only to the much smaller Canada of that day. This was an inspired method of providing flexibility in the constitutional and political field. I am convinced it is more of this flexibility that we need today, not less. The federal government has become progressively more involved in such fields as health, welfare and education, all of which are exclusively within the ambit of the provincial administrations. I believe they were deliberately placed there—and rightly so. They should be allowed to remain there now.

The federal government should confine itself simply and solely to providing what assistance is needed by individual provinces to keep their health, welfare and educational standards at or near a national level. I believe it is essential that the provinces have sufficient financial resources to enable them to establish and support their own set of priorities. No strings whatever should be attached to the financial assistance they are given. Their own citizens may be relied upon to police them. We may be sure, in these days of almost instantaneous information, that the people of any given province will know what others are receiving and will compel their government to give them the same, if they judge that their ability to carry such services is great enough.

If the people—the taxpayers—do not think that they can carry the load, it should not be imposed on them. It should not be imposed on them particularly by pressure exerted by some group of public servants who happen to cherish enthusiasm for some specific plan of social welfare. It seems obvious to me that democratic government must be a vehicle whereby people can govern themselves as they wish. In a country of widely differing regions such as ours, this means freedom of choice at the regional level. In a democracy there cannot be a mandate for any small group to tell the people what they should have.

It should not be difficult to arrive at an acceptable formula within the constitution that would provide unconditional federal grants as a matter of right to provinces requiring assistance in discharging their constitutional responsibilities. The financial status of any province and its potential for tax and other revenue can, today, be forecast with reasonable accuracy. Balanced against its requirements under the constitution, a figure for unconditional federal grants could then be calculated. Such a system, protected against manipulation or abuse by the constitution, would permit both levels of government to do their job without the continual bickering and bargaining that goes on today. It would effectively prevent the federal government from encroaching upon provincial fields of responsibility and leave full initiative and decision in these fields to the appropriate authority.

The massive sums of money now involved in this question of the Canadian provinces discharging their constitutional responsibilities greatly aggravates the situation and this aggravation will grow rapidly in the years immediately ahead. In 1967, the total expenditure of all governments on health, welfare and education was in excess of $10 billion. The Economic Council of Canada has estimated that, by 1975, this expenditure will have risen to about $19 billion annually. On the basis of these figures it is clear that, in 1967, the Canadian government spent about 16 per cent of the gross national product in areas strictly within provincial jurisdiction. If, as is forecast by the Economic Council, the GNP reaches the $100 billion mark by 1975, this percentage will have risen to the about 20 per cent of the GNP at that time. This gives you some idea of the magnitude of the financial question in relation to the constitution about which I have been talking. If we consider it wise that government expenditure not exceed 35 per cent, or so, of the gross national product then I think you can see how important this is.

In 1967, the federal, provincial and municipal governments spent a little better than $4 billion on education. According to the Economic Council this amount will more than double by 1975. The most important feature of these figures, however, is that the overwhelming proportion of these education costs will be for elementary and secondary schools, the principal educational responsibility of the provinces. If they are not provided the financial muscle to handle this responsibility and are permitted to sink to the level of puppets of Ottawa, then it will be the central government that will direct educational policy and administration in the provinces despite any facesaving formula that might be devised to give the illusion of continuing provincial autonomy. In existing circumstances only two or three of our ten provinces are in a position to carry this burden. The remainder are dependent on help from the federal government. Caught between the constitutional compulsion to provide adequate educational facilities and the staggering costs involved, many provinces are helpless to resist federal encroachment by means of conditional financial aid. It is often carefully hidden, but the federal initiative is a positive force in today's health, welfare and education programs.

This situation is directly contrary to the spirit of our constitution. There is little prospect of such provinces as Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Newfoundland, Saskatchewan or Manitoba being regarded as independent and resolute regional units within the Canadian confederation when inadequate resources make them subservient to the central government. A healthy and workable confederation demands a constitution that will restore the ideal measure of regional autonomy envisaged in the British North America Act. It may well develop that the old regional groupings, are outdated. Some measure of regional consolidation may now be required. But this would, in no way, change the conditions and demands of confederation. If, for instance, a union of the maritime provinces takes place and the three prairie provinces amalgamate, this would not change the essential nature of the new union regional governments in relation to our constitution. We would then simply have one regional government for the Atlantic area instead of four and one for the prairies instead of three. The requirement for regional administrations to answer the needs of the people would remain the same as ever.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

I should like to mention what is common talk these days, the alienation of the west. Everyone assumes this is a new situation. But it has been around for a long time. It is not just related to lack of sales for wheat. It is a natural outgrowth of the long history of federal governments who have regarded western Canada as a mere appendage to central Canada. Only in the years 1958-62 did western Canada assume any real significance in the affairs of the nation. Since then, it has reverted to its role of exporting its natural resources to fuel the economic machine of central Canada. The present government, schizophrenic in its central theme that Canada extends only a stone's throw from Montreal, has immeasurably strengthened the very strong suspicion that western Canada will receive no support from central Canada. If the country has developed on an east-west axis, now so far as the west is concerned the flow is north-south. If Canada is to remain a confederation, then it must be recognized that it is a nation of regions. Otherwise, if nothing else, it may fracture off at the Lakehead. The federal government, with its preoccupation with its central Canada outlook, must revise its thrust if Canada is to remain a confederacy in the next 100 years.

There are many other arguments for entrenching the rights of the provinces under the confederation agreement. These, no doubt, will be brought out in detail in the discussions of the committee should it be established. But, as I suggested earlier, I believe first priority should be given to consideration of ways to curb the power of the executive by constitutional safeguards. If we do not do this, if we do not find means of restraining the small ruling clique, we may be sure they will never allow any meaningful amendment of the constitution with regard to provincial rights. I hope the committee will be established. I hope it will be based broadly enough to take in all shades of opinion, both within the recognized political parties and without. I hope, too, that discussion will not be confined to a narrow agenda drawn up by the government or that the committee itself will be emasculated by a government majority and government chairman whose thoughts and actions are dictated by the executive.

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I find that when elected to the House of Commons we all seem to become instant experts. I gather it is inherent in politics that we be all things to all men and there is a tremendous compulsion to display full knowledge on any number of subjects in a very erudite fashion. I hope, Mr. Speaker, you will forgive me if, from time to time, in the course of my remarks, I indicate that I am somewhat unencumbered by a profound knowledge of constitutional politics, history and the law. But I do not apologize because in the last year and a half, and sometimes in this House, we have seen the political gods of this nation show an equal ignorance and lack of profundity. So, unimpeded by humility, I should like to reflect on two particular aspects of the resolution. The first is the method used to bring about constitutional change. Then, secondly, I should like to put forward some concept of what we might consider should be proposed in order to solve our chronic Canadian malady, the constitutional headache.

I think it is generally agreed that constitutional change is necessary. The constitution, being the root of all political and legal power, is the foundation upon which and within which our legal system operates. It must be flexible and at the same time unequivocal. The modern state, being complex, infringes tremendously at all levels of government on the rights of the individual. We must have a constitution which equally benefits and protects the citizen. The constitution adopted in 1867, as a result of judicial interpretation, the development of the double aspect theory, the water compartment theory and the restrictions on the peace, order and good government clause, is often interpreted by men out of the country with little knowledge of the nation or the nation's future. Coupled also with the evasion of the constitution by federal-provincial agreement, and a tactic of downright invasion by governments of other governmental spheres, we are left with a constitution which is at times almost impossible to decipher, which is obscure and which on many occasions cannot be determined.

Modern Canada is very different from Canada at the time the constitution was formed. In addition to that, I notice there are two distinct attitudes toward our constitution, largely dependent upon the region of the country from which one comes. Easterners generally consider the federal government to be the child of the provinces and therefore believe the provinces should be given appropriate powers. Westerners look at it in reverse. They consider their provinces to be children of the federal government and tend to accept more readily the centralization and consolidation of power in the federal authority.

I believe the government is to be complimented for proposing the formation of this committee and also for giving the priority it has to constitutional change. Although it might be criticized in the sense that it will interfere in an immediate solution to some of our problems, I think in the long run it will certainly simplify and expedite answers to these problems. The method adopted is the federal-provincial conference. Any method has drawbacks and any method can be criticized.

It is difficult to constructively criticize a method and suggest good solid alternatives. But having adopted the method, I believe those who are engaged in the conference perhaps should accept a little constructive criticism, even though it comes from an hon. member who is not an expert on it. At the outset, it appears to me that some of the observations made in the House yesterday by members of the opposition are quite justified. I get the feeling that I, as an average taxpayer and citizen, am a bystander to a confrontation between big governments whereby the governments squabble over the power to tax, the power to control my destiny, the power to infringe upon my rights and all too often drift away from the concept that it is not what is best for the federal or provincial governments with which I am concerned but rather what is best for me as an average citizen. The suggestion that the provinces should have more taxing power, it seems to me, should have been coupled with the suggestion that there should be an over-all control over taxation at all levels of government before such a suggestion is put forward.

I say that no matter what office you might hold, the problems must be considered from the point of view of the individual citizen first and what he might need and want as a citizen of this country. It should not be a squabble between two governments trying to determine which politician shall have the most power. Politicians are always loth to surrender power once they get into office, and they have a tendency to want more and more of it, rationalizing their demands from time to time without approaching the matter in a rational and objective manner.

It is regrettable that no mechanism was set up in these conferences whereby individual citizens and groups could be heard. Constitutional change should not be the prerogative of politicians—I agree with some of the speakers who have expressed that view. Party dogma, party philosophy and the more or less temporal tenure of political office should not be factors that warp and distort the validity of the results of constitutional conferences. It is certainly pleasing to see that this committee will be empowered to call witnesses and hear the views of the Canadian public.

Another criticism that might well be put forward about the method that was adopted is that there is too much parochialism. Premier Bennett, the great ringmaster of the Social Credit circus in British Columbia, suggested at one conference that the northern boundary of British Columbia should be extended to include part of the Yukon, if not all of it. But if he had been looking at this matter from the point of view of the national interest, he could equally well have suggested that the southern boundary of the Yukon should be extended down into British Columbia and that a new province should be created. I must say I do not think that Premier Bennett is known for his concept of nationalism and for thinking in national terms, certainly not in British Columbia.

I think that there has been a rather blatant display by people who came to perform and not to confer; people who, mindful of the fact that they are wearing their television makeup and are on national television, sometimes drift a little away from the fact that they are there to consider what we want to have in a new constitution. I suggest that the conferences have been used for the blatant, chauvinistic purposes of political gain in the old home town. I refer here to the attack on the white paper. I do not know what that had to do with the constitution. It is certainly contemporary in the political sense, but it is not part of the constitutional conference.

I am gravely concerned about in camera sessions. I think that secrecy in government affairs is dangerous, and I suggest that the political climate greatly differs now from what it was at the time of the Quebec and Charlottetown conferences which were held in camera. Perhaps there was far greater reason for secrecy then that there is now. I am worried about the tremendous influence that can be brought to bear by bureaucrats at in camera meetings, and the great tendency of politicians to accept decisions made by bureaucrats as being very erudite and cogent. I think we should all warn the delegates to these conferences that this country is unlikely to accept a constitution that is a fait accompli by decisions made in camera.

[Mr. Hogarth.]

I am rather disappointed that the terms of reference of this committee are confined to those declarations that have been made public. I look forward to seeing the person who is going to be able to confine that committee to its terms of reference. It will be a very interesting job indeed, but I do not think that the delegates will ever get away with presenting to the Canadian people a fait accompli constitution in the mêlée of a general election. The confrontation method leads to the intrusion of partisan politics in an approach to a new constitution. Provincial premiers, or perhaps even a prime minister, facing an election might take a rather different view if they did not have an election in the offing. For instance, the change in government in Manitoba brought about little change in attitude from the people in that province, and I do not think the people in that province really changed their minds so substantially about the constitution.

The criticisms I have made perhaps have more or less validity and cogency. I do not suggest that there is any adequate alternate way, but I am surprised that somebody has not given some consideration to the creation of a constitutional parliament, entirely objective in its deliberations, free of confrontation, independent of existing governments, representative of all regions, and empowered to listen to the people as well as to all levels of government.

Mr. Baldwin: And free of law professors.

Mr. Hogarth: Yes, and free of a few lawyers, too. This might not be a very valid alternative, but you have to admit it is a hell of a lot better than a revolution.

In dealing with these proposals for a new constitution, two matters of great importance should be noted: first, the entrenchment of civil rights in the constitution—I certainly welcome that suggestion—and second, the consideration of the division of powers, which are so essential in a federal state. I do not propose to dwell a great deal on the entrenchment of civil rights in the constitution. It is going to bring about a wholly new attitude toward legislation at all government levels, and certainly the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Drybones case, which was recently handed down, adds but a slight tremor to the earth shaking judicial decisions which will be handed down when civil rights are entrenched in the new constitution. It will be a money-maker for lawyers.

In dealing with the division between federal and provincial powers, we have to concede at the outset that the central or federal government should have the major instruments that are necessary to formulate the economic policy of the nation. The federal government must always be in a position to have its hands on the throttle of the economy of Canada. For instance, the attack on inflation should be primarily and exclusively something within the power of the federal government because it is a national problem.

Similarly, all problems that affect the national interest should rest with the federal government, and I would mention specifically foreign affairs. There should be adherence to the original concept that local governments should look after local and regional problems. The problem which arises, as I see it, is what happens when the local problems become so intense that they become of national concern—problems such as pollution, urban affairs, housing, consumer affairs, and standards of health. These things which were essentially local problems at one time have now become so national in their scope that they are considered to be problems of the whole of Canada.

For instance, according to the Hall report on medicare the reason the federal government entered the medicare field was, as the honourable judge suggested, that standards of health in Canada should be applied all across the country and therefore the federal government should act in this area. But the result has not been particularly satisfactory. It has not been what it would have been if the government had been able to act in a direct fashion without going into extensive consultations with the provinces. Sometimes such problems are very small in their subject matter and do not lend themselves to great, big, over-all reviews of the constitution. For instance, for years the Canadian Bar Association has been trying to set up a central registry for encumbrances and mortgages on aircraft but were continually met by the statement from the federal government that this would be unconstitutional.

In connection with all these problems, there must be a way in which the powers can be transferred from the provinces to the federal government and vice-versa, should the occasion in the contemporary scene demand it. Similarly, we are devoid of any throttle on the amount of taxation that can be imposed. The provincial governments have unlimited taxation powers in their own field, and so does the federal government. The result is that nobody can say, "wait, there is too much taxation now". There is no way in which that can be controlled.

The question is how can these problems be solved? My suggestion is that we give some consideration to that venerable company of old Canadians who share this building with us, and who respond so quaintly, so quickly and in such numbers to the tinkle of their little bell. I have never argued that the Senate should continue to exist in its present form. I think it could be reformed and changed into a very viable body. This baby-blanket of Parliament Hill could be of tremendous use by becoming the arbiter between the provincial and the federal governments of this country.

I think we should propose to the Canadian people that the Senate take on new functions. I suggest, first, that it should be appointed by a constitutionally entrenched formula, getting representatives from the provinces and the federal government, and that its objectivity, its independence from both governments should be entrenched in that formula so that it cannot be manipulated by either the federal or the provincial governments.

Secondly, it should have no legislative powers at all in the direct sense.

Thirdly, it should be empowered to determine when a transfer of legislative power should take place from the provinces to the federal government, or vice versa, depending upon the applications made to it by either of these levels of government. It should have the staff and the structure to investigate where the national or provincial interests might lie, in a broad sense, throughout the nation. For example, the pollution problem could be put before such a Senate, and it could decide which government and to what extent which government should be responsible for it. It could say that the federal government should take the responsibility entirely, or that the federal government should take certain aspects of it and certain other aspects should be left to the provinces.

Fourthly, it could be used to control the over-all imposition of taxation. For example, it could advise a government when it was imposing a new tax that it had gone too far in certain regions of the country because the provinces concerned had already taxed those regions to a certain level. That would be a powerful political factor in preventing the imposition of too much taxation.

Fifthly, it could serve as a fact-finding body for the federal and provincial governments, and thus abolish the necessity for royal commissions. It could even inquire as to what has happened to the Royal Commission on the Status of Women.

Sixthly, it could be the arbiter of intra-provincial disputes, and seventhly, it could serve as a national law reform commission and concern itself with the uniformity of laws throughout the country.

Eighthly, it could have a judicial arm to solve disputes arising out of constitutional matters. I would not suggest that the Senators all be selected for the same purpose. You might have a general body of Senators selected, and then have some selected because of their specific knowledge to serve for a certain purpose or for a certain term of years.

I have just about exhausted my time, Mr. Speaker. Whatever happens to this committee that we are now forming, I think we all look forward to watching its progress in helping to shape a new constitution. Above all, I hope that when it finally reports to this House it will have more luck than the Standing Committee on Northern Affairs did.

[Translation]

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) for his courtesy.

[English]

I should like to give a very warm welcome to this motion, Mr. Speaker. For many years I have been convinced that the elected members of Parliament, representing as they do every region in Canada and many different groups and interests, are pre-eminently suited to deal with the future framework of the Canadian political system, and that, after all, is what the constitution is.

I am personally interested because I pressed this idea of a parliamentary committee on the constitution in correspondence and in conference on the former prime minister, Mr. Pearson. He always agreed with me, but it was never the appropriate time to do anything about it. The present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) may remember that I urged support for this idea upon him a few weeks after he became a member of this House. Yesterday, he introduced the motion to set up such a committee, and it would be most ungracious of me not to acknowledge that fact with gratitude.

For myself, I am profoundly convinced that the committee can play a vital role in the constitutional development necessary to the future needs of Canada. Whatever the utility and necessity of continuing committees of civil servants and other experts, whatever the role of federal-provincial constitutional conferences, I am confident that in the ultimate analysis this Parliament is and should remain the major guardian of a strong but flexible federal system.

I do not share the attitude of those who regard the process of constitutional revision with impatience and who call for action on economic bread-and-butter issues. There is a false division here. Modern governments, of necessity, deal with economic issues. They must be concerned with full employment, housing, health, pollution, urban problems and even recreational facilities. They are called upon to improve the quality of life as well as to maintain economic growth. But governments either perform these functions, or fail to perform them because of the constitutional compact within which they must all work.

In a country with regions widely separated from each other by language and cultural divisions, as well as by distance and different economic conditions, as in Canada, agreement as to the constitutional structure is essential. Constitutional improvement and clarification are required for the smooth functioning of our system of government; indeed, for its existence. Constitutional revision, therefore, is of great practical importance and not an exercise to be reserved for constitutional lawyers and experts, but the very stuff of politics and the concern of all elected members.

I can sympathize with provincial premiers who speak out about the ancient and modern problems, such as freight rates and regional inequalities. I am sure much can be done within the existing constitution and by an intensified process of co-operative federalism to deal with some of these problems, but this does not absolve us from considering the constitutional framework of our whole constitutional system.

I am not one of those who think that the revision of the British North America Act is unimportant. The Prime Minister, in his speech, referred to cliches about the constitution. Perhaps I shall be guilty of some of the cliches to which he referred. But however obvious some of these remarks may be they need to be repeated from time to time.

The British North America Act is a colonial statute, passed by the British parliament in Westminster more than a hundred years ago. It is obsolete in form and uninspiring in style. It deals with the needs of small and mainly agricultural societies. Today, we are called upon to deal with vast urban conglomerations. It would be miraculous if the dispositions of a hundred years ago did not require review.

I am personally not iconoclastic about some of the basic provisions of the British North America Act. Some of those provisions, namely, those dealing with division of powers between the federal and provincial legislatures, may remain basically sound and require little change. It is to me, however, quite unthinkable that with the development of new problems of housing, pollution and renewal it does not require a new look.

The federal Parliament, as we all know, has employed the spending power to intervene from time to time in fields regarded as exclusively provincial. This has been bitterly resented by some provinces, notably the province of Quebec. Such a use of the spending power is nowhere explicit in the British North America Act. The limits of consequences of the exercise of the spending power need to be spelled out in the new constitution.

There remains in our constitutional set-up one crucial problem that must be resolved if Canada is to continue to be united. Federations, if they are healthy, are based on the consent of all regions, but there is in Canada a bone of contention which threatens to destroy consent. I refer to the difference of opinion about the degree of centralization in respect of legislation on social issues which is acceptable to different parts of Canada.

The Prime Minister of Quebec, at the last federal-provincial constitutional conference, made it quite clear that whatever other provinces might do, Quebec was not prepared to see the federal government interfere by use of the spending power, shared-cost programs or any other device, in fields such as social services and housing; such centralization would be resisted. In saying this he was repeating what had been said by his predecessors of all parties. I do not doubt that he speaks for Quebec in this regard, but I believe that the other provinces are willing, and in some cases anxious, for federal intervention in these fields. They do not wish to be hampered in securing national action on some of these matters because of Quebec's reluctance.

It was for this reason, Mr. Speaker, that some of us used the phrase "special status for Quebec". Perhaps it was an unfortunate phrase. It seemed to some to smack of condescension and concession. I emphasize, nevertheless, that the basic problem which remains is: How are we to organize our constitution so that Quebec can retain autonomy in fields in which her special culture demands it, without forcing upon the other provinces a decentralization which seems to some of them excessive?

I believe this is the crux of our constitutional problem, and I think that perhaps M. Bertrand was on the right track when he suggested that the device of delegation might be used by other provinces desiring it. It would have to be a refined process of delegation and be terminable only after an agreed period. The British North America Act says nothing about delegation. I believe the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—perhaps the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) will correct me if I am wrong—has said that there is no power of legislative delegation within our present constitutional system.

I suggest that the committee ought to explore this avenue, because I believe that by following-up the matter of delegation and by studying the implications of some sort of permanency of delegation, we might find the answer to what I call the dilemma of our constitution.

There are three more subjects upon which I wish to touch lightly, Mr. Speaker. The first is the charter of human rights or a constitutional bill of rights. I hope that this Parliament and government will not flag in their determination to bring such charter into existence. There has developed an academic school of thought which downgrades the importance of such charter or constitutional bill of rights. I am afraid that some members of our provincial governments have paid undue attention to this school of thought. These people claim that to enshrine basic fundamental freedoms in a constitution is (a) to limit them, and (b) to hand over the protection of these fundamental political rights to the tender mercies of judicial review rather than to the protection of politically-elected governments and Parliaments.

I think neither of these objections is valid. Such declarations in our fundamental constitutional law have an immense educational value. They clarify for all the human and individual basic rights in a free democracy and, in addition, they provide useful and needed instruments to strike down the overzealous exercise of legislative interference with fundamental rights of the citizen. I know this statement to be valid because of my career at the Bar. I suggest that nobody familiar with history will say that leaders of nations do not from time to time attempt to interfere, sometimes with the best intentions in mind, with those fundamental rights which we all should have.

I should now like to say a word about the amending formula which is essential to any successful rewriting of the constitution. This party has opposed, and I hope will continue to oppose, any rigid system which would give to an individual province the power of veto, no matter how small, in the field of constitutional revision. We successfully opposed, and continue to oppose, the unlamented Fulton-Favreau formula. We think that certain provisions of a fundamental nature could be enshrined in the constitution in such a way that the unanimous consent of the federal and provincial legislatures would be required for any change.

Examples of what I mean might be found in a charter of human rights, language rights and the right to free and regular elections. For instance, the constitution might contain various provisions which could not be changed without unanimous consent, whereas economic matters could be amended by a more simple and less rigid formula.

Perhaps the most recent federal-provincial constitutional conference was very close to the mark when it suggested that three out of four senatorial districts or three out of five such regions, including British Columbia—this was a suggestion of the Premier of British Columbia—might provide a consensus justifying federal interference in the provincial realm of shared-cost programs. I suggest to the House that a formula similar to that suggested to be applied to shared-cost programs might be applied to the amending of the constitution. Something of this sort is essential.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words about the role of municipal governments in the constitutional process. The time has come for the senior levels of government to recognize that if the human problems of Canadian citizens in the latter part of the twentieth century are to be solved, it must be done as a result of planning, consultation and co-operation with municipal levels of government. I remind the House that the populations of Toronto and Montreal exceed those of all the individual provinces except Quebec and Ontario. Immense environmental problems involving pollution, renewal, recreation, housing, etc., cannot be solved except by the combined efforts of federal, provincial and municipal governments.

The British North America Act makes the municipalities entirely the creatures of the provinces. I submit that in this decade the mutual problems of the federal government and municipal governments require consultation. We have heard in the House from time to time, when these matters have arisen, that such consultation is not possible under our constitution. I do not think this is so. Even if it is so, we must make it clear in the new constitution that it will be so no longer.

The 1969 conference of the Federation of Mayors and Municipalities demanded a commitment from the federal government as well as provincial governments to consult with municipalities—it being their right—on matters of mutual concern. If members of the committee which will be set up as a result of this motion are to do their job properly, they must, as must we, listen to those who represent our cities. So long as we remain a federal country, co-operative federalism must be practised to deal with urgent social needs such as housing and urban development generally. Such co-operative federalism must be both more thorough, deeper in its content and wide enough to take into its breadth of participatory democracy those who represent our cities and towns. Mr. Speaker, I look forward, as I believe other members of the House do, to Parliament asserting its proper role in determining the future fundamental law of this country. I will therefore support the motion before the House.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, this House has before it indirectly, in the form of a motion to establish a joint committee on the Constitution of Canada, the question of creating a new constitution for Canada. This is not the task for a day or even a year, but a task of great magnitude which will consume a proportionate amount of time.

In a formal sense, the process of creating a new constitution may be said to have begun at the first constitutional conference in February of 1968. I was privileged to be a participant in that conference as a delegate from the province of Prince Edward Island, and I would like to recall a phrase used by Premier Campbell of Prince Edward Island at that conference as a description of what those who participated in it were about to undertake. Premier Campbell said that if the men who in 1864, 1865, 1866 and 1867 worked out the Constitution of Canada could be called the Fathers of Confederation, he believed those who embarked on this new task in 1968 could be called the foster-fathers of our country.

In a sociological sense, however, the process of constitutional review and re-creation may be said to have begun with the quiet revolution of 1960 in Quebec and all the consequences which that led to, not only the great attention subsequently devoted in the province of Quebec to constitutional matters—not that Quebec had been entirely quiescent in this field before that time—but the response engendered in other parts of Canada, and of course the aspirations peculiar to all regions of Canada which partly as a result of the quiet revolution, partly as a result of Canada's first centennial and partly as a result of the national fervour engendered by Expo, began to find expression.

Why is it necessary to draft a new constitution a century after our first one? Perhaps the short answer is that the world is a very different place: great external changes have occurred; we have seen world wars with great dislocations in empires, trade patterns, economies and the movement of people. These world wars have had a great effect on Canada. We have had a great depression and we have had recessions.

In the 1960s many moral authorities have spoken of seeing new views of morals coming into being which may perhaps cause greater changes in our society. There have been changes in transportation and communications which were completely unforeseeable a century ago. Our closest neighbour, the United States, has emerged as the superpower of the world, with important consequences for Canada.

Internally we have evolved from the state of 1867 which was still, in effect, a colony despite the fact that we had responsible and popular government through our participation in the conferences after World War I to the Statute of Westminster and eventually the abolition of appeals to the Privy Council in criminal and civil matters, to the point where we are now a fully independent country. The only limitation on our freedom of action now is the fact that our constitution can still be formally amended only in Great Britain. This, of course, is part of the reason why we need to re-think and re-create our constitution.

There have also been forward and backward shifts in the balance of power between the federal government and the provinces in this century. We have seen the role of the government in the economy increase. We have seen changes in ethnic composition, especially as a result of the heavy immigration in the early part of the twentieth century. The immigration which followed the Second World War also changed considerably the character of our country. In 1867 we were largely a country composed of people from England, France, Scotland and Ireland. We could hardly begin today to name the nationalities of those who have come to our country. Moreover, there has been a quiet revolution in Quebec, and urbanization has continued to the point where 65 per cent of our people now live in urban centres. All these changes have been great social changes. I believe the changes have made it necessary not only to take a new look at our constitution, but to re-create and redraft it.

It is often thought our constitution is simply the British North America Act, but this is a somewhat oversimplified view. There is a vast conglomeration of statutes and practices—including, I think, the rules of this House and certainly the practices of the government of Canada—which in a very real sense can be considered to be part of our constitution.

I wish to dwell for a few moments on the most obvious part of our constitution, the British North America Act. I would quote a brief description of it by Dr. MacGregor Dawson in his book "The Government of Canada":

> The British North America Act, however, does not pretend to be a comprehensive document, such as, for example, the constitution of the United States; and there is thus little of the well-rounded, balanced description and enumeration of authorities and functions which so frequently characterize those written constitutions which aim to cover all the essentials of government within a limited number of carefully articulated sections. There are many vital things about the government of Canada (to say nothing of the provincial governments) which are not stated or even hinted at in the British North America Act, and even those matters which are dealt with in some detail are frequently given in such fashion that they become ambiguous and sometimes misleading.

A less neutral description of the British North America Act is given by Dean Jean Beetz. It is reprinted in the book edited by Crépeau and Macpherson, "The Future of Canadian Federalism". I wish to quote several sentences from this succinct description by Dean Beetz which I think poses in a few French words the dilemma of our constitution:

[Translation]

The 1867 constitution is a paradoxical document. Its character as fundamental law, the difficulty one finds in amending it, should normally command the use of a broad, liberal, analogical method of interpretation. On the other hand, its wording has all the character of restrictive interpretation statutes. The legislator modestly hides his principles behind it:—In other respects, the 1867 constitution, except perhaps as regards the provisions dividing the legislative jurisdiction between the central power and the provinces, is written in a jargon fit for painstaking lawers, completely indifferent to aesthetics, even on a legal level; it is a highly technical document which is therefore abstruse, misleading for the jurist who is not familiar with our laws, beyond the reach of the layman, the average man. Such wording normally leads to a purely exegetical and literal interpretation, the only one in which the Victorian jurists who gave a statutory form to the London resolutions likely believed.

This divorce between the nature of the 1867 constitution and its form may be one of the reasons for the variations of jurisprudence as regards the use of an appropriate method of interpretation for its implementation.

[English]

This divorce between the nature of the constitution and its form, between the broad nature of a constitution and the restricted, limited horizons of the form in which it was cast, has always posed a great problem, not only for the legal interpreters of the British North America Act but for the Canadian people. It has meant that their most formal document, the one which should best express all their aspirations, merely expresses the legalistic jargon, the technical views of the drafters of that document. It is still a legally serviceable document, but as living law it is inadequate. It is not a constitution of today for tomorrow, but a constitution of yesterday for yesterday.

• (5:50 p.m.)

How are we to proceed in attempting to create a new constitution? Professor Cheffins, in a new book entitled "The Constitutional Process in Canada", expresses in the following words grave reservations about the likely success of this task:

For Canada's political leaders to sit down at a constitutional conference and attempt to redraft completely a new constitution for Canada would, in my opinion, be a dangerous and difficult step.

I agree that it would be dangerous and difficult, but I do not draw the author's conclusion that it should not be done. This is a task upon which we have embarked, and I believe it is one we must now complete. There are, it seems to me, four ways in which we could proceed. First, there is the method of holding federal-provincial conferences, the one which is being most actively used. I do not share the disillusionment of some hon. members as to the outcome and pace of these conferences, although I believe that as public conferences they have probably gone as far as they can in enlightening the Canadian people by making them aware of the problems we face.

The second method is that of the constitutional convention, which means calling representatives of the people, perhaps members of the federal Parliament and the provincial legislatures among others, and inviting them to approve the draft of a new constitution as a document upon which our future history would be based. This conception is along the lines of the United States model; it would probably be awkward to employ in a country such as Canada which has no tradition of such constitutional conventions, but at least it is a possibility.

The third possibility is the holding of a referendum—the submission of a draft constitution to the people of Canada for their approval or rejection. I need hardly say that such a course would encounter serious difficulties of communication. It is hard enough for law professors to explain constitutions to their law classes. It is almost too much to expect the contents of such a document to be readily ascertainable by all the people of this country. However, in any new Canadian constitution we must achieve a better balance of the technical and the popular than was achieved in the last one.

A fourth method of constitutional change is by sending a joint address of both Houses of Parliament to the British Parliament. In any event, this is the course which will probably have to be followed eventually. It may seem to be a last resort and, legally, it can be taken in the absence of any of the steps to which I have just referred.

We have embarked upon a course of federal-provincial conferences which has perhaps served its day as far as public sessions are concerned. But the conferences are valuable because they are producing a series of documents which the Government of Canada is presenting to the people and to the provinces, and which will be the primary texts, if I might use that term, for the new committee to consider.

We must involve the public in this process, and we must also involve Parliament. Parliamentary and popular debate is important in connection with all the courses I have mentioned. Debate might not in itself be a method of constitution-making, but it is at the very least a concomitant; perhaps one might say that it breathes the breath of life into the other forms.

I believe the people of Canada want to be involved in the making of a new constitution. In the first of the federal papers there are a few sentences which read as follows:

> There is a Canadian personality. We are not carbon-copy Englishmen, nor carbon-copy Frenchmen, nor carbon-copy Europeans. Each of the founding societies and each of the cultural groups in this country has achieved in different ways its independence from its past, and none really wants to go back. Nor do Canadians want to become carbon-copy Americans, friendly and strong as our ties are with them. We have our own values, our own attitudes to life which are not British, nor French, nor American.

A constitution must be a popular document. It is, as Aristotle once said, the way of life of a citizen body; or, as we might prefer to say today, it is the embodiment of a consensus of popular feeling about our life. Another philosopher, Savigny, referred to the two elements which he said were necessary in any constitution, the political or popular element on the one hand, and the legal or technical element on the other. Our first constitution was predominantly legal; the legal element assumed almost total importance. In our new constitution I hope the stress will be laid on the political and popular element.

We shall not achieve a new constitution in a short time; the process might take a number of years. The most important conclusion we can reach at this point is that to help us obtain this new constitution we need new vehicles for popular and parliamentary participation. I believe the proposed parliamentary committee would provide such a vehicle. I believe it would enable us in Parliament to share in the work of creating a new constitution and I believe, too, that it would enable the people of Canada to take a more vital part in this task than would otherwise be possible.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Hon. Hugh John Flemming (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, we are presently discussing what I consider are the preliminary steps toward action relative to the constitution. Nothing could be more important, in my opinion. As all hon. members know, the motion is to appoint a joint committee of this House and the Senate "to examine and report upon proposals, made public"—I draw Your Honour's attention especially to the words "to examine and report upon proposals, made public"—"or which are from time to time made public by the Government of Canada, on a number of subjects related to the Constitution of Canada during the course of the comprehensive review of the Constitution of Canada, which review was agreed upon at the Constitutional Conference of the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premiers and Prime Ministers of the provinces in February 1968."

My reason for reading the motion almost verbatim is that I feel there are some portions of it which might be emphasized which, I submit, might not be in the general public interest. I do not propose to make much comment on the suggested detail of the basic principles embodied in the motion, nor on the set-up of the suggested committee. My remarks will be general in character and I will refer to the principles involved.

In considering the duties of the committee to examine and report upon the proposals already made to the public by the Government of Canada, it seems to me this is somewhat restrictive and I immediately question why there appears to be a restriction upon the studies and examinations to be made by the committee. The only flexibility that seems to be in the motion is that proposals to be made public later by the Government of Canada may be examined and reported upon. Again, I submit there is a degree of restriction here which, considering the comprehensive nature of the study, should not appear in the motion. At least there should be some indication by the government of what they have in mind, and that information should be given to members of this House.

I am not sure whether the motion was framed with the idea of restricting the committee, or if it will be given plenty of latitude by subsequent reports of the Government of Canada. I hope the committee will have comprehensive references made to it later. In this connection I cannot help feeling that this committee of our central Parliament should be able, in its deliberations, to consider representations made by the provinces as well as those made by the Government of Canada. If the committee is to render a service, and surely that is the objective, it must of necessity consider the views and representations of the provinces, the municipalities, organizations and citizens in general because by the motion it has been asked to undertake an all-embracing, comprehensive job.

Mr. Speaker, let us examine the question of the constitution and ask ourselves what it is. On reference to the dictionary I find that the definition of the word "constitution" is as follows:

> The fundamental principles of government of a nation, state, society, or other organized body of men, embodied in written documents, or implied in the institutions and customs of the country or society concerned.

I especially draw the attention of the House to the following portion of the definition, "embodied in written documents, or implied in the institutions and customs of the country," because in my opinion this suggests a degree of flexibility which has perhaps not been adopted by all people in their analysis of constitutional responsibility. I now wish to consider the constitution under which we have been operating for over 100 years.

Yesterday and today we listened to some very good speeches made in this chamber. In some cases the House was urged not to forget the British North America Act which, after all, has been our constitution for over 100 years. I am quite prepared to agree that our constitution, which has been in existence since 1867, should be brought up-to-date in light of the progress made, but I am not prepared to agree that the constitution under which we have operated should be completely ignored.

I am not prepared to admit that we should discard the constitution under which great progress has been made. I think it has a basis for improvement and that we should retain all that is constructive in it and all that tends to contribute to the creation of a new constitution, and make the necessary changes in light of changing conditions over the last 100 years.

In this chamber we hear many members express great satisfaction, and quite properly so, with the progress that this country has made in 100 years. Then why discard the constitution under which that progress was made? It is not suggested that it should form the basis of a new constitution. It seems to me that the fact that is ignored suggests something which will be rather harmful in the preparation of a new document.

For several years various Prime Ministers and Premiers have been discussing constitutional questions. Only now is the Parliament of Canada being asked to take action and examine the matter. I well remember attending federal-provincial conferences as Premier of New Brunswick. I remember very well the attitude of the Prime Minister of the day, Mr. St. Laurent. I believe that very capable and considerate Prime Minister had great respect for the rights of the provinces. On many occasions he stated his view that conferences between the provinces and the federal government on questions of jurisdiction should be co-operative. It always seemed to me that he deplored any conflict between the provinces and the federal authority.

I have always considered Mr. St. Laurent to be a great constitutional lawyer and a great Prime Minister. He mentioned conferences very frequently, but to my knowledge he never suggested the need for a brand new constitution. Perhaps the influence of this great man has made me very sensitive to the need of preserving in the old constitution all that is beneficial, important and near and dear to many Canadians, while at the same time adding to it where it appears wise to do so and amending it where it appears desirable. The next Prime Minister with whom I was associated is the Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker, the hon. member for Prince Albert. To my recollection, his attitude with reference to the constitution was much the same as Mr. St. Laurent's.

I do not think we are discussing a matter about which there should be great political or partisan differences among the various groups in this House. I think we are discussing a document which deserves attention, which perhaps deserves amendment and some additional sections. I think the constitution in general needs to be dressed up and fixed up so it will serve us for the next 100 years, or even more, in a better way than the old one served us in the last 100 years.

I belong to a party that subscribes to the general political philosophy that we should preserve and conserve all that is good in established institutions and formulas that have been in operation for some time. We should make those changes which appear likely to strengthen these institutions; we should make any amendment which seems desirable.

Everyone will acknowledge that we live today in a world very different from that of a century or even half a century ago. From horse and buggy to automobile, aeroplane and now trips to the moon, is a great-deal of progress in half a century. It would be very unwise after half a century of experience to suggest that the rules and regulations under which we operate, or in other words the constitution, should not be reviewed and changed to suit changing conditions.

I do not believe, however, that the constitution should be left entirely in the hands of constitutional lawyers, together with the executive heads or civil servants of 11 governments. I am in favour of a revised constitution, but I am also in favour of using the present constitution—the British North America Act—as a foundation upon which to build.

In the process of changing a constitution it is well to remember that there are countries which change their constitutions from time to time. This applies to the United States of America. I respectfully draw the attention of the House to the fact that a change in the constitution of that great country calls for more than just a majority vote. Changing the constitution of the United States is a long and laborious process. It calls for much discussion, examination and consideration and is only done by a two-thirds majority vote. In other words, it is a very serious matter to change the constitution of any country.

Therefore, the action we are asked to take today, namely, to set up a committee to examine and report on this question is not especially contentious and I have no reason to think it will not receive general support. I would be concerned, however, if I was not thoroughly satisfied that the constitution under which we have been operating will be completely ignored.

I do not believe that all the factors involved in the making of a new constitution are recognized by many people. A major revision is far reaching in its consequences. Countries which have freely changed their constitutions provide us with examples we would do well to avoid. This is why the procedure we follow in arriving at a new constitution is of the utmost importance.

I am somewhat concerned about the point of view of the provinces. The statement was made yesterday that we cannot leave a matter as important as the changing of the constitution to 11 people who by accident of election happen to be prime ministers or premiers of the provinces. Because at one time I qualified under one of those categories, I am prepared to acknowledge that there is something to be said for this argument. However, I ask this question: If you do not listen to elected representatives entrusted with responsibility of office by the people of their native province—people who know them well—to whom do you listen? In my opinion, in the final analysis one must realize that provincial governments have the needs and views of their people very much at heart. At the same time, I think they are quite prepared to recognize that in matters of jurisdiction there must be a strong central government in respect of matters which pertain to national acts. I am sure that is obvious to all concerned.

It is the reconciliation of these divergent views, and embodying them in written documents, that the committee we propose to set up will have entrusted to it. I believe in the principle of responsible government. It is all right to talk about listening to the views of the average citizen, but after you get the views of the average citizen, how much nearer are you to getting unanimity of view? All you get is a variation of opinion from a lot of different people. If this were done, would we be any further ahead as a country than if we accepted the general principle that provincial governments, answerable to their people in the next election, are reasonably accurate in communicating the needs and wishes of the people regarding a common, uniform constitution?

Provincial governments have prestige to maintain. The heads of those governments are answerable for every opinion they express. I have the feeling that conferences between federal and provincial governments which are televised and exposed to the public greatly restrict expressions of honest opinion. In the machinery of conferences there must of necessity be a degree of give and take, of argument and consent, and the opinions of the people participating might sometimes be influenced by the fact that their expressions and reactions are capable of being misrepresented and misconstrued if they are exposed ruthlessly through television. I say it is ruthless because it brings out all the weaknesses.

When we attend such conferences we are all obliged to consider that we have political opponents at home. They are there, and they are watching. They are watching in the wings for the slightest slip that might be considered a deviation from the general public interest. If such a conference could be held in which the only topic to be discussed was the constitution under which the country was to be governed, I wonder if it would not be possible to have representatives of political parties in all the provinces meet so the matter of constitutional change might be considered on a strictly non-partisan basis.

In this connection, surely there is one area of political activity in which we are all united with one objective and one result, that is, to improve and continue the progress of this great country called Canada. Surely that is paramount. This requires unity of action, and I see no reason why it should be lacking. I likewise see no reason why there should be any restriction of matters to be examined and reported upon by the committee. The motion says it shall be confined to subjects raised by the federal government or by other governments at past constitutional conferences. This reference should be enlarged. The committee should not be hampered, hamstrung or restricted. There should be complete flexibility and movement of action so that members of the committee may decide for themselves what they should study in light of the need to come up with a document in respect of which they can take a great deal of pride as the constitution for the next 100 years.

At the outset of these remarks I stated that I intended to speak only in general terms concerning the motion. I wish, however, to refer to the observations made in the House last evening by my hon. friend from Palliser (Mr. Schumacher). In his reference to what constitutes the Parliament of Canada he quoted section 17 of the BNA Act, which states there shall be one Parliament for Canada consisting of the Queen, an upper house styled the Senate, and the House of Commons. I happen to be one who believes very much in recognizing as part of our formal Parliament the presence of someone who shall be entirely above any political controversy. I am quite prepared to acknowledge that I have a sentimental attachment to our Queen.

While I do not quarrel with anyone who does not possess a similar sentiment, I believe it is instinctive for all people to desire a symbol which they agree is a most desirable and precious one. I also agree with my hon. friend when he speaks about the need for decentralization as the only apparent way of adequately protecting regions and minorities in this country. But there are, of course, very good reasons for a strong national government. I think of the question of transportation. When this country came into being in 1867, the result of a conference among the representatives of the two central provinces and those of the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick was—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret that I must interrupt the hon. member to bring to his attention that his time has expired, unless he has the unanimous agreement of the House to continue his remarks beyond the allotted time. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Flemming: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and members of the House. I shall not continue much longer. At that time a commitment was made on the question of transportation. That commitment was that two provinces in the east which made confederation possible would be protected by the building of the Intercolonial Railway which would make it possible for their producers to be placed on the threshold of the markets of central Canada. I do not propose to proceed with a discussion of this matter, especially in light of the fact that my time has expired. I submit, however, that this commitment has not been carried out, and the more transportation acts this House passes, the more Parliament seems to forget the commitment ever existed.

As one who has had some experience both in the provincial and federal fields of responsibility, I welcome this motion. Action to initiate steps such as are envisaged by this motion will not, I believe, receive any great degree of objection. I would argue that the terms of reference of the committee should be made more flexible than now is the case. The basic principle which should be kept in mind is the protection of the individual. That is really what a constitution is for—the protection of the individual. This is really the only means by which we can make sure there is a limit beyond which our rulers cannot go; I care not to which party they belong. There must be something to hold them down.

As Canadians we have a great degree of freedom. So long as we use that freedom properly and for the general good of all Canadians, we have a right to insist that it be maintained. In practice we are a very fortunate people. In a practical aspect, emphasis upon the abstract, the legal as well as theorizing and philosophizing will lead us nowhere.

The question of the constitution must be brought into the open, in plain simple terms, so that all will be able to see what it will mean to him or her. Let us take it away from the plodding experts and the lawyers. Let us have a new instrument which will embody all that is good in the old, which will contain amendments of improvement and additions where necessary in light of present conditions, all of which will be designed to result in improved and continued progress for Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. André Ouellet (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, let me express my satisfaction that the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) yesterday introduced a motion to appoint a joint Committee of the House of Commons and the Senate to review the Canadian constitution.

I trust this motion will be passed unanimously by the House, and that it will be a preliminary step to the drafting of a brand new constitution, a truly Canadian and modern one.

The last Special Committee on the Constitution was established by the House in 1935. It is of interest to note that such prominent people as the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, the Hon. Ian Mackenzie, Onésime Gagnon, and G. L. Ralston, as well as Mr. G. S. Woodsworth and Mr. Henri Bourassa were members of that Committee.

I hope each party will appoint to the Committee their most prominent members and that the Committee will produce as many good results as the one of 1935.

At the time, one of the most interesting witnesses was Dr. Maurice Ollivier, lawyer and Parliamentary adviser of the House of Commons. Dr. Ollivier who was my professor of constitutional law at the University of Ottawa, had suggested a very comprehensive amending method which might well still be applicable today. In an article published in the Canadian Journal of Economy's Political Science Mr. Eugene Forsey set forth Dr. Ollivier's recommendations as follows:

[English]

He divides the BNA Act into five categories: (1) sections "spent" or not requiring amendment; (2) sections which should be alterable simply by two-thirds vote of both Houses of the Dominion Parliament (or, on a second presentation, two-thirds of the Commons and a majority of the Senate); (3) sections requiring in addition the consent of one province; (4) sections requiring consent of a majority of the provinces; (5) sections requiring consent of all provinces. The third category comprises sections 69-80; the fourth sections 8, 12, 51, 58-68, 81-92, 94-101, 118, 128, 132, 146, 147; the fifth, sections 5-7, 93, 133, 92, heads 12-14. In respect to section 92, head 13, however, Dr. Ollivier attaches the notable proviso that "in the case of social services . . . for the general advantage of Canada" majority consent would be enough.

Unfortunately, the economic recession and the war put an end to this hope for constitutional amendments. It is therefore extremely important that the parliamentary committee that we want to create today should really get down to business and do the work our predecessors tried to do 35 years ago already.

At that time it seemed important to adopt our constitution to the new circumstances. It is all the more so for us now to adopt a constitution suited to our times.

The young of today wish to change society so as to adapt it to their aspirations, to make it more genuinely Canadian, less artificial and much more in agreement with their ideal.

The centennial year of Canadian confederation was marked by numerous merry celebrations. Canadians from all over the country fraternized and lived through a common and exciting experience and were moved together by the same feelings.

It was felt then that there was a common and unmistakable wish for co-existence, but the euphoria has died out. The year 1967 has now gone by and our national pride has faded away almost simultaneously, which was hardly surprising.

On the other hand, how could a young English-Canadian who is suffering from regional disparities be proud to call himself a Canadian?

How could a young Canadian of French origin who is compelled to speak English to obtain services from his government be proud to be a Canadian?

How could a young Canadian of Polish descent who must swear allegiance to the Queen of England in the service of Canada be proud to be a Canadian?

How could a young person visiting Parliament be proud to be a Canadian when seeing the Speaker and the sergeant-at-arms of this House walking along wearing costumes and hats so obsolete and ridiculous—if I may say so—belonging to a bygone era and a foreign country?

How could a young student have pride in Canada when watching television during federal-provincial conferences and seeing politicians who are more interested in their own image and political advantages than in the seriousness and the urgency motivating those conferences?

I am happy to note that one of the clauses of the resolution moved yesterday by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) provides for granting the committee authorization to travel across Canada.

It is obvious that steps will have to be taken to promote in Canada a real national sense of pride. Workshops held in different cities of the country by the parliamentary committee seems to me an efficient means of bringing the population to contribute to the constitutional review.

In my opinion, the Canadian population must take part in the dialogue and to that end, it appears important to me at this stage that no government, either federal or provincial, claim that certain elements of the constitution are endowed with a sacrosanct quality which can automatically shield them from a free discussion.

The Prime Minister has already stated that the federal government is henceforth prepared to discuss any constitutional reform whatever.

I therefore think that the monarchy is one of the subjects that will have to be considered openly and without passion.

In a document published in February 1969, The Constitution and the People of Canada, the federal government explained how the aspirations of Canadians can best be expressed when establishing the objectives of the constitution, how their democratic rights can be guaranteed and how their interests as citizens of a specific country and region can be protected under the federal regime.

I readily subscribe to all the recommendations made in this document, except for the views on the monarchy. However, I agree that some proposals should be discussed long before we come to the monarchy, which will have to be examined in due time.

Finally, I sent a questionnaire to all my constituents. I am proud to say to the House that I represent a riding which reflects well our country's characteristics. I represent French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians, immigrants who are trying to understand the Canadian mentality and make a new and happy life for themselves, old citizens who are faced with insecurity and inflation, young people looking for reasons to be proud of their country and who are wondering if Canada is really their country. They all live in relative harmony. In brief, I represent a riding where good people live, who talk of themselves as Canadians, but who would like to have reasons to be more so.

In the questionnaire, I asked my electors if they were in favor of the progressive disappearance of royal symbols. Well, 80 per cent said yes. Of all the questions I asked, this was the one on which there was the greatest unanimity; only 9 per cent were against and 11 per cent undecided.

This is an interesting sample of public opinion. Therefore, it is important to leave the door open to discussion, because the new constitution will be worthwhile only if the population wishes it to be.

That is why I advocate dialogue with the people, because I believe the committee that will be established should hear experts in political science, representatives of provincial legislatures, of intermediate bodies, of municipalities and any other person capable of making a useful contribution. With the help of all those people, a report could be prepared and presented to the House of Commons and the Senate for the approval of a new constitution. The only thing remaining to be done would be to have it accepted by the Canadian people through a national referendum.

The people are sovereign. It is useless in 1970 to apply to London, in order to amend the constitution. Let us draw up a new constitution which we will submit to the people. Let us show our national pride and settle our own affairs in Canada.

On page 408 of his book entitled "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty", Mr. Maurice Ollivier wrote, and I quote:

[English]

Two classes of people have been the enemies of Canadian unity; those who have placed another country above Canada in their love, affection and admiration, ever stressing the alleged superiority of that country over our own, and secondly those nationalists with a narrow provincial concept who have constantly attacked the federal power just as if the provinces were not represented at Ottawa and were not part of the federal system but separate entities fighting a foreign government—

All we need to do is to place Canada first and consider this fair country as our home.

[Translation]

This is what I wanted to say at this stage. The time available to me does not allow me to specify what provisions should be included in that new constitution. I will surely have the opportunity to bring up that matter again in committee, if the resolution is carried.

It is obvious, however, that this constitution will have to ensure the necessary means in order to afford the two founding nations equal chances to develop fully and respect each other. The very survival of Canada as a nation as we know it at present is at stake; the survival and free development of French Canadians is also at stake.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of the debate has such serious implications for the future of our country that it must be treated with the greatest objectivity.

Reading over the speeches made so far, I have come to the conclusion that everyone is anxious to do his share in order that Canada may have a constitution that will fulfil the needs of all Canadians and of all provinces.

I congratulate my colleague the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) for his speech yesterday, and I shall continue expressing the thinking of our party through a study of another aspect of the problem.

For a layman like myself, it is perhaps daring to take part in a debate on such an important and sensitive subject. However, since my youth, I have been interested in the constitutional problems of our country and I have often wondered why when there has been general agreement on the terms of a contract, conflict should inevitably result when it comes to its enforcement.

The motion now under consideration reads as follows:

> That a joint Committee . . . be appointed to examine and report upon proposals, made public, or which are from time to time made public by the Government of Canada, on a number of subjects related to the Constitution of Canada, during the course of the comprehensive review of the Constitution of Canada, which review was agreed upon at the Constitutional Conference of the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premiers and Prime Ministers of the Provinces in Febuary, 1968, and alternative proposals on the same subjects;

I had the opportunity in 1969 to attend the federal-provincial conference. I followed the proceedings with great interest and I concluded that the most delicate matters on which the participants disagreed most strongly had to do with finance and taxation.

It is quite obvious that we need to reform or to amend our constitution so as to meet the needs of our times. But why amend or rewrite our constitution, if both sides are not prepared to respect it afterwards?

I think the constitution governing us at the present time would not have been so bad after all if it had been and were still respected by the central government. In my view, the time has come to improve it considerably and even to rewrite it. Perhaps some will reply that certain provinces do not respect it to the letter either. Personally, I do not think so, because we all know that when the central government felt that the constitution had been violated by a provincial government, the federal government would soon resort to the competent tribunals to get a ruling on whether the province concerned had violated the constitution or not.

In Canada, there is perhaps a particular constitutional problem since confederation is made up of nine English-speaking provinces and of one French-speaking province. In other words, Canada has two cultures, one is English and the other French and, in my opinion, it is a happy circumstance. Since 1867, Canada has enjoyed other cultures.

For the past century, Canada has been discussing its constitution. All governments, to whatever party they belonged, one after the other established commissions to conduct studies and inquiries into the matter, and their reports were made public; however, they have not settled the problem.

The British North America Act has created a federal state and distributed powers among the central government and the provincial governments, but it hardly described the federal parliamentary or the provincial legislature machineries. At any rate, the Act specified that the British parliamentary institutions and the existing laws should be maintained. That provision, altogether too general, introduced in Canada all the British constitutional and parliamentary practices, rules and standards, and they were to be an essential part of the Canadian constitutional procedure.

The Canadian government is based on the federal system, which involves an assembly of autonomous provinces enjoying some exclusive rights, and a central government that looks after the matters of prime concern to the whole population.

Under such a system, powers are divided between the federal and provincial governments. To operate properly, it needs the cooperation of everybody and must apply the give-and-take principle. We are fortunate in having inherited this form of government which is more suited to our character than an arbitrary system. The federative system does more than suit us; it is a must. Differences in race, language, religion, regional economies and social activities make it more pressing than in 1867 to distribute the administrative powers. Because of its constitutional machinery, federalism is more likely to safeguard provincial prerogatives, while enabling a common discussion on basic issues, even though such distribution of powers gives rise to endless problems.

The British North America Act united initially the provinces of Quebec, Ontario, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick; the other provinces joined confederation later on, one by one. The purpose was to unite the country under various agreements, which brought about problems respecting the distribution of powers. The reasons why federalism must be maintained in Canada, namely the differences in race, wealth, resources and religion, are the same ones which make distribution of powers necessary.

For complete understanding of the details of the distribution of powers, we need only turn to section 91 of the British North America Act, enumerating federal powers. This section empowers Parliament to:

> make Laws for the Peace, Order and good Government of Canada in relation to all matters not coming within the Classed of Subjects assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces.

One can thus wonder whether a subject which at first sight might appear to fall within provincial jurisdiction does not come within federal authority, and vice versa. The section goes on to list the subjects exclusively assigned to parliament. The purpose of the enumeration is to ensure greater clarity and not to limit the scope of the general authority mentioned earlier. It includes classes of powers within federal jurisdiction such as the regulation of trade and commerce, defence, currency, the raising of moneys by any mode or system of taxation, postal service, navigation and shipping, and weights and measures.

Section 92 confers powers on provinces including the right to amend their constitution (excepting with regard to the appointment of the lieutenant governor), to raise direct taxes to meet their own expenses, to manage and sell Crown land, to pass legislation concerning municipal institutions, civil rights and property.

Canada and the provinces share powers in respect of agriculture and immigration, but in case of conflict the federal law prevails. This article should be immediately and completely revised.

Education was considered so important that it was dealt with in a separate section. Section 93 confers on the federal parliament limited legislative powers in education matters in order to protect the rights of minorities who attend denominational or separate schools. The provinces have the exclusive power to legislate in the field of education. The federal government should make a very serious soul-searching effort in that respect.

Most of the difficulties which oppose the federal and provincial governments derive from the fact that there could not have been a provision for everything at the time of confederation and that a judicial interpretation of section 91, from 1867 to 1945, tended to increase provincial powers and decrease federal powers. Another important factor was the tremendous increase in provincial expenditures. Those difficulties also result from the fact the federal and provincial authorities must increase their taxation powers and levy new taxes in view of the people's demands for expensive welfare services such as pensions, health insurance, etc. Being limited to direct taxation, the provinces find themselves continuously fighting competition from the federal power which has taken over the taxation fields opened to it. Several of these difficulties, such as those concerning family allowances and unemployment insurance, have been settled by agreement.

Since family allowances are very closely related to the family, I personally think that they should come under provincial jurisdiction.

With regard to the limited powers and obligations of the provinces, since they are always faced with financial difficulties, I shall quote an article which appeared in the January 26 issue of La Presse. This article reads as follows, and I quote:

> The President of the Teachers Association of the Gaspé Peninsula regional School Board, Mr. Gaston Dubé, states in a telegram addressed to the Quebec Teachers Corporation that the union is considering the possibility of resorting to work-to-rule and even to an all-out strike, because of arrears from $300,000 to $400,000 in the payment of teachers' salaries.

It would seem needless today to attempt to prove that the fathers of confederation wanted to create a strongly centralized federal system in which a central government would enjoy limitless powers.

However, carefully are divided the powers within a federal system, difficulties inevitably crop up when an attempt is made to apply this distribution to the various and complex aspects of social life.

• (8:50 p.m.)

We have evidence that during federal-provincial conferences, the great problems which opposed the federal government to the provinces were of an economic and financial nature.

It is not only the province of Quebec that does not agree with the federal government on this issue. During those conferences, the Premier of Newfoundland, Mr. Smallwood, was perhaps the one who complained most bitterly about the injustice suffered by the eastern provinces. He added that Canada is divided in two economic areas: a poor one and a rich one. I think he is right.

The central government taxes and overtaxes, and then it says to the provinces: if you need money, it is your turn to go and get it in the pockets of taxpayers. You must discharge your responsibilities by increasing taxes. The taxpayer has become overtaxed because of this misunderstanding between the federal powers, on one hand, and those of the provinces, on the other.

I hope that the committee that will be appointed will look fully into all the aspects of the taxation problem and that during the hearings it will hold throughout the country, there will be people and organizations able to see the problem in its true light in order to prove that above all, what divides us and prevents us from respecting our constitution, is the need for additional financial resources of the provinces to enable them to meet their commitments.

Last week I met here, in Ottawa, the Premier of Manitoba and I asked him how things were going in his province. He replied he had to cope with serious financial problems and added: I have the economic potential to do many things but I do not have the necessary funds. So I suggested he demand help from the Bank of Canada for his province, through interest-free loans. He must have thought my suggestion was worthwhile for he replied that he was considering it seriously.

It is not the province of Quebec alone that disagrees with the present constitution, as far as economic and taxation questions are concerned. Ask Mr. Robichaud, from New Brunswick, or the other provincial premiers for their opinion and you will get the same answer. But to my knowledge, there is not a single one who had enough courage, during the federal-provincial conferences, to suggest a favourable financial reform for Canada as a whole.

In my opinion, even if the proposed committee on the constitution were to make just one recommendation, asking the sovereign government of Canada to use the Bank of Canada to finance the public sector in the departments involved in capitalization, in capital expenditures, such as the Department of Public Works, for instance, it would allow the provinces a wider scope for taxation. The committee would thus prove its usefulness.

As long as the federal government and the provinces will wrangle over the right of being the first to despoil the taxpayer, this country will remain divided, whatever constitution we may have. We are more divided over this question than over the language issue. I have travelled extensively across the country and discovered that Canadians are now much more concerned about economic problems than about the question of the constitution, however important it may be.

In conclusion, I am willing to support the motion to establish a committee and I demand a fair deal for the province of Quebec. We are not begging for rights, we only want them to be acknowledged. If we do not take action while it is still time, we shall witness the disintegration of Canada.

As for me, I am a Canadian and, as such, I have a claim on the heritage of my entire country, no matter in which area I live, the language I speak or the religion I practice.

When Jacques Cartier, erected the cross at Gaspé, he brought on the American soil the symbol of christianity. And when he hoisted the flag, it meant the beginning of a new civilization on this continent. Thus did Cartier found Canada which we have so many reasons for being proud of.

But within Canada, there are territorial subdivisions known as provinces, each of which has its own characteristics; we should take them into account in a new constitution, so that each province might be true to itself, and be strong within a strong Canada.

Even now, one can guess that the fathers of confederation recognized that diversity. Let us hope the authors of the new constitution will recognize that even more, that each one of the provinces, including Quebec, might develop socially, economically and culturally, while retaining complete financial autonomy.

This is a critical time: there is unrest, unemployment, dissatisfaction, and the governments disclaim all responsibility.

Let us go back to the people to see for ourselves what is going on. Then we can think, speak and act according to the needs of the whole country. Let us go back to the fountain-head, and have the courage to make the necessary constitutional and financial reforms before it is too late.

[English]

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, on June 25, 1968, Canada opted emphatically for one nation, with each region, each province enjoying the same rights in the Canadian Confederation as every other region and province, and with no region and no province denied rights extended to the others—in short, a Canada with a full status for all and special status for none.

Since that time the executive branches of our federal and provincial governments have engaged in what appears to us on the outside to have become an increasingly frustrating and decreasingly productive dialogue as attitudes harden and the message delivered by the voters in June, 1968, becomes less and less immediate in their memories. Nowhere was that message delivered in more emphatic terms than urban Canada, and nowhere is the need for constitutional reform more evident than when we relate the existing constitution to urban Canada.

Surely, if the agricultural community was of the importance over a century ago to merit the concurrent jurisdiction of the federal and provincial governments—and it unquestionably was—the draftsmen of the constitution, taking into the account the realities of Canada today, would not leave our great urban municipalities in the position they now find themselves, creatures of largely rural-oriented provincial governments, creatures whose resources, founded on the base of the real property tax cannot even remotely be related to their responsibilities.

If I am correct in inferring from this resolution a decision by the government to again take the constitutional debate to the people of Canada, I am all for it. It will take much more than the reminder of occasional elections to keep these governments and their leaders firmly on the course of constitutional reform which is so necessary and which the people have emphatically endorsed.

An improvement I suggest is that the legislatures of our provinces be invited to have members on this joint committee, and that it be made a constitutional commission with a firm mandate to achieve the kind of results which seem as far as ever from realization through the processes being pursued from time to time before the cameras at the old Union Station.

There are certain rather tired and trite truisms which seem necessarily to come up in debates of this nature, if for no other reason than that each participant wants his own offering to be a thing of literary beauty, complete in itself and independent of other contributions to the debate. I trust that I shall be neither more nor less guilty than others who participate if I yield to this common offence and observe that since we are a nation of vast geographic dimensions and disparate social and economic situations, we are necessarily a federation. It is impossible to see Canada as a unitary state. Circumstances compel us, if we are to be a nation at all, to find the means of being a workable federation. Failing that, the long-term trend will be to fragmentation, not centralization.

The difficulty inherent in the search for this solution is compounded by the concentration of our population in rather narrow limits. With the exception of artificial considerations dictating the representation of Prince Edward Island, the Yukon and Northwest Territories, membership in this House is a pretty fair profile of the population distribution of the nation. Of every five Members of Parliament, three represent constituencies lying in a strip 100 miles deep running from Windsor to Quebec City. There are more Members of Parliament from metropolitan Montreal than from the entire province of British Columbia. There are more Members of Parliament from metropolitan Toronto than from any of the three prairie provinces. There are more from Ontario alone than from the three prairie and four Atlantic provinces together.

One of the very fundamental questions which must be asked is whether any federation so dominated by one or two of its constituent members is workable. Looking at the problem from the other end of the pipe, would anyone, considering Canada today and concluding, as he must, that it is too cumbersome an entity to govern as a unitary state, subdivide in such a manner that over 60 per cent of its political muscle, expressed by sheer weight of numbers in this House, was concentrated in two of its ten subdivisions?

The further subdivision of Ontario and Quebec may very well be a necessary prerequisite, not only to a workable Canadian federation but to the satisfaction of the conflicting aspirations of those who live in the great cities of those provinces and those in the rural areas. The rural residents still hold the power in the provincial legislatures through inequitable distribution of seats, but this situation cannot last for ever. When it does come to an end, it may very well be found best for all that the fact of the new city state be recognized and that metropolitan Toronto and metropolitan Montreal be given provincial status in Canada rather than dominating the provinces to whose rural electorate they are presently subordinated.

Atlantic union is already a topic of conversation in the Atlantic provinces. At the University of Lethbridge, in May of this year a conference entitled "One Prairie Province? A question for Canada" will be held. I wish to read briefly from the invitation sent to participants in that conference by the university and the Lethbridge Herald:

> The conference "One Prairie Province? A Question for Canada" is designed to explore the issues, debate the pros and cons and discuss the idea of uniting Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba into "One Prairie Province".
> We hope that this conference will develop a better informed public with regard to the understanding of constitutional relationships and the stresses on our present federal structure and thus strengthen our national cohesion. We feel this is the time for frank discussion and for searching for ways to improve our federal system.

To this I say, amen. A second basic question that arises from this great concentration of population in a relatively small area, about 60 per cent of Canada's people on about 4 per cent of its land mass, is whether the effective federal legislative power ought fairly and properly to be committed entirely to this chamber; whether, in a federal state with Canada's particular characteristics, the transparently fair approach of "one man; one vote" is indeed as equitable as it sounds.

That, of course, is what the Senate is supposed to be all about. With the possible exception of certain members of that august chamber, you will get little argument on the proposition that it has not worked; that it has not fulfilled the expectations of those who called for it in the Quebec resolution and created it in the British North America Act. More to the point, why has it failed to be an effective entity in the bicameral legislature of Canada? Is it the manner of selection of its members? Is it the fact that once appointed they are, for all practical purposes, answerable to no one? How could it be made more effective without at the same time detracting undesirably from the rights and responsibilities of this chamber?

Another institution central to Canadian federalism is our Supreme Court. Had that court exercised a creative role, it is possible that this resolution would not be before us today. But it did not, through no fault of its own, during the first 80 years of confederation and by then, when appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council were finally abolished, it was probably too late. But for the future the question remains, how can our Supreme Court be constituted so as to fulfil a creative, on-going role in the Canadian Confederation?

It is not an unusual spectacle in this chamber to witness a member opposite, trembling with poorly-simulated rage, genuine sanctimony dripping from every pore, charge the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) with attempting to impose a presidential system on Canada. The bait has been taken by some columnists and during the dog days in Ottawa when the House is in recess an occasional speculative article on the subject appears.

I, for one, oppose any move to eliminate the monarchy from our constitution; but there is nothing really inconsistent in having a presidential system in a monarchy. The president would merely be the head of government, popularly elected, rather than the head of state elected as a substitute for the monarch. It may very well be that for the next century of confederation, Canada can best be served by a less powerful head of government than a prime minister is under the present system. After all, a prime minister controls not only the executive but the legislature. He holds in his hands, relative to his country, far more power than does a president, who controls only the executive.

Another complementary reform which might be considered is whether the system of responsible government is really best suited to the needs of a federal state, or whether Canada might not be better served by the congressional system. While members on this side as a rule find themselves in agreement that government policies are, on balance, best not only for the nation but for the regions they represent, this is not invariably the case.

We have our opportunities in caucus; they are good opportunities, and frequently the fight is won there—although having fought and won the good fight, it is a matter of some regret to the victor that his efforts will forever go unnoted by his constituents as the secrecy of caucus prevails. I suspect that the overriding obligation to support the ministry, imposed on government Members of Parliament by the system of responsible government, has led the voters of the generally disaffected region I represent to send platoon upon platoon of opposition members of this House. I do not think the prairie voters have necessarily served their best interests by doing this. I do not think that the system which has impelled them to do it has necessarily served the best interests of Canada.

Other speakers in this debate have expressed concern about particular aspects of our constitution. The hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet) concentrated on questions affecting its amendment, the hon. member for Etobicoke (Mr. Gillespie) concentrated on the powers necessary to manage the economy of this country, and the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin) dealt at some length with the subject of the monarchy.

There is much more I should like to say, but I have tried to limit my observations to a few fundamental areas wherein I see a possibility of basic reform in the interest of better accommodating our federal institutions to the fact of western regionalism. Again, the University of Lethbridge seminar in May will point to another way in which these regions can obtain proportionate power in the Canadian union.

Talk of separatism is not unknown in western Canada. It is increasing in frequency. Studies as to the economic feasibility of a separate western Canada are being openly conducted and discussed. Some people seem to have adopted this approach for tactical purposes on the basis of an assumption that it has been highly successful in achieving more for another region than they deem to be its fair share.

I hope I have indicated that very little of the past or of established institutions is sacred to me when it comes to seeking a workable constitution for the future. But I draw the line at separatism wherever it is proposed. It is high time the Prime Minister stood in this House and told all Canadians that the federal government is open to all ideas concerning the way in which Canada can best continue as a nation—but that we are speaking of Canada, not some fragmentation of Canada; separatism is not an option for Canadians.

It is high time the leaders of the opposition parties endorsed this view without equivocation. The sooner we reject the options which would patently destroy Canada, the sooner we can get on with the job of choosing among the options which would preserve Canada. It may be that this rejection will require an intervention of the heart rather than of the mind, but being a Canadian is not entirely an intellectual exercise; there is something visceral about it, too. Let no Canadian be ashamed to show that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): We have had a very good debate so far, Mr. Speaker, and there are many aspects which could be dealt with in speaking on this subject. One matter which has not been dealt with at any length concerns the great difficulty which Canada experiences in subscribing to international agreements, dating back to the labour conventions of the 1930s when we found we could not sign a treaty in connection with an agreement on labour legislation, and continuing until recent days at the United Nations.

I recall that when I had the honour to represent Canada at that body for a number of years, we were constantly faced with this problem when resolutions were presented having to do with education and other matters. Canada was obliged to abstain from voting. Countries with unitary government could not understand Canada's position. They could not understand why a country such as Canada, a forward-looking country, could not support resolutions concerning human rights, education and the like. It was almost impossible to explain to them why Canada and Australia, for instance, could not fix their names to these resolutions. This is something which must be dealt with when constitutional reform is carried out.

I was most interested in the speech this afternoon of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen). This minister is one of the ablest debaters on the government side of the House. Today he made a very loud speech. I find that when people make loud speeches it is usually for the purpose of covering up a weak case. In this instance, if I recall correctly, he was telling us that the government was seeking a national consensus with regard to the constitution.

I can understand his point of view. I can understand the tortoise-like pace the government has been setting in this regard. It is understandable when we realize that among the hon. gentleman's colleagues there is no consensus at all about what the constitution should contain.

I have here some reports from the press which reflect the thinking of members of the cabinet with respect to the constitution. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) may close the debate, and perhaps he will take the opportunity to explain the position he took about a year ago as reported in the Toronto Telegram of March 22, 1968, when he said:

> Provincial governments should be permitted the same right as private broadcasters in operating radio and television networks, Liberal leadership candidate John Turner said last night.
> The new distribution of power should empower the provincial governments to establish their own radio and T.V. networks, provided all technical control and all apparatus was maintained by the federal government to prevent anarchy. This indicates that consumer affairs minister Turner supports demands by Quebec to set up its own radio and television network.

Then we have the view of the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) as to what should be done in connection with the constitution. I refer to the Globe and Mail of March 27, 1968, where the following appears:

> Warning that bilingualism and biculturalism are not the whole answer to Canada's unity problem, Eric Kierans yesterday staked out a constitutional position which would open the door to a special status for Quebec.

Now I come to another quotation from the Minister of Justice. This appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of March 2, 1968:

> Among social security programs which could be transferred to the provinces were federal family allowances and old age pensions, but the unemployment insurance program should remain a mixed field of jurisdiction.

Then there is the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp). I refer to the Toronto Star of March 22, 1968, in which the following appears:

> Sharp said Canadians must be ready to accept sweeping constitutional changes to satisfy Quebec's aspirations.

I could dwell at length on this aspect; it seems to me I have even juicier quotations in front of me. I was interested in the minister's statement that the government was seeking a consensus with regard to the constitution. All I can say is, they had better find a consensus among their own members before starting on anybody else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nesbitt: We heard this afternoon from the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney). He began his speech with a quotation—"Common status for all; special status for none". It must be difficult for the hon. member for Calgary to believe this when his seniors in the cabinet hold such a diversity of views as to the form the constitution should take. None of them appears to agree with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), which is very odd.

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration spent most of his time this afternoon making cracks at the expense of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). He referred to his speech as one which would be called the "our days are numbered" speech. All I can say in this regard, Mr. Speaker, is that one might regard the minister's speech as a "head-in-sand" speech, or "pretend that the provincial opposition to the government's proposal is not there, and maybe the objections will go away". The minister took particular objection to the Leader of the Opposition's suggestion that the proposals of the government were not meeting with success even though the government had a nine-point program.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, there is one thing we must be quite clear about. It is that despite what was said by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration this afternoon, I have not been able to find agreement on any of the major constitutional problems of this country. It is true that the question about the administration in Ottawa being bilingual was mentioned, but that is not a constitutional problem. There has been no major agreement on any of the major constitutional problems that were before the conferences already held. As far as I could find out, the only agreement has been to put a certain number of things on the agenda for further discussion; that is about all it amounts to.

We have only to look to the minister's colleagues to dispute what he said, Mr. Speaker. I refer to a prominent member of cabinet who not long ago said that the Prime Minister was not having much success with his federal-provincial conferences. If my memory serves me correctly, this matter was brought before the House by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) not long ago.

Unfortunately, in this House we are all limited in time, and there are still one or two matters I should like to deal with in some detail. I should like to turn my attention briefly to the latest federal proposals made at the constitutional conference some weeks ago. I hope that my remarks will illustrate why the federal proposals, in themselves, provide a most unsatisfactory base upon which to found the discussions of the special parliamentary committee. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration said this afternoon that matters of social welfare had not been dealt with. I propose to deal with them now.

First of all, the proposals make very few changes of any substance in the constitutional status quo in so far as they relate to income support and social service programs. It appears to be essentially a reply to the position of the government of Quebec, a position which is explicitly rejected. The proposal asserts that the federal government must have an equal right to make payments to individuals in income support programs and the like. I find nothing remarkable in this, in that it represents the status quo and I would think it intolerable to deny the federal government such a role. The only rationale one can find for the statement is that it is simply another rigid reply to Quebec.

We find a similar situation with respect to the proposals which relate to the control of health and social services. Here the provincial position is again affirmed while the federal right to involvement in these areas, wherever there is a national need, is maintained and justified through the spending power. This is but another example, of which there are many in this document, of the federal government seeming to propose something new but in fact merely asserting the status quo.

Unfortunately, there is nothing in the proposals which suggests that the federal government might be planning badly needed consolidation of the federal welfare program; neither is a change in the constitutional division of powers suggested. The document explicitly leaves the field, as it relates for example to the idea of a guaranteed income, to both levels of government. It says nothing about which level would have priority, or how conflicts would be resolved. That problem, however, may be an entirely theoretical one because, as I suggested, there is no indication that the federal government plans to use its present powers, or any future powers it might acquire, to do anything about welfare.

In general, I welcome the assertion that the federal government has a wide range of power to act in order to alleviate the unhappy situation of individuals and provinces through the constitutional spending power. Since the Second World War, use of the practically unrestricted federal spending power has enabled Canadian governments to do as much as has been done to create more equal opportunities in the less favoured regions of the country. We must recognize, however, that the federal spending power has been abused at times and that extreme care must be used in the future. It may now be desirable, in fact, to spell out the provision that the federal spending power should not be used as a means of getting around any agreed constitutional division of powers.

The document tries to make a distinction between what are called income security programs, income insurance and social services. The distinction is very unclear and fuzzy. The definitions used are often circuitous. I find it difficult to say whether I agree that social services should be exclusively provincial, because it is almost impossible to tell what the federal government means by this section of the proposal. I gather it would be left entirely to the courts to decide whether a program was mainly one of income security and therefore under federal jurisdiction, or whether it was mainly one of social services and therefore under provincial jurisdiction.

There is no question that the distribution of jurisdiction relating to social services and social welfare is considered to be very important by some provinces. That being so, it is very important that we are clear on how the powers are divided, if they are to be divided. I think it most unsatisfactory to propose leaving this distinction to the courts. The problem is really one of policy, not one of law, and legal solutions such as the courts provide are of use primarily in solving legal problems. What we need in this regard is a clear distinction and definition in terms of policy.

The federal government in its document also asserts its jurisdiction to handle special cases such as involving Indians and veterans. In general, this responsibility must continue. But we must be careful that we do not get into another constitutional straitjacket. One wonders, for example, about the possibility of making Indians full provincial citizens and integrating them into the provincial political system. There might be similar problems with respect to the handling of immigrants.

What is most important is constitutional flexibility—a fairly clear delineation in terms of policy as to what powers should belong to whom, and who is responsible for doing what, while at the same time maintaining freedom of manœuvre. The federal proposals do not seem to take into account the evidence that a number of provincial governments are concerned about Indians, are concerned about immigrants, and some are even concerned about veterans, strange as those ideas might appear to the federal government. Do I understand from the federal proposals that the federal government proposes to take no account whatever of these provincial interests?

The federal proposals do envision one substantial change in the present distribution of power. Unfortunately, the proposal is highly controversial and seems designed only to provoke the province of Quebec and hostility from other provinces, to no apparent good end. I refer to the proposal to change the 1951 amendment to the British North America Act, the one which made pensions a matter of joint jurisdiction and gave the provinces priority. The federal government which brought about 1951 amendment now proposes to change the priority from provincial to federal. Why, one is not told; and what would be accomplished thereby is not at all clear.

There is no point in changing this part of the British North America Act unless a change in the program itself is contemplated. There are essentially two programs, and only two: one is the Quebec Pension Plan and the other is the Canada Pension Plan. Both seem to be working very well and the provincial governments in particular are pleased with the funds which are made available to them through the Canada Pension Plan.

There would seem to be only two possible reasons for wishing such a change. The federal government should tell us now which of the two reasons it is. The first is the possibility that the federal government wishes to eliminate the Quebec Pension Plan and to integrate the people in the province of Quebec into the same kind of pension program which exists in the rest of Canada. The second possibility is that the federal government wants to change the Canada Pension Plan to a kind of gigantic money-grab. It may wish to see the funds which the provincial governments now have for their own capital development transferred to the federal treasury, so it can squander at will as it has been so used to doing. There may be a third reason, but it is not at all clear what that might be and it is incumbent on this government to tell the country what it has in mind and why it is making this particular proposal. If I may sum up this point, the working paper is probably best interpreted as a direct rebuff to the proposals of the province of Quebec.

There is nothing wrong with the federal government stating where it stands in relation to other proposals, but it should never do so in the deliberately provocative way that it has. Its use of the word "tentative" to describe what has been the explicit and detailed policy of the government of Quebec during the past six or seven years indicates a general attitude which I think is highly undesirable. This is simply confrontation politics and contributes in no way at all to Canadian unity. The degree of inflexibility indicated in the federal working paper on social services and income security is in no way desirable. It is a symptom, I should say, of the autocracy and rigidity which marks the policy of the present federal administration.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have been able to attend the House during most of this debate. If I may say with respect to the House, and I feel sure hon. members will generally agree, it has been a first-class debate. I have enjoyed it thoroughly. I think it has in some way highlighted for the people of Canada the importance of this exercise in constitutional review and its importance for the future of our country.

I know there have been critics of the way the constitutional review has been conducted. Criticisms have been expressed both in the country at large and, indeed, during the course of this debate. We have heard it said that the entire process of constitutional review is irrelevant to the main issues and questions that are before the country, and that the government in proceeding to a deliberate review of the constitution and the British North America Act is not dealing with what have been called the gut issues facing Canada. I think Premier Thatcher put it in the strongest possible terms when he said that the province of Saskatchewan may have had 100 problems facing the future of the people of Saskatchewan, but the constitution was the 101st. In any event, that has been said.

The critics have maintained that the government should be dealing with the main issues of the day and should be concentrating its attention on efforts of reform in respect of the issues of cities such as traffic, transportation, urban renewal, housing and pollution; that it should be directing its efforts toward overcoming the poisoning of our environment on land, in the waters and in the air; that it should be concentrating on developing a national resources policy and on taking an inventory of those resources and assuring the production and manufacturing of these resources in Canada under Canadian control. These critics have said we should be dealing with issues that are economic, particularly those now affecting the country—inflation, the cost of living, prices, rents and wages.

I think the first answer to all this criticism is that we categorically deny that we have not been dealing with these issues. Indeed, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has said, no program of any advantage to the people of Canada has in any way been delayed or postponed by reason of this constitutional review.

I think the more fundamental answer is perhaps to recognize that there are many people in Canada, and might I say many people in this House of Commons, who fail to appreciate the relevance of the constitution, as a fundamental document under which we conduct our affairs in a federal state, to the problems of our everyday life. They fail to recognize that the British North America Act is a fundamental and primary document affecting the relationship between federal and provincial governments. By the very process of reviewing that document we are dealing with the gut issues facing Canada; we are dealing with the bread and butter issues of this nation. A federal state by its very nature involves limitation on the powers and authority of the federal government, and corresponding limitations on the authority of provincial governments. These limitations of powers are set forth primarily in articles 91 and 92 of the British North America Act. This distribution of powers was agreed to over 100 years ago.

There are those who maintain that the constitution was largely rewritten by decisions of the Privy Council, particularly under the auspices of Lord Watson and Lord Haldane over the years, and that the document as currently interpreted by the courts does not resemble what the Fathers of Confederation intended to say and have written down.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

New economic realities permit many people to question the current application of that distribution of powers as set forth in the BNA Act. Regarding the concentration in urban centres, the Economic Council of Canada suggests that by 1980 over 80 per cent of us will be living in large metropolitan areas in this country. Regional disparity is growing and the gaps are growing wider. This was eloquently put by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis)—this has happened since the French-speaking Canadians have a new awareness of their own cultural identity particularly in Quebec.

For what it is worth, my own view is that in the past generation the federal government has failed to exercise fully its available constitutional powers, the powers available to the federal government under the present constitution of Canada. For what it is worth, I feel that the federal government over the past generation has failed to test its constitutional muscle before the courts of this country, when such testing was necessary. I believe the federal government has been constitutionally timid. Perhaps it has been traumatized by past decisions of the Privy Council.

Certainly I would think, and submit to the House and Your Honour, that we as a federal government and as a Parliament of the people of Canada, have been insufficiently resourceful in testing the trade and commerce clause, the residual clause of peace, order and good government, and in confining property and civil rights to its proper ambit. We have placed overreliance on the criminal power, particularly as it has been used to regulate economic affairs. I refer particularly to the Combines Investigation Act which is really economic regulation and control by criminal power. This involves a stiffer burden of proof than the state can discharge in many cases. This has resulted in the merger clauses becoming ineffective. It prevents the ordinary citizen from obtaining civil damages from those who monopolize and conspire to fix prices. It also prevents cease and desist orders and injunctions to prevent action in respect of which a remedy is sought.

Notwithstanding my view that we have been constitutionally timid, I think the critics fail to realize or admit that the ultimate long-term solution to the economic and environmental issues in Canada—those issues which will demand our attention in the 1970s—involve a review of the fundamental constitutional framework under which the country operates.

I suggest that the federal government ought to explore exclusive jurisdiction or at least joint jurisdiction over these areas. The point was well taken by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair). The federal government should explore this jurisdiction in respect of matters or urban renewal and other urban issues, the environment, resources, development, inflation, consumer credit, and so on.

It is true that the Prime Minister and this government have recognized this. On the other hand, there may be other powers now found in article 91 that might now be more conveniently exercised and more efficiently exercised by the provinces. I think we should envisage more flexibility in joint jurisdiction and in the transferring and delegation of powers from one jurisdiction to another under proper circumstances.

The Leader of the Opposition accused the Prime Minister of playing confrontation politics with Quebec. I am not going to get involved in an argument at this stage, but I suggest to him that a federal state by its very nature involves confrontation at times between the federal and provincial jurisdictions. There is always a flowing and ebbing of power to and fro in these jurisdictions. This is particularly true between Ottawa and Quebec.

[Translation]

The province of Quebec objects to certain centralizing influences which can be acceptable to other provinces. Why? Because the province of Quebec is the home of a people, because the French Canadian people has its own traditions, its own language, its own law.

If I were a French Canadian, living in the province of Quebec, I would insist on two things. First, I would insist on the need for a heavy representation in the House and in the federal cabinet. I would insist also to see the French Canadians adequately represented in Ottawa, and it seems obvious to me that they are not too badly represented in this government, for the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is one of them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Turner: In fact, French Canadians have been appointed Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Minister of National Defence, Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Secretary of State. There are also other ministers of great talent who represent here the French Canadian fact in North America.

Then, if I were a French Canadian living in Quebec, I would insist on the principle that Quebec must be strong, have enough resources to fulfil its responsibilities under the constitution, and enjoy enough constitutional powers to mobilize the forces of its identity, something which invariably leads to a conflict of interests between the federal and the provincial governments.

It is necessary that there be confrontation from time to time in order to clarify the terms for the Canadian public.

• (9:40 p.m.)

[English]

I should like to say a few words about the current status of the negotiations at the federal-provincial conferences. It seems to me we have not yet had a joinder of issue. The federal positions have been set forth on a number of major items. They have been published and hon. members are aware of the publication. Therefore, it is not necessary for me to recite them. Except for the province of Quebec, the province of New Brunswick and in respect of certain issues the province of Manitoba, the provinces have been reluctant to reveal their own hands. There has been a failure to come to grips or, as lawyers would say, to join issue with the federal government so that true discussion can be possible.

It has also been suggested that negotiation in respect of a constitution under the lights of television may not be too productive because this may not be the best possible atmosphere. For my own part, I believe in an open democracy. So far as television is concerned, I believe it is inevitable that television will be brought into the proceedings of committees and into this chamber so that the ordinary person in Canada will be placed in the position of people in the galleries. If this means the rules will have to be revised to accommodate this place to the instrument of instant communication, then the rules will have to be revised. At any rate, at the federal-provincial conferences we will now have working sessions, an euphemism for closed sessions.

A new or revised constitution is not easily packaged. There is no instant solution. I say to the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. Flemming) that there is no reason the British North America Act cannot be the base from which we operate. There will be some hard negotiation, not only between governments but between regions and the people living in these regions.

The Prime Minister and this government have opened a total review of the constitution. There will be give and take concerning what we believe the people of Canada as a whole should have in terms of legislative authority, and what the people of individual regions and provinces should have. There will be hard bargaining. I want to suggest to the hon. member for York South, who made his usual able contribution to this debate, that perhaps he is using sophistry when he suggested the conferences so far have been merely exercises in auctioneering whereby the provincial and federal governments auction power at the expense of the Canadian people.

A new constitution or any amendment to a constitution implies some bargaining. We will concede to the hon. member and to the House that the negotiations cannot be solely between governments but must be between the provinces and the people of Canada who form this great country. The people of Canada must be involved. If they are to be involved, then we as a Parliament must be involved. We are the forum of the nation. We are still the theatre of this great country.

[Translation]

I do not intend to recapitulate all the arguments that have been advanced during the debate on the resolution before the House. No doubt, such a committee can very efficiently contribute to the examination in depth of the constitution presently in force.

However, the measure of this contribution will be, to a certain extent, determined by the way in which the committee's work will be co-ordinated with that of the federal and provincial governments. We also hope that the constitutional review will be strengthened by the combined voices of senators and members of Parliament.

[English]

For this reason, we see this committee as one having a positive and influential role if its work is to be related to the constitutional review process. The federal government and the provinces in their constitutional negotiations have, perforce, had to establish a plan, a methodology, for review. This has involved selecting certain areas for priority study, if only for the purpose of defining the issues. To the extent that there is a limitation proposed in the ambit of the study of the committee, it is the same limitation to which the federal government and the provinces will have to submit themselves in relation to the process of total review of the constitution. The discipline of some defined approach to constitutional review is implicit by the very nature of the enterprise, and that same discipline is all that is sought to he imposed on the committee.

It may well be asked: What is this process? I believe the Prime Minister has already outlined the background of our involvement in constitutional review and how the process went from a review of individual rights and the institutions of the federal government into a review of the division of powers. But the point he made with great force was that the total review of the constitution implies an organized review, a controlled review and a controlled development of our constitution. The federal government, as I have said, has sought to move from the rights of citizens and institutions of our federation into a study of the more contentious subjects involved in the division of powers. For this reason we have been concerned with questions relating to a charter of rights and the judiciary, two matters with which I have had a particular concern as chairman at the ministerial level.

The government hoped to place to the forefront, in a constitutional review, the reassessment of the protection of the rights of individuals in our society. We hope there will be an increased recognition of what we consider to be the necessity of formal recognition of certain basic rights of Canadians. We believe this should be implicit in the constitution of Canada. In fact, it seems to me it would be really inconceivable in respect of the establishment of a new constitutional framework for Canada if the principle of freedom of assembly, freedom of religion and freedom of speech were not enshrined as part of the constitution of this country.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And freedom from discrimination.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): If I can summarize the reasons for the establishment of the committee, I would say first that governments cannot operate in a vacuum. They need a responsive climate of public opinion. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) said rulers cannot decide the rules under which we are to be ruled. I agree. However, I think he would concede that governments have to lead and take responsibility. I believe this government has taken its responsibility and has declared itself by way of its propositions before the country. We have put ourselves on the line. The federal government has now declared its position on a number of items. Parliament should now review, test and probe those positions. As the Prime Minister said in his opening speech in introducing the resolution, Parliament should nurture the necessary consensus for nationhood. Constitutions in the past have been written only under the fire of crisis. A sense of urgency has had to dominate the minds of men before constitutions could be written or rewritten—revolution, anarchy, secession.

Our controlled procedure of rational discussion, discussion of the issues in the widest possible national form, is the first time in history that a nation has tried to anticipate and head-off a crisis, and to dissolve it before it crystallized, by rational discussion among free men.

[Translation]

Perhaps I could come back to the theme so eloquently developed during the debate by the member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau), a name which has a particular signification for all Canadians of good will. Indeed, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe who sat in the House for a long time and who for many years, headed the department I am honored of now being in charge of personified the open-mindedness that has always characterized French-speaking members and the whole French-speaking population.

This spirit springs from the desire of making our federal system work, of helping to build a strong and united Canada which, at the same time, makes room for linguistic, cultural and geographical variety. This is not to say that differences do not exist, but that we have the experience of different views, of a possible synthesis, of the acceptation of better solutions that are possible but not perfect.

We, the English-speaking Canadians have, in a certain way, lived under federalism, like the French-speaking Canadians for more than a 100 years.

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the minister, but the time allotted to him has expired. Unless he obtains the unanimous consent of the House, he cannot continue his speech.

Some hon. Members: Agreed!

Mr. Speaker: Agreed!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I sincerely thank my colleagues, Mr. Speaker.

Our experience is made up of pragmatism and generosity from both parts.

I am sure that the representatives of all political parties who took part in this debate are faithful to the same traditions.

But I must add that, for its part, the federal government will never give up its place as a front-line defender of National unity and efficient federalism. For that reason, we have been most diligent in the realization of our linguistic objectives as required by the Official Languages Act which, was drawn up in the light of public opinion.

In the constitutional field, we do not submit to this House any fixed and unchanging positions.

We merely suggest, a means of taking part in this review of the constitution, that is the creation of a parliamentary committee. This will allow for a greater political involvement in this process, as was pointed out by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Roberts) whose very wise words should be kept in mind by those who are interested in this question of constitutional review.

We ask the House to vote in favour of the motion. We believe that a parliamentary committee would make a great contribution to the long and detailed study which is at the very basis of any constitutional review.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, writing a new constitution or reworking the present one will demand reservoirs of good will, understanding and tolerance in Canada. This good will cannot be imposed upon the Canadian people by experts, bureaucrats or mandarins. Essentially, this process is a political one, reconciling the legitimate interests and approaches of various parts of Canada. It is a political one, but it need not be a partisan process. The issues are for the people to decide, not for experts to proclaim. This committee, if it meets the hopes of the government, and indeed the hopes of the House, will bring the constitution home to the people of Canada.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have made shorter speeches than the one I shall have to make tonight, but not many. Like the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) I should like to make the comment that this has been an excellent debate during which valuable contributions have been made from all quarters of the House, and indeed I should like to add to those who were commended by the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Justice himself with respect to the very useful contribution he made to this debate just now.

We all agree that the task of reviewing and rewriting our constitution is a difficult one. It seems to take a long time. There are many occasions when we feel frustrated, when there is the temptation to feel that it is hopeless. But because of the importance of a basic constitution to a country like ours, we must press forward, and I think it can be said that the Members of Parliament from all parts of Canada have made it clear during the course of this debate that that is what we shall do. I trust the result will be an excellent piece of work by this committee which will press forward the cause that is now in hand.

In the minute or two that are left there are one or two things I would like to say. In a sense, the Minister of Justice gave me a text to use for what I wanted to say when he asserted that at times the federal government has been too timid in testing its federal authority. Whether he noted it or not, I was applauding that statement and I welcome it. It does seem to me that one of the dangers, because of the time it is taking to review and rewrite our constitution, is for certain things that could now be done to be left undone or to be allowed to wait.

I was not impressed by the assertion of the Minister of Justice that nothing has been delayed because of this discussion. After all, that is an argument by assertion and the minister and I are both good at it. But the fact of the matter is that the minister was right when he said that this government has not tested the authority that it now has, and I name in particular such fields as housing, pollution and income security.

I quite disagree with the interpretation of the working paper on income security and social services that was offered tonight by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). I would say that whatever may be the outcome, there are areas of federal authority asserted in that document that no one will challenge, and the government should act on them now in terms of such programs as the guaranteed annual income and other ways of supporting the incomes of all the Canadian people.

As I said, in all these fields that I have indicated, such as housing, pollution and income security, and in the other fields that the Minister of Justice himself cited tonight, I do not think that the federal Parliament or the federal government have yet tested their authority to the extent that they might have done. I hope that concurrent with the attempt to rewrite our basic document and come up with a constitution that will stand us for many decades to come, this Parliament will insist on the government proceeding with policies and programs for which it now has authority and which this country and our people sorely need.

Mr. Speaker: It being ten o'clock, pursuant to special order made by the House yesterday it is my duty to put the question to the House. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to.

At 10 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, January 28, 1970

The House met at 2 p.m.

MANITOBA CENTENNIAL

DECLARATION BY MAYOR OF OTTAWA OF MANITOBA DAY

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Members of Parliament from Manitoba I should like to express sincere thanks to His Worship Mayor Fogarty of Ottawa for having declared that in Ottawa this is Manitoba Day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should also like to congratulate all those who have been fortunate enough to get tickets for tonight's performance of the Royal Winnipeg Ballet at the National Arts Centre, after which we shall enjoy a centennial birthday party, the hosts for which will be Mr. Schreyer, the premier of the province, and Mr. Maitland Steinkopf, Chairman of the Manitoba Centennial Corporation.

Perhaps in honour of this occasion the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition, my hon. friend from Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands and the hon. member for Shefford might like to wear Manitoba pins today.

Mr. Stanfield: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I already have a Manitoba pin.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, if I may add a brief word to what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, I should like to remind you and all members of the House that throughout this entire year Manitoba will be celebrating its centennial. There is an old saying that all wise men come from the east.

An hon. Member: Nova Scotia.

Mr. Dinsdale: Those of us who come from Manitoba will subscribe to that viewpoint, adding that the wiser they are, the faster they come. We cordially invite all hon. members to visit the Keystone province during 1970.

Mr. Speaker: To follow up the question of privilege which has just been raised, hon. members might allow me to bring to their attention the presence in the Speaker's gallery of Mr. Speaker Hanuschak and his wife.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure all hon. members will wish Mr. Speaker Hanuschak to convey to his colleagues in the Manitoba legislative assembly the greetings of their parliamentary colleagues in Ottawa.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

TABLING OF STATEMENT ON PROGRAM FOR BALANCE OF SESSION

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2) I should like to lay on the table of the House, in both official languages, a paper setting out details with respect to the business of the House for the balance of the session.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection whatsoever to the tabling of this document. In fact, the President of the Privy Council has been good enough to let some of us see it in advance. But I should like to enter a caveat against this being done under Standing Order 41(2).

It seems to me this is House business and that it would be more appropriate if the President of the Privy Council were to ask the unanimous consent of the House to table the document. I do not have my rule book open before me, but the pertinent Standing Order says that the minister may do this with respect to any statement that deals with any matter coming under the administrative responsibilities of the government. This statement has to do with the business of the House and, whatever territory the government may take in, it is not responsible for the administration of the House. I do not ask for a debate on the point of order or a ruling; I am satisfied to enter a caveat, although there may be other occasions when we may wish to argue the point further. But today it would be much better if the Government House Leader were to ask for unanimous consent, which I am sure he would get, for the tabling of this document.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the point of order Your Honour may recall that in the previous session we raised similar objections in connection with motions of the Minister of Finance and other ministers. Today I am prepared to say that our party will give its unanimous consent for the tabling of the document. However, I leave with Your Honour the caveat that while the Prime Minister and the President of the Privy Council are moving rapidly in the direction of making the House of Commons the administrative responsibility of the government, they have not quite reached that point. I wish to make that quite plain.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, may I point out, as hon. members have indicated, that the document in question concerns the business to be put before the House by the government and decisions to be recommended to the House with regard to times for the adjournment and resumption of the sittings of the House. Surely this quintessentially comes under the administrative responsibility of the government. It is the administrative responsibility of the government to bring forward legislation, and this document indicating at what times we anticipate bringing forward legislation comes under that heading.

I can understand that in some circumstances with regard to other matters concerning the internal operations of the House the objection raised might be made, but I would say quite clearly in response to the caveat that it is the responsibility of the government to bring legislation forward and this is what the document is about. Perhaps hon. members would agree that, for the convenience of the

[Mr. Knowles (Wininpeg North Centre).]

House, the document might be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard so that it could be readily referred to in future.

Mr. Baldwin: We agree, subject to the caveat.

Mr. Speaker: Since it is only a caveat that has been brought before the House today it will not be necessary for me to make a ruling. The President of the Privy Council has sought the unanimous agreement of the House for the purpose of having this document printed as an appendix to today's Hansard. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For text of document referred to above, see appendix "A".]

TRACTOR AND COMBINE PRICES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to ask for unanimous consent under Standing Order 43 for a motion to be put to the House. The matter is urgent and immediate as it involves the extremely important recommendations made by the Royal Commission on Farm Machinery in its special report on prices, dated December, 1969. This report took three and a half years to produce and deals with the excessively high prices of farm machinery, a matter of the most crucial importance to farmers today who, particularly in western Canada, are faced with a lack of funds to obtain essential equipment. In order to have the government consider and act on this report without further delay, I ask for consent to move the following motion:

That the special report on prices of tractors and combines in Canada and other countries and the recommendations set out in such report be forthwith referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43 the motion can be put to the House only if there is unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Since there is not unanimous consent I regret that the motion cannot be put at this time.

LAY-OFFS OF CNR TELECOMMUNICATIONS EMPLOYEES, ATLANTIC REGION

Question No. 392—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys):

1. How many employees of the Canadian National Railways in the Telecommunications Branch in the Atlantic Region have been informed that their services are no longer required either at the present time or in the future and what action will be taken by the CNR as far as job protection is concerned?

2. Did the CNR inform the Minister of Transport of its intended action in this regard, and (a) if so, what action is he taking as far as job protection is concerned (b) if not, for what reason?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. As a result of technological advances, operational and organizational changes and staffing adjustments dictated by declining patronage, since November 1, 1969, 18 employees located throughout the provinces of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick have been given notice of lay off. Those affected may avail themselves of every consideration within the context of the existing Labour Agreements such as exercise seniority rights, retraining, early retirement and severance pay.

2. No. (a) Not applicable; (b) Such actions are within the jurisdiction of management and are governed by the applicable labour agreements.

ELDON POWERIDE CAR

Question No. 564—Mrs. MacInnis:

PUBLICATION OF BULLETIN, "LABOUR NEWS HEADLINES"

Question No. 647—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys):

1. What is the reason for the publication by the Department of Labour of the Labour News Headlines?

2. On what date was the publication of this information bulletin initiated, how many people are involved in the publication of this bulletin and what is the estimated annual cost of same?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): 1. The main reason for the publication of this bulletin is to assist in keeping the Minister of Labour, the Deputy Minister, other Senior Officers of the Department and Information Staffs abreast of major industrial relations news, editorial opinion, and special features appearing in the daily press and industrial journals. However, as a result of a growing number of requests, the Department recognized there was a valid and widespread interest for such information in areas such as educational institutions and the general business and labour community.

2. The bulletin, more or less in its present form and for internal Departmental use only commenced daily publication on August 8, 1955. The first edition for expanded distribution outside the Department was issued November 21, 1969.

Six people are involved part-time in its publication and the estimated current total annual cost, including prorated labour costs, is $3,452.19.

765 copies of the bulletin are distributed outside the Department (including circulation to the Senate and the House of Commons) at an estimated additional cost of $332.01 per year. This figure is included in the above total.

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence between the federal Food and Drug Directorate and Canadian drug manufacturers regarding changes in Canada's drug regulations.

Motion agreed to.

NRC CONSULTANT REPORT, ERWICK, CURRY AND PARTNERS LIMITED

Motion No. 314—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by Erwick, Curry and Partners Limited undertaken for the National Research Council as mentioned in answer to Question Number 2,452 of the past Session.

Motion agreed to.

TERMS OF REFERENCE, FARM MACHINERY COMMISSION

Motion No. 328—Mr. Burton:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all correspondence and other documents exchanged between the Privy Council and the Barber Commission on Farm Machinery concerning the terms of reference and the scope of inquiry of the said Commission.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

Mr. Forest: Mr. Speaker, notices of motions Nos. 264, 291 and 303 are acceptable to the government, subject to the usual reservations concerning confidential papers and to the authorization of the government authorities concerned.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations or conditions expressed by the hon. parliamentary secretary is it the pleasure of the House that notices of motion Nos. 264, 291 and 303 be deemed to have been adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

REGIONAL AIRPORT, VICTORIAVILLE, QUE.

Motion No. 264—Mr. Fortin:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence, reports, briefs and other documents submitted to the Government of Canada regarding the construction and development of a regional airport in Victoriaville, Quebec.

Motion agreed to.

BABB CONSTRUCTION WATER SYSTEM CONTRACT, ENGLEE, NFLD.

Motion No. 291—Mr. Burton:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the contract awarded to Babb Construction Limited of Harbour Grace, Newfoundland by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion regarding the construction of a water system at Englee, Newfoundland.

Motion agreed to.

PROPOSED NATIONAL PARK, SHIP HARBOUR, N.S.

Motion No. 303—Mr. Forrestall:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada and the Government of Nova Scotia, together with copies of any proposed plans dealing with the establishment of a National Park at or near Ship Harbour, Nova Scotia.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

Mr. Forest: Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notices of motions Nos. 1, 171, 199 and 256?

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining notices of motions be allowed to stand.

[English]

COPPER EXPORTS

Motion No. 1—Mr. Saltsman:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all export permits granted for copper exports for the period January 1, 1969, to September 30, 1969.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Stand.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY COST STRUCTURE STUDY

Motion No. 171—Mr. Saltsman:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the study by economist David F. Smith of the Mechanical Transport Branch, Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce on "The Effects of Canada-United States Wage Parity Upon the Cost Structure of the Canadian Automotive Industries".

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Stand.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Motions for Papers

DISCONTINUANCE OF PRODUCTION BY KAISER JEEP CANADA LTD.

Motion No. 199—Mr. Broadbent:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all correspondence between the Government of Canada and Kaiser Jeep Canada Ltd. regarding the discontinuation of its production activities in Canada.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce wishes to inform the hon. member that the correspondence requested includes confidential information on the internal affairs of the parent corporation and the Canadian company's performance under the automotive agreement. Such information is proprietary and its disclosure could have a serious effect not only with this particular parent corporation and its future Canadian operations but with other companies, as well, which have provided similar information in confidence. In view of this, the minister would ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Broadbent: I agree, Mr. Speaker.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVE GRANTS

Motion No. 256—Mr. Burton:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of a list of the 278 development incentive grants made by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion from January to mid-November 1969, and in each case (a) the name and address of the firm receiving the grant (b) the amount of grant received (c) the total estimated capital cost of the project (d) the nature of the project for which the grant was provided and its location (e) the number of new jobs created as a result of the project?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the cases referred to are not grants paid out but offers made. The details requested will be made public in all cases when the project is proceeded with, and before any grant is actually paid. But at the offer stage, confidentiality is essential to the program.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary has consulted with me on this matter. The information provided leads me to the conclusion that the department's press release of November 19 announcing the number of new jobs created in 1969 is a hoax and a fraud. Therefore I ask that this motion be put to a vote.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is transferred for debate.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, may I inquire when I may expect notice of motion No. 80 standing in my name, which has been on the Order Paper since October 23, to be called?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I will inquire, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, can the House Leader also say when notice of motion No. 32 under my name as of October 23 will be called?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I shall make that inquiry as well, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my inquiry of the President of the Privy Council relates to a notice of motion for the production of papers which has been passed. I refer to No. 30 passed on December 17, 1969, having to do with the report of Professor Jeremy Williams on the subject of conflict of interest legislation. Can the minister say when this document, already ordered, will be tabled?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Today or tomorrow, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire about Notices of Motion Nos. 295 and 296 placed on the order paper on December 9. It seems to me it should have been possible to deal with these motions before now.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

NATIONAL DEFENCE

AVAILABILITY OF INFORMATION FROM ALLIES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence what the policy of the government is in light of the fact that our allies have reduced substantially Canada's accessibility to military and strategic information, a situation which could be very serious for the future of our defence activities?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Leader of the Opposition is drawing conclusions that are not warranted by the testimony to which he is obviously referring.

Mr. Stanfield: Am I to take from the minister's statement that there is no concern about this matter? May I ask the minister whether he or anybody else on behalf of the government has made any representations to our allies with regard to the exchange of military and strategic information, which apparently took place formerly quite freely?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, we have many allies and I believe it would be useful if the allies to which he is referring were identified.

An hon. Member: Don't you know them?

An hon. Member: You haven't any left.

An hon. Member: We had.

An hon. Member: We are losing them, though.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, am I to take it from the reply of the minister that he is simply evading his responsibility in this regard—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: —and that the government of Canada—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, will the minister advise the House whether it is a fact that he has received reports from Canadian officers posted to establishments in the United States to the effect that they are finding restrictions placed upon them with regard to access to information and also participation in discussions as a result of the reduction in Canada's participation both in NATO and SACLANT?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, now we are talking about the United States. I am very happy to have this identification.

An hon. Member: You are smart.

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): My hon. friend is obviously referring to the testimony given the day before yesterday before the committee by Dr. Lindsey. I believe Dr. Lindsey said that in the scientific field some of the information is released on a need-to-know basis. I think it would be a big step to conclude from that that there is some restriction on the exchange of military information.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a further supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will allow the hon. member's supplementary in a moment, but I think I should caution hon. members that this might not be the place to discuss evidence given before a committee when that committee has not yet reported.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Very much so, Mr. Speaker, but will the minister kindly inform us whether there have been reports by Canadian officers from various military bases in the United States which in fact indicate there has been a restriction placed upon them?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): I am glad to have this opportunity to deny such an assertion.

An hon. Member: Why didn't you say that in the first place?

OIL

CONTINUED PARTICIPATION IN PANARCTIC OILS LIMITED

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development may I direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister regarding Panarctic Oils Limited in which the Canadian government has a 45 per cent equity. In view of the fact that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has said, "We do not know whether we will sell or continue to participate," I want to ask the Prime Minister whether the government has made a decision either to continue to participate and to put up its share of the $10 million expansion or has decided to withdraw from the Panarctic Oil consortium?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): This question has been taken up by the government and an announcement will be made in due course.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the government considering the advisability of acquiring a controlling interest in the Panarctic Oil consortium in view of the recent developments in oil exploration in the Northwest Territories?

Mr. Trudeau: This question has not been considered in the context in which the hon. member has put it. It was considered at the outset in the setting-up of Panarctic.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ISRAELI-ARAB CONFLICT—REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING SALE OF ARMS TO BELLIGERENTS

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Has the government of Canada expressed its concern to some powers that are sending arms to the belligerent countries in the Middle East and does it intend to ask France and the United States, for instance, to stop supporting the war between Israelis and Arabs?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As the House knows, Canada is not supplying arms to either side in this conflict and has urged in the United Nations and elsewhere that this should be the practice of all countries, including France and others who are supplying arms to that area.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Have these countries to whom we have shown our concern given any affirmative answer to the minister?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Obviously not, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING CULTURAL AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND BELGIUM

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Has Canada received through its ambassador in Brussels, or through any other means, representations from the Belgian government with a view to amending or terminating the cultural agreement between Belgium and Canada?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I do not think so, Mr. Speaker, but I would have to check. My recollection is, no.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Can he inform the House whether this agreement enables Quebec to sign agreements with Belgium for cultural and technical exchanges? If not, does Canada intend to amend this agreement in order to enable Quebec to have exchanges with Belgium?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: I think the position of the government in this respect is very well known, that is that Canada is responsible for its foreign relations with other countries. It is quite possible, within that ambit of course, for close relations in cultural and educational matters with other countries, but we must insist that no government in Canada other than the government of Canada can act as if it were a sovereign state.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

INVITATION FROM MAURITANIA TO ATTEND CONFERENCE OF FRENCH-SPEAKING MINISTERS OF EDUCATION

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Could the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell us if Canada has been invited by Mauritania to attend the conference of the ministers of education of French-speaking countries? If so, is it the government's intention to accept the invitation and send the same delegation as the one who represented Canada at the Paris conference last December?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is yes, Canada has received an invitation. We have not yet replied to it.

[Translation]

POLICY RESPECTING DELEGATIONS TO FRANCE

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

Could the Secretary of State for External Affairs inform the House whether the way of selecting the Paris delegation is the official and final one or whether it will be modified?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the general principles underlying the participation of Quebec or any other province in Canadian delegations are laid out in the documents that were tabled at the time of the constitutional conference. That remains our policy.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ALLEGED MISLEADING ADVERTISING BY IMPERIAL TOBACCO COMPANY

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Is he in a position to say whether his department has launched an investigation into allegations of misleading advertising by Imperial Tobacco in connection with the marketing of a new brand of cigarettes in the province of Alberta, and would the minister undertake to advise the House of the results of such inquiry?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not at this time able to go beyond what I said the other day.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question. Can the minister say whether the interests of those who are claiming significant winnings as a result of the Imperial Tobacco Company's promotion program will be taken into consideration?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South.

IMMIGRATION

DEPORTATION OF JERRY MYRIC MIHM AND FAMILY—REQUEST FOR INTERVENTION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister on a matter which may not have been brought to his attention and which he may want to take into consideration. It arises out of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada that a Mr. Jerry Myric Mihm, his wife and children should be deported from Canada in accordance with an order of the Immigration Department. Would the Prime Minister consider and discuss with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration the possibility of letting this family remain in Canada despite the decision of the Supreme Court in view of the fact that deportation under present circumstances would cause great hardship to the family?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the matter has not been brought to my attention. I thank the hon. member for doing so. I will ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to advise me on the subject.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MONTREAL WATERFRONT—PUBLICATION OF REPORT

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour following upon other questions that have been asked in the House. Is the minister now ready to make public the findings of the Smith Commission report relating to the harbour of Montreal?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I anticipate making the report public by next Wednesday. The report was authorized by the then Minister of Labour under a section of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, and it is not necessary to table it in the House. It will be made public to the parties concerned, and I think in view of the unusual interest in the report I will however table it not later than next Wednesday.

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Labour. In view of the suggestion made yesterday by Mr. Beaudet, the port manager, that the pilferage was so mysterious that it might have something to do with the signs of the zodiac, I would like to ask the minister if he is waiting for a favourable astrological sign to release the Smith report?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

FREEDOM OF JOINT COMMITTEE TO MAKE DECISIONS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister prompted by a report that the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville is to be appointed co-chairman of the Joint Committee on the Constitution, together with an unnamed French-Canadian Senator. Without in any way disparaging the qualifications of the hon. member, I would ask the Prime Minister to assure the House that at least at this early point in the committee's history that the government will keep its hands off the committee and allow it to come to its own decisions.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Quite gladly, Mr. Speaker. I was surprised to see the story in the Globe and Mail indicating that the hon. member's appointment would be confirmed shortly by the Prime Minister. Surely a paper that knows so much about Parliament should know the Prime Minister does not confirm such appointments.

Mr. Baldwin: It knows the Prime Minister.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CONSERVATION REGULATIONS AND LAND USE POLICIES

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and also for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, but since they are unfortunately not with us today and it concerns both their departments, as well as that of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I will address my question to the Prime Minister. In view of recent matters that were before the House, and also in view of renewed concern over possible pollution in the Arctic following the discovery of oil by Imperial Oil Limited near the mouth of the Mackenzie River, when can the House expect a meaningful statement on government plans regarding conservation regulations and land use policies in the Northwest Territories, the Yukon Territory and the Arctic Islands?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, is the question related to the land or to the Arctic area in general? I missed the preamble to the question.

Mr. Nesbitt: Your Honour, I realize the Prime Minister has many things on his mind, and perhaps with your permission I might repeat the question.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the question might be made just a bit shorter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad to accept your suggestion. I said—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nesbitt: I am quite prepared to wait, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time will expire pretty soon.

Mr. Nesbitt: I am sorry that because of the disturbance I cannot hear Your Honour's advice on the matter. Will Your Honour allow me now to rephrase my question to the Prime Minister? When may members of the House expect a meaningful statement on government plans regarding conservation regulations and land use policies in the Northwest Territories, the Yukon Territory, the Arctic Islands and the waters lying between?

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nesbitt: I ask this question, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked it twice. Perhaps he could get a reply now.

Mr. Trudeau: It came out a little clearer that time, Mr. Speaker. Concerning the addendum to the question, that of course will be dealt with by the government when it discusses the legislation which was announced in the Speech from the Throne concerning anti-pollution measures in the Arctic. The other aspects of the question come under the policies of the Canadian government with regard to pollution in waters under the Canada Water Act. There are also measures being contemplated in other areas concerning, for instance, gas and oil pollution.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the contents of the Prime Minister's reply as far as it went, but I would ask him this question. In view of the fact that legislation from several departments obviously is coming forward, as announced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs the other evening, and in view of the fact that some of these matters are pretty urgent and of great public concern, could the Prime Minister tell us when his ministers will be able to make a statement dealing with those matters which do not need legislation at the present time?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

POLLUTION

NON-PHOSPHATE DETERGENT RESEARCH

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. Given the fact that housewives through the daily use of detergents are forced to contribute heavily and unwillingly to water pollution in Canada, is the government considering asking the National Research Council to initiate an emergency research program to develop a non-phosphate, non-pollutive detergent?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think that this question, important though it is, ought normally to be placed on the Order Paper. If it is a matter of great urgency it might be debated at the time of adjournment.

Mrs. MacInnis: Ten o'clock.

SPORTS

APPEARANCE OF HOCKEY CANADA BEFORE COMMITTEE

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the withdrawal of Canada from the international ice hockey tournament and its implications for the future of our national game, would the minister use his good offices to arrange for Hockey Canada to appear soon before the appropriate standing committee of the House?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to give consideration to that suggestion.

Mr. Rose: As a supplementary and related question, does the minister intend in the near future to make a statement on motions regarding the government's sports policy, elaborating on the statement he made on this subject outside the House on February 27?

Mr. Munro: No, Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to make a statement in the House.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

DISPOSITION OF PROCEEDS FROM RESERVATION PASTURE DEVELOPMENT

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Under the new pasture development plan for Indian reservations, are these pastures for Indian cattle only and, if not, will the Indians receive all the moneys from the development of these pastures?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that this question should be placed on the Order Paper.

Mr. Horner: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I raise this question today because the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development released a press statement today that should have been made in the House. He should be here to explain and answer questions. This is why I ask the question today.

TRADE

REASON FOR LOSS OF ORDER BY DAVIE SHIPBUILDING COMPANY

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Rural Development.

The president of Davie Shipbuilding has stated that construction of 24 ships for Greece at Lauzon would not be carried out, because of administrative delays on the part of authorities in Ottawa.

Can the minister inform us whether he agrees with the assertion of administrative delays?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will, I am sure, appreciate that the question, in its present form is out of order.

The Minister of Economic Regional Expansion on a point of order.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to mention that there is no Minister of Rural Development in the federal government.

[English]

COMBINES

REVIEW OF RETAIL GROCERY INDUSTRY IN PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is an old one given renewed urgency by last week's announcement by Dominion Stores Limited of its withdrawal from the Calgary and Edmonton markets in accord, as its press release said, "with our over-all long-term plans for expansion and growth." Since this withdrawal involves the concurrent expansion of the already impressive market penetration of Canada Safeway Limited in those cities, can the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should ask the question. He is making an argument. He should not make a speech but ask the question.

Mr. Mahoney: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In view of all that, can the minister assure the House that the Combines Investigation Branch will give top priority to a review of the retail grocery industry in the prairies and particularly in Alberta?

An hon. Member: "It's all because of the meat."

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Because the hon. member for Calgary South is always on the job—

Mr. Baldwin: Too bad you were not.

Mr. Basford: —I and the director under the Combines Investigation Branch are aware of the situation and he will deal with it under the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

NEWFOUNDLAND—SIGNING OF AGREEMENT ON FIRST PHASE OF DEVELOPMENT PLAN

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and has to do with the question I posed to his Parliamentary Secretary last Wednesday, as found on page 2647 of Hansard. Is the minister prepared to answer the question now?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Would the hon. member repeat the question, please?

Mr. Marshall: Can the minister indicate and confirm that the agreement on the first phase of a five-year regional development plan for Newfoundland will be signed in April and would he be prepared to table the contents so that the people of Newfoundland can be made aware of the benefits of this plan?

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member is referring to the signing of a document in April, I doubt that the question is in order at this time. It should be placed on the Order Paper.

Mr. Marshall: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, Your Honour allowed the question last Wednesday.

Mr. Speaker: If I made a mistake, it was last Wednesday.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

OFFER OF POSITION AS JUDGE TO MR. CLAUDE WAGNER

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour.

[Mr. Mahoney.]

Would he tell the House whether the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice has authorized him to offer a judgeship to Mr. Claude Wagner?

Mr. Speaker: I cannot allow this question.

[English]

PUBLIC SERVICE

PROFESSIONAL INSTITUTE OBJECTION TO TERMINOLOGY RESPECTING LAY-OFFS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In view of the objections raised by the Professional Institute of the Public Service to the terminology used by the minister in referring to scientific and professional men who were being laid off as deadwood, would the minister take steps to remove this stigma from these men who are now trying to find new jobs?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): I think the best way to remove this stigma is to stop using the term, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONTRACTS AWARDED TO RCA VICTOR—INTEREST CONFLICT OF J. B. HOULDING

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, given the fact that the Defence Research Board plays a leading role in establishing research priorities of the government involving millions of dollars, will the minister assure the House that he will investigate the conflict of interest position of Mr. J. B. Houlding who is simultaneously president of RCA Victor and a member of the Defence Research Board?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I believe it would be useful to indicate to the House that the terms of reference of the Defence Research Board designate representatives from industry, universities and other research interests in Canada as possible members of the board. The case in point is a temporary assignment. I can reassure my hon. friend by telling him that the Defence Research Board has no specific responsibility for directing purchasing for the government.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NIGERIA—EFFECTIVENESS OF RELIEF OPERATIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he has any recent report from the observer team or the Canadian representative on the observer team regarding conditions in Nigeria and what was formerly Biafra, particularly with regard to the flow of relief and whether it is satisfactory and also conditions generally?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian observers have reported to me about conditions. The report is very similar to the one made by the representatives of the Secretary General of the United Nations. I have been urging the release of this report but apparently there is some difficulty that has arisen because it is not unanimous. One country in particular, not Canada, has filed a minority report and some difficulty has arisen as to when it can be released. The observers themselves are continuing their survey.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Has the minister any information from the Canadian observers or the Canadian Red Cross on whether the Nigerian government has granted clearance for planes carrying relief supplies to land at Uli or any of the former Biafran airports?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there has been any approval given yet to the use of Uli airport. I gather that other airports in the area are being used and, indeed, I saw a report the other day that there was some doubt as to whether one of them was in proper condition. So attempts are being made to use them, but with regard to Uli my understanding is that so far the Nigerian government is not using it.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In light of the current difficulties with regard to the observers' report, will the minister give an undertaking to the House that relevant information of particular interest to the committee at present meeting on the question of relief procedures will be made available to that committee, and that every measure will be taken to assure the publication of even the minority report in light of the great interest in this country and in others that full exposure be given to the situation in that part of Nigeria?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I thought I made it clear that I have seen a copy of the report made by a majority of the observers. However it is subject to an embargo as the members of the team themselves have to release the report. It is not a question of the Canadian government holding up the publication of the report. I am not sure what the rules of the team are, whether they have to be unanimous, but apparently there is some difficulty. We have urged the publication of the report but we do not order our observers about. They report what they see when they are ready to report.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

COST OF NURSING HOME CARE

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the increasing number of generally older people who are being discharged from hospitals to nursing homes for further care and who find themselves without funds and not covered by hospitalization services for which they have paid for many years, has the minister discussed this problem with his provincial counterparts or has he some plan to cover the cost of such care for these people?

Mr. Speaker: The question might be replied to by the minister by way of a statement on motions. He might indicate to the hon. member who asked the question whether this is his intention.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I would be pleased to consider making a statement on motions concerning this matter, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

DELAY IN PAYMENT OF BENEFITS

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Labour. It arises from a good many complaints I and many other hon. members, I am sure, have received concerning the payment of benefits to unemployed people. There seems to be a very great delay in the payment of these benefits. Has the minister any plan in mind to streamline the present operation?

Mr. Speaker: I think also in this case that this is the kind of general information which should normally be given by a statement on motions unless the minister has a very short answer to the question asked by the hon. member.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): The hon. member is such a considerate member that I should like to answer his question. I was informed this morning that 97.8 per cent of all claims processed by the Unemployment Insurance Commission are processed on time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: The majority of the complaints are usually due to faulty information supplied by the unemployed people when filling out the forms.

Mr. Hales: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I thank the minister for his statement on this matter. I think the minister might discuss this problem with his colleague, the Postmaster General.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This seems to be a debate between the minister and the hon. member.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

REQUEST FOR ORGANIZATION MEETING OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In keeping with the undertaking the minister gave the House before the end of the last session that he would take steps to call the Standing Committee on Regional Development together in January, is the minister now prepared to do that and have the committee meet so it can deal with some of the serious problems facing his department?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I hope we shall soon be able to appoint the committee.

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

PROCLAMATION OF REMAINDER OF AMENDMENTS RESPECTING BREATHALYZER

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): I have a question for the Minister of Justice. When does the minister anticipate the remainder of the breathalyzer section of the Criminal Code dealing with the approved container will be proclaimed?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): When we have found a container that can be approved.

[Mr. Mackasey.]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

COMMISSION ADVERTISEMENTS RESPECTING FRAUD

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): My question is directed to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister seen and does he approve of the advertisements which have been appearing recently on behalf of the Unemployment Insurance Commission warning about alleged fraud in the collection of unemployment insurance claims?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): I have seen the advertisements, Mr. Speaker, and I approve of them. I do not think anybody should apologize for the fact that we feel the unemployment insurance fund belongs to the workers of this country and their employers who contribute. We should not have sympathy for anybody who sets out to defraud that fund. It is our obligation to protect the fund. All that we have said is if you intend to intentionally defraud the fund, be prepared for your day in court. We do not intend to apologize for this philosophy.

Mr. Orlikow: Has the minister received representations to the effect that the advertisements are drafted in such a way that many people who have legitimate and proper claims are afraid to make their claims?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, the only—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the statement he just made that the unemployment insurance fund belongs to the workers of this country, I ask him to consider that Devco, a Crown Corporation, has forcibly retired persons in Cape Breton and compelled them to use their own UIC benefits while they are unemployed.

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. gentleman has raised this point about seven times. It is a very uncharitable, inaccurate and unfair misrepresentation of the facts. I think it should be clarified once and for all, Mr. Speaker. Under the regulations—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the minister that this is a debate between the minister and the hon. member as to the interpretation of the facts of the situation. I do not think there should be a debate on that point.

Mr. Mackasey: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the question will appear without an answer and this is very unfair to the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I would like to set the record straight.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister cannot do this on a point of order. I suggest that whether he is right or wrong this is not a point of order. It is a question of debate.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. The minister has indicated that I have misrepresented the facts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacInnis: The minister also indicated in previous answers that he has hundreds of examples of this type of abuse of the UIC fund. My question of privilege arises from the fact that I asked for one or two of these hundreds of examples, not only verbally but also in the form of a letter to the minister over a month ago to which I have not received a reply.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. minister kindly resume his seat. I have to suggest to the minister who has a point of order, and to the hon. member who has a question of privilege, that my interpretation is that this is a debate over the interpretation of the facts of the situation. That is not tantamount to either a question of privilege or a point of order. I suggest that the minister might get together with the hon. member later in the day and they might resolve the difficulty by private discussion.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, in order to help—

Mr. Speaker: Is the minister rising on a point of order?

Mr. Mackasey: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Because he is one of my favourite members I am only trying to help him. If the hon. member will put a question on the Order Paper asking if other similar programs are in existence, I will—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister has to respect the observation made by the Chair that this is not a point of order but a question of debate.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUPPLEMENTARY PENSIONS BENEFITS BILL

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for either of the presidents across the way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: There is only one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is too bad there is not a television camera to record the rising of His Excellency the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): However, I am referring to the President of the Treasury Board or the President of the Privy Council.

An hon. Member: They are just honorary presidents.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In view of the fact that the list of business tabled today includes the very welcome supplementary pensions benefits bill which is listed for first reading before the Easter recess, and in view of the fact the President of the Treasury Board announced on December 19 that this legislation would be effective in April, may I ask whether efforts will be made to put this bill through all stages before Easter?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

POLLUTION

CONVERSION OF GOVERNMENT CARS TO NATURAL GAS FUEL

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): I direct my question to the Minister of Supply and Services. In view of the report by the general services administrator of the United States, does the Canadian government plan a conversion of government cars to natural gas fuel which trials have shown to be successful in eliminating pollution?

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

EXTENSION OF BOUNDARIES

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): My question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the serious economic situation in the province of Saskatchewan, is the government considering or has it decided to extend the boundaries under the Regional Development Incentives Act?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): No, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFF OF GRAIN HANDLERS AT THUNDER BAY

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. In view of the unemployment situation affecting the grain handlers at Thunder Bay—the figure has risen to as high as 300 in recent weeks—would the hon. gentleman urge his colleague, the Minister without Portfolio responsible for the movement of grain, to accelerate delivery to the terminals and thereby provide badly needed economic relief to grain handlers and prairie wheat growers?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, my colleague the Minister without Portfolio is an adept and talented minister. As a matter of fact, in anticipation of this problem he and the Minister of Labour met representatives of labour at the Lakehead three weeks ago and reached a satisfactory solution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dinsdale: In light of the meeting I had with the same representative last evening, I wonder whether the minister would review the situation.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. Mackasey: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the hon. member that in light of my answer he should hold another meeting with that particular gentleman.

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is this: In view of reports that grain sales have been lost because of threatened management-labour difficulties on the west coast, can the minister advise the House what steps are being taken to deal with the situation and prevent further disruption and loss of sales?

Mr. Mackasey: In view of the fact that there is a possibility of a strike on the west coast at Vancouver, perhaps the question should be addressed to the Minister of Industry, because the employers are just as responsible as the labour movement and no settlement has yet been reached.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

DISCUSSION BETWEEN OTTAWA AND QUEBEC RESPECTING RE-ESTABLISHMENT

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice.

In view of the fact that the number of murders has increased in Canada in 1969, compared to 1967, and in view of the fact that the Minister of Justice of Quebec has asked for the re-establishment of the death penalty, can the minister tell us whether he has had talks on this subject with the Quebec Minister of Justice?

Mr. Speaker: I think this question was put to the minister a few days ago.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON LICENSING OF WEST COAST SALMON FISHERMEN

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry with regard to the government's policy on the licensing of salmon fishermen on the Pacific coast. Since most of the information we have received on this subject has emanated from press releases made outside the House and has been somewhat fragmentary in character, would the minister consider making a full statement in the House on motions setting forth the government's policy and the regulations pertaining thereto?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, because a number of briefs have been submitted on this subject and a number of meetings are being held, I think it might be better to refer the matter to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Will the minister assure the House that this matter will be submitted to the committee within the next few days, because for a long time hon. members have been asking that it be referred to the committee?

Mr. Davis: If there is not an early opportunity to discuss this question on the estimates, I shall be glad to refer it to the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to bring to the notice of hon. members that the question period expired a few minutes ago. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition might be allowed one further question.

PENSIONS

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION RESPECTING OLD AGE SECURITY BENEFITS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have noted there is nothing in the list of legislation set down for the remainder of the session which will provide any relief for those in receipt of old age security benefits. I therefore ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare, particularly bearing in mind the rising cost of living, whether this is an oversight or whether we are to assume that no measure designed to bring such relief will be introduced during this session of Parliament?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the Leader of the Opposition may know, we intend to present a white paper setting out policy in this area. In the meantime, the provinces have been informed in a series of meetings on welfare that the federal government will be amenable to sharing, under the Canada Assistance Plan, the cost of any supplementation they consider necessary. This would apply to any supplementary payments they care to make under the federal programs.

Mr. Stanfield: Is it the feeling of the government of Canada that an offer of this sort is likely to lead to justice for the older people of Canada, particularly in view of the difficulty some provinces are experiencing in carrying out even their present programs, let alone taking on increased commitments?

Mr. Munro: It was the view of the provinces at the time of the introduction of the Canada Assistance Plan that this would assist present programs. At the time the hon. gentleman was Premier of Nova Scotia this legislation was regarded as being very just, very much needed, and as serving the purpose.

MANITOBA CENTENNIAL

PRESENTATIONS OF COMMEMORATIVE SILVER DOLLARS

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member for Saint-Boniface (Mr. Guay) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Saint-Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take the opportunity of Manitoba Centennial Day being commemorated in Ottawa today, to present you, as well as the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Official Opposition, with a case containing a one-dollar coin fresh from the mint as a remembrance of Manitoba's Centennial.

I have the pleasure of offering it to you, Mr. Speaker. Somebody will hand it to you in a moment.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I think the procedure will be shorter if I thank the hon. member on behalf of myself, the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

COMPANY OF YOUNG CANADIANS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING STRUCTURE OF ORGANIZATION

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State) moved that Bill C-176, to amend the Company of Young Canadians Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

He said:

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I do not have to remind the House of the incidents which led before the Christmas recess to the inquiry held by the Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts into the Company of Young Canadians.

Neither do I need to remind the House of the contents of that committee report which led to the appointment of a financial controller for the Company of Young Canadians.

After first reading of the bill, the government committed itself to a motion for second reading of the bill by the end of January. We are now dealing with such a motion.

The House is no doubt aware that, at its request, we have determined the exact duration of the financial controller's mandate. In so doing, we were tacitly committing ourselves to completing the legislative process of amending the act by March 31, so that the controller could be replaced by the new structures provided by the amendments that the House will be considering today.

Before commenting upon and explaining briefly those amendments and those new structures, and this I am sure will be done in a much more detailed manner in the committee, I would like to reflect for a moment with the hon. members on the philosophy which inspired government action in this field. I would, as I say, like to reflect on what, in spite of certain pressures, led us to maintain the Company of Young Canadians and on what, on the other hand, justifies our making significant changes to its legal framework.

• (3:10 p.m.)

[English]

The first point I want to make is that no one can understand the nature of the CYC unless one fully understands the nature of our society.

Mr. Stanfield: Nobody can understand it.

Mr. Pelletier: We live in a society of conflict. I do not necessarily mean conflict in the normal, physical sense of the word. I mean confrontation, upheaval, poverty and change; I mean the conflicts of a society with an unequal distribution of wealth, an unequal distribution of power and an unequal distribution of participation. A society in which individuals cannot participate inevitably breeds conflicts. It is a society that robs man of his dignity; it is a society that breeds disillusionment and indignity, generates frustration and, in effect, tends to dehumanize people.

In its initial stages, political action must be remedial. The purpose of many government initiatives is to remedy existing flaws. We must, however, strive to achieve the development of a society that is not only remedial but constructive. We must attempt to achieve a society of equality, a society in which all people may participate, not in token fashion but rather in active ways in attacking both the problems of today and of tomorrow. Either we achieve this goal or we will develop an oligarchic society in which a group of technocrats dictate the means of achieving their goals and assume their goals to be the goals of society at large.

We live in an age that is full of contradictions. This is an age in which expertise has become the passport to success. People, it is often said, know more and more about less and less. In many ways this is a necessity. In a period of time when knowledge is doubling every 10 years, how can one expect to keep abreast of all factors? I am amazed sometimes to hear how the social sciences have subdivided themselves and then re-subdivided themselves into smaller and smaller groups dealing with smaller but more complex problems.

We cannot deny the necessity for expertise and the necessity for sophisticated knowledge. However, at the same time, more and more of our problems are being seen as multi-disciplines and sub-disciplines. This is a moment in time when not the expert, but rather the generalist, the multi-disciplinarian must come to the fore. We must recognize that very often the sum of the trees does not equal the forest. Without expertise, we cannot exist. However, we cannot make the mistake of allowing expertise to dictate solutions. Expertise must remain the handmaiden of policy-makers and not the controller of policy-makers. Expertise can never be allowed to become an excuse for the blind acceptance of solutions.

We are fortunate to live at a time when the technology exists to free man from the day-to-day drudgery of mundane chores. Machines can release man to develop his potential in an atmosphere free of want. Unfortunately, the machine can also be allowed to suppress man, to dictate man's existence and in other ways totally dehumanize him. We must learn to harness our creations to free, rather than to enslave.

I plead today for a re-evaluation of our decision structure, based upon my basic belief in the integrity and intelligence of man. We must allow all members of our society to participate equally in the decision-making structure of our country. We must not fall into the trap of believing that our privileged information gives us a privileged right to make decisions. We must, rather, educate and inform the members of our society in order to assure their participation in the evolution of our society.

It is unacceptable for people in a democratic society to abrogate their responsibilities because of a supposed lack of information. It is our responsibility to assure that the necessary information is available. Too many atrocities have been perpetrated on mankind because supposed expert opinion was unavailable to the people. Too many heartless solutions have been imposed in the name of technocracy.

What I have said thus far is neither new nor original. I can suggest that it has not been said often enough. I can suggest that it is one of the most important results of the critical analysis to which society has been subjected during the sixties. The generations gathered in this chamber have sometimes been overly impressed by efficiency. Throughout our life we have watched with envy, with pride and respect, the development of efficient machines designed to accomplish tasks, duties and produce results.

This world has developed efficient machines of destruction and, fortunately, efficient machines of production. It is not surprising that we have been overwhelmed by means of production and infatuated with efficiency. We are the product of the last stages of the industrial revolution. But now, as we approach the post-industrial society, the time has come for us to rigorously re-evaluate the utilization of technology.

The time has come for us to heed the call of youth who have been screaming the basic questions of why efficiency; why growth; why this allocation of resources? While we must organize our wealth in order to assure the maximum benefit for all mankind, we must recognize that the benefits to mankind cannot be measured in material terms alone. We must recognize man's need to strive for fulfilment in many different ways.

Our youth are active participants in our society, and although we wish to encourage their participation they are in many ways independent enough, aloof enough, to undertake a critical analysis that is impossible for our generation. I do not wish to set up youth as a sort of independent alter ego screaming in the darkness. Rather, I wish to argue for a legitimate voice for youth in our structures just as I would argue, and have argued, for a legitimate voice for all people in our society. Youth in particular have a point of view; youth in particular have an analysis. The fact is that what we do today determines the society in which they must live tomorrow. The mistakes we make today, they must undo tomorrow. Surely, this is reason enough to grant them full and equal participation in our society. The worst possible thing that could happen, in my opinion, would be a return to the dull fifties, the period of navel contemplations by youth.

To the lawmakers of the time, there were no problems with youth; youth knew its place and youth was no bother. Perhaps one of the reasons we are confronted with some of the problems of today is precisely because youth shunned its responsibility in the fifties of analyzing and challenging society.

• (3:20 p.m.)

These remarks are not designed to suggest that all that youth recommends or all that youth undertakes is destined to be good as long as we do not interfere. We know that this generation of youth is subject to many of the same problems as our generation. We know of the danger of manipulation by small groups. We know we must maintain safeguards within the structures used by youth in order to protect the great bulk of youth from manipulative minorities. But these small contemptuous minorities, who by their machinations have destroyed many of the positive projects of youth, cannot be allowed to destroy all the mechanisms designed for the participation of this group.

[Translation]

The Company of Young Canadians, established in 1966, was founded on youth idealism. Its purpose was to channel that idealism toward constructive programs. The creation of the Company of Young Canadians perhaps showed a certain artlessness. It was thought that youth would be spared the scheming from which so many groups have suffered in the past. The experience has shown that we were wrong to believe this. But experience has also clearly shown that the Company of Young Canadians, through its programs, can greatly contribute to the development of our society, can encourage and prompt youth to play an active part in the rehabilitation of that society. We can analyze and dissect every aspect of such experiences as that of the Company of Young Canadians in order to discover exactly why it somewhat fizzled out.

The Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, did everything it could and it is to be commended for its analysis of the problem.

I wish to point out that the committee strongly re-affirms the need and the importance of organizations such as the Company of Young Canadians which is an experience in itself, as are, in one way or another, most youth activities.

As it was mentioned in the House in 1966, during the debate on the legislation establishing the Company of Young Canadians, the experience was almost inevitably bound to result in many failures, but it was hoped that with the anticipated successes, they would be lessons.

I should like to think that is exactly what happened. We have learned that the CYC projects, its role as a thorn in the flesh of the powers that be, were necessary. It was also necessary that the Company should help the people and provide them with the bare minimum to enable them to participate in the life of our society. Past mistakes must not make us forget those facts. We also know, now, that it is necessary to spell out to the CYC the responsibilities to be assumed and the authority to be wielded. We also know that idealism and the duty to be accountable are not actually incompatible.

Mr. Speaker, the amendments provided in this bill are the minimum changes necessary to enable the Company of Young Canadians to remain in operation. Contrary to what has been suggested, these amendments are aimed at establishing an organization which will still enjoy wide autonomy. Once the proposed amendments are passed, the Company of Young Canadians will be comparable to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the Canada Council, and the Corporation of the National Museums of Canada. In each of these cases, although the government appoints the members of the board of directors and the executive director, one must admit that these bodies are largely independent from public authorities. They have been structured this way in order that they may continue to perform their difficult task, aloof from the vicissitudes of politics, and that they may initiate, when needed, projects that may be of a controversial nature. The Company of Young Canadians will always be controversial.

The Company of Young Canadians will keep on working in the midst of marginal groups on the fringe of our society, and it will keep on threatening and troubling the powers that be. This is not what we are seeking, but we must recognize beforehand that it is almost unavoidable. This bill aims at giving the Company of Young Canadians the independence required to undertake some tricky projects when it deems.

It seems to me logical, Mr. Speaker, to remind the hon. members that as representatives of the people, it is our duty to see to it that the use of the taxpayers' money can be controlled. By introducing this bill, the government is assuming its responsibilities, while granting the company its legal autonomy.

[Mr. Pelletier.]

I would like to point out that the government intends to appoint a board which will be representative of youth and not a group whose duty would be to supervise the Company and to keep youth in its place, as some people say. The average age of the persons appointed by the government within the last Council was quite a bit under thirty and there is no reason to think that it will go up substantially.

Before concluding, I would like to mention another aspect of the problem which is raised periodically. Some people wonder why the government should grant its financial support to those who are contesting some of its decisions and who are challenging it. The government has to inform the public and to listen the views which are submitted to it, and even to facilitate in a financial way the submitting of views which could be different from its own. Everybody knows that big companies, in order to make themselves known and to protect their interests, hire people or agencies specialized in public relations whose services are highly developed technically and are equally very costly. Some, of them, as we know, will not hesitate to convey their views to members of the House. One can stand aloof from pressure groups that seek thus to make the influence they may have felt openly. One can wonder whether the costs incurred by firms to get themselves a good public relations branch are really legitimate expenses. Personally, I think they are in so far as these operations are conducted openly and the objectives of the companies concerned are all clearly identifiable.

In fact, the government helps those companies financially by allowing them to deduct such costs from their fiscal charges and that at the rate of several million dollars a year.

Is it not logical that we should help population groups which lack the means to have recourse to sophisticated representation techniques? Is it not logical that we should help groups whoses expenses are not deductible for income tax purposes? We do it in several cases and at a relatively low cost, one case being the Consumer Advisory Council and another the Company of Young Canadians.

• (3:30 p.m.)

The Company is a sort of investment by the government and Canada's youth in the process of participation. It is an investment of the greatest of our resources: our human capital.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would repeat what I said earlier. I pointed out that we live in a society at grips with many conflicts, suffering from alienation, discrimination and other forms of enslavement. The Company of Young Canadians represents a major factor in the government's policy on participation. On the one hand, it will provide youth with a means—not the only one, of course—of taking part in the evolution of our society. On the other, the CYC is meant to help badly informed and ill-prepared groups to join in the life of our society and, for that purpose, to master the techniques of participation. Unfortunately, participation often implies a degree of specialization which some of our people do not have. The CYC can help those who are not technicians acquire the necessary knowledge for putting their views across.

After all, we are living under a democratic system in which all citizens over a certain age are allowed to vote. Unfortunately, some votes count more than others. Most young people are not entitled to vote and thus cannot make their voices heard. The great majority of those who live in slums, on reserves and in other substandard environments of our society are also unable to make their influence felt, or to wield any significant influence.

The establishment of the Company of Young Canadians is a step toward the development of a more just society. I have one last recommendation to express, Mr. Speaker: that we proceed as soon as possible with discussion of the bill, that of course it be referred, to the Committee according to the work of the House, but with minimum delay, in order that we may meet the deadline of the end of the term of office of the Financial Controller and that we may return to a normal system of administration for the Company of Young Canadians as soon as possible.

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, would the Secretary of State allow a question?

Mr. Pelletier: Certainly.

Mr. Valade: In his statement, the Secretary of State said that the government itself would appoint the officers representing the students within the new organization and that the directors appointed by the government would be in majority on the council. How does the minister intend to proceed with those appointments so that that Company will not be influenced by the government in a partisan way or otherwise? Could the minister give me some information in this connection?

Mr. Pelletier: First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out an inaccuracy. I think the hon. member for Sainte-Marie made a lapsus by referring to students, since it is not stipulated anywhere, and it is not the government's intention, that the Council of the Company will be restricted to the student class which is a minority, and a privileged one at that, among our youth.

As to the process of appointing these representatives, I would say to the hon. member for Sainte-Marie that the government will follow the same pattern that it applies for instance in the case of the directors of the C.B.C., or the members of the Board of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission, whose integrity or objectivity has never to my knowledge been questioned by anybody—not even by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie.

[English]

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the minister with a great deal of interest as we began the second reading debate on Bill C-176. I share with him the desire that this bill proceed with dispatch so that the committee may study it in detail before it comes back to the House for third reading and the comptroller who has been appointed by act of this House may be relieved of his duties.

As I listened to the opening remarks of the minister I wondered whether he was talking about a bill to amend the Company of Young Canadians Act or a bill to amend his philosophy of life. He has given rise to enough provocation, perhaps in a philosophical way, for me to debate with him several statements about his philosophy of life.

The original intention on this side of the House was to have only one speaker take part in this debate. I am not sure whether this intention can now be maintained in view of the many statements the minister has made about his philosophy of life. I do not know how that matter has any relevance in this debate, but it certainly stimulated a little thought in my mind.

I agree that many of his philosophical statements are not necessarily new or original. In addition, I do not think they are pertinent to a bill to amend the charter of the Company of Young Canadians. I repeat that while it was our original intention to have one speaker give our point of view so that we could move quickly through the debate today, I am not sure that we will now be able to follow this procedure. I have seldom seen or heard—I say this with all respect to the minister and intend no personal slight—a more intellectual gymnastic exercise than when the minister talked about participation of youth and involvement of youth. The clauses of the bill to amend the charter of the Company of Young Canadians, in effect—except for the whim and/or discretion of the cabinet, which we do not know about—eliminate the participation of youth unless the cabinet decides to appoint youth to the council, or as chairman, vice-chairman of the council or executive director.

The effect of the amendments in the bill is that no longer will the volunteers, youth on the streets, directly participate in the deliberations of the Company of Young Canadians. I do not understand how the minister could stand up this afternoon and for the first 10 or 15 minutes give his personal philosophy of life and relate that to the Company of Young Canadians and, the participation of youth. The core of the debate is related to clauses which would remove their direct participation. As I have said, this is an exercise in intellectual gymnastics such as we have seldom seen in this House.

So far as life and conflict is concerned, I am sure the minister would agree—if not, we could debate the issue for many minutes but I do not intend to do so unless the minister so desires—that when we talk about life and conflicts in society we realize that of course there are conflicts in society. Is not life a conflict? I say to the minister, in a philosophical way, that the only time one does not have conflict is when one is dead—it is as simple as that.

The minister should not have wasted time, and we should not be wasting time on this philosophical preamble to a bill to amend the Company of Young Canadians Act. The relevant portion of that philosophical preamble concerning participation and involvement is not borne out by the bill we are debating today.

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member answer a question?

Mr. Nowlan: Gladly.

Mr. Pelletier: I understand the hon. member's initial remarks to mean that I have stirred up some thought in his mind. He seems to resent it. I am ready to withdraw anything that has stirred up some thought in his mind if he finds it uncomfortable.

Mr. Nowlan: I think the minister is not asking a question but is making a statement. I am most comfortable with stimulating thoughts of either the minister or myself; I am comfortable with thoughts from all sources. But we are debating a bill to amend the Company of Young Canadians Act. There are in this bill about eight germane clauses which completely contradict the minister's philosophy of life and involvement and participation of youth. I do not see any point continuing the debate along this line, although I agree with his philosophy that there are conflicts in life and society. I make the equally obvious statement that all life is a conflict, and the only time you do not have conflict is when you are dead. So why waste time discussing it?

I should like to briefly review a little of the history that has brought us to this debate. The minister spoke of the dull fifties. I do not accept that statement, either. That was the time of the first real mass confrontation. That was when desegregation began. It was also a time when some members of his party were even then active in politics. I think the concept of the Company of Young Canadians and its creation is well known. It was created by the then leader of the government, the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson. I do not imagine any piece of legislation passed through this House with higher hopes and greater expectations than the Company of Young Canadians Act.

In his philosophical preamble in June, 1966, Mr. Pearson talked about the participation of youth. But Mr. Pearson allowed youth to participate. He introduced what was called the volunteer member. We can say in retrospect, having seen the Company operate for three years, that obviously it should not have had all that freedom. But, conversely, under the legislation sponsored by the minister in Bill C-176 there should not be the complete domination of the Company which the government seeks to impose.

Our high hopes and great expectations were evidenced by the unanimous vote of the House, which in itself is a rare thing. I will not dwell too long on this aspect of the matter, but the minister did not even refer to those high hopes and expectations. He said we were well aware that we would debate this subject today, but for the purposes of the record we should state frankly that although at first there were high hopes and expectations with regard to the Company, they were matched by the sad results, pathetic performance and misguided messages which came from many individuals who were working in the CYC.

I say this with the caveat and the qualification that it was uniformly assessed—I think the minister would probably agree with the evidence given to the committee although I am not sure about that—but it has been pretty well admitted that however laudable were the Company's concept, ideas and objectives, they were not enough to produce practical results and to resolve some of the problems which, as the minister said, were evident in our society. These problems are evident today and will be evident tomorrow whether or not there is a Company of Young Canadians, and whether the present government or another government is in office, because life is a conflict.

You try to resolve the problems and blunt some of the sharp edges, you try to help those who cannot help themselves and you give voice to the voiceless; but these are just euphemisms which we utter so easily, sad as it may seem. I say in a realistic way that we in our short existence will not achieve a Utopia wherein everything is planned, everyone is happy and we are all in lotus land. We can only reach lotus land when we are somewhere else, either up above or down below.

Be that as it may, I suggest that although the results were poor, the performance unfortunate and the messages misguided, the fault does not lie with those who were so intimately and sincerely involved, as the minister well knows through being better acquainted with some of the CYC members than I am. It is not the fault of the individuals and volunteers who were with the Company through the stormy times from interim to permanent council. Those individuals may have contributed to it in part, but it was not the fault of the youth who were participating or involved in this grand design and this exciting adventure, as Mr. Pearson called it in the debate on the CYC which took place in the House on June 10, 1966, as recorded at page 6257 of Hansard.

I suggest that in large part, if not overwhelmingly, the fault lay in the lack of direction, the lack of interest and the absence of leadership at the top. These are the factors that got the Company into the difficulties in which it finds itself today. I believe those who were charged with directing this exciting experiment should accept the responsibility for the failure of the Company of Young Canadians, which was so obviously ignored in the minister's presentation today. The sad truth is that it did not take place overnight.

I point out, with all due respect to the minister, that this was not one incident. Mr. Saulnier of Montreal might have been the catalyst responsible for the ultimate investigation of the Company. The minister said before the committee and in one of his press releases that even before Mr. Saulnier made his statements about the CYC, the minister had evidence that gave him reason for concern about the direction of the Company. But let me point out that long before the minister had any responsibility for the Company—although the minister was elected in 1965, he was not responsible for the company when it was first established—those in charge were aware that things were not going right, that neither direction nor course were set for the Company, and that the Company would founder unless something was done about it.

I will not review the evidence which was presented to the committee. However, it was clear from the press statement given by the vice-chairman of the provisional council while the committee was reviewing this matter, and from the statements made to a columnist of a Toronto newspaper, that the vice-chairman was aware of certain problems which the company was facing, of certain personalities who were dominating, and of certain movements that were starting to take over. Yet nothing was done about it.

The fact is that after the Company was set up, a provisional council directed it for over three years from July 11, 1966, when the act was unanimously passed in this House, until October 4, 1969. This was a temporary body which directed the Company.

In retrospect, many people have tried to say that it did not matter that there was an interim board of directors which was officially called the provisional council. I do not know of another body created by parliament that has operated for three years with temporary directors.

We in the last few years have experienced problems in the CBC and in the National Film Board. With regard to these two bodies, I suggest that part of the reason for their problems was the existence of a vacuum up at the top before a president of the CBC was appointed and perhaps before a new commissioner of the National Film Board was appointed. When there is a vacuum, and no leadership or direction at the top, the legislative creatures whom we create in the House of Commons often go astray. I am afraid that is what happened here. Now we hear protestations and rationalizations in retrospect; we hear excuses for the emptiness which did not seem to matter when nobody was directing the affairs of the Company.

Some of the evidence indicates that this lack of direction at the top was a factor in the troubles which beset the Company. Some of this evidence does not come from Members of Parliament on the government side or on the opposition side; it comes from those who were on the provisional council of the Company and from one of the executive directors who for a year was responsible for its affairs.

It does not do anything constructive to again go into that evidence in detail. However, the facts must be stated for the record, especially when the minister makes statements of a philosophical nature and does not say what is the real purpose of debating this matter today. The reason is to be found in the omissions, errors and perhaps misjudgments of the past.

It is clear from the evidence given to the committee evidence that the Company operated under a provisional council for over three years and spent $7.2 million on 38 on-going projects. The minister spoke about the involvement of youth, and we on this side are all for it. But we also have to be realistic. Because the Company's activities have been publicized in the newspapers over the past two or three years, many people forget how many volunteers took part in its activities. The figure is in some dispute, but I suggest about 350 volunteers in the three-year period were involved in a continuing way in the affairs of the Company.

To my mind this is a reflection on the construction of the Company and the course it took. Only 350 to 400 volunteers were involved. I agree with the minister that many projects throughout Canada need youth involvement at the community level. This Company which has occupied so much of the time of Parliament and to which so much time and space have been devoted by newspapers and television networks, attracted only 350 to 400 volunteers since its inception and has cost $7.2 million. I know the figure of $9.2 million has been suggested, but regardless of the amount involved I suggest that those at the top must accept responsibility for the failure to chart a course for the Company.

Without going into detail, I shall just read some of the shortcomings of the Company as outlined by the parliamentary committee which investigated the Company's affairs about three weeks before Christmas. That committee's report was tabled on December 5, 1969, and now forms part of the records of the House. It illustrates more graphically than any words of mine how this exciting adventure got off on the wrong track and ran onto the shoals where it unfortunately remains today. I quote the paragraph headed "Shortcomings of CYC" in the committee's report:

Notwithstanding the fact that the Company of Young Canadians has some obvious accomplishments and successes to its credit, your committee is gravely disturbed by many aspects of the legislation, organization and operations of the Company.

More specifically, the areas of concern include the following:

i. There is a lack of administrative procedures resulting in almost chaotic conditions.

ii. Financial procedures, to say the least, are questionable and unconventional.

iii. Evidence has been adduced of an infiltration into the Company, particularly in one region of the country, by individuals who have used the Company as a base for acts of subversion, violence and illegality, which the administrators of the Company were apparently powerless to control. It would also appear that public funds may have been surreptitiously diverted to support these purposes.

iv. It is apparent that from time to time and from place to place various volunteers, in the course of their duties, participated in overt acts of a partisan political nature, contrary to the objectives and the best interests of the Company.

v. Your committee has evidence that the executive director of the Company is seriously hampered in the performance of his duties. This situation results from the following factors, among others:

(a) The Company has no policies on the qualifications required of volunteers nor any definition of their exact role and functions;

(b) There is no policy on the recruitment of volunteers;

(c) There are no policies on the training of volunteers;

(d) There are no evaluation procedures with respect to the performance of volunteers or staff;

(e) There is no adequate procedure to deal with the grievances of volunteers or staff;

(f) There are no adequate policies for the suspension and dismissal of staff and the suspension or cancellation of volunteer contracts.

vi. The Company has no policies for the research, selection, evaluation, modification and/or termination of programs or projects.

Rarely, if ever, has a parliamentary committee filed a report on a creature of Parliament detailing such errors and omissions as I have just read; and this not after two months of operations of the Company, six months, a year or two years—this indictment comes after three years of operation of the Company. What hope or solace can we in the opposition take when this type of indictment is made against the Company? The government has had authority over the Company for three years. The Governor in Council had some powers, although admittedly not many, and there was a minister to report to Parliament on behalf of the Company.

Publicity has been given to the affairs of the Company in Toronto and Montreal. Recently, all those engaged in the Company's Cape Breton project resigned en masse, even though they knew the general guidelines which this bill would set. For these and many other reasons, members of the Conservative Party who served on the Broadcasting Committee, having listened to all the evidence of the witnesses—and some of it was conflicting—in effect filed a minority report.

Under the rules of the House they could not file a minority report as such, but they issued a press release on December 5, the day on which the committee's report was filed, stating that they did not support the committee's report and that they felt the reality of the situation dictated that the CYC should no longer be considered a credible agency to try to undertake social work with youth at the community level. I wish to read into the record a portion of that press release, beginning with the third paragraph as follows:

The fundamental reason for the present difficulties of the Company was the continued failure of the Pearson and Trudeau governments to follow the direction of Parliament, as expressed in the legislation. It is basic to these difficulties that the Company of Young Canadians was run by a provisional council from its inception on July 11, 1966, to October 4, 1969, when the permanent council was appointed. This more than three year period of stewardship was the incubator for many of the Company's present problems. The Liberal government cannot escape its responsibility for a failure to provide sufficient interest and support to the Company throughout its life. A quick perusal of the shortcomings, as set out in the report, reveals as sad an indictment of mismanagement and lack of control in a federal agency, rarely seen, if ever admitted.

Accordingly, for a variety of reasons, the Company of Young Canadians—in many cases through no fault of its own—is no longer credible for social action at the community level.

Since it has become clear that legislative changes are necessary, we feel that the Company of Young Canadians should be phased out, and the federal government should appoint an independent body to review the experience of the past three years, consult with those involved, and other agencies, so that the original concept of social action with youth and government to give a voice to the voiceless, can be carried out by a new organization, without the liability of the old. Further, we understand that the Secretary of State presently has a 12-man task force within his department studying the entire question of youth and its involvement with government. Obviously, such a study should be integrated with, or at least co-ordinated with, a study of the Company of Young Canadians.

It is naïve, or idealistic, or perhaps a combination of both, to think that a parliamentary committee which only sat, intensively, for three weeks, can right the wrongs, and recommend policy changes, which others more intimately involved have ignored, or failed to do for over 3 years.

It is obvious that the Company has developed a bad reputation despite the good intentions of most of its sincere and dedicated volunteers. Such a reputation will not be corrected by legislative changes, and the fear would be that a trusteeship, labouring with the present problems of the Company, might very well pollute and irrevocably pervert the original concept and objectives behind the act.

We say it is time to be realistic, not just idealistic, and call a spade a spade. In view of the past history and present reputation we doubt if the most objective trustee can successfully impose a different structure, even radically revised, on the original frame of the Company. That frame has already been bruised and battered and any such grafting attempt, we fear, would create such a mutation that it could very well adversely affect the future role of youth in any social action at the community level.

• (4:00 p.m.)

We believe that if the government carries out the suggestions of the committee, then the Company of Young Canadians is dead de facto, if not de jure, and so it is thus reasonable to start afresh from square one.

In admitting this reality, there is no breach of faith with youth.

I am coming back to the point the Company is dead, anyway. If there is any doubt that the Company is dead, evidence can be found in the debate.

On the contrary, we believe a fresh start, building on the experience of the past, can develop a viable and constructive outlet for youth in social action at the community level, which will far exceed the present legacy of $7.2 millions spent on 38 ongoing projects which involved not more than 400 volunteers in its troubled and turbulent three year history.

Our primary belief is that volunteer service for youth is still as valid an aim as it was when we supported the concept behind the Company of Young Canadians. Surely, however, we have all learned that good intentions are not sufficient to prevent the abuses that arose in the company's operations. We endorse a new start after proper study.

This statement was endorsed unanimously, Mr. Speaker, by all members of the committee including those of my party. If there is any doubt about the statement, after reflection and having considered it in light of Bill C-176 which we are now debating, the doubt is removed. At least we are admitting the reality of the CYC as envisaged by Mr. Pearson and as spoken of by many members opposite. However, the concept of the voluntary member, which was so important to the whole purpose of the Company, is completely removed by this bill which I say makes the Company dead in reality, if not in law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: With all due respect to the minister, when we get rid of his philosophical perambulations and get down to the bill—which the minister did not do—we realize he is carrying on a charade and creating camouflage when he talks about the involvement of youth and participatory democracy. It is a camouflage, Mr. Speaker, and to appreciate this you have only to look at the main sections of the bill, starting with clause 1 which reduces the council from 15 to a group of not less than seven and not more than nine, all appointed by the cabinet. This provision is quite different from 15 members of council, ten of whom were volunteer members, appointed and governed by the CYC.

Clause 3 provides, not that the council shall appoint one of its members to be chairman but that cabinet shall appoint the chairman. The next provision is that cabinet shall appoint the vice-chairman, and in clause 4, instead of the council recommending the executive director to the cabinet it is laid down that cabinet shall appoint the executive director. Consideration of the bill shows that the members of the council replacing the volunteer-member council are appointed by the cabinet; the chairman, vice-chairman, and executive director are appointed by cabinet.

I suggest that the problems of the Company in the last three or four years will not be cured by substituting for the Company of Young Canadians a company of cabinet Canadians. The minister may have the best intentions, but when drawing up legislation good intentions are not sufficient.

It is as wrong to have cabinet domination of the council as it was for it to have total freedom or to have a majority of volunteer members in control. Because of the problems the company encountered, I suggest that the cabinet has over-reacted and has gone from total freedom to total dependence. I do not believe that the formula proposed by the government for the Company of Young Canadians is correct. There should not be total independence by which the volunteer members may dominate the council, but it is equally wrong that it should be completely dominated by cabinet, making the council subservient to the cabinet.

It should not be just another arm of government or another regional desk; it should be, rather, a youth desk. Because the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) is the minister reponsible, it is only fair that it should be his youth desk. The minister made a speech about cultural concepts and said he is reviewing the whole work of youth. If this bill makes the minister responsible, and through him the cabinet, for complete control of the CYC, it should be his appendage. He knows the state of general unrest amongst the youth of the nation, and he has written editorials to justify youth having a voice in the universities of the land. There are two sides to that question; some say that no board of governors of a university should talk to the people who are protesting.

Extremism in any form is bad. It is as bad to have cabinet domination of the council as it was to have the volunteers in control. Because this is such a fundamental change in the character of the CYC, I say that the Company is dead in fact, if not in law. There is no role for the volunteer in the deliberations of the council, unless the minister puts a volunteer there; there is nothing in the act about this.

The youth who were supposed to be participating are voiceless in the new council. But they were not before this provision was written in the bill. They will not even be represented on the council unless the minister appoints one or two of them. They are powerless, because there is no structure for them. In view of all the talk of participatory democracy, and the realities and philosophy of today, this is a paradox. The minister would have this House believe that the bill is moving against that pressure, trying to hold back the hand of time because there is no place at the top for youth. This seems to be as a result of the misdeeds and misfortunes of a few of the volunteers, which have condemned all youth and prevented them from participating at the top.

I suppose in a philosophical way the minister intends the youth to participate in the streets but not at the council table, to hopefully contribute to the community but not in the committee room—to be seen but not heard. This will be as bad as the situation which existed because of total freedom. It is even worse, in my humble opinion. This minister and the government preach the just society but their actions make a mockery of the phrase. This is an area in which participatory democracy would have been easy to legislate, even in an advisory way, so that youth could have contributed toward some of the deliberations and perhaps even had a vote on decisions reached by the provisional council.

I have said before, and I repeat, that we should not rush this legislation. It is being somewhat rushed. The committee report was dated December 5 and today is January 28. In this time we are supposed to have found solutions to all the problems the committee had when it investigated the Company of Young Canadians. We should have had a respite from the CYC. We should have reviewed the experience of the CYC with experts so that we could build a constructive and credible agency in which youth could participate socially at the community level.

I am coming to the end of the thoughts that we on this side have expressed about this whole story. Obviously it will be a continuing story. I predict that before this 28th Parliament ends we will again be debating the CYC. The CYC will be back on the parliamentary platter because we have not taken the time to really study it and to do what has been suggested. There should be an independent study. We should use our experience and take steps which are more credible.

These are not only the views of the Conservative party. I wish to quote one eminent Canadian who is also disturbed at some of the things contained in the committee report and the way this matter seems to be heading. There is an article about Duncan Edmunds in the Ottawa Citizen of December 6, 1969. For the record, Mr. Edmunds was a very active and enthusiastic supporter of the CYC in its early stages, a former executive assistant to Senator Martin. Since we are today celebrating Manitoba's centennial, I should mention that he was a candidate for the leadership of the Liberal party in Manitoba.

Mr. Dinsdale: There is no Liberal party in Manitoba now.

Mr. Nowlan: There was at that time. I quote from this press clipping:

—"the proper thing to do is what the Tories suggest: Stop it (the CYC), use the lessons learned and find other ways and means" of harnessing youthful energies for social action.

The article further states:

Although Mr. Edmunds said his objection to the CYC had "never been its radicalism but its total and utter incompetence," in his correspondence with Prime Minister Pearson—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is there unanimous consent that the hon. member continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nowlan: I will be only another minute or two, Mr. Speaker. I thank the House for its indulgence. I have spoken longer than I intended, but I suppose this is not unusual.

This article continues:

—on its "root problems" in 1967, he wrote that it was because CYC "has become the captive of a small ideological group of young people, strongly committed to radical social change through the use of volunteers and very sophisticated modern community development techniques."

He thought there should be a new image, a new creature, a more broadly-based Crown agency encompassing a wider area of interest. I read that article into the record to show that the CYC has cut across party lines. It cut across party lines in its inception, because we all voted for it.

I do not wish to trespass any further on the good grace of the House. I hope I have not taken too long, Mr. Speaker. Our party intended to have one speaker. Because of the interesting philosophical comments of the minister, there may be others who want to enter the debate and perhaps challenge some of his philosophical dogma.

As far as my party is concerned, we want to see this bill move into committee. We may very well move amendments in committee even though we do not think the Company should be kept alive. We think it has lost its credibility. In an attempt to keep faith with youth and to provide some influence, assuming the bill passes this House, we may try to correct some of the faults of the bill. But we do not want the Company to have complete independence again. We believe that youth still has a part to play in social action at the community level. We are completely against the thought that youth is to be merely an echo chamber of the cabinet and council.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, in contrast to the previous speaker, I enjoyed the minister's philosophical comments. I find that frequently I can agree with the words of the minister and the government. What does distress me is not what they say, but what they do.

In speaking for our party I say that for a government that over the years, and even today, has boasted constantly about being concerned with social injustice, and one which presumably prides itself on encourageing the rights of people to dissent, I believe this bill marks an explicit betrayal of our youth, the poor, the voiceless, and of the original ideas that led to the establishment of the Company of Young Canadians under former Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson.

I think it would be difficult to find a more stark example of legislative overkill. Clearly, the government is saying not only to the CYC but to all Canadians that the menace of a few irresponsible militants is greater and far more dangerous than the menace of continued social injustice directed at the deprived people in our slums, public housing projects and Indian reservations.

I agree with the previous speaker that the CYC has been bungled by the government, but this is no reason to believe the whole idea was wrong. The government's reaction to the heat directed at it by powerful groups and individuals has been to throw the baby out with the bath water and to turn the Company overnight from a relatively independent agency attracting purposeful young people dedicated to social change, to a typical Crown corporation under the direct thumb of the minister.

Mr. Osler: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Rose: I would appreciate answering any questions at the conclusion of my remarks. I believe the Company now runs the real risk of developing into a benign, youthful service organization that goes about doing "good works" such as handing out cups of coffee at drop-in centres.

• (4:20 p.m.)

In my opinion, this bill cuts the guts right out of the CYC. We in this party doubt that young men and women willing to fight hard and unselfishly, to challenge the existing power structure, will be prepared to serve any longer. These are the young men and women who are needed to accomplish the purposes of this legislation as originally enacted. I use the words "fight" and "power" intentionally. To me it is axiomatic that some of the dispossessed and alienated find themselves in their present unhappy circumstances because they are powerless to change those circumstances. It follows that if one group—tenants, for example—are to achieve more power, another group—landlords, for instance—will possess less power. Tenants will have to fight for this additional power because the laws of our country are stacked in favour of landlords.

I was interested to read recently that although most of us decry the need for militancy on the campuses, the fact is that militancy works—that change in university structure and organization has been brought about far more successfully by militant rather than by moderate methods. This is a fact. I am not commenting on these activities one way or another. The point is, these methods work. The lesson has not gone unnoticed.

In tenants groups and other circumstances the CYC has played a useful role in advising people of their rights, helping them to define their problems and assisting them to organize and work toward solutions. But the accomplishment of something meaningful in bringing about social change is precisely what lands the CYC into hot water and ultimately into the newspapers. This is what gets the organization into trouble.

It is my belief that an administration directed from the top, the type of set-up called for in this legislation, is likely to be oversensitive, even gun-shy, with regard to publicity of the kind likely to be directed toward the CYC, its staff and its volunteers if one of their projects threatens the status quo. I believe an administration such as is contemplated by this bill will often be tempted to cancel projects before they can accomplish the socially desirable changes which they are intended to bring about, and do so merely because some powerful person or group has seen fit to criticize those activities vocally and fiercely. It is for this reason that I and my hon. friends intend to vote against Bill C-176. We believe the freedom to act of the CYC will be removed or circumscribed by some proposed amendments, and that the organization will survive in name only as a useless relic or as a reminder of vanquished hopes.

It might be useful to review what this bill seeks to accomplish and to sum up what we find objectionable in it. In calling for the Company to become an agency like any number of Crown corporations, the government is destroying one of the unique conditions under which the Company was created. By seeking to make the CYC a Crown agency, the government is virtually destroying its independence of government policy, its freedom to question the establishment that sits opposite us, the municipal establishment, the establishment in the labour unions or even in the universities.

The government has gone far beyond the recommendations of the Committee on Broadcasting. It has retreated completely from the idea that there should be any kind of volunteer representation on the executive council. The committee report did not advise that there should be no volunteer representation on the council; on the contrary, it implied that there should be. But today, as we know, the government intends to appoint all the board members, plus the chairman and the vice-chairman. Apparently democracy cannot even be entrusted to the board to the extent of allowing government appointees to elect their own chairman and vice-chairman. So much for democracy within the council itself!

I am aware that the meetings of the permanently elected council, a body which was in existence for three or four months, were anything but tranquil. But I am also aware that the Company was managed—perhaps mismanaged would be the better word—in the first three years of its existence by a similarly appointed board, and that it was in constant hot water during that time. So if there is any thought that merely by providing for an appointed board, without volunteer representation, we can solve the problems of the CYC, all I can say is that we tried it once and we did not like it.

The previous speaker made much of the fact that some highly-placed men in the government were occupying places on the board in this early period. Therefore, nobody can allow the government to escape its responsibility for the chaotic conditions which resulted from the policies of that board, or its shortcomings whether of commission or omission. It may be, of course, that the new board will be composed of sensitive, creative and even courageous men and women—people with sufficient sense of security to enable them to back to the hilt useful projects to their completion even in the face of local hostility. It may be our fears will prove to have been unjustified. That is certainly to be hoped, because there are enough social evils around to occupy not 200 but 2,000 volunteers for years.

We cannot but support attempts to strengthen the administrative framework of the organization. We are not questioning proposals to amend the act where such action will lead to an increased sense of responsibility on the part of the staff and volunteers. Nor do we object to proposals to tighten financial accountability. For example, we do not think it is a bad thing to provide that the Auditor General should audit the books. We recognize, too, that there have been some extremely wasteful projects in the past, along with some very poorly thought-out decisions by the volunteers and the council. It is regrettable that some of the volunteers were not content with being independent of the government but also wanted to be independent of their own council. This attitude cannot be accepted. It has caused numerous misunderstandings; it has led to wasteful extravagance and consequent bad publicity against which the Company will have to labour mightily to live down.

But we also know that despite all the uproar, there have been some very good projects throughout the years—and we want these to continue and expand. Where you have volunteers who are accepted by the community and enjoy the confidence of the community in which they work, we do not want them yanked out at the whim of some bureaucrat just because a power group has been made uncomfortable as a result of the volunteer work. Such was the case, according to a recent report in the Toronto Star, with respect to the Cape Breton project.

I assure hon. members that when the committee meets to consider this bill I shall make it my business to find out what decisions about projects and people have been made since the trusteeship was imposed in December under the comptroller and the executive director. We shall also be interested to know the whys and wherefores behind these decisions, because such decisions and the rationale behind them may provide an indication, a sneak-preview if you like, of the tone and thrust we may expect in future under the legislation we are contemplating today.

In addition, I intend to fight for the appearance of volunteers before our committee, because by overlooking this matter earlier we were guilty of a glaring oversight in our deliberations. I will also ask our committee to visit some of the projects, which we did not do although the government's terms of reference permitted it. We did not do so, largely because of the time limit imposed on us. I believe that as a result of neglecting to hear volunteers and visit projects, the committee shaped a report far more extreme than desirable. The resulting legislation has been equally far more extreme than would have been the case had we heard from the volunteers and visited the projects. We as parliamentarians and decision-makers, ought to have been more familiar with the project, and personnel, both good and bad, then in existence before making our pronouncement last December.

I visited the CYC project in Vancouver recently and am proud to say I was impressed by the eager young people who staffed it. They were obviously interested in their work and believed in its value. They believe in what they are doing and are worried in case their work has no future. Some of the things they are doing may interest hon. members. One volunteer is working as a sort of welfare ombudsman; another is developing a day care centre; another is helping union members with their research into conditions causing labour unrest and is assisting them to make effective decisions in their union affairs. Other volunteers are helping ratepayer groups in a particular school area to provide a park for neighborhood children; others are working on anti-pollution projects, on summer student employment programs, and in the slums of Vancouver they are attempting to arouse the interest of the community in fighting, among other things, a freeway that might intrude into the community.

Apart from the things I have already mentioned, there is one other area of concern that I should mention. In the original legislation I believe that members of the Company of Young Canadians were to be asked to serve abroad. This provision has been struck from the new bill. It seems to me that in light of the recent report of former Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson, entitled "Partners in Development", members of the Company of Young Canadians could well perform work in developing countries, especially those who use either of our two official languages. Canada could do much to develop the well-being of people in nations less fortunate than ours. Not only is there a field in the developing countries in which our young people could make a contribution; I also think that our own country would benefit from the experience gained by our young people in serving overseas.

An hon. Member: Some Company members went to Cuba.

Mr. Rose: I shall ignore that interjection because it betrays the kind of bias that has led to the extreme nature of various clauses of the bill. No one in this or any other party countenances within the CYC any seditious or subversive activity. But when CYC workers begin to move out of the realm of service work and into the kind of work that might be controversial, I do not think they can avoid coming into conflict with political prejudices and political establishments.

An hon. Member: Especially the Liberal dinosaurs.

[Mr. Rose.]

Mr. Rose: In his opening remarks today the minister said that he believes in the integrity of human beings. Nevertheless, it seems that the various clauses of the bill do not reflect the minister's confidence. I believe we are trying to create a non-political, quiet little organization which will be involved in local social service and which will not involve itself greatly in vital community development and social activity. Perhaps we are just trying to acquire social workers on the cheap.

If we are to abrogate our volunteers freedom of movement, take away their initiative and dampen their creativity, there will be little reason for their remaining volunteers. I suggest that instead of working for $200 a month, they might prefer to quit, or alternatively organize their own union and demand salaries that are paid to professional social workers.

A good deal has been said about extravagance and mismanagement, and we have heard repeatedly that CYC projects have been ill-thought out and costly. Probably we shall never be able to measure the good and the hope that has been generated by successful CYC projects. Putting the matter in its proper perspective, this organization has cost our country approximately 10 cents per capita per year.

• (4:40 p.m.)

I agree with the previous speaker who commented that the regressive move by the government as outlined in this legislation is flying in the face of the concept of shared decision-making that is currently developing, not only in the labour movement but in universities. I think it would be unfortunate if the CYC organization were structured, not to reflect the enlightened words of the minister in his preamble but degenerate instead into a kind of lame duck replica of what was probably envisioned as the most altruistic and progressive piece of legislation that ever came out of this Parliament.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, following the statements which we have just heard in this house, we can say that some good intentions have been expressed.

But from that to believe, however, that the statements of the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) will soothe everyone and answer all the charges made against the Company of Young Canadians, which could again disappear with the adoption and the reference to committee of Bill C-176, I would say that there is quite a difference. The charges made against the CYC proved justified. On this subject, I will quote a statement by Mr. Lucien Saulnier who asked for a royal inquiry which should have been granted in order to determine exactly all that was done within the Company. When he made that request, Mr. Saulnier stated, and I quote:

We now know that in Canada, individuals and groups are working actively to implement a plan which will carry the destruction of freedom, of our form of democratic Government and, in this plan, the people's will, as expressed in the ballot box, is excluded. These individuals and groups are inspired and financed, in many cases, by foreign political powers related to an "International" that does not share our notion of man's fundamental liberties.

Besides, he added further on:

Moreover, the Company of Young Canadians has, in its ranks, in Montreal, more than one member previously convicted, in Montreal, for terrorist activities.

We also find on the premises officially occupied by the Company of Young Canadians and paid for by the Canadian taxpayers, newspapers and pamphlets showing how to fabricate molotov cocktails, paint bombs, flasks and vials devised to disrupt police work in the maintenance of public order.

If as serious a man as Mr. Saulnier can say such things, they must be true. He said that there should have been a royal inquiry instead of merely entrusting the investigation to a committee of the House of Commons, with a Liberal majority. And so, those who could have come as witnesses were unable to do so because the suggestion made by some of the members of the committee are always turned down when put to the vote. Those who could have spoken the truth were therefore unable to appear as witnesses, and Canadians did not find out how those millions had been spent.

Besides, I have here the statement of Patrice Walsh of the Canadian Intelligence Service who offered to appear as a witness, according to a letter dated November 15, 1969 addressed to the member for Matane (Mr. De Bané), and vice-chairman of the Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts. I shall quote only the most important parts of that letter:

We pointed out in our November and December 1967 issue that we feel Mr. Allen Clark's observation is quite right, page 4, adding however: "Mr. Clarke speaks the truth. The whole present concept of the Company of Young Canadians is founded on the power, without responsibility, to spend millions of dollars taken out of federal taxes, without being answerable either to parliament or the taxpayer." Our organization is now 20 years old. As taxpayers, we have the right to demand the immediate dissolution of the Company of Young Canadians. We are also ready to give testimony before your committee in Ottawa, with a view to giving more details on the subversive activities of the members of terrorist movements in Quebec, who in fact control the Company of Young Canadians in Quebec. Trusting that I shall have an early reply to this offer, I remain, yours sincerely, Patrice Walsh.

Everyone knows that Pat Walsh never appeared before the committee because he was denied the right to inform the Canadian people about the confusion the Company of Young Canadians had created in some areas of the country.

Mr. Speaker, while many want to question ideas of the past which, however, have produced men of value who today govern our country, young people read the works of Karl Marx, Communist writings which can be found almost everywhere, and they are the ones we want to shield from that harmful influence.

The Canadian Intelligence Service has issued a study called: "The evolving of the ideologic purpose". I would like to quote, in this respect, a statement made by Mr. Ron Gostick, pointing at the danger of confusing words, of enrolling young people who, through sheer ignorance, might want to involve themselves in disastrous mistakes.

I shall also explain how eager the young people can be to revolutionize everything. We shall then realize the danger of misinterpreting the words and the deeds of a body such as that of the Company of Young Canadians who do not have to answer to anybody, except to a committee with a liberal majority where everything has been ruled beforehand.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Here is Mr. Ron Gostick's statement, and I quote:

It has been established, for instance, that Sam Carr and Fred Rose, M.P., both trained in the principles of Moscow, not only pointed out Canadians to be recruited for the espionage network, but were also active with others in promoting courses or workshops where the motives of espionage were gradually developed, thus expanding the structures in view of a more intensive recruiting and, in some cases, recruited themselves some members for the espionage network proper.

The inquiry divulged the names of a number of Canadians, employed in various government agencies or departments who, while they were completely unaware of the existence of a spy network, and were not involved in any way in such illicit actions, were submitted to the same methods of "training" in order to be of use at some later date.

Mr. Speaker, if it is possible to mislead adults, governments officials, as this leaflet indicates I say this is even more true of young inexperienced, people who become the prey of communism.

This is why we, the guardians of Canadian democracy, must warn the young people against the danger threatening them.

And I shall go on with the quotation:

For these reasons, we study closely the matter of the motive and the methods carefully chosen to instill the proper moral and mental conception into the minds of future Canadian adherents before telling them what they are going to do.

In almost every instance, as has already been said, the agents come from "cells" or study groups made up with secret members or supporters of the Communist party (the progressive labor party).

Those statements have been backed up with evidence, which then sent a few people to jail. It is thereforee quite a hazard to put millions of dollars at the disposal of young enthusiastic Canadians without giving them sound guidelines.

A young member of the Company of Young Canadians, whose name is Pierre Cléroux, made a significant statement in his youthful enthusiasm and his desire to do something, to build a country. That is where the danger lies. In fact, Canadian ideology does not let anyone see this freedom and this security. So, there is danger that the young will be tempted by a socialistic ideology, leading to communism. That is why there is some similarity between the statement made by this youth in his enthusiasm and the words that I quoted a little while ago. The article reads as follows:

In the organization, Pierre considers himself as an animator as well as a helper and a secretary. "It all depends on the situation and the guys I have to face, he said. I fully co-operate in the preparatory work, but I never accept a leading position. Above all, I consider myself as a subordinate. In figures, I may be doing 60 per cent administration and 40 per cent animation.

No matter how praiseworthy are his intentions, if this youth is told lies, he may believe them. In Canada, we have groups of boy-scouts, snow schools and youth camps. With all those elements, it could certainly be possible to create better oriented movements.

I know that the minister will continue to think and say that everything must continue as before, because with a majority in parliament he can organize whatever he pleases.

I have here a letter dated January 5 and addressed to the regional coordinator of the United Steelworkers of America in which the Secretary of State gave the following reply:

—a bill to amend the Company of Young Canadians Act was tabled in the House and will be discussed very soon. It is certain that the CYC will be maintained and the failings uncovered at the inquiry will be rectified.

We see from this statement that the maintaining of the Company of Young Canadians was automatically assured, and today's discussions will bring no change as the majority government does as it pleases in parliament.

I should also like to point out that in Canada, a country that has produced men of real ability, it would be, in my opinion, most logical to revert instead to our former institutions. That is why we, of the Ralliement créditiste, ask that the Company of Young Canadians be dissolved. We demand the dissolution of this Company which has already spent too much of the taxpayers' money, when there are already, in Canada organizations, such as the Canadian Boy Scouts Association, which has rendered great services and which all Canadians are proud of. In fact, this Association has tought to young Canadians a truly extraordinary discipline.

It seems to me that the Boy Scouts of Canada could advantageously replace the Company of Young Canadians, and the money that was allocated to this group should be granted to the Boy Scouts, so that they may continue to serve Canada well.

I could also mention other groups such as Girl Guides, youth camps organized by some parishes, and folk-lore groups, which should rally the youth, help them to enjoy themselves. Young people, who probably are bored in Canada, need guidance. With certain grants, those groups would do a hundred times more than the Company of Young Canadians. Had we helped them, Mr. Lucien Saulnier would never have had to demand an inquiry on the Company of Young Canadians.

There is also in Canada a number of majorette groups composed of young girls who would like to get some training but who cannot for lack of funds.

By the way, in my riding, the young cadets of Thetford Mines have asked for subsidies so as to represent Canada in Osaka, Japan. The answer was negative and this group of 50 young Canadians, who could have gone there to make Canada better known, will have to stay in Thetford Mines. The president of this group has had to go and beg for $10,000 from Quebec to get a grant to pay for the transportation and the training of these young people who will do us proud at Osaka.

Since Canada did not assume its responsibilities, since it prefers to waste millions of dollars in grants to the Company of Young Canadians, this means that the federal government has surrendered. The parents will have to pay the bill. We have learned in committee that automobiles had even been purchased by the CYC. Nobody knows what happened to them. While money is being wasted, the young who want to contribute to the building of this country, according to sound ideas, are unable to do so for lack of money.

Mr. Speaker, again I say that we, of the Ralliement créditiste, ask for the dissolution of the Company of Young Canadians.

The groups I have mentioned urge the young people to perform one good deed each day and I believe that those should be subsidized rather than the Company in question, who is responsible neither to Parliament nor to anybody.

The Secretary of State said that the Company will remain in existence despite all the charges made against it; however, we shall vote against the bill because we demand the dissolution of that organization. Moreover, we are convinced that the scouts, girl guides, cadets and other young people in this country would make better use of public funds while serving the community.

RAILWAY ACT

EXTENSION OF AUTHORITY OF CANADIAN TRANSPORT COMMISSION RESPECTING TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE TOLLS

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications) moved that Bill C-11, to amend the Railway Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Kierans moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): May we call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the House to call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At 5.40 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

APPENDIX "A"

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SECOND SESSION 28TH PARLIAMENT

It is proposed to conclude the current part of the session, which commenced on Monday, January 12, 1970, on Wednesday, March 25, the Wednesday before Good Friday. Counting Wednesday, January 28, there remain 41 sitting days in this period, of which six are to be devoted to opposition allotted days. While the exact date for the budget speech has not been finally determined, it is anticipated that the six-day budget debate will also occur during this period. There remain, therefore, 29 days for dealing with government bills between now and Easter.

It is proposed that the House should reconvene after Easter on Monday, April 6 and adjourn for the summer on Friday, June 26. There are 57 sitting days during that period, of which 13 are devoted to opposition allotted days, leaving 44 days in that final semester for government business.

It is anticipated that the Main Estimates for 1970-71 will be available for tabling in the House during the second week in February and they will be referred to the Standing Committees immediately thereafter. The Final Supplementary Estimates for 1969-70 will be tabled on March 5 and referred to committee immediately. It is proposed that the last opposition day in this part of the session, and the final day for supply purposes, be Tuesday, March 24.

At the moment, there are 15 government bills on the Order Paper awaiting second reading and 4 at the Report Stage. They are as follows:

At Report Stage: Small Businesses Loans Act Amendments; Canada Student Loans Act Amendments; Railway Act Amendment; Expropriation Bill.

At Second Reading: Motor Vehicle Safety Bill; Quebec Savings Bank Act; Dominion Coal Board Dissolution; Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act Amendments; Cape Breton Development Corporation Act Amendments; National Parks Act Amendments; Company of Young Canadians Act Amendments; Nuclear Liability Bill; Quarantine Bill; Canada-Sweden Income Tax Agreement Act Amendments; Standards Council of Canada Bill; Criminal Records Bill; Investment Companies Bill; Canada Shipping Act (Part V) Amendments; Yukon Placer Mining Act Amendments;

In addition the following Government Bills are under consideration in committee: Trust Companies Act Amendments; Loan Companies Act Amendments; Foreign Insurance Companies Act Amendments; Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act Amendments; Canada Water Bill; Deep Sea Fisheries Act Repeal; Coastal Fisheries Protection Act Amendments; Salt Fish Bill; Criminal Code Amendments (Hate Literature); International Development Research Centre of Canada Bill; Canada Corporation Act Amendments.

The following government bill is presently before the Senate: Radiation Emitting Devices Bill.

It is anticipated that the following government bills will be given first reading before the Easter recess: Supplemental Pensions Benefits Bill; National Energy Board Act Amendments; Supreme Court Act Amendments; Northern Inland Waters Bill; Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act 1964 Amendments; Shipping Conferences Bill; Industrial Research and Development Incentives Act Amendments; Parole Act Amendments; Canada Grain Act Revision; Bills of Exchange Act Amendments; Consumer Textile Articles Bill; Farm Products Marketing Boards Bill; Law Reform Commission Bill; Canada Cooperative Associations Bill; Basic S. I. Units Bill; Weights and Measures Act Revision; Agricultural Products Cooperative Marketing Act Amendments; Tax Review Board Bill; Federal Superior Courts Bill; Arctic Seas Pollution Prevention Bill.

In addition, the following government motion will require consideration before the Easter recess: Joint Parliamentary Committee on Price Stability.

It is also anticipated that the following government bills will be given first reading between Easter and the summer adjournment: Uniform Packaging and Labelling Bill; Statistics Act Amendments; Excise Act Amendments; Yukon Act and Northwest Territories Act Amendments; Canada Labour (Standards) Code Amendments; Canada Elections Act Amendments; Representation Commissioner Act Amendment; Canada Shipping Act Amendments; Immigration Appeal Board Act Amendments; Security Review Board Bill; Combines Investigation Act Revision; Criminal Code Amendments; Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act Revision; Public Servants Retirement Bill; Agricultural Adjustment Bill; Pilotage Bill; Canada-Finland Income Tax Agreement Bill; Canada-Jamaica Income Tax Agreement Bill; Cigarette Advertising Bill; Financial Administration Act Amendments; Air Canada Act Amendments; Yukon Minerals Bill; Canada Development Corporation Bill.

To this list would have to be added any bills resulting from the budget.

In view of the fact that the Standing Committees will be embarking upon detailed examination of the Main Estimates in the week commencing the 16th of February, it would be desirable if the committee discussion of bills now before the committees could be substantially concluded by that week, and that committee discussion be well advanced on those now awaiting second reading. Such a timetable would then leave the committees free to concentrate on estimates and on the additional bills that will be introduced in the latter part of the session.

The estimate of time available for government business is, of course, subject to any interruption by unforeseen circumstances, by adjournment motions under S.O. 26, and by other decisions of the House. In turn, the legislative program will also be subject to changes imposed by circumstances not at the moment foreseen.

In summary, then, from January 28th until the summer adjournment, there are now, or there will be, 74 items of government business before the House while there will only be 73 days remaining for government business in that period. Clearly, the House will want to devote more time to some of these bills at the expense of others and it is apparent that careful planning of the time of the House will be necessary, so that all parts of the program may be dealt with.

The reference to 73 days is, of course, a reference to the time in the chamber itself and does not include the additional time available for consideration of bills at the committee stage. The committee stage offers an opportunity for more extensive detailed discussion of bills over a number of days, and in some cases, weeks.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

MANPOWER

STATEMENT ON SUMMER EMPLOYMENT FOR STUDENTS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I promised some months ago that I would make a statement on the experience with summer employment for students. Recently another question about this matter was asked in the House, and with this in mind I should like to report briefly on results last summer and to indicate some of the initiatives currently being followed by my department to assist students in finding jobs next summer.

Based on a survey carried out by my department last fall, some 323,000 students were able to find paying jobs last summer. I may say that the survey covered 39 post-secondary institutions—universities, colleges and technological institutes—across the country.

Of the roughly 400,000 students from post-secondary institutions, some 348,000 were in the summer employment market and of these 93 per cent found summer work. An estimated 323,000 of the 348,000 students who sought paid summer employment found jobs. Of these, 14 per cent worked for more than four months, 60 per cent for two to four months, 18 per cent for one to two months, and 8 per cent for less than a month.

This is generally a good result and encourages us to maintain and expand the program launched to assist student employment in the past summer. Of those who were not looking for jobs, nearly half continued their studies; another 25 per cent travelled, took time off or did unpaid volunteer work.

Half of those who found employment expressed satisfaction with the duration of their jobs. One-third would have liked two months more work and 11 per cent stated they would have worked more than two months.

Of the students working, 72 per cent were employed in industry and 14 per cent with provincial governments across Canada, while 7 per cent were granted employment with the federal government and a further 7 per cent with municipalities.

The federal government hired some 11,365 students, an increase of 26.8 per cent over the previous year. Students working for the federal governments earned $11,129,417 in salaries and wages. Seventy-five per cent of those hired were returning to post-secondary institutions. Students of post-secondary institutions in federal employment earned an average of $1,083, while high school students earned an average of $654.

Finally, plans are under way in my department, in co-operation with private and public organizations and provincial government departments, to complete plans and programs for the coming summer months. A national committee for student summer employment is functioning and includes representatives of the Association of Canadian Universities and Colleges, the University Career Planning Association, the Economic Council of Canada and the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. Working through manpower centres both across the country and at the universities, as well as with federal and provincial departments of government, it is hoped that employment can be provided for the majority of students in order to obtain funds to finance their continued education.

In closing I would pay tribute to the energetic campaign being carried on by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce through its members, who have been working closely with my department to make the "Hire a Student" campaign a success next summer.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I received a copy of the minister's statement just as I took my seat. I should like to make a few comments on what the minister has said and about this problem.

There can be no question that a number of students had difficulty obtaining employment last summer, and presumably difficulty will be encountered again this summer. I suggest this will result from the general employment conditions in the country and the policies of the government regarding employment, austerity programs and so on. These policies have increased unemployment substantially and have had an effect on students as well as others seeking work. On the basis of the present outlook we can expect quite a difficult summer in terms of students obtaining employment.

While the minister has said he has an advisory board and a program that is getting under way, I do not think anyone can stress too strongly the necessity for the minister and those with whom he is associated to understand fully the gravity of the situation and the implications for students who are not able to obtain work. Unfortunately we face a situation in which not only is employment becoming more difficult to obtain but also the number of students who need the extra money is increasing. Not only does the minister have to launch a considerably more vigorous program than we have seen to date but the government of Canada in association with the provinces must take a very careful look to determine the over-all position of these students and the extent to which students are being forced to drop out or defer their education for financial reasons.

I am disappointed that rather than working with the provinces with a view to meeting this problem the government has indicated in the white paper on tax reform that it is going to subject bursaries to income tax. This can only serve to increase the difficulties. We all recognize that if a student cannot continue his studies at a particular time in life he or she may well suffer irreparable injury with the result, of course, that the nation also suffers.

While I welcome the minister's statement and his assurance that he is working on this very serious problem, quite frankly I see no indication that the government is prepared to grapple with student assistance by placing it in context with the over-all unemployment problem. I urge the minister and the Prime Minister to really take this matter seriously, particularly in view of the fact that their policies are designed to create unemployment and incidentally create additional difficulty for our students.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I too received the minister's statement a few minutes ago just as I entered the House. We in this party welcome the minister's statement of his intentions which I am sure are good. However, I believe we are in complete agreement that the statement does not go far enough. It barely scratches the surface.

The minister pointed out that 93 per cent of students seeking work found employment last summer, but he went on to say that about half of them were not satisfied with the employment they obtained. We must remember that many students who obtained employment last summer were remunerated at a rate which did not enable them to return to university. Several students from my province of Saskatchewan have written or spoken to me or to some of my colleagues pointing out that they just could not find employment last summer in the province of Saskatchewan which is suffering from some economic hardship. Something must be done immediately because this situation has handicapped many students and made it difficult for them to attend university. This is particularly so in the case of women who find that their salaries are lower and who do not wish to borrow huge sums of money in order to attend university.

We must remember that educated people are our main resource. Therefore I believe top priority should be given to this whole problem. The answer is not simply the finding of jobs. University education should be made available to everyone. If there is universal accessibility to education we will also have to provide more jobs for our working people.

I welcome the minister's statement but it by no means goes far enough toward solving the problem.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, we are pleased with the results of the survey revealing that the great majority of students found employment last summer. We should certainly like to see every student succeed in getting a job next summer.

However, Mr. Speaker, perhaps it would be proper to point out that even if 82,700 students from Quebec, out of a total of 95,300, found employment, it remains that 12,600 did not. This is rather impressive. Would this mean that almost 13,000 Quebec students were unable to return to the university or to a technical school, because they had not the necessary financial means? If so, it is extremely unfortunate.

It would not only be necessary to find summer employment for the students, but we should also guarantee them a pre-salary, in order that their intellectual development should not be dependent on summer employment.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

PENSIONS

RESPONSIBILITY FOR PAYMENT OF ASSISTANCE TO THE AGED

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare a question arising out of the answer he gave me yesterday indicating that the government of Canada would be prepared to share in the cost of supplemental old age assistance provided the province concerned put up 50 per cent of the cost. Are we to assume from this statement that it is now the position of the government of Canada that it will not accept the full responsibility for payment of assistance to the aged in spite of the fact that it has accepted full responsibility for quite a number of years?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The situation has always been that if any province felt that the federal payments for old age security or for the guaranteed income supplement were inadequate, for various reasons within the province such as the cost of living and so on, the formula under the Canada Assistance Plan would provide that type of flexibility based on the criteria that additional funds would be given to the people who are receiving old age security, the guaranteed income supplement or other assistance payments from the province itself. That situation has existed now for at least four or five years ever since the inception of the Canada Assistance Plan.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I assume the minister would agree that the present payments are inadequate. Is the government prepared to pay more old age assistance to old people in one part of the country as opposed to those in another part of the country provided only that the provincial governments are sufficiently well to do to be able to find the 50 per cent of the cost which the minister specifies?

Mr. Munro: The situation in Canada has always been that in certain areas of the country benefit levels have been higher due to the cost of living. Where that situation exists and the province pays out more money we still provide our 50 per cent share in which case we are spending more money in that province or in that region.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. We are getting a new look at the just society. Is it the position of the government that payments for old age assistance are inflationary if the government of Canada bears 100 per cent of the cost but are not inflationary if the province pays 50 per cent of the cost?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether the statements he made yesterday and today are a preview of the government's white paper on social security, or is the door still open for increasing the rate of the universal portion of the old age security payment?

Mr. Munro: I would advise the hon. member that the door is still open and that what I have said yesterday and today is nothing new at all. This has been the situation for the last four or five years, as I said, and I am only surprised that the Leader of the Opposition is so totally unaware of the program in which he himself and his province participated.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the door is still open, is the government giving serious consideration to the universal principle rather than going back to an income test or a split federal and provincial responsibility?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, the universal principle, income testing and the guaranteed annual income concept all have to be considered in any over-all review of social welfare policies, and they are being considered.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is whether the agreements between the government of Canada and the provinces under the Canada Assistance Plan provide that the provinces may avail themselves of the privilege of lowering their payments under the Canada Assistance Plan whenever there is an increment in old age security as provided for by the act because, as a matter of fact, this does apply in the province of Alberta?

Mr. Munro: Under the Canada Assistance Plan the province determines when a person is in need. If the federal government should give an increment under some of its policies to people who were receiving payments from the province, the province could, in those circumstances, reduce the payments they had been making up to that time. We usually discourage it, but there is nothing to prevent the province from doing so.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister might then advise the House what is the benefit of the cost of living increase provided under the old age security program if a payment is provided on the one hand under the Old Age Security Act and then withdrawn by the province under the Canada Assistance Plan?

Mr. Munro: I would hope the provinces would not do that.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But they do.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

ABSORPTION BY INFORMATION CANADA—FUTURE ROLE

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State. In view of the continuing concern about the future of the National Film Board, can the minister assure the House that the National Film Board will not be absorbed in Information Canada? Also, will he undertake to make a statement as soon as possible to clarify the future role of the National Film Board?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, it has never been considered, and it is not now, to merge the National Film Board into the agency to be established under the name of Information Canada. I am surprised that a member of the House who heard my recent statement should ask such a question, as not one sentence of that statement can be so interpreted.

[English]

Mr. Burton: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the incomplete nature of the study that was made of the Film Board and in view of the uncovered areas in the minister's statement last week, has the minister given further consideration to the views of the National Film Board employees since that time? Is the minister giving consideration to maintaining the personnel strength of the production section at a greater level than he indicated in the House last week?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, cuts in personnel because of the government's austerity policy were inevitable. I said so in my statement. Once more, I will express my surprise at such a question being asked by a member who heard the statement in which I specifically mentioned that a comprehensive policy applying to films was in course of preparation.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

REFERENCE OF SAUMIER REPORT TO COMMITTEE

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): I hope the minister will not be surprised at this question. Will he use his good offices to have the Saumier report referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts so the question of the Film Board and some of the conflicting and contrasting views of the Saumier Report and the government film commissioner, Mr. McPherson, can be reviewed in terms of a cultural policy for Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the policy concerning the National Film Board and all relevant budgetary considerations will be reviewed by the committee when it deals with the estimates of the National Film Board.

[English]

RECONSIDERATION OF ORDER LEVYING CHARGES FOR USE OF FILMS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): A supplementary question to the Secretary of State. Is the minister reconsidering the policy imposed on the National Film Board through the austerity program which necessitated the implementation of user charges for films supplied to various public, educational and church institutions throughout Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, this question was examined by Mr. Saumier who stated in his report that he thought this policy was sound and necessary at this time.

[English]

Mr. Rose: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I ask the minister if he will give consideration to making a statement on motions in the near future on a comprehensive cultural policy for Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, this matter is under review and the hon. member will agree, I think, that a cultural policy cannot be drafted in a few weeks or even a few months; in any case, I think that the work undertaken long ago by the department of the Secretary of State should produce results within a few months.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DAVIE SHIPBUILDING COMPANY—PROVISION FOR EMPLOYEES IN EVENT OF CLOSURE

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): From the defunct Department of Forestry and Rural Development, and from the living Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, I would like to know if an alternative exists for the 4,000 workers at the Lauzon shipyards who may be laid off following the eventual closing of Davie Shipbuilding?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the Lauzon area is a designated area. We are preparing a program, in co-operation with the province of Quebec, and we are actively considering the case of the 4,000 workers at the Lauzon shipyards.

[English]

MINIMUM WAGE—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Is the minister planning in the near future to raise the minimum wage in industries under federal jurisdiction? It is nearly five years now since the minimum wage was raised and the cost of living has gone up 20 per cent in the intervening period.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have mentioned on several occasions that we are studying this matter. The only consolation I have is that less than 5,000 people in the federal field are working at the minimum wage level. So apart from the psychological effect it has no real effect, or at least very little on very few people.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a supplementary question to the Prime Minister as the Minister of Labour gave me almost exactly the same answer a year and a half ago. Is the policy of forcing people to live farther and farther below the poverty level the fundamental basis of his just society?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hees: The Prime Minister nods his head, which means yes.

An hon. Member: He is shy today.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

BENEFITS PAID RETIRED COAL MINERS

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister and concerns the method used by the Cape Breton Development Corporation to compensate retired coal miners. Further to the question posed to the Prime Minister on Tuesday of this week asking for an investigation into the whole matter in view of the continuing protests from the unions concerned and in view of the fact that the Prime Minister took my question as notice, may I ask the right hon. gentleman if he is in a position to shed any further light on this subject?

An hon. Member: Not today.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): The answer so far as the Unemployment Insurance Commission is concerned is that the income received by the retired miners as a result of arrangements made between Devco and the unions representing them has been classed by regulation in the same category as income from dividends and therefore these unemployed miners are not penalized in respect of being eligible for unemployment insurance. If that is a violation of the Unemployment Insurance Commission regulations, and unless someone can prove it is, I am at a loss to understand what good it would do the miners to find this source of income suddenly removed.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary. In view of the continuing telegrams of protest and other communications we are receiving it would appear that this message is not getting through to those concerned, and we are worried about this sort of thing. Perhaps I should direct the question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion; I see he is here today. Would the minister cause an investigation to be made into this whole subject so that we can reach a decision as to who is right? The message apparently is not getting through to the men receiving the moneys and I think they have a right to an investigation. I may not be a "second-hand Rose" but I think I should have the courtesy of an answer in this House.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I must say that I got in touch with Devco. No complaint was made either to Devco or to my department. The union to which the hon. member is referring is in fact a small group of superannuated employees which is called a Union and which has no connection with the United Mines Workers of America who have made no request in the name of those pensioners.

[English]

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, that statement is completely erroneous. We have a statement here in a letter of protest from the President of the C.B. of R.T. which represents the men who are at present working in the Devco coal mines. I wish the minister would get on the job so he would know what is happening.

Mr. Hees: That is asking too much.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I have order, please.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion to look at his files and see if they do not contain these wires and correspondence that he and the Prime Minister deny receiving. We have checked it out and the telegrams were delivered, but they have denied receiving these protests against the action of the Cape Breton Development Corporation. In view of the fact that the corporation is breaking the law every day, will he see—

[Mr. Mackasey.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. As the hon. member has already asked his question it should not be repeated.

Mr. MacInnis: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the question was put to the government whether they had received protests not from retired miners but from active locals within Cape Breton protesting the action of Devco. This was denied by the government but it has since been checked out and Canadian National Telegraph will confirm that these wires were received.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With respect, I have to suggest to the hon. member that he may have a point for debate but I would not think that this constitutes a question of privilege. I think we should go on to another subject.

Mr. MacInnis: On the same question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: It would have to be a different question of privilege. The hon. member may have another point and I will listen to him.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I am like the Minister of Labour; I have got hundreds of examples. Does the government now deny receiving these protests from active local unions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at times I am asked if I have received a message. When I know I say I have or have not, and when I do not know I say I will check. It is conceivable that members of the public send their telegrams to members of the opposition so that they know about matters before I do but, except in this case, I always check if I have received them.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): January 18.

Mr. MacInnis: Now that the Prime Minister has seen fit to answer my question, can I consider this a promise broken?

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): The Prime Minister is a funny boy, not a "Funny Girl".

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NIGERIA—EFFECTIVENESS OF RELIEF OPERATIONS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Has he received reports from the Fathers Doheny, Irish priests, who recently returned from the eastern region of Nigeria where they served for 15 years, to the effect that there is an urgent and very real need for international action to persuade the government of Nigeria to accept an immediate and massive airlift of food? What action, if any, is the government taking on these reports?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have had the pleasure of spending a good half hour with these gentlemen and I must say I admire greatly their devotion to the cause of their parishioners. I had from them a report on conditions as they were a couple of weeks ago when they left Nigeria and they urged the desirability of getting relief to these people. I could not agree more.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the Secretary of State for External Affairs would make a report on the progress being made with regard to the publication of the most recent report of the observer team?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, there have been no further messages since my report yesterday.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister clarify his statement yesterday and tell us just where responsibility lies with regard to these reports and whether there is not some responsibility on the part of our own observers to make these reports and then to make them public?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as I have already said, these are independent observers who do not take instructions from the Canadian government. They act on their own and report what they see which is, I am sure, what we want them to do. They have their own rules and I think we have been well served by these observers. From the reports I have seen recently I think we will continue to be well served, and I hope my hon. friend will support me in that.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he is acting upon the suggestion that Nigeria be urged to use the two other airports besides Uli, that is, Obill-a-goo and Ogua?

Mr. Sharp: I must repeat what I have said before, that I do not accept the proposition that the government of Nigeria is less interested in the people over whom it has control than we in this Parliament. If we go on taking this patronizing, superior attitude toward them, we cannot expect the kind of co-operation that I think we should have.

DRUGS

MARIJUANA—ALLEGED STATEMENT AS TO LEGALIZATION

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Did the minister state yesterday that the government will legalize marijuana if a reasonable minority of Canadians is found to use the substance? If so, what does the minister mean by a reasonable minority?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that the question cannot be asked in this way.

[Later:]

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, may I rephrase the question I asked a moment ago and direct it to the Prime Minister. Was the Minister of National Health and Welfare stating government policy when he said that the government will legalize marijuana if a reasonable minority of Canadians is found to use the substance? If so, may I ask what is meant by a reasonable minority?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the minister that he stated nothing of the kind.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

EQUAL PAY FOR WOMEN FOR EQUAL WORK

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. In view of the legislation presently before the Parliament of the United Kingdom which will at long last give women in that country the right to equal pay for equal work, is the minister considering bringing before the Parliament of Canada during the present session similar legislation for the benefit of the women of Canada?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, frankly, although we are reviewing our legislation we are waiting for the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. We want to have before us the recommendations of that report because they will perhaps have some bearing on the proposed legislation.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister not consider that the time has arrived for a little more action and a little less consideration of matters coming under his jurisdiction? We seem to be getting only consideration of matters and no action on them.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ACTION RESPECTING MALFUNCTIONING TELEVISION SETS

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Has the minister seen reports indicating that malfunctioning colour television sets sold in Canada have started fires in homes? If so, what action is his department contemplating taking in order to prevent the sale of such sets in the future?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Actually, Mr. Speaker, preliminary information became available last fall at which time we asked the Canadian Standards Association to review their standards applicable to television sets made in Canada. Two days ago the work of the United States commission on product safety became available and two of my officials are in Washington analysing that information with the commission in order to determine its applicability to Canada. When all the information has been analysed I shall be meeting with the Canadian Standards Association as well as the Canadian manufacturers and importers to see whether Canadian standards ought to be changed to correct any faults in manufacturing.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the government given consideration to having colour television sets defined under the Hazardous Products Act?

Mr. Basford: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are, although not for the reasons outlined in the previous question and answer. My colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, will be making recommendations on whether colour television sets should be regulated under the Hazardous Products Act because of their radiation emission.

[Mr. Mackasey.]

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—EXTENT OF LAY-OFFS OF EMPLOYEES

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I feel neglected. May I ask myself a question?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pepin: May I answer questions asked by the Leader of the Opposition on Tuesday with respect to lay-offs in the automobile industry? The two probing questions asked were, first, whether notice has been given in such instances and, second, whether the situation is worse in Canada than in the United States.

I have looked into this situation. To answer a distinction must be made between two types of lay-offs. One type is for restructuring. We have had two instances of that type, both in Chrysler Corporation. In each of these two instances notice was given to employees several weeks in advance.

In the other category, which involves lay-offs due to inventory surpluses, I found that the company discussed the matter with their employees or their representatives in each case. Since these are generally emergency situations it is difficult for the company to give two or three months notice.

With respect to whether the position is worse in Canada than in the United States, I have been assured by the companies, and our analysis would so far indicate, that although cutbacks have been handled somewhat differently and on a different time basis by each company in each country, there is no indication that the Canadian industry has been hit harder than that of the United States. My officials are keeping a close watch on these developments.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In order to make certain that the minister does not feel ignored or lonely, may I ask him whether he has information indicating the total extent of the lay-offs? Does he know what proportions those lay-offs may reach during this winter? Has the automobile industry indicated the extent of any such possible lay-offs?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, the future is difficult to anticipate, as I indicated, because these are emergency situations created by market conditions. If my hon. friend knows in advance what will happen in the market, I wish he would let me know because that would be useful information for the industry.

IMMIGRATION

DEPORTATION OF JAMES AUTRY

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, not long ago I directed a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration about James Autry. I wanted to know whether his officials had requested the United States government to arrange for his deportation under the Visiting Forces Act. Is the minister in a position now to answer my original question?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have my hon. friend's question in front of me and I intended to rise later to answer it and advise him that because the officials of the Immigration Department were of the opinion that this person should be dealt with under the Visiting Forces Act they were in touch with the United States consul in Halifax and I believe with U.S. officials in Ottawa about this particular person.

Replying to the question asked by the hon. member for Calgary North, there was no request by Mr. Autry to have his case heard before the Immigration Appeal Board and therefore there was no refusal of any such request.

Mr. Baldwin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister advise whether in the discussions that took place officials of the department informed United States officials that under the Visiting Forces Act there could be no right of appeal and consequently, unlike the Immigration Act, there could be no proceedings that would prove a political embarrassment to the Canadian government?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer that question because in the report to me no allusion was made to any conversation along those lines. When our policy with respect to desertion was announced in the House I made it clear that the only exception to the policy would be persons in Canada as members of forces of another country and that these persons would be subject to the Visiting Forces Act. It was for that reason that the normal policy was not followed by the officials of the department who were of the opinion that this person ought to be dealt with under that act.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice about the Autry case. Has he investigated to ascertain whether as a result of decisions by our courts, notably in British Columbia, the handing over of a man like Autry by Canadian military personnel to U.S. personnel was outside the authority of the Visiting Forces Act and therefore totally illegal?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we are conducting a very extensive investigation into the case, and because of the importance of the case I shall consider making a statement on it after we have concluded the investigation.

NATIONAL PRESS CLUB

REFUSAL OF MEMBERSHIP TO WOMEN—SUGGESTED VIOLATION OF BILL OF RIGHTS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. On Monday I asked the hon. gentleman whether he would check the tenancy of the National Press Club in a building owned by the government of Canada. May I ask him whether he has been able to reconcile any regulation authorizing that tenancy with the provisions of the Canadian Bill of Rights?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): The Canadian Bill of Rights applies only to statutes and section 2 is, I think, very clear. It does not apply to the internal management or rules of a club or private organization. The National Press Club has a lease from the Department of Public Works until April 30, 1972, with an option to renew for five years—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the minister. It seems to me this is information which should be sought by way of a question on the Order Paper and given in writing by the minister.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the Canadian Bill of Rights does apply to regulations as well as the statutes, will the minister check into this angle of the matter and give an answer in whatever way he may choose to do so?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TRANSFER OF NERVE GAS FROM OKINAWA TO UNITED STATES

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): I have a question for the Secretary of State for

Inquiries of the Ministry

External Affairs. Has the Canadian ambassador in Washington reported on the subject of the United States army's intention to ship five barges of nerve gas from Okinawa to Hermiston army base in the state of Washington via the Strait of Juan de Fuca? Furthermore, can the hon. gentleman inform the House what message the Canadian ambassador in Washington delivered to the United States authorities on this subject?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have received a report from our ambassador in Washington on this subject. I am informed by him that no shipments have yet taken place. We are pursuing discussions with the United States. The shipments cannot take place until the Secretary for Health, Education and Welfare has reviewed the proposal, including measures to protect public health and safety, and this he has not yet done.

Mr. Anderson: A supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would allow the hon. member's supplementary but we are running short of time and I think we ought to move on as quickly as we can.

Mr. Anderson: Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs let the House know the message which was delivered by the Canadian ambassador to the United States authorities?

Mr. Sharp: The ambassador made inquiries, as I have indicated, as to whether in fact these shipments had been made or were being made. I have given the information I have received, namely, that they have not yet been made.

AGRICULTURE

PROGRAM TO MOVE FARMERS OFF LAND

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): My question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. In light of statements made by the minister in a recent public address, when does the government plan to bring forward its program to speed up the transition of marginal farmers to the city or to retirement with dignity?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): As I have said many times during the course of this session, Mr. Speaker, I hope it will be before the end of the session.

[Mr. Anderson.]

INDIAN AFFAIRS

TRANSFER OF RESPONSIBILITY—ASSURANCE OF RIGHT TO ENGLISH OR FRENCH EDUCATION

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I have a question for the Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker. Having regard to the frustration experienced by Eskimos in Northern Quebec who wish to have their children educated in the English language, and in view of the government's declared policy of promoting the equality of both the English and the French languages across Canada, will the Secretary of State inform the House what steps he has taken to ensure that any transfer of responsibility for Canada's Indian people from the federal government to the provinces will not be undertaken in the absence of guarantees to the Indians that they may have their children educated in either the English or the French language?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member and to the minister that this is information which ought to be given to the House by way of a statement.

[Translation]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INVITATION FROM MAURITANIA TO ATTEND CONFERENCE OF FRENCH-SPEAKING MINISTERS OF EDUCATION

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Could he tell us whether an agreement has been reached between the federal government and that of Quebec with regard to representation at the conference in Mauritania?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. We have been taking part in some discussions with the province of Quebec on representation at a number of these conferences both in Niger and in Mauritania. These have not yet been concluded but I judge from the statement attributed to the Premier of Quebec that a decision will be made along the general lines of the agreement reached in the past.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

EASTERN NOVA SCOTIA—REPORTED DRASTIC CUTS IN MAINTENANCE OF WAY EMPLOYEES

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): I have a question for the Minister of Transport,

Mr. Speaker. In view of a report that drastic cuts are to be made in the near future in the number of workers employed by the CNR on maintenance of way in eastern Nova Scotia, would the minister check to ascertain whether this information is correct, bearing in mind the possible effect upon employment?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has made a representation to the minister and he must assume it will be looked into.

POLLUTION

ARCTIC WATERS—TRAINING OF COASTGUARD MEMBERS TO ENFORCE STANDARDS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): I have a question for the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker. I welcome the hon. gentleman to the House on a day when he is not supposed to be here, though we are not sure what reason brings him here. Are members of the Canadian Coastguard Service currently receiving training in policing anti-pollution standards in northern waters?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Since the hon. member is always telling us we do not even know the time of day, he will not be surprised if I say I will be glad to investigate, and provide an answer to his question in due course.

INTRODUCTION OF NATIONAL CLEAN AIR LEGISLATION

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): My question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It arises, in part out of the statement of business which was placed before the House by the Government House Leader. Can the hon. gentleman tell us what has happened to the proposal for a national clean air act which his predecessor indicated in the last parliament to be in an advanced state of preparation for presentation to the House?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Work is being done on a clean air bill but in view of all that remains to be done it is not planned to introduce the measure during this part of the session.

GRAIN

INVESTIGATION OF RATIONALIZATION OF COUNTRY ELEVATOR SYSTEM

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the many statements which have been made in connection with the entire grain handling system, can the minister tell us whether or not a committee of officials is investigating the rationalization of the country elevator system in the prairie provinces and whether such committee has made either firm or preliminary recommendations with respect to the long-term rationalization of the country elevator system in Saskatchewan so as to reduce the number of shipping points from 1,100 to fewer than 100?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): The matter is under consideration but it certainly has not reached the stage suggested by the hon. member in the last part of his question.

[Translation]

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INCREASE IN CRIME—REPRESENTATIONS BY QUEBEC MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

In view of the recent statements by the Quebec Minister of Justice regarding the fresh outbreak of crime in Canada and the telegram received by the federal Minister of Justice last Friday, could the Prime Minister tell us if the government has answered the telegram and, if so, what the reply was?

[English]

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I believe this question has already been asked. We are as concerned as the Attorney General of Quebec about crimes of violence; we are not sure he has suggested the right remedy.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REPRESENTATIONS BY DIABETIC ASSOCIATION RESPECTING CYCLAMATE BAN—AVAILABILITY OF SUBSTITUTE

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): My question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the recent ban on cyclamates and subsequent representations made to the minister by the Canadian Diabetic Association indicating that as a result severe hardship has been imposed upon those afflicted with diabetes, is any consideration being given to making available a substitute in order that diabetics may acquire some relief?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Mazankowski: In the meantime is the minister giving any consideration to permitting the use of controlled amounts of cyclamates by those afflicted with diabetes?

Mr. Munro: Depending on what is meant by controlled, yes, Mr. Speaker.

FISHERIES

PAYMENT OF DEFICIENCY INDEMNITIES TO SALT COD FISHERMEN

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): I have a question for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries. In connection with the unnecessary delay in making payments of deficiency indemnities to salt cod fishermen, will the hon. gentleman investigate this situation with a view to speeding up these urgently needed payments?

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): We have done that, Mr. Speaker.

GRAIN

ADVICE TO WHEAT GROWERS ON PRODUCTION

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): This question is directed to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Wheat Board. When does the minister intend to offer meaningful production advice to farmers so that they may reduce their wheat production without producing a surplus in other crops, a possibility suggested in a statement made to the Canadian Federation of Agriculture?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): It was also stated yesterday that we were very conscious of the fact that time is pressing in this regard, and therefore we shall be making any advice we have to give on this subject available as soon as possible.

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio. In view of the fact the minister is recommending that farmers with surplus wheat further reduce wheat acreage or grow no wheat this summer, is the government considering paying for this reduction in wheat acreage in order to compensate those farmers who follow his suggestion?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the whole question of the kind of advice we should give to farmers and of the fashion in which we should try to make that advice as meaningful as possible to individual farmers in order to achieve the right result is all part of the matter that is under consideration. In addition, may I say that the word "recommending" used in the hon. member's question is probably slightly mis-stating the situation, since what I was really doing was asking some logical questions in light of the current situation.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the minister's advice to western farmers not to plant wheat in the current crop year, are we to assume that the Prime Minister's remark in Winnipeg, "why should I sell wheat" has now become government policy?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[Translation]

SHIPPING

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING SHIP SPEED LIMIT

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): I would like to ask the Minister of Transport a question.

Does the Minister intend to carry out a recommendation of the Canada-U.S. committee to the effect that the speed of ships moving through the St. Lawrence Seaway should be limited to 15 miles per hour?

Mr. Speaker: This question could be placed on the Order Paper.

[English]

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

MEETING WITH NORTHWEST TERRITORIES COUNCIL RESPECTING CONSTITUTIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. R. J. Orange (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister received a request from the council of the Northwest Territories, which at the moment is concluding its session in Yellowknife, to meet with the council to discuss constitutional development in the North? May I also ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. Could the right hon. gentleman give the House some indication as to when he will be able to meet the council?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I must have received such an invitation, Mr.

Speaker, since the Parliamentary Secretary has asked the question, but I must confess that I have not seen it yet. I will look into the matter immediately.

AGRICULTURE

INCLUSION OF NEW PROTEIN GRADING IN CANADA GRAIN ACT

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Will the new Canada Grain Act, to be introduced this session, include new protein grading for wheat?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Orders of the day.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a very short question.

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings, but I would point out that we have already gone beyond the time allotted to the question period by a few minutes. Perhaps the hon. member would ask his question tomorrow.

Mr. Hees: On a point of order, tomorrow would be too late. My question will take a very short space of time.

Mr. Speaker: Certainly I have no objection whatever, and I am sure that all hon. members would like to hear the hon. member's question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

OFFER OF POSITION AS JUDGE TO MR. CLAUDE WAGNER

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister, if he can take his eyes and his mind off the visitors' gallery long enough to answer it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: My question is: Did the Prime Minister yesterday promise Mr. Wagner a federal judgeship, and does he consider that this will be sufficient to keep him from jumping out of Liberal ranks?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question was asked yesterday.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, may I raise the traditional point of order for a Thursday and ask the President of the Privy Council about the little tidbits of business that he has for the House this week and next week?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The business for today will be as indicated earlier. The first item will be No. 41 on the Order Paper, the Quebec Savings Banks Act, second reading. There will be a slight change in the order as announced in that the second item of business will be order No. 12, the Small Businesses Loans Act amendment. This will be followed by order No. 19 with respect to the Canada Student Loans Act. If those measures are completed at today's sitting, we will then commence the consideration of item No. 24 with respect to the motor vehicle safety legislation.

For tomorrow the bills to be called will be order No. 13, with respect to the Canada Shipping Act, and order No. 55, the quarantine measure. There will be further consultations in case additional business might be appropriate for the latter part of tomorrow.

On Monday we will again call the motor vehicle safety bill, if it has not been completed. Tuesday will be an opposition allotted day. On Wednesday we will call No. 29 on the order paper, the national parks bill, followed by order No. 48, the amendment to the Yukon Placer Mining Act. On Thursday next the House will take order No. 25, the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act, followed by order No. 7, the criminal records bill.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

EXTENSION OF AUTHORITY TO OPEN BRANCHES

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister without Portfolio) moved that Bill S-2, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, for many years only two banks have operated under the legislation in question, the Banque d'Économie de Quebec and the Montreal City and District Savings Bank. The first of these was authorized to operate in the district of Quebec, and the second in the district of Montreal. These districts were defined in the act.

However, as the House will recall, last year Parliament passed a private bill changing the status of the Banque d'Économie de Quebec to that of a bank operating under the Bank Act. This change of status was effective as of Monday, November 10, 1969.

The purpose of the present bill, therefore, is to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act to permit the Montreal City and District Savings Bank to extend its operations, if it chooses to do so, into that part of Quebec province which lies outside the district of Montreal. In particular, it will authorize this bank to operate in the area in which the Banque d'Économie will no longer operate as a savings bank.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to allow the bank to open branches anywhere within the province of Quebec.

[English]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no purpose in having any extended discussion on this matter. In light of the spirit of extending competition among chartered banks, and banks coming under federal jurisdiction, the desire of this bank to operate outside the confines of the city of Montreal as it has heretofore can only be commended. Therefore, we support the bill.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, we would have supported a move to not even send the bill to committee. I would be quite prepared, on behalf of this party, to agree that we amend the direction so that the committee stage be taken in this House, and that the bill be dealt with in this way.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, if I may respond to that point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure whether the hon. member is raising a point of order or whether he is speaking to the motion before the House. If he is speaking to the motion, then if the minister replies he will, of course, close the debate.

Mr. Gray: Then may I raise a point of order myself, Mr. Speaker. If I may I would like to indicate that we would be willing to accept an amendment to the order that Your Honour has presented to us along the lines the hon. member has just suggested.

[Mr. Gray.]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Then I would move, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale):

That the motion be amended by deleting that portion that refers this bill to the Standing Committee; and that the bill be referred to the committee of the whole.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I should just like to say that since the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs committee has so much business before it at the present time, I think there is merit in the proposal that has been placed before the House.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps there might be unanimous consent to accept the amendment as it has been suggested by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert).

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion as amended?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee and reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a third time?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): By leave, now.

Mr. Gray moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

EXTENSION OF CATEGORIES OF LENDERS

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-9, to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River) moved:

That Bill C-9, an Act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, be amended by striking out the word "or" at line 15, page 1 thereof, by adding the word "or", next after the word "Act;", at line 28, page 1 thereof, and by inserting therein, next after line 28, page 1 thereof, the following:

"(iv) A Treasury Branch of the Province of Alberta that is designated by the Minister on the application of the government of the Province of Alberta as a bank for the purposes of this Act;"

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a point of order, if it is proper to do so at this time. I ask Your Honour to consider whether the amendment can be considered by the House. I submit that the addition of the words "A Treasury Branch of the Province of Alberta" exceeds the terms and recommendations from His Excellency which read as follows:

His Excellency the Governor General has recommended to the House of Commons the present measure to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act to increase the present limit of liability of the Minister of Finance in respect of loans made by individual lenders, and to provide for a further one and a half year loan period ending June 30, 1971; Also to provide that the aggregate principal amount of guaranteed loans during that period shall not exceed one hundred million dollars on loans by chartered banks, and fifty million dollars on loans by credit unions, Caisses Populaires, co-operative credit societies, insurance companies, trust companies or loan companies designated by The Minister.

On October 10, 1968, Mr. Speaker, I raised what I submit is exactly the same point of order in respect of a proposed amendment to the Farm Improvement Loans Act. This matter is dealt with in the House of Commons debates for 1968-69 at page 1047. I have the text of the ruling that you made at that time. I do not know whether you would like me to quote from it, but perhaps I should do so at this time.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

The question before the House is an appeal to Mr. Speaker from a decision given by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole pursuant to section 4 of standing order 59.

In the committee of the whole on Bill No. C-111 the hon. member for Crowfoot proposed an amendment to Clause 1 of the bill as follows:

"To add after the word 'society', line 12, and before the word 'that' in line 13 the words 'and other financial institutions' ".

The question is to determine whether the proposed words of the amendment go beyond the terms of the resolution. My view is that if the words proposed by the hon. member for Crowfoot by way of amendment do not enlarge the words "financial institutions" using in clause 1 of this bill, then the amendment is redundant and superfluous. If they seek to enlarge the terms of these words, then we have to determine whether the amendment is consistent with the detailed provisions of the resolution preceding the bill. In my view, when a resolution preceding a money bill sets out in detail the terms of the bill, as this one does, we have to be very cautious about amendments which might enlarge upon these terms.

Then, Your Honour referred hon. members to citation 246 in the fourth edition of Beauchesne at page 207 sub-paragraph (3) which I will not take the time to read at this moment. You concluded by saying:

I suggest to hon. members, with respect, that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Crowfoot does affect the conditions and qualifications set out in detail in the resolution approved by the House and preceding the bill.

For this reason I feel I have to sustain the decision of the learned and wise chairman of the committee of the whole.

Therefore, I submit that this amendment is not in order.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I disagree with about nine-tenths of what the hon. minister has said, because I think the terms of the amending resolution do not contravene the regulations of this House. However, I do not feel for one moment there would be an increase in the liability of the Crown since equivalent amounts are fixed by the terms of the recommendation, whether or not one more institution shares in it.

Since the terminology of the recommendation does not include treasury branches, I agree that an exact interpretation would exclude the amendment. I am in agreement that it does. In saying so, I must commend the initiative of my colleague for moving this amendment because I think it indicates a lamentable gap in the thinking of the officials of the Department of Finance. Apparently, because there are no treasury branches in or around Ottawa, there cannot be any in the country.

There are treasury branches in the province of Alberta which look after the public's finances. Perhaps there are none in Ontario or the Province of Quebec. We admit that in these provinces there are trust companies, credit unions and caisses populaires. In Alberta, there is an extensive commercial banking business conducted by treasury branches. This measure needlessly excludes them and their customers from the provisions of the Small Businesses Loans Act. I think the action of the department in this connection is lamentable. Surely, the minister understands what I mean when I say this, as I have spoken to him about it before. I had hoped he might find a method whereby this situation could be corrected.

On the point of order, I agree that the amendment is out of order, but in saying so I want to make it clear that I do not detract for one moment from the motivations of my colleague, the hon. member for Battle River. I suggest this is another expression of discontent by those people who feel they should get consideration, but people in comfortable pews sometimes snore.

Small Businesses Loans Act

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: What we have before the House at the moment is a point of order. I trust any discussion we have at this time would not be on the substance of the interesting amendment proposed by the hon. member for Battle River, but rather would be on the procedural aspect of the matter. Having said that, I shall recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I must admit the argument against the procedural admissibility of this amendment is pretty weighty and very difficult to answer. However, as the hon. member for Edmonton West has pointed out, no increase in the total amount of money is involved so far as the amendment is concerned. But it does seem we are stuck with the citations and previous rulings which say we must remain within the terms of the resolution. I suppose therefore, heeding your admonition of a moment ago, and since I find it difficult to argue the other way, there is little I can say. However, like the hon. member for Edmonton West, I think it is too bad there is this discrimination against the treasury branches in the province of Alberta.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Speaker, I believe I find myself unable to compete with hon. gentlemen such as the hon. member for Edmonton West and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in respect of a point of order and knowledge of the rules of the House. I do recall, however, when the farm improvement loans bill was being discussed in the House last year, many precedents were cited in respect of guarantees. Arguments were put forward at that time that there was no necessity for the federal government to provide a guarantee when the province was providing the guarantee. That is, Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada would not or could not have the privilege of overriding the guarantee of Her Majesty in right of a province. In this regard, I should like to refer to the Statutes of Canada 1962-63 in respect of the setting up of the Expo Corporation. I shall quote from the Act to establish the Canadian World Exhibition, Section 12(3). It reads as follows:

> The Governor in Council may authorize the Minister of Finance, on behalf on Her Majesty, to enter into a joint guarantee by Her Majesty and Her Majesty in right of the Province of Quebec guaranteeing payment of the principal amount of any note, bond or debenture issued by the Corporation under the authority of subsection (1) and of the interest thereon, which guarantee shall be in such form and subject to such terms and conditions as may be approved by the Governor in Council and the Lieutenant Governor in Council.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

It is clear that there are precedents for this type of guarantee. Although it is not clearly spelled out in the recommendation of His Excellency the Governor General of Bill C-9 that this type of arrangement may be entered into when we look at the amount of defaults there have been in the past under small business loan and Farm Improvement loan legislation, I believe it is obvious to all of us that, for all practical purposes, there will be no additional financial commitment or guarantee forced upon the federal treasury. I would ask for the consideration of the minister in this regard. At a time when the people in the west feel they are being discriminated against I think this is very important. In light of the precedent in respect of the Expo Corporation, I would ask for the minister's consideration.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I trust the hon. member for Regina East wishes to speak to the point of order. I might say I am in a position to reach a decision on the point of order raised by the minister, which has already been commented upon by three learned and hon. members of the House. I would hope the hon. member for Regina East would limit his contribution to the procedural aspect of the point now before the Chair.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, may I say that I cannot add to what has been said by the hon. member for Edmonton West and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. However, I might ask, in view of the disposition expressed in some parts of the House, whether the minister might consider taking the necessary steps to bring in a resolution that would enable this matter to be considered by the House in the event Your Honour should decide the amendment is not admissible.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has made a suggestion which the minister may wish to consider after the ruling has been made. As hon. members might surmise, it would be very difficult for the Chair to rule otherwise than that the amendment unfortunately cannot be put to the House. As has been correctly mentioned by the minister, and as pointed out by hon. members who have taken part in this debate, the proposed amendment would appear to go beyond the terms of the Governor General's recommendation.

I might take the liberty to bring to the attention of the House citation 246 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition which, in part, reads as follows:

> The guiding principle in determining the effect of an amendment upon the financial initiative of the Crown is that the communication, to which the royal demand of recommendation is attached, must be treated as laying down once for all (unless withdrawn and replaced) not only the amount of a charge, but also its objects, purposes, conditions and qualifications.

Because of this, it is a long established practice that the type of amendment proposed by the hon. member cannot be put to the House. I regret very much that I must reach this conclusion, particularly due to the fact that there appears to be so much sympathy on both sides of the House for the intent of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Downey). However, because of the precedents and particularly the ruling I made myself after considerable thought just two years ago when this very point was brought up and considered by the Chair, with regret I rule that the hon. member's proposed amendment may not be considered by the House at this moment.

I must add that in respect of the second amendment proposed by the hon. member for Battle River, being consequential and related directly to the one just ruled out of order, the same conclusion would have to be reached. Therefore, of course, the second amendment could not be put to the House at this time.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister without Portfolio) moved that Bill C-9, to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Gray moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): May I ask the minister whether he is prepared to give consideration to the proposal placed before him with respect to the subject matter of an amendment that was proposed by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Downey) and which was ruled out of order. Is the minister prepared to consider taking the necessary steps to enable this change to be made in the bill so that the treasury branches of the province of Alberta could be included within the scope of this legislation?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to rise and put myself in the position of closing the debate if there are other members who wish to take part in the debate on third reading.

Mr. Speaker: Of course, if the minister speaks now, even if he does not close the debate, he can speak only once on a motion. He can choose whether he wants to speak now or wait until other contributions have been made.

Mr. Downey: It is a disappointment to me that the amendment I proposed was ruled out of order, but I hope the minister will take the necessary steps to ensure that a correction is made so that the provincial treasury branches can enjoy equal status with the other financial institutions which operate in the province and in the rest of the country.

I will be brief in my remarks at this stage since I spoke on this bill earlier. May I say, with regard to the treasury branch situation—and here I also wish to include farm improvement loans—that I think we have to consider financial agencies in the light of their usefulness and of their total participation in the field of finance. Certainly, the profits that accrue from institutions such as provincial treasury branches go back into the provincial revenue, and in this way part of the load is taken off the public purse, which I think is most important in view of the country's present economic situation.

Much of the profit of our other banking institutions eventually finds its way outside the country. I am not debating the merits or otherwise of this situation, but I do say that it would be a gross discrimination and contrary to the public interest for the federal government not to extend the same privileges to provincial treasury branches as they do to private financial institutions especially when, as I said earlier, we have clear precedents for this type of guarantee.

There is one other important addition which could have been made to this bill and that is the inclusion of inventory and accounts receivable so that loans could be made on this basis as well as for business expansion. In a depressed business cycle such as we are experiencing now in this country, it is of little value in the majority of cases to indicate that the government will advance loans for business expansion when often this is not necessary. What these businesses need is financing to sustain them and keep them viable. Loans could and should be made on the basis of accounts receivable and for stock in trade.

There is just one other point which I should like to make which relates to the performance of the treasury branches. In looking at borrowings under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, I notice that between 1967 and 1968 there has been a considerable drop in the number of loans made by chartered banks under this act. Certainly, there has been a need for funds in this area but I think there has probably been a reluctance on the part of these agencies to lend at the lower interest rates. I have figures for three of our main banks and I note that in 1967 loans for farm improvement from the three banks amounted to $52.4 million, $42.3 million and $70.1 million, while in 1968, a year later, the amount lent under the Farm Improvement Loans Act was $7.5 million, $4 million and $11 million, which is a dramatic reduction. I do not have as complete a breakdown for the treasury branches, but it seems that their loans in this area have been at least consistent and have even increased somewhat. Loans for agricultural and personal purposes in the same period of time increased by some $12 million, so I believe that this is quite an argument in support of the concern of treasury branches for the financial needs of the people.

I will not pursue this any further today, but will conclude by again encouraging the minister to consider these treasury branches.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): The great socialist from Windsor West has introduced this bill which, in effect, will provide government assistance to private lending institutions. I should like to go on record as saying that I favour this proposal. The great socialist from Battle River wants the federal government to underwrite the provincial government's lending institution, and I must say I think it is a good idea. I cannot see anything wrong with this proposal, either.

This type of loan has been used more widely in western Canada than in some other areas. I think this indicates perhaps that there is a greater financial need there than in some other areas of the country. However, I am quite concerned at the moment that loan companies which will come under the bill might not have money to lend at the present interest rates, particularly in view of the awkward financial situation in which agriculture in western Canada finds itself. In addition, the government's policy of restraint on agriculture makes farmers wonder if it is wise to borrow money under such a bill. If you are a banker or responsible individual in a lending institution and if you have the money available, you would be wise to lend it to such a borrower.

There are matters related to this bill. Now law stands by itself. It stands in relation to the rest of the community or institutions. If we are not going to have an effective Small Businesses Loans Act, we might as well not have one.

I invite the minister to consider some other aspects of the lending community, the business community and the position of these people generally. We know that some banks have a much more aggressive lending policy, at least they lend a great deal more money than some others. It is not always the policy of the government or the provisions of an act that govern the situation, but it is the policy of the banks. Possibly the minister should do a little more advertising or apply a little pressure to ensure that these lending institutions consider this act seriously. I assume the minister expects small businesses to borrow money.

There are two other points I want to make in relation to this bill. With the white paper, on taxation before the country, the tax situation is such that small businesses are uncertain whether or not they should borrow money. What are the tax changes going to do to them? If I were a banker or credit manager of a financial institution and were approached by a small business for a loan, I would certainly consider what effect the new tax rate would have on this businessman before I would make the loan. The white paper has caused a pall of uncertainty over some sections of the business community.

I suggest the minister should get on with the job and decide what is to be done, so that the small business people will know where they are. I do not think it is right that the government should be responsible for putting a person in a position of wondering whether he should or should not borrow money. The role of the government should be to help individuals to assess their business situation.

Another point I wish to comment on is the inflation which we have in this country, and the plans of the government for curing inflation. I will not go into the plans here, but I suggest they have some relationship to the bill because individuals and lending institutions must consider what inflation might do to some businesses and also be concerned with what government action to cure inflation might do to particular businesses. Again, there is a pall of uncertainty. Perhaps in his reply the minister might deal with these items and give us some assurance that these matters will be considered.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I do not know if my voice will last long enough to put on the record the observations I wish to make. I would have liked my vocal condition to have been better so that I would have been able to speak longer and express some feelings about this particular amendment and about the act generally.

I notice there are three points in Bill No. C-9. One is to extend the term of the legislation; two, to set loan limits and, three, to increase the guarantee to lending institutions which will mean that small institutions will be able to get involved in lending to small businesses without the same risk they previously had to face. In this respect, this amendment to Bill C-9 is encouraging and, of course, has my support.

I agree with one point raised by the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson), and I wish to offer evidence in support of that particular argument. I ask Your Honour's permission to digress from consideration of this bill for a moment. Several pieces of legislation similar to Bill C-9 have been passed. One of these is the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. I will use this example in order to make a point respecting people who wish to obtain loans under these acts.

Since the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act was passed last year, I think there have been only two loans made in my Province under this act. I am sure every member from Atlantic Canada, and possibly members from the west coast, have received correspondence from people who have gone to the banks, made their representations, put up the necessary to guarantee, which under that legislation is 25 per cent of the total loan, and made out an application—if they could get one. I am informed that frequently bank managers say they do not have any application forms. On occasion when these people fill out an application, that is the last they hear of it. I received a letter from a person who had made an application for a loan in November. To date, he has not received any response. He is interested in investing $20,000 in a piece of fishing equipment, a long-liner. The fishing season is approaching and because this person has not received any response, he does not know what his position is. The seller of the boat is waiting to complete the sale, but this man must just sit and wait. There has been correspondence with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) and numerous other people in the government departments responsible. We cannot get any fire under the bottoms of the people who are supposed to make these loans, yet the government sits back feeling quite happy that this legislation is on the books.

Legislation, not used, is useless. For example, legislation was passed by a provincial government making it illegal to change a fuse in your house. This was when houses had the old fuse boxes. It is illegal to change a fuse unless you are a qualified electrician. This is a stupid law because it is impossible to enforce. Who would know whether you changed a fuse? This bill is similar. It is not effective.

I mentioned the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act to show that the banks are not co-operating with the government. I suspect this is because the demand for capital is so high they can be very selective when lending money. On the basis of low risk lending, they should lend to fishermen because they have the best record in Canada for repaying loans. This is a fact, not an assumption. However, these loans are made not on the ability of the person to repay the loan, but on the basis of the interest the institution can get by making this loan.

Under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, the Small Businesses Loans Act and other similar pieces of legislation, the interest rate is relatively low. Certainly it is not low, but relatively low. It is roughly 8 per cent. The banks are not interested in lending money at this rate. The minister might be able to contradict me and say, look at all the money we have been lending.

I have already referred to the fisheries legislation. I participated in the debate on that bill for many weeks in this House and in committee. It was finally passed. I thought it might have been effective. If the record is checked, I am sure it will show that I voted in favour of this legislation. Having now had over a year's experience with that piece of legislation, which has similar components to the legislation now under discussion, I have grave doubts about its effectiveness. It has been a real headache to those I have been in contact with, including the Minister of Fisheries and members of Parliament. The banks are using many excuses why they are not making this money available to these people under this legislation.

Let me be more specific about the Small Businesses Loans Act. For the record, a report by the Minister of Finance dated December 9, 1969, indicates the number of loans made during the last half of 1969. I want the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gray) to listen carefully to what I am saying. When I have finished, I am sure he is going to say "I have listened to the hon. member; I will investigate that and make a report". I am going to ask the minister to do just this, unlike other occasions when the same promise was made but no action taken. This is a crucial point.

If I may be parochial for a moment, I should like to refer to how crucial this kind of legislation can be to a province like Newfoundland. For example, during the last half of last year there was a grand total of 1,146 loans made totalling $12,732,698 and in the last quarter there were 377 loans totalling over $4 million. But in Newfoundland, in the last quarter there was only one loan made for $15,000 and only three loans made in the whole year. This statement of the minister covering loans made under the Small Businesses Loans Act for the period July to September shows 225 loans in British Columbia totalling $2,323,621; Alberta, 138 loans for $1,345,372; Saskatchewan, 74 loans, Manitoba 57, Ontario 349, and Quebec 243. New Brunswick had 18 loans and Newfoundland 2 loans. In other words, we can just forget about it.

The act is not working. What is the problem? That is the question I want to pose to the Minister without Portfolio. We have small businessmen eager to expand and no doubt if he checks he will find that there have been quite a number of applications. Under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act about 15 or 20 people have written to me inquiring how to get a loan. They have reported that when they have followed the indicated procedure they still could not get loans. There are 4,000 fishermen in my riding, but I doubt if one loan has been made under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. It is something of a farce, Mr. Speaker, for us to put emphasis on legislation of this kind if people are not taking advantage of it.

[Mr. Lundrigan.]

On Small Business, again, I realize we do not have the same number of small businesses as other provinces, certainly not like Ontario with 349 loans last year. But when you consider that Newfoundland only had two loans last year and three for the same period the previous year, there is something wrong. I should like the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) to indicate what the problem is and any solutions he has for it.

The Fisheries Improvement Loans Act has been amended and brought up to date, but the banks are not lending the money. Is there not something to be done here? Can the government not take action to ensure that people meeting the requirements of the Fisheries and Small Businesses acts can take advantage of the legislation to raise the necessary capital? As far as I am concerned this is discrimination and the Minister of Finance has a responsibility here. Some months ago, I asked whether he would take remedial action against this sort of discrimination and whether his attitude toward easing of credit in slow growth areas was the same as that of the Governor of the Bank of Canada. I suspect it isn't, and the banks have been given directives not to lend money to these people because the security is not good or else the bank managers are not aware of this legislation.

There is a form of discrimination, Mr. Speaker, and this has to be rectified because there is a greater need for the liberal application of this legislation in the slow growth areas than in boom areas. In places like Newfoundland, the average small businessman or fisherman has no place but the bank to negotiate a loan. In Ottawa, Montreal or Toronto there are other sources, though applicants may have to pay through the nose. Perhaps this amendment specifically relating to the guarantee might ease the situation a little bit.

I would like to ask the Minister without Portfolio—I hope he is listening to me—if he will initiate an investigation to determine why Newfoundlanders cannot get loans under the legislation, specifically the Farm Improvement loans—they got one last year—the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act—one or two loans have been made in the province—and the Small Business Loans Act, under which a total of three loans were made last year and two the year before.

If the legislation is not applied equally or if the banks are discriminating, then the government has the responsibility to take remedial action. If the Minister of Finance is correct in saying that the Governor of the Bank of Canada shares his view that there is to be a liberalization of restraints in slow growth areas, certainly we are entitled to better treatment than we have been getting.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, the bill to amend the Small Business Loans Act is a very important piece of legislation requiring the full attention of members of this House. I think that small business across Canada is facing very serious problems and, indeed, in many cases is faced with the problem of whether it will be able to survive over the next period of years. This has come about, Mr. Speaker, in large part because of the increasing concentration of economic power within Canada. Thus, many small businesses find it difficult to compete with large corporations, large monopolies or even conglomerates, not only because of problems of competing in price but also because of problems in commanding adequate amounts of the resources necessary to enable small businesses to take advantage of the technological advances which would enable them to give their customers the type of service and product which is required.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, small business faces very many serious problems. Some of these problems have been discussed in this debate, and I concur with the suggestion that some of the aspects of this legislation and its administration, aspects which have been drawn to the attention of the government, require full consideration if, in fact, small business is to survive.

Reference has already been made, as a result of an amendment which was ruled out of order by Your Honour, to the position of the treasury branches in the province of Alberta. Of course, at this stage I cannot discuss the amendment that was originally moved and subsequently ruled out of order, but I wish to discuss this subject matter within the framework of clause 1 of the bill as it has been reported back by the committee without amendment. The amendment that has been moved with respect to paragraph (a) of section 2 pertains to the definition of "bank" and would include banks within the meaning of the Bank Act. It would also permit credit unions, caisses populaire, cooperative credit societies, insurance companies, trust companies and loan companies, if designated by the minister, to become lenders under the Small Businesses Loans Act. It seems to me that the principle involved in this amendment is perfectly sound, namely, that those institutions which people may wish to use to take advantage of this legislation to carry on their business affairs should be empowered to make loans under this act. It seems to me that that principle is perfectly sound. It is the principle that is intended in this amendment.

However, it is perfectly obvious that one particular group of businesses, namely the treasury branches of the province of Alberta, have been overlooked or not included in the amendment placed before the House in this clause. I am quite willing to give the government the benefit of the doubt and say that this was an unintentional oversight; but it seems to me that consideration should be given to including this group of institutions within this act. After all, Mr. Speaker, there are many people within the province of Alberta who conduct their financial affairs at the treasury branches of that province. They are the places of business for the carrying on of peoples' financial business in many Alberta communities, and many of the people of Alberta use them. Thus it seems to me that if the principle involved in this section is to be applied generally, the minister should seriously consider taking the necessary steps to ensure that the branches are included within this legislation. Thus, I would urge him to take the necessary steps to ensure that the treasury branches of the province of Alberta which perform a very useful function for the people of the province are included in this legislation.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, may I speak briefly on Bill C-9? I support the comments of my colleague, the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton), and urge the government and the minister to include within the legislation the treasury branches of the province of Alberta because they perform very useful work and to exclude them from the provisions of this bill would be, in my opinion, discriminatory. Surely, there can be no objection to including the treasury branches, because they have served a wonderful purpose in the province. I am sure the treasury branches of that province wish to be included in any privileges that are granted to other lending institutions.

An hon. member who spoke some time ago said that lending institutions discriminate between central Canada and the rest of the country. I am absolutely certain that the amount of money put back into any area, say, in Saskatchewan, by lending institutions in the forms of loans is not nearly as great as it ought to be. Many people who are desirous of obtaining loans from lending institutions in certain parts of the country find it difficult to do so. We ought to require lending institutions to return or make available to any part of the country, amounts of money that have been taken out of that part of the country. They should make available to those people seeking loans the funds they require. It seems that people living west of Winnipeg, right through to British Columbia, have much more difficulty obtaining loans than do people in central Canada, who apparently have no difficulty at all.

Apparently there is no limit to how much money a person in central Canada can obtain for housing purposes, the building of apartment blocks and ancillary projects. This is because our lending institutions seem to follow a policy of making money available for people in central Canada. We ought to make certain that the money of lending institutions is made available to the people living in the extreme eastern and western parts of the country as well as those in central Canada. I also think that lending institutions ought to be obligated to disclose from what part of the country their income is derived. At the same time regulations ought to be drawn up to make sure that our lending institutions provide prescribed amounts of money to municipalities and other like bodies that need capital.

We should make certain that people living in parts other than central Canada obtain the necessary services of our lending institutions. If the treasury branches of the province of Alberta were included within the provisions of the legislation, they would fill a great need. Unless the treasury branches are included in the legislation, the people of Alberta may not obtain the relief they desire.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I should like to respond to some of the comments which have been made by hon. members. The hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson) expressed some concern that institutions that now are being authorized to make small business loans under the provisions of this act may not have money available to make such loans. May I remind him and all hon. members of the House that we sent to the finance committee last week bills to amend the Trust Companies Act, Loan Companies Act and the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. One of the purposes of those amendments is to enable the institutions covered by these pieces of legislation to attract more deposits and, hopefully, to be in a better position to make loans of the types which are authorized under the amendments in this bill and under other statutes regulating their operations. I hope hon. members will keep the comments of the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley in mind when they decide on the pace of the consideration to be given to the bills which have been referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs for study.

Further, I should like to indicate that one purpose of these amendments is to provide a climate which will encourage the financial institutions covered by the act to make loans under it.

The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) made a number of useful comments, as did other hon. members. I want to state for the record, if for nothing else, that, as he surmised I was indeed, making some notes while he was speaking so as to be in a better position to comment later on what he was saying—I always like to follow carefully what the hon. member has in mind. I should like to assure him I always do whatever I can to respond to his requests. I was concerned when he suggested he had asked me to look into something and that I had not responded. The only incident I can recall is his request that I look into the regional impact of the tax recently enacted in connection with airline tickets. As I pointed out in the course of the debate on that subject, this is a complicated matter and in these circumstances I thought he would not expect an immediate response. However, had he kept in touch with me I would have told him something to confirm that I had begun working on this request.

I believe it is useful when replying to the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate and others who have spoken in this debate to call to mind that loans under this legislation are made by the banks and other financial institutions involved, not the government. The money for the loans comes from the banks, not from the government. This act authorizes the government to say to the financial institutions which are covered: If you are willing to make loans on certain terms and conditions for certain purposes we will guarantee you against loss. It is, therefore, ultimately a matter for decision by the lending institutions themselves whether they make loans under the terms of the act, or the two companion acts to which the hon. member referred. These acts do not give the government authority to order the lending institutions to make the loans contemplated by them.

As I pointed out earlier in the debate, one of the major purposes of the amendments before us is to extend the lending period under the legislation so that small business loans can continue to be made. The proposal is that the lending period be extended for a further 18 months to June 30, 1971 rather than for a three year period as has been the case in the past. This would bring the lending periods contemplated in all three acts into line as far as terminal dates are concerned.

This will enable the government to carry out a review of these three programs concurrently. Such a review would permit the government to examine the entire scope of the operation, the results of the program, and the question as to whether any changes ought to be made. This review will be carried out in a way which will enable us to look at one program in the light of the experience with the others in so far as this would seem relevant. I believe that many of the suggestions made by hon. members during this stage of the debate and previously are suggestions which ought to be considered in the course of this review. For example, the point raised by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Downey) and others with respect to including the Alberta treasury branches under the terms of the Small Businesses Loans Act is one which might be considered at that time. We should remember that the original objective of this legislation, together with its companion measures, was to facilitate by means of government guarantees a flow of credit for certain purposes by financial institutions to small business and certain other categories of enterprise. To include agencies such as the Alberta treasury branches as eligible to receive the federal government guarantee under this law and the two companion laws would raise a very broad question as to the eligibility of lending agencies of provincial governments, and, perhaps, in some cases, even of municipal governments. This, as I say, is a broad question which would extend beyond the matter of Alberta treasury branches, which, as hon. members have said, are playing a significant part in the financial life of the province of Alberta, and I think hon. members will agree we should want to give such a suggestion serious consideration. A good opportunity for carrying out such an examination would certainly be during the course of the review to which I have referred.

I also wish to say that while the terms of this legislation and the companion legislation do not authorize the government to order the financial institutions in question to make the type of loans contemplated, the guarantee loans administration of the Department of Finance is willing to investigate complaints of the type raised by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate. If he, and other members of the House would like to bring to my personal attention complaints which have been brought to their notice by those who have sought loans under these acts I would be happy to have those complaints looked into and have reports made on them as soon as possible.

Let me in conclusion point out, as I did on another occasion when this subject was before the House, that though lending under the small businesses loans program never approached the volume reached under the Farm Improvement Loans Act it has, nevertheless, been a useful source of term financing for Canadian business. Since its inception some 20,000 small businesses have obtained financing amounting to almost $190 million under this program and the proposals in Bill C-9 will help ensure that credit facilities of this kind continue to be available to assist small businessmen in Canada through arrangements encouraged by the federal government.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADA STUDENT LOANS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITION OF "BANKS", QUALIFYING STUDENTS, ETC.

Hon. Herb Gray (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-135, to amend the Canada Student Loans Act as reported (with out amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Gray moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): I have a few comments to make at this stage, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the legislation before us. It is an interesting piece of legislation. I do not know how widely this interest extends, since there do not appear to be many other speakers. Nevertheless, it is interesting to me.

This bill will broaden the sources of lending by the inclusion of trust and loan companies. Scholastic standards originally defined in the legislation now appear in another section and are left more or less to the provinces in terms of eligibility for loans. I notice, too, that a little hypocrisy has been removed from the bill. Landed immigrants no longer have to pledge that they plan to stay in Canada permanently before being accepted for a student loan. I think it would have been a simple matter for anyone to have got around this provision if they did not wish to be completely frank when making a declaration of this kind.

I notice there is now a provision in the bill fixing a semester maximum of $500 in connection with a student loan. This is perhaps in recognition of the fact that various post-secondary institutions in Canada are now embarking on newer kinds of school sessions. This may be all to the good. I am pleased that this legislation has recognized this fact. I am sorry that the student loans are continuing to be limited to full-time students. I submit it might be well worth while broadening this kind of assistance to include those who, for one reason or another, cannot attend an institution full-time but are nevertheless interested in upgrading their education during such time as they do have available. In this respect, I think Canada has been particularly remiss. We have failed to provide enough opportunities for people to gain extra education at times other than the normal dayschool time.

• (4:20 p.m.)

I think the trend today is changing. How often do we hear it said of a famous man, perhaps not so much in this country as in others, that he was originally a ditch digger who got his law degree at night school? I suggest that it would be useful indeed to broaden this legislation in this regard, and this is why I am a little critical of the provision of the bill that restricts the legislation to full-time students only. The basic loan provided under the legislation is increased to $115 million. It is to be applied on a sliding scale formula, and I should like to comment on this feature later.

The student loans legislation has been very popular if its popularity can be judged by the number of people who have taken advantage of it. I have before me a press release by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) dated September 12, 1969 and I should like to quote the first paragraph. The press release is entitled "Canada Student Loans Plan" and reads:

> The Honourable E. J. Benson, Minister of Finance, announced today that loans totalling $65,767,496 to 107,145 students were authorized under the Canada Student Loans Plan during the period of July 1, 1968 to June 30, 1969. In the previous year—

That is the year 1967-68.

> —loans totalling $57,053,410 to 90,371 students were authorized.

This indicates two things to me. One is that I think people are showing a great and increasing interest in education. Secondly, I think it also indicates something that perhaps most members, are not quite so ready to talk about in this Parliament—I am, but there are some members who are reluctant—namely that if more students are required to borrow money to finance their education, it is because there are fewer opportunities for them to earn money by summer employment. I suggest it also indicates an economic down-turn which limits the opportunities for those students who have financed themselves in the past but cannot equally well do so today.

I suggest this is a matter into which we should look, because not only does it indicate an increasing interest on the part of young people to educate themselves, but it also indicates, or to be fair perhaps I should say it may indicate, a down-turn in the economy. As a result, in order to get their education they have to go into hock by taking a loan to be repaid over a period of nine and a half years at varying rates of interest. I do not know how the rest of the members of the House feel about this but I think this practice may well impose an extreme burden upon them. Certainly, the nine and a half years following my graduation from university were the most economically deprived of my life.

Mr. Jamieson: What about the present?

Mr. Rose: I appreciate the minister's interjection, but I have no desire at this particular point to get into the question of a pay increase for M.P.'s.

Further on in the minister's press release there is this paragraph:

> Since the inception of the Plan in 1964 to June 30, 1969 the nine participating provinces and two territories have issued approximately 378,000 certificates of eligibility amounting to $226.7 million.

That is a substantial amount of money and shows that a substantial number of students have been assisted by this loan provision. But this is far in excess of the 10,000 student scholarships—I underline the word "scholarships"—that were part of a campaign pledge made by former Prime Minister, Lester B. Pearson.

But, Mr. Speaker, student loans are really but a half-way house, when you really get down to examining their rationale. Although they are necessary under our present system, they are definitely a crutch. Up to 80 per cent of the cost of secondary education today is paid by the government, either federal or provincial.

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen) made a statement to the House today on the efforts being made to increase employment opportunities for summer students. I think that since industry, the public and our institutions all benefit from education, not forgetting the benefit received by the students themselves, it would seem to me that it would only be logical to raise the other 20 per cent of the cost of education. We might then arrive at the point where those students who require summer employment in order to finance their education would not at the same time be competing against heads of families who are often marginally employed, in some cases putting them out of work, and this in spite of the fact that there is usually a seasonal upswing in summer employment opportunities. I think we should examine tuition costs from this point of view. I am not sure that this House, however, is the right place to look at the matter in view of the limits of federal jurisdiction in educational matters. Nevertheless, I feel the subject is worthy of mention.

Before I resume my seat, I should like to comment on the sliding scale that is being proposed in the legislation. This scale is based not on the number of young people in Canada between the ages of 18 and 24 but, instead, on the number of students presently enrolled in post-secondrary education who are between the ages of 18 and 24. The formula is based on what the condition is rather than on what the condition should be. The formula ignores the fact that in this age group of 18 to 24, 50 per cent of our students may have never completed high school. These people should be encouraged to complete their education assured that they will find a place in higher education. These dropouts are indicative of a waste of talent and an inefficient use of human resources. Their talents should be developed to contribute to the development of this country.

I would also suggest to the House that one of the difficulties encountered in the provision of secondary education is that education is often not accessible to students with merit or scholastic ability but instead is provided only to those by affluent parents and to those students who live reasonably close to a university. I believe we should look more and more to the time when students attend university on the basis of ability, not on the basis of how much money their parents have. If necessary, the students should receive travel assistance. Today our university students represent a relatively small and affluent section of the population. We must do much more to see that university education is spread uniformly and fairly through the total population. Intelligence is not confined to any single economic class.

That is the main emphasis I put on the remarks I made this afternoon. I feel the legislation is perhaps of assistance to many students. There will be an increasing number of students who wish to take advantage of this measure. They will not only wish to do so but will be forced to because there are no other alternative provisions to adequately fulfil the demands and needs of young Canadians for post secondary education.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I bow to John.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I had a little difficulty determining who was on his feet first. Does the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate wish to speak?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have much pleasure in yielding to my hon. friend.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I hardly know how to interpret that remark, but I will take my chances and accept it graciously. I intend only to take a few minutes.

I am interested in seeing how the government continues to be involved in education, even though it is in its efforts coming in through the back door. Let me preface my remarks by saying I speak now on the basis of my opinion. Perhaps one of the reasons I was elected at the federal level was that I felt the government of Canada should assume much more responsibility for the development of human resources than it has done in the last 100 years.

It is a fact, documented by economists and others who are not professional educators, that there is a great statistical correlation between government investment in the field of education and higher economic benefits. In other words, a country that is capable of investing in the field of education as a matter of fact enjoys greater resources in the economic field. Some people who are not in favour of investing more in the field of higher education argue that it is the economic situation which creates this investment rather than that education itself creates the investment. I hope I am not confusing the minister or the Minister without Portfolio in this regard.

An hon. Member: You are doing very well.

Mr. Lundrigan: Let me commend the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) for his remarks. I know of his educational background and I suggest that hon. members should listen carefully to some of his recommendations.

It has been suggested that there are few opportunities today for Canadian students. Again, a main reason for the increase in the number of student loans is the fact that a great many more people are desirous of obtaining a university education. This is a favourable situation. My main aim, however, is to lend my support to the suggestion made by the capable chairman of our caucus committee, and other members, regarding the restriction being placed on students eligible for loans, in that they must be full-time students.

The Government of Canada has recognized that the provinces have to be given more flexibility in the determination of who should receive a loan. Under clause 10, the provinces are given the authority to determine the scholastic standing, the academic achievement, the need and the amount of money up to $1,000 in respect of students. I suggest that this government should also permit the provinces to determine what constitutes a student rather than limiting this definition by the words "a full-time student", who must be in attendance during not less than one semester. This limitation is to be found in clause 1, subclause (3), paragraph (i). I am not a lawyer but I think that is the part. I cannot understand the need for this restriction or inflexibility.

[Mr. Lundrigan.]

First of all, the use of the word "semester" in a chancy thing because there are about 25 different definitions in various universities across the country. But on the main point, why should the student be a "full-time student"? In many areas, where salaries are low, teachers are without full qualifications and receive small wages, these people must obtain their education by attending evening classes or summer schools. They are not able to enrol as full-time students at universities.

Many thousands of teachers across Canada are not able to attend universities full time because they are married and have families which they must support. Perhaps they got their education some 20 years ago. They cannot now afford to attend university full-time in order to obtain a degreee and that expertise of many hon. members of this House, or others who consider themselves experts. They are not experts. They are just ordinary "Joes" who have only a few years of university education. They are qualified to teach under provincial statutes. Many of them have given up the teaching profession because they are not qualified to demand the higher salaries. And now they are not entitled to these student loans, although in my opinion they are professionals. These people should be permitted to obtain the maximum loan at the reduced rate of interest. They are, in many instances, more eligible than some of the greenhorns and rookies who are going to universities but cannot now qualify as teachers. Many of this latter group are likely to be dropouts.

The people who enrol in summer schools and evening courses are usually those who cannot afford to take full time programs at universities. They are unable to return to university without the advantages offered under this measure. I know of many people who have been financed from the pockets of their friends in order that they could return to school. Many of them have large families. These are the people who should be given the benefit of this measure. Many others like them are not able to finance their educational requirements and as a result remain in lesser positions with low salaries. I suggest they are being discriminated against as a result of the restriction in this measure, consequently they cannot upgrade their positions.

It is extremely vital that we do everything possible to assure these individuals an opportunity to increase their education. This point was raised during the committee hearings. I was not a member of that committee, but I have been told that this matter was a subject of discussion. I hope the government gives consideration to the suggestion that we eliminate, through an amendment or by the application of this legislation, that restrictiveness inherent in the definition of a student.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am very very happy to follow the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) and I support the appeal he has just made. In fact, the appeal I wish to make is in the same vein, though I shall demonstrate it by reference to a particular case.

I realize that on third reading it is difficult to amend a bill which is going through the House. It is even more difficult to amend something that in fact is in the act itself. In this case it may be that no such amendment to the legislation is necessary. Indeed, perhaps what we should do is to make our point to the government with sufficient merit and weight that the government will change the regulations under the legislation. On November 25, 1969, Mr. Gordon MacDonell, Superintendent of Secondary Schools of Winnipeg, wrote the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) concerning this legislation, the Canada Student Loans Act. Mr. MacDonell's particular point related to the Winnipeg adult education centre. This is a very useful and valuable operation which has been going on for a few years. It happens to be located in my constituency. This is a centre to which adults can go when they realize they did not receive all the education they might have when attending school and wish to go back and perchance complete their matriculation or, in any case, receive supplementary education which would better fit them for life.

It would seem to me that the motives of such people deserve support and that when they require financial assistance that assistance should be forthcoming. Despite the appeal made in Mr. MacDonell's letter of November 25, to which I have referred, the Minister of Finance replied in the negative, although the letter is a page and a half long, on December 29, 1969. The argument used is that the legislation is for people who are in post-secondary institutions and that definitions have been worked out which do not include this kind of program, namely mature people, adults, who go back to complete what would amount to their high school education.

Like the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) and the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) who spoke a moment ago, if we are to assist people in obtaining an education—a proposition which surely all of us support—I believe here is a group of people who deserve not only our moral but also our financial support. I regret very much the government has not seen fit to meet the request presented to it by the Superintendent of Secondary Schools for the city of Winnipeg.

I may say parenthetically, and I confess I say it with a bit of pride, that some of these people who were anxious that this should be done under the Canada Student Loans plan made their request to the government of Manitoba and the very fine new government we now have in that province—

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dinsdale: That was not me.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The last government in Manitoba was a good one, too. This one just seems to be a little better.

Mr. Dinsdale: We all learn by experience.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The government of Manitoba, at least on a temporary basis, has made a provision the effect of which is that these people are obtaining loans. We applaud the Manitoba government for what it is doing. I am sure everyone will join in that applause. But I submit this ought to be done on a federal basis. The same principles which inspired this legislation should carry through all the way.

When I first took the floor, the reason I said it may not be necessary to amend this legislation is to be found in the fact that in the letter the Minister of Finance wrote to Mr. MacDonell on December 29 there is a paragraph concerning how these definitions were arrived at. It appears they were achieved by consultations among the provinces and that there really is no barrier in the legislation itself to the defining of an adult education centre as the kind of body that could qualify under this legislation. At least, there is no barrier if the provinces can agree. I am not even sure from the wording of the letter of the Minister of Finance that that agreement must come from all the provinces. Therefore, it would seem to me that this matter might be looked into again. That was my purpose in rising to support those who have made this kind of appeal.

I think education should be supported everywhere. It is one of those motherhood qualities in which we all believe. Surely, when a group of people realize they did not receive sufficient education when at school and have the sense and vision to want to go back and pick up their education, they are doing a service not only to themselves but to society and to Canada. I do not think they should be excluded from the governmental assistance that is available because of these technicalities in respect of an act or because the regulations drawn under that act have not been drawn with sufficient latitude. I am glad the Minister without Portfolio chose to make his speech on third reading later in the debate rather than early and I hope therefore he will have a good word for those of us who have made this appeal at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. The hon. minister cannot rise unless he has the unanimous consent of the House. Does the minister have the unanimous consent of the House to speak at this time?

An hon. Member: Agreed.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the unanimous consent of the House. It indicates the degree of interest there is in hearing me speak. It seems to me, however, that since I did not speak at the opening of the debate I would certainly have the right of reply. I just say this in the event that inadvertently a precedent might be set.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. I shall read from page 139 of Parliamentary Rules and Forms, 166(4):

> If a member who moves an order of the day should rise and say only a word or two,—for instance, "that he moves the order,"—he is precluded from again addressing the House;

Mr. Gray: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have the greatest respect and praise for the manner in which you have conducted yourself in the position of Acting Speaker and Chairman of the Committee of the Whole over the years. I just wanted to indicate that, so far as I was aware, I had not said anything in moving third reading. Perhaps I moved in your direction, but I do not recall making any remarks. All this is not, however, directly relevant to my rising to speak in response to some of the very interesting comments which have been made. I shall be very brief. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) appeared to suggest that provision for the setting of scholastic standards to determine eligibility for loans by the Federal government had been taken out of the Act and that they were being given to the provinces by the amendments. I may not have heard him correctly, but if this is what he said then I would submit there is some misconception here because the setting of scholastic standards for these loans through action of the federal government was never in the Act.

The hon. member might have been referring to an amendment which takes out of one clause some references to certificates of eligibility and puts them in another clause. I should place on the record the fact that, in effect, a bank is in a position to make a loan under the Canada Student Loans Act which would qualify for the government guarantee if a student presents to the bank a certificate issued by the appropriate authority for a province. The act says that the appropriate authority of the province may issue or cause to be issued a certificate to a qualifying student for an academic year whom that authority considers—and the section as amended here states:

> (a) to have attained a satisfactory scholastic standard, and
> (b) to be in need of a student loan
>
> (i) for the academic year in such amount, not exceeding one thousand dollars, or
>
> (ii) for the semester in such amount, not exceeding five hundred dollars,
> as the case may be, as is stated in the certificate in order to pursue a course of studies at a post-secondary school level as a full-time student at the educational institution specified therein.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Therefore, I submit that the decision as to eligibility continues, as it was before these amendments, to be one basically made by the provincial authority and is a matter of provincial responsibility.

Hon. members have made very interesting suggestions about enabling part time students to be covered under this act. An hon. member made an interesting suggestion about the definition of a post-secondary institution. If I am not mistaken, in addition to a consultation with the provinces, it could well be that it would be necessary to have some form of amendment to the act to achieve this because I note that subsection (k) of section 2 of the act specifies educational institution as an institution of learning, whether within or outside a province, that offers courses at a post-secondary school level and that is designated by the Lieutenant Governor in Council of that province.

The important thing to keep in mind in raising points for consideration by the government on this—and hon. members have made very useful points along the lines that were also raised in the earlier stages of the debate—is that the provincial ministers of education are carrying out a complete review of all student aid programs. I submit again, as I did in the earlier stages of the debate, that it would not be appropriate to make fundamental changes in the act until this review has been completed and the recommendations of the ministers of education in the provinces are available to the government. It could well be that the points mentioned at this stage of the debate and at earlier stages will be among those considered and there will be recommendations on them. I am sure that putting them on the record here will make it possible to bring them to the attention of the provincial ministers of education and, of course, the federal government to be available when the provincial ministers submit their recommendations to the federal government on completion of their review.

In conclusion I will say again, as other hon. members have already said, that the Canada student loans program has played a very constructive role during the past five and a half years in helping thousands of Canadian students to pursue post secondary studies. As the hon. member for Fraser Valley West pointed out, during the first loan year of 1964-65 some 42,000 students received loans valued at over $26 million, while in the loan year ending June 30, 1969, over 107,000 students obtained loans valued at almost $66 million. It is anticipated that the volume of loans could approach $90 million in the current loan year. So, the amendments before us are to help ensure that this program will operate even more effectively in the interests of students at the post secondary level and therefore, as I said on an earlier occasion, will be to the benefit not only of these students but of our entire country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY

NATIONAL MARKS AND STANDARDS

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C-137, respecting the use of national safety marks in relation to motor vehicles and to provide for safety standards for certain motor vehicles imported into or exported from Canada or sent or conveyed from one province to another, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in view of the hour I suggest that we adjourn the debate until eight o'clock, if that is agreeable to hon. members.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale)—Air Transport—Discontinuance of Western Manitoba service by Transair; the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg)—Penitentiaries—Guards pay increase—Offer by government; the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean)—Distinguished service awards—Reference of interdepartmental study to committee.

It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, private bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

ICG TRANSMISSION LIMITED

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River) moved that Bill S-17, to incorporate ICG Transmission Limited, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a third time, now?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

Mr. Reid moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I have been interested in reading the report of the Committee on Transport and Communications on this bill because of the legislation which we have been passing lately which has been giving to other boards the responsibility for much of the work that the House used to perform, and to a small extent still is performing, with regard to this type of bill. As hon. members know, this is a pipeline bill which raises a problem which occurs frequently in that the company is asking, not for a Canadian route, but for a route through the United States and therefore the establishment of a number of companies rather than of one operating on the Canadian scene. I have read the report and I think that it is interesting to note that, as pointed out by the company, two thirds of this route would pass through Canada and one third through the United States. The cost of it would be $4 million for the Canadian section and $2 million for the U.S. section. Why it is more expensive per mile in the United States than in Canada is difficult to understand. An hon. member who sits close by says that the reason for this is that the terrain there is rocky.

This leads me to the other argument made by the company when they were asked why the route did not go through Canada. The company pointed out that the alternate route would be from the Trans-Canada line through the edge of the Canadian shield and thus would be plagued by both water and rocks, which was not felt to be advantageous. This might not be the real reason for the route not crossing Canada, and this raises a problem which I wish to mention. The reason that the route is brought down through the United States is that this company intends to sell a considerable amount of gas in the United States. They have established a U.S. company to work in co-operation with the newly established Canadian company, both companies being held by Inter City Gas. The reason for this is that there is a lucrative market for gas in the United States and only a limited one in Canada. For this reason, I believe that the representative of the company would have been more accurate if he had stressed the fact that money would be derived from the route in the United States.

As we all know, there is a very limited market in that area. It is probable that the only reason the pipeline is coming back into Canada is to serve the new pulp and paper complex in the Fort Frances area. We are not opposed to this. In fact, we are pleased that this particular development is taking place and that gas can be brought in to make feasible the operation of that pulp and paper complex in the Fort Frances area.

I think one weakness of the committee discussion is the inability or lack of desire to find out the comparison in cost in terms of the service to Canada from this pipeline. I am not sure from reading the report what the distance would be as I do not know whether it is to be brought directly into the Fort Frances area from the Trans-Canada pipeline or brought from south of Winnipeg into the Fort Frances area. This is an important matter and obviously will have some relationship to the cost per cubic foot in terms of gas delivered to the Canadian pulp and paper complex at Fort Frances and the difference that will be created by the amount of gas sold in the United States from points along that pipe line. It is unlikely it will pass through a number of communities without some sales being made.

I have been pleased to note that in the main this is a Canadian operation, with a large percentage of the shares held by Canadians, approximately ten to one, and that it has been quite successful in selling gas in Minnesota and southern Manitoba. I have always been concerned with the choice of a route for either a gas or oil pipeline. We will again be faced with this problem when we consider developing an oil line across Canada to serve the eastern markets.

It seems that we are depending entirely on the National Energy Board to make the assessment of whether the costs justify the means or whether the company should decide where to build a pipeline on the basis of serving a larger area with larger sales. This shorter route should be weighed against the proposition of an all-Canadian route. There may be savings through lower cost, although there may be an increase in capital costs for installation purposes and the volume would be less than if it served a large number of communities.

I believe this company has a good record, Mr. Speaker. Obviously, it does since the committee has agreed to this proposal. However, I am still concerned about this matter. I did not have the opportunity that committee members had of seeing the map showing where the proposed structure would be. I do not know if it is to be built from the Trans-Canada pipeline on the north to the city of Fort Frances on the south, nor am I aware of the additional route that would be necessary to bring it to Fort Frances from the south. I am not in a position to even guess what the mileage would be nor am I in a position to guess at the total sales. Both of these will have some effect on the situation.

A company could legitimately argue that if they brought their pipeline in from the south, if they had an export permit and were allowed to sell a large volume of gas en route to the Fort Frances complex, the price would be lower. However, we know from experience this is not true. This has never happened. Gas is not a lower priced commodity because every person on the street uses it. It is the same price whether there are only one or two customers on the street or if everyone uses it. It is doubtful whether a large number of subscribers would substantially reduce the cost of gas to the Fort Frances complex as well as areas situated along the pipeline.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, it could be argued that if the pipeline were built entirely in Canada, although the capital cost would be considerably higher than using an alternative route, the capital cost would eventually be written off. Through our tax structure these companies are given considerable assistance. Much of their capital cost is written off over a period of time. There would then be a short pipeline. The National Energy Board would calculate the cost on the distance involved. The transportation costs would be reduced and eventually the ultimate consumer would have the benefit of a reduction in cost.

I am not very concerned about this bill. I know the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) is very interested in it because it affects his area. We are pleased that this development is taking place. It is taking place at a very good time. For a number of years there has been a very slack market for the pulp and paper industry. Apparently this has now changed for the better and many companies intend to get into production very shortly. I hope the building of this pipeline will be of assistance to them.

I ask hon. members to give consideration to an all-Canadian pipeline. I ask them to consider the advantages we will receive in terms of reduction of costs which is very important to the ultimate consumer. Also we will have control over this facility if it is totally under one agency. Mr. Graham, who represented the company, pointed out that there will be two sister companies, one to handle relations with the federal agency in the United States and the other to handle relations with the National Energy Board in Canada. These companies will operate under significantly different criteria and often under legislation that is not necessarily designed to produce the same results. These two companies will be under the control of a third company, the parent company. Hon. members will agree this creates a complication which would not have arisen if the complete pipeline were built in Canada. When one or two committee members made inquiries about this matter, Mr. Graham commented that they had tentatively studied an alternate route but dismissed this. He did not have any figures to offer nor did he offer an alternative.

I think that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, after he gets over being pleased to have this gas coming into the area, may be concerned about the cost. Many factors contribute to cost and one would be the shorter distance in Canada; a second would be that capital costs will eventually be written off. The pipeline will operate as a transportation facility long after the capital is repaid.

The fact that we ask questions about the ownership and control of the company by Canadians means little when we cannot write in and are not writing into the corporations act any limitations on the sale of shares. It is not like the banks and life insurance companies where we have legislation to ensure that the situation does not change. If the 300-odd Canadian shareholders should decide to sell out, then the situation would be changed.

While I am not particularly concerned with this company, Mr. Speaker, I am concerned with the attitude of some Canadians and of some members of Parliament to this over-all problem. It is my opinion that we will have to face a very serious decision in the next few years regarding a new transcontinental oil line. It is my hope that the things that make up the desires and aspirations of a nation will be taken into consideration, as well as the fact that a particular company may not want to go through the rock and water of northern Ontario but would rather detour through the United States. This would mean that a foreign agency would be able to control one of our natural resources. Hon. members should give some consideration to this, not particularly because of this bill but because this bill does, in a small way, point out many of the problems we are going to have with pipelines in the future.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, in dealing with Bill S-17 on third reading, it was noted in testimony that the sponsor of the bill, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) would make a correction in Hansard which I expected he would do when he closed the debate.

In a debate we had in the Committee on Transport and Communications, various things came up upon which most of us agreed. However, the basic philosophy concerning the transportation of natural resources in our country through another country and then back again to Canada is one with which I cannot agree. The pipeline is 160 miles long and 40 miles of that goes through Minnesota, then comes back to International Falls.

It seems to me when application is made by a corporation or pipeline company for a detour such as this feasibility studies should be available for the committee to consider possible alternate routes. In this particular case, there was no feasibility study made as far as building the pipeline directly from the Trans-Canada to the Canadian destination. I am very pleased to see that this company was quite prepared to table and add as an appendix, a list of the shareholders involved in the company. It is noteworthy that of 311,537 shares issued as outstanding, 307,836 are held by 817 shareholders resident in Canada and 3,701 shares are held by 20 shareholders in the United States. Mr. Speaker, I am sure none of us could have any objection to this type of corporation doing business in Canada with that type of corporate setup.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, looking at the route of the pipeline and remembering that we had a railroad trying to take our coal resources from the Kootenays to the United States and back to Roberts Bank, the analogy is too much to accept. The Great Northern would like nothing better than to obtain permission to take this coal through the United States and back to Roberts Bank. In this case, the Canadian Pacific would be left out in the distance somewhere. It is for this reason, Mr. Speaker, that I have reservations about this bill before us.

We will be very glad that this pipeline will serve a portion of Manitoba which has not got natural gas at the moment, but surely feeder lines could have provided service if this pipeline company or any other were interested.

Another point that bothers me is the amount of money being spent on labour. At page 7.8 in the transcript of the hearings, we see that some $4 million will be spent in Canada and $2 million in the United States in the construction of the pipeline. I realize there are problems regarding employment of Canadians across the border, but it is only in the last few years that the United States immigration department has become so strict about visas for people working there on contracts allotted to and tendered by Canadian companies. As a result, they could not keep their employees on the United States portions of a particular job. Co-operation between Canada and the United States should relieve this situation so that our labour could complete the whole 160 miles of this pipeline without having to subcontract the 40-mile section through the United States.

I realize that there is also a problem as far as the union is concerned, but this too should be rectified. There should not be any restrictions on Canadian workers in the United States on a project such as this, any more than if a United States firm had the same opportunities here. We all appreciate that there are hardly any pipeline construction companies in Canada which are subject to United States domination in so far as the Construction contract is concerned. I am sure that all those bidding on this particular line would like to see it a completely Canadian job. I was very pleased to learn, through the evidence brought forth before the committee, that the pipe at least will be constructed by some Canadian company. This will give employment in Canada which, of course, is one of our main concerns.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that if we are to be consistent in our desire to have pipelines in Canada, then the next pipeline built, which will be one to serve the east, should be constructed by an all-Canadian group. While this one does serve a section of Minnesota and comes back into Canada some problems exist, namely that we are using the territory of another country, as well as its labour, for the transportation of our natural resource. However, I for one will never take exception to the route because I am pleased to say that this particular company has its domain in Winnipeg and its major shareholders are in Canada. This is something we can appreciate at this particular time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I see the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) rising to speak. I might point out that he can only speak at this time with the unanimous consent of the House. Is it so agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I rise only to make the correction in Hansard to which the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg) referred. In Hansard of January 15, 1970 at page 2447 the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) asked me a question and I inadvertently gave him incorrect information. The hon. member asked if I could give him the areas to which Inter City Gas Company distributed natural gas. I replied:

My information is that it distributes natural gas throughout the southern part of Manitoba and parts of the city of Winnipeg.

That information is incorrect. The company distributes gas through the rural part of Manitoba and also the northern part of Minnesota; it does not distribute gas to parts of Winnipeg.

• (5:20 p.m.)

I should like to make a brief comment about the routing. I recognize the argument advanced by hon. members concerning that part of the pipeline going through the United States. But may I also point out that other communities in the Rainy River district such as Emo and Rainy River could not have natural gas service except as a result of this routing. Therefore, from the point of view of servicing the people of the Rainy River district, this type of routing is necessary. It would not have been possible for this part of the district to attract a pipeline running down from the Trans-Canada line because the cost would have been too much. This course was followed in a former part of my constituency and a pipe line was dropped down from the Trans-Canada Pipe Line at Ignace to Atikokan over a distance of approximately 40 to 50 air miles. Although, the cost was high it could be borne because two iron mines at Atikokan had contracted to take large amounts of the gas over a long period of time.

May I thank hon. members for their assistance in the House and during the committee proceedings when the bill was considered.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

An hon. Member: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Before the House proceeds to the next item of business, I point out that pursuant to Standing Order 75 (3) the House is not permitted to consider items No. 2, 3, 4 and 5 under the heading of Private Bills on the Order Paper. Standing Order 75(3) reads:

The report stage of any bill reported by any standing or special committee shall not be taken into consideration prior to forty-eight hours following the presentation of the said report, unless otherwise ordered by the House.

Since Bills S-10, S-11, S-15 and S-16 were reported only yesterday, the 40-hour provision has not been met. The House will therefore proceed to the next order of business, namely, notices of motions (papers).

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I believe there is general agreement that we stand the first three notices of motions and proceed with No. 104, in the name of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg).

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR COPIES OF CONSULTANT STUDIES

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw) moved:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all outside consultant studies undertaken for the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs as mentioned in answer to Question No. 1,323, tabled on June 25, 1969, as reported in Hansard on page 10597.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am utterly amazed to hear that the government refuses to supply the pertinent information the motion requests. It seems that the consumers of this nation are paying for the cost of these reports. The government seems to be ignoring the warning of the Prices and Incomes Commission. As I say, our consumers are paying the bill and it seems to me that the consumers of Canada, through their members of Parliament, are entitled to obtain the information asked for in the notice of motion. Furthermore, they are entitled to know whether the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is really concerned about the matter of costs and rising prices in this country. Question No. 1,323 reads as follows in part:

For the fiscal years 1963-64, 1964-65, 1965-66, 1966-67, 1967-68 and 1968-69, what outside consultant studies have been undertaken or are presently in progress sponsored by the following Departments and Agencies—

A number of agencies and departments were then enumerated. The second part of the question reads as follows:

What was the cost for each outside consultant study prepared for each department and agency and were the contracts from each department or agency awarded by competitive tendering and, if not, for what reason?

The first part of the government's answer tries to show what action has been taken. The document in my hand relating to the answer shows the following:

1. (a) Task Force—Corporate Law

(b) Task Force—Securities Regulation

(c) Operations Research Incorporated: Consumer Affairs Programme Planning and Analysis Study

(d) Canadian Committee on Mutual Funds and Investment Contracts

In the second portion of the answer which relates to the cost of outside consultants and whether tenders for the work had been submitted, we see the following:

2. (a)	1967-68	$117,628	No tenders
	1968-69	60,000	No tenders
(b)	1967-68	30,078	No tenders
(c)	1967-68	83,000	No tenders
	1968-69	57,000	No tenders
(d)	1967-68	120,007	No tenders
	1968-69	65,155	No tenders

The aggregate amount spent without tenders having been received is over $500,000. The latter part of that answer indicates that consultants who were engaged were lawyers, university professors and graduate and post-graduate students completing their degrees.

I have often said that such studies ought to be tendered for, and if this government were really interested in participatory democracy it would make sure that tenders are submitted. We have often been told to wait for the report of the task force on government information. That report is now in our hands, but the government still refuses to make known to the people of Canada exactly how much has been spent on consultant studies with relation to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. On page 1 of the task force report we read the following paragraph:

Governments feel increasingly a compulsion to compel: the single issue of environmental pollution will shortly oblige every citizen to comply with government regulations affecting cherished private routines of living.

In these circumstances, governments must acquire the power to speak persuasively and continuously, on many subjects and at many levels of comprehension. Unless this skill on the part of government is quickly acquired, there is a risk that administration will be swamped by rising tides of incomprehension and discontent.

[Mr. Skoberg.]

Unless the people of this country can obtain necessary information which will enable them to judge whether the actions of the government are to their advantage, there will be discontent. If there is to be any real democracy in Canada, then people who write to their members of Parliament for information ought to be entitled to be given that information. I also think it should be absolutely mandatory for these consultant studies to be awarded on the basis of tender.

• (5:30 p.m.)

I cannot accept for one moment that there should be a select, priority list of consultants who obtain all these jobs from the government. To tell certain consultants and contractors that they are not entitled, or are not sufficiently competent to work for the government is a disservice to those who pay taxes and play their part in a so-called democracy. What we are doing when we call for consultant studies under present arrangements amounts to bootlegging certain people into the government service.

On the basis of the relatively short time I have spent in Ottawa, I do not have to tell hon. members who have spent a considerably longer time here about the number of consultants who have benefited from choice government contracts. The public should have the right to see the results of these studies and know exactly what is going on. The same argument applies to the system of tenders; there is too much secrecy attached to the system and we do not know which firms bid for what contracts, and on what terms and conditions.

As long ago as 1937, Mr. Mackenzie King said, as recorded on page 3 of the report to which I have referred:

Where there is little or no public opinion there is likely to be bad government, which sooner or later becomes autocratic government." And though dead prime ministers and dead presidents may not necessarily be unfailing founts of current wisdom, it is still interesting that a century and a half before that, James Madison had this to say about governments and information: "A popular government without popular information or the means of acquiring it is but a prologue to a farce or a tragedy, or perhaps both."

The same thing applied to these tenders and studies. The government's consistent refusal to produce the papers for which we have asked means that the people of Canada are witnessing a farce or a tragedy. It is high time they realized exactly what confronts them as far as consultant studies are concerned. A number of observations on the subject have been made in various newspapers. Bob Cohen has written about it in the Globe and Mail and an editorial on the subject has appeared in that paper. George Bain has also written on the subject. It all boils down to this: we cannot have a true democracy unless all these studies are made public. We cannot expect any type of participation by the people of Canada in the democratic process unless the government makes sure that the information which it has available is also available to the people, so that they may know what is really happening.

I am particularly surprised that the information sought in the Notice of Motion we are now considering would not be made available to the public. This criticism relates to one department in particular in which everyone in Canada has a direct interest, namely, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I plead with the government to make these documents available. I can think of nothing which might be contained in them which should not be made public. It is on the basis of information of this kind that people can reach informed decisions and journalists can write intelligent editorials summing up the direction in which we are moving. I urge the government to make this information available now, so that all of us can be as familiar with the subject of consumer affairs as are the government's consultants.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the studies mentioned by the member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg) in his notice of motion (papers) No. 104 are confidential and they relate to the making of the policy, except one report prepared by Operation Research Inc. on the organization of the consumer program.

We would be happy to table this report, but we ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion as far as the other studies are concerned.

[English]

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take part in this debate, but the hon. member whose motion this is has shown a very sophisticated lack of knowledge concerning the whole field of research and, with respect, I feel he should be put right with regard to at least one aspect of it, that is, tenders.

If the government requires steel of a certain size and weight, it is a simple matter to ask for tenders. But if it is seeking information which cannot be so easily specified, the situation becomes more complex. The government would be justified in calling for public tenders for supplies of paper or books. Having had some experience in the field of market research and research in general, I should like to point out to the hon. member that a research project is not outlined at the outset. The government or the institution concerned does not say; "Ask these questions; interview these people."

What happens is that firms of consultants are invited to make proposals. These proposals outline the type of research it is intended to conduct in order to find the answers to certain questions, together with an estimate of the cost. Some proposals may be double the cost of others. On the other hand, if what is wanted in an answer to a question, some firms might interview two persons and others would interview a thousand. The customer must decide whether, regardless of the cost, one firm or the other is likely to produce the right answer. Once this decision is made, the customer cannot go to another firm and say; "This proposal came from another firm, but you can do it cheaper." That is not the way in which it is done. If the hon. member would examine the way in which the research and consultative studies industry has developed, he will find that the tender system was dropped some years ago because it had been found to be an utter failure.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a short question? Does he believe that tender by invitation is the only way in which an operation such as the government is engaged in could be conducted?

Mr. Otto: In the field of research and consultative studies, invitation proposals are the only way which has been found to be successful over the past 22 years.

Mr. Skoberg: How do you get on the list?

Mr. Otto: Just be a researcher.

Mr. Skoberg: Is the hon. member suggesting the government should get in touch with everybody?

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Skoberg) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost. It being six o'clock, the hour assigned for the consideration of private members' business is now terminated. This House stands adjourned until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY

NATIONAL MARKS AND STANDARDS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Jamieson that Bill C-137, respecting the use of national safety marks in relation to motor vehicles and to provide for safety standards for certain motor vehicles imported into or exported from Canada or sent or conveyed from one province to another, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that hon. members will understand the degree of satisfaction that I take in being able to introduce and explain to some extent the measure which is now before the House. It has been quite a while since we began our planning for what might be properly described as this auto safety bill, but I think it is one of the more important measures that hon. members will be called upon to enact during the present session and I am sure also that it will receive widespread endorsement in all parts of the House.

On June 17 I indicated that the government was giving consideration to legislation to establish mandatory safety standards for new motor vehicles and their components at the point of manufacture or of importation into Canada. The main reason for this legislation is the government's awareness of and concern about the seriousness of the highway accident situation and about the danger to the health of citizens which may result from motor vehicle exhaust and possible noise emissions.

In this connection I may say that this is not merely a highway safety bill in the rather confined definition of that word, but in fact it will go beyond that particular objective in order to take the first steps at least in terms of emissions from automobiles that can be a danger to health. I hope in my introductory remarks to illustrate to hon. members in a few moments just how we propose to do this.

The federal government has evidence that significant reductions in motor vehicle traffic accidents, injuries and deaths can be effected through the provision of safety standards for motor vehicles and components at the point of manufacture. This is clearly the most logical point at which to attack the problem to ensure that when the automobile leaves the factory in the first instance it is as safe as it is possible for those involved, from a technological and now from a legislative point of view, to devise. Therefore, we have this legislation coupled, incidentally, with the research program which my department is undertaking, and I am confident that this should contribute significantly to increased safety in motor vehicle transportation in Canada.

The legislation itself deals primarily with those parts of the highway safety program which are designed to improve the calibre of the automobile, but I want to emphasize that simultaneously we are undertaking a stepped-up research program into all aspects of highway safety. Of course, in some respects this is perhaps even more important than the standards of the automobile itself because it is only after an automobile becomes involved in an accident that the safety measures can, in effect, come into play. What we really have to find answers to before we can move truly, in a major way, into the field of solution and improvement is what it is that causes accidents in the first instance.

While a good deal of publicity is often given to the drunken driver or the impaired driver, and while we have taken steps in an effort to improve that situation through the breathalyzer test, it is still a fact that a great deal is unknown about what causes drivers to become involved in accidents under circumstances which do not appear, on the surface at least, to contribute in any way to the actual crash.

So in addition to moving on the legislative front, through these efforts, to improve the safety standards of the vehicle itself, we will be moving as well—I am sure hon. members will get details of this at the committee stage—to step up our research efforts, because in the last analysis the prevention of accidents is the most important consideration.

In preparing this bill we recognized the need for close consultation with the provincial departments responsible for road and motor vehicle administration. As you are aware, sir, the provinces have primary responsibility for roads and road traffic as well as motor vehicle and driver registration. Here, if I may be permitted, I should like to pay tribute to the provincial ministers concerned who have shown at least as much interest in this matter as the federal government. They have also co-operated with us in every way—as the debate will undoubtedly reveal, and the subsequent questioning in committee—in order to ensure the maximum amount of co-operation between the two levels of government, because the federal effort alone would not be sufficient to make a significant improvement.

The federal-provincial discussions to which I have referred led to my meeting with the provincial ministers on September 4, 1969, when it was agreed that the federal government should assume responsibility for the safety standards for new motor vehicles manufactured in Canada and for motor vehicles imported into Canada. At this time it was also agreed that the provinces, under existing legislation, would undertake to ensure the safety of vehicles in use as well as the safety of replacement and additional parts for motor vehicles.

I think there was unanimous agreement that at the federal level we could make the biggest impact on the problem by dealing with the new car manufacturer, to ensure that as cars left the factory they were in top condition. It was also agreed that we would work closely with the provinces to ensure, wherever necessary, that they would introduce the kind of legislation which would put their needs on all fours with ours in terms of replacement parts. The provincial ministers indicated their support of the objectives in this field and the means contemplated to impose them, and it was agreed that the federal government should proceed with its legislation as quickly as possible.

The measure that I have the honour to introduce tonight, Mr. Speaker, is a bill which the provinces and the appropriate provincial ministers have said is desirable and one with which they are wholly prepared to co-operate.

At this stage I think it is important that I set forth with some care the principle of the bill. The bill defines a "motor vehicle" as, "any vehicle designed to be driven or drawn on roads by any means other than muscular power." It does not include vehicles designed for running on rails. Perhaps the operative words are, " 'motor vehicle' means any vehicle designed to be driven or drawn on roads". In a sense, that is the outside limit of the definition.

I am sure subsequent discussion will bring out that this puts us in a somewhat uncertain position with regard to some new types of vehicles now being introduced. I refer specifically to perhaps the most remarkable phenomenon in the new automotive age, the snowmobile and the snowcruiser—that kind of vehicle. We have had discussions with the provinces as to how this kind of machine might be brought under control. At the moment, however, there is such a conflict in the various forms of jurisdiction across the country that it was not deemed advisable to do it now. Nevertheless, the legislation does provide the means by which at some future time these modes of travel to which I have referred, the off-highway vehicle and various others, can be brought within the ambit of this legislation.

The act distinguishes between a manufacturer, distributor and importer. Here I get into some legal jargon with regard to persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, distributing and importing, respectively. I think these three categories are quite important in terms of legislation. Manufacturing, of course, includes the process of assembly.

The bill would give the government of Canada the authority to prescribe safety standards which would regulate the design, construction and functioning of motor vehicles and their components for the purpose of protecting persons against personal injury, impairment of health or death. I want to emphasize again the impairment of health provision, which I think will prove to be extremely important. Twenty-nine standards have now been prepared which can be adopted as the initial regulations under this legislation. In other words, Mr. Speaker, if and when this honourable House chooses to pass this legislation, there are now 29 standards which officials of the Department of Transport have established and which could be introduced immediately as the first set of regulations under this measure. Subsequently, of course, there will be others as new devices are discovered, but 29 are now in place and can be introduced. I should be very pleased to make copies available to hon. members who may wish to comment upon them. The bill would give this authority to the government under these 29 standards.

These standards deal with the main safety features which would be henceforth incorporated in all new motor vehicles for sale in Canada. As of the time of implementation, they would automatically become the standard and the starting point for the new legislation. For obvious reasons—and this is one of the matters which has concerned me a good deal in planning for this legislation, and I think it will also concern other hon. members—the initial standards will be identical in intent to those currently enforced in the United States.

The reason for this, of course, is the tremendous interchange of automobiles back and forth across the border. Indeed, the situation at the moment is that many automobiles manufactured in Canada are not in fact sold to Canadians, and a great many of the automobiles bought by Canadians are manufactured in the United States. Because of this transborder traffic it is necessary at the present time to have our regulations more or less on all fours with those of the United States.

I would like to emphasize, however, that some standards could be altered to conform with special Canadian requirements, and others may be added as the need arises. The most obvious would be some necessary provision for winter conditions in this country, which might not be necessary on some cars sold in the United States. Indeed, at some point we might have to modify these regulations so that cars being sold out of Canadian plants to the tropics would not be required, as they would be under the regulations, to be sold with heating equipment. As a first step it was felt desirable to keep them on the same basis and eventually, hopefully, to introduce special conditions for Canada where they were considered necessary.

It is hoped that the initial regulation can be published in March or April, and thereby become effective at the commencement of production of the 1971 model vehicles. In other words, there is a rather important timetable, and I am quite confident that members will recognize this. I am sure if the legislation commends itself to the House at all, it will be law by that time. It is therefore important that we have the necessary authority to indicate to the manufacturers what the regulations will be, in time for the 1971 car year which begins quite a bit ahead of the point at which vehicles are put on sale.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, would the minister allow a question before he goes on to another provision of the bill? My question is not argumentative, I assure you. I wonder whether he would attach to Hansard a list of the 29 standards to which he referred, so that all Members of Parliament may be aware of them.

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, of course, Mr. Speaker. If the House gives consent, I will be pleased to table them immediately. I have concluded my formal remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And appended to Hansard.

Mr. Jamieson: And appended to Hansard, of course.

[Editor's Note: For list referred to, see appendix.]

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, the definition of safety standards contained in the bill refers specifically to the impairment of health. This provision was not in our original planning, but we came to the conclusion it was the most appropriate place for us to attack the question of air pollution by automobile exhaust. This provision would allow the government to issue regulations limiting harmful exhaust emissions from motor vehicles. It is contemplated, therefore, that exhaust emissions will be included in the initial regulations under the act. This is in addition to the 29 provisions to which I have referred. We shall also study the relationship between motor vehicle noise and the impairment of health. Should the evidence indicate a need to control noise pollution from this source, regulations will be issued under this act.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: So we have tried to be as all-embracing as possible in introducing these two measures. The noise problem is a little more difficult to cope with, particularly in terms of snowmobiles and so forth, but as one hon. member and I agreed this afternoon, noise emission might be the biggest single factor.

The act will establish national safety margins as trademarks which are the exclusive property of Canada. Under the act regulations will be made respecting the use of the national safety mark on prescribed classes of vehicles, such as passenger cars, multipurpose passenger vehicles, trucks, buses and motorcycles. The use of the mark—I wish to emphasize this—will imply compliance of the motor vehicle and its components with the prescribed safety standards.

It is not, if I may use an old phrase, a good housekeeping seal of approval. It does not say, in effect, "This vehicle has been inspected and has been approved by inspectors appointed under the act." The onus and the responsibility is on the manufacturer to show, by the application of this mark, that he has in fact complied with the conditions set down in such regulations as may be operable at any given moment. The form of this mark, as well as its location on the vehicle, will also be prescribed, together with the date of manufacture. Misuse of the national safety mark will be an offence. In passing, may I note that the bill provides for stiff penalties ranging from $5,000 to as much as $200,000 if convicted of offences under the act.

Manufacturers and distributors are prohibited from applying the national safety mark to motor vehicles, or from selling or possessing motor vehicles, to which has been applied the national safety mark unless those vehicles and their components comply with all safety standards applicable at the time the vehicle was manufactured. In other words, they cannot have vehicles in their possession unless these conditions have been met.

Manufacturers and distributors are also prohibited from exporting or from sending or conveying from one province to another motor vehicles to which the national safety mark has not been applied. Therefore, in the interests of Canada's good name and prestige abroad, while we are saying that we will have minimum requirements for Canada, we are also saying that we will not sell a less satisfactory car in any part of the world. As I said a few moments ago, the only distinction is in the possibility that when cars are to be sold in tropical countries, we might not require heating equipment in them.

Safety standards will also be prescribed for motor vehicles imported into Canada. This, again, is a most important consideration. These standards will also very probably be identical to those applicable to cars manufactured in Canada. All imported vehicles and their components will be required at the time of importation to comply with the prescribed safety standards applicable at the time the vehicles were manufactured. Hence, vehicles manufactured after the proclamation of this act could be imported only if they complied with the regulations. Individuals or companies importing new or used vehicles will be required to produce evidence at the time of importation demonstrating compliance with the regulations applicable when the vehicle was manufactured.

These safety standard regulations will not apply, however, to vehicles being brought into Canada temporarily for the purposes of exhibition and demonstration, nor to vehicles being used by tourists or visitors entering or passing through Canada. In the latter case I suspect that most vehicles will come in from the United States and, since the regulations in Canada and in the United States will be more or less similar, I do not foresee any difficulty being created.

The act will make it an offence for manufacturers, distributors or importers to fail to give notice of any defect. This, too, is a most important provision. This requirement applies when the manufacturer, distributor or importer is aware of the vehicle defect affecting safety. They are then required to furnish a notice to persons who have purchased the vehicles from them, to subsequent purchasers to whom warrantees have been transferred, and also to the Minister of Transport.

Incidentally, in my arrangements with the provincial ministers I have undertaken that immediately I or whoever the minister of transport may be receives the notification, it will be passed on to the appropriate provincial minister to take whatever action is deemed necessary within the provincial jurisdiction. These notices are to be sent by registered mail and will contain a description of the defect and the evaluation of the safety risk, as well as a statement of the means to be taken to correct the defect. It will not be a notice simply telling someone that his car is inadequate. The companies will have to tell those people just how much risk the defect involves, and what they must do in order to correct it.

Clause 9 of part I of the provides:

> A copy of each regulation ... that the Govenor in Council proposes to make—

This is with respect to safety standard.

> —shall be published in the Canada Gazette and a reasonable opportunity shall be afforded to manufacturers, distributors, importers and other interested persons to make representations to the minister with respect thereto.

This provision will thus prevent the incorporation of any possible technical errors in our regulations and will also allow industry some time to ensure that their products comply with the regulations. We think this is a reasonable provision in view of the fact that many of the regulations promulgated under the act will require the expenditure of hundreds of thousands, and perhaps millions of dollars. We think it right to give manufacturers and other interested parties, which includes the general public, an opportunity to make submissions before the regulations become law.

Mr. Skoberg: How long is "reasonable"?

Mr. Jamieson: That is a good question and it is one which can only be determined by circumstances. In case other hon. members did not hear that remark, the hon. member asked, "How long is 'reasonable'?"

The act will provide the government with power to enter places where motor vehicles and their components are manufactured or stored, for the purpose of inspecting both vehicles and applicable records. The act will also provide for the seizure, detention and forfeiture of vehicles found to be in violation of its provisions. The act will, further, specify penalties for violations of various provisions by either corporations or individuals, under both summary conviction and conviction by indictment. As I mentioned a moment ago, the bill provides a scale of penalties ranging up to $200,000 for some violations.

I hope this is a reasonably comprehensive summary of what is involved in the bill. I consider it a major step forward in what is undeniably one of the many serious problems facing us in this country and, indeed, the peoples of all civilized countries of the world. This House spends a good deal of time, understandably, discussing the loss of life which results from tragedies such as war and conflict. But the simple truth is that the carnage on our highways, the loss of life as a result of accidents, is of major proportions. Motor vehicle accidents are one of the major killers of modern man. It has taken a long time—perhaps many hon. members will say too long—for us to get this legislation together. It has not been an easy task. But I believe we have come up with a satisfactory and productive approach to this major problem.

I do not wish to end without again emphasizing that from my studies of this matter over recent months it has become apparent to me that there is a great lack of information concerning the causes of accidents and a great need for research into this matter. No matter how good the automobile is in the first instance, it will not get into trouble unless there is some action or reaction on the part of the person behind the wheel. There is a surprising lack of knowledge about the motivations of people who get into accidents. Are there really people who are accident prone? Should we have a more comprehensive driver's test and a more frequent reassessment of drivers? Should we, instead of advocating simply that people who drink should not drive, also advocate that people who are emotionally disturbed should not drive?

There are all manner of items in this category which remain woefully unresearched at the present time, but I think it is vitally important that we introduce this legislation now and make the regulations as stringent as possible. However, it would be a ghastly mistake if we as legislators were to leave the matter there and say we have done our part. The responsibility, in the last analysis, rests upon us to see that the necessary research is undertaken in order that we may find out why accidents happen.

It is not merely, as we are beginning to find out, the drinking driver who fits into the category of the accident prone driver; there are thousands of other causes for accidents. Therefore, hand in hand with this legislation, which I commend to hon. members, is my undertaking to the House that within our department we will step up considerably our research efforts.

I am looking forward to outlining in more detail in committee the nature of some of these projects. I am grateful to hon. members for the kind comments they made about this bill when it was given first reading. I hope that with their help we can make it law and extend its benefits to the people of Canada as quickly as possible.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan-Boundary): Would the minister permit a question? I am not clear about the effect of clause 2(f) which contains the definition of "motor vehicle," and I should like some clarification. What is the status of farm vehicles under this definition?

Mr. Jamieson: I am sure this is the kind of question we shall deal with at great length in the committee. The operative words here appear to be "designed to be driven....on roads." The act applies to any vehicle designed for use on roads even though it might be marketed primarily for use off the road. It will thus apply to all vehicles licensed by the provinces for operation on highways, but it could be extended to cover mini-bikes, air cushion vehicles, dune buggies and the so-called all-terrain vehicles whose numbers are growing all the time.

An hon. Member: What about tractors?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, if they are licensed for use on highways.

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we have all listened with much interest to the minister's interpretation of this bill. He did a capable job. I want to fill in some of the background by showing how the bill came to the House of Commons; how long ago it is since this issue was placed before Parliament.

The first and most important move made by this government in respect of highway safety was its action in making the breathalyzer test mandatory. I now have a further measure of satisfaction in the government presenting Bill C-137 to the House of Commons for approval, even with its inadequacies and after long delay. My satisfaction arises from the fact that I took the initiative in introducing highway safety to the House of Commons and appealed to the government to accept some of the responsibility for reducing the tragic toll being taken on our highways in terms of death and injury. To introduce the question to the House of Commons, on November 19, 1963, I put this question to the prime minister of the day:

> Would the Prime Minister take the first opportunity to make a television appeal to the Canadian people in order to impress upon them the great necessity for better observance of highway safety regulations, in the hope that we might reduce the traffic death toll which was so much in evidence last week end?

He replied:

> I would be glad to do anything I can along the lines suggested by the hon. member, including an appeal over television if that were appropriate in the circumstances.

To my knowledge, nothing was done. Therefore, on April 16, 1964, I made another approach by asking the Minister of National Health and Welfare the following question:

Is any research being carried on by the minister's department with a view to discovering ways and means of curbing air pollution by vehicular traffic which is becoming an increasingly serious threat to the health of our nation.

The minister replied:

My department is conducting research into air pollution generally and we are keeping a close eye on efforts aimed at reducing noxious gases from internal combustion engines. We are also in close contact with United States public health service which is spending vast amounts of money on this problem and we are expecting to benefit from any developments which may take place there. Also automobile manufacturers in Canada and the United States have intensive research projects under way with a view to introducing measures to control pollution.

As the records show, with each succeeding month the death toll on the highways has increased. Therefore, in the hope of arousing some action, on June 2, 1965, I put this question to the then prime minister:

Owing to the ever increasing death toll on the highways, will the Prime Minister consider introducing legislation making it compulsory for automobiles being sold in Canada to be equipped with safety devices currently proven practical and efficient?

He replied:

This is a very important question and I think it should be put on the order paper so it can be studied.

I put the question on the order paper and it was replied to by the minister of industry in the following manner:

It should be emphasized that the provincial governments have the responsibility of drafting and enforcing regulations pertaining to the operational standards of motor vehicles. A great deal of work has already been undertaken by various groups to determine the areas where improvement in design or vehicle construction could lead to greater safety which would be useful in the preparation of a safety code. It would, of course, be necessary to obtain the agreement of the provinces before a uniform safety code could be established for motor vehicles. The Department of Industry would be happy to co-operate with the provinces in the preparation of such a code.

On January 27, 1966, I directed this question to the minister of justice:

Would the government give consideration to amending the Criminal Code so that the breathalyzer test can be made mandatory?

The minister stated:

That is one of the several possible amendments to the Criminal Code which are now being given consideration by the government.

[Mr. Noble.]

This measure will be placed on the statute books. On February 2, 1966, on a supply motion, I spoke on highway safety. I will read into the record the following excerpt:

Mr. Speaker, the matter of highway safety deserves immediate attention. The federal government has failed to take the necessary steps to fulfil its obligations in fighting public enemy No. 1, the constantly increasing death toll on our highways. We are all aware of the appalling increase in highway accidents but it would seem these are being treated in some quarters as a course of events that should be expected. Something must be done and there should be no delay.

In my opinion, help and assistance would be readily available if this government would take the initiative and launch an all-out crusade to face up to this monster once and for all. They should pull out all stops, make the breathalizer test mandatory and increase the grant to the Canadian Highway Safety Council. A conference should also be called with provincial representatives and, in fact, representatives from all organizations willing to get together in a drive to bring about improvement in the situation.

Responsibility in highway safety has been ignored too long by all governments. Our laws and regulations have not kept pace with the times. Uniformity of laws and regulations, as well as of penalties, should apply to all provinces. Traffic signs and driver testing or any other feature having to do with our highways or driving on them should be the same.

Periodical vehicle inspection should be compulsory. Signboards, radio and television should be in constant use in an effort to keep our people alert and aware of the need for extreme caution on our streets and highways. No doubt if the people I have suggested were brought together to set up a framework or a pattern for greater highway safety, many worthwhile ideas would be brought to light.

Automobile manufacturers have shown a favourable response to highway safety through their willingness to supply cars for student training and supply them in abundance. Their designers are constantly investigating safety features and quite a number have been included in car equipment with satisfactory results. Perhaps the automobile people could be persuaded to go quite a lot further by way of extensive research on some of the recently suggested safety devices.

I suggest that in the not too distant future legislation will necessarily be passed to make anti-smog equipment a requirement. There is no way of assessing the injury being inflicted on us by carbon monoxide. However, we do know that any element which causes irritation in the lungs is a potential contributor to lung cancer. We know too that carbon monoxide is deadly when confined and may even be the cause of some highway accidents.

• (8:40 p.m.)

On February 16, March 23, and April 1, 1966, I put questions to ministers on the matter. In these questions I continued to press for some action. On May 2, 1966, I put this question on the order papers:

Has the government received representations from any provincial government or association or other organized body asking for the calling of a federal-provincial conference for the purpose of working out a national program:

(a) to ensure that all practical safety devices be required equipment in motor vehicles,

(b) to ensure that more and better driver education be made available,

(c) to require more rigid traffic law observance,

(d) any other action that would help in reducing the accidents and loss of life on our highways. If so, has the government taken or does it intend to take any action on such representation.

The secretary of state replied:

(1) Yes. A letter dated August 12, 1965, was received from the Premier of Manitoba who urged the calling by the federal government jointly with the provinces of a national conference on highway safety.

(2) The matter is receiving appropriate consideration by the government.

Following this I asked five more questions on the subject of highway safety. On July 11, 1966, I put this question to the minister of industry:

Has the government taken any action in regard to the promotion of highway safety and, if so, what action?

The minister replied:

Yes. In so far as the departments of defence production and industry are concerned: (1) The Canadian government specifications board has prepared a draft automotive vehicle safety code in collaboration with the Canadian Good Roads Association and the traffic injury research foundation. The draft has been submitted for critical review to a committee consisting of representatives of the provinces, the motor vehicle manufacturers, safety groups, the medical profession and others. A revised draft is now being prepared.

(2) The government has undertaken to include all available safety features in the specifications governing the procurement of conventional type vehicles for both civilian departments and the military.

(3) Two consultants have been engaged: one to assist on the automotive safety code and the other to conduct research studies.

(4) Consideration is being given to what other steps the federal government can usefully take in the light of the constitutional position and the relative responsibilities of the provinces and the government in this area.

Further ... in so far as requiring of pollution control devices for motor vehicle exhaust systems is concerned, the committee recommended that the standard for the pollutants omission control be deleted from the proposed standards because: (a) it is not yet agreed that this is indeed a safety device. (b) the Department of National Health and Welfare is making a detailed study of the problem of air contamination in close consultation with their counterparts in the United States.

I could continue to enumerate many more questions asked by myself and others in the House of Commons who joined in the dialogue about that time, but I think I have made it clear to the House that the government showed much reluctance and indifference to a problem that was costing the country thousands of lives and millions of dollars.

However, the justice committee did table a report on March 27, 1967. The report was dated March 21 and a release concerning its contents read as follows:

Government intervention in the area of auto safety was today recommended by the Commons Justice Committee, when it tabled its report to the House.

The chairman ... said the main recommendation of the committee was to establish a public board. This board, with representatives from the federal government, the automotive industry, the provincial governments and universities, would be charged with the responsibility for "developing, as quickly as possible, and improving from time to time the appropriate safety standards of design of construction and equipment for all motor vehicles produced in or imported into Canada, and authorized for use in interprovincial or international transportation". Safety standards would be more in the nature of performance standards, rather than specific items of equipment.

In addition the board would be charged with the "authority to set appropriate standards on inspection and quality control" and see that they are observed by automotive producers and parts manufacturers. It would initiate the supervising of traffic safety research possibly through the National Research Council. Co-ordination of the activities of the many voluntary governmental agencies now interested in and involved in traffic safety would also be one of its functions.

The report went on to say that while this board should be established by federal legislation it is essential that the co-operation of the provincial governments and the automotive industry be obtained and that "the danger of bureaucratic control over this vital industry should be minimized". The committee's report is based on ten months of hearings, study and investigation.

At the end of November 1966 the committee made a three day visit to the Detroit-Windsor area during which they visited the laboratory and automobile testing facilities of General Motors at Milford, Mich., Ford Motor Company in Dearborn, Mich., and Chrysler Motor Company at Highland Park, Mich. The committee had two meetings while in Windsor at the University of Windsor, at which the executives from the major automobile manufacturers were questioned.

Among the many witnesses who appeared before the committee were the Canadian Automobile Association; Canadian Government Specifications Board; Canadian Labour Congress the United Automobile Workers Union.

Among the 33 documents filed with the committee was information required by the committee of the automotive manufacturers showing recall campaign figures for the last five years.

The Chairman said he felt that the Committee's recommendations would go far in answering the problem of auto safety with all its many facets. Just as important as safety devices in automotive vehicles is the co-ordination of the many voluntary agencies which are involved in education and research in traffic. From the evidence given before the committee, it would appear that there was a definite deficiency in this area. He also pointed out that the committee does not recommend specific safety devices, but rather recommends that the public agency enforce performance standards; and quality control and production procedures. The committee was considering two private bills bringing safety devices under the Criminal Code, and four notices of motion recommending that the government take action in this area.

At his point I would like to read into the record three clippings of recent date that I think are timely. The first, taken from the Ottawa Journal, is dated November 28, 1969:

An executive of one of the largest automobile insurance companies in the United States predicts that within a few years insurers will set their rates according to how susceptible to damage the automobile is.

Sweden already has such a system, and reports it working well. As a preliminary move to consideration of the innovation in the U.S., the National Assocation of Independent Insurers hired a professor from the University of Detroit to determine how susceptible various cars are to damage.

Those involved in the study estimate it may be a year or more until enough data have been accumulated to make any evaluation. But they apparently agree on one point—that modern cars, particularly their bumpers, are not being made as collision-proof as they could be, or once were.

Automobile insurance premiums directly reflect the rising cost of automobile repairs. It is natural that insurers should try to place a higher cost of insurability on those products which accidents statistics and tests indicate provide the least resistance to damage.

This move might produce consternation among automobile manufacturers, but it could also be the strongest possible incentive to produce cars which not only look pretty but wear well.

The next clipping is taken from the Toronto Telegram of January 14, 1970. It is a press release from Detroit, and reads as follows:

A group of automotive engineers squirmed uncomfortably in their seats as an insurance safety executive stopped just short of calling them criminals.

Doctor William Haddon Jr., president of the Washington-based Insurance Institute for Highway Safety was talking about high performance, high powered cars.

"The way the auto industry is pushing muscle cars borders on criminal irresponsibility," said Dr. Haddon.

He acted as moderator for a panel discussion at the Society of Automotive Engineers Congress, which dealt with how to reduce highway losses.

"Cars with high horsepower ratings are fine on the racetrack, but it's almost criminal to use them on public roads."

• (8:50 p.m.)

Dr. Haddon was referring to such juiced-up packages as the Pontiac GTO; the Plymouth Road Runner; and the Ford Torino Cobra.

Muscle cars, or supercars, or factory hotrods as they are often called, accounted for 600,000 sales last year.

[Mr. Noble.]

"Due to advertising techniques, the image that is being sold at great expense to the buying public is why you don't have transportation, you have thrills on the highways."

Dr. Haddon said insurance losses are substantially higher on muscle cars.

"We don't know if this is because of the way they are built, or because they are used too fast" said the safety expert.

Supercars are responsible for a credibility gap involving safety and the auto industry.

"I know these cars are not the way for American business to protect the capitalistic system in the generation now coming of age in the decade of the 70s," said Dr. Haddon.

He was asked after the panel session what the future holds.

"It's the automaker's choice. They are either going to face condemnation by the public and probably restrictions by the government."

"Their only other course is to put restrictions on horsepower themselves. The blood has been accumulating for a long time," he added.

He was also critical of reports that car makers are turning away from development of safety seats with built-in belts.

Dr. Haddon favours the 3-point lap-shoulder harness, proven successful for the last 10 years in imported cars.

I have a clipping from the Ottawa Journal of January 28, 1970. This release is from Worcester, Massachusetts. It states:

An experimental car that would be safe in any kind of crash up to 50 mph will be built and tested within the next three years, Transportation Secretary Volpe said Tuesday.

Volpe said the "mobile crash laboratory" being planned could be rolled over at 70 mph with its passenger compartment remaining intact.

The car would offer improved handling, braking and visibility and use low-pollution fuels, he said.

"Our plan is to have 14 of these cars and tested by the end of 1972," he said. "It is our intention that the auto industry will seize on the new safety improvements we develop and incorporate them in production models."

I should now like to return to the bill. Regulations covering national safety standards for automobiles are long overdue, but I am afraid, however encouraging this bill appears at first sight, it falls considerably short of its objectives. I cannot quarrel with the fact that specifications or standards are not spelled out in this bill, although I shall have some comments later on that. I question the strange omissions that could, in the hands of certain unscrupulous car dealers, lead to death or injury for the buyers of cars which bear the national safety mark but which in fact have been transformed into deathtraps.

There must be protection for the innocent person who is lured into buying a car carrying the national seal of approval but which has become defective through wear, damage or tampering. There is nothing in the bill which prohibits, after the initial sale, tampering or changing those parts of the auto which have met the approved safety standards. Failing this, an attempt should be made to encourage a voluntary system of standard controls within the used car trade.

We all appreciate that improved safety standards will add to the price of the automobile, but at least we will live longer. I am told that about half the cars now being produced will, during their life span, be involved in an injury-causing accident. Federal regulations can be made considerably stronger by an amendment which should be moved in committee, to the effect that this act shall apply to the shipment of motor vehicles, new or used, from one province to another, as though the shipment into the province were an import. A second amendment could be moved to the effect that the national safety mark be accompanied by the words, "As at the time of manufacture, assembly, importation and new car sale". The bill refers to components. I do not know whether this applies to tires or ashtrays. I believe the bill should spell out the difference between components and accessories, and that this must not be left to pure chance or individual interpretation of the safety code.

We have heard statements to the effect that Canadian standards to accompany this bill are similar to U.S. safety requirements, but I wonder just how compatible U.S. standards are for cars running on Canadian highways. South Carolina is different from Ontario. Consideration should be given to the climatic conditions, and in spelling out our safety standards we would be well advised to study the situation in countries which have conditions similar to those found in Canada. The bill is concerned primarily with the safety of the driver, the passenger, the pedestrian and the other driver. I hoped it would cover, by enforcement of strong, air pollution regulations, the safety of all persons in Canada.

History has shown time and again that major epidemics are stamped out only after major research efforts. At long last the public are beginning to realize that we are faced with an epidemic, the contributing factors being the driver, the road and the car. I am especially concerned with the third factor, the car. I do not suggest that the others are not just as important, but we in Parliament can control the car. This bill is not the answer to the problem.

With the exception of making the breathalyzer test mandatory, Bill C-137 is all we have to show in response to the deep desire of the Canadian people for something that will be effective in achieving a maximum reduction of the death and destruction on our highways. This bill is indeed a very vague document and leaves much to be desired. It is to be hoped that when it goes to the committee, the necessary amendments will be made so that when it returns to the House it will be more specific and meaningful.

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, the matter before us in Bill C-137 is safety standards for motor vehicles. This is potentially of extreme importance to millions of Canadians. Before dealing with some of the details of the proposals I should like to take a few moments to sketch-in the background of this matter.

The annual traffic toll now is 60,000 people killed and 3,650,000 injured—and many of the latter might as well be dead. In economic terms, this traffic toll represents a loss of approximately $2 million every hour of every day, of every week, of every month of every year. For our part, in Canada we kill 5,000 people every year and no less than 150,000 Canadians are injured, non-fatally, on our roads and highways. To put the last two figures in closer focus, let me put it this way: in a four-year period—say the life of a Parliament—20,000 Canadians die and 600,000 are injured on our roads.

There are three major factors involved in this warlike toll; the first is the car, the second is the driver and the third is the road condition. The bill we are considering tonight—and I compliment the minister for his very able introduction of it—seeks to do something to lower the death and injuries toll for which the car itself is specifically responsible. At this point it might be well for us to keep in mind that in North America there are now 100 million vehicles and that this number is increasing at the rate of about nine per minute.

Considering the toll and the economic drain involved in this highway war, it may be surprising that North Americans, Canadians included, have done so little to defend themselves against it. The fact is that on this continent we have all been assured for many years by the industry, which in many respects is as powerful as the nation, that what the industry wants is good for the public.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Inasmuch as the industry is producing cars for maximum sales, maximum profits and quick obsolescence, this goodness to the public is not evident. The car consumer, dazzled by even greater sex, speed and prestige appeals, and having very little control over what is produced or offered to him in the way of a motor vehicle, has taken a long time to realize that public safety is more important than private profit. However, he has finally realized this; he is on the road. He has a long way to go, but in the United States and in our country legislation of this type is an indication that there has been a realization of the situation and of what will be attempted in the future.

Bill C-137 is designed to set safety standards on cars, trucks and motor cycles entering Canada or manufactured in Canada. I thought the minister and the previous speaker both did well in outlining some of the details of the legislation. The bill is a move in the right direction, but it has its weaknesses and shortcomings. We know that auto safety legislation will bear the United States stamp of approval, but the possibility of Canadian standards varying substantially from those in the United States I believe is small.

Canadian auto safety standards will be set in Washington, where the consistent opposition of the industry has slowed down progress in this field and where the United States authorities too often have tended to accept the standards the industry dictates. On that point, in fairness to the United States authorities, I should like to mention that I have in my hand a number of releases from the office of the secretary, Department of Transportation in the United States. These show an increased awareness of the need for speedy action in protecting the United States motoring public. These releases come to my desk almost daily, and I imagine they are received by other members. Here is one:

> The federal highway administration plans to improve its motor vehicle safety standard 209 dealing with seat-belt assemblies.

This is another:

> Secretary of Transportation John A. Volpe today announced release of the first of what will be a series of monthly reports to the public on the department's most recent vehicle safety compliance activities.

Then we have this release:

> Secretary of Transportation John A. Volpe today demonstrated a modified diesel engine and exhaust system for transit buses which offers substantial improvements in eliminating pollutants, smoke, noise and odour.

I have several others. I thought I would take this opportunity to refer to the fact that in the United States, and I hope here, the department of transport has finally become aware of the pressing need for such action and is working on it. It might be of interest to us as members of this House to think back to the genesis of the bill.

It had its genesis in a previous Parliament when with the consent of the government a number of hon. members, including the hon. member who spoke last, who had private member's bills on the Order Paper with relation to one phase or another of traffic safety, took their bills off the Order Paper. The subject matter of these bills was then referred to the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. This committee held a great number of meetings at which many witnesses were heard.

This resulted in a report supported, I believe, by all members of the committee. The report finds some expression in the legislation before the House tonight. Incidentally, the proposal in respect of the breathalyzer test was part of the committee's report. I have gone into this background because as one of the members who took a bill off the Order Paper I believe that in respect of non-partisan matters this is a good way to have action taken in respect of proposals, and to have a solidified result come back to the House. That is what has happened today in respect of this bill. It also is what happened last year in respect of the breathalyzer legislation. There are areas of common thinking and common opinion in respect of which unified action can be taken which results in worth while legislation. My opinion is that this is a worth while process.

We have some criticism in respect of the bill. It would seem that safety features peculiar to the Canadian climate, such as rear window defrosters, are not likely to be included. The initial safety standards to which the bill refers are not spelled out. They are to be regulated by the Governor in Council. The 29 standards the minister mentioned are those which are now required by law in the United States. At present they act as a voluntary guide for the Canadian, United States-controlled auto industry. For the present we accept the 29 standards as a basis, but we must press for a much further extension of standards.

We want Canadian auto safety standards included specifically in this legislation. We should not despair of having this done. What can be done to force a general acceptance of standards is well illustrated by the action of New York state, where safety belts were made mandatory. Safety belts soon became standard across the continent. The same thing happened when California established tough standards for hydrocarbon and carbon monoxide emissions from vehicle motors. The standards are important and are becoming more common.

I believe a similar situation could develop here if Canadian authorities had the courage to set proper standards and enforce them. Enough cars are sold in Canada to have a significant effect on the total market. Cars sold in Canada can be fitted with safety features even if Washington fails to act. I think it is a crying shame that one need today is for such standards in respect of bumpers. Originally these appendages were designed to protect cars and passengers in case of accident.

Today, with the industry's accent on eye appeal rather than safety, and with the drive for more and more profits, bumpers perform a dual function: they are decorative devices designed to sell cars through eye appeal, and they seem to be engineered to achieve the maximum sale of spare parts.

The fact is that the fancy chrome on the front and rear of most cars is not intended to perform the bumper function. There are no standards in respect of height, and the great variety of design and shine features are completely useless as protective devices. Worse than this, however, is the fact that many bumpers have knife-edge protrusions running vertically, horizontally or both, and some have protruding snouts with the knife edges coming to a point in front of the grille. Others have a bewildering variety of knobs, gadgets and fixtures which perform no useful function to the car or its owner. All these devices perform maximum damage to both cars involved in a collision.

As far back as December, 1966, the Canadian Government Specifications Board emphasized the need to design bumpers to meet their original protective function. The board called for a standard height, flat surfaces, and shock-resistant construction. The design of the New York state safety car included such a bumper. So far, the industry has ignored bumper safety and has continued to design eye catching, cosmetic and damage-prone chrome.

Canada can set realistic standards for bumpers sold in this country—standards relating to height, surface and shock resistance. These standards should be set now, before designers of the 1972 models tell us that their new, devastating bumpers are locked into models beyond recall.

There are many phases and spheres involved in our discussion of this legislation—which is perhaps 15 or 20 years late—which is intended to grapple with car safety. There is the matter of air pollution and sound pollution in relation to the car, and I was glad to hear the minister refer to it. I remember raising the question last November in the House. I was assured by the minister's parliamentary secretary that under clauses of the proposed legislation there would be scope for prosecution in line with the legislating of vehicles whose function impairs the public health or welfare because of noise and air pollution. This is a point which we in this part of the House are most concerned about and will try to get spelled out in the legislation.

In working in the committee in trying to improve this legislation, we will keep in mind what has happened in the United States. We will think and act on the basis of the U.S. experience. We will remember that the car makers in the United States are charging higher prices, more than the actual cost of quality safety improvements. We will not forget that United States government-financed safety tests show that individual car component failures are at a rate of about 10 per cent, and we cannot overlook the fact that dozens of types of car tires have failed to comply with federal safety standards.

It seems to us important to remember that according to one expert at least, the average new car in North America has 25 to 40 deficiences, and that seat belts produced by 10 or 12 of the biggest U.S. suppliers are under investigation for what appears to be failure to meet federal standards. Let us consider this point for a minute. At 10 miles per hour, a crash between two standard model popular cars in the United States, such as you see driven around here every day, results in average estimated damage of $510 for both cars.

In addition, we believe that when we have set our car safety standards, they must not only be enforced but they must be seen to be enforced. We think that safety must not only be achieved but must be seen to be achieved by the public.

I would like to remind the minister of his reply to a question I asked last December 8. I asked, having in mind the U.S. regulation requiring manufacturers of automobiles to provide the people of the U.S. with specific information and data on the safety qualities of their vehicles, whether the minister was giving consideration to similar legislation in this country. The minister replied:

I think this is a commendable step. As soon as we have the necessary authority and a bill is passed by this House I will be more than pleased to give it consideration ... I see no reason why we should not do so.

I think it is important, if we are to have this legislation, to convince the public that we mean business and that we are going to make it work. That is why I stress the need for open action by the administration.

In summary, and in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, we support the general aim of the bill, noting its lateness and its weaknesses. It is our hope that in committee or in the House we will be able to strengthen the provisions of the bill so that they will work more for the benefit of the Canadian public. May I note, Mr. Speaker, that while I have been speaking, approximately 1,200 car accidents have taken place in North America, half a million dollars damage has been done, and 55 more cars have been produced.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I did not expect I would have to speak today on Bill C-137. However, I want to make a few remarks on the principle of the bill and to assure the minister and the House that we, members of the Ralliement créditiste, are in favour of the principle of the bill and feel it will, to a certain extent, improve safety standards on our roads. I say "to a certain extent" because, as the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather) said today, provincial governments, as the road network comes under their jurisdiction, are partly responsible for accidents occurring on them. We know to what extent roads in bad repair are responsible for accidents. Part of the responsibility for accidents must also be borne by drivers unaware of highway regulations or driving while their faculties are impaired by alcohol.

This bill also purports to improve vehicle safety standards to ensure the safety of drivers.

In order to illustrate the need for this bill, I would like to give the House information from the July-August 1969 issue of the Bulletin of the Canadian Highway Safety Council, where I found figures which do not tally with those supplied by the hon. member a moment ago. In 1968, there were 4,370 fatal accidents in which 5,254 people died and 172,795 were injured.

[Mr. Mather.]

• (9:20 p.m.)

Since so many people were injured or killed in the course of a single year, one can venture to say that more people are injured or kill on the highways than in any war.

In 1968 Canada reported 479,721 accidents in which people were injured or killed. That is enough to make us think and to prompt the government to take all the necessary measures to improve highway safety in Canada. That is its responsibility.

In 1959, for instance, 3,231 persons lost their lives and 84,445 were injured. In 1968, almost ten years later, 5,254 were killed and 172,795 were injured.

In view of the increasing number of accidents, the government was justified, even though it may have acted a little bit late, in taking appropriate measures to improve the safety of motor vehicles.

The minister said he had a list of 29 safety standards. Here is how the expression is defined in the bill:

—standards regulating the design, construction or functioning of motor vehicles and their components for the purpose of protecting persons against personal injury, impairment of health or death.

We must admit that since the appearance of the first automobile, there have been improvements in the construction of motor vehicles and the manufacturers, to a certain extent, are not too concerned about the safety of their products. Indeed, automobile manufacturers have often become big trusts more concerned with making profits than safer cars. Evidently, competition exists among car manufacturers and it prompts them to improve constantly the cars offered to their clients. However, it must also be realized that quite often we unfortunately have to pay for costly useless gadgets only to increase their profits.

I hope that the 29 security standards introduced by the minister have been selected so as to help the drivers rather than enable car manufacturers to make even more money.

I was saying a few minutes ago that the manufacturers have to a certain extent improved their vehicles from a safety point of view. For instance, the advent of shatterproof windshields was a great progress which surely prevented countless accidents. In spite of it, loss of life was caused by drivers travelling at excessive speed. However, there was continuous improvement of the braking system on cars and today we have disck brakes. We have better suspension and steering systems in cars.

Power-steering and power-brakes have greatly improved motor vehicles as such.

Sometimes, though, new accessories appear on the market, such as tubeless tires, which, in my view, have come too soon, causing many accidents, fatal ones sometimes, when they blew out, as the product had not been perfected. Today, this danger no longer exists, because tires have been improved; but, for two or three years, the car driver had to try them out himself and he was the one who had to pay.

Despite all these improvements in the manufacture of cars, some control should be exercised at the drawing-board stage. Any prototype, after it is launched, should be sujected to an inspection. In fact, I believe that this bill provides for the appointment of inspectors; they should have the necessary authority to check the specifications of the new car before it is put on the market.

The rear lights of a certain make are placed in such a way that once snow-covered, they are almost invisible, which endangers the life of the driver and of the passengers in the cars behind.

These are points which a government-appointed inspector should verify before a car is built, so that the public might be protected against such hazards.

Mr. Speaker, these are the few remarks I wanted to make to show the importance of this bill. When it is deferred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, we will be able to get more information from the minister and the experts who will perhaps be invited to advise the committee members. If the bill does not meet with the wishes of the public, we will be able to ask the minister to bring in the necessary amendments.

I have just mentioned the efforts of the manufacturers in order to increase the safety of vehicles, but one should not forget the laws that the government has enacted for this purpose.

I should like to deal at this stage with the breathalizer test which I think has not yet been applied long enough to permit us to appreciate its results, but I am convinced that it will bring an improvement on the roads. A similar provision has already been applied in England. While I was discussing it with an English Tory a few months ago he told me that though he had been opposed to such a test he had to admit that it had greatly increased highway safety in England and that, therefore, the same results could be expected in our country.

The steps provided for in the bill are meant to increase highway safety. With the co-operation of automobile drivers, automobile insurance rates will decrease or, at least, will not increase, as they have over the past years.

For these reasons, we ought to concur in the motion for second reading and reference of the bill to a committee for study.

[English]

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about this piece of legislation. In all fairness, I think one should first point out that it is new legislation; it is not legislation which just re-enacts a measure which has been in operation. I was interested in the minister's remark that the department has gone to the trouble of researching 29 standards which will apply immediately the act is promulgated.

I was disappointed that clause 7 of the bill suggests that regulations will be drawn up. I think the 29 standards should have been examined more carefully, because I do not like buying a pig in a poke. I suppose we shall have to trust the judgment of those who will be responsible for administrating the 29 standards.

The minister dealt with the question of standards and said they will be much the same as those in the United States. Because of our different climatic conditions, our cold winters, our frosts, our methods of road-heating and so on, these standards may have to be adjusted.

The minister did not say what research would be conducted into these standards. Nowhere in the bill does it say that the branch of government responsible for research will examine the application of the 29 standards and ascertain whether, for instance, six or seven additional standards should be added in view of the winters and summers we have in this country. Before passing this legislation we should know whether bodies like the National Research Council will study these standards.

In the past the government has frowned on research, and there is an indication that this is the thinking with respect to this legislation. The former minister of transport set up what was called, I believe, an engineering institute. It was given $250,000 and told to study road safety matters. That institute has not yet brought down its report; it is still being typed. But we have before us a piece of legislation dealing with this very matter.

Before the bill receives second reading and goes to committee, I ask this simple question: Will the members of this engineering institute, which cost $250,000 to set up, be heard by the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, so that the committee may determine whether pertinent standards relating to highway hazards have been covered by this legislation? I bring my question to the attention of the minister, the chairman of the committee and to all hon. members of the House. We may derive some benefit from the studies of the institute.

According to the minister, these 29 standards are initial standards only and may be adjusted as time goes on. I throw the idea out that perhaps there should be a continuing study of this whole question. I think the engineering institute which was set up to study road safety matters should continue its study. All its members need not be kept on; perhaps only one or two of the university professors who worked on the original study should be retained. In any event, there should be a continuing examination of standards by a body whose job is to see whether this legislation will do what we want done.

As I said, it is a new piece of legislation; it is not a re-drafting or a re-enactment of something already on our statute books. Surely there is merit in having a body continuing a study of these standards. Similar bodies should undertake continuing studies of health standards, pollution standards and, as the minister suggested, noise standards.

The minister dealt partially with the question of farm tractors. He said that if they are licensed to go on highways, they will be covered, and if they are not so licensed, they may not be covered. As I understand it, any vehicle licensed to go on a highway will be covered by this legislation. The minister raised the question of snowmobiles which may or may not be licensed to go on highways. In many cases they are prohibited from going on highways. Many provinces across Canada are becoming increasingly concerned about the safety of snowmobiles and the hazards they pose to motorists and pedestrians. So far as I know, the bill does not deal with this matter; but perhaps members of the committee will examine it at the appropriate time. I understand that the list of 29 standards referred to will be included in today's Hansard.

Another aspect of the bill which disturbs me may be considered in committee and will no doubt be considered by those who will be responsible for enforcing the act. Unquestionably, we must have guidelines or safety standards for the manufacturer or importer, but the question is: Should we apply those standards and penalties to a distributor? The manufacturer makes the product and ships it to someone to sell. The importer imports the product and hands it over to a distributor. I wonder whether we should police the distributor as well as the manufacturer and importer. I think that the less policing there is, the better.

Mr. Jamieson: Only when importing the goods is the distributor liable in that respect.

Mr. Horner: We would then be calling the importer a distributor; that would be the effect. In my opinion an importer should import.

Let us consider farm tractors. Today component parts of farm tractors are being imported into Canada and the North American market in general and made into complete units. From my reading of the bill, it deals with component parts but not with the whole automobile. If a component part is unsafe, the inspector can make a decision about it.

Although these parts are sold by a distributor, one cannot say that in that sense he is the manufacturer; nor should he be treated as the manufacturer. I suggest that that aspect must be looked into, because I am concerned that some provision of this bill will apply to plain, ordinary distributors. I am also concerned about the application of some provisions to a manufacturer, importer and distributor.

Nowhere in the bill does it say that there will be a right of appeal. To whom will they appeal? Will they appeal to the minister? One would naturally think this would be the case, because inspectors are appointed by him.

I am surprised that in connection with a major piece of legislation, one which will be on the statute books for a long time, the minister has not felt called upon to make provision for much greater continuity with regard to the process of inspection. I am surprised that no provision has been made for the training of inspectors and the continuity of their employment. I have never been particularly in favour of expanding the civil service, but I would point out that knowledge and continuity are built into that organization, a regular body to which people are hired by a commission.

I caution hon. members against accepting the use of the minister's prerogative to appoint inspectors at his whim. If an inspector does what the minister says he should do, if he likes his work and finds it inspiring, he will stay in that occupation. But will the minister be as thorough as he should be in guiding the inspectors? Will he be as thorough as he should be in ensuring that the inspectors are dutifully doing their jobs?

I recognize that the minister is a very competent and capable person, but I do not think his job allows him time in which to watch over the situation properly. Meanwhile, we are being asked to study a piece of legislation which concerns the safety of all our citizens who use the highway, and we are told the inspectors responsible for these 29 standards will be selected on what appears to me to be a very temporary and limited basis. I do not believe this is satisfactory.

The purpose of the legislation is good; there is no question in my mind about that. It will call for dutiful, watchful and patient inspectors with a love for their work and a regard for the purposes of the bill. As it stands, the bill smells of political patronage at the choice and whim of the minister. In this particular minister I have complete confidence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: But he may change tomorrow. I may see signs of political partisanship in his judgment. The next week it may be worse. The month after that it may be worse still, and I may become suspicious; though I am not normally a suspicious man.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: A new minister might be appointed tomorrow. The previous minister of transport resigned; he got fed up with the job. He wanted to sit as an independent backbencher in the Liberal Party because they have so much fun over there; they can participate so much. The directorate of road safety, hired and paid by this government, was set up by the former minister of transport. But that hon. member became so fed up with the job that he quit. So what assurance do we have about the permanence of the present minister, when we consider the nature of the job and the hazardous conditions which exist in his party? This is why I tell the hon. gentleman: rest assured that when this subject comes up in the Transport Committee, that is, the question of inspectors appointed at his discretion, we intend to go into it at length. I tell him, also, that the whole question of the 29 standards, the research work necessary to draft them, and any addition safety standards which seem likely to be called for will also be considered at length.

Pollution of the air by automobiles will become one of our major problems as we move into the coming decade. I believe that health and safety on the highways has been one of the major problems of the last 20 years, and that its seriousness will continue to grow. It is the duty of hon. members to examine this new piece of legislation to ensure that the measures proposed are not mere window-dressing to create a good image or to satisfy public demand, but that they will in fact bring substantial benefit, up-dated from time to time as necessary to meet changing circumstances and standards.

The whole question of pollution will be under continuous examination. We have seen standards as they apply to automobiles upgraded regularly during the past five or six years. It may be that in 1971 and 1972 vehicles manufactured and sold in the United States will have to conform with even stricter standards as far as anti-pollution devices are concerned. This illustrates the need for continuity in research, and is another reason for examining carefully the whole question of making appointments at the discretion of the minister. I do not believe that appointments made in this way are in line with the purpose of this bill, which is the safety of highway traffic for all who drive vehicles on our roads.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): This is a very important bill, Mr. Speaker, and I believe it will arouse a great deal of interest among Canadians. It is likely to have its ups and downs before it becomes effective in eliminating some of the carnage which takes place on our highways.

It is interesting to reflect that Mr. Ralph Nader and the United States "Consumer Report" have probably been more responsible for promoting recognition among the general public of the features which are unsafe in automobiles than have any of the investigations conducted in Canada or in the United States. The one thing which both depended upon was the force of public opinion. In the course of this debate, during which a number of interesting comments were made, the National Press Club was not represented. There is a difference of opinion as to whether the attractive section of the press gallery can be counted part of that institution.

The public will not regard the safety measures being proposed as necessary unless they can be convinced that safety is a major factor in the preservation of their lives. While for the last five or six years I have not done very much travelling, I have been on the highway frequently and driven cars that were considered to have the safest possible equipment—for example, seat-belts. For four or five years I owned a Volvo and now I own another car. Although both of them had a safety-harness over the shoulder, I can honestly say that I never wore the harness in either car.

This is an admission that I am not convinced that this is necessary equipment or that it is a selling point. A number of people have asked me whether I consider the Volvo the safest vehicle on the road, and I have said it may be. They ask how I like the shoulder-harness, but I have had to reply that I have never tried it on. My son used it, but it seemed a difficult procedure.

My present car has a very elaborate safety-harness. It is an imported car and meets the safety standards not only of the United States but of European countries. I tried on the harness once but found it six or eight inches too short for me. But my point is that the public are not yet convinced that car safety is their business. Until the average man wants safety features in his automobile, I suggest our cars will not be safe.

We have always been suckers for United States advertising on television. We buy aspirins because people in the United States do. We buy Oldsmobiles because they do, and we even buy Cadillacs because they do. Continually we are bombarded with advertising claiming that U.S. cars are good cars and are the kind of cars that we should buy.

As a colleague of mine said the other day, although it is important to have safety devices on cars, it is equally important that we should be able to start our cars. Certainly we will not get into any trouble on the road if our cars do not start. My colleague was pointing out that the car that he had—and also the car I had at the time—was failing to start.

[Mr. Peters.]

It seems to me that what is required is a car made in Canada which incorporates Canadian safety equipment. I recall driving down the Queensway the other night and observing in a distance of about eight blocks five or six cars that had stalled. This had created a traffic hazard that was serious, and it would have been quite easy to cause a 50-car pile-up. It seems to me that this is certainly a factor that should be taken into account when considering car safety.

For example, in Florida a car would probably require only 100 amps to start it. The battery will be required to deliver about 40 amps for roughly two and a half minutes, and then can settle down to supplying amperage to the coil, the points, the sparking plugs and all the rest of it. Gasoline that we buy in Canada does not burn well at a temperature of 40 below zero; it is primarily intended for climates warmer than ours. But I suggest that at least our cars should have installed in them batteries which are adequate for our conditions instead of those obtaining in the tropics.

I recall observing a car parked outside the building the other night which a member of the protective staff was helping to start. When he lifted the hood he found the wind had blown up under the car and covered the engine, the distributor and ignition wiring, with three or four inches of snow. Consequently, it would not start. After the snow was brushed away, the car started.

I remember the day when I used to drive model T Fords. I am a contemporary of other members here who did the same. As a kid I bought a lot of model T's, and even that particular car was provided with splash pans between the engine and fenders to stop debris slushing up onto the ignition wires, which was precisely the trouble with the cars that were stalled on the Queensway the other night.

I suggest safety features do not just involve seat-belts, reinforced doors and safety windows. In the wintertime in Canada you turn the car one way by looking out of the window, and the other way by looking through your rear-view mirror. They now heat rear windows with a built-in element. However, they are not designed for Canadian conditions but for Florida and California. My own car is full of junk under the hood to prevent smog in California. There are six or eight contraptions I have never seen before—and I have been doing mechanical work for a number of years. There are wires and hoses going in all directions. Cars today do not give the better gas mileage they are supposed to, but instead cut down smog. If you want to take off the air filter and put Quickstart in the carburettor, you will find it difficult even to reach the carburettor.

We are not building cars that are safe in Canadian conditions. I suggest we should have full control over cars at all times, instead of being forced to reach down to push in a choke or to scrape snow off the windows and all the rest of it. Certainly in Ottawa the roads do not lend themselves to devoting much time to the mechanics of driving.

In Canada there has been developed a studded tire that is really useful only about three times a year, though it has done some good work. It was introduced with a great promotional drive. The department of highways now tells us that it will cost a fortune to repair the roads and they will have to crack down on studs. These studs work well when changing from summer to winter driving conditions. When we get the first two inches of snow on the roads and are not sure how to drive, studded tires are very useful.

Mr. Jamieson: Ten o'clock. You are slipping the clutch.

Mr. Peters: Yes, I used to do that and it worked well. I see there is another little device for tires, which costs 99 cents and is a little like the old trucker's trick of dumping Javex on his tires in really bad weather.

The minister has outlined 29 safety points. These are not Canadian safety points but United States points. I do not criticize the minister for this; I think "Consumers Report" has detailed sufficient failings in the United States in the matter of car safety to easily compile a list of 29 inspection points.

What is required in Canada is a safety code which will enforce the installation in cars of devices that make them safe to drive on our roads, particularly in the winter time. To date no such car has been made in Canada. Even my Volvo that is imported from Sweden is unsuited to winter conditions in northern Ontario. I suggest the minister will be required to add many other points to his list to meet Canadian safety requirements, and in this regard he will receive the support of many members and of the public in general.

May I call it ten o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been made.

AIR TRANSPORT—DISCONTINUANCE OF WESTERN MANITOBA SERVICE BY TRANSAIR

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the minister is in the House tonight, because I want to discuss briefly a question which I posed on January 14 regarding regional air policy in western Canada. In response to the question the minister indicated that as a result of recent submissions by Transair, which is the regional carrier for the Manitoba and Saskatchewan region, he would be coming up with a solution which would be entirely satisfactory to myself and those I represent. The reason I pursue the matter tonight is that as a result of a series of discussions and negotiations the picture has changed somewhat since January 14, and certain points need clarifying.

I should like to point out to the minister, and I am sure he is aware of this, that the history of the regional policy in this part of Canada starts with a period when Air Canada provided a class 1 service. It was withdrawn, and Air Canada was replaced by Transair under subsidy. Finally, there was a removal of the subsidy and Transair was carrying on the class 1 service without subsidy.

I stress the importance of the continuance of class 1 service because there is uncertainty as to whether airport operating subsidies which apply to regional carriers and large airports used by carriers providing class 1 service, as well as subsidies for a passenger terminal building which is now under discussion, are to be tied in with the continuation of class 1 service.

As a result of discussions it has been indicated that the freight and air express business on this western lateral of the regional service has been increasing substantially during the past year or so. This is directly related to the encouraging growth of the industry in this part of the west under the incentive of the regional development program. It would seem to me that adequate air transportation is basic to a regional incentive program and would run along parallel lines.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

During the discussions it became apparent that Transair has agreed to continue this class 1 service on the western lateral. The only point in doubt is whether it will continue service into the city of Brandon. Brandon is the second city in Manitoba; it has been designated as the second city for industrial growth in that province. It would be a strange anomaly if Brandon was overflown in the interests of Regina, Saskatchewan, particularly when it can be demonstrated that most of the revenue is generated between Winnipeg and Brandon, not Regina and Winnipeg.

An hon. Member: There are only coyotes there.

Mr. Dinsdale: This service is provided by four daily flights with Air Canada DC-9s. I think one can understand that when there is a choice between pure jet and turbo jet, the DC-9 service will get the business. I hope the minister—I now he is giving this matter very serious consideration—will be able to develop a policy in such a way that the revenues and losses will be equalized over the entire system.

For example, extra revenue from airmail contracts, and the possibility of an extension of this, if the eastern lateral is to go through the Lakehead to Toronto might be taken into consideration. I would suggest that an alternate service such as a seven-passenger light aircraft service would be quite inadequate to meet the industrial needs of this part of western Manitoba. Perhaps a seven-passenger service would be an excellent means by which to supplement the A-class service already in operation, and which obviously is to continue on the western lateral, so that the best connection could be made with the connecting flights out of the city of Winnipeg.

I know this would tap the substantial passenger potential out of western Manitoba which has not yet been realized, largely because Transair has been so busy surviving that it has not been able to develop an adequate market policy. The present discussion and considerations provide an opportunity to establish a regional air policy that would really work for this important developing part of Canada. I am sure under the leadership of the minister this will be achieved, and I trust the hon. gentleman will be able to give us this assurance tonight.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am always more than pleased to try to the best of my ability to accommodate the honourable and distinguished member. Indeed, he and I have had a number of exchanges on this matter over the past weeks. I believe it was at my suggestion that the Canadian Transport Commission contacted him earlier in order to give him some sort of a progress report. Despite my willingness to discuss the matter with the hon. member, may I suggest it would have been better if this exchange had occurred tomorrow night, because I understand the Canadian Transport Commission is to release its decision with regard to prairie air services some time subsequent to 10 a.m. tomorrow.

A number of hearings have been held with the air lines, and because of the hon. member's efforts and personal interest in this matter many informal discussions have been held. I do not wish to anticipate, but it is my understanding that no service will be discontinued and that the modifications and adjustments contemplated will result in a more viable service being provided to all points now being served. I think a form of rationalization has been undertaken. Once the decision of the Canadian Transport Commission is released, if my hon. friend is still of the opinion that the matter ought to be pursued further I will do whatever is in my competence to do. In the interim I think his efforts have been fruitful and I hope the results tomorrow morning will be to his satisfaction.

PENITENTIARIES—GUARDS' PAY INCREASE—OFFER BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, on December 8 I asked a question of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury). The question was as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General of Canada.

Eventually it got to the President of the Treasury Board.

> In view of the offer by the government of a 2 per cent pay increase for prison guards in 34 federal institutions, would the minister advise the House whether he considers this offer of 2 per cent to be a reasonable basis for contract negotiations?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest that the question as asked is not in order.

Mr. Skoberg: The reason I placed this matter on the late-night show so many weeks later is that it relates to the fact that the Public Service Alliance has signed a three-year contract with Treasury Board which provides for a 22.3 per cent raise for 2,000 guards and training officers at federal penal institutions, as reported in the Globe and Mail of January 15. I believe it is very important that we look at the whole area surrounding this situation. When we pick up the paper tonight we see an item to the effect that a number of CBC workers were fired because of irregularities.

If we look back to a very short time ago we will realize that the civil servants of this country were unquestionably being subjected to intimidation by the federal government. A typical example of this is the situation of people with 25 to 30 years' seniority who are receiving letters from the CNR advising them: We regret to advise you that your services are no longer required.

The only question I should like to put tonight is: Are we really trying to negotiate, or to encourage a confrontation? I should like to refer to the situation created by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) in so far as his fine specialists are concerned. The minister says he backs the force. The following appeared in a press article:

Labour Minister Bryce Mackasey is confident his new industrial peacekeeping force of five industry specialists will not get chewed up in battles between labour and management.

For one thing, the force will be backed up by Bryce Mackasey.

At a news conference today, the Labour Minister explained that the specialists will maintain regular contacts with senior union and management officials and will be able to identify obstacles to agreement long before the two parties collide in bargaining sessions.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the President of the Treasury Board, that he should ask the Minister of Labour to assign immediately one of these specialists to the federal negotiating bargaining table, because I am certain that in the present circumstances collective bargaining will never be achieved so far as this government is concerned.

My only purpose tonight in bringing this matter forward is to try to impress upon the government its importance. According to the news release, the Minister of Labour suggested that the experience with the traditional approach to conciliation has shown that government assistance frequently came too late to prevent the development of serious disputes. In a newspaper article we find the following:

Treasury Board President C. M. Drury said Tuesday that "every effort" is being made to conclude a satisfactory working agreement with 1,500 firemen at federal airports in Canada—

Mr. Drury said that the firemen had the option of seeking arbitration.

I suggest to the President of the Treasury Board that if we are looking for confrontation, that is all we will get. But, surely, to offer a 2 per cent increase to the penal institution employees, after which they end up with a 22.3 per cent increase, demonstrates that collective bargaining in the true sense of the word has not taken place. The Minister of Labour said:

By the time one of the parties had asked for conciliation, in the manner required by law, positions had often hardened to a degree that provided little room for manoeuvre.

Again I suggest that this is exactly the position in which the government finds itself today. The minister also said:

Introduction of the new industry specialist program reflects a determination to break with the traditional approach—to shift the emphasis from the settlement to the prevention of disputes.

I sincerely suggest to the minister that to achieve a settlement of disputes requires negotiation. I believe there is a general feeling of appreciation for this approach, but I also suggest in all humility that the Minister of Labour assign one of his new industrial specialists to beguile the President of the Treasury Board in order that the latter may appreciate what is going on in so far as negotiations are concerned. I am sure that ultimately he will convince the President of the Treasury Board that sincere relations cannot be entered into as frivolously and as temporarily as has recently been the case. I suggest that this country cannot stand this type of collective negotiation. Either we are sincere in setting up negotiations, or we will cause a confrontation. In conclusion let me quote the Minister of Labour, who said:

To maintain contact with the principal management officials and trade union leaders in a specified industry or industries and become familiar with their organizations, policies and practices—

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, the greatest mistake the Minister of Labour has made to date is that he has not assigned one specialist to ensure that there will be collective bargaining as we know it.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that what I have just listened to is a request for information. The hon. member has been giving advice.

An hon. Member: How about an explanation?

Mr. Drury: As he says, he is making a plea to incorporate into the collective bargaining process, the conciliation officers of the federal Department of Labour. He also suggests that on the basis of a report from an undisclosed source that an offer of a 2 per cent salary increase had been made to penitentiary services. That was in his view proof positive of the insincerity of Treasury Board officers in their collective bargaining.

Mr. Benjamin: That is in Hansard.

Mr. Drury: He suggests, furthermore, that we should never have collective bargaining in the public service unless officers of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) are assigned to in effect, I suppose, conduct the bargaining process. I think the hon. gentleman should know that collective bargaining in the public service is substantially by mutual agreement between bargaining agents and the Treasury Board, to be conducted in private. As a consequence, any information regarding negotiations is assumed to be speculation or rumour, and those who rely on it are allowing themselves to be misled.

This was a long and sincere collective bargaining process. It resulted in an agreement which was, I am advised, satisfactory to the penitentiary staffs and is a clear example of the success, not the failure, of the collective bargaining process. I have had relatively little experience with collective bargaining, but I do know that the party who states at the outset its final position and does not budge from that is accused, and rightly so, of inflexibility. The tactic is to start out with something considerably less than what will ultimately be offered. The representatives on the other side of the bargaining unit ask for considerably more than they hope to get.

DISTINGUISHED SERVICE AWARDS—REFERENCE OF INTERDEPARTMENTAL STUDY TO COMMITTEE

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpèque): Mr. Speaker, during the last few days a number of questions have been asked of the ministry about the matter of distinguished service awards. While the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) has been very forthright in stating, "There is no intention whatever to downgrade the awards which gallant and brave Canadians have received in the past from the sovereign", it seems clear that the minister has not been kept fully informed or taken completely into the confidence, apparently, of the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) or whoever is in charge of an interdepartmental committee studying this matter.

I regret to say that it seems the Secretary of State, by his evasive answers, wishes to hide something. I would like to be assured of three things, Mr. Speaker, and I will try to be brief. One, I think, can be taken for granted but it is well it should be on record, and that is the decorations of a given grade awarded in the past will not be downgraded by any past or future award. To take an extreme example, I want to be assured that our Sergeant-at-Arms will never be requested to wear his Canadian Volunteer Service Medal ahead of his Victoria Cross.

Second, I hope that the parliamentary secretary can assure me that Commonwealth decorations, especially the ones instituted specifically for the armed forces for peacetime acts of gallantry, will continue to be awarded to the Canadian forces. I am thinking of such decorations as the Air Force Cross. It may be that since this government has done away with the Royal Canadian Air Force, it may feel that its role in life is to do away with the Air Force Cross as well and thus tidy-up the matter. Frankly, I do not see it that way. Surely, if members of the armed forces wear with pride the United Nations service ribbons, it is at least as fitting that Commonwealth awards should continue to be granted.

Third, I should like to be assured that any further Canadian orders or awards which may be instituted will be suitably integrated as to precedence with Commonwealth awards which have been or may be awarded to Canadians by the Crown on the recommendation of the Canadian government, so that it will be recognized, as it was for instance, that the Victoria Cross and the George Cross take precedence over the Order of Canada which was instituted in 1967. Furthermore, Canadians want to be assured that a bigot has not set the termites gnawing away at the framework of our nation in some dark corner of the Department of the Secretary of State.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: The traditions and practises of a nation in the matter of awards are part of the symbolism which gives its citizens a feeling of belonging to their country or to their brand of civilization. There are many traditions that members of the Commonwealth, especially the older members such as Australia, New Zealand, Canada and Great Britain, have built up together. We as a country will be poorer if we go on tearing them down on the basis of some narrow-minded bigotry growing out of a shortsighted and provincial immaturity.

This matter, Mr. Speaker, is one on which there should be a measure of consensus, if that is at all possible. It should have the approval of Canadians generally. It should be resolved in a manner that will ensure a continuation of that approval. Therefore, I hope that before any final decision is taken by the government in this matter, the report of the committee will be studied by a standing or special committee of this House.

Mr. D. W. Gross (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the hon. member made at the outset of his remarks tonight a statement to the effect that the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) has something to hide. I think that is eminently unfair to the Secretary of State. Having said that, I very much regret that I am unable to give the hon. member a complete answer to his question, much as I should like to do so.

The fact is that the entire subject he has raised is still under active consideration by the decorations committee. In these circumstances I can do little more than repeat the reply given by my minister to what was essentially the same question asked by the hon. member last Tuesday. The reply is to be found at page 2864 of Hansard. For greater certainty, may I also refer the hon. member to the answer given by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) to a somewhat similar question asked by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair) on January 16, which is to be found on page 2478 of Hansard.

Since I am allowed to speak for only three minutes, I will not read those replies. I have nothing to add except to say that we shall both have to wait until these matters now under consideration are decided. I trust that the deliberations will be concluded soon. I feel sure that when the announcement is made through the traditional channels, it will be very satisfactory to my hon. friend and all members of the House.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES (WINNIPEG NORTH CENTRE)—NATIONAL PRESS CLUB INVITATION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I must again rise on a question of privilege. I do so with reference to a document that has come to all of us. It purports to be from my friend, Bruce Phillips, president of the National Press Club.

At the outset I should like to make it clear that all of us in this place know the difference between the National Press Club and the Parliamentary Press Gallery. As I say, this matter relates to the National Press Club which has its quarters in a government building located at 150 Wellington Street. This letter starts off as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate and the House of Commons,

Gentlemen:

All of us received a copy of this letter. I checked with my friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis). She received it although it was just stuck in the box with no envelope. She does not know whether she is invited or not. She received the document but she is no gentleman. I understand the same dilemma obtains in respect of women members of the other place.

I know that in grammatical terms the masculine includes both masculine and feminine. I know that in the Interpretation Act the masculine is to be read both ways. But in the context of current events and in view of the fact that the National Press Club has in its constitution a ban on the admission of women to its membership and in view of the fact that this matter has been raised several times recently in Parliament, it seems to me this document is either an act of gross discourtesy to Members of Parliament, particularly the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and women members of the other place, or it is a calculated insult because of the questions we have raised about this matter.

The document is an invitation to all of us to attend an event which I should like to attend, for it has to do with recalling the anniversary of the night the House burned, but how can I? I point out that one reason for this question of privilege is that in the letter there is a specific request that the Speakers of both Houses and the leaders of all parties be in attendance. It seems to me that so long as the National Press Club practises discrimination we should consider seriously whether with propriety any of us, including Your Honour, can accept this invitation. I have not drafted a motion—

Mr. McIlraith: You are seeking publicity.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —because it could be that this document is a fraud. It could be that we should assume that the National Press Club would not be so stupid as to send this out. In that case maybe what is necessary is an investigation to find out how this document came into our possession. In any event, I believe the matter should be considered by all of us.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

PUBLIC SERVICE

STATEMENT ON ISSUING OF RETROACTIVE PAY CHEQUES

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to advise the House that most of the delays and difficulties which have recently been experienced in the government pay system have now been resolved.

In making this statement I would like to express my thanks to several hon. members who have brought particular pay problems and particular cases to our attention.

Mr. Baldwin: It is our pleasure.

Mr. Richardson: At this time I would like to report on the present position in the Central Pay Office and also on the government's plans for continuing to improve the pay process.

Public Service Retroactive Pay Cheques

During the past year the government has signed 78 collective agreements covering 185,000 of its employees. In addition, the government has negotiated another 36 collective agreements for employees in Crown Corporations, boards and agencies. Most of these agreements include retroactive pay increases back as far as two years or more. This enormous volume of pay changes imposed an unprecedented burden on the departmental personnel officers and also on our paying offices. The size of this burden is made evident by the fact that during the last nine months of 1969 the Central Pay Office alone issued over 100,000 cheques for retroactive pay increases.

It should be emphasized that at no time did the government pay offices fail to process and to issue regular salary cheques on time. The delays which have been of concern to the government and understandably frustrating to some of its employees have been with respect to the delays in receiving increases in pay.

When the backlog of pay changes began to climb as a result of the increasing flow of collective agreements, a number of steps were taken. We employed 75 additional personnel, we worked an average of 3,000 hours a month overtime, and we strengthened the management of the paying offices.

The result of these actions was that by last November we were able to meet our initial objective of having the paying offices in a current position with respect to the implementation of collective agreements; that is to say, if some employees were not receiving on time retroactive pay increases due them under a collective agreement, the problem was not in the paying offices but in other areas of the pay process. Every effort has been made through the personnel offices of the departments and through the staff associations to identify such cases and to take immediate action.

As soon as we were up to date with the implementation of collective agreements we were able to turn our full attention to the processing of normal pay changes, that is, pay changes for employees who are promoted, who go on leave without pay, who retire, or who change their medical or other deductions. Every month our paying offices receive more than 75,000 pay changes of this type. The backlog of these normal pay changes had built up to a serious level, but I am pleased to be able to report to the House that it has been reduced steadily in recent weeks and that within the next few days the backlog will be down to a very small number of unresolved cases.

Now that the current difficulties have been overcome—I want to emphasize this—because of the hard work of many people in the departments and in the paying offices, we have an opportunity to undertake a fundamental examination of the pay system. To make the most of this opportunity, and to help make certain that the recent difficulties will not recur, I intend to engage a firm of Canadian management consultants to examine all aspects of the government's pay system.

Mr. Hees: Here we go again, more Liberals on the pay roll.

Mr. Richardson: My intention is that our pay system should be re-examined in terms of its responsiveness to the present system of collective bargaining in the Public Service, in terms of its relationship to over-all government personnel policy, and in terms of the ease with which an individual can understand how his salary cheque is calculated. It is my hope that representatives of the staff associations will be actively involved in this examination to express the point of view of their members.

I hope I have made it clear, Mr. Speaker, that we intend to do everything possible to ensure that the pay system measures up to the high standards of the government and to the understandably high expectations of its employees.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to note the minister now feels that the Central Pay Office is in a current position with respect to the implementation of collective agreements. I wonder whether the minister is referring to agreements affecting employees in the Ottawa area or across Canada, for I was informed this week that 13 employees in my constituency have been waiting since last May for both their retroactive pay and increases under a collective agreement and, unless they received them in the mail today, are still waiting to secure the increases agreed upon.

The minister points out the large volume of collective agreements and the tremendous volume of changes in the amount employees have received both in pay increases and retroactive pay, but there can be no excuse for the very substantial delays that have developed between the signing of agreements and the date on which such increases have been effected. The government knew what would transpire when the system was altered but, like everything else this government does, they did not prepare themselves for the situation that did in fact develop and as a result people have suffered and continue to suffer.

Now the minister informs us that the future will be bright because another firm of management consultants will be hired by the government to examine all aspects of the government pay system. At this late date the minister has decided that the whole pay structure system should be examined. If the government continues to hire management consultants at the present rate we will soon be informed that they are hiring a firm of management consultants to study the work of the multitude of management consultant firms they have retained to study the oversights they have failed to anticipate when they undertook changes. If management consultants were required by the Department of Supply and Services, they were required before and not after they got into this mess, and surely they should be able to determine now within the government service, and without the additional expense of outside consultants, what should be done. The Department of Supply and Services should be setting an example for other departments in examining and solving problems rather than shifting the onus to agencies outside the government to solve problems that should not have been allowed to develop with such severity and dislocation in the first place.

The minister must know that his explanation is far from satisfactory with regard to the inability of his department to deal with the situation that developed. Certainly the 185,000 employees know this to be the case.

Because of the inability of the government to anticipate the problems that would ensue the taxpayers of this nation have been burdened with the expense of an additional 75 employees and payment for 3,000 hours of overtime. This, Mr. Speaker, is just not good enough and indicates the inability of this government to cope with the problems of the day.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the Minister of Supply and Services for providing us two or three hours ago with a copy of this statement and I thank him for making it in the House this morning.

• (11:20 a.m.)

Whether or not the delays and difficulties which have been experienced recently have been resolved will be established, I imagine, within hours. If it is true, we will not hear anything about the matter but if it is not true we will continue to hear from those who have not got their retroactive pay cheques.

Other than that initial comment, there are three brief remarks I should like to make. First, I join with the Minister of Supply and Services in criticizing the other areas of government that have been far too slow with respect to the matter of pay increases. As the minister has said on two or three occasions, he is only at the end of the pipeline. It is somewhere downstream, or upstream, that the delay has taken place. I earnestly hope that the business of getting collective bargaining going and pay increases put into effect will be speeded up and that the Minister of Supply and Services will not have to level this criticism against other areas of government.

The second of my three comments I suppose has been made for me by the preceding speaker. I, too, am afraid that this firm of management consultants will get in the way. We shall have to have more of them. In the end a white paper will have to be put out and, eventually, we shall have to have a reference to a committee. It seems to me that there ought to be a simpler way of straightening out this problem.

My third comment is that the paragraph I like best in the statement is the penultimate one which says:

> It is my hope that representatives of the staff associations will be actively involved in this examination to express the point of view of their members.

I trust that the minister will turn that hope into an assertion. I have noted with interest the comments on this question which have been made, notably by the Public Service Alliance of Canada and the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada. They have made it clear that the main trouble is not with those who are working in the Central Pay Office but with the system, and they have ideas as to how the system can be improved. Their approach to this question is much more practical than that of management consultants. I hope the minister will not just hope that these people can get involved but will bring them in very actively and obtain their assistance in straightening out this situation so that these delays may be a thing of the past.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the minister for sending us the French version of the statement he has just made.

We are pleased with the improvement mentioned by the minister and with the fact that the Treasury Board has always performed his task well. In his statement, the minister points out that the complaints by hon. members were given careful consideration. It is to the credit of the minister and for us encouragement to keep on asking for justice in Parliament.

We must, however, deplore the delay in payment of the 7 per cent premium to all bilingual employees. This delay, to my mind unjustified, does not further the cause of good understanding in Canada. I therefore urge the minister to give this problem special attention, particularly in the case of members of the House of Commons Protective Service who receive no recognition for being bilingual. It is so satisfying to French-speaking visitors to be welcomed in French in the parliament buildings that I feel special attention should be given to these guards who have long been deprived of something to which they are entitled.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

COMPLETION OF COMMITTEE INQUIRY INTO PARAGRAPH 101 OF AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the representatives of the parties with respect to a possible order of the House which would permit the Public Accounts Committee to complete the work it had under way during the previous session. I think there might be found to be general agreement for an order of the House in the following terms:

That a copy of the Minutes of the Proceedings and Evidence of, and all papers produced before, the Standing Committee on Public Accounts during the first session of the twenty-eighth Parliament in relation to the committee's inquiry into paragraph 101 of the Auditor General's report for the year ended March 31, 1967, be laid before the House and referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

If there is agreement, Mr. Speaker, perhaps that could be made an order of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL DEFENCE

AUTHORIZATION TO SUBCOMMITTEE TO TRAVEL OUTSIDE CANADA

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there have also been discussions among representatives of the parties in respect of the work of the Maritime Forces Subcommittee of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. I think there might also be agreement to the following order:

That the members who comprise the Subcommittee on Maritime Forces of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence be granted leave to travel outside Canada between February 15 and February 17, 1970, namely to Norfolk, Virginia, for the purpose of visiting the Supreme Allied Commander Atlantic, and Washington, D.C., and that the necessary supporting staff accompany them.

Perhaps that could also be made an order.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House agree to the order in the terms proposed by the President of the Privy Council?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CROUSE—STATEMENT OUTSIDE HOUSE BY MINISTER OF FISHERIES ON ATLANTIC COAST SEAL FISHERY

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting the rights and privileges of every member of the House.

At nine o'clock this morning the Minister of Fisheries held a press conference outside this House, and at that time he made a statement on the Atlantic coast seal fishery and the outcome of discussions he has held on this important matter with the Norwegian Minister of Fisheries. I contend that the Minister of Fisheries, in following this course, has been discourteous to the elected representatives of the people of Atlantic Canada and to the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Crouse: We are thereby prevented from replying to his statement. By making the statement outside the House the Minister of Fisheries has held Parliament in contempt. This is not the first time the minister has acted in an arbitrary manner with regard to announcing regulations of concern to the sealing industry. In fact, he completely ignored a unanimous recommendation by the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry in respect of this industry which is of vital importance to the economy of Atlantic Canada.

In our opinion, if the Minister of Fisheries had any respect for Parliament he would have waited two hours more and made his statement in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I am rising more on a question of privilege than in response to what one might call the substance of that charge. The hon. member has said that I have completely disregarded a recommendation of a committee of this House. Nothing could be farther from the truth. That committee recommended that the sealing hunt continue and it is continuing.

Mr. McGrath: You have destroyed the industry.

Mr. Davis: It recommended protection by certain conservation measures. These precautions have also been incorporated in the arrangements we have made in recent months. We have followed the recommendations of the committee of this House to the letter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: A misleading and false statement.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for South Shore has raised a matter by way of a question of privilege. I think he will recognize that there is not a question of privilege. In any event there has been no motion proposed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In connection with the hon. member's purported question of privilege I would make the ruling that it is not a question of privilege and I should not think the matter should be pursued further.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise on a point of order in reference to statements made on motions. In doing so I would refer to page 9 of the Standing Orders where the kind of statements that can be made is outlined. It is my personal view as a member of the House that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration yesterday and the Minister of Supply and Services today did not follow the rules of the House in respect of making brief and succinct statements of government policy. Nor did the members of the opposition follow the rules in commenting upon those statements. I believe it is most important that regulations affecting sealing on the east coast and salmon on the west coast are not dealt with at all times in the House. We have other things to deal with that—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubt whether that is a point of order. It is my impression that the hon. member is seeking to initiate a debate on a substantive question, and I feel that cannot be done either by way of a question of privilege or a point of order.

• (11:30 a.m.)

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TAXATION

SUPPLEMENTARY WHITE PAPERS ON TAX REFORM

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I should like to direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio from Windsor West. It relates to the promised paper to supplement the white paper on tax reform. This supplementary paper, which it was promised would be issued before the end of January, has not arrived. Can the minister indicate to the House when the supplementary paper will be available to the House and to the people of Canada? I ask this question because of the obvious absurdity of the people of Canada having to consider the question of tax reform without knowing what the government's proposals are.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, my recollection of the minister's words before the committee is that the paper in question could be expected probably by the end of January. Work is proceeding on it. I am sure it will be presented at the earliest possible date. I recall the minister saying that the paper was to set out various factors to be taken into account in considering one particular aspect of the white paper.

Mr. Stanfield: I am disappointed that the minister cannot give us any idea when it will be received. May I ask the minister also whether it is the intention to present a supplementary paper relating to modifications in the white paper consequent upon discussions with the provinces, it having been indicated that this might happen? Can the minister give us any information concerning when we may expect such a supplementary paper?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I would think it would be more appropriate to hear evidence before the committee before proceeding along the lines my hon. friend is suggesting.

Mr. Stanfield: I wonder whether the minister could say whether it would be proper for us, until we receive these supplementary papers, to pretend that the white paper does not really exist or, indeed, whether the minister would encourage us to believe that eventually the government might withdraw the white paper and start all over again?

HOUSING

PUBLIC HOUSING—REQUEST FOR INCLUSION IN POLICY STATEMENT OF REACTION TO RENTAL PROPOSAL

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a question on the urgent and important matter of housing. The Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing has not been in the House for three days. I suppose I should address my question to the Prime Minister, or to any other minister who can answer a question on housing. When the minister makes his promised statement on public housing shortly, will he include a statement on the government's reaction to the proposal of the Ontario Housing Corporation for a study of revision and reduction of rentals for public housing?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to inform the House that when the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing is not present during this question period it is my responsibility to appear on his behalf, and I have been here on occasions earlier this week when he has been away on government business. I will certainly be pleased to draw the hon. member's question to the minister's attention. I am sure his question will be given consideration along with other important matters pertaining to this area of policy.

Mr. Brewin: Does the minister propose to make a statement to the House on Monday dealing with an increase in funds available for low-cost public housing?

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I have not yet had an opportunity to check with my colleague concerning the exact date of an announcement in this area. I believe it will come forward very shortly and I think will indicate the government's intention to give emphasis to this area of housing need.

NATIONAL PARKS

POINTE FORILLON—AGREEMENT RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT AND MINERAL EXPLORATION RIGHTS

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Can he tell us whether the agreement with the Province of Quebec concerning the transfer of land for developing a national park in the Gaspé Peninsula is final, and whether work on the project is to start as planned?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the arrangement is final. However the Quebec government has not yet transferred that land to us and we can only start work if and when we are in possession of such land.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Could the minister advise the House whether or not he has met with members of the Quebec government with a view to arriving at an agreement concerning the mining rights inside the park?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, that problem was settled at the time of the agreement. In a national park, no mining or oil operations are allowed. That point should not have been raised recently for the agreement had provided for that.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

FORT CHIMO—PROTECTION OF LANGUAGE RIGHTS IN TRANSFER OF AUTHORITY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development whose remarks on strategy I listened to with interest this morning over the CBC. Is action being taken or has action been taken by the government of Canada to protect the interests of its wards, the Eskimo-Canadians at Fort Chimo, in respect of the transferring of authority over them to the provincial government, particularly in respect of their right to the language of their choice in the schools and, generally, to what degree are these people being given the opportunity as Canadians to determine their course rather than being placed in the position of being pushed around like chattels?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, may I point out to the right hon. member that negotiations are under way and that the first condition we make, with regard to any transfer, is that the people who live in the New Quebec territories be free to worship as they please and to speak the language of their choice.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister say with whom the negotiations are taking place, and will he also answer the question concerning why it is that decisions of this kind are being made without the consent of these Canadians of the Eskimo race who are entitled to be consulted and not to be pushed around?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, it is not true that decisions have been taken. Discussions are presently in progress and I am pleased to inform the right hon. member that a team comprised of one provincial and one federal official is now travelling through Canada. This team will visit New Quebec in order to consider what formulas could be adopted to ensure that the Eskimos will participate fully in Quebec and Canadian life.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Have these Eskimo people at Fort Chimo consented to being pushed around in this way?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: If they are not being pushed around, then why are they going up north to the Northwest Territories?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the right hon. gentleman knows the situation very well.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have all the facts here.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: A few years ago we concluded an agreement to the effect that no change of jurisdiction would take place unless the Eskimos participated in the discussions. That is exactly what we are doing now, by sending two officials to that region.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Unless they agree.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Abitibi.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Has he received representations from parents in other New Quebec communities expressing their fear about the language in which their children will receive their education and can he assure us that Eskimos are kept well informed by Quebec authorities?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out to the hon. member that last summer, I visited four Eskimo and Indian villages in New Quebec. I heard the grievances of those citizens and I assured them there would be no jurisdictional transfer unless the protection of their language and religion was guaranteed.

We have undertaken other action to keep them better informed. We have invited Eskimos to meetings held in Quebec city, where federal and provincial officials were present. The proceedings have been translated in Eskimo, English and French, and have been sent to Eskimos for study. Discussions are going on at the moment, with the participation of one federal and one provincial official.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why are they leaving there in such numbers?

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister have his department make inquiries as to why a relatively large number of Eskimos have moved from Fort Chimo in view of the assurances given by the minister to the Eskimos that they would not be forced to change the language of their education?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not know the exact number of Eskimos who have emigrated from Fort Chimo to the Northwest Territories, but I shall try to get it. I know that two or three families left Suglic last winter, and all of them, except one, returned to Suglic last summer, to start living again in their community and with their fellow-citizens.

[English]

STONY CREEK—FORCED ATTENDANCE OF CHILDREN AT PUBLIC SCHOOL

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): I have a supplementary question to the minister regarding the rights of individuals to determine their own course of action. Is it still the intention of the government to force Indian children in Stony Creek, British Columbia, to attend the public school rather than the Roman Catholic school they have been attending for a number of years?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): No, Mr. Speaker. By the way, an official from my department stated yesterday before the committee, that the Indians had the right to attend the school of their choice. Of course, a particular situation will soon develop there because of the increasing number of school-age children. Since there may be a shortage of school rooms next year, department officials have given to understand that it might be desirable that some pupils attend public school, but I can assure the hon. member that no family will be forced to have their children attend this school.

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FOREIGN POLICY REVIEW

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I should like to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Would he take the first opportunity on motions to advise the House of the results of the foreign policy review which he initiated nearly two years ago, in addition, of course, to the government's policy on NATO which was announced some time ago?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Thus far the results are evident in the great deal of work done by the Department of External Affairs and by the ministers who are members of the cabinet committee that is studying the recommendations and reports.

Mr. Hees: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Prime Minister expect to take the House into his confidence in the near future as to what the actual results are, and is he confident that the policy which members of the government are studying at the present time will be equally successful in antagonizing our principal allies and trading partners as our policy of withdrawing troops from NATO has been?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

GRAIN

PURPOSE OF TRIP BY MINISTER TO ENGLAND

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): I should like to direct a question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board arising from the press release issued by the minister's office yesterday in which the minister stated:

> I am going to England next week to consult with our principal buyers there, not as a grain salesman, mind you.

My question is: What is the purpose of the minister's trip, or is he just going as a tourist?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[Later:]

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question arises out of the question asked by the hon. member for Marquette. During the minister's stay in Britain, will he take the opportunity to discuss with that government the concern of Canadian farmers about the possible loss of markets, and will he report back on the stance the British government will take during negotiations for their entry into the European Common Market?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): I may indeed have opportunities to discuss the very important question of agricultural policy in England, Mr. Speaker, and the access to that market for Canadian wheat under a variety of circumstances in the future. I thank the hon. member for making the suggestion.

SCIENCE COUNCIL

CONFLICT OF INTEREST OF CHAIRMAN

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the fact that Dr. Solandt has obviously come to the decision that he intends to remain as chairman of the Science Council of Canada, has the minister had any indication that Dr. Solandt is currently considering divesting himself of his interests in the Electric Reduction Company of Canada as an alternative means of freeing himself from conflict-of-interest charges?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): No, I have had no such indication.

Mrs. MacInnis: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Are members of this House to conclude that Canada is so poverty-stricken in the field of science that Dr. Solandt is the only competent and capable scientist available to occupy this very sensitive post?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that her question is argumentative.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Privy Council. Is it the intention of the government to move shortly to implement the very important proposals and recommendations of the Special Committee on Statutory Instruments?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): We have had the proposals under consideration, and a draft proposal is now being completed which I hope will be available to the House before the end of the session.

Mr. Baldwin: I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister use what influence he has with the President of the Privy Council to speed up the process, and would he take into account the very alarming and dangerous increase in executive dictatorial powers contained in recent government legislation and the need to provide countervailing supervisory powers to Parliament?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I wish to inform the hon. member that I do not have that much leverage with the House Leader. He is always threatening to resign if I make him do that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

OIL

CONTINUED PARTICIPATION IN PANARCTIC OILS LIMITED

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Can the Minister advise the House if and when he will be making a statement regarding the government's participation or non-participation, as the case may be, in the Panarctic Oil consortium?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. I am unable to say when I shall make a statement, but the government is ready to make public its opinion on the matter. I hope to be in a position to make such a statement in the House next week.

[English]

[Later:]

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development whether the government has had any firm offers for its share of Panarctic Oils Limited?

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I replied a moment ago in answer to a question by the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo that I would have a statement to make next week in this connection.

THE MINISTRY

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE—FILLING OF REGIONAL DESK POSITIONS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the appointment of persons holding positions at the so-called regional desks in the Prime Minister's office to positions in departments in spite of the freeze on personnel hiring, will the Prime Minister advise whether the regional desk positions will remain vacant or does he contemplate making new appointments?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure that this question is urgent or that it should be asked at this time. I wonder if the hon. member might not consider the advisability of placing his question on the Order Paper.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

LISTING OF INGREDIENTS ON FOOD PRODUCTS

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, but in view of his absence perhaps I can direct it to the Acting Minister, the Solicitor General. How soon may the Canadian people expect ingredient listing on food products?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Acting Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I will be very glad to take the question as notice and bring it to the attention of the minister.

TRANSPORT

NEED FOR ICEBREAKERS ON EAST COAST

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): My question is for the able and co-operative Minister of Transport.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He must feel lost over there.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): In view of the fact that only one icebreaker, the Wolfe is at present on the east coast where ice conditions, I am informed, are very hazardous, whereas the bulk of the icebreaker fleet is at present located on the St. Lawrence, will the minister investigate the situation and have it remedied in view of its urgency?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): We are reassessing ice conditions on a daily basis, and if it should prove necessary to put some vessels into the area in question we will be glad to do it. In the meantime, let me assure the hon. member that I will be delighted to keep the "Wolfe" at his door.

WATER RESOURCES

AMENDMENT OF BILL TO COVER EFFLUENT FEES

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, but in his absence perhaps I might direct it to his Parliamentary Secretary. In view of reports following yesterday's meeting between the minister and the Ontario Minister of Energy and Resources Management, does the minister propose, in addressing the Standing Committee on National Resources on Monday, to announce amendments with respect to the Canada Water Act and particularly the payment of effluent fees?

Mr. R. J. Orange (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I will be glad to bring the hon. member's representation to the attention of the minister so that he can make an announcement on Monday if he so desires.

[Mr. Noble.]

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PHASING OUT OF MARINE DIVISION

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): On Monday last the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys asked a question about the marine services of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and I undertook to bring forward further information. The situation is that the method of control of these services both as to personnel and the responsibility for the use of the boats is being re-examined. The services will now report through the divisional command in the region in which the boats are being used. I might add that in addition two of the boats will be taken out of service this spring because they are obsolescent and not suitable for the purpose for which they are being used.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister if he would go further and assure the House that the mounties will be able to get their man on sea as well as on land?

TRANSPORT

WHEAT—EXTENSION OF CHURCHILL SHIPPING SEASON

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of reports that practically all of the wheat for the port of Churchill shipping season has been sold, will he consider making representations to his colleague the Minister of Transport to immediately extend the Churchill shipping season from its present short length of time?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member knows that my colleague, the Minister of Transport, has this matter in hand for consideration. Certainly on our part we are always concerned to see that the port of Churchill is used to the maximum extent possible for the shipment of wheat.

Mr. Burton: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of this and other indications that the port of Churchill will be used more extensively than was suggested in the recent report tabled by the minister, will he consider using his good offices, particularly as a cabinet minister from the province of Saskatchewan, to urge that the development plan for the port of Churchill be speeded up from what is proposed in the report?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is making a representation; it is hardly a question.

TRADE

POSSIBLE BRITISH ENTRY INTO ECM—REPRESENTATIONS TO PRIME MINISTER WILSON

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I have a question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. During his discussions with the Prime Minister of Great Britain did he bring to the attention of Prime Minister Wilson the serious effects on Canadian agriculture that are bound to follow if the United Kingdom enters the European Common Market unless similar provisions are made to those agreed to by Prime Minister McMillan during my administration as Prime Minister to protect Canadian agriculture as well as that of Australia and New Zealand?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we did raise this general subject with the Prime Minister of Great Britain and I was greatly assisted in this endeavour by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The subject was discussed at some length and during the discussions the Prime Minister of Great Britain said that there had been no guarantees of that type given at the time of previous negotiations with the Common Market.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I say there were. They are fully set out and express rights were protected.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I would be very interested to find out where they were set out. If they were not verbal, perhaps they were in documented form and if so I would like to have the reference.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All you have to do is look it up. So Canadian agriculture is to be sacrificed.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—INCREASE IN TRUCKING RATES BY QUEBEC TRANSPORTATION BOARD

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister without Portfolio from Windsor West whether he is in a position to answer the question I asked earlier in the week following a question addressed to the Minister of Finance a week ago on the attitude of the government toward the increase in Quebec-Ontario trucking rates and whether the government proposes to take any initiative at all in this regard?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I should like to apologize to my hon. friend for not having the information here for him at this time but I will have the answer for him on Monday.

TRANSPORT

MOVEMENT OF GRAIN—RETURN OF CANADIAN BOXCARS FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the genial Minister of Transport. The minister's Parliamentary Secretary took notice of this question on Tuesday during his absence. In view of current reports from the United States that the tremendous grain boxcar shortage in that country may result in legislation to rectify the situation, would the minister indicate if he is taking any steps to make sure that Canadian boxcars in use in the United States are being returned to Canada within the prescribed time limit?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have a large number of figures on the boxcar situation at the moment and I would be glad to make them available to the hon. member. I would also inform him at this time that the continuing discussions with the presidents of the two railways will go on. I should like to emphasize, as has my colleague the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon-Humboldt, the importance of getting as many cars back as possible.

Mr. Southam: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister consider a materially increased daily rental or demurrage charge on Canadian boxcars being used in the United States to ensure the speedy return of our rolling stock?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, this is a matter for the railways in the first instance, but I shall be very glad to discuss it with them at my next meeting which should be Monday or Tuesday.

Inquiries of the Ministry

MOVEMENT OF GRAIN—FULFILLING BY RAILWAYS OF WHEAT BOARD ORDERS

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): A supplementary question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Wheat Board, Mr. Speaker. In view of the serious shortage of boxcars at many points in Saskatchewan and the serious lack of diesel units available to haul boxcars, could the minister now state whether there are any orders on hand issued by the Canadian Wheat Board that the Canadian Pacific Railway and Canadian National Railways have not been able to fulfil at this time?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the question does not permit a simple answer. First of all, the area is divided into two parts, the part fully within the block system and the part that is not. Within the block system orders are met on schedule according to the program laid out from week to week. In the case of the non-block system, orders may be outstanding for some time before cars are spotted. The block system will be fully in effect, I think, by the end of February and at that time there should be complete order in the way in which cars arrive to pick up the orders.

The question of motive power available to the railways is one of very serious concern to us. We have had discussions with the railways to ensure that they will take steps to bring their motive power into position to handle the very large number of carload orders which—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe.

AIRPORTS

ST. SCHOLASTIQUE—AGREEMENT BETWEEN OTTAWA AND QUEBEC

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport.

Could he advise the House if an agreement has been reached with the Quebec government respecting the international airport at St. Scholastique?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the airport is entirely within the competence of the federal government there is no necessity for such an official agreement. In terms of our working agreements and relationships and in terms of the development of various parts of the land that has been acquired, I can say that negotiations are going forward amiably and, I think, profitably, and I would hope to be able to make a full statement on the matter on Tuesday or Wednesday of next week.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TANZANIA—FUNDS FOR BUILDING OF MILITARY COLLEGE

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question could have been supplementary to that asked previously by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East and the answer provided by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development on the possible lack of accommodation for Indian children. I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if the Canadian government is providing funds for the building of a military college in Tanzania or any other foreign country?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

FISHERIES

COMPENSATION TO FISHERMEN FOR WHITE COAT SEAL BAN

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. Now that the minister by his arbitrary decision has effectively destroyed the Canadian seal industry contrary to the unanimous wishes of the Fisheries Committee—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should not make a statement, he should ask a question.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I consider it to be a very serious question and not at all frivolous as some members across the way may think. My question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry is: what steps will the government of Canada take to compensate the fishermen of the Magdalen Islands and Newfoundland who will suffer economic hardship as a consequence of the minister's arbitrary decision to ban the harvesting of white coat seals?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, after a record number of ships have returned from the seal hunt this spring, we will see how they made out.

EXTENT OF SEAL HERD—CONSERVATION MEASURES

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a couple of supplementary questions. First, can the minister indicate the extent of the seal herd in the North Atlantic, especially since he has indicated that an increase of one million seals will reduce the incomes of Newfoundland fishermen by about 25 per cent? Also, could he indicate what will be the result of the conservation measures on the increase in the seal herd?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, scientists tell us that the present seal population is of the order of 2.5 million. If there were no harvesting of seals it would increase by 1.5 million. That increase would seriously affect our other fishery activities in the North Atlantic.

Mr. Lundrigan: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister make a statement on motions to indicate what measures will be taken either to increase or control the size of the seal herd, in view of the detrimental effect on other fisheries? Will he also indicate what negotiations have taken place with the Soviet Union in order that we may be assured that benefits to be gained from conservation measures will not end up in the pockets of the Russians, since its fishing fleet could conceivably prosecute the North Atlantic fishery?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, as a result of the continuation of the seal hunt, and because only older seals will be taken, there will not be any difficulty in maintaining the herd at its present level. There will therefore, be no detrimental effect as a result of any recent steps taken. The Soviet Union participated, as late as 1964, in this fishery but we do not expect that it will in future.

ROYAL VISIT

GRANTING OF AMNESTY TO INMATES OF FEDERAL PRISONS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Solicitor General. He was here a moment ago. Perhaps if I ask my question slowly he will return to his seat in time to answer it. In view of the forthcoming visit of Her Majesty to Canada this year, will any arrangements be made to grant a special amnesty to inmates in federal prisons? Will their time be reduced as a result of the exercise of the royal prerogative?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to consider the hon. member's suggestion.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MAURITANIA—COMPOSITION OF CANADIAN DELEGATION TO EDUCATIONAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In his absence, however, may I direct it to the right hon. Prime Minister?

Since Canada has received an invitation from Mauritania to attend the forthcoming conference on education, can the Prime Minister tell us whether he has decided to send a delegation and, if so, what its make-up will be?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what the Secretary of State for External Affairs told the House in that respect. Federal officials, in co-operation with the provinces concerned, are now considering the make-up of a Canadian delegation.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, could the Prime Minister indicate to the House whether provinces other than Quebec have hinted that they would send some of their own representatives to that conference?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I could not tell. There were representatives from two or three provinces in the previous Canadian delegations. That is likely to be the case this time, but I cannot give any assurance to the House. That will of course depend on the provinces themselves.

[English]

NATIONAL REVENUE

ALLEGED SPECIAL ATTENTION TO CRITICS OF WHITE PAPER ON TAX REFORM

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Will the minister look into a rather rare coincidence involving officials of his department? It seems that certain taxpayers recently visited by his tax officials were people who, just previous to the visits, had criticized the white paper on tax reform.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Perhaps that will explain why our western farmers have not been left free from the same course.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[Later:]

Mr. Barney Danson (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the one asked a moment ago by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster. If all those who have criticized the white paper on tax reform are being investigated by officials of the Department of National Revenue, I wonder if the minister would consider asking the Minister of National Defence for troops to cover the whole job?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

AIR TRANSPORT

CTC DECISION RESPECTING PRAIRIE SERVICES

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? Is the hon. gentleman in a position to table the decision of the CTC on improved air service for the prairies which he indicated last night would be available at ten o'clock this morning?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have both the judgment and the press release here and, if it is so wished, I will be glad to table them. Other copies will be available. However, if the hon. member wishes me to I will be glad to table a copy of the judgment.

LOWER FARES WITHIN CANADA

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the President of Air Canada made it known publicly a couple of days ago that Air Canada is pressing very hard for lower transatlantic fares for the ordinary travelling public, is the government pressing Air Canada to make lower fares available to Canadians travelling in this country as well?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not discussed this matter with the chairman of the board of Air Canada, but I am sure this is something that will come up in the near future. Of course, we must also make sure that the fares do not descend to the point where they become a drain on the general public. We must not reduce fares to the point where we have a deficit.

HARBOURS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SMALL VESSEL REGULATIONS

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, a little earlier during the question period the Minister of Transport was receiving too much flattery for his own good. May I ask this procrastinating minister if he will make a statement with regard to changes in small vessel harbour administration on the British Columbia coast? He has been toying with this idea for many weeks, months—even years.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have been toying with it because it is a very complex problem. It has reached the point where we have designated certain harbours in British Columbia as being commercial harbours, others as being fishing harbours and still others as being pleasure harbours. I have handed the list over to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry and the Minister of Public Works. If they agree with my assignment of categories, I am suggesting that these harbours be transferred from the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport to the jurisdiction of other related departments. This would be, from my point of view, good riddance.

Mr. Barnett: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister be prepared to table in the House a list of the proposed designations he has referred to, so that the rest of us in the House may have a chance of looking at them?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I will give the hon. member a map and let him make up his own list. I would also be glad to give him this list.

[Later:]

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. Do I understand from the minister's answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that the harbours referred to in British Columbia will now be transferred to three different federal departments, each of which will be responsible for a certain number of them? Will there not be some co-ordination in the application of harbour policy in British Columbia?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, what I said was, and I repeat, that there are harbours in British Columbia which I should like to come under the responsibility of various departments. Some are used only as fishing harbours, and it appears to me that they could be transferred from the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport to that of the Department of Fisheries. That is a matter we are now discussing.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Prime Minister? Has he asked the law officers of the Crown to investigate whether there was an invasion of his personal privacy by news reporters stationed outside his home last night, at whom the Prime Minister threw snowballs? Also, is the Prime Minister providing snowmobiles for these newsmen this weekend so they may be able to keep up with his fast pace in private life?

AIR TRANSPORT

REPORT ON CRASH AT WABUSH

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Will he advise the House if his department's officials have yet completed their investigation into the air crash near Wabush, Labrador, last year which claimed the lives of a number of officials of Churchill Falls Power Corporation?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker. The detailed study has not been completed. When it has been and has been handed to me, I will in due course release it in the customary fashion.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ST. JOHN'S, NFLD—INVESTIGATION OF ACCIDENT INVOLVING SNOW CLEARING EQUIPMENT

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? Will the minister undertake to have an investigation begun immediately into an accident that occurred recently near St. John's involving Canadian National snow clearing equipment?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that such investigation is undertaken as a matter of course. If it has not been, I will see that the investigation is speeded up.

POLLUTION

LAKE ERIE—RECOMMENDATION OF MORATORIUM ON OIL DRILLING

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, but as the minister is absent perhaps his Parliamentary Secretary could answer it. Would the minister advise the House whether the Canadian government intends to make a similar recommendation to the International Joint Commission as that made by the United States government two months ago when it recommended that a moratorium be imposed on oil drilling in Lake Erie because of dangerous pollution possibilities?

Mr. R. J. Orange (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the minister is meeting today with the National Advisory Committee on Petroleum. This may be one of the subjects discussed at this meeting, and I will bring the hon. member's point to the attention of the minister.

Mr. Harding: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. This very question was raised exactly two months ago. You asked me to put it on the ten o'clock show, which I did. I raised it the other night but neither the minister nor the Parliamentary Secretary were here to answer, even after arrangements had been made. Surely, a better answer than this should be forthcoming from the department.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, purely in the interests of trying to facilitate the business of this House by shortcircuiting numerous questions to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday of the coming week. I ask the minister to make a statement on motions at the earliest convenient opportunity, indicating what effect the conservation measures respecting seals will have on the fisheries resources in the Atlantic region. As members from Atlantic Canada, we are entitled to some assurance that this conservation measure will not in fact reduce our fisheries income—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member because this is not a point of order. He has asked the minister whether a statement will be made. That is the type of question which might normally be asked during the question period.

Mr. Lundrigan: I did ask it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member says he did not have time to ask—

Mr. Lundrigan: I did ask the question.

Mr. Speaker: In any event, other questions cannot be asked now as the question period expired a few moments ago. Perhaps the hon. member might ask the question on Monday and the minister might reflect on the matter between now and then.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that I did ask the question but the minister gave us no indication of what the position is. Therefore I am trying to facilitate the business of the House. I should like a response to the question.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING COST OF MEDICAL AND HOSPITAL SERVICES TO CREW

Hon. Herb Gray (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill C-10, to amend the Canada Shipping Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Bill C-10 deals, in the main, with amendments to the existing legislation provided in Part V of the Canada Shipping Act and includes an amendment to Part IV of the Canada Shipping Act.

The concept of a prepaid medical insurance and hospital insurance plan for ill or injured seafarers from vessels of foreign registry entering Canadian ports originated in the last century, in fact before Confederation, in the province of New Brunswick. The purpose of this plan was to set up a fund to defray the cost of medical and surgical treatment and hospitalization provided to a sick mariner and to prevent these costs becoming a charge on the community where such were incurred when the vessel set sail and left ill seamen behind.

At confederation, the responsibility for administration of this service was transferred to the federal government and was expanded to include other maritime provinces. This service was later extended, on an optional basis, to provide sick mariners benefits to crew members of Canadian registered fishing vessels. The fund to provide these services was accrued by the collection of dues, that is, a levy or a duty, calculated on the basis of the tonnage of the vessel. Existing legislation provides for the collection of two cents per ton on the occasion of the first three entries in a Canadian port in the calendar year. It is obligatory for certain vessels, including foreign vessels, and optional to Canadian vessels engaged in the fishing industry.

Until the early 1940's, the revenues collected closely approximated the expenditures. During the 1940's costs spiralled; revenues remained fixed by statute and could not be adjusted to meet the increased costs. This disparity developed chiefly in respect of government vessels, fishing vessels of Canadian registry and vessels operating exclusively in Canadian waters. The government departments were requested to withdraw from the plan, which they did in 1956. In recent years, the revenue collected from foreign vessels has closely approximated the costs and, in fact, in some years has exceeded the expenditures. The over-all deficit incurred in operating the service has resulted from the provision of the services to crews of Canadian fishing vessels and vessels operating exclusively in Canadian waters.

Many changes in respect of medical care and hospital insurance have occurred since this legislation was enacted. A number of schemes for medical care insurance have been available to Canadians. With the advent of prepaid medical care insurance in some provinces, a considerable number of Canadian fishermen and mariners are adequately protected. In certain provinces, they may be protected by the provisions of the workmen's compensation board and in all provinces the provisions of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act are applicable.

Many changes in respect of the shipping industry have occurred as well. The small vessel with a large crew complement has been replaced by the large mechanized vessel with a small crew complement. In addition, medical care insurance plans are available to the owner of a vessel and many foreign shipping companies have taken advantage of these schemes to provide protection for their crews. As Canada is one of the few nations, if not the only nation, that provides sick mariners benefits, many shipping companies have appreciated the need to cover their crew with an insurance plan applicable in any port in the world. It is apparent that the obligation to pay dues in order to enter a Canadian port results in a duplication of these particular costs to the owner or agent of a foreign shipping company which, no doubt, contributes to increased transportation costs to Canadians.

The minister's decision to amend Part V of the Canada Shipping Act has followed deliberations within the department as a result of consultation with concerned colleagues in the Departments of Transport, Fisheries and Forestry, Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Manpower and Immigration and Justice.

The amendments presented as Bill C-10 effect repeal of the provision to collect dues and to provide medical treatment without charge to ill or injured crew members from vessels of foreign registry but retain, on an optional basis, provision for the collection of dues and medical care to ill or injured seamen from a Canadian vessel engaged in the fishing industry, providing these services are not available by reason of a federal-provincial cost sharing agreement under the Medical Care Act. The plan has never operated in either of the two northern territories nor in the inland waters of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta.

In the event a sick mariner from a foreign registered vessel is not covered by a medical care insurance plan, it is deemed necessary to amend Part IV of the act by the addition of a clause requiring ship owners to take responsibility for costs of health care to crews.

To summarize, we have legislation which was enacted, in the main, for two reasons. One of these reasons is now almost non-existent, the other is now thwarted. It is proposed to continue to provide medical care insurance but not hospitalization for crew members of Canadian fishing vessels, the masters of which elect to pay sick mariners dues before the first fishing voyage in the calendar year, in those provinces which do not have an operating medical care insurance scheme, provided Part V of the Canada Shipping Act formerly operated in that province. This results in the proposals of Bill C-10 operating in the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island, until such time as these provinces implement a medical care insurance program.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at length on this subject. This, however, is a matter which has concerned me, for some period of time particularly in respect of Part V of the Canada Shipping Act. I hope that I, perhaps, had something to do with instigating the introduction of this legislation. Over a period of time, I have been corresponding with the minister and his officials on this subject. In fact, last summer I specifically asked how long Part V of the Canada Shipping Act had been in existence and whether it had ever been reviewed. I asked why it had not been made to conform to modern conditions. There are many matters which I hope will be resolved by this bill. However, I shall raise them again in case I have not properly understood the remarks of the parliamentary secretary.

I understand that one reason for the service provided under this Act is the provision of free drugs to sick mariners. I now understand that under this legislation medical services will be provided similar to those provided to any other citizen who has access to services under a medical care insurance plan. I note that new Section 318(1) in clause 3 of the bill reads:

> The master of a Canadian ship described in section 316 in respect of which the duty prescribed in that section has been paid may apply in writing to the Customs Officer at any port to have any sick mariner on his ship provided, without charge, with the services of a designated medical practitioner that are medically required by that sick mariner.

Again, we have a situation where the master of a ship must apply in writing. I expect there is a standard form for this. He must apply to the customs officer at the port where the ship lands to have the sick mariner provided with medical help. But again, the sick mariner can be provided with help only by the designated medical practitioner of that port. I may be wrong, but it is my understanding that this does not change the existing legislation in the sense that there is still a provision that a sick mariner can be treated only by the medical practitioner of that port. If I am wrong, I hope the parliamentary secretary will correct me, but it would seem to me that this provision would not apply in a province where there is a medical care plan. In a province where there is no medical care plan, the mariner would still be treated by the medical practitioner designated by the customs officer at that particular port. I also wonder whether the latter provision applies only to fishing vessels or whether it applies to other vessels as well. I think, for instance, of ferries such as, the motor vessel Bluenose which operates in my constituency between Yarmouth and Bar Harbour. I am wondering whether sick mariners from such a vessel can be treated only by the designated medical practitioner at a particular port.

Under the new provisions, particularly in Nova Scotia, I believe crew members will be treated the same as any other citizens of Nova Scotia under the medical care plan of that province. However, I should like some clarification on this point. To my mind, new section 318 still provides that a sick mariner can be treated only by the port physician. It would seem, in cases where there is no medical care plan, the sick mariner cannot go to any physician other than the physician designated by the port officer. In other words, he can be treated only in that port. For instance, if he should reside perhaps 40 miles away from that port, he cannot be treated by his local doctor. This concerns me a little. There may be cases where a sick crew member would wish to go home to be treated. It is natural, I suppose, for a sick person to want to be with his family. However, it would seem that he can be treated only by the port physician. I understand there are cases where this would not apply, but in provinces like New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, these mariners will still be able to receive medical help only from the medical practitioner designated by the customs officer. I do not like this provision.

If my interpretation is correct I would hope the bill would be amended so that a sick mariner may be treated by any physician. I should like to know whether this provision applies to ferries or simply to fishing vessels. I think the situation is clear in respect of the province of Nova Scotia, where there is a medical care plan, but I believe it should also be clear in respect of the care of crew members of ferries, particularly any ferry operating between provinces.

My big complaint is against clause 3, section 318, which still provides for an application in writing for the designation of a medical practitioner. The Parliamentary Secretary said this Provision was in the old act, and he gave several reasons for changing it. However, I do not see that it is being changed in the bill before us, particularly in respect of provinces which do not have medicare. I think that, like appointments to the Senate, this was a good way of satisfying some of the medical practitioners who were in support of the government cause. I hope that this clause can be changed.

That is all I have to say, Mr. Speaker, and I will wait to see if my questions are answered before I put forward any amendments.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us is asking us to put another patch on the already patched-up and hoary Canada Shipping Act. Whether or not this is a step in the right direction is something on which we in this party intend to reserve our judgment until we are able to ask our questions in the committee. By saying that, I am making it clear that, while we are prepared to agree to the passage of this bill at second reading, we do not want that to be an indication of our support of the principle of the bill, if indeed it has any principle. It is merely an indication that we are prepared to agree that this proposal has to be discussed in a standing committee in order that its real purport can be properly understood.

I think the speech that was made by the hon. member on behalf of the official opposition bears out my contention in this regard because he did raise a number of questions. I should like to say, as has been made clear by the remarks of the parliamentary secretary in introducing the bill on second reading, that this bill has a very definite impact on Canadian seamen who are involved in the fishing industry. It is a matter of concern to some of us as to just what is to be accomplished. In listening to the parliamentary secretary, it appeared to me that what he was telling us was that the Department of National Health and Welfare was trying to back out of its responsibilities under the Canada Shipping Act. Whether or not this is something that they should be doing certainly should be subject to question, particularly by members who are concerned with the well-being of our people who are involved in the fishing industry. We all know that they are having a good many difficulties in many ways, and I think this applies to both the east and west coasts of Canada. Therefore, I feel that this bill should receive a searching scrutiny in the committee.

I know that a number of fishermen on the west coast have expressed their concern over the fact that the enactment of this piece of legislation will remove from them some of the benefits of health care that they have hitherto enjoyed. I do not profess to be familiar with all the details of the operation of the sick mariners' provisions, but I should like to tell the House that one of the concerns that has been expressed to me is that the result of this bill will be the loss of protection to Canadian fishing seamen who may, for one reason or another, wish to receive medical care in ports outside of Canada. In the case of the west coast, this involves landings in the ports of the United States.

Certainly, this is one of the questions that I would want to have clarified in the committee. I would like to know just what impact, if any, the bill has on this arrangement and just what this arrangement is. In effect, the argument advanced by the parliamentary secretary was that because of the enactment of medicare, the earlier provisions are not necessary in some respects. May I say again that the details of this will have to be carefully examined. If I heard him correctly, he made reference to the fact that it is proposed—and I noted this when I read the bill and compared it with the former sections of the act which will be repealed—to eliminate coverage for hospitalization which hitherto had been in effect under the sick mariners provisions. Here again, I think the onus will be on the department to justify the changes they are proposing before we can agree to them.

I have given some indication that we are prepared to have a fair look at this bill in committee, but I want to make it clear that this is not to be taken as meaning that we will not be proposing amendments at the report stage or that we will necessarily support the bill when it comes back to the House.

Having said that, I will resume my seat because I have indicated that this matter can better be dealt with in detail in the committee when the referral is made.

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): There is a point which I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could clarify. It is of interest to the people in the port and city of Vancouver. Can he tell us how the present amendment would affect the case of the Pacific and Orient liner Oronsay which recently came into Vancouver harbour with typhoid cases aboard. In this particular case, a classic case in marine history in British Columbia, a giant passenger liner was found to have typhoid aboard and all the medical services of Vancouver had to be put to work to control this small outbreak. I wonder how the present act would affect this particular case.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): It is not my intention to make any extended remarks on Bill C-10, but I would like to have one matter clarified if possible by the minister. It deals with the proposal in the bill which states that the owner of every ship that is not Canadian is liable for the cost of all medical treatment and hospital care provided in Canada to a person employed by him on that ship. This puts the onus on the owners of any foreign ship to look after their crew members. I think that it is only right and proper that they should be responsible. As has been stated, formerly under the act indigent seamen were cared for by the port physician. At the present time, if the port physician looks after indigent seamen he is reimbursed by the owners of the foreign ships.

• (12:40 p.m.)

The question that comes to mind is, in what manner will the Canadian government be asked to ascertain whether foreign ships are adequately insured so that the Canadian government will be recompensed for any outlay made on behalf of indigent seamen who may need hospitalization in Canada?

I hope it will be possible for the Parliamentary Secretary who has presented this bill to give some indication later as to the manner in which this question will be handled.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask some questions, but there would be no opportunity for the Parliamentary Secretary to reply except upon closing the debate, which precludes the possibility of following up the reply. I have an interest in getting some information about the effect of the bill on those sections of the Canada Shipping Act which, to say the least, are obsolete and archaic and which raise all sorts of questions about the possibility of a continuing colonial status for Canada.

One question I have is whether this bill would apply as equally to denizens as it does to fishermen or seamen. I was rather struck by the oddness of that word and by the fact that apparently there is an opportunity for the government, exercising the royal prerogative I suppose, to grant to some people letters of denization. There is no other indication in the bill as to just what this means. How does one go about getting them? Are there any forms? Have such letters ever been issued? Are there any denizens in Canada?

The parliamentary secretary chuckles, and I do not blame him because this seems such a weird reference to have in the law of Canada. Yet there it is in the section of the Canada Shipping Act relating to the registering of ships. Apart from that section relating to the registering of ships, there is no reference to Canadian citizens. The only reference is to natural-born British subjects or persons recognized by law throughout Her Majesty's dominions as having the status of natural-born British subjects, who can register or own ships liable for registration within Canada. Also of course, the provision applies to persons who are made denizens by letters of denization.

I looked up the word in the dictionary, but even that did not help very much. I knew that denizens were habitués of a certain area. For instance, we know that a rabbit is a denizen of the forest because he happens to live there, and there are denizens of the deep. These are supposed to be supernatural monsters of some sort and were described in imaginative terms in the early days of sailing ships. But to see this word in a statute of Canada does make valid the argument that the government is not really concerned about updating the laws of the nation but is engaged in a program of patching British law which existed before the turn of the century.

All we have done, Mr. Speaker, has been to carry that law forward, making some slight alterations as time went on but maintaining the basis of a document with colonial or imperialistic flavour. We have no Canada Shipping Act as such; it is subservient to British law.

Had the government really wanted to do something effective, it might have dealt with the Canada Shipping Act in total instead of only with a minor, insignificant part such as we are dealing with at the moment. As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) has pointed out, this particular part is fraught with difficulty and misunderstanding. Members of the Official Opposition have indicated their doubts as to the real value of the bill itself.

If the government is only concerned with stacking-up a record of getting bills through Parliament, it could spend its whole time running insignificant pieces of legislation through the House and then point to a record of accomplishment in the passage of legislation. Of course, in reality it would not have accomplished much.

Referring to the Earl Jowitt dictionary of English law, I find the following definition of denizen:

> A denizen in the primary but obsolete sense of the word is a natural-born subject of a country, or a native or inhabitant of a city or liberty.

Then, there is a quotation which reads:

> If the King and his subjects should conquer another kingdom or dominion [they] are all citizens of the kingdom or dominion conquered.

Mr. Baldwin: How about a president?

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Well, a president, I don't know. I don't know whether someone in Canada, who either thinks of himself as a president or conceives that he someday might be a president, would be considered a denizen. I gather from the preamble to the act that he would have to get a letter of denization from somebody. Now, if by the very act of becoming president he removed himself from the position of privy councillor, presumably then he would not be in a position to give himself a letter of denization—unless he did that before, and accomplished everything at the same time!

Going back to Jowitt's dictionary of English law, with regard to denizen he says "denizen in its modern sense denotes a person who is alien born." Whether that applies to the gentleman who might be president, I do not know. Certainly, some people in the province from which he comes think in those terms. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has regularly referred to English-Canadians in a hyphenated sense. That probably indicates that he, himself, feels he has come from an alien country. I am sure that citizens of Irish descent, for instance, or people in the House who are of Irish descent, would not like to be looked upon as English-Canadians. People who are of English descent do not like to be looked on as English-Canadians. I hope I have made my point clear.

• (12:50 p.m.)

In any event, denizen, in its modern sense denotes a person who is an alien born, who has obtained, ex donatione regis letters patent called letters of denization to make him either permanently or for a time a British subject. The granting of such letters patent is a branch of the royal prerogative and is subject to no restrictions whatever. The denizen might hold lands by purchase or devise, which an alien might not, but could not take by inheritance before the Naturalization Act of 1870. All of this, of course, refers to the English law.

Replying to the question asked by the hon. member for Peace River with regard to presidents, it is clear—and perhaps I am not answering his question directly—that a denizen cannot become a member of the House of Commons, because as Lord Jowitt says, a denizen cannot be a member of the Privy Council or of either of the Houses of Parliament.

Mr. Baldwin: That provision is pretty tough on the cabinet.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Yes, it might create difficulties for our cabinet. The point is that this type of thinking prevails in our laws relating to shipping. Our shipping act is a most archaic, dinosaur type, piece of legislation. It really was conceived in England when Britannia ruled the waves during a time when Lord Nelson and his like were in the fore. At that time sea power gave Britain economic power and imperial power. Unfortunately, we still carry those concepts and those ideas forward into the modern day and see them reflected in our shipping legislation. We see outdated ideas relating to ships, seamen, to one ownership, to registration and to a host of other factors relating to shipping. We are still a century behind the times when it comes to the laws on our statute books that relate to shipping.

If the parliamentary secretary imagines that there is anything in this legislation that is of real value in terms of trying to do something for our own good, then he is sadly mistaken. I thought he looked rather apologetic as he introduced the legislation. I wish he were able to go before his cabinet colleagues and tell them—but perhaps this is impossible—that for many years this nation has had an archaic shipping act and it is time that we had a real Canada Shipping Act in fact as well as title.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, since I come from that great inland port of Peace River—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Barnett: It was a port before Mr. Bennett built the dam.

Mr. Baldwin: —I wish to make a few comments. I must say that it will be somewhat difficult to repeat the interesting performance that we witnessed in the delightful remarks of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard). However, I shall not find it too difficult to observe the ordinary rules of relevancy. There are two questions I wish to ask the parliamentary secretary, and perhaps he can answer them. The first is this: If this bill becomes law, if it is to be an effective amendment to our shipping legislation, then I submit some important issues involved ought to be examined. Clearly, there will no longer be available to seamen of coastal vessels in Canada the same protection that was afforded them heretofore. A provision in the amending bill indicates that there will be a measure of protection for, seamen on vessels engaged in fishing, but not for seamen on coastal vessels.

When one examines the figures, it becomes obvious that by far the smallest number of people involved in this matter are those who are seamen on coastal vessels which are not fishing vessels. There was some protection for these seamen. However, from my reading of the change in the legislation, it seems that that protection afforded to those seamen will be lost. Secondly, it seems to me that there will be lost to seamen, whether of foreign-going, coastal or fishing vessels, the benefits of certain programs. Those programs included hospital care and provision of drugs where drugs were required in hospital or for medical treatment. Clearly, the government intends to make use of the facilities of the various medicare programs. As hon. members know, the provision of drugs is not included under those programs. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary might take note of this part of my remarks. I think I am correct in assuming that, as a result of this amendment, there will be no provision of drugs for seamen, such as was the case before.

Finally, if Your Honour would undertake not to see the clock for about a minute, I shall be able to complete the latter part of my remarks. The program involved in this legislation is something that was discussed by the Glassco Commission a number of years ago, and we see here a number of very real problems. For instance, the federal government had been heretofore wholly responsible for the cost of these programs, and an inspection of figures will indicate that very substantial sums of money were involved. These were all the responsibility of the federal government. Clearly, under the alternative proposals, these programs will not be the responsibility of the federal government inasmuch as medicare will become wholly the responsibility of provincial governments. The federal government was to have assumed half of the cost involved in the medicare program but now, because the federal government wishes to opt out, the provincial governments will be taking over the whole responsibility.

I think it should be made plain by the minister that in this area the federal government is shedding certain of its financial responsibility. Secondly, in doing so, the federal government will impose on the provinces many problems. It indicated that, after a period of time, it will slide out from its responsibilities under the original medicare program. The provinces, after a period of time, will have to assume their full responsibilities under the program, and hence the provincial governments of those provinces bordering our coastlines will be faced with an increased burden when they have to pay their share of moneys that this amendment, in effect, says they must make available. I merely point this out. I hope, too, that we shall hear, from time to time, statements on this matter from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) who seems to be exceedingly critical of provincial governments. I hope he will remember that by employing means such as the introduction of this amendment, the federal government is attempting to crawl out from responsibilities it assumed in the first place. The federal government proposed the changes in the medicare financial provisions which has been, in the first instance, introduced by the federal government.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a suggestion to the hon. parliamentary secretary, in view of the remarks of the hon. member of Skeena (Mr. Howard) before lunch. I should like to ask him to consider consulting with the law officers of the Crown to determine whether or not the mayor of Toronto is a denizen within the definition of that hon. member of the House of Lords in England.

More seriously, I have a question in respect of clause 2 of the bill regarding section 315(c). The hon. parliamentary secretary will note that this section limits the definition of a port. Why are existing ports, as well as those likely to be constructed in the Arctic islands and along the whole North Arctic coast of Canada, except Hudson's Bay and James Bay, excluded from this definition? I am particularly interested in this in view of the government's announced determination to develop our north in a better fashion than we have in the past.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. member a question in respect of his very reasonable suggestion regarding inquiries to be made by law officers of the Crown. Would the hon. member be prepared to extend that to cover the present position of the former mayor of Toronto?

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I spoke earlier but I should like to suggest that a number of hon. members have posed questions in anticipation of the parliamentary secretary dealing with them in his closing remarks.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I might point out that if the parliamentary secretary speaks at this point he will close the debate.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Haidasz: Mr. Speaker, I should like first to thank hon. members for raising some interesting points. I hope, at least in a general way, to give them an interim answer. Other details can be obtained by questioning the officials when they appear before the committee studying this bill.

Before I answer some of these questions, I should like to state that on August 14 of last year the deputy minister of national health received a statement from the general manager of the Canadian Chamber of Shipping which read as follows:

> The Canadian Chamber of Shipping, which represents most of the deep-sea shipping interests in Canada through the Shipping Federation of Canada, the British Columbia Employers Association, the Chamber of Shipping of British Columbia, the B.C. Towboat Owners' Association, advocates repeal of Part V of the Canada Shipping Act.

As far as the questions are concerned, I will answer the hon. member for Skeena's (Mr. Howard) very interesting discourse about the obsolescence and antiquity of the Canada Shipping Act. I should like to say, however, that the shipping Act was amended in 1953, 1956, 1957, 1960, 1961 and again today we are proposing to amend it to bring it up to date as soon as possible.

The shipping act itself contains approximately 735 clauses with many schedules. I have been told that the officials of the Department of Transport are working to bring the Canada Shipping Act up to date, and I can perhaps state that we should be getting extensive amendments or perhaps a new Canada Shipping Act. I do not know personally, but I know second hand it is being revised and that the officials are very busy studying it in an attempt to bring it up to date.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) raised a question about coasting vessels, as did other hon. members of this House. As the proposals in this bill C-10, indicate, coasting vessels will no longer come under the new act. So far as drugs are concerned, this matter was raised both by the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) and the hon. member for Peace River. It is true that under the new section, the cost of drugs is the only major benefit that will not be provided to sick mariners. By the amendment to Part V, this benefit will not be provided except in respect of drugs administered by the examining physician.

The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) asked a question about the Oronsay and its relationship to the present bill. The only way it relates to the Canada Shipping Act is in respect of the provision of medical services to sick crew members on the Oronsay. So far as the public health aspect is concerned, that comes under the Quarantine Act. There is a provision in the regulations dealing with contagious diseases which covers the outbreak of typhoid fever on a ship.

The hon. member for South Western Nova also raised a question in respect of sick mariners obtaining medical attention. In answer to him, I must say that the customs officer determines simply the eligibility of the sick mariner. In other words, he determines whether or not he is eligible for medical care. After the customs officer establishes the fact, in an ordinary case which is not an emergency, that this crew member needs medical care and is eligible, he then refers the sick mariner to a physician or hospital designated not by him but by the Department of National Health and Welfare. Apparently it has been found desirable for administrative purposes to provide some checks in order to prevent certain abuses. That is the reason this regulation is again in the bill.

The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Ryan) raised a point in respect of clause 2 of the bill concerning designated ports in the Northwest Territories and along the Arctic shores. So far, the information available to me indicates that at the present time, in respect of Part V, there has been no necessity to include any provision such as that suggested by the hon. member for Spadina. I would not be surprised if, during the recasting of the Canada Shipping Act which I have been told is under way, there should be a good deal of consideration given to the hon. member's suggestion.

Mr. Comeau: Mr. Speaker, might I ask the parliamentary secretary one final question? What happens in a case where a crew member becomes sick and does not live in the area of the port of call? A distance of 30 or 40 miles might be involved. He might be at home, require medical attention and find that the doctor at the port cannot come to his home. I have reference to a situation in a province which does not have a medical care plan. Would this sick crew member be allowed to engage the services of another medical practitioner?

Mr. Haidasz: In the case of an emergency, when there is not sufficient time to follow the procedures established by the act and its regulations, a sick mariner or member of a fishing crew would have to be taken to the emergency department of a hospital or to a physician. As soon as possible, he should communicate with the master of his ship who would get in touch with the Customs officer so that the Customs officer would be in a position to fill out the necessary papers.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

QUARANTINE ACT

MEASURE TO PREVENT INTRODUCTION INTO CANADA OF INFECTIOUS OR CONTAGIOUS DISEASES

Hon. Léo Cadieux (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill S-12, to prevent the introduction into Canada of infectious or contagious diseases be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether the Minister of National Defence is to explain the bill on second reading?

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present to the House for its consideration Bill S-12 a new act to prevent the introduction into Canada of infectious or contagious diseases. The short title may be cited as the Quarantine Act. This bill was given first reading in the Senate on November 18, 1969. Two days later, debate on second reading commenced during which many informative and valuable remarks were made. After study before the Senate Health, Welfare and Science Committee, the committee report was presented on December 10, 1969 which contained a few amendments clarifying some questions that had been raised. The bill was then read a third time and passed on December 16, 1969.

The Quarantine Act is now contained in chapter 231 of the Revised Statutes of Canada and was first made the subject of Canadian legislation in 1868. Except for two amendments made at the end of World War I, the legislation has remained the same in substance and in context since first enacted more than 100 years ago.

As was reasonable at the time of its enactment, and even at the time of the amendments in 1918 and 1919, the text of the act was considered adequate to deal with inward traffic by ship to Canada, the language of the act speaking throughout of "masters of vessels", of quarantine stations at maritime ports of entry, of coasting traffic and so forth. Nowhere does the act recognize by any reference the immense degree to which inward passenger and cargo traffic entails air travel, the use of numerous international airports or the frequency with which international air traffic must be received and admitted into Canada. Other developments and changes in the area of transportation and communications have similarly rendered obsolete certain other matters of substance, as well as the language of the Quarantine Act and, for this reason also, early revision is imperative. The urgency arises out of the degree to which the obsolescence referred to is increasing in significance and the difficulty of effecting useful quarantine measures becoming more marked.

• (2:20 p.m.)

The quarantine service of Canada has a very interesting historical record which I will review only briefly. Attempts to control the introduction of communicable diseases by visiting travellers predates confederation and, indeed, most other forms of community public health services. The word "quarantine" dates back to the 14th century at least and is usually ascribed to the 40 days of isolation imposed by the local government on travellers arriving in certain Italian ports in an attempt to prevent them from infecting the local inhabitants. There were quarantine regulations in force at all major North American ports in colonial times. In Canada, the first Quarantine Act was passed by the first session of the first Dominion Parliament, and it was probably one of its first items of business. This act made the minister of agriculture responsible for administering the regulations. The first regulations made under the Canadian Quarantine Act were signed by the Governor in Council on May 23, 1868.

The original regulations make reference to only three quarantine stations located at Grosse Isle—an island in the St. Lawrence below Quebec city—at Halifax, and at Saint John, N.B. The stations at the latter two points were situated at Lawlor's Island and Partridge Island respectively. All three stations predated confederation, having been established by the cities concerned in the early 1830's. The graves which may still be seen on these islands are mute evidence of the epidemics of smallpox, cholera and typhus which raged at that time. Additional stations were opened from time to time on the east coast as increased maritime traffic required, and in 1884 the first station was established on the west coast at Victoria, or more precisely at Albert Head and subsequently removed to William Head. By 1896, additional stations had been opened on the west coast and a medical superintendent of quarantine for British Columbia appointed.

During these early years cholera and typhus from Europe, yellow fever from South and Central America and the West Indies, cholera from the Far East, and smallpox from everywhere were the most feared. The last quarantine at Grosse Isle was in 1928-29 for smallpox; at Halifax in 1937-38 for smallpox, and in 1944-45 for typhus; at Saint John in 1920-21 for smallpox, and at William Head in 1938-39 for smallpox and in 1945-46 for typhus.

Quarantine stations at Grosse Isle, Halifax, Saint John and William Head, with their full facilities for large numbers of passengers, hospitals for treatment and large staffs with disinfecting equipment became unnecessary owing to the identification of the organisms of the diseases, methods of prevention by immunisation and vaccination, new medicines and treatments and improvement of world sanitation and international travel regulations. The quarantine station at Grosse Isle was closed in 1937, and subsequently the stations at Lawlor's and Partridge Islands were closed, and in 1959 William Head was closed. Canada now has five organized quarantine stations at Quebec, Halifax, Saint John, New Brunswick, St. John's, Newfoundland, and Victoria, B.C., with their substations. In addition, there are unorganized inland and maritime quarantine stations where customs officers act as quarantine officers.

The responsibility for the quarantine service was transferred from the department of agriculture to the department of immigration and colonization for one year, then to the department of health in 1919 which in 1928 became the department of pensions and national health. In 1944, responsibility was transferred to the Department of National Health and Welfare with the passing of the National Health and Welfare Act.

The general pattern of quarantine operations remained substantially the same until after World War II, although these decades were marked by a gradual diminution of the major quarantinable diseases. During the 1940's, increased attention was given to health problems on an international scale, and on October 1, 1952 the international sanitary regulations of the World Health Organization to which Canada subscribed without reservation from the outset, came into effect. Prior to World War II the quarantine service was concerned with marine traffic only. Commercial aircraft capable of carrying passengers to Canada from outside North America did not exist.

Soon after World War II the situation began to change rapidly and the establishment of quarantine offices at airports became necessary. In the succeeding two decades, the rate of growth of commercial aviation outstripped almost all other forms of transport, and now the number of persons arriving by air cleared through quarantine each year exceeds one million. The number continues to increase by about 15 per cent annually. This development has significantly changed the entire pattern of quarantine problems.

The reduction of quarantinable diseases throughout large areas of the world, as well as the greatly improved rapid methods of reporting incidence of disease which have been developed by the World Health Organization, have substantially reduced the danger of importation of major quarantinable disease by maritime traffic as infected areas are, for the most part, located sufficiently far away from Canada and it is impossible for vessels to complete the journey within the incubation period of the disease. Aircraft, however, readily transport passengers from highly infected areas to Canadian airports within a single day.

While vigilance must be maintained in respect of marine traffic and especially to guard against the importation of plague by rodents, air traffic has become of primary concern. This is further aggravated by the natural tendency of the passenger and the carrier not to lose the advantage of speed inherent in air travel by time consuming inspection procedures on arrival, and pressures for expeditious clearance of passengers continually increase. A new age is imminent. High capacity aircraft carrying up to 500 persons will begin operating this year. Supersonic aircraft capable of crossing the Atlantic in approximately three hours will be in operation later in the decade. Both will bring with them their particular problems.

Bill S-12, a recasting of the quarantine act, is designed to minimize the risk of importation into Canada of the major quarantinable diseases which, fortunately, have been eradicated in Canada but which, if imported, could be the cause of serious morbidity and, indeed, mortality. Our major concern is in respect of smallpox, cholera and plague, and this is reflected in the clauses of Bill S-12. We are aware of the improvement in global health conditions resulting from preventive health measures applied in other states which, in certain areas, were undertaken with the assistance of the World Health Organization. However, until the major quarantinable diseases are eradicated from the world, legislation which provides authority to inspect and examine international passengers and international carriers entering Canada for the purpose of determining the risk presented to public health, is necessary.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I think there are several interesting conclusions to be drawn from this bill, but first I want to thank the parliamentary secretary for giving us a full and concise statement of the basic reasons behind the introduction of the legislation and for explaining to us what is involved. I was very interested to hear his comment that this is the first full scale amendment of the act in over 100 years. I would point out to my good friend, the hon. gentleman who is the leader on the government side of the house the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald), that what this House should be interested in is good legislation, even if it takes a little longer to pass. I am not suggesting that because this act has not been amended substantially for 100 years it need not have been. Obviously, there could have been some amendments. However, measures which have been conceived in haste and often disguised for political purposes so as to get a number of measures through the House, will not replace good measures which will stand the test of time.

Obviously there was a need for amendment here, a need for change. The recent experience of passengers aboard the liner which was held up off the west coast is an indication of the difficult situations which can arise in the modern world and which give rise to a need for change. The use of aircraft was not in the contemplation of those who occupied this chamber at the time this act was passed. This circumstance in itself is reason enough for considering changes in the regulations. It is likely that the bill will receive close examination in committee; there are many technical aspects involved which obviously are not susceptible of being dealt with adequately here.

There is one point I should like to make at this time. This bill, like so many others this session, provides that the usual wide discretionary powers be given to the Governor in Council to act by order in council, by regulation or by decree. I call this to the attention of the House as I have done in the case of so many bills in the past.

This morning I raised this particular issue by addressing questions to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) and to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in which I referred particularly to the report of the Special Committee on Statutory Instruments which goes right to the heart of the question raised by clause 19 of the bill before us. The very widest powers are given by that clause to the Governor in Council to enact various regulations, including the power to require persons arriving in Canada to produce to a quarantine officer evidence of immunization to any infectious or contagious disease.

There was an interesting discussion on this subject in the other place. One hon. Senator proposed there should be included in the regulatory power a right to provide for exemptions, and he gave certain reasons in support of his view that this power ought to be included. As I read from the proceedings of the Committee on Health, Welfare and Science in the other place, he suggested:

> That persons with eczema or diseases such as leukemia, lymphoma, or generalized malignancy or those who may have lowered resistance such as from therapy with steroids, alkylating drugs, antimetabolites or radiation, or during pregnancy in which immunization is deemed to be contra-indicated, be exempted from this section at the discretion of the quarantine officer.

This was opposed by hon. Senators who were supporters of the government. I notice that one Senator from Calgary, speaking of the need for exemption in the case of a pregnant woman, asked: "How are we going to know whether a woman is pregnant or not when a lot of them do not know themselves?" I consider this to be a very weak answer to the suggestion made by the Senator who proposed the amendment. Nevertheless, it illustrates the point I tried to make this morning, one which was evaded by the President of the Privy Council and passed off by the Prime Minister in a rather humorous way.

If we give to this government or to any government the right to legislate by order in council, as we are being asked to do in clause 19, it is imperative that Parliament be provided with the means of checking these regulations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baldwin: The committee report to which I referred was a report from an all-party committee which held a series of useful and valuable meetings characterized by a lack of partisanship highly enlightening to those who think the House of Commons is a continuous battleground. It was proposed there, for example—and I relate my remarks to this particular clause—that all these regulations should first be vetted by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) to make sure they contained a measure of certainty, legality and reason. It was suggested that before regulations were made, the widest possible notice should be given so that persons interested might have an opportunity to make representations. When we are asked to pass a measure of this kind, and are aware of its implications, we must see to it that safeguards are available to the people of this country.

Someone said: Let no man stand between me and my liberty. Well, day after day, year after year, we continue, while legislating on behalf of the people of Canada, to give away rights which are theirs and which they have given us no mandate to destroy as we are now doing. It is becoming an accepted fact that in any legislative program the first thing to be prepared is the section having to do with regulations; all the rest is then built around it. It is the case here. It is the case with regard to any number of bills with which we have recently been dealing—the rules of relevancy will not permit me to give examples in detail.

There can be no doubt we are slowly eroding the rights of the people of Canada by giving to the government, in the form of a clause such as this, the power to make regulations far more detailed and far more threatening to the lives and rights of the ordinary people of Canada than any of the legislative clauses which surrounds the regulatory section.

• (2:40 p.m.)

I realize the President of the Privy Council told us that some time before the end of the session the government proposed to bring in what it thought was the proper means of checking these regulatory powers. His answer was along these lines: A committee has brought in a report which the government is considering, and in due course measures which the government feels to be appropriate will be laid before the House. I am quite prepared to listen to the views of the government, but I would point out that I am referring now to the report of an all-party committee of the House. I think it contemptuous for the President of the Privy Council to take this position. What we are doing is building up a sort of collective tinpot dictatorship in this country. Those of us who stand idly by and let this happen without protest are not justified in accepting the position we have in this House. I especially say this to hon. members on the other side who have a greater responsibility in many ways than we to ensure that this government is called to account, and is not allowed freedom to pass these sections without some of the safeguards and protections contained in the report of the Standing Committee on Special Instruments.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I listened, Mr. Speaker, with interest to the review of the quarantine legislation which was given by the parliamentary secretary. I did not hear him go into the question of whether there were or had been any denizens in quarantine stations during the operations of the legislation. However, I agree that the legislation as it stands in chapter 231 of the Revised Statutes, which is proposed to be repealed by this bill, is outmoded in some of its wording. Perhaps in parenthesis I might say that I hope some of the anachronisms in the Canada Shipping Act illustrated by the remarks of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), will be eliminated with more dispatch than has been the case in the past. The Canada Shipping Act has been under consideration for quite a long time, but I am not sure whether we are any closer to revisions now than we were five years ago, judging from the remarks made earlier.

The bill under consideration is not directly related to the one discussed earlier, except in so far as it also deals with a very hoary piece of legislation. Anyone could see that the changing pattern of entry into Canada makes the updating of this legislation an immediate requirement and, after examination by the committee, all members of this House would probably consent to the basic idea of this bill.

I listened with some interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and as a general proposition I find myself in agreement with his ideas concerning legislation by regulation. However, it behooves us to look at the clauses of this bill which give to the Governor in Council the power to legislate of which the hon. member speaks. I find myself somewhat puzzled that he should have picked upon this particular piece of legislation to raise the question and my reaction to a comparison of this bill with the Quarantine Act is that the powers of the Governor in Council are somewhat more restricted under the proposed legislation than under the existing act.

I might make reference in particular to the definition of an infectious or contagious disease which, under the proposed act applies to the particular diseases listed in the schedule. I think the committee should have some explanation from medically competent people why it is proposed to specifically restrict the definition of contagious or infectious diseases to those set out in the schedule. Most of them are familiar to me, Mr. Speaker, but I have not encountered anybody with relapsing fever (louse borne).

In an informal discussion with the hon. member for Skeena this morning, we were speculating whether this might be some kind of political disease to which members of this House were subject, particularly those who currently sit on the government side. Upon reflection however, I decided not to push the point—at least at the second reading stage of this debate.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I conclude that, since this is basically just a piece of housekeeping legislation and generally speaking does update the provisions of our Quarantine Act, it is, to that extent at least, a bill which merits support. It may be, since it has been considered in the other place, that the bill could be reported back to this chamber without amendment. This will have to be determined when it is considered by the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Services.

CRIMINAL RECORDS

PROVISION FOR RELIEF OF CONVICTED PERSONS

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General) moved that Bill C-5, to provide for relief of persons who have been convicted of offences and subsequently rehabilitated themselves, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill represents an attempt on the part of the government to bring forward legislation that will deal with one aspect of the field of corrections that has been causing concern to all those working in the field and to public figures who have thought about the subject. The area I speak about is the apparently unjust consequences that still attach to a person who has been convicted of an offence but who has long since rehabilitated himself and become integrated into society in a wholly satisfactory way.

The consequences, in those circumstances, of having a conviction can work many injustices as well as leaving a stigma on the character of the person. This, it would seem clear, should be removed to the extent it is possible to do so. The great interest and concern in this subject was well evidenced by the private bill brought forward in the last Parliament in 1966 and dealt with in a committee of this House in the next year, as well as subsequent bills that have been brought forward in this Parliament.

The approach in this bill is quite different from that in the bill brought forward by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Tolmie). His private bill sought to deal with the matter differently; I think the term used was "expunging the records of the courts". This bill approaches the problem in a different way. It is an attempt to remove the consequences of the conviction and we believe will be more effective in achieving the desired objectives. The objectives, of course, in any of the legislation submitted for consideration by the House were never in question. It is a matter of working out the best method of achieving the objectives and, unfortunately, there is no background of statistics on this subject that is of much help. There is very little, other than the actual experience of the workers in this field.

The bill itself approaches the problem in this way: It provides that the person concerned make application and the National Parole Board, which we believe to be the body best equipped to examine into these kinds of problems and with the most experience in this field, examine into the particular case and make the recommendation for the grant of a pardon if the facts warrant it.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

The grant of a pardon, in itself, does not necessarily solve all problems but it seems to be the closest approach we know towards solving some of the problems that arise in these cases. It will be seen when the bill is examined in committee that it provides for the procedures of the board and makes significant provisions relating to the grant of a pardon. Clause 5 of the bill reads as follows:

> 5. The grant of a pardon (a) is evidence of the fact that the Board, after making proper inquiries, was satisfied that an applicant was of good behaviour and that the conviction in respect of which the pardon is granted should no longer reflect adversely on his character; and (b) vacates the conviction in respect of which it is granted, unless the pardon is subsequently revoked.

Thus, the pardon is evidence of rehabilitation of good character and it vacates the conviction. It does these three things.

There is a subsequent provision in the bill that deals with the withdrawal of records. The approach to this aspect, which we believe to be the best approach we can work out, is the following: It is not accurate to say that a record that has been made many years ago can be physically obliterated, because there are records in the memories of other persons, there are newspaper reports and there is all sorts of documentation in many places. What we have sought to do here, and we think this will prevent the improper use of old records, is to have them withdrawn to the central authority in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police where they then can be sealed and only brought out under the limited conditions, set out in the act, when it is apparent that their use would be necessary. That is the approach to that problem.

As hon. members know, there has always been a right to grant a pardon under the royal prerogative of mercy. It is interesting to know that in the whole period of 40 years from 1910 to 1959 inclusive, there were only 32 ordinary pardons granted under the royal prerogative of mercy. Perhaps I should give some more recent figures. In 1966, the year the Department of the Solicitor General was created, 21 ordinary pardons were granted. In 1967, there were 36 ordinary pardons granted; in 1968, there were 75 ordinary pardons granted and in 1969, and I shall speak about the pardons of 1969 in a particular way in a moment, some 131 pardons were recommended by the National Parole Board under the existing procedure.

So, hon. members can see the increase in the use of this prerogative. That increase in use stems from the fact that, in an effort to find some kind of solution or get started towards a solution to this problem, we began to use the royal prerogative of mercy as a method of granting pardons. This in large measure, although not quite, is what will be achieved under the legislation. By itself, the present procedure is rather cumbersome. Actually, until this bill is passed, there is only authority for the minister to request the parole board to look into each individual case and then, in each individual case, sign a recommendation to His Excellency, the Governor General and have the individual's pardon granted by His Excellency, the Governor General.

It will be seen that that procedure is not adequate at all to deal with the problem but it was very useful in giving the parole board and those authorities concerned in the field of correction a lot of administrative experience. In addition, the procedure helped in finding out what would best meet the problems that arise with those persons who have been unfortunate enough to have a conviction registered against them but have long since rehabilitated themselves and re-established themselves. This experience, which has been sharply accelerating throughout the latter part of the year, has indeed been very useful and has confirmed us in the belief that the approach evidenced in this bill is the best approach in trying to deal with the problem.

There will be, of course, sharply increased numbers of these applications once the bill is passed. The very limited experience so far indicates or appears to indicate that it would be very useful in meeting these problems. There is a lot of detail about the bill that can best be discussed in committee when the appropriate officers who deal with these problems are available. I, for one, welcome the opportunity to have the bill before committee so that all hon. members who are interested and concerned in this subject can ask the questions they wish, obtain all the information that is available and make suggestions that may be helpful in improving the bill.

I for one do not view the bill as the final answer. I hope it will get quick passage through the House and then be re-examined at the end of two or three years experience when we will be in a better position to know what improvements can be made in the administrative procedure and what changes and other improvements should be made to its provisions.

Already we have found, since embarking on this course, that we have been able to do a great many things of a beneficial nature, particularly in the employment field. This has been the result of co-operation on the part of personnel officers and management in a great many large firms. The response and attitude in that regard have been rather good. The available information in this regard can be given to hon. members at the committee stage. One of the things we had not anticipated, which seems to have been very effective, is that we grant a pardon as distinct from trying to deny that there ever was a record. That approach seems to have been very well received.

Already there have been changes made in what we might now regard as rather offensively worded questions on this subject which appear on many applications for employment. That whole aspect of the subject should be examined in committee. It is possible that we will require further legislation on that aspect after a review of the administrative practices and some experience with the measure. I hope we will not prematurely introduce compulsory legislation forcing people to do certain things, at least at this stage. As a result of our limited experience so far, I hope we do not make the granting of a pardon an automatic process. That does not seem to create a situation most beneficial to the one who has a record but has successfully rehabilitated himself.

I do not think there is much more I can usefully add on this subject. I welcome the opportunity of putting the bill before the House and I am sorry we were not able to put it forward earlier. I welcome the opportunity of discussing this matter with hon. members at the committee stage.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I ask this question now because I may not get the opportunity to speak on the bill before our time expires. My question relates to the last point made by the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith). I have in mind questions on application forms for Canadian citizenship, for employment in the public service and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and for visas to go to other countries.

Does the minister envisage that the effect of a pardon will be to allow a person who has been convicted of other than a minor traffic offence to answer "No" to the question: Have you ever been convicted of an offence other than a minor traffic offence?

Mr. McIlraith: This question has been dropped from some of the forms to which the hon. member has referred. That has already been done by administrative action. In respect of some of the other matters under discussion, it has been thought that the question might be: Has the applicant ever been convicted of any offence for which a pardon has not been granted? There would then be no need to disclose an offence for which a pardon had been granted. Quite a bit of detailed information can be given to the committee on this point.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I was privileged to be a member of the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs during the last Parliament. This committee spent part of two sessions on the subject of the destruction of criminal records, and it considered several private bills submitted by hon. members of this House. The evidence was not completed during the first session of the 27th Parliament and the meetings carried through into the second session. Finally, a report dated December 19, 1967, was made to the House.

In the first place, I commend the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith) for making a move on this subject. There was a very great divergence of opinion in the committee as to how this matter should be approached. The committee was not prepared to make an absolute and final recommendation, although it did make a report. The report recommended that legislation be enacted incorporating the principle of expunging criminal records on the basis of several considerations. I do not want to read the five or six considerations in full, because obviously they have been considered by the Solicitor General who adopted a completely different approach from that recommended by the committee.

At this stage I think we should take a brief look at this principle before it goes to the committee for further consideration. A question just raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) concerning the effect a pardon would have on a person who has been convicted of one criminal offence, with no further record for a period of five years, who had led a normal and reformed life and then applies for one of the special things for which many people apply. The individual may apply for an immigration visa to go to another country, either for a short term or to work; he may apply for a bond in connection with employment he is about to take; he may apply for employment in an agency which requires a form to be filled out.

One question almost always asked on these forms is: Have you ever been convicted of a criminal offence? The wording of the bill as presented is a little vague. I should like to ask the Solicitor General, a couple of questions if I can get his attention, which perhaps he will answer when closing the debate.

The first question relates to the type of question already asked. Clause 5(a), which is the effective clause, says that the granting of a pardon vacates the conviction in respect of which it is granted. The word "vacates" is one I cannot recall having been used in legal terminology except in respect of certain actions which have been taken in the courts. Does the Solicitor General feel that if a pardon vacates the conviction, the person involved is entitled to say, "I do not have a criminal record" or, "I have not been convicted"? If the conviction is vacated, what does it mean? It certainly does not go as far as the meaning of the word "expunge," which is the word that kept coming up during the discussions in the committee.

I believe we are left pretty much in the dark in respect of the real effect of this legislation. If the granting of a pardon vacates a conviction, may we assume that the conviction has been wiped out? A question was asked of the minister concerning the forms being changed so that the question would be: Have you ever been convicted of an offence for which a pardon was not granted? If a provision were included in the legislation to require application forms to contain a question of this type, I think 99 out of every 100 doubts members of the committee had would be answered.

I hope the minister will say that in respect of a criminal offence for which a person could be subsequently pardoned, nobody may include in an application form of any kind a question other than the one set out in the act. I believe this is the meat of the whole problem. Such a clause, however, is not in the bill. I do not know whether it was considered and abandoned, or whether it was not considered.

Mr. McIlraith: It was considered at great length.

Mr. Aiken: The minister advises that it was considered, so presumably it was abandoned. I would like this matter to be reconsidered, because I think such a provision would eliminate the concern of many people. What is the use of having a procedure whereby a conviction is wiped out and it is established that a person is of good character, if that person then became involved in filling out a form which asked if he was ever convicted of a criminal offence, to which he would have to answer "Yes"? This person would then find himself in further difficulties. However, if the question, "Have you ever been convicted of a criminal offence for which you have not been granted a pardon" were asked, he could answer "No" and that would be the end of the matter. I firmly believe the committee should take a very serious look at this matter when the bill comes before the committee. This is a point that everyone is concerned about.

A second point I should like to raise concerns offences for which a person was convicted in the past maybe once or maybe twice, which now have been made legal. Recently amendments to the Criminal Code were passed. I know of a number of cases in the past involving doctors who were convicted of performing abortions. I thought the convictions, as a matter of humanity, were outrageous. I agreed with some portions of the Criminal code bill, because many of these doctors were performing a service to humanity which if performed now would not involve a criminal offence.

The same argument applies to certain sexual offences which were under the Criminal Code. They were illegal one day, and on the following day they were legal. Should not a pardon be issued as a matter of course in such situations? I suggest this is another matter which the committee should examine, because in these cases the law has changed and such a person would not now be regarded as having a criminal record.

The third matter which concerns me a little is that of the one-time offender convicted some years ago perhaps of a minor offence; then years go by and he never applies for a pardon, perhaps on the ground that he does not think there is any record of the conviction or because he thinks this bill would wipe it out after five years. This is one of the dangers which arises in connection with the bill. Such a person may not apply for a pardon because he might think that because there was only one conviction of a minor nature, all he would do by applying for a pardon would be to stir up things again. This would mean that the Parole Board would have to institute an investigation, and he would fear its officers visiting his home or people inquiring whether he was still, as the act states, a person of good character.

There may be many situations in which the person whom we are really trying to protect would be discriminated against because he made such application, whereas a person who did not would not be in the same position. It might sound as if I am splitting hairs, but I do not think I am.

A number of these people probably would be very hesitant about applying for a pardon because they might think they would rather let sleeping dogs lie until the day they have a chance to obtain a better job, move to another country or provide a bond for a friend. When this day comes, they suddenly find that the record which they thought was long dead is still there. As the minister has admitted, this bill does not cover such a situation.

Also, this bill does not cover the situation in respect of the record of juveniles. A lot of time was spent on this matter during the sittings of the standing committee. I have very strong views in respect of the records of juvenile offenders. According to the Juvenile Delinquents Act, these records are not to be used. A person under age 16 in Ontario, and under age 18 in some other provinces, is deemed not to be a criminal but rather a person in need of aid and assistance. The Juvenile Delinquents Act is so framed that such a person does not have a criminal record. But the police consider that there is a criminal record in respect of such a person.

The records in some juvenille courts are made available, improperly, to the police. I think that in respect of the very few cases where there is no further record of the offence, the record in the juvenile court should die there. I believe this bill should contain a clause amending the Juvenile Delinquents Act which would make specifically clear that all records of juvenile delinquents, after these persons have reached age 16, should be expunged, sealed and not reopened. One cannot say they were never there, but one can say they will never be referred to.

A person convicted of a criminal offence may answer "No" to the question on the application form. But there is much misuse of juvenile court records. They are misused because nowhere is it provided clearly what should be done with them. Many bills that we pass in this House contain clauses amending acts, to make them conform. I would like the juvenile delinquents problem cleared up once and for all. Amendments to the Juvenile Delinquents Act have been kicking around for a long time; they go back to long before the Liberal Party came into power in 1963. I remember that a former minister of justice, Mr. Fulton, set up a committee to deal with the matter. The whole question of juvenile delinquency seems to have died.

Mr. McIlraith: No, it is still very much alive.

Mr. Aiken: It is just as alive as it has been for a number of years.

Mr. McIlraith: But it is much more vigorous now.

Mr. Aiken: It is in a drugged state, in a state of torpor. I am glad to hear the minister say that he is considering some amendments to the act, and if he will bring in a bill shortly I will go on to another subject. There is no reason why, when we are dealing with expunging the record or getting rid of the record of past convictions, we should not touch on that subject.

This bill does not make any provision in regard to juvenile delinquents. I think that is a very serious shortcoming because so long as this situation continues the police and agencies connected with them will continue to consider juvenile delinquency records as relating to criminal offences, and this is not right. I make no exception even for a person who gets into trouble later in life; in these cases their past record should also be wiped out.

There is one other point I would like to make. It was stated during the hearings of the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs that the police in fact have two records; the official record which we are trying to expunge—or vacate, in the wording of the bill—and an unofficial record which is sometimes called a police blotter type of record, which they keep separately.

This evidence was given by Chief Mackey, chief of the Toronto police, as recorded at page 59 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the committee meeting of November 2, 1967. Chief Mackey said very clearly that these records are all in special files, not in the ordinary police files, so the argument of the police that they need them to catch up with known criminals is a fallacy. They do not need them, because they have the record in another file—a record which will never be expunged. In fact, there is no suggestion that police records will ever be expunged. They have their modus operandi files from which they catch up with people. They also have them in respect of juveniles.

We can never get rid of these records, and perhaps we should not. However, these records are not the ones I am talking about. I am referring to the public records which I believe should be dealt with in such a way that a one-time offender is assured that after a reasonable period of time someone will not come along and blackmail him because at one time he committed an offence about which no one has ever heard.

I would like to make one more point regarding the revocation of a pardon. Clause 7 provides that if it is established to the satisfaction of the Governor in Council that the person to whom a pardon was granted is no longer of good character, his pardon may be revoked. I think this is one of the most difficult clauses to accept. What is a person of good character, and who is to decide about it? We have always held that a person is innocent until proven guilty. In this country we do not draw a distinction between good people and bad people. They are all people, but they may have been convicted of an offence. Whether they are of good character is a matter of opinion in every case.

I think it will be very difficult to establish that a person is no longer of good character. If it were the other way round, I might not be so concerned. In other words, if the bill provided that a pardon would not be granted if a person was not of good character, perhaps there would be some argument for it. In that case it could be established to the satisfaction of the Parole Board that, in addition to being convicted of an offence, the person in question consorted with other persons who had been convicted and had engaged in activities that verge on criminal. Perhaps such a person had been found in the company of persons whose backgrounds made it obvious that he was leading a life of crime.

However, this clause is different—it relates to the revocation of a pardon. The man has been pardoned and his offence has been expunged from the record, then someone says that he is not of good character any more and his pardon will be revoked. This is a dangerous clause, because under these provisions a man can be convicted without trial, which is contrary to our understanding of the law.

I find acceptable that part of the clause which provides that if a person has made deceptive statements in his application, his pardon can be revoked. There is a perfectly valid ground for revoking his pardon if he has made incorrect statements, failed to disclose evidence, or information comes to light that was not revealed previously. However, the fact that a person is no longer of good character is, in my opinion, not sufficient ground for revoking his pardon.

I think that the principle of granting a pardon will be acceptable provided there are enough applications. There must be thousands and thousands of people in this country in the category of those whom this legislation is trying to help, and in favour of whom the committee made recommendations. How many of these people will apply for a pardon? If the number is small, the legislation will be a failure because it will not be achieving the effect that is desired.

I was glad to hear the minister say that the matter will be reviewed, because the number of convictions and pardons will eventually reveal the effectiveness of the statute. I agree that we must take some action. I would like these few matters to be reconsidered in the committee; therefore, I support the recommendation that the bill be referred to the committee. I hope the minister will be prepared to reconsider some of these points which do not go against the principle of the bill but which, if accepted, will make the legislation much more effective.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to pay tribute to my hon. friend from Vancouver-East (Mr. Winch) for the interest he has shown throughout his life in penology and matters such as this. His activities in this connection began long before most hon. members took their seats in Parliament.

As Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in the British Columbia legislature in the forties, he pioneered in an area which was delicate and not very acceptable socially, as did his father. I refer to institutions for mental care, penitentiaries, provincial jails and the like. He took an active interest in problems of rehabilitation, recidivism, parole and related questions. As I say, my hon. friend has shown a lifelong interest in such matters, and having known him personally for some time, I think he deserves commendation on this occasion.

While I am sure the bill is acceptable to everyone in a general sense, it is really not a pace-setter. If anything, it is a bit behind the public conscience in these matters. For some time now the ice has been broken in terms of greater industrial and social acceptance of persons who have been convicted of criminal offences. In addition, we know that the Department of the Solicitor General, through the Parole Board service, has been operating in this field, developing a certain expertise and sophistication in its approach to persons convicted of criminal offences, the expunging of records and the process of pardon which is being used.

I notice that the bill is all-inclusive. It refers to persons who might have been convicted under the Criminal Code or any other federal statute, but the wording in clause 3 indicates that application might be made by a corporate structure as well. In this regard we are aware that a number of companies and corporations in Canada have been convicted of criminal offences, of criminal conspiracy, and have been sentenced in the courts and fined under the Combines Investigation Act.

Technically speaking, these organizations, these companies, would be eligible to make application for pardon. Even the Electric Reduction Company, which we have heard mentioned recently, would be able to apply for a pardon and, presumably, receive one if it applied five years from the time it was convicted of contravening the criminal law of Canada. The difficulty is that there is an element of friendliness involved in the structure of a company, because it is not a company itself which engages in these criminal activities; it is the officials of the company. It is not the Electric Reduction Company which was guilty of criminal offences; it is people like Dr. Solandt who engaged in criminal activity. But he will not have to worry about applying for a pardon. In fact, he has already received one inasmuch as he is being maintained as chairman of the Science Council of Canada, and an endorsement of that kind precludes the necessity of involving himself in the procedure of applying for a pardon.

We are really dealing with persons—with human beings who have fallen foul of the law—and we are hoping to establish machinery sanctioned by legislation which will give them an opportunity to apply for the removal of the stigma attached to the commission of a criminal offence. The idea is that persons will apply, and thus set the process in motion. An investigation will be carried out by officers of the National Parole Board, as is done in practice at the present time.

I suggest that under the provisions of clause 4 there are two items which have been omitted. One concerns persons who are sentenced or dealt with under the Juvenile Delinquents Act. This aspect has been eloquently discussed by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) and does not need further elaboration.

The other omission relates to suspended sentences. The board can cause inquiries to be made when five years has elapsed since a sentence of imprisonment has been served, a period of probation ended or a fine paid. But in the case of a person who received a suspended sentence—and such sentences are often passed when young people are concerned, though not exclusively—I believe we are bound to recognize an area of omission.

In some ways a person who receives a suspended sentence finds himself in a situation which can last forever. Presumably, at any time in the future a court could impose two sentences, should a further offence be committed—one for the current offence and one in respect of the original offence. It seems to me there should be some mechanism by means of which a suspended sentence could be regarded as though it had been imposed and served at the time of conviction. An opportunity should be provided for an individual in those circumstances to apply for removal of the right to impose a sentence after a period of time.

What concerns us in large measure is that an individual affected shall have the right or the opportunity to obtain gainful employment. There is an added psychological element involved—the relief which enters into the person's mind, the sense of well-being he experiences on receiving a pardon. In the few cases known to me in which individuals have applied for and received pardons under the procedure which exists at the present time, this sense of relief was present, as if a shadow had been wiped out and was no longer there to haunt the memory.

The federal government undertook a while ago to remove from all its application forms in connection with employment the question relating to criminal offences. I do not know whether Canadian National Railways still has a question of this kind on its application forms, but it did until not long ago. I know there are individuals working for the CNR, as well as persons in the government service, who lied when they answered that because they wished to obtain employment and thought that if they answered the question honestly and admitted a criminal record, they probably would not obtain work. They are still employed. In some cases the employer knows about the misinformation which was supplied but has decided against taking any action; he has wiped it out and has not taken it as a reason for discontinuing the fellow's employment, which is a helpful and enlightened approach.

In some types of employment there is not any great concern on the part of the employer whether the fellow has a criminal record or not. I worked as a logger on the west coast at one time. The primary desire of logging companies is to get production going, get the logs in the water and on their way to the mills. They do not really care whether a chap has a criminal record as long as he puts in a day's work and keeps up production.

However, companies involved in handling money and valuables are quite concerned about a criminal record, not so much because of the record itself but because it will probably prohibit bonding. This is an area that the government should become involved in; it should establish a substitute bonding arrangement. This is a kind of extension of the concept, but a logical one, and I think the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith) feels as strongly about it as anybody.

Perhaps it is not possible to set up this mechanism for bonding through the federal government, but at least we can explore the possibilities in committee and maybe use this bill as a prelude to some other legislative arrangement. In this way individuals who fall into difficulty about bonding would be helped to find meaningful employment in fields which would otherwise be closed to them.

I think there is a failure in the bill with respect to the question that might be asked by prospective employers about a criminal record. This has already been touched upon by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka and by the minister. Whilst on the subject, I would say that I do not agree with the proposition made a couple of years ago that we change history by expunging criminal records—in effect saying that an individual did not commit a criminal offence.

I submit, even though it is argued by the other side that this is not the case, that although a person may receive a pardon, under this legislation a prospective employer would still be in a position to ask the simple question: Have you ever been convicted of a criminal offence? If the individual is honest about it, regardless of having received a pardon he would be required in conscience to answer that he had. I think we must follow the suggestion of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka and confine the type of question on applications for employment to simply: Have you ever been convicted of a criminal offence for which a pardon under the criminal records act has not been received? The individual would then, in all honesty, be able to answer "No" and that would prevent any further exploration.

According to our rules, Mr. Speaker, we cannot engage in a detailed discussion of clauses of the bill, but I hope I may be permitted to say a word or two on clause 6(2). This clause speaks of keeping records of people who have received a pardon, in the hands of the RCMP in a separate, locked vault. It also states that the existence of the record or the fact of the conviction shall not be disclosed to any person. I think the fact that in clause 6(2) there is reference to the conviction and the existence of a criminal record indicates that in fact the record still exists, in fact the conviction was imposed, in fact history has not been rewritten, and that though the individual may have received a pardon, he was convicted of a criminal offence. No matter what anybody says, always he will have been convicted of a criminal offence. He may have received a pardon, but he still was convicted.

History cannot be rewritten. Newspapers still exist, memories still exist, and as the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka said, police forces still have memories. Detectives know which persons have records, and keep an eye on them. Even now, if an individual should receive parole the knowledge of the criminal background is available to the RCMP in his community. I know of two or three instances where individuals have in effect been hounded—not in the direct sense of being awakened every morning at four o'clock, but hounded by being watched and questions being asked about them. So memory exists in the police force and cannot possibly be wiped out.

Primarily, however, we are talking about employment. I think we can avoid an employer asking questions in a way that would elicit the information that a prospective employee had been convicted of a criminal offence, whether or not he had received a pardon. The bill provides that five years must elapse upon the completion of sentence, probation or payment of a fine, before the individual can apply for and receive a pardon. This leaves open to speculation and comment the period of time between his release from jail and the end of the five-year period. It is difficult enough for anybody to make a go of it upon release from jail at the completion of a sentence, but when employment opportunities are not as good all across the nation as at other times, it is even more difficult.

For the sake of argument, a person released from jail at this time of year and at this point in our history would have more difficulty finding employment than if released during a period of high employment. Also, after two years in jail unemployment insurance benefits are not carried forward, so there is not that assistance to fall back upon. Many people have difficulty obtaining social welfare assistance and, surprisingly enough, many ex-convicts have an element of pride which precludes them from applying for such assistance. Things are even more difficult, of course, in the absence of any real rehabilitation program. Although we talk about it a good deal, there is no rehabilitation program within our prison structure. Lip service is paid to the concept within our penitentiaries, but primarily our penitentiaries are places where you keep people locked up. That is their primary function and every person in authority, from the warden down to the most recently employed guard, thinks: We are here to keep the prisoners locked up, and maintain discipline. Clearly, those who are looking for any rehabilitative activity within our prison structure are butting their heads against a stone wall.

When a person receives parole there may be some hope for him, especially if he is able to obtain employment and if there are friends or individuals outside to assist him in getting off on the right foot. Where there is no such help, where there is no after care so to speak, the outlook for a former prisoner is not promising. The more people in our penitentiary structure look at a man as being a hardened criminal, the greater will be his difficulty in rehabilitating himself, no matter how much he should want that.

If I might inject my own thoughts here, it might be helpful if, for political reasons only, candidates of political parties in elections were to visit penitentiaries. It would be helpful if we gave the inmates of penitentiaries the right to vote in federal elections, because then candidates and members of political parties would pay more than lip service to the idea of rehabilitating prisoners. I am an advocate of giving the inmates of penitentiaries the vote. After all, the federal Parliament deals with their affairs after they have been incarcerated, but they have no real opportunity to communicate with us in this House. Because they do not vote there is no pressure on political parties to consider them, whereas there would be that pressure if inmates had the right to vote.

I have grave reservations about certain parts of clause 7 which relates to the revocation of pardons. If the Parole Board which granted the original pardon feels the individual is no longer of good character, or if the minister finds he is no longer of good character—no matter what that phrase may mean—the man's pardon may be revoked. I think the pertinent words in the clause are far too vague and too difficult to interpret and should not be retained in the legislation. Perhaps they will be removed in committee, or we might substitute other words for them. In any event, I think we should explore the ideas that would govern the revocation of a pardon or the not granting of an application in the first place.

Also, there appears to be no opportunity to appeal the rejection of an application. There is no opportunity to appeal the revocation of a pardon. Here we are granting by legislation a right that individuals enjoy under our common law; we are spelling it out and adding some characteristics that will give it force and effect. Along with our common rights there is a companion right which says that individuals shall be able to appeal to a court of last resort; yet in the construction of this bill it seems that there is no such right. It is true that the man makes his application to a certain authority; someone within the Parole Board will examine that application, will check with the RCMP or the city police, with former employers and the like, and may come to the conclusion that the person should not be granted a pardon. That, then, is the end of it.

It is true that the individual whose application has been rejected may go to the minister and, for argument's sake, say, "I have applied for a pardon and have not received it. Why not?" The minister will not conduct an inquiry himself; instead, he will go back to the Parole Board, back to the same people who conducted the investigation in the first instance, and will receive from that body the grounds and premises upon which the original application was rejected. Since the minister will have no other information, he will have to advise the individual that this is all the information he has, and that will be the end of the matter.

Although the individual may have a right under law to appeal, that right is abrogated because in effect he will be appealing to that group which made the decision in the first place. I think this is not correct and that some counterbalancing factor ought to be introduced. I am sure the minister thought about this matter when preparing the legislation. Perhaps he will explore it further when we get into committee.

There is in society, as I said a while ago, a much stronger desire now to help those who have been convicted of criminal offences. If we could entice prospective employers, say to work directly with individuals who are inmates of penitentiaries and employ them, there is hope of rehabilitating those men who are lucky enough to be so employed. I do not think we should wait until a man gets out of jail and onto the street and then becomes involved in more trouble.

I have almost concluded my remarks, Mr. Speaker; it is almost four o'clock. If there is disposition on the part of hon. members to continue with the bill and proceed to its conclusion today, we will have no objection.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, in view of the last remark of the hon. member, I wonder if there is disposition to continue with public business, with the prospect of finishing this legislation this afternoon?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, this is the first I have heard about it. The bill in my name is due to be considered. Under our Standing Orders, any private members' hour that is given up on Thursdays or Fridays is lost. I am prepared to consider this on any Monday or Tuesday when there is a right of deferral. In the circumstances, since at considerable inconvenience to myself I have been prepared for the last two weeks to debate the bill that stands in my name, and since I will not be here next week, I will not stand down on this occasion and will insist on private members' hour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

PROVISION THAT ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES COMMISSIONS GIVE REASONS FOR RECOMMENDATIONS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West) moved that Bill C-19, to amend the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity of again bringing forward this point. It was discussed in November of 1968 during the debate on a motion which went much further than does this bill. If hon. members will look at Bill C-19 they will see that it calls for an amendment to section 2, the definition section of the act. I think it would be instructive to put on the record the explanatory note which appears in this bill. It is as follows:

> The purpose of this bill is to require that an Electoral Boundaries Commission for a province, when making its report, support with reasons its recommendations concerning the division of that province into electoral districts, the description of the boundaries of each such district, and the representation and name given to each district. Section 20 of the act requires that a Notice of Motion, made in the House of Commons in objection to recommendations in a commission report, must specify "the provisions of the report objected to and the reasons for the objection". Obviously, the rules of debate in the House will be better observed if the recommendations of a Commission are reasoned amendments to which debate can be directed by Mr. Speaker; obviously, too, there is less likelihood that a debate will be initiated or prolonged if the recommendations are reasonably explained.

On November 20, 1968, there was participation on the part of hon. members of this House in respect of the motion I put on the Order Paper at that time. This is to be found commencing at page 2994 of Hansard for that date. As I said, it went much further than this bill. I do not want to repeat the descriptions I then gave of the results of redistribution whether in the province of Alberta or elsewhere. I think I clearly set those out, and I commend to the House what was said by hon. members on that occasion. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) did not agree with about 10 per cent of what I said—perhaps that is an arbitrary figure—and other hon. members were canvassing the situation or making representations to make sure this question would not come to a vote.

Perhaps I should also propose changes to section 13 of the act as well as section 2, in order to give greater importance to demographic considerations. A number of hon. members opposite during the last debate took great exception to the considerations of demography by the various commissions. I have in mind such things as community of interest, local employment and schooling of children.

As a result of the boundary changes during the last redistribution, we experienced all sorts of mix-ups. I need not describe the terrible situation which exists in some provinces. In my own constituency there is a large area which has no logical connection with the bulk of that constituency. There has been a tremendous amount of house construction in the area. Very fine people live there. When I identify myself to them as their member, and when I talk to the children in the schools, there is absolute amazement on their part that they should be connected with the constituency of Edmonton West. As a matter of fact, there is a standing joke to the effect that Edmonton West goes further east than does Edmonton East, but that is the fact.

It seems to me that on the last redistribution the various commissions did not start from scratch. The Electoral Boundaries Commissions made changes in constituency boundaries on the basis of information prepared by their staff. They worked from census reports after consulting the staff of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and various other offices across the country. No account was taken of the many features that should be considered in respect of constituencies. Perhaps this was because the people were merely ciphers who thought that so many people should be herded into a particular area.

So far as a democratic country is concerned there should be a desire for participation by the people in government. But when you have constituencies with disparity elements, you have a degree of frustration and confusion in those communities which quite naturally do not belong to a specific constituency. It seems to me it would be much better if these demographic considerations were given some weight by the boundaries commissioner's staff who apparently work in the isolation of the ivory tower of Ottawa. Apparently they have no conception of what they are doing in many constituencies. They engage in drawing a zigzag pattern including or excluding areas which turn out to be reserved entirely for industrial or commercial development.

This is the sort of thing experienced by my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski), and myself. These people have engaged in designing a bewildering pattern instead of following natural divisions such as main highways. The area represented by my colleague contains land zoned for warehouse use. As a matter of fact, warehouses have been built there. That may be very nice, but we do not represent people from that area. In other areas the boundaries commission followed a different zigzag pattern, and one has difficulty explaining to people why they do not belong in one constituency or another. After explaining as best one can, they want to know who made such a crazy decision. Surely these people should consult the elected representatives.

An hon. Member: They invited you.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is so, but speaking to the commission is like speaking to a blank wall. I suggest that the commission should give reasons for the changes it makes. It is axiomatic that anyone desiring to make a change must justify that change, whether or not he is a commissioner appointed under a statute. If changes are to be made, or if we argue against proposed changes, reasons should be provided. The discussion will then have some pertinence. During the previous debate some members made comments which indicated they preferred the old system of members attending a committee which carved up the country. I suggest they only displayed their ignorance of what happened in that situation.

• (4:10 p.m.)

It must be remembered nothing is said about changes in the act whereby any report, while it may be debated, can be varied by motion. There is no vote. Members are able to express opinions. If a sufficient number of them wish to object to a particular distribution, limited debate may take place in this House. But no motion can be made. No decision can be made by Members of Parliament concerning the boundaries. However, they have the right to express their opinions concerning how a constituency is redistributed or given new boundaries, because they are the ones who recognize how a constituency should be serviced and whether some people would be effectively disenfranchised. Therefore, I have proposed this amendment to section 2. I hope the amendment will commend itself to the House.

In conclusion, I wish to read a paragraph of the remarks I made on the previous occasion. As recorded at page 2996 of Hansard for November 20, 1968, I said:

> Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I say we want to have something better in the composition of commissions. We want to have something better in the way of the principles upon which a redistribution shall take place, and we want to have the reports of commissions so that we can see just why certain constituencies were put together, thus placing the onus for changes upon the commissions. They have to justify the changes. They may want to make a change by saying. "In this district the population has changes." That is perfectly valid. This is a reason; but there are other reasons that must be included.

I commend this bill to hon. members, and since adoption of the bill would refer it to the standing Committee on Privileges and Elections I move that it be adopted and do not merely say that if hon. members cannot vote in favour of the bill, at least vote to send its contents to the committee. That is not the purpose of the motion at the present time; therefore, I ask that the motion be adopted by this House.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question? The hon. member indicated he thought reasons should be given by the commissions, and he said a population change would be a very acceptable reason. Would he go so far as to include an anticipated shift in population as one of the reasons? So far as the major problem relates to growth, to what extent, in the hon. member's opinion, is it feasible or proper for that kind of reason to be expressed?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I say very simply that I had occasion to point out to the commission that an area in my constituency could be one in which expansion would take place, and that effectively the boundary as drawn prevented any expansion in the constituencies of my colleagues from Edmonton Centre and Edmonton East. This is precisely what has happened since the commission made its report. Land which at that time had been vacant, now contains some 3,000 homes. Two years from now it will perhaps contain 6,000 homes. This land is on the north side of the city of Edmonton. It is an area in which I would say 80 per cent of the non-multiple residential building is taking place. It is an area four miles in breadth and a little over a mile in depth.

In addition, the next step in redevelopment is to be on the western side of my constituency. This was also pointed out to the commission. While they left the land on the west, as I anticipated they would, in effect they prevented any possible expansion by my colleagues in the constituencies represented by them, and the people involved have an affinity with the constituencies of my colleagues rather than with mine, other than the fact that they are residents of the city. For these reasons I think the commissioners should say that they include in a constituency a particular block of land because it is forecast there will be development in the area.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the introduction of this bill by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) gives us today the opportunity to discuss a matter of utmost interest to almost all hon. members. It will soon become topic no. 1 because a forthcoming census will give rise to another revision of the electoral boundaries. Thus the debate might be useful on many counts.

I know that all hon. members recognize that all constituencies are to be established in the most logical, fair and equitable manner possible. Boundaries of electoral districts should be determined in such a way as not to leave too much margin, as it should not be harder or more difficult to represent one district rather than another. That situation, unfortunately, still prevails.

On this point, I share many of the views of the hon. member for Edmonton West, sponsor of the bill. As he aptly stated, the first revision, according to the bill adopted in 1964, was not a success, particularly in some of the provinces. The criteria described in section 13 of the act could perhaps be improved upon or altered to good purpose.

• (4:20 p.m.)

But that was the first time we were using that procedure the purpose of which is to bring about viable political units, taking into account not only population but other criteria as well. To be objective, however, we must admit that it was not an easy task to divide the electoral map because of the vastness of the land, its other geographic characteristics and the number of sparsely populated areas.

Of course, as was said by the hon. member, this was a marked improvement on the old system. Previously, when a committee of the House met to redistribute the electoral map, members were often influenced by partisan considerations, which led to some illogical boundaries.

And it is quite to the honour of the 1964 Liberal government, under the right hon. Mr. Pearson, to have made adopted the principle of an impartial and independent commission to deal with this important but delicate task of reviewing periodicaly the riding limits. This action had generally been well received since it was a significant improvement on the previous system.

However, the Electoral Boundaries Commission had, in its decisions, to take into account the provisions of the act and particularly the principle under which the division of a province into ridings should be effected on the basis of population, keeping as nearly as possible to the electoral quota for the province, that is the quotient obtained by dividing the total population as ascertained by the census by the number of the House of Commons assigned to the province as calculated by the Representation Commissioner under section 12 of the act, subject and according with section 51 of the British North America Act and rules provided therein.

Now, it is to comply with the provisions of this legislation that chapter 31 of the 1964-1965 Statutes of Canada was drafted; in particular, section 13(c) stipulates that the Commission may depart from the rule I just mentioned, for geographic considerations or because of the diversity of interests of the inhabitants of various regions of the province, but the departure from the electoral quota for that province shall not exceed 25 per cent more or 25 per cent less.

Now, I think that at the time of the last redistribution, this exception provision was not used as often as it should have been or as it could be used. In most cases, this difference should have, at least, been taken into account, especially in rural ridings, which sometimes cover such a large area that it is virtually impossible for members to visit them as often as they wish and to get in touch with all their constituents.

I suggest that it is not the same thing to represent a rural district, which may include 50 or 75 rural, semi-urban or urban municipalities, with all the problems that this may imply, and to represent an urban district, generally including a large community and sometimes being part of a large urban centre.

In such a case, this 25 per cent margin should have been fully allowed and this, I suggest, was not done at the last census. It might be advisable to amend these sections in order to give more discretionary power to the Commissioner and to take into account not only the population required to justify the establishment of an electoral district, but also the various demographic, geographic and economic factors.

Under the legislation, before drawing up its report, the Commission must hold public hearings in each province, following the publication of a preliminary report and of a map showing the proposed boundaries. During those hearings, any interested individual who has given notice within the required time can make some comments and suggest some changes.

Now, experience has shown rather clearly, I think, that once the map has been drawn up by the Commission, it is not easy to have it altered, to any great extent, because those changes would affect many neighbouring constituencies and as a result, the electoral map would become useless.

That is why, in my opinion, there have been so few changes, following the public hearings of 1965 or even following the subsequent debates in the House of Commons. In fact, the municipalities, the Chambers of Commerce and the intermediate bodies which submitted briefs often at great cost found that out the hard way. I was told many times that petitioners were not always welcomed by the Commission, even when, as was often the case, briefs revealed the existence of disparities or the inopportunity of combining some areas.

That is why it is most important, first of all, to make good appointments, to choose competent commissioners. However, we must not exclude necessarily those who were active in politics or choose only among judges or university professors as is often the case.

Commissioners have to be not only qualified but impartial also.

It has previously been said that they could be influenced by party considerations. I question that. It certainly did not happen during the latest census, at least not in the province of Quebec. Quite the contrary. As for me, the constituency I had been representing since 1963, that of Stanstead, disappeared. Following the electoral redistribution, it was divided in three. I represent Magog where I live. This region was added to the provincial counties of Brome, Missisquoi and Iberville. As for the town of Iberville it became the new federal constituency of Missisquoi.

[Mr. Forest.]

I can say that electors from the new regions which were added to the former Brome-Missisquoi constituency were quite astonished, especially those residing in the provincial county of Iberville. In fact, following the annexation which followed redistribution, part of the town of Iberville and all the adjoining rural district became the Missisquoi constituency, whereas the remaining part of the town was included in the Saint-Jean constituency.

This is only one instance. The situation should be remedied on the occasion of the next electoral boundaries readjustment. However, I got over the whole thing by getting elected in a new constituency. There, I met active, hard-working and thoroughly Canadian-minded people. In that area, English-speaking and French-speaking people work together in harmony to build a better future.

The report of the Commission was finally tabled in the House. The purpose of the bill introduced by the hon. member for Edmonton West is to require the Commission to support with reasons the proposed changes.

As far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the commissioners explaining the changes they propose to make concerning the boundaries, the description or the name of the electoral districts. That might help Canadians to understand some decisions. Perhaps, they would not have had such an easy time of it on the last occasion. As a matter of fact, I had the impression they were concerned only with demography when the time came for redistribution.

But, as indicated by other members in the debate of November 1968, especially by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner), I believe that the publication of the reasons might initiate a debate which, far from being shortened, could drag on considerably. In fact all hon. members are more or less dissatisfied and they would like to discuss the reasons given by the commissioners, because as they know their ridings they are probably very sensitive to that question.

I am afraid that this would give rise to lengthy debates with no practical results, because, as pointed out by the hon. member, the House cannot bring in any amendments. To do so, indeed, it is necessary that in the length of time prescribed by the Standing Orders, ten members should register an objection of which they ought to inform the Commission through Hansard or Votes and Proceedings. The Commission is supposed to study it in order to determine the motives advocated by the members.

Generally speaking, the members who know their area better than anybody and who, most of the time, have had talks with the people concerned, are those who can most likely make useful recommendations, without necessarily knowing what motivated the decisions of the commissioners.

I think that nothing prevents hon. members or anyone else from filing an objection with the Commission, or even previously with the Representation Commissioner, preferably before the preliminary report is tabled. It might then be for the members and other people concerned the ideal time to comment on it and to draw the attention of the Commission and of the Representation Commissioner to the blatant cases of discrimination.

Mr. Speaker, it might be advisable under the circumstances to amend the act, particularly Section 13. It is extremely important to appoint to these commissions people who have practical experience and who can draw from this experience in order to arrive at a fair delimitation of electoral constituencies, while keeping in mind the obvious difficulties which the commissioners must face.

I hope that the next revision will be a great improvement on the last one and that we will at least try to reach this aim as is no doubt the wish of all hon. members.

[English]

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I am interested in the bill brought before the House by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). I express sympathy with the hon. member in connection with the problems he has raised for discussion and consideration.

I am aware that he and other hon. members, together with various interested people in Alberta, experienced difficulties in the most recent redistribution of boundaries because of the terms of the legislation. I have had some contact with the operation of this legislation, although I was not a member of the House when the act was debated in this chamber or when subsequent discussions took place regarding the decisions of the provincial boundary commissions. I was involved to the extent that I took part in making recommendations to the commission in my province of Saskatchewan, in my capacity as research director for the leader of the opposition in that province. I also went with him to present a brief to the commission on behalf of the New Democratic Party of Saskatchewan.

When the original legislation was passed by the House there was a fairly general feeling that hon. members wanted to do away with what had been termed gerrymandering, or the suspicion of gerrymandering. They wanted to do away with the decennial haggling which had taken place with regard to electoral boundaries. In effect, they wanted to take politics out of the process of drawing up electoral boundaries. This was very commendable and to this extent the act has represented a step forward.

Having the benefit of hindsight, however, I suggest that we lost sight of the fact that constituency boundaries are an essential feature of the political process. They cannot be separated from the political process or considered in some apolitical fashion completely apart from it. This was demonstrated when some of the shortcomings of the original act were recognized—when an amendment was introduced which at least provided for debate on the boundaries proposed by the commissions.

This amendment gave the provincial commissions an opportunity to review their proposals, taking into account objections which had been raised in the House of Commons. Final power still rested with the commissions, which were not required to give any reasons or set forth any rationale in support of their decisions.

There was considerable lack of response to some extremely valid points which were made in debate in the House of Commons at that time in objecting to proposals made by the commissions across Canada. Particular objections were raised with respect to the reports of the commissions in the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia.

In some parts of Canada the reports of the commissions were sound and there was little objection to them. But in the three western provinces there were some very real difficulties. I do not think I need remind hon. members of the ghastly mistakes associated with boundaries in Alberta. There was also considerable objection to boundaries in British Columbia. But after strong representations had been made, I believe only one change was brought about, and that was to boundaries affecting the Queen Charlotte Islands. In Saskatchewan, as in Alberta, no change was made in any of the boundaries, in spite of the very reasonable representations which had been put forward though the changes called for could have been implemented without any great difficulty.

I think it became clear during the course of the hearings that the initial report provided by the provincial commissions served as a basis for the final report, and that despite the soundness of any objections made to the commissions' proposals there was little chance of any change being made to the initial plan.

With respect to the commission operating in my own province of Saskatchewan, I wish to make it clear that I have the highest respect for the integrity of its members. It consisted of a well-known political scientist from the University of Saskatchewan, the Clerk of the Legislative Assembly of the province of Saskatchewan and a well-known judge on the bench of that province. In my view these gentlemen gave earnest consideration to the representations which were made. Nevertheless, it seems to me their immediate reaction to a representation was to say, "Well, the trouble is this—" and from there on they would proceed to defend the original proposals they had made public.

It was difficult to get anything by way of a sympathetic response. There was no effective communication between the commission and those who were interested in the boundaries it was establishing. There is no question about the apolitical nature of the commission in my province, or for that matter in any other province to my knowledge. But I think that in the boundaries which were established in some cases, very little consideration was given to the real problems facing people involved in the political and the electoral processes.

I could cite a number of examples in my own province where the boundaries drawn simply did not relate in any way to the natural community structures. One example is the constituency of Moose Jaw, with approximately 70,000 people, one-half of whom live in the city of Moose Jaw which is in the extreme southeast corner of the constituency which then proceeds in a westerly and northerly direction to within eight miles of the city of Saskatoon, goes far west to the Saskatchewan River, takes in an area west of the South Saskatchewan dam and the river in that area, which is completely cut off from the rest of the constituency.

Another example is the constituency of Meadow Lake, which comes within a few miles of the city of North Battleford and within a few miles of the city of Prince Albert. For the people living immediately adjacent to these cities, all their activities are linked to them; but for purposes of election and political activities their contact is totally with the constituency of Meadow Lake in the northwestern corner of the province.

With respect to population, terms were written into the federal legislation providing that there should not be a variation of more than 25 per cent above or below the norm for any province. But the fact was that a considerable change in population took place between 1961 and the time the redistribution was carried out. The net effect was that when the final boundaries were settled, the variation in population in constituencies in Saskatchewan was as great as it had been prior to redistribution.

I have already commented on the hearings when a number of representations were made by very interested people, and reasonable proposals were set forth. However, there was very little response from the commission, and in its official report it did not make a single change to the original proposals which had been made public. I think we should learn from this experience and consider alternatives to or changes in the legislation.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I should make it clear that I am speaking on my own behalf and not necessarily on behalf of the New Democratic Party. I think some way should be found to apply the general approach and principles involved in the legislation as originally passed, and to take into account the fact that the drawing of electoral boundaries is part of the political process. Should we not, in fact, give consideration to establishing a commission which could have as chairman a judge appointed by the Chief Justice of the province and a number of representatives appointed by the Speaker of the House of Commons as is presently the case?

Provision could also be made to include representatives from each of the recognized political parties within each province. A formula could be devised and used as a guide in deciding which political parties should have representation on the commission and that would take account of the various points of view to be considered.

One other change which might be considered is giving the House of Commons the power to make a change in the report of a commission if the change receives approval of two-thirds or three-quarters of the members of the House.

Mr. Speaker, in my view all members of this House have a responsibility to try and make the process work as it is set out in the legislation approved some years ago. No one will argue with the fact that you cannot make everybody happy with any set of proposals. However, I do not think this should prevent members of the House doing everything that can be done with a very difficult task. I think it is very necessary that we consider this matter in that context, because we do need to take account of these problems if we are to make this process work and ensure its survival.

I hope the proposal placed before us by the hon. member for Edmonton West is either approved, or the subject matter referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Allen B. Sulatycky (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, this is a debate of great interest to me. It has been said of the redistribution that it affected the province of Alberta, and indeed it was the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) who raised the subject today. I should like to hear more from other hon. members from Alberta because I for one do not feel that the Electoral Boundaries Commission did a ghastly job.

Mr. Bigg: Look at the map.

Mr. Sulatycky: The hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Bigg) suggests that I have not looked at the map. May I point out to him that I have travelled all over that particular riding, and the map is not as bad as it appears.

Mr. Speaker, the bill proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West suggests that the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act be amended so that the report of the commission in each province gives the reason for the recommendations made. Basically, I do not object to this except to say that if it were question as to the basis on which the redistribution was made in each province.

If we opened up the discussion as widely as possible, it would not be very long before political considerations began creeping into the system again. My understanding is that the purpose of this act was to eliminate what was called gerrymandering, which we acknowledge to have taken place for the first 100 years of the political history of this country. By and large it has been eliminated with the new act.

It can readily be seen that if changes such as those proposed in Bill C-19 were made, it would not be long before changes such as the one proposed by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton), where political parties would become involved in the selection of members of the commission, could lead to a situation similar to the one prevalent for many years after confederation. On that basis I cannot support this bill. If it is supportable at all, it is only in that I believe the provinces should have control to the maximum extent, short of political considerations, over the operations of the Electoral Boundaries Commissions. On my reading of the measure as it stands, I believe it goes as far as it can reasonably and safely go toward allowing political considerations to become significant in this field.

• (4:50 p.m.)

May I say a few words about allegations that the commission did a poor job in the province of Alberta. I know that for many people in Alberta this has been a matter of contention for the last four or five years. I am not sure whether the hon. member for Edmonton West would agree with my point of view. In any event, in two elections in which I was involved the candidate for the Conservative Party went around the constituency contending that its borders showed a very good example of gerrymandering. I hope the hon. member for Edmonton West does not still adhere to this thinking, because I am sure that most hon. members would agree that the commission in Alberta, as in other provinces, was as impartial as it could be.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The hon. member will not convince anybody else.

Mr. Sulatycky: It is obvious that in talking about the poor job the commission did in Alberta, the hon. member was referring to the constituency of Rocky Mountain in Alberta. On November 20, 1968, the hon. member made these remarks, as reported at page 2995 of Hansard. Clearly the constituency referred to is Rocky Mountain. He said in part:

> Ridings made no sense geographically, leading to very difficult election campaigns. Often, no interior roads existed. We have one constituency that stretches along the eastern slope of the mountains, running some 450 miles, I would say, from the United States boundary, and 36 miles south of the city of Grande Prairie. There is not a road running directly through that constituency. The people in it have no community of interest.

Those remarks clearly refer to the constituency of Rocky Mountain which I have the honour to represent in Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sulatycky: It is perhaps one of the most exciting and interesting ridings in the country. In the last election we had not only three Liberal candidates but two Conservatives as well as one socialist, all trying to win the seat. So despite what my Conservative friends say, at least two members of their party were interested enough to try and win the seat. I am proud to have won it.

Mr. Bigg: You can thank God.

Mr. Sulatycky: The hon. member for Pembina suggested I should thank God. I invite him to attempt to win the seat for his party during the next election, because then we shall also win Pembina. Having represented this constituency for a year and a half, I am now in a position to say that no constituency in Canada is more challenging or rewarding to represent.

Mr. Perrault: Other than Burnaby-Seymour.

Mr. Sulatycky: In my constituency of Rocky Mountain we have three great national parks of Canada. They stretch from the extreme south to the extreme north of the riding and are very important to the economy of the constituency. The national parks are very important from the point of view of tourism. In addition, we have an economic community of interest throughout the riding. Our people carry on coal mining. That activity commences in the southern portion or the riding and is carried on throughout the length of the region. We find that activity in the Crowsnest Pass area, the Canmore area, the Coal Valley area and in the Smoky River deposits which had not been developed when the commission was considering electoral boundaries in Alberta. They investigated the potential of the coal deposits in the northern part of the riding and now it is safe to say that we have a community of interest extending from the extreme south to the extreme north of the constituency.

As a result of the farsightedness the commissioners exercised, the constituency of Rocky Mountain may be the only constituency in Alberta which will not need to have its boundaries changed when constituencies are next considered for redistribution. There are at present in the constituency approximately 65,000 people. That is less than the optimum number for Alberta constituencies. But in the north end of the riding we have a rapidly growing population, and it will continue to grow for some time because of resource development taking place there.

It will not be necessary to change the constituency boundaries even after the next census has been taken. It has not, as have many other rural constituencies in western Canada, a great outflow of population which necessitates changes in boundaries; neither has it, as have many urban constituencies, a vast increase in population which requires a contraction of constituency boundaries. I suggest that the constituency of Rocky Mountain will not need to be changed when redistribution is considered again.

At five o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSING

TABLING OF CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION 1970 CAPITAL BUDGET

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement on the capital budget of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the calendar year 1970 which for the first time is being tabled this early in the year. The approved capital budget authorizes CMHC to make loans under the various sections of the National Housing Act in a total amount of $854 million. This represents an increase of $174 million over the 1969 commitment level of $680 million. As in 1969, and in accordance with the undertaking given in the Speech from the Throne at the opening of this session, the largest part of the corporation's budget will be devoted to the provision of housing for low-income families and persons. A total of $570 million has been reserved for this purpose.

An amount of $265 million has been allocated to the provincial housing authorities for the public housing program under section 35 of the National Housing Act. They were so informed last week. In almost all cases, this matches provincial requests. An amount of $105 million will be directed immediately to section 16 loans to sponsoring groups who will supply low-rental housing in limited-return, non-profit and co-operative projects. The sum of $200 million is being reserved temporarily for new innovations and a balancing of distribution based on need. It is my hope that a substantial portion of this $200 million can be used to bolster efforts in those areas where poverty is most acute and to employ new or revised techniques for reaching low-income families where the present arrangements under the National Housing Act may not be fully effective. In any event, these funds will permit the corporation to arrange in 1970 for the construction of 35,000 housing units specifically for low-income families.

So that hon. members will have some idea of the magnitude of this allocation it should be noted that during the 20 years prior to 1969, 82,000 homes for low-income families were built in Canada through the CMHC loan budget. In 1969, in line with government policy, provision was made for 27,000 units of low-rental, low-income housing in that year, a number that will be increased to not less than 35,000 units in 1970.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Andras: The total allocation of capital funds for low-income housing in 1969 and 1970 at 62,000 units therefore represents 75 per cent of the previous 20 years' performance. In addition to the specific low-income housing sections, $110 million will be for direct loans under section 40 to home owners for new and existing housing in small towns, rural areas and the remote parts of Canada where new communities are emerging as a result of the development of resource industries. It is my intention, Mr. Speaker, that the direct lending activities of CMHC under section 40 shall also be devoted to the needs of families in the lower income brackets.

An allocation of $45 million has been made for student housing, which will provide 6,500 dormitory beds on university campuses. Unfortunately, this allocation will not meet all of the demand for student housing in 1970. But in view of the pressing and greater need for housing for low-income families and because of the large amount of capital funds directed to student housing in recent years, it is my opinion that a modest decline from $55 million to $45 million this year is appropriate. In this regard hon. members will recall that $340 million has been devoted to student housing in the last nine years, an amount that has produced more than 56,000 hostel beds and nearly 5,000 units of fully served accommodation on university campuses.

In view of the increasing concern with ground and water pollution, the CMHC budget provides for loans to assist in financing sewage treatment plants and major trunk sewers in an amount of $75 million. This is an increase of 50 per cent over the 1969 figure of $50 million and represents the only major increase in the non-housing portion of the corporation's 1970 capital budget. The funds allocated for land assembly and urban renewal loans have been set at approximately the 1969 level.

Hon. members will note that, of the total budget, $724 million is being directed to housing purposes, mainly for low income families and persons, including the elderly, while $130 million has been reserved for infrastructure programs, such as sewage treatment, land assembly and urban renewal.

The 1970 CMHC capital budget is being tabled concurrently with these few remarks. May I conclude by reminding hon. members that, in addition to the large sums to which I have already referred, there is an amount of $53.7 million in the annual estimates covering grants, subsidies and losses under part V, sections 23A and 23B and 36G of the National Housing Act, as well as losses on public housing projects. I should like to add that, as I have stated on previous occasions, we, in co-operation with the provinces, are seeking to encourage and establish long-range budgeting for all NHA programs.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the statement by the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing. It certainly shows some awareness of housing problems as they affect the poor. But I must state at the outset that we on this side of the House are extremely disturbed and gravely disappointed that the minister has made no mention of guidelines for public housing, which are extremely important to all. Therefore it appears that uncertainty still remains regarding size and design. I hope that the minister, in his wisdom, will look into this matter inasmuch as several questions have been directed to him over the past months as to when these guidelines would be available.

One very important point regarding the minister's statement which gives those on this side of the House some concern is the fact that, as has been said on many occasions, tenants in public housing are trapped by high rents. We must remember that public housing was never intended to be permanent but rather only a temporary means of providing housing for those at the bottom of the economic ladder until such time as they are able to move into more substantial housing on a permanent basis.

[Mr. Andras.]

I should like to point out at this time that those living in public housing who earn approximately $560 a month pay rent of approximately $160 a month. As their income increases we find that those making approximately $600 a month pay $180 a month for rent. Yet studies have shown that people living in our larger metropolitan areas where the same circumstances exist who earn $14,000 a year pay approximately $176 per month for rent. Therefore I point out to the minister that the public housing rental scale is far too high. Changes must be made to take account of differences in projects, in construction costs and in the quality of services. In this regard we have to pay specific attention to the tenant associations which are deeply involved in this matter.

I notice the Minister mentioned that some emphasis is to be placed on limited dividend housing. I point out that with $105 million to be devoted to this field we must have some regard for priority. In effect I do not think this type of home is geared to meet the needs of those in the lower income bracket but rather the needs of those in the $6,000 to $8,000 bracket. Therefore I say we should be concerned to see that at the expiration of 15 years these limited dividend housing projects will have no further governmental supervision. Charges of $100 a month for a one-bedroom apartment could conceivably increase to $200 a month.

With regard to limited dividend housing we must also be concerned about the high cost of land. In order for this type of project to be successful it is important that the government realize that we must be concerned about acquiring serviced land upon which this type of housing can be erected. We have to realize that public housing is designed to meet the needs of the poor. Therefore our policies with respect to public housing should be directed to assisting those people whom I have described as being locked in.

The amount of money now going into direct loans is of some significance in terms of the interest shown, but I would like to remind the minister that in the past—and here the only figures we have are for 1968—apparently 75 per cent of this money was directed to people who on average were making between $8,000 and $10,000 per year.

There were certain unwarranted inconsistencies in the minister's speech which I would like to bring to his attention. One concerns the fact that the government does not have an acceptable urban renewal policy. The vast majority of poor people in this land live within areas now designated for urban renewal projects. The minister's statement on this aspect is unacceptable to many people, particularly to those on this side of the House who are concerned about helping the poor. I say with all respect to the minister that he should try to issue a policy statement at least once a year.

I believe that the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Andras) should get together with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). It appears to me there is not too much rapport between them, if that is now the acceptable word rather than dialogue, because the Minister of Finance wants to bring homes under a new capital gains tax structure, while at the same time he is talking about taxing the small businessman at the rate of 50 per cent on his profits, a step which will certainly discourage home ownership.

I must also point out that student housing is a unique problem calling for special consideration. It has been reported that there will be some 500,000 students needing accommodation by 1975. If this be true, then we must be very concerned because student housing affects the intellectual and emotional development of students. A sum of $45 million is neither practical nor adequate.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member—will the hon. member kindly resume his seat. I appreciate that the matter now under consideration is of great importance but at the same time the Standing Order requires that comments on ministerial statements should be brief. I would invite the hon. member to come to a conclusion as early as possible.

Mr. Alexander: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The matter is so complex and calls for so much involvement that perhaps I was carried away.

I welcome the statement of the minister. I point out, however, that successful public housing is not only dependent on the number of projects but also on the inter-related effect of general housing policy. Unless we begin to produce homes at reasonable cost and with a reasonable rental scale, people with rising incomes will remain locked in and dependent on public housing.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, the amiable and courteous minister read his statement with a great deal of pride, I thought. I suppose he ought to be congratulated that he did make the statement today. I remind him, however, that this is the beginning of February and that the Ontario government found it necessary to freeze its public housing program until he had tabled the CMHC budget. I see no reason in the world why he could not have done so before the end of last year instead of in the second month of the year to which the budget is intended to apply.

Everyone in this House and in the country must be glad that the minister has increased the money available for public housing in view of the fact that this is the major concern in the generally difficult field of housing. But I cannot help but be distressed and saddened by the fact that after some years of study of the problem of housing, after task forces, reports and housing conferences across the country, all we have today is the provision of a little more money in the realm of housing. Have any guidelines for public housing, any of those programs necessary to make it effective, any of the details, been made known to this Parliament, the provincial governments or the municipal authorities? What in heaven's name are we going to do for the poor people who have no housing? That is where the problem lies.

I happened to be present last Saturday, as was my leader, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, at a meeting at Trefann Court in Toronto where people concerned with urban renewal and threatened with the demolition of their houses, and people from existing public housing projects such as Regent Park, met with us and spoke of their worries. It was an experience to sit and listen to these Canadians speak of the kind of life they are forced to live in these public housing projects. Apparently the attention paid to garbage collection in these large apartments is inadequate and in some cases garbage is piled up at elevators to within two feet of the ceiling. Apparently, too, the people cannot always get adequate maintenance service and have to chase around for days to get plumbing or electrical repairs made. They complain too that the rents are much too high for people with families to support.

One cannot feel satisfied that the public housing program up to this time has accomplished anything except to provide a roof over heads that might otherwise not have had one. Surely, Mr. Speaker, that is not what we are after. Surely what we are after is to build communities into which Canadians who cannot afford high-price homes can move and live in decency and with some sort of personal fulfilment rather than having to live in a new form of degradation, a new form of inferiority such as accompanies these public housing projects.

These people told us that they have no recreation facilities, no chance of participating in what takes place in the projects and that there is bad management. I am just reporting what they told us. I appreciate that the federal minister does not do the managing. That is done through the Ontario Housing Corporation or similar bodies in the other provinces. I am not saying it is directly his fault but I am saying that it is his fault to some extent because the government has failed to bring down guidelines for public housing demanding that there be recreational facilities and good management and laying down as a condition governing the advancing of any money the requirement that the environment be such that Canadian children can be brought up in decency. That is the main point I wished to make.

I do not wish to speak at such length that Your Honour will have to remind me to be brief. I say to the minister that what he has presented today is really no solution to those concerned about the problem of public housing. The problem is a social one. It is of concern to those living in our present public housing projects who cannot live in decency and have to pay too high a rent. Many of these people are not given any chance to make decisions which will affect their lives in these apartments.

I submit that the minister is doing only one-tenth of his job when he brings to our attention the slight and inadequate increase in the allocation of funds for public housing.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I will be quite brief. I merely wish to point out some gaps in the government proposal on housing. Each time that the government announces that it is granting some kind of assistance, I wonder what it really means for Quebec. We already know that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation provides very few loans to Quebec compared to Ontario. This depends on the fact that standards in a country as vast as Canada cannot be the same for all provinces. In the housing field, some provisions are closely related to the individual himself.

Due to the presence of various ethnic groups in Quebec, in comparison with other Canadian provinces, the government should have realized that there was already a housing corporation in that province which cannot have the necessary scope to serve the people, on account of its lack of funds. In order to solve the problem, should the government not have provided more money to the Quebec housing corporation, and thus by decentralizing the problem, it could more easily have met the needs of the population of Canada in general and that of Quebec in particular.

AIR TRANSPORT

PRAIRIE SERVICES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House—

Mr. Barnett: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Are we still on motions?

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Comox-Alberni rising on a point of order?

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I wanted at this time to ask leave to make a correction in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris has the floor.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on the following grounds: On Friday last the Air Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission brought down a decision which makes fundamental changes in regional air policy. Under licence No. 502/50(s), in accordance with the principles of regional policy Transair Limited has been providing a prairie regional class I air service including major centres on the western lateral such as Winnipeg, Brandon, Regina, Saskatoon and Prince Albert, emphasizing centres not served by Air Canada. The decision has amended condition four of the licence which prohibits direct non-stop service between Winnipeg-Regina and Winnipeg-Saskatoon. This introduces a new element in regional air policy providing for competitive service with Air Canada and Canadian Pacific Airlines on main line routes rather than supplementary service to major communities off the main routes.

• (2:30 p.m.)

As a result of the decision, Brandon and western Manitoba have been downgraded from class I to class II service at a critical juncture when industry is developing to offset the decline in the agricultural industry on the Prairies. The change in policy runs counter to, and in fact works against, the government's regional development program.

Because of the serious implications of this ad hoc decision for all regions of Canada labouring under problems of regional disparity, I ask unanimous consent to have the whole question of regional air policy referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications for urgent consideration and confirmation.

Mr. Speaker: As hon. members know, this motion cannot be put unless there is unanimous agreement. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous agreement.

ECONOMIC COUNCIL COMBINES REPORT

Question No. 311—Mr. Barnett:

1. How many briefs and letters were received by mid-October in response to the Economic Council's report on combines?

2. What organizations or individuals have submitted briefs or letters?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. 7.

2. Warren Allmand, M.P.; Canadian Chiropractic Association; Ivey & Dowler, London, Ontario; Imperial Oil Limited; Retail Council of Canada; Dominion Stores Ltd.; Eric B. Appleby of Fredericton, N.B.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES IN UNITED KINGDOM

Question No. 519—Mr. Stewart (Cochrane):

What was the total number of people, both Canadian and non-Canadian, employed by the Canadian Government within the United Kingdom, excluding military personnel, in 1965 and 1969?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): 1965: 607; 1969: 545.

WHITE PAPER ON TAXATION

Question No. 727—Mr. Orlikow:

1. How many copies of the White Paper on Taxation were printed?

2. What was the cost of printing the White Paper on Taxation?

3. Were copies of the White Paper on Taxation distributed to political parties and, if so, how many to each party?

Questions

4. Were copies of the White Paper on Taxation distributed to organizations and, if so, to which organizations and in what quantities?

5. Were copies of the White Paper on Taxation distributed by the Department to Members of Parliament and, if so, how many received (a) 1-10 copies (b) 10-25 copies (c) 25-100 copies (d) more than 100 copies?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1. Two printings of the White Paper, each totalling 50,000, have been received and a further order for 25,000 is being processed by The Queen's Printer.

2. Printing costs for the 125,000 copies are expected to total about $44,000.

3. Since tabling of the document, requests have been received from political parties for varying amounts and these requests have been met. The numbers involved have not been recorded.

4. In most cases copies of the White Paper were sent to individual members of organizations, e.g. labor organizations, members of the Federation of Mayors and Municipalities, members of the Canadian Consumer Council, etc. A supply of 230 was provided directly to the Canadian Manufacturers' Association for its own distribution to members. Two commercial tax reporting services, CCH Canadian Limited and Richard De Boo Limited, received 7,000 and 1,500 copies respectively and were charged printing costs. Accounting and law firms, schools, universities and similar bodies requesting large supplies of the White Paper are billed 25 cents per copy to cover printing costs.

5. At the time of release approximately 1,800 copies were made available for Members at a special briefing and in the House of Commons post office. Since then Members' requests for copies for constituents have been met on a one-per-person basis; where possible, mailing has been handled by the Department of Finance to ensure rapid distribution. No precise record has been kept of the numbers received by individual Members, or mailed on their behalf to constituents.

NUMBER OF AMERICANS IN CYC

Question No. 777—Mr. Saltsman:

1. How many Americans are in the Company of Young Canadians?

2. Have any Americans in the Company of Young Canadians policy-making jobs?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Company of Young Canadians as follows: 1. There are seven Americans having landed immigrant status in the Company of Young Canadians.

2. There are no Americans holding policy-making jobs in the Company of Young Canadians at the present time.

CBC FREE TELEVISION TIME FOR QUEBEC PARTIES

Question No. 781—Mr. Rondeau:

1. Does CBC make available to Quebec provincial parties free television periods between elections and, if so, what Quebec provincial parties were granted such free time in 1969?

2. How many periods and how many minutes per period has CBC granted to (a) the Quebec Liberal Party (b) the Union Nationale Party of Quebec (c) the Parti Québecois?

3. What criteria are used by CBC in recognizing political parties?

4. Was Dr. Gaston Tremblay, Ralliement Créditiste Party member representing Montmorency in the Quebec National Assembly, given pro-rated free television time and, if not, for what reason and does CBC intend to correct this situation?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1 and 2. Yes. CBC made available 28 periods of 5-minutes duration for free-time political telecasts by Quebec provincial political parties for the 1969-70 Fall-Winter season as follows: Union Nationale, 14 periods; Parti Libéral, 12 periods; Parti Québecois, 2 periods.

3. The Corporation has established certain guidelines to determine the eligibility of a party for free time periods. Under these guidelines it is expected that a provincial party has a program relating to a large number of questions of provincial interest and, as a result of a political convention, has a recognized provincial leader and province-wide organization which includes province-wide representation. Another consideration is the number of candidates fielded by a party during the previous provincial elections.

4. Dr. Gaston Tremblay, as a Ralliement créditiste member, was not given pro-rated free television time because of the criteria outlined in part 3 above.

CONVENTION AND ENTERTAINMENT EXPENSES —REVENUE FROM PROPOSED ELIMINATION OF DEDUCTION

Question No. 800—Mr. Mather:

What, in dollars, is the estimated annual amount of revenue to be gained by the federal Treasury through implementation of the White Paper proposal to end convention and entertainment expenses as tax deductible business expenditures?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Tables 15 and 16 of White Paper show revenue gain in first year from cancellation of deduction for club dues, entertainment expenses, and conventions as from personal income tax, $12 million; from corporation income tax, $5 million; total: $17 million.

This includes provincial revenue gain. It is estimated that federal revenue gain would be $13 million.

LOANS IDB FOR CATV SYSTEMS

Question No. 811—Mr. Rose:

For each year from 1960 to 1969 (a) how many loans (b) what size of loans have been provided by the Industrial Development Bank for the establishment or furthering of CATV systems?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): The Annual Report of the Industrial Development Bank for the fiscal year ended September 30th, 1969 contains information regarding loan approvals by types of business, by number and amount for the years 1964-69 inclusive on pages 18 and 19; the Annual Report for the year ended September 30, 1965 contains similar information for the years 1960-63 on pages 20 and 21. Information on the number and amount of loans to CATV systems is not published as a separate classification.

REPRESENTATION ON WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES

Question No. 813—Mr. McBride:

1. Does the Government of Canada have any official who at any time represents the Government of Canada at the Geneva headquarters of the World Council of Churches and, if so, who is/are the person(s) involved?

2. Do they report through the Canadian Ambassador to Switzerland?

3. If the Government of Canada has no such representative, are there any plans to establish such an office?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Yes. The Permanent Representative of Canada to the Office of the United Nations at Geneva is also the authorized representative of the Government of Canada to the specialized agencies and other international organizations in Geneva. In this capacity, he is called upon to maintain close ties with the World Council of Churches and other non-governmental organizations located in Geneva whose activities present an interest to Canada.

2. No. The Permanent Representative reports direct to the Department of External Affairs.

3. Answered by No. 1.

*INVESTIGATION AND PROSECUTION OF GRAIN BOOTLEGGING

Question No. 825—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many investigations have taken place since the 1st of November to date by the RCMP in connection with alleged grain bootlegging in each of the Prairie Provinces?

2. How many charges in respect of such alleged bootlegging have been laid in each of said provinces during said period?

3. Were these prosecutions taken at the instance of the Honourable Member for Saskatoon-Humboldt, the Minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board and, if not, at whose request?

4. From how many farmers were Quota Books removed by the RCMP during said period?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The answer is as follows: 1. Manitoba, 3; Saskatchewan, 75; Alberta, 5.

2. Manitoba, 2; Saskatchewan, 2; Alberta, 2.

3. No. Prosecutions undertaken by the Canadian Wheat Board are instituted by the Board on the advice of Counsel.

4. Manitoba, None; Saskatchewan, 42; Alberta, None.

Questions

CLOSURE OF POST OFFICE, RUPERT, P.Q.

Question No. 832—Mr. La Salle:

1. Has the Postmaster General received a petition protesting the closure of the Post Office in Rupert, in Gatineau County, that was opened more than ninety years ago?

2. Does the Postmaster General intend to carry out the wish expressed in the petition and continue the operation of this Post Office serving both the permanent population of the area and a large number of summer visitors?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): 1. Yes.

2. As the Rupert, P.Q., Post Office was eligible for closing under all three categories of the Department's program to close small unproductive post offices and as approximately $1,100 per annum savings could be realized, there was no alternative but to close the office.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—MINESWEEPERS

Question No. 837—Mr. McCleave:

1. Do the Canadian Armed Forces have any minesweepers in commission and, if so, which are they?

2. Do the Canadian Armed Forces have any capability of dealing with a mining campaign carried out by foreign submarines in Eastern Canadian waters or the approaches to Eastern Canadian harbours, including Belle Isle Strait, St. John's, St. Lawrence Gulf and River, Sydney, Port Hawkesbury, Halifax and Saint John and, if so, what is it?

3. When did Canadian minesweepers last carry out any minesweeping exercises or mine warfare training?

4. If the approaches to Halifax Harbour were mined, how long would it take the Canadian Armed Forces to clear a safe channel?

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes, six Bay class minesweepers, Chaleur, Chignecto, Fundy, Thunder, Miramichi and Cowichan.

2 and 3. All of these vessels have a limited potential minesweeping capability although no minesweeping exercises as such have been carried out since December 1963. A portion of their minesweeping equipment has been landed for preservation and equipment aboard is not in an operative state. Over a period of time, varying from several days to several months, these ships could be readied to perform the type of tasks normally assigned to coastal minesweepers seven to ten years ago. Since 1963 several officers and senior non-commissioned personnel have attended courses with, and served in, mine counter measures forces of other allied nations. In addition, Canadian Forces clearance divers continue to train in and practice mine hunting and disposal techniques.

4. This is a hypothetical question; however, the time required to sweep a mined area depends upon many factors, some of which are, the number, location and degree of sophistication of the mines. When these factors and others are known they may be weighed against the effectiveness of the mine counter measures units and the period of time required to complete the task can then be estimated.

IMMIGRATION ACT—DELETION OF CRIME INVOLVING MORAL TURPITUDE AS REASON FOR NON-ADMISSION

Question No. 846—Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West):

1. Is it proposed to amend section 5 (d) of the Immigration Act to delete the words "crime involving moral turpitude" as a reason for non-admission to Canada of an applicant for entry in the light of the strictures and criticisms of this term by Monnin J. in Kings V Brooks (1960) 3 W.W.R. 673 and more recently by the Immigration Appeal Board in Turpin vs Minister of Manpower and Immigration decided February 12, 1968 (File 67-5006) reported September, 1969 and published December, 1969?

2. Since the date of the decision in Turpin have the said grounds of "crime involving moral turpitude" been used by Immigration officials to deny admission of anyone to Canada in the absence of other valid reasons and, if so, how often?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. The Immigration Act is under review. However, until this review has been completed and a firm decision has been made concerning any amendments which may be considered advisable, it is not possible to say whether any change in subsection (d) of section 5 will be recommended for the approval of Parliament.

2. During the calendar year 1968, there were 90 aliens refused admission to Canada at ports of entry where the primary cause of refusal was based on subsection (d) of section 5 of the Immigration Act. Similar data for 1969 are not available.

BILINGUAL SIGN COST, RIDING MOUNTAIN PARK

Question No. 847—Mr. Stewart (Marquette):

1. What has been the cost to date of installing bilingual signs in Riding Mountain National Park including all bilingual descriptions of displays in the Museum at Clear Lake Townsite?

2. Has this program been completed and, if not, what is the estimated cost to complete it?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. The cost including the normal annual replacement or refurnishing of older signs is $22,000.

2. This program will be completed during the fiscal year 1970-71 at an estimated cost of $8,000.00.

RETROACTIVE PAY INCREASES

Question No. 850—Mr. Orlikow:

1. As of January 1, 1970, how many government employees to whom retroactive pay increases had been granted still had not received these agreed upon increases?

2. Of these employees, how many had not received their retroactive pay for (a) less than one month (b) one to two months (c) two to three months (d) three to four months (e) four to five months (f) five to six months (g) more than six months?

3. Is the government giving consideration to making some adjustment for the increased income tax such employees will have to pay as a result of the delayed payments which will be made in 1970?

4. Is the government giving consideration to extra expenses which may have been incurred by employees who, believing that they had been granted retroactive pay, made financial commitments which led to extra expenses such as bank loans because of the sometimes lengthy delay in making the retroactive payments?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): 1. As of January 1, 1970, the following collective agreements had passed the 90-day implementation period and as accurately as could be determined employees in the numbers indicated had not received retroactive adjustments: Physical Science, 20; Biological Sciences, 10; Economics, Sociology and Statistics, 77; Scientific Research, 82; Photography, 8; General Technical, 60.

As of January 1, 1970, collective agreements had been signed or arbitral awards rendered for the following groups but the 90 day implementation period or extensions where granted had not expired. Population of these groups is as shown: Communications, 923; Ships Officers, 1307; Engineering & Land Survey, 1673; Law, 41; Air Traffic Control, 1104; Electronics, 1886; Printing Operations (Supervisory), 70.

It is anticipated that these groups will be paid on or before their respective expiry dates.

2. To answer this part of the question would require the examination of each individual employee's file and entail thousands of hours of work by the very staff that is processing the retroactive pay documentation, and would delay the issuance of retroactive cheques. It is considered that the continued processing of retroactive cheques should receive a higher priority than the preparation of the detailed reply required by this part of the question.

3. No.

4. No.

RCMP STRENGTH AND MAINTENANCE COST

Question No. 858—Mr. Rodrigue:

1. What will be the cost of maintaining the RCMP for the fiscal year 1969-70?

2. What was the total strength of the RCMP at January 1, 1970?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General):
1. $113,576,995.

2. 11,669.

TRIPS BY DND EXECUTIVE AIRCRAFT

Question No. 867—Mr. Schumacher:

1. During the calendar year 1969, how many trips were made by Falcons and/or other executive type jet aircraft owned by the Department of National Defence?

2. What were the dates of each such trip?

3. What were the destinations in each case?

4. What was the duration of each trip?

5. Who were the passengers in each case?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5. The fact that the functional Commands of the Canadian Forces are spread across Canada has created a great need for air transportation, and in the interests of service efficiency and flexibility it is important that Commanders and their staffs travel between Commands and Canadian Forces Headquarters or to conferences in all parts of North America in the shortest possible time. Accordingly the Falcon was selected as the most suitable type of aircraft to provide faster and more economical transportation to replace Cosmopolitan and Dakota aircraft being withdrawn from service. Seven of these aircraft were purchased and went into service in 1968. Because of the demands of regular aircraft maintenance, the need to train new pilots and to provide continuation training for squadron pilots, only four of the seven Falcon are available for tasking at any given time. Notwithstanding this, the four aircraft in use account for an average of 92 passenger flights per month which includes a total of 24 monthly scheduled flights. These flights account for approximately 320 flying hours out of an established monthly total of 420 hours, the remainder being utilized for the training of new pilots, for continuation training of squadron pilots and the occasional ferry flight. To provide the information requested would require the perusal of over 1100 individual flight manifests, and the necessary expert staff to undertake this large amount of work is not available to gather the necessary information.

VETERANS AFFAIRS ECONOMY CUTBACKS

Question No. 900—Mr. MacRae:

In reference to the government's economy cutbacks in the Department of Veterans Affairs, has any consideration been given to a review of fees paid to physicians rather than the layoffs of Department of Veterans Affairs personnel?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): There is a constant review of fees paid to physicians when these are remunerated for part-time services. However, when physicians are remunerated on a fee for service basis, they are paid 90 per cent of the prevailing authorized provincial fee schedules issued by the provincial College of Physicians and Surgeons, and we do not consider there is any option open to vary the amounts paid for each type of service.

LANCASTER VETERANS HOSPITAL—PART-TIME ATTENDING STAFF

Question No. 901—Mr. MacRae:

Notwithstanding the government's economy measures, has an increase been recommended for part-time attending staff of the Department of Veterans Affairs Hospital, Lancaster, New Brunswick, and if so, by what percentage?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The Medical Advisory Committee at Lancaster Hospital passed a recommendation to the Hospital Director which requested a 25 per cent increase for part-time medical staff. This recommendation has not been actioned either by the Hospital Director locally or at Head Office.

HOG CARCASS PREMIUMS

Question No. 906—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. How much money was paid out for premium quality hog carcasses in the fiscal year 1967-68 and in 1968-69, and what rates were applicable?

2. How much was paid in premiums from March 31 to December 31, 1969 and what rates were applicable?

3. Does the federal government intend to completely discontinue payments for premium quality hog carcasses and, if so, on what date?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): 1. 1967-68, $10,250,577 paid in premiums; 1968-69, $6,438,418 paid in premiums.

Rate applicable fiscal 1967-68, $3 per grade "A" hog.

Rate applicable April 1, 1968 to December 30, 1968, $2 per grade "A" hog.

Rate applicable December 30, 1968 to March 30, 1969, $3 per hog grading Canada Index 103 or better.

2. March 31 to December 31, 1969, $2,034,482 paid in premiums.

Rate applicable March 31 to December 31, 1969, $3 per hog grading Canada Index 105 or better.

3. Yes. A date has not yet been determined.

VISIT TO CANADA BY KING HUSSEIN'S BROTHER

Question 973—Mr. Nesbitt:

1. Did the brother of His Majesty King Hussein of Jordan pay a visit to Canada in 1969 or to date during 1970?

2. When did the visit take place and for how long?

3. What was the purpose of the visit?

4. How many government personnel were attached to the service of the royal personage during his Canadian visit?

5. What was the nature of the duties of the government personnel?

6. Was any announcement made of this visit to Canada?

7. If the reply to Part 6 is in the negative, what was the reason for the secrecy?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Yes.

2. January 1970. One week.

3. To visit his brother-in-law and sister-in-law who are Canadian citizens resident in Canada.

4. None. Normal security precautions were taken by the competent authorities during the Prince's visit.

5. Not applicable.

6. No.

7. The visit was private and unofficial.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

QUEBEC—HOMES FOR THE AGED

Question No. 546—Mr. Godin:

During the period 1965-68 inclusive, did the federal government contribute financially to the construction of homes for the aged, through CMHC, in the Province of Quebec and, if so, how many such loans were granted each year in (a) the Province (b) the Constituency of Montmorency (c) the Constituency of Champlain (d) the Constituency of Portneuf, showing the names and addresses of each of such institution in the latter.

TRAINING OF ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL FOR OTHER COUNTRIES

Question No. 663—Mr. Robinson:

1. Does the Canadian Government train members of the Armed Forces for any other country and, if so, which countries and how many have been trained and in what capacity in each of the years 1945 to 1969 to date?

2. What has been the cost to Canada for the training provided in Part 1 for each of the years from 1945 to 1969 to date?

3. Is it the intention of the government to continue to train personnel for other countries and, if so, what is the present policy?

*CBC—DISPOSITION OF PROGRAM ON DRUG USE

Question No. 715—Mr. Nesbitt:

1. Did CBC provide radio and television facilities to record an "Open Forum" on drugs and drug abuse held at the Colonnade Theatre in Toronto on Thursday, November 6, 1969?

2. Who were the panelists appearing at this "Forum"?

3. Under whose auspices was this "Forum" arranged?

4. Who initiated the move to offer CBC coverage for this "Forum"?

5. What was the cost to the CBC of this project?

6. What was the original intention for the disposition of the material recorded by CBC?

7. Has this material been used by CBC?

8. What is the ultimate intended disposition of this material?

9. Did CBC hold any consultations or discussions with one Professor Stephen Clarkson, one of the candidates for Mayor in the recent mayoralty contest in the City of Toronto and, if so, what was the nature of such consultations or discussions?

10. Were any other mayoralty candidates provided with similar facilities by CBC and, if so, which candidate or candidates?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as the reply to this question is particularly lengthy—it includes ten paragraphs—I am afraid that Your Honour might interrupt me if I undertook to read it. Therefore, would the hon. member agree that the reply be simply taken as read and printed in Hansard?

[Editor's note: The above-mentioned reply reads as follows:]

Inquiries of the Ministry

I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. No. However, on November 6, 1969, CBC Television did use a mobile television unit to videotape coverage of an open forum on drug addiction at the Colonnade Theatre, Toronto. Regular local television news coverage was also given to this event.

2. Sydney Katz, June Callwood, Dr. Stephen Clarkson, Dr. Anna Keyl, R. Gaskin and Adrienne Clarkson.

3. The Corporation understands that the forum was organized by Dr. Clarkson and the municipal Liberal party.

4. CBC "Weekend" program for the videotape and the News assignment desk for news coverage.

5. Approximately $950.

6. The news film was intended for a local news broadcast. The videotape recorded material was for inclusion in a future "Weekend" program dealing with drug problems.

7. The news film was used in a 90-second local news item; the videotape material has not yet been used.

8. See 6 above.

9. Discussions concerning arrangements for technical facilities and coverage were held with the organizers of the open forum on drug addiction. Discussions were held separately with Professor Clarkson and his agents in connection with the recent mayoralty contest, at which time the Corporation was asked to provide political free time on its local station. This was rejected.

10. No free time was allotted to any of the candidates in the municipal election. Normal arrangements were made to ensure that all major candidates received adequate and equitable campaign coverage on local programming. The news report on the open forum on drug addiction was considered to be part of this local election coverage. However, the videotape recording made by "Weekend" related solely to a larger study concerning drug addiction in Canada which was not scheduled to be aired until after the municipal election.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN PRICE OF MILK—PRIOR CONSULTATION—GOVERNMENT REACTION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs a question relating to an announced increase in the price of milk by one firm in the city of Toronto. Were there consultations with the government or the Prices and Incomes Commission prior to this announcement?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. I have noted the press report to which the Leader of the Opposition referred. The reasons given in the press report for the increase in the price of milk by one dairy do not seem to be very sound reasons for an immediate price increase. I hope other dairies in that district will not see fit to raise their prices.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is this action contrary to the position announced by the Minister of Finance whereby all firms were being requested not to increase their prices at least until after the meeting arranged by the Prices and Incomes Commission to see whether a program of effective restraint can be achieved?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance and other members of the government have been endeavouring to get firms contemplating a price increase not to do so until March 1 or until such time as the Prices and Incomes Commission has had an opportunity of endeavouring to work out an agreed formula. We have been meeting with a fair amount of success in that endeavour, and I am appreciative of those firms which have agreed to roll back their prices. The price increase referred to by the Leader of the Opposition was announced in the press and we were not aware of it until this morning.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary. Is it the intention of the minister or the government to try to persuade the firm in question to hold the line until after the meeting arranged by the Prices and Incomes Commission or is it the position of the government that the increase is regrettable but it does not propose doing anything about it?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, as I have already indicated, only one firm has increased its price. I have asked the other firms in this market area not to increase their prices. If they do not, I anticipate the price increase will have to be rolled back.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): In view of the minister's expressed desire for consumers to ginger him up, has he received enough ginger from the protest of the Consumers Association in Toronto to get busy and ensure that this one increase does not spread to all the dairies in the area, which it undoubtedly will if the minister does not take action?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, as I read the statement of the President of the Consumers Association of Toronto, it is that there should be price, wage and profit controls in Canada. That is the first time I have noted such a statement by the Consumers Association. It was not made by their national organization.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UNITED STATES ABM SYSTEM—INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN DECISION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. It arises out of a statement by President Nixon that his administration now proposes to proceed with the second stage of the Safeguard ABM system. In view of the Prime Minister's statement of March 19 last that the Canadian government was reviewing the matter and would decide very soon whether they would condemn this ABM program or co-operate with it, I ask the Prime Minister whether the government has now reached a decision, whether it has conveyed any protest to the United States against the ABM system or whether it has indicated its intention of co-operating with them in the construction of the Safeguard system?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the House will recall that on that occasion we were concerned that the announcement by the United States of America would create an escalation of the arms race. I must say that to date our evidence has not shown that this has resulted. Therefore our main concern at that time does not appear to have been well founded thus far.

This does not mean that on over-all grounds we are happy to see the project proceed. As far as we are concerned, we have no deterrent to protect on our soil. However, in so far as it is important to protect not the deterrent but the civilian population, we feel—and I understand the fear felt by the United States is mostly coming from an Oriental direction—that our own approach to the People's Republic of China, the negotiations going on in Stockholm are certainly a better way in the long run to protect the world from war than is a continuance of the arms race.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the fact that, as majority leader Mike Mansfield has said, this program will cost over $50 billion, which in itself is an escalation of the arms race, may I ask the Prime Minister whether we are to take his response as meaning that the Canadian government has now decided that this does not constitute any peril to the future peace of the world, and that the Canadian government does not propose to make any protest whatsoever with respect to the second phase of the Safeguard system being proceeded with?

Mr. Trudeau: I am afraid the hon. member has unintentionally misinterpreted my statement. It seems to me, on the contrary, that there was some form of protest in what I said; if the hon. member prefers to look at it otherwise, that is up to him. So far as the figure produced by Senator Mansfield is concerned, we only heard it this morning on the news and we have not had an opportunity to look into it. I also take issue with the hon. member's logic. When we talk of escalation we talk of escalation between countries rather than in terms of dollars and cents spent in one country. When we were answering this question last spring, it had to do with the danger of a decision by the United States resulting in a decision by the Soviet Union which would lead to a series of escalations. We have not seen this follow from the original United States decision. The Canadian government remains rather unhappy, however, that a friend and ally of such importance should be seeing its way to peace in this direction rather than in the direction I have just mentioned.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask the Prime Minister whether any member of the cabinet is at the present time carrying on any negotiations or discussions with the United States authorities with respect to the extension of the Safeguard system? If so, which ministers are concerned and what is the purpose of those discussions?

Mr. Trudeau: There has been no consultation on this item of news, which we learned about only this morning. To answer the hon. gentleman, there has been no consultation and there is no minister engaged in consultation. We have not, since this morning, made any decision.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): May I direct this supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs? Are we to infer from the reply just given that the presidential announcement in the United States does not involve any co-operation on the part of Canada whatsoever?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I can certainly give that assurance. This decision by the United States was made quite independently of any consultation with us.

PROPOSED U.S. NUCLEAR TESTS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): My supplementary question is also directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the announcement by the United States that further atomic explosions are to be set off in the Aleutians, reportedly three times as powerful as the one last October, does the Canadian government plan to make any formal protest regarding the continuation of these tests so close to Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): With regard to this item also may I say I have just read the bulletin in which the announcement appeared. Again, this announcement by the United States was not made after any consultation with us. In the course of the announcement the United States authorities said they had no reason to fear, on the basis of the tests made on Amchitka Island earlier, that there would be any untoward effects—for example, the creation of an earthquake or a tidal wave. They are satisfied in this regard on the basis of previous tests. We have not had the opportunity of seeing the results of those tests yet and therefore we have had no opportunity to decide whether to make a formal protest this time as we did before.

FINANCE

SHARING OF FEDERAL BUDGETARY SURPLUS WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister a question.

Could he tell us if the government would consent to share its budget surplus with the provinces which are facing very serious financial problems at the present time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member does not understand why we have a surplus. If we did not want one, we could easily spend the money or reduce taxes.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

We have a budgetary surplus precisely because we want to combat inflation and this was done at the cost of great sacrifices. It would therefore not be a solution to transfer—

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

I may not have the same approach to the problem as the Prime Minister, but I know that certain provinces are beset with great difficulties.

This question will certainly come up at the conference of Finance Ministers this week. According to news reports, some provinces do not share the federal government's views on inflation.

My supplementary question is as follows: Will this issue be formally examined during the conference of Finance Ministers?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, this matter is settled in our minds and if some provinces feel that way, their viewpoint is oversimplified. I repeat: We had to make great sacrifices in order to accumulate a surplus.

It led to lay-offs in the public service and reductions in certain programs. In brief, we have accumulated that surplus once again despite the opposition's encouragement to spend more.

This surplus was built up to fight inflation. This is an elementary rule of economics, and if the provinces, instead of reducing their own expenditures and building up a surplus, merely asked for a transfer of federal funds, they would be contributing to inflation rather than fighting it.

That matter has been settled. It should not be raised in Quebec City.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Would the Prime Minister tell us what is the use of a federal-provincial conference on this matter, if the federal government has made a unilateral decision?

[English]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MINIMUM WAGE INCREASE TO MEET HIGHER COST OF LIVING

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a question to direct to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. As the government has been urging organized labour to limit wage demands to 5 per cent a year, thus indicating that wage demands of that magnitude can be reconciled with the government's inflation control program, will the Prime Minister take the first opportunity on motions to explain why, during the last five years, the government has refused to grant yearly wage increases of this amount to workers on federal minimum wages, thus enabling them at least to keep level with the annual rise in the cost of living?

Mr. Speaker: I have some doubt whether this question can be admitted; the hon. member appears to be making an argument. In its present form the question does not appear to be acceptable.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I asked the Prime Minister whether he would take the first opportunity on motions to explain this important matter. I did not ask him to take the time of the House to do so now. May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Since the Prime Minister obviously refuses to answer this question—

Mr. Trudeau: It is out of order. I am not allowed to.

Mr. Hees: —and since it is reliably reported that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are the two who have blocked minimum wage increases, how does the right hon. gentleman square this reactionary attitude—

Mr. Trudeau: —with the just society.

Mr. Hees: —with his promises to introduce a just society made during the last election?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Peace River.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ACTION TO COPE WITH EXPECTED INFLUX OF COSA NOSTRA

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in light of the statement which I understand was made by the Deputy Solicitor General that we can expect a heavy influx of the Cosa Nostra from the United States following the recent crackdown there, could the Solicitor General advise whether new steps are being taken to deal with the expected heavy immigration of the Mafia to Canada?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I do not have the text of the speech referred to before me at the moment, but I presume it has been accurately summarized or quoted. In respect of this subject we are constantly seeking to be aware of exactly what activities are being conducted in this field. No special additional steps have been taken at this time but many regular steps are being taken in the ordinary course of watching this situation.

ACTION RESPECTING MARXISM-LENINISM MOVEMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, in view of the remarkable answer just given by the minister, which indicates a desire to give the House full information, may I ask him whether the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are looking into the activities of the Canadian Communist Marxism-Leninism Movement, whose leader has said, according to the Vancouver Sun, that he is "conscientiously organizing and preparing for the armed overthrow of the Canadian government"?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows he cannot quote from a speech. Perhaps he might ask the question directly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I ask but I am not sure that the scriptural conclusion, "and ye shall receive" will be realized. I ask the minister: What is being done about this movement? Is he giving it the same lack of action that he has indicated in connection with the organization referred to a moment ago?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, a great deal of action is being taken to watch both these situations. I do not propose to give the right hon. gentleman detailed information as to what investigations are being undertaken by the police in connection with each particular excerpt he reads in the newspapers.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not ask for particulars; I asked whether the matter was being looked into or whether these people are free to advocate the overthrow of the Canadian government by force?

Mr. McIlraith: No, they are not, and the matter is being looked into.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is the Prime Minister that sure? He is one of those who had similar views at one time.

Mr. Trudeau: They won't overthrow us.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEW OR REVISED TECHNIQUES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to ask a question of the Solicitor General as I find his answers a bit too difficult to take. I should like to address a question to the minister in charge of housing arising out of the statement he made earlier this afternoon. He said he was allocating $200 million of the amount he mentioned to the development of new or revised techniques in respect of public housing where the present act is not adequate. I think I paraphrased that correctly. Will he inform the House when he will be able to make a statement on exactly what he intends to use that $200 million for, and what new or revised techniques he has arrived at after discussing the idea with people who know something about the matter?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I cannot concede that the hon. member has paraphrased the statement correctly, but I can simply say that I will be happy to make such a statement soon. In the meantime I invite his ideas on new methods of providing housing for low income groups.

DRUGS

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF LE DAIN COMMISSION

Mr. Ray Perrault (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, in light of recent ministerial statements concerning laws regulating the use of drugs, can the Prime Minister inform the House whether the royal commission now inquiring into the subject is expected to report soon?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hear a suggestion that we should legalize potash. I think we should take that into consideration. I have had no indication when the royal commission will report but I do want to emphasize that until it does the position of the government is not fixed. We have reached no decision concerning the legalizing or otherwise of the non-medical use of drugs. We are looking forward to the report and the establishment of criteria on the basis of which any decision would be made. It is on the basis of such criteria that the government will determine what action should be taken.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

MARIJUANA—ALLEGED STATEMENT AS TO LEGALIZATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare which has to do with an article in the Ottawa Journal under the heading "Munro Seeking To Get Off Pot". This is an admirable objective. What did the minister mean when he said that if a reasonable minority of Canadians were found to use marijuana this would be a basis for legalizing it? What did he have in mind in respect of "a reasonable minority"?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If my recollection is correct this question was asked of the minister last week. I suggested at the time the question might be directed to the Prime Minister and it was. That is my recollection of what happened in respect of this matter last Thursday or Friday.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister spoke for the minister, and while he can speak for most of them I am sure he cannot interpret what one of his ministers has said. Surely the minister should be given an opportunity to tell us what he meant when he made this irresponsible statement.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the minister will have the opportunity to do so but the rules do not allow him to do so in the way suggested by the right hon. gentleman.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR FURTHER INFORMATION ON BILL AMENDING ACT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, in view of certain allegations made by the Minister of Fisheries, can he supply more information regarding the new Fisheries Act as outlined on television on Sunday?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the Fisheries Act is on the agenda of House business and will be dealt with shortly.

POLLUTION

SAINT JOHN RIVER—CO-OPERATIVE ACTION TO ALLEVIATE

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, in view of the allegation by the Minister of Fisheries that companies are polluting the Saint John River, have he or his officials taken the opportunity to meet with management in an attempt to plan joint action to alleviate the pollution?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker. We have met with all the companies with one exception, and we have been endeavouring to meet with that company as well.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Fisheries is dealing with this matter will he give every assurance that where vital employment is concerned in the Maritimes he will not deal with one particular aspect on the Saint John River system but will consider the problem as a whole?

Mr. Davis: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Officials of my department, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and of other federal and provincial departments are meeting today in Fredericton to discuss that very matter today.

FRASER RIVER—MONITORING OF PULPMILL EFFLUENT

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the aggressive anti-pollution stance the Minister of Fisheries took on television yesterday, is he considering making public the results of Fisheries Department monitoring of pulpmill effluent on the Fraser River?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, my brief answer to that question would have to be no. We have had great success in working closely with companies on a confidential basis and they have been adhering to our engineering standards for clean-up plant in B.C.

FISHERIES

SEALS—RESPONSE TO REPRESENTATIONS—COMPENSATION FOR FISHERMEN

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a question about the seal fishery. Can the minister indicate what has been his response to representations made by spokesmen for the seal fishery of Newfoundland, and can he confirm whether or not the largest firm in Newfoundland to send seal fishermen to the ice has indicated that it will not prosecute the seal fishery this year?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I do not know at this moment the intentions of that particular firm. It is having to change its operations somewhat and I am sure it will know the results of its survey in the next day or two.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, can the minister indicate what programs the government has in mind to compensate the sealers who in 33 days last year earned approximately $1,000 and will not be taking part in the fishery this year, as well as the firms which have already made preparations but because of the lateness of the minister's decision have had to cancel their programs?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is inviting the minister to make a statement concerning what program is being considered by the government. In the circumstances outlined, I think the information might be given by way of a statement. The minister might indicate if he is prepared to do that.

Mr. Davis: My brief answer, Mr. Speaker, is that we hope and have reason to expect the seal hunt this year will be every bit as productive in terms of income as it has been in other years.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, the information we have is that as a consequence of the minister's announcement on Friday—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must bring to the attention of the hon. member that he cannot indicate to the House what his information is. He may only ask a question.

Mr. McGrath: Will the minister make a statement in clarification of the very ambiguous statement he made on Friday which cast a great deal of doubt on the future of the industry in Canada and indicated that if it is to be productive it will be productive exclusively for the Norwegians—and the minister knows that?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are two members waiting to ask supplementaries. I shall allow these supplementaries, but I might remind hon. members we are running short of time and many members have been waiting for an opportunity to ask questions.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I have a brief supplementary. Would the minister advise what plans the Canadian government has for policing the international waters—and there is an international role here—in view of the fact that in past years the agreement in respect of taking seals at the front was broken?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Davis: We will have federal fisheries officers on the vessels and we have an arrangement with the Norwegians whereby we may jointly supervise each other's fishermen.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

COMPLAINTS RESPECTING CAR REPAIR CLINICS

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Some weeks ago the minister undertook to have his department look into the complaints of a consumers group regarding the alleged shortcomings of car repair clinics across Canada. Could the minister make a report to the House in this regard today?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to answer the hon. member's question at this point. We have been examining the matter very carefully, but the jurisdiction of my department and the federal government is somewhat doubtful at the moment, save and except as it relates to fraud under the Criminal Code. I do not think the complaints made involve fraud.

AIR TRANSPORT

CRASH IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—DND SEARCH AND RESCUE OPERATIONS AND EQUIPMENT

Mr. Bruce Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence but in his absence I shall direct it to the minister answering for him today. In connection with the crash of another aircraft carrying seven passengers in southwestern British Columbia this past weekend, I should like to inquire how long it took the search and rescue operations of the department to get into operation and whether or not the aircraft was equipped with a crash position indicator?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I regret to inform the hon. member that on Mondays nobody answers for the Department of National Defence.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: That is the most informative answer you have given today.

[Mr. Lundrigan.]

WOMEN

SENIORITY AND JOB SECURITY WHILE PREGNANT

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In light of the submission today by the Canadian Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, is the government preparing legislation to protect the seniority and job security of working women while bearing children?

The silence, Mr. Speaker, indicates a negative response apparently, so perhaps I might ask a supplementary. This is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In the light of the submission to which I have already referred, will the government be ratifying the convention of the International Labour Organization on maternity protection?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the submission made this morning by the Federation of Business and Professional Women, the minister stated that until the provinces had passed legislation in conformity with this convention it would be impossible for Canada to ratify it, and that the government of Canada was pressing on the provinces the desirability of such legislation.

HIGHWAYS

ALASKA HIGHWAY—CONSULTATIONS REGARDING COMPLETION OR IMPROVEMENT

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. Can he tell us whether or not, during his recent tour of the north, any consultations were held with either Canadian or United States officials regarding the completion, or improvement, of the Alaska Highway?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, no consultations were held there, but I was informed while in the north that a bill is being acted upon by Congress which would set aside certain moneys for extended studies and negotiations with the government of Canada.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, might I just answer the Minister's comment by saying that there is a private member's bill which has been on the Order Paper for a long time and in respect of which there has been no action.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether in the course of his discussions he advised his United States counterparts, despite the fear of the government to have the matter come to a vote, that a majority of the members of this House are strongly convinced that the Canadian government should declare sovereignty over the Arctic islands and the water surrounding the Arctic archipelago?

POST OFFICE

RURAL CLOSURES—PROVISION OF OTHER SERVICE

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications. In view of the confusion and consternation in the minds of rural patrons, and in view of the wholesale closing of many rural post offices, may I ask the minister whether there is any proposed change in respect of the rural carriers and whether he is prepared to make a statement in the House indicating how these rural patrons would be affected—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question is acceptable procedurally only to the extent it invites the minister to make a statement on motions. The minister might like to reply to that part of the question.

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I do not anticipate making any statement on motions. Where we do close post offices we always provide alternative service.

HOUSING

POLICY RESPECTING REHABILITATION OF HOMES

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing. It has to do with a matter he did not mention in his statement. In view of the tremendous importance of maintaining the existing stock of housing as well as building new housing, will the minister make a statement relating to government policy to encourage or assist home owners to rehabilitate their existing houses.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, in my statement I believe I referred to the application of section 40 loans. One of the things we did last year was to provide for loans to a maximum of $18,000 for the rehabilitation of existing homes. We hope to use a larger number of section 40 loans for the benefit of people on low incomes.

PUBLIC HOUSING—PROVISION OF RECREATIONAL FACILITIES

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, would the minister assure the House that in respect of the building of low-rent public housing, outside and inside recreational facilities will be built in in every case?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether this question is in order at this time.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether he would make a statement shortly concerning the type of public housing to be built and the details of the program?

Mr. Andras: I shall be very happy to make a statement soon which will probably be very favourable with regard to the question raised.

WELFARE

INQUIRY AS TO WHITE PAPER ON SERVICES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether we can count on receiving the government's white paper on welfare services before the end of the session and whether we can count on receiving it, for example, not later than June?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it has not yet been determined whether or not it will be presented before June.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare a supplementary question. I am not sure I heard his response to my other question correctly but I assumed the date in June was the aim, not necessarily a commitment. I wish to ask the minister whether the advisory committee which has been named has been given any firm indication as to how long it will have to work, or does it have an indefinite duration for expressing views or giving advice on what should go into the white paper?

Mr. Munro: There is no direct relationship between the advisory committee and the white paper. The committee is a statutory body set up under the Government Organization Act and it is of a continuous nature. They meet three times a year to advise the government, and myself in particular, on efficiency and on the merits of current welfare policies and to initiate advice on their own, not necessarily to act on questions that I might put to them. Therefore they may, of their own volition, have suggestions to offer with respect to the white paper.

Mr. Stanfield: I have one further question. If there is no relationship at all between the June date and the appointment of the advisory committee, then any delay in bringing out the white paper is purely an internal matter within the government?

Mr. Munro: That is correct, Mr. Speaker, but may I indicate that I do not believe the Leader of the Opposition heard me when I indicated, in reply to his first question, that no firm decision has been taken by the government on the timing of the publication of the white paper.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

POLICY FOLLOWING THIRD REPORT OF COMMISSION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Has the government decided on its policy in respect of the third report of the B and B Commission?

Mr. MacInnis: No.

Mr. Nowlan: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not think the right hon. Prime Minister has delegated the responsibility for answering to the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Just this once.

Mr. Nowlan: If no decision has been made, does government policy now permit senior public servants, as it permits cabinet ministers, to give their personal views on this matter?

Mr. MacInnis: The Prime Minister makes a good dummy.

Mr. Trudeau: May I say, in answer to the hon. member's question, yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Munro.]

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF TASK FORCE

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Is the final report of the task force on agriculture in the hands of the government and, if so, can the minister inform the House when this important and long-expected document will be tabled and made public?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I received a copy of the report last Friday, but at this point I cannot indicate precisely how long it will take to translate and print it.

[Translation]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NIGERIA—PRESENCE OF CANADIAN CATHOLIC PRIESTS

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question.

Could he tell the House whether Catholic priests of Canadian origin are in Nigeria at present?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that there are no Canadian missionaries in the enclave, and therefore there is no problem in this respect. The House may recall that I reported some weeks ago that there were two or three who were evacuated in Biafran planes.

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

ASSERTION OF CONTROL OVER ARCTIC WATERS

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the announcement that the Manhattan will make a second voyage, and in view of the fact that this second trip in Canada's waters may establish a precedent, does the government intend to make a declaration on Arctic sovereignty before any such voyage?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As the House is aware, legislation was included in the Speech from the Throne. I hope it will be introduced before very long.

In answer to the first part of the question may I say that I have also read these reports.

I do not know, as a result of my own inquiries, that in fact this ship is making another trip.

[Later:]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have a supplementary question to that of the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley. I wish to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether officials of the Humble Oil Company or the United States State Department have been in consultation with the minister's department regarding the proposed second trip of the Manhattan, and whether or not the Canadian government indicated to those responsible what regulations the Canadian government would lay down with respect to the possible pollution of Arctic waters?

Mr. Sharp: Of course there have been some exchanges between the U.S. administration and the Canadian government arising out of various statements made by the Prime Minister and by other ministers on the whole subject of Arctic pollution and sovereignty over the Arctic.

With regard to the specific question whether the U.S. government has asked us about a second trip of the Manhattan, I think I made it quite clear in my previous answer that I did not know the Manhattan was to make another trip. Indeed, I do not know also whether the U.S. government would in fact make such inquiries. It is the Manhattan itself which would be making the voyage, not the U.S. government.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the government intend to lay down strict provisions or regulations with respect to the trip of the Manhattan as it might affect the possible pollution of Arctic waters?

Mr. Sharp: The House will recall that last year when the Manhattan made its voyage it was made with the concurrence of the Canadian government. It was an experimental trip in order to test whether there is passage and under what conditions it could be made. I should think that if the Manhattan passes through there again, the trip would be part of the same experiment and one which we should welcome, not protest against, because it is most important that we should all know the conditions under which Canadian waters can be used.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POLLUTION

INQUIRY AS TO NEW MEASURES

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): I have a question for the President of the Privy Council. Since, as I noticed, he was chatting with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources a while ago, I should like to ask the minister whether new anti-pollution legislation or measures will be announced soon. I am not asking whether the legislation will be dealt with in this session, but whether the announcement will be made soon?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): The program for the balance of this session has been indicated. At present there is nothing I can indicate that will be added.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

STEPHENVILLE, NFLD.—CONSTRUCTION OF NEW FACILITIES

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): My question is for the Minister of Public Works. Would he indicate whether a decision has been made to construct new federal facilities in Stephenville, Newfoundland, in line with recommendations of the Post Office Department and other federal agencies to improve the capabilities as projected in relation to the potential growth of the area?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question should be put on the Order Paper.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

COMPLAINTS RESPECTING HARASSMENT OF PORTUGUESE SHIPS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a question for the Solicitor General. Has he received complaints of what appears to be excessive harassment by the RCMP of Portuguese ships in the port of St. John's?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Yes, Mr. Speaker, complaints on that subject were received.

Mr. McGrath: In view of the fact that Portugese ships have been using the port of St. John's for 400 years, may I ask the minister what he proposes to do about these complaints?

Mr. McIlraith: We had the matter investigated and found that the complaints were not substantiated. But I am pursuing the investigation further.

Mr. McGrath: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I was hoping to be recognized by you, Sir, before the question period ran out in view of the importance of the Prime Minister's answer to a supplementary question, an answer which I am not sure I heard correctly. I was trying to be recognized again by Your Honour to ensure that I heard what I thought I heard in answer to the supplementary question. Because of the confusion between the two sides of the House, I honestly do not know whether the Prime Minister heard my question and I would not want any confusion to arise with regard to the answer he gave. If I heard the answer correctly, federal civil servants can publicly express their views on matters of public policy; this might be an important precedent.

Mr. Speaker: I have to suggest to the hon. member that I heard the question clearly and I also heard the answer. Perhaps he might wait to see what appears in Hansard.

Mr. Trudeau: It might be helpful if I were permitted to answer the question, but when the Opposition wants to volunteer answers I can only sit down and let them do it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I understand the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is also rising on a point of order.

Mr. Nowlan: There is still my question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising again on the same point of order?

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it may be in anticipation of another question of privilege, but Your Honour said yourself that you heard the question and the answer. I should like to clarify what happened for the record. It seems to me that if the Prime Minister uttered something he cannot suggest the answer came from hon. members on this side. He is one of the leaders of the land and must be responsible.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do so essentially for the purpose of putting a caveat on the record. When the hon. member for Okanagan-Boundary asked a question a few minutes ago of the Minister of National Defence the Prime Minister replied, if I heard him correctly, that no one answers today for the Department of National Defence. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that that comment should not stand without some remark about it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It has become apparent that we cannot force ministers to be here to answer questions, but I trust it is still clear that by the rules, in particular Standing Order 39(5), any member of the House has a right to ask a question of any minister any day of the week. Incidentally, since the second Acting Minister of National Defence is present, I thought he might have answered the question.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might make it clear as well that the situation you had cause to rule on during the course of this Parliament has come into general acceptance, and the caveat of the hon. member has no application.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am suggesting there should be no debate. I would not agree readily with the statement made by the President of the Privy Council.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The Standing Order referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has not been changed or amended. It is still there.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, on this point of order, I might suggest that the only intention in applying this system was to ensure that the question period could be orderly. As a gesture of goodwill, I think I might invite the acting minister to answer the question, if such is the desire of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Of course, the question period has expired and it is only with the unanimous agreement of the House that this could be done.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no such agreement. The hon. member may have an opportunity tomorrow to ask the question again.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY

NATIONAL MARKS AND STANDARDS

The House resumed, from Thursday, January 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Jamieson that Bill C-137, respecting the use of national safety marks in relation to motor vehicles and to provide for safety standards for certain motor vehicles imported into or exported from Canada or sent or conveyed from one province to another, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, when this bill was under discussion the other night, I mentioned one of the problems that will not be solved by our acceptance of the legislation. Some failures have already become apparent in the counterpart U.S. legislation, and in addition this bill does not take into account certain driving conditions in Canada. Mr. Speaker, since there is considerable conversation taking place in the chamber, perhaps you might invite some of those concerned to leave.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I notice the hon. member is looking pleadingly in the direction of the Chair. I assume he is hoping that the conversations will be somewhat more subdued so that we can hear him. I would invite hon. members to hold their conversations behind the curtains so that we can listen to the hon. member's very interesting speech.

Mr. Peters: I appreciate your assistance, Mr. Speaker. One factor that has not been covered in the 29 points concerning safety factors in the United States, and which is unique to Canada, concerns our weather conditions. All the cars that one sees stalled on the Queensway, and on all the other highways and byways because of weather conditions, are an added hazard to traffic in wintertime, a hazard that does not exist in most of the United States. These stalled cars cause many serious accidents in Canada.

When a slight drizzle and foggy conditions are forecast, one can expect an increase in the number of road accidents. On cold mornings there will probably be as many rear-end collisions on the Queensway, even on dry pavement, as there are when conditions are slippery, so slippery as to make stopping impossible. The fact that some cars will not run in this type of weather adds to the seriousness of the problem.

In the United States, it is reported that the cost of installing mandatory safety devices on cars came to $46, but a sum of $107 was charged to automobile purchasers. It is interesting to note that a survey of motorists disclosed that 54 per cent of those 20 to 49 years of age indicated a willingness to pay a higher price for safety devices, but only 50 per cent of those over age 50 indicated a similar willingness. I believe if drivers aged 60, 65 and 70 had been surveyed, a majority would have indicated a marked degree of reluctance to pay for additional safety features.

No doubt this bill will be examined thoroughly in committee. Members may draw attention to studies done in the United States which indicate that 10 per cent of safety devices produced by United States factories are rejected as unsafe following inspection. Members will certainly hope this will not be the case in Canada.

No doubt members will also raise the question of car bumpers. I am sure that even if a motorist in Toronto had a piece of steel railway track welded all around his car he would still not find it safe to drive on some of the freeways there. It appears most car bumpers are installed just for wives to polish. They certainly are not installed for protection.

When I looked at the bumper on a car I previously owned I was amazed to see a big dent in it. I was sure I had not hit anything, and that nothing had hit me. When I looked at a number of similar type cars, I found they all had a dent in the same place. Another example of this was the little Karmann Ghia Volkswagen. It always had a dent in the hood. This was not because I drove it under a truck, but simply because the bumpers did not coincide.

I like the advertisement, although I do not believe it, which shows a guy with a sledge hammer banging upon a car bumper, and nothing happens to it. Such a bumper might withstand a five or ten miles per hour impact, without everything being scattered all over the pavement.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I would like to see the hammer he uses.

Mr. Peters: If a little more cobalt were put in the bumper, it might produce a stronger alloy and make it last longer. That would help some of the mines in my area.

Another reason I have for speaking on the bill today is that it makes no provision with respect to snowmobiles and snowmobile safety. The snowmobile is one of the greatest inventions the Canadian people have seen in many years, and many people are riding them for sport. I noticed the other day that two old ladies, one over 70 and the other over 60, were out on their snowmobile and ran into a car. Clearly, people of mature years as well as those not so mature are using snowmobiles which are growing in popularity. For that reason, I think it will be necessary for us to introduce legislation governing the safety of snowmobile operation. This matter comes under federal jurisdiction. I am also pleased to note that, since snowmobiles in large part are manufactured in Canada, the regulations governing their safety can be brought under federal jurisdiction. I have a number of suggestions to make with respect to the safety of snowmobiles.

• (3:30 p.m.)

You know, Mr. Speaker, one cannot believe everything one hears about horsepower. It seems to me that some manufacturers lie like the dickens when they speak about the horsepower of their cars. You see tractors rated at 15, 20 or 25 horsepower, and yet you will see a Buick rated at 450 horsepower. The Cadillac people now have on the market a car with a motor said to develop 500 horsepower. A few years ago, an engine of that size would power an aeroplane of some size; it was enough to run a diesel plant which would supply electric power for a town of some 10,000 inhabitants. Clearly, when manufacturers talk of horsepower they are not talking about the power you can use to pull your neighbour out of the ditch; they are talking about concepts of speed and weight.

Advertising of a similar sort is applied to snowmobiles. These little vehicles are about 6 or 7 feet long, probably 2 or 3 feet wide, and weight anywhere between 250 and 1,000 pounds. They are now powerful enough to reach speeds of between 105 and 115 miles per hour. Of course, these fast snowmobiles are basically ordinary machines which have been souped-up, to use the vernacular. I think the minister ought to interest himself in this area and try to inform the public of the dangers through a program of advertising. As I say, horsepower really has little to do with how much power you have to pull your neighbour out of the ditch or pass the car ahead of you. It is based on engine capacity and the type of gasoline you use. I think our advertisers have been emphasizing the wrong things when advertising snowmobiles. The size of snowmobile power plants ought to be limited by law, and there ought to be some distinction between snowmobiles used on the race track and those used for every day purposes.

Another problem is the noise of snowmobiles. Although some municipalities have bylaws governing noise, those bylaws are difficult to enforce insofar as snowmobiles are concerned. I know that some municipalities say snowmobiles may not be used in city streets, yet these snowmobiles which are kept at home must pass through city streets on their way to the country or to open spaces. One of my constituents complained about noisy snowmobiles going past his window on Sunday mornings. On the morning in question he tried to watch television but, because of the noise from snowmobiles outside, he could not do so. He went to the window and within one hour had counted 82 snowmobiles going past his house. In a subsequent letter he told me that he became more disturbed on learning that wheels could be fitted to snowmobiles, enabling them to be used in the summer as well as in winter. Clearly, some kind of engine muffler must be fitted to snowmobiles. You are not allowed to drive a car in any town without an engine muffler; neither are you allowed to operate a power lawnmower without some kind of muffling device. The same sort of regulation ought to apply to snowmobiles.

The question of headlights is also important. People approaching a snowmobile on the highway at night very often cannot tell if the vehicle approaching is a motorcar with only one headlight, a motorcycle or a snowmobile. Just as we would not appreciate hearing, say, 200 Model T Fords going by without engine mufflers, so I submit our motorists do not appreciate meeting vehicles in the dark with only one headlight. It is often impossible to tell, as I say, whether the vehicle you are meeting is a car with only one headlight. Sometimes a motorist may think he is meeting a car which has only its left headlight working. Clearly, if he pulls to the side of the road in order to take evasive action he may be doing the wrong thing if the approaching vehicle turns out to be a snowmobile. I, therefore, advocate that for snowmobiles as well as for motorcycles, two headlights set fairly close together ought to be mandatory.

My next point has to do with the survival of those who may be stranded in the bush. This ought to be of particular interest to the Department of Transport. Very often these days, snowmobiles travelling in the bush break down. In temperatures of between 30 below and 40 below zero, it is often impossible for a man to survive in the bush unless he is equipped with snowshoes, knowledge of the environment and survival equipment. This equipment ought to include an axe and, I submit, some sort of radio oscillating device costing about $20 which could be switched on and guide rescue forces to him. Snow conditions in the bush often make it impossible for a man to walk far. If he could switch on some kind of oscillating device, which could work on the citizens radio band or a police band, his rescue would be more easily directed. These bands, for instance, could be monitored on a continuing basis, so that in an emergency we would not have to wait until a person was known to be lost before setting rescue operations in motion. We could provide adequate penalities in case children played around with such devices.

Of course, repairing one of these devices would probably cost as much as the original purchase price, but nevertheless it should be on the machine. It should be sealed so that once it is turned on it cannot be turned off until the rescue is effected. If this simple device were installed in an aeroplane, one could locate the aircraft very quickly. It has a range of 20 miles and is operated by a flashlight battery on one particular band. I understood they were to be installed on aircraft so that if a crash occurred, causing an impact of a certain magnitude, this device would automatically start operating.

There are several other considerations, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the municipalities will have to give consideration to installing guy wires parallel to the roads. I heard of a girl who was riding behind her boyfriend on a skidoo who ended up with his head in her lap after hitting a guy wire. A friend of mine, skidooing on his own farm, hit a barbed wire fence and had to have 40 stitches put in his face. He nearly lost an eye. Imagine what could happen when one is not familiar with the terrain! This bill may be concerned with safety devices such as roll bars or reinforced windshields. In the case of skidoos, we have an opportunity right now to make safety devices of this type available to the public before any more damage is done. It is no use waiting until a dozen people have their heads tucked under somebody else's arm.

We have this opportunity, and I think the minister is well advised to follow the American safety program in the initial stages. In Canada, perhaps we are more interested in a car that will operate safely and satisfactorily in northern climates. Features such as rear window defrosters, battery chargers and block heaters are much more important to us than some of the smog devices installed in California. Perhaps, we should consider these as well, but there are some purely Canadian problems on which we will have to act independently of the United States.

I am not sure what we should do about studded tires. In the United States, 10 per cent of the tires tested failed in one out of six tests but I am not clear how many of these failures were related to heat or cold. You will remember that after the war everybody was begging, borrowing or stealing tires because they were in short supply. On a cold morning it was not unusual to find all four tires flat. They were just not made for cold conditions. Perhaps studded tires are a northern problem, but they are costing provincial taxpayers large amounts of money if the report on highway damage is correct. The tungsten studs appear to be fine for the first snowfall, but I am not sure of their effectiveness in deep snow or ice. The safety requirements for tires in Canada would be totally different from those of the United States. Tires should be tested under Canadian winter conditions and the results would probably differ greatly from tests conducted in the United States.

The minister has shown some initiative in presenting this bill, as have some members in drafting private members' bills. One is my colleague from Surrey (Mr. Mather) who has had experience with the National Automobile Associations and has been interested in promoting highway safety for quite some time. The fact that the minister has taken some of the better points from a number of bills, and that there has been some Canadian consideration of this problem, leads me to believe that the minister will give consideration in committee to the extension of this investigation into some other fields, particularly snowmobiles and water safety. I am very surprised how many people wearing life-preserving equipment bearing the stamp of approval of the Department of Transport lose their lives. Some improvement could be brought about in this bill.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-137 introduced a day or two ago by the Minister of Transport is a very important bill.

I should like to make a few suggestions which I trust will be accepted by the House, particularly in view of the fact that I spent some 23 years in law enforcement and came in contact with some of these problems under the most distressing circumstances. It is a disgrace that in North America we kill upwards of 60,000 people every year on our highways, not to mention innumerable cases of impairment, maiming and property damage running into millions of dollars. No law can stop this, but it certainly is a step in the right direction.

As we all know, it is very difficult to enforce law because once the manufacturer has sold the automobile to the public, often he feels that is where his responsibility ends. This bill, Mr. Speaker, purports to plug one or two of those gaps.

It may be dangerous to have safety stickers or safety marks put on automobiles by the manufacturer because sometimes these automobiles are defective when they leave the factory. The previous speaker mentioned bumpers, and everyone who drives an automobile knows that the present bumpers are entirely inadequate. A bumper should be able to absorb the shock of an automobile running into a solid object at 30 miles an hour without danger to the automobile. We cannot be sure that there will not be danger to the occupants, but shock absorbers or a properly built bumper would reduce damage both to the automobile and the occupants.

I see no reason why a safety sticker should be put on an automobile when the bumper, one of the most important parts of the automobile when it is in motion, is nothing more than a piece of tinsel. Although it is extremely high priced, it is absolutely useless for the job for which it is intended. The amount that we pay for these chrome beauties could very well be used for devices made from reinforced rubber and steel. There could be some form of shock absorber or oil recuperating system similar to the one on large guns which we had in the army. The modern automobile is as lethal a weapon as a piece of artillery. The committee should give priority to bumpers when considering safety factors.

Some attention should be given to the danger caused by frost. I do not see any reason why windshields could not be lined with an arrangement of very fine heating wires to keep them free of frost. In cold climates such as we have in Canada, I suggest this should be mandatory for all windows.

[Mr. Bigg.]

It has always seemed strange that trucks are obliged to have all sorts of safety devices, but these are not mandatory on automobiles. One such item that comes to mind is a proper flasher. Most automobiles today have a flasher system, but this becomes inoperative when the battery goes dead. I think a mandatory provision should be incorporated in this bill that every automobile should have a double safety feature. If the electrical flashers are inoperative, there should be manual devices such as fire flares or the ordinary battery operated flashers. These flares could be put out for protection when changing a flat tire or if the vehicle is abandoned in a snowdrift with part of the car protruding. These flares could be used any time the automobile is a menace to traffic.

It should be mandatory that all automobiles have a proper towing hitch on both the front and rear of the car. When a vehicle becomes stalled in traffic which is proceeding at 60 miles an hour, it immediately becomes a menace. There should be a steel hook for towing purposes located in an accessible location so that it is not necessary to crawl underneath the car. The vehicle could then be towed by another vehicle with a strong nylon cord or chain.

I am sure law enforcement officers would support me when I say that many serious accidents occur after some minor breakdown, such as a flat tire, running out of gas, becoming stuck in a snowdrift or on the icy slope of a hill. The danger arises when people are on the highway trying to get the vehicle clear. Often, another vehicle comes over a hill or cuts out from other traffic and collides with the stalled vehicle.

Perhaps all these safety features cannot be incorporated at one time, but I feel they are long overdue. I feel they are necessary if the vehicle is to receive a government approved safety sticker. The only argument against these features at the moment is their cost. I feel there should be a little less soap opera advertising, and more value and safety for the purchasers of these vehicles.

I am glad the minister contemplates spending some government money on research. If we are to have safety devices, then by all means we should have our more intelligent people working on the cheapest and most effective devices so that the cost can be kept to a minimum. This would give some of our bright young people an opportunity to pursue this matter in the Canadian research councils, universities and in the automobile factories.

I am delighted to see that a step forward is being taken on the question of pollution. A day or two ago I made a gloomy speech on this subject. I pointed out that our atmosphere is being endangered by the emission of an enormous quantity of exhaust fumes, and that perhaps we are destroying forever our very limited oxygen supply. I think there should also be research on this subject. A great deal could be done to ensure that the most efficient fuels are used in our automobiles, such as those hydrocarbon fuels which create the least carbon dioxide and use the least amount of oxygen to propel the vehicle.

There has been a great improvement in storage batteries. Such batteries might well be incorporated into a vehicle as a subsidiary electrical driving device. This would be valuable on long trips. When driving from here to Toronto, upon reaching the outskirts of Toronto this electrical device could be switched on and used to drive through the city where the problem of pollution is the greatest. This system would not be necessary when driving in the country where the vehicle would be using up oxygen, but not endangering the health of the people.

This whole matter of safety on the highways is not confined to Bill C-137. There should be a continuing, concentrated educational program which could also be used to teach our children safety values. Safety programs can be effective. I hope hon. members will forgive an old man for reminding them of a situation which occurred in 1938 and 1939 in greater Winnipeg. Even in those days, the population of that city was 350,000. By co-operation of the public and the police, a safety record was established, which I think is an all time world safety record, of 228 days without a fatal accident—two-thirds of a year without anyone being killed. I have no hesitation in saying that if one picks up the newspaper today or tomorrow, there will be a report of a fatal accident in the greater Winnipeg area. I believe this to be true of any major city. In this instance, there was a period of eight months without a fatality. The automobiles of that day were very much the same shape and size as those of today. I do not think the driving public were greatly different. They were hurrying home for their dinner, and many of them used alcohol. However, with a concentrated effort, co-operation between the police, the local authority and those responsible for the administration of the law, a magnificent safety record was set up and there is no reason why any other city cannot equal it or do better.

We have better machinery today, better safety facilities. It is true that automobiles are more powerful but they are equipped with better safety devices—better brakes, power steering. Often there is two or three times as much contact between the automobile and the highway, resulting from the use of much wider tires.

Then, there is the question of what can be done by concentrating on safety. Speaking as a former police officer, I believe the first responsibility rests on the law enforcement officers. I know there are certain roads in Canada today which are considered to be revenue lanes the public is reluctant to drive down them for fear of being picked up for some picayune traffic offence. Motorists figure they are paying the cost, to the municipality, of running the police force. This results in bad liaison between the police and the public. If the minister, and all hon. members present will take cognizance of what I am saying and use their influence in the right way to make sure this sort of attitude is discouraged, I think the result would be beneficial. There is nothing in my opinion, next to the courtesy of one man toward another, which prevents accidents on the highway so much as a proper respect for the law. I admire a police force which enforces the law, but it should not engage in a game of hare and hounds in which it is continually hounding the public. The force is there to serve the public, to make sure that traffic flows properly back and forth. It is a sad thing when motorists get the idea that they are being forced, by a police force which is not doing its proper job, to pay municipal taxes that is, by a force which is raising revenue instead of making the highway safer.

I want to say something about the breathalyzer test. I have always been a strong supporter of civil rights and liberties, but when we are killing up to 60,000 people a year on the highways I say it is time we all put false pride in our pockets and said: If I have been drinking so much that the policeman thinks I am drunk, I owe it to the public to blow into the little balloon. It is a question of co-operating in the effort to reduce this terrible toll of our highways. Let us hear no more about motorists being assaulted when asked by the police to take this test. Instead, let each motorist resolve not to be one of those who carelessly risk other people's lives because they insist on mixing gasoline and alcohol. I believe the breathalyzer test is a very fair experiment.

People have told me that with .08 per cent of alcohol in their bloodstreams they are just as capable of driving as if they had not taken any alcohol, or just as capable of driving as anyone else. I challenge this assertion. If they could see the films made of drivers who thought they could drink and still drive well, or the safety films put out by the research institutes, I am sure they would be convinced no one is safe behind the wheel of a car travelling at 60 miles per hour when he has .08 per cent of alcohol in his system.

It is not alcohol alone which is entirely responsible for the high death toll. I bring the word down: the word I should like hon. members to take home with them is "courtesy". It is when alcohol is mixed with bad manners that it is most explosive. When alcohol is added to bad manners, and the motorist gets out on the highway with a tired, jaded feeling, determined to hog the road and race the other fellow home, the combination is often fatal. In all the years I was a policeman I cannot remember a fatal accident involving two cars when alcohol was not involved in the case of either one or both drivers. I did not always find physical evidence in the form of bottles, or alcohol in the cars, but I cannot recall any fatal accident—and I was present at far too many—when there was not at least a strong suspicion of impaired driving on the part of one or both drivers involved. This, in itself, should be sufficient justification for accepting the breathalyzer test. Surely, we owe it to others to drop the keys into the mailbox after we have been drinking, or to give them to the wife and let her drive home.

Mr. Jamieson: She may be drunker than you.

Mr. Bigg: Money might well be spent on public education, or on the provision of safety awards. I like that idea. When I read that a bus or truck driver has won a 20-year safety award I am ready to take my hat off to him. Anyone who can drive through our cities and on our highways for 20 years, or cover a million miles without an accident, has got to be a superman. When these drivers have travelled a certain number of miles I suggest they might even be considered for one of the Canadian awards. To me, a bus driver who has driven two million miles without an accident is a public hero who deserves not only to be honoured but given a salary increase of 20 per cent. Some wonderful films are available. Our national research people, the Mounted Police and the municipal police all have films on road safety which deserve the widest publicity. Everyone in a position to make use of them should draw out these films and show them at service clubs or at scout meetings.

I should like to see a reinstatement of the old youth and police programs begun by the Mounted Police some 25 years ago. Members of the force who were then, and still are, very highly respected, especially among young people, spent a great deal of their own time, with a minimum of assistance from the government as to time, vehicles at their disposal and the use of films, talking to young people and showing them films—how the force trained their dogs; how they made policemen; the kind of policemen who were true servants of the public, out to maintain the safety and happiness of the public. And they very much resented this modern trend of using the policeman as a revenue officer. It should never be done, and whenever it is done it should be discouraged.

This bill will go to the committee. I, for one, think the committee system has some very valuable uses, though it is still in the experimental stage. Let us get hold of this bill, take the 29 main points which the minister has outlined, examine them carefully and enlarge upon them. It might be well to spend a little money on research and upon the education of the public, because the prevention of automobile accidents is far more important than anything we can do after they have occurred.

I close by reminding you once more that in 1938 Winnipeg managed to get through two thirds of the year without one fatal accident among 350,000 people. If that could be done then, it can be done again now. The money that was spent in those days represents only a very small proportion of the amount of money we are spending every day to clean up this mess after it has occurred.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in the debate on Bill C-137, I find myself in a position somewhat similar to those hon. members who, from a sense of dignity or of duty, were obliged to point out the inadequacies of the Canada water bill which we sent to a committee a few days ago.

While this bill is a very timely and important piece of legislation, as many hon. members have pointed out it lacks teeth and effective administrative measures to cope with the serious problems it was designed to alleviate. This bill merely seems to be a copy of United States safety standards, and a governmental compliance with standards already effected by most major car companies. There is no real, clear evidence of a truly Canadian safety standards code, in spite of the fact the department has allegedly been deeply involved in a comprehensive research program to determine and prescribed various minimum safety regulations and standards for vehicles operating in Canada.

Some of the safety devices we now have on our automobiles as standard equipment may be effective. Some, on the other hand, raise some degree of doubt, perhaps not totally in principle, but in design. For example, it was just last week that the Winnipeg police department removed the headrests from their patrol cars as a safety and convenience measure. This was done for safety because the officials of the department found the design of the headrests to be a hindrance to vision which more than offset the appreciable protection factor for which the headrest was intended.

I could also refer to the use of seatbelts. In a recently conducted survey in the province of Alberta it was found that only 18 per cent of the motorists interviewed actually used their seatbelts, in spite of the fact they knew of their existence and were aware of their function. If a motorist is grossly endangering his life or health by not using seatbelts, then perhaps we should consider legislation forcing the use of this device. The use of any safety innovation such as this should be enforced if it is to be effective. If, on the other hand, only 18 per cent of the motoring public choose to use this device, with no indication of a possible increase in usage, it then would appear to be merely another factor contributing to the cost of manufacturing a car. This being the case, then the customer should be given the choice of purchasing a car with or without seatbelts. Seatbelts could be considered an option rather than mandatory item to be included in the price of the automobile.

Having regard to the stepped-up research program to which the minister referred, I must say Canada could certainly stand some improvement in this area. In substantiating this fact, I should like to point out that not so long ago the two-ply tire was introduced as standard equipment on all passenger cars and light trucks. This tire was to be safer because it supposedly had all the qualities of a four-ply tire plus many other side benefits. It was to have been safer because it ran cooler; it was to have been shock-resistant and impact resistant because it was more flexible and had a tougher core, and it was supposed to give longer wear. In short, it was totally engineered to meet existing highway travel demands, freeway operation, gravel and dirt roads. The simple fact is that this tire was not only unsatisfactory in a performance or economy sense, it was totally unsafe. It was not long before blowouts, ruptures and separations became a rather common occurrence.

The interesting point I should like to bring to the attention of the House relates to the great selling job that automakers and tire manufacturers did in the United States and in Canada, particularly with the governments. They fell for this so-called revolutionary breakthrough, hook, line and sinker, and without hesitation placed their designated mark of approval on these tires to indicate that they met government safety standards.

After these so-called "rags" appeared, as they were commonly referred to in automotive circles, it was not long before the consumer found that these tires were totally unsatisfactory, unsafe and uneconomical, not only to the consumer but likewise to those involved in merchandising the product. The automotive makers found themselves in the embarrassing position of having to make a complete circle in their recommendations by recommending four-ply tires to correct a steering condition which developed from the use of this ardently supported two-ply tire.

The concern and lack of acceptance by customers resulted in a situation wherein new vehicle customers refused to accept a new car with a two-ply tire of any brand name and simply demanded a safe four-ply tire. These were furnished at an additional cost of from $50 to $75. The result was an insurmountable buildup of two-ply tire stocks within many wholesale and retail tire outlets. Eventually, tire companies refused to take their own tires back in exchange for suitable replacements.

Despite this degree of dissatisfaction, and the resultant hazardous implications, the government failed to intervene and ban the marketing of this product which was totally unsuitable and unsafe. I believe that tires marketed in Canada should be subjected to a vigorous inspection and test in order to meet Canadian road and driving conditions. After all, tires are still the basic foundation of the automobile.

This leads me to another point in respect of the claim of motor manufacturers that the increased cost of new vehicles is the result of safety features. This is simply nonsense, and the manufacturers should be called upon to substantiate their claim. There is no question but that many safer instruments and devices could be installed at relatively little or no extra cost. For example, I think it would be just as cheap to manufacture a dashboard with a smooth, contoured surface as it is to have the sharp, knife-like edges we see in many models today. I think this could be incorporated without additional cost. I have known many injuries to be sustained as a result of impact against the rear view mirror, some of a minor nature but in many cases of a permanent nature.

As was pointed out by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Bigg), much improvement could be made in the construction of the bumper. The function of the bumper has been totally disregarded and it has now become an item of appeal rather than an item for safety.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Another aspect that should be investigated, and to which no reference is made in the bill or the appendix, is a minimum standard for windshield and rear window vision. This matter, naturally, could affect the total design of an automobile and indeed it should. Even today, there are many fastback models produced which have a limited amount of rear window vision and which contain detrimental blind spots. Coincidental with this, I believe it should be mandatory in Canada that all vehicles have adequate defrosting equipment in order that front, rear and side vision may not be obscured in any significant way. Naturally, this standard would probably apply to vehicles marketed in Canada only, but I think it is a matter of major importance. This has been covered adequately by other hon. members.

In looking over the 29 standards set out in the appendix to Hansard of Thursday last, I find most items to be very vague. I hope, during the consideration of the bill by the committee, we will be able to find out specifically what is meant by item 113, which is a regulation concerning hood latch systems and regulation 206 in respect of door latches, hinges and locks. These are very vague terms. I think we all realize these are basic necessities in respect of automobiles. I should like to know for the record just what provisions the automobile manufacturers must follow in this regard.

I do not wish to delay this bill unduly and, therefore, shall close by saying I believe the bill is a necessary piece of legislation which I intend to support. I am disappointed, however, by the lack of initiative of the government in prescribing Canadian standards in addition to those set by the United States. I believe such standards are necessary. Some of the Canadian requirements have been pointed out by me and others have been pointed out by other hon. members. I refer to such things as flares and towing devices, which were mentioned by my hon. friend from Pembina.

When one reads the bill one might almost believe it had been written by the motor car companies because without standards the bill does not mean too much. In a general way, all automobile manufacturers now comply with the standards to some degree. Regardless of the safety devices installed, the effect of such devices will depend to a large degree on the driver and passengers. There can be no substitute for caution and concern. One cannot legislate judgment and courtesy on the road.

Probably the greatest single contributor to carnage on the highway today is speed. I submit that if we are really serious about curbing the mass destruction of life and property, perhaps the best and simplest way to achieve it would be to simply build an automobile which travels no more than 50 or 60 miles per hour. Then, it might not be necessary to become involved in a debate which, in many respects, is rather superficial to the basic problem. But I doubt whether such a development will ever take place. Vested interests are involved and these will continue to exist. There will also probably continue to exist a desire and a challenge, on the part of some individuals, to live dangerously. So, we will continue to hear a lot of talk about safety, new innovations and new devices after this bill is passed. We will also continue to hear the tried and proven automobile advertising theme of more power, more torque and more speed. In view of this, there can be no illusions about there being less accidents. I submit therein lies a great part of our problem of highway safety today.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I just wish to make a few comments.

We are faced with an extremely serious problem, the problem of highway safety which must first be assured through education of those who drive vehicles and surveillance over mechanical safety of vehicles. As a matter of fact, the most advanced car, if in the hands of a careless driver, will always result in catastrophes such as those we unfortunately see every day, especially on weekends.

It is surprising to realize that in this era of technology and progress, when vehicles can land on the moon, and a great number of mechanical problems, can be resolved with incredible accuracy, the main being living on earth, i.e. man, is forgotten and that truly improved motor vehicles that may be driven safely home yet to be devised.

Cars have been made wider, more beautiful. Sometimes, they have been made smaller, without anything being done to improve them. When you think of the $3,000, $4,000, $5,000 or $6,000 that must be payed for a car, it seems paradoxical that the safety features have been completely disregarded. Too many accidents happen on the highways for them to be all attributed to the drivers' recklessness. It is obvious that car manufacturers do not live up to their responsibilities.

I am therefore in favor of any action aimed at improving motor vehicle safety standards so as to cut down the startling number of accidents on Canadian roads.

Since the price of cars is quite high, it is quite normal for the buyer to expect something safe, something truly useful. This is why I suggest that the previous speeches were to the point. The technical aspect they dealt with must be taken into consideration, so that motor vehicles will really be made to serve the people. We do not get in a car because it likes it, but because it serves us one way or the other. Therefore, a car must be equipped with everything necessary to give us the best possible service. We must therefore think of a whole gamut of small details which are not necesarily the ones that have been thought of.

Safety belts were mentioned. It is common knowledge that practically nobody bothers about them. Sometimes accidents happen precisely because of the wearing of safety belts. There are therefore many problems, of varying importance, and we should not go to the other extreme in adding gadgets to car because this often serves no other purpose than enriching the manufacturer of these gadgets. We should therefore be concerned only with safety devices that are necessary.

I cannot be led to believe that in this century of progress, of sophistication, it is not possible to invent everything required to cut down on highway accidents through improved safety of motor vehicles.

• (4:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure you that I would not have entered the debate on this matter had it not been that I noted throughout this debate that you yourself, Sir, and those who occupy Your Honour's Chair, have allowed the discussion to involve matters such as snowmobiles and protection of aeroplanes. As I have no intention of speaking for more than about four minutes, I know without question that I will be granted the same privilege as that given to other members.

I have noted in reports over the years what it costs Canada to engage in a sea or air search and rescue when a plane goes down. It is my understanding that if a certain instrument, called a beeper, were put in a plane, hundreds of thousands of dollars would be saved in air or sea search and rescue, and also many lives might be saved.

So, I would like to recommend, on this aspect only, what I think will meet with unanimous approval, namely, that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) consider the introduction at an early date of legislation making it mandatory that all planes flying over Canada, especially private planes, be required to have this very inexpensive piece of equipment. At present our law does not require this, but I am certain that for the few hundreds of dollars it costs thousands of dollars would be saved and, in all probability, lives would also be saved. I request that this matter be taken into consideration by the Minister of Transport and that it be made compulsory for this piece of equipment to be included on all planes flying in Canada.

The second point I wish to make concerns snowmobiles. I have been doing a great deal of reading about this piece of equipment. A few years ago it was unknown, but now we have them by the thousand all across Canada. I should like to recommend to the Minister of Transport that the mechanical safety aspect of snowmobiles be included in the bill, apart from the motor vehicle aspect. However, if my reading is correct, and I have no reason to think it is not, a great many accidents are occurring on snowmobiles. I read that in our far north the snowmobile is replacing the dogs and sled. An aeroplane, with two or three passengers, might go down, necessitating air search and rescue. Similarly, a snowmobile might be lost due to an ice break, or for various other reasons, and the same air search and rescue would have to be undertaken. I should like to suggest that a beeper, similar to the one which I suggested should be put into planes, be put on snowmobiles or, in other words, that it be mandatory that all snowmobiles be equipped with a beeper.

I see the minister is nodding. May I point out to him that the same expenditure is involved in search and rescue operations for a snowmobile as one undertaken for a plane. So, the point I am trying to make, however ineffectual it may be, is that it should be made mandatory that all planes in Canada or coming to Canada should be equipped with beepers, which cost only about $325 and which could save many lives. I also wish to point out that if they were used on snowmobiles just as many lives could be saved.

I will not abuse my privilege any further, but let me just say again that consideration should be given to equipping planes and snowmobiles with beepers, and that this legistion should be changed accordingly.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I apologize to the House for being late, but I was at a committee meeting elsewhere. However, I should like to have the attention of the minister with regard to a number of points which I should like to make in relation to the bill before us. I think everyone is concerned about making a concerted attack on the whole problem of the annual slaughter on the highways, not only the thousands who are killed on the highways but the scores of thousands who are injured and the millions of dollars of damage to property which results from automobile accidents. As the minister indicated, a section of the legislation deals with the drivers' habits. The provinces have a whole litany of offences dealing with the drivers' conduct. We, ourselves, have recently amended the Criminal Code dealing with the drinking driver. Whether or not this will have a great impact, I do not know. Then, of course, the provincial departments of transport and the departments of public works are concerned with the safety of the highways. Yet we know we are spending millions of dollars annually on rebuilding, on researching, and on the question of highway safety from the point of view of the road service. Now, there remains the last one, and that has to do with the vehicle itself.

• (4:40 p.m.)

I do not care how good a highway you may have, how good a vehicle you may have, how well a driver may have been trained, if he behaves like a damned fool at the wheel all the rest is gone for naught. There is no way in which legislation can deal with his thinking. Within limits, you can constrain him. He can drive only so fast. We have rules of the road, and laws governing such things as dangerous driving, negligence, and so forth. But there are many ways in which the mental attitude of the driver can escape any legislation.

Let us deal with Bill C-137, Mr. Speaker. I think everyone in the House wholeheartedly agrees with its objectives. These are simply an increase in the safe use of the motor vehicle, not exclusively due to the action of the driver but to the safe quality of the vehicle.

My colleague from Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Noble) spoke about his early interest in this matter. I would not want this debate to end without reminding the House, particularly many of the new members on the government side, of the efforts made by the former hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi, Mr. Heward Grafftey, who at times appeared to be a lone knight in this battle. The action now being taken by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) may in large measure result from Mr. Grafftey's insistent prodding on this question. I think we all owe him a great debt of gratitude.

The bill will not guarantee against latent defects showing up in any part of a vehicle. Anything can be designed to standard, can be manufactured to standard, but this is no guarantee against a latent defect appearing in it. Further, the administration of the bill's provisions will be somewhat difficult.

As a classic example, are we going to force automobile manufacturers to design a special model for Canada? We must remember that, according to the terms of the auto pact, decisions are made as to what types of car are manufactured in Canada. The minister must know that what I have in mind here concerns winter driving conditions.

Take the example of a car designed on the fastback principle, which gives quite a low angle to the rear window. In the prairies, where the snow is drier than it is in eastern Canada, there is not much tendency for it to accumulate on such a rear window. However, in Ottawa, Montreal, New York State, and in the interior of British Columbia where the snow is much more moist, the ordinary slipstream of air passing over such a rear window is not sufficient to remove that snow. I have had this experience driving that particular type of vehicle in Ottawa. How will the ministry police such a situation? Can it say to a manufacturer, "If that type of car is to be sold in particular regions, its design is no use"?

The other day the minister had some difficulty replying to questions about the term, "motor vehicle". He was asked what about a tractor. He replied that in certain cases a tractor might be covered by this bill, for instance if it were licensed to run on a road. But the trouble is that a manufacturer or distributor cannot determine, when he makes a sale, whether a tractor will be used primarily on the highway, or part-time on the highway, or all the time on a farm. I suggest it would be better to amend the bill to say that a motor vehicle means any vehicle except a tractor. The minister should definitely exclude tractors from the provisions of this legislation. The ultimate use of a tractor will be determined by its purchaser, and under the terms of this bill an inspector cannot go into a retail sales outlet and seize a vehicle.

Who will establish the standards to be specified by this legislation? On what basis will they be established? Who will do the research? Instead of setting up a government research bureau, I would prefer that we use an organization such as the Canadian Standards Association, an eminently suitable organization of national repute. Its seal of approval must appear on electrical and electronic apparatus, and on many other kinds of commodities. Why not require that its seal of approval be necessary for automobile components?

Mr. Jamieson: It deals with some of them.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I would prefer to see a body of this kind deal with the actual research and the actual testing of components.

Then, there is the question of the appeal. A difference of opinion may arise between the automobile manufacturer and the government's bureau or the standards association. Who will sit in judgment? There is no use in one side saying yes and the other saying no, with both sides standing firm on their proposals. If we stipulate that the government side will always prevail, what sort of exercise will we have? I do not think that the minister, the government, and the public want that sort of thing.

• (4:50 p.m.)

The section that deals with notice of defects imposes what I say is an absolute liability, an absolute responsibility on the manufacturer or distributor. He cannot claim any omission of notice because under the section it envisages the manufacturer or distributor failing to give notice. He may have done all that is reasonable but the Post Office may have failed to deliver the registered notice. After all, a bag of registered mail containing 50 passports was stolen once and we do not know what other registered mail was missing. Under the system of bulk billing registered mail in the Post Office, it is not possible to ascertain what mail was in a particular bag unless there was a complaint from someone expecting a letter.

Suppose the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) owned a car with a defect and the manufacturer was trying to get in touch with him, would he know that he must receive a notice? If he did not, how could he complain?

I say the section is far too sweeping and imposes an absolute liability. It is worded so that there would be no relief against the situation where notice did not reach the owner, despite all reasonable efforts of the manufacturer or the distributor. Failure to deliver notice constitutes an offence and the penalties imposed for this are extraordinarily high.

Mr. Winch: Not high enough.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) said "not high enough". They are exceptionally high and changes should be made.

Now, I come to the second last point I want to raise, Mr. Speaker, and that is the right of entry of inspectors. I cannot agree that an inspector on his own may enter the premises of a distributor or manufacturer as he is empowered to do under the act, without some authority. Last year there was some discussion brought forward by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) about the powers of inspectors under the act dealing with pesticides. This act gave far more sweeping powers than those accorded the local police or the Royal Canadian Mounted Police regarding search for narcotics. No RCMP officer can enter and search for narcotics unless he has a specific warrant and only a person designated by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) through the Exchequer Court to possess a warrant has this same power. What is more important, narcotics or vehicle inspection? I think the standards are unbalanced merely for administrative convenience. Administrative inspectors are given far greater power than inspectors under the Narcotics Act. When this bill comes back from committee, I hope to have a lot more to say about that.

The next thing, Mr. Speaker, is the right of seizure without warrant. There is no appeal under the act against this. Why is there forfeiture of the vehicle to the Crown? There is a provision for a fine and also penal servitude. Why seize the vehicle as well? Under the Excise Act a vehicle can be seized which is used by bootleggers, but in this particular instance why make it forfeit to the Crown?

Mr. Jamieson: Because it is unsafe.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The minister says "because it is unsafe", but what if the defect were to be corrected? Say for instance there was an unsafe tie rod, and a new safer tie rod were installed, what entitlement has the Crown to seize that vehicle?

This is a matter I have continuously objected to in the drafting of statutes. Why in heaven's name do we need a cross-reference to the Fisheries Act in this bill for the provision of steps to be taken under seizure and disposal and all that sort of thing? This is just bad drafting. Perhaps the minister and his colleagues should get together and bring out a new federal seizures act, but let us not keep going back to the Fisheries Act. One of these days, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) is going to amend his legislation unknown to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson). Then he and a lot of others will be left hanging on the coattails of the Minister of Fisheries. Far better to get busy on a new federal seizures act to standardize the procedure under the various acts and know what it is all about. As a lawyer, why I should have to tell a client that I must go to the Fisheries Act to find out how to deal with an automobile is beyond my comprehension.

I hope this bill gets a real going over and that we get some sensible answers to the questions posed on all sides of the House.

I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock the House will now proceed with Private Members' Notices of Motion, namely, public bills.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the House will bear with me for a second, I should like to outline the business to be raised at the time of adjournment: The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave)—Criminal Code—Proclamation of remainder of amendments respecting breathalyzer; the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis)—Housing—1970 construction target for homes for elderly and those on low incomes; the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte)—Post Office—Earnings following postal rates increase.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' NOTICES OF MOTIONS

POLLUTION

REQUEST FOR RESEARCH ON METHODS OF SOLID-WASTE DISPOSAL

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should initiate a national reaserch and development program in respect of methods of proper and economic solid-waste disposal, including studies directed to the conservation of natural resources by reducing the amount of waste and unsalvageable materials and by recovery and utilization of potential resources in solid wastes; and provide technical and financial assistance to provincial and municipal governments and multi-governmental agencies in the planning, development, and conduct of solid-waste disposal programs.

• (5:00 p.m.)

He said: Mr. Speaker, I note that although my motion was filed, if I may use that expression, since that time there has been a notice in the Citizen of January 30, about the intentions of the Province of Ontario. The headline of the article reads, "Ontario makes fresh beginning on industrial pollution controls". The body of the article reads in part:

All waste disposal sites and systems (including municipal dumps) will require provincial certificates of approval, and fines of up to $2,000 daily will be possible against violators who dispose of garbage at places and in ways not acceptable to the government.

Hamilton has a problem with regard to the disposal of solid waste emanating from the householder. I will not take up the time of the House in discussing this matter except to say that we have a secondary sewage disposal system utilized for the disposal of solid waste. I hope the federal government realizes that the people of Hamilton are concerned about this matter and are concerned because of the lack of commitment in this area by the federal government.

It can be said that as we enter the 1970's we are burying ourselves in our own waste with as little concern as we showed regarding the pollution of our waters and air. I believe it is time for us to place high on the list of priorities the question of solid-waste disposal. We must now become very concerned about smothering ourselves in the debris of our own making. I am not aware of any comprehensive statistics on the magnitude of solid-waste of all forms generated in Canada. Undoubtedly, there must be some statistics. Nevertheless, it seems to be that because of increased populations and the continuing trend towards urbanization that will be part of the pattern of the 1970's, the problem of waste, its disposal and related problems will become much more pressing than has been the case in the past.

The nature of solid-waste is variable and the problems relating to the disposal of solid-waste involve factors of geography, technology, government and public attitudes. Notwithstanding the variable of geographic location, it has been found that municipal solid-waste can be broken down statistically as follows:

Cardboard	7 per cent
Newspaper	14 per cent
Miscellaneous paper	25 per cent
Plastic, Film	2 per cent
Leather, Moulded Plastic and Rubber	2 per cent
Garbage	12 per cent
Grass and Dirt	10 per cent
Textiles	3 per cent
Wood	7 per cent
Glass, Ceramics and Stone	10 per cent
Metallics	8 per cent

Solid waste from industry is another source of such waste. It is of significant magnitude. Although industry is involved in the waste problem, it plays a significant role in conserving material, thus conserving raw materials, and in the recycling through the industrial process of salvaged material. For example, industrial scrap is useful in the recovery of tons of copper, lead, zinc and other metals.

The paper industry also generates annually millions of tons of waste from the production of articles utilizing paper. Waste is generated from our acceptance of items like paper packaging, paper containers, bottles and jars, plastic containers and caps, metal cans and other miscellaneous packaging materials. This indicates the magnitude of the problem in this area alone. It takes very little imagination for us to realize that society will not stop generating large quantities of this type of waste, all of which in the end has to be discarded. Waste material also results from mining industries and takes the form of waste rock, mill tailings, smelter slag and so on, all accumulated at mine sites. Other areas of concern, of course, are those to do with urban renewal and superhighway construction which is, to say the least, being greatly accelerated. The problem here is this: We must ask ourselves what we are to do with waste materials such as plastic, tile, metal, stones, dirt and masonry. For how long can such materials remain on site or continue to be buried?

The three divisions that must be considered when classifying waste products and their disposal problems are atmospheric, liquid and solid. Although it seems possible, it really is not practical to separate problems involving solid-waste disposal from those involving water and air pollution. For example, air pollution can be aggravated by the burning of solid wastes. Household grinding of garbage eliminates solid waste but increases liquid waste. Solid-waste disposal by means of land fill can produce problems relating to ground water supplies. Therefore, any over-all policy involving the disposal of solid wastes must be developed in association with any policy relating to liquid waste and atmospheric conditions. Accordingly, it is necessary for the federal government to adopt some unified standard. At present it seems to show no interest in this.

I think it would be very unwise for Parliament and the government to debate the Canada water bill in isolation from other factors I have mentioned because, as I said, pollution and solid-waste disposal are interrelated questions. The outpourings of households, municipalities and industry, business and agriculture in the form of waste and discarded materials bring about pollution.

The theme of my remarks is really a plea for better waste management policies and how we are to bring those into effect in order to benefit Canadians as a whole at present and in the future. We must become motivated to deal with this problem now. It matters little whether the ends of our actions are the improvement of health, the economic incentives resulting from salvaging of waste products, long range conservation programs or the removal of aesthetic insults in the form of ugly views and undesirable odours. Although we have been motivated in the past by considerations relating to health hazards, other considerations are steadfastly becoming more important.

We are mainly concerned about the following forms of waste: Organic sewage or waste which is principally carried by water contained in the units we use for the disposal of our wastes; trash and garbage, by which we mean primarily the material picked up from homes, businesses and other manufacturing establishments, and automobile hulks and demolition materials. Sewage disposal units cost millions of dollars in capital, and we should determine if they offer convenient means for the collecting and transporting of solid wastes that might be collected in the systems. Substantial grants are required in the area of sewage treatment because we must encourage chemists, biochemists, microbiologists and biologists to develop innovations in the technology of sewage treatment. I say this because it seems that professionals in this field have made scant contribution to this area.

The collection of trash and garbage is still, in many instances, carried out in a primitive way and I submit that we need to undertake studies which will examine systems of modernizing the collecting and disposal of such waste. A good many cities have no satisfactory refuse disposal system at the present time and it is not uncommon to see refuse dumped in our rivers and lakes. The complexities resulting from the disposal of waste material from various sources, the salvage aspects relating to waste material, aspects relating to water and air pollution and the logistics of transfer and disposal of wastes, create problems of great magnitude. Visual pollution by automobile hulks is becoming a matter of national concern, and immediate steps ought to be initiated to recycle scrap from old cars to our steel furnaces. In that way, we could clean up this aspect of pollution.

Programs of salvaging and reclaiming can play a very significant role in solid-waste disposal management. The re-use of scrap material can make up for any deficiency in our raw materials. Solid wastes can, therefore, be viewed, in certain instances, as resources. The recovery of these resources has been the motivation behind some salvage operations, particularly in the United States. It is vital therefore that further research be undertaken in order to determine the purposes for which such salvaged waste material can be used.

It will probably be argued, Mr. Speaker, that the problem of solid waste disposal lies in the field of urban affairs, and that the federal government has no jurisdiction for action here. It seems that the federal government is not even interested in this field. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that the problem is complex and calls for co-ordination and hard thinking without any jurisdictional nitpicking. As a result of recent United States studies the following has been said. I quote:

> The inescapable conclusion is that it is now clearly necessary to treat the whole urban, suburban and rural complex, instituting a modern community, as a single unit within which waste management problems must be resolved. Full regard must be given to the inter-relationships of all environmental factors, to the total insult of pollutants to man's physical and mental health and well being, to all sources of pollution and to all methods for control.

That statement gives, I suggest, a great deal of credibility to my notice of motion. Hon. members will now appreciate why I call for a national research and development program that will be instrumental in the co-ordinating of programs to do with research, experimenting, the collection of data and so on, as a result of which technical assistance in the form of grants will be made available for the study of this over-all problem.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Technology has solved the problem of getting material into the community. It must now concern itself with bringing forth solutions which will remove waste. The Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Andras) in charge of housing requested suggestions from the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) as to what he should do with the $200 million. I suggest this is an area in which he can place some fairly high priority and, perhaps in his wisdom, he would be prepared to give some credence to the motion which I have brought this afternoon.

In closing I wish to read from a report of the Environmental Pollution Panel of the Presidents Science Advisory Committee. I believe this matter was studied in 1966. It is still up-to-date. I think it is very important that we should be aware of what it stated in terms of final conclusions. I quote:

> The overall nature of the problem is such therefore that attention should be given to—
> (1) The improvement of organization and systemization of the waste material outflow portion of our consuming society.
>
> (2) The improvement of technology dealing with this outflow and with the separate steps of collecting, processing and disposing, and
> (3) The adoption of practices and policies that will close the loop between the materials consumption and the waste production parts of our society so that decisions relative to consumption will consider the waste product problem.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak very briefly in this debate. I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) for raising this subject in the form of a motion and also for outlining so well the problem we are faced with. I do not wish to go over all the figures that were in his speech and I hope other speakers following me will also refrain from doing so.

There is no doubt that the population of the world is increasing at a very rapid rate and that increases in urbanization and sophistication of life are also taking place at a very rapid rate. The problem of solid-waste disposal—the disposal of paper, plastics, bottles, cars, cans—has become perhaps one of the most serious problems facing the modern urban society.

The hon. member's motion is to the effect that more research should be done in this area. From what little I know of the problem, I agree with this. I think all hon. members would agree that federal provincial, or private funds should be allocated for research if it can be shown that research in this area is necessary. The problem of course is that if we devote money to research, this money is not available for use in dealing with the problem itself. Therefore, if research is not necessary and the skills and sophistication of existing technology is sufficient, perhaps the money should be devoted to actual production and operation of the techniques which research has already given us.

I have already stated I do not intend to speak at great length on this point. Perhaps other hon. members who speak on this motion of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) will discuss it at greater length. I wish to give an example of what I have in mind, which is the East Hamilton solid-waste reduction unit which I presume is close to my hon. friend's riding. This is a large plant costing approximately $6.3 million which is now being put into operation. I understand this plant will compound solid-wastes, produce steam, and that there will be a by-product of reclaimed minerals. According to my information, this is being done in Hamilton at perhaps no cost to the taxpayer once the capital costs are met. This is the type of project where more research is evidently not necessary but where more money is being devoted to actually dealing with the problem with the present level of technology. I am not an expert on this subject, but it appears to me that using our present technology, and without extra research, much more could be done along these lines.

I also wish to mention the program of Firestone Tire Company in dealing with old tires which now litter the countryside, waterways, roads and trash heaps. The company now has a process of reclaiming the chemical ingredients of these tires without the air pollution caused by burning them. Which has been the normal method of dealing with them up to now. This process now exists, and evidently more research is not necessary here. It is capable of being put into effect with present technology.

There is one important aspect which was not dealt with by the hon. member for Hamilton West, namely that we in Canada do not have a problem of the magnitude of other societies with respect to waste disposal. I myself lived for many years in Hong Kong, which is a small island less than 30 miles long and 5 miles at its widest point. One million people live on that island, as does a population of wild deer and other wild animals. I give this as an example of proper land use and an intelligent approach to urbanization which makes it possible for a relatively small area to have wildlife as well as a very substantial and heavy human population. In that city we have an efficient waste disposal plant. Forgive me for using "we". I realize I am speaking possessively, but a number of times I have been referred to as the member for Hong Kong. But to return to my subject, a by-product of this plant is building materials, such as building blocks. The costs of building and operating this plant are not met by the sale of building blocks. There is a certain deficit which has to be made up. Nevertheless, it has been possible to substantially meet the cost of solid-waste disposal by the sale of these by-products. This is the type of operation which Canadians should study.

I would also like to mention another area I know something about, namely Japan. This country has a problem infinitely greater than ours. In many urban areas of Japan the problem is even greater than some United States cities. I noticed in the January 3 edition of the Financial Post an article on the Tezuka disposal system of solid wastes. I will not go into all the complexities, but it is, according to the report, a new type of solid-waste disposal system. The research has evidently been done. The Tezuka Kosan Company is willing to sell these units for the disposal of solid wastes f.o.b. Yokohama. They have reached a stage where the research is completed and the units are now into production.

Canada, I suggest, can benefit a great deal by learning from the experience of other countries, such as the U.S., and especially Japan. I suggest if we embark on independent research, much of it would only duplicate research that has already been done elsewhere. If I may make one suggestion in this particular debate, it would be that a portion of the research moneys which have been talked of by the hon. member for Hamilton West should be used for translating foreign technical journals and perhaps even subscribing to these journals and making them widely available in Canada. By so doing, we will avoid a great deal of duplication and waste, not to mention delay in getting on with the job. With that suggestion, Mr. Speaker, I resume my seat.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, for the life of me I could not understand anyone in this House who approached this motion from a realistic point of view, irrespective of his party, opposing the motion or being a party to talking it out. Without doubt this is a motion which should be accepted in principle and agreed to, particularly when we realize the importance of the principle involved. It has been moved in a manner acceptable under the rules of this House, in that it calls for an expression of opinion by the House that the government should initiate a national research and development program to study suitable and economic methods of disposing of solid waste, and so on.

I must admit that upon occasions I am not quite certain as to the interpretation or definition of "solid waste", though I believe I understand the priority assigned to this question by the hon. member who introduced this motion. I also note that he mentioned the subject of sewage, and, of course, whenever there is solid waste in sewage, disposal problems arise. As one who comes from Vancouver, the third largest city in Canada, I have some interest in this question. On the southern boundary of Vancouver, there is the twin delta of the Fraser River whose course begins hundreds of miles to the north. This being so, Vancouver gets everything from the cities, municipalities and industrial establishments as it is discharged into the river as far back as Prince George. So, whether it is solid waste, semi-solid waste or just waste, it all ends in Vancouver where the Fraser hits the Strait of Juan de Fuca.

We in Vancouver and, I think, the citizens of Canada generally, take great pride in the beaches of Vancouver. Yet in the last few years we have been forced on occasions to completely close our beaches because of the effluent, the solid or semi-solid waste which is polluting the area. Vancouver has spent millions of dollars trying to correct the situation through its disposal plant at Iona, yet even today we do not possess too good a record in this regard. There is no question but that the pollution of our rivers, our streams, our oceans is serious enough to call for federal action.

I make these remarks because, in part, they were prompted by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) when he introduced his motion. Nevertheless, should anyone think that the motion refers strictly to solid waste, then in this case too I believe we should approve the motion of the hon. member for Hamilton West without too much debate. It should certainly not be talked out.

I was most interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson), particularly his references to what is being done in Tokyo and in Hong Kong. He told us from his own experience as a resident in those cities that they have moved to deal with this question of the disposal of solid waste. He suggested there was, in fact, no need to spend money on research on this subject since we could learn directly from what they were doing in Hong Kong and Japan. I would agree with that proposition—if we were doing anything about it, if we were learning and taking action on the basis of what he knows from his personal experience in those areas. Basically, there is no great difference between the solid material of Hong Kong, or of Japan and that of Canada. Metropolitan Vancouver now has a population of 900,000; Montreal has a population of well over two million; Toronto, about two million.

So, one does not have to think in terms of Hong Kong or of a city in Japan. We have cities here of comparable population experiencing comparable problems. It is time we moved to deal with them. There has been so much talk and writing about pollution in the last two or three years without anything being done about it that I believe I am not the only member of this House or the only citizen of Canada who is getting heartsick about the fact that all this talk and wishful thinking is accompanied by no action. This motion asks that we carry out certain research projects. If we can get the information from Japan or

Hong Kong, that is fine. But let us then take action. For Heaven's sake, Mr. Speaker, do I have to tell you or any other hon. member what it is like outside the City of Vancouver, or any other large city—to show you the debris of the cars, the tires and the cans? The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich says they are dealing with this in Tokyo and Hong Kong. Why, in the name of God, are we not moving in that direction here?

I live in what I maintain is one of the most beautiful cities in the world—Vancouver. Move up the valley, though, and see the acres upon acres of abandoned cars, the tires and the cans. I do not know too much about science but I do read scientific journals and if my reading of them is correct there are methods, developed in other countries, whereby scrap metals can be recovered, tires can be used for other purposes, and cans can be utilized. All I have to say is this: congratulations to Hong Kong and Japan on their progress as outlined by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich. Congratulations to those who have done research in getting rid of solid waste material.

Unless I am wrong, the point of the motion by the hon. member for Hamilton West is, let us accumulate that knowledge, and for God's sake let us do something about it: with federal initiative, let us co-ordinate this knowledge and work with the provinces and municipalities to remove not only the eyesores but the detriment to the health of the people in our cities and rural areas, because no action has been taken by this authority in respect of solid-waste disposal.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) on this motion. It is a very good one. I am sure it is the precursor of many efforts that will follow from many quarters to focus on a problem that is increasingly recognized as being of major importance.

The hon. member's motion has roughly two arms to it. One calls for research and asks the federal government to initiate research into solid-waste disposal to reduce its volume, and to look into methods of recovery and use of such materials that are beneficial. The second arm of the motion calls for technical and financial assistance to the provinces and to municipal governments—he even goes so far as to include multi-government agencies—for planning, developing and continuing programs.

The hon. member in moving his motion very properly recognizes that this is an urban problem. It is a problem of concentrations of population in relatively small areas. It is a problem of an increasingly affluent society. The beer cans and discarded, used automobiles that litter our highways and provide eyesores are the by-products of a society whose members have two cars in the garage, two television sets in the home and an increasingly high standard of living—a society that places high value on labour services yet neglects the elements of recovery that are essential if we are to reduce this problem to manageable proportions.

Every year in Canada some 400,000 automobiles are scrapped. A disturbingly small proportion of them are scrapped through the established channels through which full recovery of their materials is possible. Approximately 19 million to 20 million tons per year of solid wastes are, as estimated by one authority, being produced in our urban centres. Within the last ten years this amount has increased by 10 per cent in the country of our neighbour to the south, according to our best estimates, and will continue to increase. We are told that roughly 4½ pounds per day of municipal solid waste per person is produced. It is estimated by one authority that in 1980 this will go up to 5½ pounds per person.

In the United States, every person uses per year 250 metal cans, 135 bottles, 338 metal and plastic caps and 6 tubes, including four tubes of toothpaste. These are just a few indicators of the mountains of surplus materials that are being discharged from our increasingly urban communities. The mover of the motion said we are literally burying ourselves in our own wastes. This has been said many times. This is in fact an urban problem. Those of us who have served on municipal councils know how urban it is and how the nature of the problem has changed. A decade ago ashes were an important part of this problem. Now, thanks to the change to heating oils and natural gas, ashes are an almost negligible part of wastes.

We now have an increasing proportion of brush from suburbanites who have their own gardens and have to discharge their own materials because they are forbidden to burn it in their own backyards because it would pollute the air. We have increasing proportions of industrial wastes. We have in Canada, I am sure, the highest proportion of newsprint and cardboard waste per capita.

This is perhaps a doubtful feature of this magnificent resource of our country which has led to its rather reckless use.

Convenient containers, methods of packaging, and trends in public health which insist that everything be covered and nothing be left in such a way that it can be contaminated in the process of distribution, have contributed to the waste disposal problem. The problem has to be viewed in its entirety, and it has to be analyzed at various stages.

The definition of solid waste is fairly arbitrary as between liquid, solid and atmospheric waste. As the mover of the motion pointed out, the one embraces the other; measures to control atmospheric pollution where there are particles involved will often accentuate the solid disposal problem. Liquid and solid wastes are in many cases interchangeable. Let us consider the situation where the woman of the house has a garbage disposal unit which chops the garbage to shreds. It simply converts solid waste to a liquid form of waste, and there is a problem at a different point. The collection of waste, its processing and disposal must be attacked at every stage.

There is also a major secondary materials industry. It is estimated that something like $5 billion to $10 billion worth of waste could be recovered in the United States. The recovery of scrap copper could amount to 80 per cent of the new copper used in the United States. The recovery of lead from secondary materials and scrap is equal to twice the domestic lead production in the United States. The recovery of materials such as paper, rubber, plastic, textiles, even hair and feathers, and in some cases precious metals, has an economic base. A community that has sufficient incentive and interest in that base could build up an industry.

This affluent society of ours increasingly destroys the economic base of the secondary materials industry. How does it do so? It does so by its social attitudes. Anyone engaged in the business of recovering waste is associated with the junk collector. Collection and transfer points are zoned out of existence by municipal authorities. There is no positive encouragement to make such collection points comply with sanitary requirements. There are no research programs initiated to establish a means by which these places could be made acceptable to communities. The approach of our affluent society is just to zone them out of existence.

In our society we are very fortunate that the standard of living and wage rates are as high as they are, and I would not in any way want to change them. However the high cost of living defeats the secondary recovery process because the high cost of labour makes the cost of recovery prohibitive. We have frequently criticized local government because it is completely self-defeating as far as orderly waste recovery programs are concerned. Garbage collection in its rough sense, in broad population usage, tends to be fragmented over different municipalities. This is one of the services that is frequently left, in a two-tier system of municipal government, at the primary level and is not transferred to the regional level.

Regional authorities may have control of waste disposal sites because these are so few, and expensive. The fragmented nature of municipal government, each with its own zoning laws, each with its own by-laws governing the collection and disposal of waste, and each with its own system, makes this a very difficult matter. Municipalities may farm out the job to private contractors. They may have a municipal operation. The effect of such a state of affairs is to make almost impossible an orderly arrangement for the secondary materials industry, with sufficient inducement to engage in planning and investment in capital facilities, collection facilities and transfer points. This is almost entirely due to the fragmented nature of local government in our big city areas.

I served on a municipal council in this city. Every second year we had the problem of how to acquire a satisfactory land-fill site: that was the language used. I am sure hon. members of this House would be astonished to know how many parts of the city of Ottawa have been built up by the sanitary land-fill method. Within my own recollection some of the best parkways along the Rideau River have had five or six feet of sanitary land-fill dumped there. It has been dumped on both sides of the Rideau River parkway and on the Ottawa River parkway.

A major sand re-fill operation took place on the Ottawa River parkway in the Britannia area, in my own constituency. The problem, of course, is very simple: Sites become more difficult to find. Every year the cost of haulage to sites farther and farther removed from the point of origin of the solid waste becomes more prohibitive in an economic sense. More and more communities regard the temporary land-fill operation as a community nuisance that must be stopped at all costs.

The municipality, generally speaking, has two choices. It can incinerate and pollute the air, or it can engage in landfill operations, face the violent objection of residents of the area and run the serious risk of polluting the water and destroying the natural marshes and other features which are part of the environment for a considerable time to come. Last but not least, they must face the fact that the sites that are reasonably available within economic hauling distance are rapidly being exhausted.

The hon. member for Hamiltion West commented favourably, I gather, on the announcement by the government of Ontario that it intends to licence disposal sites and impose penalties on people who do not use proper disposal sites. I believe this is action on the negative side, the penalty side, and is not proper use of the jurisdiction the province has in this area. I do not wish to hide behind the jurisdictional problem. I am one who believes the federal government also should take a great deal of initiative. It is easy to do just what the province of Ontario has done. It is just one small part of the story, that is, placing a prohibition without giving any answers to dealing with the problem. I see the hon. member agrees with me.

Mr. Alexander: I think the hon. member is reading a little more into it than is indicated by my smile.

Mr. Francis: I should be very happy to hear the hon. member's view if he disagrees, because I know the type of problem the municipalities face. They have to face the fact that these sites are not available any more. What can be done? A prohibition can be placed on dumping. Then, where does the garbage and solid waste go? It does not vanish into thin air. It cannot be placed in a stream. Something has to be done.

I am in total agreement with the purpose behind the motion. I believe it is an eminently satisfactory motion, but I wonder if its mover would consider going a little further. This is not exclusively a problem of the federal government, as much as I would like the federal government to have authority over it. I think it is a serious enough matter that when we have a federal-provincial conference on urban problems, it should receive high priority on the agenda. There is no way in which one level of government can cope with this problem. Of all the problems in the whole area of urban affairs, this one has an extremely local content, a regional content and a national content. By the very nature of things I believe the development of a national program would have to be part of a co-operative endeavour at all levels of government.

I should like to say a word or two about the problem of automobiles. Like any other member of this House, when I take a drive on Sunday afternoon out into the country, especially in the winter when the leaves are not there to hide the view, I see the hulks of wrecked automobiles. There is no question that this is an unpleasant sight and that something must be done about it. The National Capital Commission spends in the order of $20,000 each year in hauling away abandoned automobiles from the green belt area. This is just one community and one area. When the owner of an automobile decides it is no longer worth driving, or decides he can no longer drive it, he hauls it out at night, takes off the licence plates, hopes he has succeeded in obliterating the identifying marks, and abandons it. This has become a great problem in areas such as Detroit and New York.

I have read of proposals whereby governments could deal with the problem of abandoned automobiles. I have spoken to people who know something about the automobile business. When I ask what can be done with an old automobile, I am told that first it is stripped. Certain parts of a salvageable nature are removed, such as the battery which has recoverable lead, the tires which have recoverable rubber, and other items. Then the automobile is taken somewhere and burned. By burning, it is reduced to metallic remains; then the burned hulk can be compressed and has an economic salvage value.

Part of the difficulty is what has happened in respect of the steel industry. The steel industry does not need a large volume of scrap material any more. There was a time in the steel industry, about 15 years ago, when scrap metal was a very important item, but because of recent developments the requirements for scrap has been reduced. This has had a most unfortunate effect on the removal of automobiles from our landscape.

The hon. member said that site control is needed. I quite agree. I wonder what other measures might be taken to cope with this problem. I understand the Japanese have developed a good method of recovering automobiles, but in a country like ours the recovery of automobiles is not a simple matter. There must be recovery points, and we have long distances to deal with and sparse population. We must recognize that a recovery method based on burning would involve pollution of the air. We must have some disposal method whereby we can reduce the extraneous materials which pollute the air.

I believe, also, we must have a method of subsidy in respect of bringing the material into a central point. The tragedy of a solid-waste disposal program is that it has such a precarious economic base because of the attitude toward it, the trends in our society, the cost factor and everything else. It seems to me we cannot reply upon a "do nothing" attitude to develop positive salvage and secondary material recovery industries. The industry will have to receive a good deal of assistance and research. It will have to receive a good deal of help by way of subsidy and help from local authorities who will have to adapt their zoning and regional planning requirements at certain central points to which waste should be attracted and where it can be recovered.

This program will call for a national code of waste removal which, in my opinion, can be developed only by co-operative action at the three levels of government in Canada. I look forward to the day in the near future when, at a conference called to discuss urban affairs, this problem will receive high priority and will lead to the kind of measures which were mentioned in the debate today.

Mr. R. J. Orange (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I join hon. members who have taken part in this most important discussion this afternoon in congratulating the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) for his responsible action and for his adeptness in arranging the motion to the top of the Order Paper so that it could be discussed today. I also congratulate him for the subject matter of the motion.

All of us in the society in which we live are becoming increasingly aware of the despoiling of our environment. I think we are all concerned that somehow or other governments, in concert with industry, universities and others, must work together to develop a better quality of life and environment for ourselves and for our heirs.

We who are from the north have also seen the pollution of our environment through thoughtlessness by individuals and companies and because of poor planning. In the small, northern gold mining community of Yellowknife back in the 1940s an underground water supply was developed from Great Slave Lake without regard to the effect of the arsenic run-off from the mines in the spring. Over the years medical officers expressed concern for the health of the inhabitants of the area because of the arsenic run-off which might have affected the water supply.

During the months of April, May and June, due to the arsenic run-off from the two gold mines in the area the supply of water had to be heavily chlorinated and there were warnings to all residents in the community to be careful in the use of snow and ice during this period of the year. As Yellowknife grew to become a larger city, and in view of the fact that it was to become the capital of the Northwest Territories, it was necessary to expand the water system in the community, as a result of which a pipeline was built which cost Yellowknife Bay a great deal of money. The distance covered by the pipeline is about 1¼ miles, and it reaches the Yellowknife River itself. It is from here that the water supply for the community is now available. It is interesting to note that in this particular instance the industry did its share by paying the extra cost of moving the water pipeline to this new area.

Further north, on Great Bear Lake, north of the Arctic Circle one can walk along the shore of the lake, which is 12,000 square miles, and find places where people have stopped and left behind empty beer bottles, empty pork and bean cans, Spam tins and other pieces of garbage. This shows a poor sense of responsibility in keeping the environment clean.

In speaking about this problem the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) made a very pertinent comment, namely, that it is not the exclusive responsibility of the federal government. He said he is looking forward to the meeting of all levels of government so that a concerted attack can be made on the disposal of solid wastes. However, it might be useful to put on the record some of the action the federal government is taking at present.

The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has undertaken investigations in connection with solid wastes occurring in streams in New Brunswick as a result of base-metal mining activities. The inland waters branch provides facilities to collect water samples from a network of sites and to analyze them for dissolved and suspended materials. The materials that are lost from the tailings pond system are then studied, and the transportation and fate of these substances in the receiving stream are analysed. This is an experimental program which could be expanded if we learned more about the handling of solid wastes from base-metal mining activities.

There is in the Department of National Health and Welfare an advisory committee in public health engineering, under the chairmanship of Professor P. Jones of the University of Toronto, which is in the process of preparing a report on solid-waste disposal problems in Canada. This report, hopefully, will be available within the next few months. It is to be submitted to the Science Council through this advisory committee. It will attempt to identify the urgency of the problem, with probable emphasis on waste disposal in large urban centres and solid-waste disposal associated with feed lots wherein large herds of animals are concentrated in small areas.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has one program of the value of almost $1 million which has been continued for over three years to develop apparatus for the disposal of wastes within apartment complexes. The apparatus will provide a method for treating all wastes within the complex itself and will handle the solid wastes involved.

The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has a program for the advancement of industrial technology. One project, which is valued at $57,000, is in progress to develop a solid-waste compacting machine to replace incineration in large dwelling complexes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration for private members business having expired, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY

NATIONAL MARKS AND STANDARDS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Jamieson that Bill C-137, respecting the use of national safety marks in relation to motor vehicles and to provide for safety standards for certain motor vehicles imported into or exported from Canada or sent or conveyed from one province to another, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.
