I therefore beg to move that this be added as the sixth section of the Bill. I may mention as, no doubt, the House is well aware, that in Ontario this is the law, so far as civil cases are concerned. Now, I am well aware, from expressions which have been made use of in this House on former occasions, that there are many hon. gentlemen who are opposed to the principle of my amendment. But it appears to me that when they come to consider the whole facts they will find that these objections are not well founded. As I heard the hon. gentleman from Quebec say to-night, the great object of all evidence is to get at the real truth of the matter. Now, it is a fact that if a person who is produced as a witness has scruples against taking an oath, he may object to be sworn and, more than that, supposing he does not object to being sworn himself, his evidence may be objected to. Now, it appears to me that if a person tells what he knows, on a solemn affirmation, that is as binding on his conscience as if he swore on the Gospels, I think the experience of all judges, at all events, is, and it is the opinion of the great majority of the judges in Ontario, that this is a very desirable amendment of the law. I hope this House will see the desirability of accepting the amendment I have proposed.

Mr. BLAKE. I am sorry my hon. friend should have proposed this amendment to this particular Bill. It is a repetition by which this Bill itself, I think, and the proposal of the hon. gentleman, both suffered shipwreck in a former Session. Measures upon three different matters in connection with the criminal law were referred to the same select committee, and that committee, in its wisdom, combined the three different propositions in one Bill, and the result was that when the Bill got back into the House the opponents of each of these different propositions combined in their opposition to the whole measure, and the measure went down under the stress of that combined opposition. I think it would be very much better that the proposition of the hon. gentleman, which is a very important one, and one to which I am quite prepared to give my assent and vote, as I did before, should come up on its merits, disembarassed by the opposition that may obtain to my hon. friend's Bill, and that my hon. friend's Bill should not be embarrassed by the opposition which may obtain to the hon. gentleman's proposal. If, however, the hon. gentleman persists in moving it, I would suggest that, having stated his intentions, it would be better to move on the report, when the votes can be recorded, than to propose the introduction of the clause in the committee, when he cannot obtain in a formal manner the sense of the House.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). The reason I proposed this now is that it appeared to me that it was not in the same position that it was in on the occasion the hon. member for West Durham refers to, because there were several subjects introduced in that Bill, one of which was not a matter of evidence. For instance, there was in the other Bill an amendment proposed to the criminal law, which is now before the House, with reference to ice holes.

Mr. BLAKE. Oh! There is where the Bill went down.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). That is exactly where it went through. Now, this Bill is entitled: "An Act to further amend the law of Evidence in Criminal Cases," and that would be the title of the Bill if I introduced my amendment in the shape of a Bill. However, I am always ready to receive a suggestion from my hon. friend opposite, upon a matter of practice, although I cannot always receive his suggestions on political matters, and as some of my hon. friends behind me seem to think his suggestion is a good one, I will withdraw the amendment.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. McCARTHY. I desire to move a short amendment, of which I have given notice, and which I think the House will accept without objection. It is to enable a wife to give evidence against her husband in those cases in which, according to the law as it stood in the Statute Book in 1869, the husband is answerable for not supporting his wife. It has been decided in the Court of Queen's Bench of Ontario that the wife, who is the only person that can know about the matter, is not a competent witness, although she is a competent witness in cases where her person or liberty are concerned. I move to add the following clause:—

In any prosecutions against a husband for not providing for his wife necessary food, clothing or lodging, wilfully and without lawful excuse, or for refusing or neglecting to provide the same, his wife shall be a competent witness, as if the prosecution was for an offence affecting her liberty or person.

I think that this is a very reasonable amendment, and I do not think there will be any objection to it.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). We recognise the principle in the Bill, that a wife shall not be a competent witness, except in certain cases. If the wife should be competent to give evidence against her husband in a case of this kind, why not in every case?

Mr. McCARTHY. The wife is competent now, and my amendment is only an extension of the law.

Mr. WELDON. I would suggest that the amendment of the hon. gentleman should be made a proviso in section 2.

Mr. McCARTHY. If there is any difficulty about the wording of the clause, I will move it on the report.

Amendment agreed to.

Committee rose and reported Bill with amendments.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved that the said amendments be now concurred in.

Mr. AMYOT moved:

That the said amendments be not adopted, but that the said Bill be referred back to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions to amend the same, so as to take away the right of husband and wife to be used as witnesses, the one for or against the other.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). There is no clause providing that the wife can be a witness against her husband; she can be a witness, but not against him.

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. AMYOT. When a witness is brought into a box you cannot tell beforehand what he is going to say. It often happens that a witness who is brought to help the prisoner turns out to be the strongest witness against him. There is great danger that a wife who comes into the box to help her husband may become the cause of his conviction, and there is great danger that by the interference of the wife or husband in the evidence you will create trouble in families and weaken the tie that exists between husband and wife. The permission given to a wife or husband to be a witness against the other is immoral; it is against the law that makes man and wife but one, and I hope the House will not permit such evidence to be admitted.

The House divided on amendment (Mr. Amyot) to recommend.

INCOMPLETE RETURNS.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I have been accused of putting a report before this House knowing that it was incomplete. If the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk) had taken the trouble to read the first page of the report, he would have seen that it is a complete return, as the return furnished is the only return that has been made of the Canada Temperance Act from the Province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. BLAKE. As I repeated the hon. member for Guysboro's question, I know that his statement was that the hon. gentleman had not brought down a complete return, but he did not say that he had brought down an incomplete return knowingly.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I did not mean it as maliciously; that would be like the verdict rendered lately in Montreal.

Mr. KIRK. The Order of the House was for a return for the year 1884. This return is for the year 1881; therefore, it did not follow the Order at all, and there was no necessity to bring it down. The Secretary of State says that is all that is in the office. Well, the law requires that an annual return be made, and it is the duty of the Minister to see that these returns are sent to the Department.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Nemo dat non quem habet. There is none and can be none in my Department. The Department of Inland Revenue has given us the only report made.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Return showing the number of free passes or reduced fare tickets granted to parties to travel on or over the Intercolonial Railway, from the 1st of January, 1884, to the 1st of February, 1885; the names of the parties to whom granted; the date of issue; the length of time to remain in force, and in case of a reduced fare, the reduction made.—(Mr. McMullen.)

Return showing amount of money paid for injuries to parties in the Mounted Police since 1878; specifying the names of the parties injured, the nature of the injuries, the amount of money paid, and to whom paid.—(Mr. Somerville, Brant.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 12th March, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRIVATE BILLS—EXTENSION OF TIME.

Mr. ABBOTT moved :

That as the time for the reception of reports from the Committee on Private Bills expires to-day, the same be extended to Thursday, 2nd April next, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

AMERICAN GOLD.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, Whether the attention of Government had been called to the fact that by substituting American gold for sovereigns in the gold held by them a material reduction in the average rate of exchange upon New York may be secured to the great advantage of the community at large? And whether it is the intention of the Government to arrange for holding sufficient quantities of American gold to secure this object henceforward?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We hold our reserve both in English sovereigns and in American gold, and it is optional with the Department to pay it out with one or with the other.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. BLAKE asked, How soon the measure on the subject of Chinese immigration, which the Secretary of State declared in Victoria would be proposed this Session, will be introduced?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I do not know that any measure was promised on the subject, but I suppose the Government will take the matter in hand when they are ready to put it before the House.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—CONTRACTORS' CLAIMS.

Mr. WELDON asked, Have any claims been preferred by the contractors, or any of them, of section sixteen (16) of the Intercolonial Railway? Have the same been adjudicated upon by the Railway Commission? If so, has any award been made thereon; and has any money been paid to J. B. Gough, or any other person, on account thereof?

Mr. POPE. No claims have been presented to Department, and consequently no action has been taken on them and no money paid.

CANADA AND JAMAICA.

Mr. BURPEE moved for:

Copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Island of Jamaica concerning the confederation of the same with Canada, or with Mr. Solomon or any other party on behalf of Jamaica, upon the subject. Also all correspondence with the Government of Great Britain upon the same subject.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I may inform the hon. gentleman, there is no correspondence.

Motion withdrawn.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed adjourned debate on motion of Sir Leonard Tilley, for the House to go again into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. McLELAN. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to trouble the House at any great length on this occasion, and I hope I shall not do so. But there seems to be a great desire on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to discuss the National Policy, and to emphasise and repeat for the hundredth time their admiration for a policy of free trade, and their belief that every man ought to be free, as the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) expressed it at Toronto, to purchase whatever he requires in whatever market he chooses. It seems no matter to those hon. gentlemen whether the mechanic, who makes the articles that we require for use, shall reside in our own country or in a foreign. We, on this side of the House, entertain different views from those. We have no desire to shorten discussion on this question; we desire that it shall be discussed in the fullest manner possible as far as it can be done consistently with the despatch of public business. All we object to is the tone and manner in which hon. gentlemen opposite have for five years discussed this question. When the tariff and the policy of the Government were first laid upon the Table, we remember how bitterly that policy and that tariff were assailed. We remember well that the manufacturers under that policy were styled public robbers, and we were told it was the intention of this Government to legalise the robbery of the people by the manufacturers. The hon. gentleman, the ex-Finance Minister, lavished all his wealth of bitter invective upon the manufacturers of this country, denouncing them and the purpose they had in view. He has to some extent since then moderated his tone, and we do not hear so much of robbery by the manufacturers now. But, Mr. Speaker, they have assumed a tone of sadness and depression; the hon. gentlemen who sit opposite seem to be acting in a spirit of rivalry as to who shall present the condition of this country in the most sad and doleful colors possible. There seems to be a rivalry among them; certainly not a holy rivalry, but more in the spirit of that which may be supposed to exist amongst undertakers as to who shall do their work in the most solemn and grief-stricken manner. They appear to have been studying the philosophy of sorrow and to have been acting with some slight amendment in the words of Thomson's "Philosophy of Sorrow":

"For party sake let us gather around
And invent sad and doleful stories about everything,
To see who among us shall do the worst
In tangling the skein of circumstances,
And in weaving a web of dreariest argument,
To make us comfortably miserable."

So, Mr. Speaker, they seem to be exerting themselves to be comfortably miserable. Whenever they can point to a bankruptcy, whenever they can point to an industry that is broken down, to a workshop whose fires have gone out, and whose workmen are idle, they seem to be comfortably miserable and happy in publishing those facts abroad to the world. Sometimes they get miserably jolly—we had an instance of that the other night, when the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) presented to the House a picture of a city laid in ashes. He brought up to our minds the destruction of the City of St. John and the calamities connected with it. We had pictured before us all those thousands of men who had for years previously been providing homes for themselves, and families—all suddenly swept away, and nothing but blackened walls and smouldering ashes left to mark the spot where once their homes had stood. And while he was dwelling upon that picture the hon. gentleman's wit sparkled and shone as a fire, his oratory flamed up, and the hon. gentlemen beside him and behind him grew uproarious in their mirth, with this picture of desolation before us. Mr. Speaker, there are some things which come down to us in history that are hard to believe, but when the hon. gentleman and his friends grew so joyous and uproarious, in view of that picture, I felt, Sir, that the incident which the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) alluded to the other night was possible, and that it was even probable, that Nero fiddled while Rome was burning. But, Mr. Speaker, they must choose their own course, and we do not so greatly complain of the effects their speeches may have in this country; our only concern is as to the effects upon this country which their speeches and utterances may have abroad. But to refer for a few moments to the utterances of the hon. member for North Norfolk. The hon. gentleman summarised his indictment against the Government by declaring that we met Parliament with a large debt, with heavy expenses, with over production, the North-West blighted, the tide of immigration reduced to a dribble, and the North-West people told that they shall not use their own moneys to build their own railways. For a moment let us refer to this indictment. He says we have met Parliament with a large debt. It is true that our debt is respectably large. It is true too that, as has been shown by the hon. the Minister of Finance, it is by no means so large as the debts of many other colonies which have less resources and less abilities to meet those debts than the Dominion of Canada. But, so far at least as this Government is concerned, both during the time it has occupied the Government benches since 1878 and in the period up to 1873, no part of that public debt was created to meet the ordinary expenses of Government. We cannot say so much of the hon. gentlemen opposite, for a considerable portion, not a very large percentage, but a very large sum at least, was added to that debt by the hon. gentlemen opposite to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government of the country which could not be met out of the current revenue. On the contrary, the present Government can turn to this fact that, but for the surpluses which they have had previous to 1873 and since, the public debt of the country, with the works that have been constructed, would have been very much larger by some $30,000,000 than it is at present. It was expected in the confederation of these Provinces that we should incur considerable debt. It was anticipated, in forming this Confederation, that in order to its success and to the prosperity, and to the stability of the Dominion, there should be large public works undertaken on capital account and carried to completion. It was specially provided that the Intercolonial Railway should be constructed in order to afford means of communication between the Lower Provinces and the Upper. It was provided that the canals should be enlarged and deepened; and subsequently, when the North-West was acquired and British Columbia was added to the other Provinces and made part of the Dominion of Canada, it was admitted by both parties that there should be a very large capital expended in the construction and completion of a highway from ocean to ocean. What would this Confederation have been worth if there had been no means of communication from one Province to the other? What would it have been worth if we in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick had, every year, or whenever we wished to visit Ottawa or any portion of the Upper Province, to take passage to Maine or to Boston—in the winter season especially—or to New York, and then travel through American territory in order to reach the capital of the Dominion? I say it would hardly have been worth the paper on which the British North America Act was printed had there not been means of communication provided from one Province to the other. The hon. gentleman from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) made a comparison of the debt of the United States with the debt per head of the Dominion of Canada. I shall not deal specially with that branch of the subject, because I understand that a gentleman near me will take it up and go into it at large, but I may refer to the remark of the hon. gentleman and the reason he gave for the debt of the United States. He told us that twenty years ago there was an enormous debt rolled up in the United States to preserve the nation, to preserve the life of the nation. Why, we have incurred a debt to create a nation, we have rolled up this debt in order to create a nationality, to consolidate and bind together a Dominion which at some time shall be regarded as one of the proudest nations of the world. The hon. gentleman has said that in the United States that debt was created to preserve the national life. Ours has been caused in order to create a national life. I have said that the Confederation Act would not be worth the paper upon which it is written if there were no intercourse between the various Provinces from the east to the west. Sentiment is all very well, but you must bind the people together, you must create a self-interest, and, without the means of communication, there is no way in which the people of one Province can trade with the people of another and create an interest which will bind them together stronger than any paper Act of Confederation. The hon. gentleman from West Durham (Mr. Blake) went down to Nova Scotia and told us that the proper market for us was in the United States. If we had all followed his advice, if the Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island had all their intercourse with the people of the United States, and none with the people of western Canada, and the people of western Canada had none with the people of the east, there would be wanting that strong commercial bond which binds people, and sometimes is stronger and more effective than any other that can be formed. The Intercolonial Railway was built and trade has been had between the eastern Provinces and the middle Provinces here, and, since that trade has been opened, and year by year is growing and enlarging, the feeling of sympathy between the eastern and the middle Provinces grows with it, and year by year becomes stronger and more binding; and soon, from a large portion of this expenditure which has been incurred, this debt with which we are charged, we shall have communication with the extreme west, we shall have the great Pacific Railway opened up, and communication from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and that communication will give the people of the extreme west and the extreme east an intercourse and a trade and a traffic which will grow up and strengthen and bind them together from the east to the west. Without incurring this debt and this expenditure, that communication could not have been made. We anticipated it years ago; both parties were prepared for it. It is true that the debt in 1885 is larger than we anticipated. We expected that in 1891 the whole expenditure necessary to complete the Canadian Pacific Railway would be laid upon our backs as a portion of the public debt, but it has been found possible, and good reasons have been given, that it is in the public interest to complete the Canadian Pacific Railway at an earlier date, and it was decided in the interests of the public at large to make that expenditure in order to effect that completion, six years earlier than was originally contemplated, in 1891. But, Sir, if that debt is now larger than it was anticipated, if it has reached the sum we expected it to be in 1891, we believe that the results of the opening of that railway, the benefits of having communication between the extreme west and the east, will compensate for the outlay, and enable us fully to bear any burthen that may be imposed on us. The hon. gentleman said that the United States has rolled up an enormous debt in the war which was concluded in 1865; and he told us how that country had reduced their indebtedness and were year by year paying it off. And he says to the House that while we are increasing our indebtedness that fact is a matter for grave thought. Why, Mr. Speaker, I do look at that circumstance, and instead of its being matter for grave thought, I say it is matter for happy thought, that the United States have been able to reduce their large indebtedness by so many millions, in the twenty years which have followed the war. Why, Sir, what have they for that debt? What caused that debt? The hon. gentleman says it was to preserve the national life and all that was left of it was hundreds and thousands of men slain and an immense amount of property destroyed. Sir, all that was left to the United States for that great expenditure were the graves that covered the slain, and the tombstones that were erected to their memory—works that will never yield any return until the last trump is sounded and the graves give up their dead. How different it is with our expenditure and that for which our indebtedness has been created—not for any dead works, but for works that tend to the development and prosperity of this country, and that will, year by year, as the years roll on and as the country becomes more developed, show that they have been good investments and will be no burden to this great and prosperous country. If the United States, with their great diversity of soil and climate, if they, under their protective policy, were able, in twenty years, so largely to reduce their indebtedness, having no works that are productive caused by that special indebtedness, how much more hope have we that in our great Dominion, with its great diversity of soil and the inexhaustible resources we have in our mines, our fisheries and in agriculture, and our protective policy—how much greater hope have we that our debt shall be reduced in due time—in comparatively less time, and the burthen be entirely wiped out. But, Sir, if it were not wiped out I maintain that it is a necessary expenditure, and although these public works, as the hon. member for Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) said, were not wholly productive directly, yet indirectly they are of the greatest of benefit. They were necessary to our national existence, they are necessary to our national life, and they will form the greatest bond that will keep together this great Dominion from the east to the west. When this great highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific is opened, and when trade from the extreme east shall be had with the extreme west, and when it shall be borne over that railway, then we shall feel that we are one people indeed, and that we have one common interest. If I may be allowed to borrow an illustration, I would say that the trains which shall pass to and fro from the west to the east and from the east to the west, bearing the products of one Province to the others, shall be as the shuttle in the loom, weaving a web of common interest that shall bind these Provinces together in one great brotherhood. The hon. gentleman said that the expenses are heavy. Well, Sir, they are large, but the Finance Minister has shown that they are not heavy, that they do not bear unduly upon the people. The hon. gentleman says that the Finance Minister had to shin around the streets in order to get money to meet his expenses. Sir, if the hon. gentleman had to secure money it was only for temporary purposes and to meet the obligations incurred in the construction of these great public works. Hon. gentlemen opposite, during the five years they were in power, had to shin round and borrow money in order to meet the current expenses of the country to the extent of seven or eight millions of dollars. I need not dwell further upon that point of the hon. gentleman's indictment. The hon. the Finance Minister, has given the figures to show how the expenditure, which the hon. gentleman calls heavy, has been met, and how lightly it bears upon the people of this country. The hon. gentleman says there is a plethora of production, and he regrets that there are so many manufacturers in this country. I think the hon. gentleman has himself to blame for that, to a large extent. We remember that three or four years ago, after the National Policy was introduced, hon. gentlemen on that side rose and announced to the world that, in the manufacture of cotton, in the refining of sugars, and in various other industries, the manufacturers were reaping enormous profits of twenty, forty or fifty per cent., and in some cases more. With such statements made to the country, is it any wonder that an undue stimulus was given to manufactures, and that a larger number of people went into the manufacture of cotton than, perhaps, the wants of the country just at that time called for? I repeat, hon. gentlemen have themselves to blame largely—if there be a plethora of production, if there be too many manufactures—for having increased the number of people engaged in them. Hon. gentlemen opposite would not have it said that no man in the Dominion believed them—that upon this great public question their word was not to be taken; Their word was taken in many cases; and it had its influence in bringing more manufactories into existence in these particular branches than were for the time desirable. But the Customs returns show that in those articles, the manufacture of which the National Policy is specially designed to encourage—cotton goods, and iron and steel manufactures—the importations have diminished. Take the six months from 1st of July, 1884, and compare them with the corresponding six months of 1883, and you find that there is a considerable decrease in the importation of these articles. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) tried to alarm us by the announcement that we have a shrinking revenue. The falling off in the revenue during the past six months has been occasioned by the diminution in the importation of cotton goods and of iron and steel manufactures; and why, Sir? Because the men who distribute these goods, the merchants throughout the country, find that they can be purchased on better terms at home than they can be imported. During the last six months there has been a decrease of $805,153 in the revenue. There has been a decrease in the revenue from cotton goods of $347,109, and from iron and steel manufactures, which are specially protected and encouraged by the National Policy, $420,738, making together $767,847; and in the revenue from spirits and wines, which are no doubt affected by the adoption of the Scott Act in the various counties, there has been a decrease of $78,418; making a total decrease in the revenue from these three classes of articles of $846,265, or $41,112 more than the entire decrease in the whole Customs revenue for the six months. So that hon. gentlemen will see that instead of there being a general decline all through the importations, the decline has only been in such articles as we are specially fitted to manufacture, and which are specially encouraged by the National Policy. But the hon. gentleman says that the North-West has been blighted and the tide of immigration has been reduced to driblets. Why, Sir, if there be any blight or any diminution in the tide of immigration, who is responsible for it but the hon. gentlemen who occupy the Opposition benches. The hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) smiles, but I want to ask those hon. gentlemen what they did during the five years that the North-West was under their control, to increase the tide of immigration. I want to ask them if they had not control of the North-West for five long dreary years, and what they did to induce immigration to that country. The hon. member for South Huron said in Montreal that if it had not been for the mismanagement of these people, we should have 500,000 or 600,000 people in the North-West, and 20,000,000 bushels of grain would have been exported from the country this year. Why, after spending $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 in that country, hon. gentlemen opposite went out of power acknowledging that there were only 30,000 people in the North-West; and yet they get up now and tell us that but for mismanagement there would be a population there of 500,000 or 600,000. Under their policy what inducement was there for people to go into the North-West? What facilities did they provide for going into the country?

Mr. LANDERKIN. Railroads.

Mr. McLELAN. Railroads where?

Mr. LANDERKIN. From Emerson to Winnipeg.

Mr. McLELAN. You had not a single mile.

Mr. MACKENZIE. We had 50 miles.

Mr. McLELAN. There was not a single rail laid.

Mr. MACKENZIE. It was all laid.

Mr. McLELAN. It was graded for three or four years, and you had piles of rails rusting in the North-West, but not a single rail laid.

An hon. MEMBER. It was in operation.

Mr. McLELAN. I am informed by the Department of Railways that there was not a rail laid when hon. gentlemen opposite went out of power, and during the autumn following every rail was laid and the cars were running into Winnipeg, providing for the first time railway connection with the rest of the Continent of America. Hon. gentlemen have boasted time and again that they built the railway. They started a railway at Selkirk to run 114 miles into the woods, and another from Port Arthur into the woods 114 miles, and then they went away 100 miles south of that and spent a quarter of a million dollars in constructing the Fort Frances locks. And yet they contend that with such a system they could have brought out from the North-West 20,000,000 bushels of grain. It would have been impossible, if they had completed the Fort Frances locks, and all the other means of communication they were arranging to have, to have brought out this year's surplus crop of the North-West in less than three or four years. But the hon. gentleman says the people of the North-West have been told that they shall not use their money to construct their own railways. Why, Sir, they forget the action they took. They forget that they either passed or submitted to Parliament a Bill, one of the provisions of which was that no railway should be constructed in the North-West nearer to the Pacific Railway than 40 miles.

Mr. MILLS. Parallel with it.

Mr. McLELAN. That you are not to tap the main line nor to construct any railway nearer to it than 40 miles.

Mr. MILLS. There is no such provision.

Mr. McLELAN. And so it hardly lies in the mouth of hon. gentlemen opposite to charge us with having prevented the construction of railways in the North-West, or with having prevented the people of the North-West from using their own money in the construction of railways. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says that under the National Policy we have not benefitted the farmer, yet in almost the same breath he says there has not been a day since the National Policy was adopted by Parliament when agricultural produce has not been quoted higher in the United States than it has been in the Dominion of Canada, and he also claims that it is the markets abroad that regulate the prices of agricultural produce. Well, if it be the markets abroad that regulate the price of agricultural products on this continent, the United States export largely their produce and we largely export ours. Why therefore should the markets abroad keep the prices at higher rates in the United States than in the Dominion? And why does the hon. gentleman desire so much that there should be reciprocity in agricultural products between the United States and Canada? If the hon. gentleman will go back to the celebrated speech that he delivered some years ago, he will find from his own utterances that the farmers are benefitted by a protective policy. He knows that it is a very small percentage of the agricultural products of the United States and the Dominion which is exported. He knows that nine-tenths of the products of the farm are consumed in the country, and that if we have a large population, not producers of agricultural products, if we have a large body of manufacturing people who are the consumers of agricultural products, we enhance the value of those products to a very appreciable extent; and that is the reason, if the hon. gentleman's statements be true, why agricultural products are quoted higher in the United States than in the Dominion—the reason being that in the United States there is a larger manufacturing population, a very much larger population of consumers for whom the farmers must cater, than proportionately exists in the Dominion. Then the hon. gentleman says we are doing nothing to get reciprocity. As I have said before, why does he desire reciprocity so much, if our markets are only affected by the foreign markets? The hon. gentleman went farther than he should have gone, in stating to the House that we are pledged not to accept a fair treaty. Why, we have for years announced our readiness to accept a reciprocity treaty negotiated on fair terms with the United States. But the hon. gentleman says we must give up something, and first of all he wants us to go back to a free trade tariff; he wants to have free flour, free grain, free coal, everything free, and then, he says, we will be in a position to negotiate a treaty by giving up something in return to the United States. There is but one desire in the Government and in Parliament, and that is, to have a fair commercial treaty with the United States, a treaty on fair and equal terms, in which the rights of the people of Canada will be maintained, and the people of the United States not have everything their own way. We desire to live. The hon. gentleman smiles. Well, we have had treaties with the United States, we have had general reciprocity with them, we have had treaties in connection with our fisheries, and we found that even these treaties required to be closely watched. We found that when our fish were allowed into the United States free, the packages or cans of the lobsters were taxed. Our desire is that there should be no misunderstandings, but that we should have a broad treaty negotiated, based upon equal rights. Our desire is to live in commercial concord and amity with the great people that dwell opposite to us; that the beaver and the eagle may dwell together in commercial concord and amity; that if the lion and the lamb should lie down together, that the little child shall be able to place his hand upon an untaxed lobster can. But the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) would have us first give up everything; he would have us first make free trade, and then he would have us negotiate a reciprocity treaty, and give up something more. What more could we give up? No, the true policy is to go on as we are doing, and when the time comes, when the people of the United States will be in the humor, we will meet them face to face, discuss the whole question with them, and negotiate a treaty on fair and equitable terms to the people of Canada as well as to the people of the United States.

Mr. McLELAN.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to correct his statement?

Mr. McLELAN. Well, he can do so after I get through, as I want to finish before recess.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I have merely to say that every rail was laid before 1st July, 1878, and the road was finished to Selkirk, 23 miles beyond Winnipeg.

Mr. McLELAN. That is from Selkirk to Winnipeg.

Mr. MACKENZIE. That was completed, and from the boundary to Winnipeg every rail was laid. Here is the report.

Mr. McLELAN. I went specially to the Railway Department to enquire and was informed that every rail was laid from Selkirk to Winnipeg, but between Winnipeg and Emerson not a rail was laid.

Mr. MACKENZIE. That shows how well informed the present railway management must be.

Mr. McLELAN. If I am wrongly informed, the fault is with the Department and there is an oversight on their part.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The Minister ought to know.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman will not claim that the railway was opened?

Mr. MACKENZIE. I will.

Mr. McLELAN. And running?

Mr. MACKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. McLELAN. Why, it was not opened and running until the winter, if my memory serves me at all. However, it is better that we should not enter into a discussion now, before we have the papers from the Railway Department.

Mr. MACKENZIE. This is from the Railway Department.

Mr. McLELAN. It is not of very serious importance. The hon. gentleman had not opened it for traffic, he had not commenced the running of trains—I am satisfied on that at least—and there was no communication or traffic when the Government went out of power.

Mr. MACKENZIE. You said there was not a railway.

Mr. McLELAN. That is what I was informed. There was no traffic at all events.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Yes, there was traffic.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) made the announcement to the world that we are growing poorer every day, and that people are leaving the Dominion. What an announcement to make in Parliament, and to make to the world, that this Dominion of Canada every day is growing poorer and poorer, and that the population is rushing out of it as fast as it possibly can! If the hon. gentleman believed that himself, if he believed that this country is going to rack and ruin, and that the people are leaving it, why does he not go out of it himself? If he believes that this country is going to rack and ruin, he has no right to stay in it. No man is justified in either going to a country or living in a country, unless he believes that country will afford to himself and his children the means of a living and of prosperity; and I say that the best denial of the hon. gentleman's own statement that the country is going to rack and ruin is that he remains here, and I believe that he is prospering, with the great mass of the people that remain in the country. What indication does the hon. gentleman give? The Finance Minister referred to the returns of the savings bank and of various institutions, all proving that the great mass of the people are prospering, and that wealth is accumulating in the country. The hon. gentleman has tried to elaborate the argument that people are going out of the country in vast numbers. They have some figures to sustain their case that people have gone out. They have the census returns of the United States from 1870 to 1880, and from these census returns they show that there has been a large out-going of Canadians to the United States, some 400,000 people.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Add 2,000 more.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman would outdo Uncle Sam. He would outdo the Census Commissioners. On that side of the House, they are continually complaining that our census is a fraud. He seeks to make out that the census of the United States, that they admire so much, is a fraud and has not done justice to the United States. But, suppose that a large number of people have gone out between 1870 and 1880, do we not know and remember that the hon. gentlemen opposite were in the Government for five years of that period? Do we not know how they managed the affairs of the country? Do we not know the depression that existed from 1875 to 1878-79 and which only ended after the change of Government and after the introduction of the National Policy? And do they not see, in that depression and in that condition of the country during the five years that they held office, that there was just reason why there should be an outgo of the people of this country? But these gentlemen argue and they reiterate the fact that people have gone out since, forgetting that their own leader, the member for West Durham, last year showed to the House conclusively, endorsed the statement that almost all that outgo that is stated in the United States census was during the years 1876 and 1877. Let me refer to the hon. gentleman's speech to prove what I state, that they, in making this statement, are giving a flat contradiction to the position taken by the hon. the leader of the Opposition, who admitted here on the floor of Parliament that nearly all that outgo of people between 1870 and 1880 was during the time that they held office and in the years 1876 and 1877.

Mr. MILLS. Not at all, it is a mistake.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman says his leader makes mistakes.

Mr. MILLS. No, it is yours.

Mr. McLELAN. We know he makes mistakes, and from the time he took the leadership, seized the reins of the party, it has been one succession of mistakes down to the present. I know that in the particular party view the hon. gentleman takes, it was perhaps a mistake for him to make this admission, but here it is, he was making a long and elaborate speech upon the emigration—long and elaborate as his speeches always are, and able as they always are—but here is the mistake the hon. gentleman committed, according to the views of the hon. member for Bothwell. He says:

"It is proved by a very thorough examination that took place in the year 1882 under the instruction of the Legislature of Massachusetts into the question"—

That is the question of the immigration into the United States of French Canadians—

"that it has only been within the last ten or fifteen years that this immigration has assumed such large proportion in that part of the country. It is only within a much shorter period, five or six years before 1882, that it began to assume the character of a permanent settlement in the country to which these people went."

These are the words, this is the mistake, according to the hon. gentleman, which his leader made. The hon. gentleman was referring to an investigation made by the Massachusetts Legislature into this question of the immigration into their country of the French Canadians, and then he refers to a meeting of the French Canadians, themselves, and the resolutions which they passed at that time, and he goes on to read one of the resolutions which was passed by a gathering of the French Canadians of Lowell, as follows:—

"Whereas, since the French Canadians have come to this section, they have reached a population of 400,000 in New England, and whereas a large number have become proprietors, paying large taxes, and whereas, for the most part, the young men propose to make their homes here,—Resolved, that we protest against the portion of the report which says we are a horde of industrial invaders; whereas we have to live five years in this country before we can become citizens of this glorious Republic, and the French Canadians have been here in large numbers only for five or six years."

Take the first resolution, where they say they are 400,000 strong, and take the next, that they have been there only five or six years, and take the date, 1882, and you have the hon. member for West Durham proving that all this outgo was during the years 1876 and 1877. And yet the gentlemen opposite, forgetting what their leader has done, overlooking the mistake, as they call it, that he has made in making this admission, still harp upon this statement that there is a great outgo of the people from this country. My hon. friend from Cardwell (Mr. White) the other day gave us the proof that, even from the railway returns, there are more people coming into the country than going out of it. We refer to our census and we find we have a very large number of people here, once American citizens, residing in the Dominion of Canada and prospering; and that, compared to our population, there is a larger proportion of American born subjects residing in the Dominion of Canada than, compared to the population of the United States, is the percentage of Canadians residing in the United States. The hon. gentleman will persist, I suppose, in telling us they are going there; and why are they going there? What should there be in the United States to draw people away from Canada? I suppose the hon. gentleman will say there is more employment there, that wages are better, and that there are prairie lands to be settled. Well, Mr. Speaker, if the policy of the hon. gentleman were carried out and if we were reduced to a revenue tariff, if the doctrines laid down by the hon. member for West Durham were adopted by the Government that men should be free to purchase whatever article they require in whatever market they choose, and on the lowest terms, then there would be less employment for our own people in our own country, wages would be reduced, and there would be greater inducements for our people to leave this country and join the great multitude of the manufacturing classes employed in the United States. But the hon. gentleman referred to the balance of trade, and he says that it has been claimed by the Finance Minister that the nearer he can approach to equalizing it the better for us. I endorse that doctrine. The hon. gentleman referred us to the case of England, and he told us there was an enormous balance of trade against England in the eight or ten years past. And he told the House how that balance of trade was made up? By the earnings of their ships abroad, by the interest on the investments that they had in all parts of the world. But he did not go back and tell us that England had, under a protective policy, grown enormously wealthy and earned the money which she had to loan all over the world; that she was receiving the interest upon investments which she had abroad, and out of that she met the adverse balance of trade. Nor did he attempt to show how much better off England would be if she had not to expend that 1,290 million pounds sterling which he mentioned in purchasing foreign goods. He did not tell us how much better off England would be if that enormous balance of trade was not against her, which she now has to meet out of the earnings of her ships, and out of the interest of her investments abroad. He did not tell us how much employment that money, if spent at home, would give to the people of England, Ireland and Scotland. He did not tell us, either, that because of this large adverse balance of trade, and this enormous amount of money sent away to foreign countries, how much misery and suffering there is among the unemployed people of Great Britain. Why, Mr. Speaker, they talk about the burdens that are laid upon the Dominion of Canada, and the taxes that are gathered by my hon. friend the Finance Minister. Sir, if my hon. friend only had the poor rates of Great Britain at his command, if he had the amount annually collected to maintain the paupers of that country, he would be able to run the Federal Government and every Local Government in the Dominion of Canada, and still have a larger surplus than he has ever had yet. And yet the hon. gentleman opposite want us to adopt a policy that would take away employment from our people.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. McLELAN. I will just ask him. Suppose a portion of that 1,290 millions of pounds sterling went to Ireland to start manufactures and give employment to the people there, would it not conduce to the prosperity and happiness of that country? One of the great grievances complained of in Ireland is that there is a constant drain upon that people and upon that country by absent landlords; it is said that absentee landlordism is a curse to Ireland. If that is admitted, and it seems to be generally admitted the world over, where is the difference between absent landlords and absent mechanics? The hon. gentleman would have our mechanics go to the United States, to Great Britain or any other country, and in that portion of the country to withdraw from us the money that they earn from day to day to maintain and support themselves and families. The laboring classes of Canada would soon recognise a grievance like that, and would not be slow to complain of it, just as the people of Ireland are not slow to complain of the grievance of their being subjected to a constant drain to maintain absent landlords. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman next referred to assisted immigration, which he condemns. I have a word to say upon that. I think I made the statement here last year, in the absence of the hon. Minister of Agriculture—and if I did not make that statement the public records of the Province of Ontario will show the fact—that the assisted immigration which was so much complained of was induced by the Government of the Province of Ontario; that an arrangement was made by the commissioners from Ireland with the Government of Ontario to receive such immigrants as they should send out, and give them employment. Under that arrangement they came to the Minister of Agriculture and said: The Government of Ontario will receive all the people we send out, will you give some assistance in order to bring these people where the Ontario Government can care for them. That was done, and that policy was thus inaugurated, or very much enlarged. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentlemen opposite pretend to be the friends of the workingman and have his interests very deeply at heart. I ask them how they propose to benefit the workingman by the adoption of a policy of having all the various articles that we require for domestic and public purposes, manufactured in a foreign country? How are they to benefit the laboring classes in this Dominion if they are to break down the barriers and allow an influx of foreign goods. The hon. gentleman knows that it is just at a time when there is a plethora of production the world over, as the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) calls it, that a protective policy is specially advantageous to us. It is then, if ever, advantageous, because that is the time when the productions of foreign manufacturers and mechanics will be sent in to overwhelm the markets of the countries that have free trade and no protection. And, therefore, I say that when hon. gentlemen opposite take to heart the workingman and want to improve his position so much, it is not by sending abroad for labor and giving encouragement to foreign mechanics that they will better his position very much, but rather by having mechanics in the country, employing them here and maintaining them by the produce raised by our farming population. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) reminded me the other day of an incident which shows clearly, to my mind, how largely the whole community, and more especially the agricultural class, can be benefitted by the employment of mechanics. Why, if you take all the mechanics out of Montreal and Toronto and send them to the United States, the markets of those cities will not be one-half what they are at present. The incident of which the hon. member reminds me was this: When I was in Scotland, a gentleman took me to see various towns of the country. We came to a town which seemed to be all prosperity. I walked through the streets and looked at the shop windows, and saw there every article of luxury and comfort possible for the hands of man to manufacture and display for sale. I saw large public halls, schools, churches, and I asked my friend, what is the population of this town? He said: about 60,000. I went through the markets and saw them crowded with agricultural produce for the maintenance of these 60,000 inhabitants. I turned to my friend and said, What is the trade of this town? How is it sustained? He said, It is just manufacturing thread; the whole prosperity of the town and its inhabitants depends upon the manufacture of little spools of thread that are sent all over the world. In all my travels through that town I did not see a single spool of thread, but everything for the comfort and luxury of the 60,000 inhabitants, all maintained by that little manufacture of which the hon. member reminded me the other day. Is it possible that such a town can be in existence and not benefit the agricultural portion of the community? If you establish in the Dominion one industry or a dozen industries that will support a population of 60,000 people, it is an impossibility that such shall not largely benefit the agricultural as well as all other classes of the population. But hon. gentlemen opposite say that laborers should have protection as well as other classes. We feel we have given laborers protection, and that protection is in giving them employment. It may be that there are a few industries which are depressed; it may be that there are a few people who are not so fully employed as they once were; but compare their position with that during the years 1876-77-78. Those people then were either not in the country or were idle, begging from door to door. But the figures given by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), the other night, are conclusive upon this point. He gave a table of rates of wages, and said that the rate of wages paid to a laboring man, in 1877, was 80 cents a day. It is from $1.25 to $1.50 now, and, I say, in that increase of wages we have given protection to the laboring classes. It does not lie in the mouth of hon. gentlemen opposite to talk of not protecting the laboring class. That is our aim and our desire, and we have the interest of the workingman deeply at heart, and we are watching carefully in what way we can improve his condition. But hon. gentlemen opposite in 1876-77 and 78 were not so careful. They did not manifest such interest in the laborers as they do now. Sir, I have been for twenty-seven years in Parliament, and during that time I have heard many speeches that were wise and many that were otherwise; but of all the speeches I have heard none do I remember so distinctly and clearly as a speech made by a member of the late Government in the other House, the leader of the Government in the other House. Speaking of public works and what had been done in the country, that hon. gentleman boasted that they had saved $3,000,000 at least by the lowness of wages paid to the laboring people; that they had saved $3,000,000 on canals and railways, $3,000,000 ground out of the muscle and blood of the laboring class of the community. That speech fell upon my ears harshly, it was "graven" on my memory as if "with a pen of iron and lead in the rock forever," and I could not help taking advantage of the occasion to condemn the hon. gentleman for the insulting manner in which he had boasted that the Government had saved $3,000,000 by the lowness of wages, when the people were begging from door to door, and even from Parliament. Yet, now when wages have advanced and employment is given to the people, hon. gentlemen opposite come forward and say we are neglecting the working man. Sir, the Government to which I have the honor to belong has the interests of the workingman at heart, although we may not be able to do all we desire to improve his condition. God forbid, that I should ever be a member of a Government which would boast of saving $3,000,000, wrung out of the blood and muscle of the laboring people, and out of their starving wives and children. There is another point to which I desire to refer. I suppose the hon. gentleman who will next address the House will tell us what enormous taxation we have placed on the poor man; he will pretend that while we have increased his wages—and they will not presume to deny that the wages of the working class have been increased since 1877-78—we are taking more than that out of them in taxation, and that the grievous taxation we are imposing on the poor man is driving him out of the country and making his condition worse than what it was in 1877-78 on the 80 cents a day rate of wages. I should have referred to this matter when I was dealing with the North-West; I should have shown the hon. gentleman that in the Province of Manitoba and the North-West the percentage of taxation which they imposed on the people was higher than the taxation under the present tariff. I have said before, and I repeat, that in a purely agricultural country the present tariff does not impose so heavy a degree of taxation as the tariff of the hon. member for Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright). When we passed over the North-West to them the rate of taxation was about 5½ per cent.; when they gave it back in 1878 the rate of taxation upon all goods entering into the Province of Manitoba and the North-West was 19 per cent., and during the past year under this tariff, which they say is driving the people out of this country, the percentage has only been 17¼, so that there has actually been a less percentage of taxation in Manitoba and the North-West under the present tariff than was under the old tariff of the hon. the ex-Finance Minister. Before passing from that subject I want to refer to one statement made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). He said, You had prosperous times, you had a surplus, you had plenty of money, and if you had only left the tariff alone you would have had just as good times, and you would have had just as much prosperity, and the taxation then would have been comparatively as much. What we maintain is that under this tariff, under this modification, with the duties on tea and coffee and many other articles reduced, with a large list of free goods, poor men and men in middle life can purchase their goods as low, and live as cheaply as, and more cheaply than, they could when the old tariff was in existence, and the taxation distributed as it was under that tariff. Now, let me remind the hon. gentleman of one or two points in illustration of this fact. What we claim is that a large portion of the money collected under this tariff, now that manufactures have got started, is collected on the luxuries of life and from that class of people who are best able to pay. I take spirits and wines, and I suppose hon. gentlemen think these are luxuries; I take silks and satins, and I dare say hon. gentlemen will admit that these are luxuries. I ascertain the amount of duty collected by hon. gentlemen opposite during the five years they were in office upon silks and satins, and I take the five years my hon. friend the Finance Minister has been collecting the duty, and I find that in these latter five years we have collected $2,555,977 more on silks and satins than the hon. gentlemen did under his tariff. That is one illustration of the fact that this tariff is designed to press most heavily upon the class who are best able to pay. Let me say this, that while the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) claims that we are growing poorer every day, is not the fact that people are importing and wearing more silks and satins a proof that they are growing richer and more luxurious in their tastes? I take those two things, wines and spirits on the one hand, and silks and satins on the other, and I find that my hon. friend the Finance Minister in those five years has collected $3,848,860 more than the hon. gentlemen opposite collected during the five years he was in office. While they are talking about our distressing the poor man and grinding him down, and taking a surplus of money, we show that a large proportion comes from the class who are best able to bear it. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has referred to the condition of the United States manufacturers under a revenue tariff and under a protective tariff. But the hon. gentleman deals entirely with percentages. He says that under the revenue tariff, from 1850 to 1860, there was a large percentage of increase, and then he goes on to the protective tariff period and he says there has been an increase but there is not so much percentage. Now, the House will perceive the fallacy of this statement. Let me illustrate it. If you start with a basis of 100,000, and you have 100 per cent. increase in a year, you have 200,000 but in the next year if you have 100,000 increase you have only 50 per cent., and so on; and as the hon. gentleman came down from 1850 to 1880, the percentage diminished, although the volume of increase there had been very much larger than in the other periods referred to.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Four times larger.

Mr. CHARLTON. No.

Mr. McLELAN. I give this as an illustration of how the hon. gentleman conducts his arguments in order to deceive the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. McLELAN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman does not do it to deceive, but it does deceive the country in the first flush, but not those who have time to examine the case and understand it, and understand the motives and facts he may present. Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for the patience with which they have heard me. There are some other points to be refuted in the hon. gentleman's long and elaborate speech, but I know that there are several other gentlemen who are prepared to deal with them, and with the arguments and fallacies which the hon. gentleman has addressed to the House.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MILLS. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries is not at all pleased with this side of the House. He says we speak in lugubrious tones—that one would think we were engaged in the business of undertakers. But it seemed to me from the tones of the hon. gentleman himself that he was much more likely to engage in the business to which he referred than any hon. gentleman on this side of the House. He spoke very much more like one having upon him the weeds of mourning than the garments of rejoicing. The hon. gentleman's reference to the business of undertaking reminds me of a story that was told of a very ardent supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite residing in this city, who after 1873 declared that he had not had a customer for three months; so that it would seem that if any particular business was injured by a change of Administration at that time it was the very business to which the hon. gentleman who has just spoken referred. The hon. Minister told us that the United States debt was incurred in consequence of a great war, but that by the policy of protection they had been enabled to pay off a great portion of that debt, and that in fact they had nothing to show for the immense expense which had resulted from that war other than tombstones and the inscriptions upon them. He quite forgot that six millions of the population of that country were turned from slaves to free men; and unless the hon. gentleman supposes that freedom adds nothing to the intellectual power and force of a people, he can hardly suppose that so extraordinary a revolution as that could be of no possible consequence. The hon. gentleman quite forgets, too, that the circumstances of population have something to do with progress. The civil war of the United States was a great event. It stirred the feelings of the nation to their profoundest depths. There was in many parts of the country a great demand, a real necessity, for labor. The inventive faculties of the people were taxed to their utmost, and it is a remarkable fact that most of the progress made in the application of machinery to agricultural pursuits was in a large degree the outcome of that particular period. I might mention a fact which will perhaps show more than anything else the absurdity of the fiscal policy which the Government are at present upholding, and which the hon. gentleman advocated—I think I mentioned it once before in this House—a fact stated in the Scientific American some three or four years ago, that in the business of boots and shoes a single invention that took place in 1872 or 1873 had added 55 per cent. to the laboring power of those engaged in that particular business. In other words, the production of a given number of hands was 55 per cent. greater after the invention than it was before; and it is perfectly obvious that a tax, unless it exceeded 55 per cent., could not serve as a barrier to the importation of that particular commodity. Then the hon. gentleman told the House what extraordinary progress the country had made under the present Administration, and what very little progress it had made under their predecessors. He said there were only 30,000 people in the North-West Territories and Manitoba when this Government came into office in 1878. The Government of Mr. Mackenzie had been in power for five years, and during that time there had been only 30,000 added to the population of that country. Well, Sir, the hon. First Minister has been in power for many years, and there is no greater population in the vicinity of Hudson Bay or the Labrador coast than there was when the hon. gentleman took his seat in Parliament for the first time. Now, I do not think very much can be established in that way. The hon. gentleman did say that up to the time that the Government of Mr. Mackenzie retired from office, there was no railway communication established with the North-West Territories. The railway from Pembina to Selkirk, a distance of 84 miles, was completed, a few weeks before the defeat of the Administration, except ballasting, which I think was completed some time in the month of December, 1878, but as no American railway was at that time built up to the border, railway communication was not established, and until facilities were afforded to enable population to get into the country with some degree of ease, we could not expect that there would be any very large number of people who would go to settle there. The Government of hon. gentleman opposite obtained possession of the country in 1869. In that year they provided by a Bill for the establishment of government in the territory; in 1871 they admitted Manitoba into the Union; nearly three years afterwards they retired from office; and what population was added to Manitoba during those two years and nine months? Very few people went there, because there were no facilities for going into the country; and the hon. gentleman might with just as much propriety refer to the fact that these hon. gentleman had been a long time in power, that they had been in possession of the country for at least three years, and that they had established a province there nearly three years before they retired from office, and yet before their retirement there were not 5,000 people in the country in addition to the aborigines. Well, Sir, nothing can be established in that way; there is no propriety in such a line of argument; and when the hon. gentleman stated that but 30,000 people had gone into the country, he proved nothing against the policy or the conduct of the late Administration. Then, the hon. gentleman said that my hon. friend the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), who was Premier at that time and was in charge of the Department of Public Works, had commenced the construction of a railway from Red River to Lake Superior, and that the two ends were built while there was a large section of the centre portion of the railway for which the contract was not let. Well, Sir, that is true, and I think it was proper, it was a wise and prudent course to pursue in the public interest. The hon. gentleman complains that we had not begun with the construction of this road at an inaccessible point—in the centre. Where was the propriety of letting contracts for the construction of that portion of a road which was inaccessible, and which could not be reached until the two ends were completed? It was by the construction of the two extremities that it was made possible to construct the centre portion, and it is perfectly obvious that the terms on which the Government could make a contract for the construction of that centre portion would be much more favorable after the two ends were completed than before. The hon. gentleman knows that since he has come into office the Government paid as much as 15 cts. a pound for sending Indian supplies into that country. Now, the hon. gentleman said that we also proposed to create railway monopolies in that country—that we proposed a system of colonisation railways, and provided that no railways should be constructed within 40 miles of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, that statement is not correct. It is only necessary to examine the Bill that was introduced on that subject to see that it is not an accurate statement. The fact is that we proposed that no line running parallel with the Canadian Pacific Railway should be constructed within 40 miles of that road; but any number of tributary lines radiating out from that line might be built. The proposal we made was a wise proposal; it was a proposal in the public interest, and one which, if those hon. gentlemen had carried it out, would have supplied the whole North-West with a network of railways without any charge on the public treasury, and with immense advantage to the settlement of that country. Then the hon. gentleman says that he is in favor of a reciprocity treaty, but he wants reciprocity upon fair terms: he wishes to have something to offer the people of the United States when the time comes for the negotiation of a reciprocity treaty. Well, the hon. gentleman has his opinions as to the best means of securing reciprocity, but I can tell him that when the Government adopted a high protective tariff, when they abandoned the policy of a revenue tariff, they did that which was the very worst thing that could be done in the interest of the people of this country. It is not by imitating the people of the United States, it is not by adopting the policy they have adopted, and which has proved detrimental to their interests, that we will succeed in convincing them that they are wrong. If the hon. gentleman be right in his views, it is the best thing in the world for us not to have a reciprocity treaty at all; if he be right, a reciprocity treaty would be a misfortune to us and to the United States as well. It is, according to him, by a policy of exclusion that the two countries are to prosper. Was the hon. gentleman to go to the United States and propose to negotiate a treaty, what would the Americans say to him? Why they would say: There are many people in this country who hold that the less free trade we have with others the better; who claim that it is important to keep the United States for the people of the United States; you have adopted the doctrine of Canada for the Canadians; why, then, do you come here and ask to have the barriers thrown down between the United States and Canada, if by removing them each country will be injured? What reason can hon. gentlemen opposite assign for establishing free trade between the United States and this country that will not apply to every other country as well as to Canada? There may be a difference in degree, but there can be no difference in kind, and hon. gentlemen opposite, in adopting the policy they have adopted, have delayed, instead of hastening, the period when a treaty of reciprocity might be negotiated with some hope of success. Let me take an instance in point. The colony of Victoria, in Australia, adopted in 1883 a protective policy; and the colony of New South Wales continued the policy of free trade. The two colonies lie side by side, precisely as do Canada and the United States. There were a few in the colony of New South Wales who advocated the doctrine of hon. gentlemen opposite, the doctrine of retaliation; who said: "If the people of Victoria will not admit our products into their country on fair terms, we should not admit their products into ours on fair terms." But the majority of the people of New South Wales took a different view, they believed in the policy of a revenue tariff, they believed that the system of free trade was better than the system of protection; they acted on that belief and have adhered to free trade ever since. And what has been the result of each system during the 11 years in which both have been in operation side by side? To-day the Colony of New South Wales has an extensive commerce, to-day it is the maritime colony of that portion of the British Empire. The shipping interests of New South Wales have prospered, the shipping interests of Victoria have languished; the shipping interests of New South Wales have increased, the shipping interests of Victoria have diminished. In 1873, the imports and exports of the two were very nearly equal; to-day the imports and exports of New South Wales are millions in excess of those of Victoria; and, in fact, of the two provinces situated towards each other relatively as are Canada and the United States, the one adhering to a policy of high duties and the other to the policy of a revenue tariff, the colony that adopted the revenue tariff has far outstripped in commercial prosperity the colony that followed the opposite doctrine. Now I say that New South Wales has at this moment an opportunity of securing free trade or reciprocal trade relations, based upon the principle of free trade, with Victoria, very much better than she would have had if she had imitated Victoria and adopted her fiscal policy. And I say too that we would be in a position to secure more favorable trade relations with the United States had we adhered to the policy which we had pursued for many years before, than by following the policy we have since adopted. The hon. gentleman told us also that the Government have not imposed taxation in the interests of the rich and against the poor, that they have not favored the manufacturer at the expense of the ordinary laborer; in fact he says, we have collected three million dollars more duty upon silks during the past five years than was collected by the Government that preceded us. Well, what of that? I remember when the First Minister, addressing an audience in Toronto some time in 1878, told them he was going to admit silks free of duty; he told them it was very important that they should be admitted free of duty, that the poor people ought to have their silks cheap, and that if he succeeded in obtaining office he would see that that was done. I have before me a statement of another tax that these hon. gentlemen have imposed and to which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has not alluded—the tax on bread stuffs and coal. Now bread stuffs and coal were admitted free under the previous Administration. I suppose that hon. gentlemen opposite will say that this duty imposed no burden on the population, that in fact they are duties which are paid by the producer; that the people of the Maritime Provinces do not really pay any duty upon bread-stuffs, but that these are paid by the people of the United States; and that the people of Ontario do not pay any duty upon coal, but that this duty is paid by the people across the line. I do not think that there are many who subscribe to that view. If that view be correct, I am unable to understand why the hon. gentleman who has charge of the fiscal policy of this Administration has permitted the rascally Chinese to escape a tax on tea. Now I find that there have been duties collected during the last five years on breadstuffs and coal amounting to $5,791,152. The tax on coal during the past year amounted to $1,113,611. This tax has more than doubled during the past five years, not because coal is more largely consumed by manufacturers, although, no doubt, there has been an increase in that particular, and by railways, but because coal is largely entering into consumption amongst the population. The people are using it in their houses instead of wood; many people who during former periods used no coal at all are now consuming it, and a very large quantity of coal is being consumed for domestic purposes by our population. It is worth while saying something with regard to the history of this policy. The hon. gentlemen began to preach the doctrine of protection in 1877 and 1878, and after they came into power in 1879 this protective policy was adopted, but all the Conservative party was not committed to the doctrine of protection in this House. The hon. the First Minister sat for many years on the fence. He said it was not a protective policy he was imposing, that he was not proposing to increase the tariff, but only to equalise the taxation. He also said that it was for the purpose of retaliation. The people of the United States had kept out the products of Canada from their markets, and we ought to retaliate and keep their products out of our market. In fact, it is only necessary to read the resolution to see that the policy of high tariffs when first proposed by the hon. gentleman was not proposed as a protective policy at all, but a means of coercing the United States to adopt towards this country a more liberal policy. In fact he admitted that protection was a bad thing, that it was not in the public interest, but he said it was better than a system of one-sided free trade, and it was important to adopt a policy of protection until the Americans were forced to give us more favorable trade relations than we had, since the repeal of the reciprocity treaty, been enabled to secure from them. The hon. gentleman proposed this resolution in 1878:

“That this House is of opinion that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a National Policy which, by a judicious readjustment of the tariff, will benefit the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion; that such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our countrymen obliged to expatriate themselves in search of employment denied them at home, will restore prosperity to our struggling industries, now so sadly depressed.—”

Mr. RYKERT. True—every word of it.

Mr. MILLS. I shall have an opportunity of saying something about that—

“will prevent Canada being made a sacrifice market, will encourage and develop an active interprovincial trade, and moving, as it ought to do, in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbors, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, will gradually tend to procure for this country eventually a reciprocity of trade.”

Mr. RYKERT. Hear, hear—every word true.

Mr. MILLS. One hon. gentleman says every word of this is true. Was it true that thousands of our people had gone out of the country for want of employment? Was it true that our manufacturing industries were badly depressed? Was it true that by adopting this policy we are likely to secure eventually a reciprocity of trade with the United States? This resolution is worth some little consideration from the House, for, although many years have passed, it is the starting point of the present fiscal policy of the Administration. There are here three propositions, no two of which can stand together. If it be true that interprovincial trade is necessary, it is perfectly obvious that reciprocity would, in a large degree, put an end to that interprovincial trade. The hon. gentleman knows that he cannot have interprovincial trade to any large extent and reciprocity with the United States. The people of Nova Scotia do not want Ontario as a coal market; they would prefer the New England States; and, if we were to get reciprocity with the United States there is no doubt whatever that Nova Scotia coal would cease to find its way up the St. Lawrence. It would find its way to the New England States, and the breadstuffs of Ontario would not to the same extent be carried to the Maritime Provinces. The hon. gentleman proclaims that this interprovincial trade is a necessary bond of union, that without it we have only a union on paper, that without this interprovincial trade our union was not likely to endure, that by trading with the people of the Maritime Provinces we were likely to consolidate the union between those Provinces and Ontario and the Provinces of the west. When I look at the reports of the condition of affairs and of public feeling in the city of Halifax and the city of St. John, after a trial of this policy since 1879. It does not appear that it has done very much in either of those places to consolidate union. It does not seem that the people of Halifax are more devoted to the union to-day than they were when the union was established, and it is quite obvious that the city represented by the Finance Minister himself is, at this moment, far more disaffected towards union than at the time the union was carried. The hon. gentleman says that this reciprocity of tariffs is ultimately to secure reciprocal free trade. He admits then that reciprocal free trade is a better thing than protection. He admits that the interests of Canada would be promoted by reciprocal free trade with the United States. The reason he gives for a continuance in the policy of protection is that it is the best thing we can do until reciprocal free trade with the United States is established. If that be so, then it follows that all we have heard about struggling industries, all we have about Canada being a slaughter market, all we have been told about the necessity of protecting the smaller manufactures of Canada against the hostile policy of the larger establishments on the other side, is unfounded. I am inclined to think that in that view hon. gentlemen are right. I see cotton mills springing up at St. Louis and rolling mills at Chicago, and I know they are not protected against the hostile policy of the cotton mills of Lowell or the rolling mills of Pittsburg. There is no tariff to protect these manufactures in a new state. How then do they come into existence, if the arguments which hon. gentlemen put forward are well founded? It is perfectly clear that an establishment in Canada can live quite as well as an establishment in Kansas against an American establishment of the same kind; but, if that be so, if reciprocal free trade with the United States is an advantage, then all we have heard about the dangers of competition from the larger establishments is quite unfounded. These gentlemen have told us that the trade was very much depressed in 1878, that what the hon. First Minister said about thousands leaving Canada then was quite true. They tell us, and he told us in a speech in Toronto at the time, that 500,000 people had been driven out of Canada by the policy of the Mackenzie Administration. He said it was a crying shame that so large a number of our population should be obliged to go away for want of employment. Well, I look at the Trade and Navigation returns, and I do not find that they sustain the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite. I find that in 1873 we imported into Canada 3,514,387 lbs. of raw cotton for the purpose of being manufactured, and that in 1878 the cotton mills had increased to such an extent that we manufactured 7,243,418 pounds of raw cotton, that in fact the quantity of raw cotton had more than doubled during those five years. The cotton mills increased their capacity. If I look at the woollen mills, the boot and shoe business, no matter to what particular industry I turn my attention, as disclosed in the trade and navigation returns and the census. I find that we have made a constant progress in these particulars. Now, Sir, those gentlemen told us at that time stories about soup kitchens. They said the soup kitchen was the only establishment that prospered during the Mackenzie regime. I remember that the hon. member for Kent, and I think the hon. Minister of Militia, went to the mills at the Chaudiere and brought about a hundred men who were employed in those mills, to the House here, demanding employment from the Minister of Public Works, the Premier Minister of the day—and the hon. gentleman referred to this. Here were men who were crying for work, men who were not seeking favors at the hands of the Administration, but were only seeking an opportunity for toil: and he said that if you were to go to the cities of Pittsburgh, Baltimore, and New York, wherever you might go where there were manufacturing establishments, there you would find Canadians employed. Now, Sir, at that time we heard nothing about a want of patriotism in those who decried the country and spoke against the exodus of the population. Now we are told that it is little short of treason to say that any portion of our population are not employed; now it is little short of treason to say that large numbers are being expatriated to the States; now it is quite improper to make any representation of this sort. We are told that the agents of American railways abroad are publishing those statements that we make as to the condition of the country, and using them to prevent people coming here, with a view of attracting European immigration to the United States. Well, Sir, how was it that those gentlemen did not say the same in 1878? How was that when the First Minister proclaimed from the hustings—I think at the Amphitheatre in Toronto—that 500,000 Canadians had gone to the States, there was nothing improper in that statement? How was it that when the First Minister declared there were thousands of people anxious to obtain employment and were obliged to emigrate because they could not obtain employment, that there was nothing unpatriotic in that? Were not these statements sent abroad? Were they not employed by emigration agents of the United States?

Mr. RYKER. They were true then.

Mr. MILLS. They were not true, and I have before me facts which will show they were not true. I have before me facts which will show that the emigration from Canada during the Administration of the hon. gentleman down to 1873, averaged nearly 44,000 a year, that during the Mackenzie Administration it was 22,000 a year, and that during the present Administration it has been 88,500 a year. And yet when these facts are accessible to all and are as well established as any other matter of fact can be, hon. gentlemen continue to repeat that the people of Canada were expatriated at a time when the people left the country at the rate of 22,000 a year, and that they are not expatriated during the Administration of the present Government although 88,500 have left the country each year for the past five years. Let me give to the hon. gentleman a few facts from the Hamilton Spectator of 1877. That was a year of as great depression as any year during the regime of the Mackenzie Administration. The Hamilton Spectator is the organ of the Tory party. It is a paper friendly to the Administration; it advocates the doctrine of protection, and it describes the condition of the manufactures in Hamilton at that time. It says: "The Empire foundry of Copp & Co. had been enormously increased in capacity, and its business has increased." It mentions the facts that the Wanzer Sewing Machine Co. had greatly extended their business, and were employing a much larger number of hands than before. It mentions that the Gurney Co. had also greatly increased the capacity of their factory, and were giving employment to a greater number of men than before. It also describes the manufacturing establishments of Sawyer & Co. and of Burrows, Stewart & Milne. It describes several other establishments in Hamilton that had enlarged their capacity, and employed an increased number of hands. And, sir, it is well known that the progress of manufactures in Hamilton was greater between 1873 and 1878, notwithstanding there was a depression existing, than it has been between 1879 and the present hour. Now, Sir, these hon. gentlemen seem to think that they are the only parties who are privileged to discuss the state of the nation. Tom Moore describes a pagan country in which he says that

"None but priests are privileged to trade
In the best marble of which gods are made."

So it is with these hon. gentlemen. While they think they are entitled to discuss the state of the country and its industrial condition, it is little less than treason for any hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to point out the actual condition of things while the present Government holds power. It is quite proper to exaggerate the distress, to misrepresent the industrial position of the country when they are on this side of the House, but it is improper to state the real condition of the country when they are upon that side of the House. Now, Sir, there has been a very large emigration from Canada, and I wish to give a statement with regard to the exodus. I shall ascertain by different methods the extent of that exodus, which, I think, will show that the representations made from this side of the House are not exaggerations, but that they are borne out by the facts. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) charges my hon. friend from South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) with quoting school statistics to show the exodus from Ontario, which, he says, are notoriously inaccurate. Now, I do not hesitate to say that we have no returns more to be relied on than the report of school attendance which the hon. member for Huron quoted. How did the hon. member for Cardwell substantiate his declaration that these statistics were not to be relied on? Did he show that they were inaccurate; that they were, in any way, self-contradictory? Not at all: he did not even attack them. He attacked a wholly different return, and one which no one claims to be reliable. The member for Cardwell referred, not to the school attendance, but to the population between five and sixteen years of age, whether at school or not. The statistics of school population is often estimated, and is known not to be perfectly accurate. But about the school attendance there can be no mistake. The teacher keeps a daily register. The name and age of every pupil is entered upon the register; and a copy of these names and ages is transmitted, half yearly, to the school inspector. It is a part of his duty to examine the registers when he visits the schools and to see that the numbers have been properly reported. The school registers of 1873 showed an attendance of 471,918; of 1878 an attendance of 499,589, and in 1884 of 476,212, that is, an increase in the school attendance of 27,500 from 1873 to 1878, and a decrease of 23,300 from 1878 to 1884. There can be no doubt that these statistics show a diminution of the population during the last five years within the school area of the Province. Some of the inhabitants may have removed to Algoma and Muskoka, some to Manitoba and the North-West; but by far the greater number have gone to the United States, and I am confident that I am quite within the mark when I say that there are to-day 200,000 Canadians in the State of Michigan alone. There is no denying the fact that, according to the United States census, in 1880, one-sixth of the native population of Canada was resident in the United States. This is a very serious matter, and when we examine these statistics we will find that since 1880 the emigration from Canada to the United States has been unprecedentedly large, larger than at any previous period of our history. The number of Canadians in the United States in 1870 was 490,000, and in 1880 712,000. The leader of the Opposition showed last year that the death rate was 21.27 per cent. for the decade, which would show 123,000 deaths during the decade; so that the actual emigration from Canada between 1870 and 1880 was 343,000, or 34,300 a year, which would be a little larger number than that shown by the Bureau of Statistics. The number of immigrants to Canada between 1871 and 1881 was 333,700, and the Minister of Agriculture had claimed these as Canadian settlers. But when we look at the census of 1871 we find the foreign-born population of Canada was 489,500; and in 1881 the number was 487,600, or 1,900 less than it had been ten years before. We were told that, according to the returns made by the Minister of Agriculture from time to time to this House, there were, during that same period, 333,700 immigrants settled in Canada. But that is quite impossible, because if we make allowance for the usual number of deaths, it is too plain to admit of denial that only about 100,000 people came from abroad and settled in the Provinces of Canada during the ten years between 1871 and 1881. If we take the natural increase of population and the same percentage of increase as is shown by the census of the United States, there ought to have been an increase of 783,380. There was, according to the census, 558,300, or 225,500 less than there should have been. If we add to this the decrease from death, which vacuum must have been supplied from abroad, we have 343,000 as the emigration from Canada to the United States during the period between 1871 and 1881, and we have, according to the census of the United States, 343,000 as the number which emigrated to the United States between 1870 and 1880. These figures are sufficiently near to show that this is a fairly accurate representation of the exodus from Canada to the United States. If we take the returns of the Bureau of Statistics, we get very nearly the same numbers that we get from the census of the United States and from the census of Canada. According to the census of the United States, as I have pointed out, the number of emigrants from Canada to the United States, between 1870 and 1880, was 343,000, and between 1871 and 1881, according to the census of Canada, 348,000. The number was about 340,000, according to the census returns of the Bureau of Statistics. So we have three independent sources of information, all giving very nearly the same number as those who expatriated themselves from Canada and took up their abode in the United States during those ten years. I find the Bureau of Statistics gives the number of those who settled in the States from Canada, as follows: 1880, 89,416; 1881, 125,000; 1882, 98,109; 1883, 69,354; 1884, 60,406. So that we have during those five years a population leaving Canada larger in number than the population of any one of the Maritime Provinces. If we were to lose the entire population of Nova Scotia we would be appalled at the tremendous loss that the country would sustain, yet during the five years those hon. gentlemen have been in office, since 1880, the population which this country has lost by emigration to the United States is far in excess of the population of any one of the Maritime Provinces. I find that during the five years of the Mackenzie Administration the emigration from Canada to the United States was about 123,000, and yet by the returns of the Bureau of Statistics of 1881, no less than 125,000 people left this Dominion for the States. In other words, a larger number of people left Canada in 1881 than left this country between 1874 and 1879. The hon. gentlemen proposed to keep the people in Canada, to adopt a policy that would put an end to the exodus. They proposed to put an end to the emigration of 22,000 Canadians yearly to the United States. They came into office. They have had seven years in which to try their experiment. What is the result? That there are 83,500 people leaving Canada every year. If any one in any ordinary pursuit were to promise to do certain things and failed as egregiously as hon. gentlemen opposite have done, he would not have been retained in his position for an hour; and yet those hon. gentlemen have not in a single particular fulfilled the pledges they made to the country. They were to be the great State physicians; they were to perform extraordinary feats; they were to give employment to our entire population; foreign markets for our goods would be unnecessary; every village was to be converted into a town, every town into a city, and all the cities were to become great markets, such as New York and London are at the present time. Those were the representations that hon. gentlemen made. They said we must have a home market—Canada for the Canadians—and we will not only secure a large immigration of people to this country, but also a large amount of capital, which would serve to build mills and give employment to our people. Where are those great mills? Where are those millions of capital that were to be invested? Where are those hundreds of thousands of artisans of Europe who were living in comparative penury there, but who were to be employed in this country? At the present time we have a larger export trade than we had before, but not one of those things which the hon. gentleman promised has been fulfilled. I look, Sir, at this tariff which the hon. gentleman has tinkered year by year for the last five years, which he informs us that he has made better every year, and I observe that he does not exactly adhere to the orthodox doctrines laid down by the First Minister. The First Minister told us that the producer always paid the taxation. He told us a story about two barley farms, and he told it so often and so well that all his supporters learned it and we heard it everywhere. He assured us that if he was in power the farmers would receive the advantages of just as good prices for the products of their industry as were received in the United States. The Finance Minister does not adhere to these doctrines. He admits wool into the country free of duty, but if the duty is paid by the persons who produce the wool why should he admit it free? Then the hon. gentleman promised to allow drawbacks on wheat and other breadstuffs which are imported into Canada, and are to be manufactured and reshipped again; but if these taxes are paid by the producer, why does he allow the miller to put his hand in the public Treasury and receive so much for every bushel of wheat which is imported into the country. We find, therefore, that the hon. gentleman is proclaiming one doctrine when he is seeking protective duties, and is professing wholly different doctrines when he is professing to help the manufacturers. He admits wool free from duty, raw cotton and many other articles used by the manufacturers of the country, on the theory that the duties he imposes will be paid by the person who imports the article. Sir, last year we called the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the impropriety of importing a large number of artisan immigrants. We pointed out that these people could not find employment; that they were idle in our cities; that they became a burden to the rest of our population, and were seriously interfering with those artisans who were already in the country, and who found it sufficiently difficult to get employment. The hon. gentlemen denied this. It did not comport with the theory they advocated in this House to admit that we had more of this class of people in this country than could now be profitably employed. Now, Sir, when my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson) proposed a motion against assisted passages for this particular class of people, hon. gentlemen opposite resisted it, and they voted it down. But this year they proclaimed to the House that they had adopted the very policy which they thought it was not in the public interest to favor. In fact, they have been forced to do so. They have had loud remonstrances from the unemployed artisans in the cities of the country, and they knew they could not disregard those remonstrances and complaints; they knew that if they did not discourage further immigration of this particular class they would not be very likely to secure the support of those people. Now, Sir, I recently observed a statement in a New York paper about two Danes who applied there to some charitable institution for relief. They said they had been brought out to Canada as assisted passengers; that they had been taken to Toronto; that they could not get employment, although they had sought for employment for some time, and not being able to find any, they had left the country and had gone to New York. They also gave this further piece of information. They said they had served for some years in a Danish penitentiary, that they had served out their time and had been discharged, and they had been told that they had better go to Canada, because people going to Canada were assisted in their passage. How many of this class came here I do not know; I hope the large majority of those who are brought here are of a very different class; but we do know that people have been taken out of the poor houses; that waifs have been taken off the streets of London and brought to this country, and that the only advantage that the country has in the matter is from the fact that we know that they very speedily find their way across the border. If they prove to be not a very desirable class of people, we have at all events this consolation, that we do not retain them very long in the country. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) informed us that the Government were very economical; that there had been no unnecessary waste of public money; that the affairs of the country were now as economically administered as they had been formerly. Well, Sir, I find, at all events, from the statement of the Minister of Finance, that there is nearly $33,000,000 of expenditure during the current year, and that this is very nearly $10,000,000 more than it was when these hon. gentlemen took office. I find, Sir, by the Estimates which are brought down, that we have an enormously greater expenditure now than we had five years ago. In 1878 the expenditure on Indian affairs was $421,531; in 1882, $1,183,000; and in 1883, $1,116,000, or an increase of nearly threefold. I say there is nothing to justify this increase—nothing to warrant so large an expenditure on the management of our Indians. In 1878 we were put to a large cost in negotiating the treaties, and in carrying supplies to various points during the period we were paying the Indians for their annuities. They were not settled on their reservations, and they had to be kept together for several days before payment was made, and a large incidental expenditure was incurred during the making of these payments. Everyone expected that when the Indians were settled on their reservations this expenditure would come to an end. Hon. gentlemen opposite complained that there was any expenditure at all in this particular, and still this expenditure has not only been continued but been increased; and there is a much larger sum paid to-day and, in my opinion, unnecessarily, than in 1878. In fact, the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite has served to pauperise the Indian. These people, if they were put under careful management, under the supervision of competent agents, might have been made self-sustaining, but hon. gentlemen opposite have been more anxious to provide places for their friends than to provide competent men to take charge of the various Indian bands, and the result is, that the Indians are less industrious and do less for themselves than formerly. They have not come to depend on, they will not work, and the result is, that they are, year by year, becoming a more heavy charge on the public Treasury. Then, Sir, I observe that there is an immense increase in the expenditure of almost every Department. In 1878 the expenditure for clerks and officials in the Department of the Interior was $42,760; in 1883 it was $175,422, an increase of upwards of $133,000. There is nothing to warrant this increased expenditure, and the Government, themselves, felt that it could not be justified; for we find that $30,000 of the expenditure for the officials of the Department here in Ottawa is charged to capital account. Then, in the Department of Public Works, in 1878, there was an expenditure of $48,884, and in 1883 an expenditure of $87,790—and when I say the Department of Public Works, I am including the Department of Railways and Canals, because this Department was part of the Department of Public Works in 1878. Now, Sir, some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have said, in reference to the Washington treaty, that we were opposed to it at the time it was negotiated, but that now we are in favor of it; that then we condemned the First Minister for the course which he took; and that now we exhibit an undue anxiety for its perpetuation. This, Sir, is a misrepresentation of the facts. Of what we then did not approve, we still oppose. We did not approve of the policy of giving the go-by to the subject of the Fenian raids. We thought that to allow a part of the citizens of the United States to arm and drill and collect funds for the purpose of invading this country, was a flagrant violation of international duty. We think so still. We thought that to allow those men to invade this country was a still more flagrant violation of that duty. We thought that this, no less than the Alabama claims, ought to have been dealt with. We thought the United States could not reasonably resist our claims in face of the demand they were urging upon Great Britain for allowing vessels to be fitted out in England to prey on the commerce of the United States. Ministers at the time concurred in this opinion. Their minutes of Council conclusively established this fact. But at this point they played a shabby part. They asked for and obtained an Imperial guarantee for a loan of £2,500,000, towards the construction of a transcontinental railway, as a condition of acquiescence in what had been done. Of this we did not approve. If it were necessary to abandon our claim in the interest of the Empire, it ought to have been done with becoming public spirit, and not for a bribe. We were opposed to the provisions relating to the St. Lawrence and the canals. We conceded the navigation of the river for all time, and we secured the right to navigate Lake Michigan for ten years. We did not obtain the right to navigate the Columbia. A right which we had to the navigation of the rivers of Alaska was limited to three rivers. We were opposed to a monetary compensation for the use of our fisheries, believing that certain trade relations ought to have been made with the United States; and we were in favor of the settlement of the headland question. So far as I know, the views of this side of the House on all these matters remain unchanged. What we opposed then we do not approve of now, and what has since transpired has not served to show that our views were unsound. Now, Sir, the hon. Minister of Finance has laid on the Table a report on the progress of manufacturing industries in Canada since 1878, which, by the way, I believe has not yet been distributed, and has not yet been placed in the hands of the members. In that report there is a great show of material and industrial progress, and I observe, after looking at it while it was on the table of the House, that it reports ten new industries in the city of London. The names of these industries and the time they are stated in the report to have been published are as follows:—

New Factories.	Purpose.	When Established.
1 Essex, Dunn & Co.....	Brass works.....	1880
2 J. Gouinlock & Co.....	Hats and caps.....	1883
3 Dom. Baby Carriage Co.....	Baby carriages.....	1881
4 J. M. Dufton.....	Woollen factory.....	1881
5 J. Fox.....	Scales.....	1882
6 Joseph Groves.....	Safes and locks.....	1884
7 London Machine Tool Co.....	Machinery.....	1882
8 John Elliott & Sons.....	Ploughs.....	1882
9 Wortman & Ward.....	Iron pumps, etc.....	1882
10 Oil Cloth Co.....		1884

Now, I have made inquiries with reference to the above, and I will read the information I have obtained:

"1. Essex, Dunn & Co. were the purchasers of the Essex, Murray & Jolliffe business, and Essex, Murray & Jolliffe bought out, I think, the London Steam Supply Co., who bought out the Stevens, Turner & Burns Co. Stevens, Turner & Burns were in business, and because the contractors for the London water works, and there had been a plumbers' shop in the premises for many years before.

"2. J. Gouinlock, hats and caps. J. Gouinlock was in partnership with John Marshall—Marshall & Gouinlock. They dissolved and divided into two businesses. Marshall is alone with his share; J. Gouinlock took a young man, Hastings, in with him.

"3. Dominion Baby Carriage Co. bought out Hourd's insolvent Baby Carriage Co. Hourd & Co. conducted the business now conducted by that company in existence ten or twelve years.

"4. J. M. Dufton is a removal from Byron, about five miles down the river, near the waterworks—twenty years in business.

"5. J. Fox, scales, is on York street. House and factory combined; father and son constitute the staff.

"6. Joseph Groves, safes and locks. He failed, and the Advertiser and Fairgrieve took a safe in partnership for their accounts.

"7. London Machine Tool Company. This is Wm. Yates. When Mahon's bank failed, Yates failed or compromised. The company was then formed and is the Yates Company.

"8. John Elliott & Sons, ploughs. The business they bought is the old George Jackson business. Jackson failed, Elliott & Co. bought the plough works. Of course you are aware that John Elliott made his wealth long before the National Policy was thought of.

"9. Wortman & Ward. I don't know whether this is running now or not. It is the place on York street, a little west of William street.

"10. I made diligent enquiries in every part of the city, and have not been able to find the Oilcloth Co. In fact, I have not been able to meet any person who knows anything about it."

These are all the industries mentioned in the city of London as the outcome of this National Policy.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What did that report cost—$6,000?

Mr. MILLS. Then I find that he has reported four establishments in the town of Chatham, and it was reported that since then two new ones have been established, making six altogether. I sent this statement to a gentleman in Chatham, and he reported that there were fifty-three there in 1878 instead of four, that some of those mentioned are closed, and certainly we know that the waggon factory, in which a large number of the hands mentioned as being employed are engaged, has not been doing a prosperous business for the last two years. I do not wish to enter into a discussion of the condition of private firms, but certainly the report which the hon. gentleman has laid on the Table is one that presents very strong temptations to enter into a discussion of those establishments. A more untrustworthy document was never submitted to a Legislature; in no particular can it be relied on. It does not give the condition of the manufacturing industries, either in 1878 or at the present time; it is thoroughly misleading, utterly untrustworthy. It may have served the purposes of the Finance Minister of making a show of prosperity, but a large number of those establishments mentioned in various places are in a far less prosperous condition to-day than that in which they were in 1878, and many of those reported as being in operation are insolvent institutions. Now, I have in my hand a report of the condition of the manufacturing establishments in Hamilton. I learn from it that many of them are far less prosperous now than they were in 1878. Take the Wanzer Sewing Machine Company. I have a report in which it is said that they to-day employ one-third the number of hands that they employed in 1877, and so with many other establishments; and the writer says that if the Government are anxious to know the views of the people of Hamilton on the National Policy, they have only to appoint the one member collector and the other a judge, and they will have an opportunity of discovering what the opinion of the people of Hamilton is at the present time. I am inclined to think that the wholly untrustworthy character of these reports will fully account for its not being in the hands of members at the present time. It will not bear inspection; it will not bear scrutiny, and I have no doubt that the Finance Minister has pursued a very prudent course in withholding it from the supervision of hon. members.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I did not withhold it in any shape or form. It was submitted the very day it was prepared, and so far as the Government are concerned, they have not interfered in any way, except to have it printed as soon as possible.

Mr. MILLS. Well, it was in the power of the Government to have this report printed and laid on the Table when the House met; and, what is more, it does seem to me that it is scarcely fair in the Minister to refer to this report and herald its contents while, at the same time, the House had not an opportunity of examining it fully and considering it. There is no doubt of the fact that the report is not in our hands; there is no doubt of the fact that it is utterly worthless; there is no doubt of the fact that its untrustworthy character could be established, not only in the city of London and the town of Chatham, but in every town and city of Canada to which reference has been made, and the Finance Minister ought not to have discussed its contents until the House had an opportunity of examining the report. Let me look at some of the industries mentioned. High taxes have been imposed, and for what? Why, hon. gentlemen opposite say, for the purpose of keeping away foreign products, and making Canada a close preserve for the manufacturers of Canada. We want to have Canada for the Canadians; but has that been the result of the policy? Take the case of importations. The following table shows the importations in 1879 and 1883 of a number of leading articles:

Carriages.....	106,946	202,606
Clocks.....	61,405	136,345
Brooms.....	41,345	112,359
Boots and shoes.....	200,150	216,205
Blankets.....	201,070	265,956
Furniture.....	247,970	264,361
Pianos.....	289,631	371,323
Stoves.....	34,212	49,043
Sewing machines.....	126,262	323,197
Hats and caps.....	938,583	1,364,558
Files and rasps.....	49,664	106,341
Whips, etc.....	3,383	56,237

So that, as regards a large number of manufacturing industries, the importations have increased, under the operation of the National Policy. The hon. gentleman, after doubling the taxation of the country, assured us that Canada was still the most lightly taxed country in the world, or very nearly so, and he referred to the amount of revenue and expenditure in the Australian colonies, and showed how very heavily they were taxed as compared with Canada. That was, in my opinion, a most disingenuous comparison. The hon. gentleman knows that no comparison can be instituted between Canada and the Australian colonies in the way he suggested. He knows that there the railways and the telegraphs are public property; he knows that the cost of running those railways is charged as ordinary expenditure, and that every dollar paid for freight and passenger tickets on a road is marked as revenue. He also knows that in those colonies they have no such thing as capital account, that the whole expenditure of the Government for the year is charged as ordinary expenditure. He knows that he himself has expended during the past year $67,000,000 instead of $31,000,000; that, by keeping a capital account, he has charged $37,000,000 of expenditure during the past year to that account which, in the Australian colonies, would be charged as ordinary expenditure. In order to institute a comparison it is necessary not only to see what has been expended on capital account and what has been charged as ordinary expenditure, but also what has been expended in operating every railway and telegraph in the country; and to charge that as Government expenditure. It would be necessary to ascertain the exact expenditure of every Province of the Dominion for municipal and local purposes as well as for ordinary provincial purposes, and to charge that as the ordinary expenses of the Dominion. I will hastily run over some of the receipts and expenditures of these Australian colonies. I find that in New Zealand they have a population of 540,000; that their revenue is £3,700,000 and their expenditure £3,800,000; that they own 1,370 miles of railway, and that £888,000 of the expenditure is expended in operating this railway. Their expenditure on telegraphs is over £40,000, and their earnings from railways, which appear as part of the revenue, is £1,260,000, and their income from telegraphs nearly £93,000; that from registration fees they have an income of £37,000, from land sales £320,000, and their postal revenue is £177,000; that their Customs duties amount to £1,396,000, and their Excise to £57,000. In fact, a large portion of their expenditures are not expenditures upon works that would here be regarded as ordinary Government expenditure, and that a large part of their income is derived from other sources than that of taxation. Let me take some of the expenses of that colony which are not expenditures with us at all, but are expended by the Provinces. Education, £313,000; railway surveys, £13,000; ordinary roads, £202,000; gold field roads, £26,000; water works, £16,000; gaols and other public buildings, £165,000. Here is a total of local expenditures of nearly £800,000, besides the large expenditure of nearly £900,000 on railways. Now it is clear that, if we deduct those expenditures from the ordinary expenditures of Government, the expenditure of Government in New Zealand is reduced to very nearly the same proportions as in Canada. The hon. gentleman gave us a statement of the revenue and expenditure in the colony of Victoria. I find that Victoria has a population of 915,000, a revenue of £5,600,000, an expenditure of £5,600,000, imports of £18,700,000, exports of £16,100,000; that it has 1,400 miles of railway built, and 7,000 miles of telegraph in operation. It expends on railways £1,098,000 a year, and has a revenue from railways of £1,781,000. In fact, its railway pays expenses and affords a revenue of £600,000 in addition. It has from post offices and telegraphs a revenue of £311,000; a territorial revenue from land sales of £700,000; its Customs duties are £1,871,000, and its Excise £552,000. The Customs duties are almost exactly 10 per cent. on the importations, so that, although Victoria is a protective colony, its taxation from Customs duties is very much less than the taxation of Canada.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Oh.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman says "oh."

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The gross amount is far ahead.

Mr. MILLS. The imports amount to £18,748,000, and the Customs duties to £1,871,000, or 10 per cent. as nearly as may be. Now, look at the expenditures of Victoria. It expends annually on railways £1,209,000; £55,000 on agriculture; telegraphs, £39,000; charitable institutions, £110,000; municipal subsidies, £310,000; education, £578,000; gaols, £57,000; reformatory schools, £52,000, insane hospitals, £99,000, and irrigation, £27,000. Here is an expenditure of more than half the total expenditure of Victoria for operating railways and for expenditures that are here assumed by the Provinces, and yet the hon. gentleman, in the statement he made to the House, included the railway expenditures, the telegraph expenditures, the expenditures that here would be charged to capital account, and the expenditures that here would fall to the lot of the Provinces, and he compares the gross revenue of that Province with the Customs duties and the ordinary taxation of this Dominion. Then, if we take New South Wales, we find it has a population of 840,000; imports, £21,000,000; exports, £16,750,000; that it has 1,400 miles of railway completed and 504 miles partly completed, and 16,000 miles of telegraph, that cost £524,000. It has a revenue of £7,900,000 sterling. It has an expenditure of £6,350,000. Now, when I look at its taxation, I find the Customs duties are £1,632,000, and the Excise duties £5,000. In fact, New South Wales has a tax on its imports of 8 per cent. Now, the hon. gentleman informed the House that these people were more highly taxed than we are, yet we find that the larger portion of their revenues is not a tax at all. They have a revenue from land of £1,480,000; from land sales and occupation rents of £723,350; income from railways, telegraphs and other sources of service, £2,720,000. Now, I find that, when I look at their expenses, they expend on public instruction, £530,000; for operating railways, £750,000; for operating telegraphs, £130,000, yearly. Yet the hon. gentleman institutes a comparison between the expenses of those Provinces, which have these extraordinary sources of income, and the Dominion of Canada. I might go over Queensland. I find that the taxation on its imports is 10 per cent., and there is just the same concealment of facts. Did the hon. gentleman tell the House that a large portion of this expenditure was expenditure that falls to the Provinces?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I practically did.

Mr. MILLS. Did the hon. gentleman say that a large portion of their expenditure was for railways, such as the Grand Trunk Railway, the Great Western, the Canada Southern and other roads of that sort?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman knows that if he were to charge the expenditure on the Grand Trunk Railway to the ordinary expenditure of the country, he would add $16,000,000 on that one item alone. If he were to add all the railway and telegraph expenditures of the Dominion to that of the Government, and add the Local Legislatures also, then he might institute a comparison. The hon. gentleman's comparison was not a candid comparison; it was one calculated to mislead the House and the country. Sir, it has had that effect already, for we find the press which supports the hon. gentleman is already declaring that Canada is one of the most lightly taxed countries in the world.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear. That is true.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman says "hear hear," and yet the facts from every one of those Provinces, with the single exceptions of Tasmania and New Zealand, are against his statement. If the hon. gentleman deducts the expenditure on railways and telegraphs, which more than pay expenses; if he deducts the income from the ordinary charges of the Government; if he deducts the charges for education, public works, gaols and things of this sort, that here fall to the Provinces, he will find that there is a very much smaller expenditure both in Victoria, in New South Wales, in Queensland, and in South Australia, than we have here in Canada. The hon. gentleman also instituted a comparison between Norway and Sweden and Canada. If the hon. gentleman should deduct the expenditure in those countries for the diplomatic service, for the navies and the armies, he will then have a very much larger expenditure—

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Are they not taxes on that country?

Mr. MILLS. Certainly they are taxes, and I am not disputing the fact that they are taxes. But I am pointing out the fact that, so far as these countries are concerned, the hon. gentleman has instituted an unfair comparison. They are not situated as we are; they are not seeking for immigration.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I was answering the charge made by a gentleman opposite.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman was doing a good deal more than that. He was conveying an impression that was not consistent with the facts. The impression which the hon. gentleman's speech was calculated to make, and which it did make, is at variance with the facts.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Not at all. I will prove the contrary.

Mr. MILLS. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman says that this policy of his has not affected the carrying trade from the western States through Canada to Europe. I contest that statement; I say that it has. I say the Trade and Navigation returns show that the trade of Canada in that particular has been seriously affected by the policy the hon. gentleman has pursued. I take the wheat, corn and oats that have been imported into Canada and in part exported to Europe, and I find that in 1876 there were 10,000,000 bushels carried; in 1877, 14,800,000; in 1878, 15,331,919; in 1882, 6,900,000. Now, if the carrying trade had increased in the same proportion as the total American trade in broadstuffs, it would have been 16,000,000. In 1883 it was 7,600,000 instead of 17,300,000, and in 1884 it was 9,630,000 instead of 15,000,000. So the hon. gentleman will see that the carrying of grain through the canals and waterways of Canada from the west to Europe, has been very seriously affected by his tariff policy, that it was not at all as large as it was formerly, and that it is much less than it ought to have been if the same percentage had been preserved. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman has stated that the industries had been diversified. The hon. member for Cardwell and other hon. gentlemen on that side have spoken of the necessity of diversifying our industries—that we ought not to be hewers of wood and drawers of water, and that we ought to engage in manufacturing pursuits, and furnish other employment to our population than that of cultivating farms and clearing forests. The hon. gentleman quite forgets the condition of things that existed in this country even as early as 1871. Now, I find, by the census of 1871, that we manufactured, of the woollen goods consumed in Canada, 84 per cent.; of Canadian cotton goods, 28 per cent.; of boots and shoes, 99.1 per cent.; of rubber goods, 81 per cent.; of harnesses and saddles, 99 per cent.; of carriages, 98.91 per cent.; of furniture, 97 per cent.; of agricultural implements, 95.1 per cent.; of hardware and nails, 99.5 per cent. Now, in all these respects, with the single exception of the cotton manufactures, we are to-day manufacturing no greater percentage of the goods consumed in the country than we were manufacturing at that particular time. It is not a fact, as stated by the report which the hon. gentleman laid on the

Mr. MILLS.

Table, that we are manufacturing to-day $5,200,000 worth more goods in the country than we were manufacturing in 1876. The hon. gentleman increased that amount by 50 per cent.; he made it $79,561,125. I deny, Sir, that there is any such increase in the product and manufactured goods in this country. Let us look at the facts: In 1870 we imported $70,415,000 worth of goods; in 1873-74, when our importations were very large, we imported $128,213,000 worth of goods. There was a variation between the lowest point of importation and the highest point of $57,750,000. In 1878 there were $91,000,000 worth of goods imported; in 1882 there were $132,000,000 worth imported. There was a variation between the two periods of $41,000,000. Now, if there had been a corresponding increase of importation since 1878 there ought to have been $157,000,000 worth of importations, making allowance for the growth of wealth and population in the country, instead of $132,000,000. Now, that would indicate a displacement, not of $79,000,000, as the hon. gentleman says, but of $25,000,000 worth of goods. So that would indicate the increase was not very greatly in excess of the natural increase, allowing the same percentage of growth that prevailed between 1871 and 1878. Now, according to the hon. gentleman's mode of calculation, that would represent an increase of industrial population, not of 51,800, as the hon. gentleman reports to the House, but of 15,125. But this increase of 15,125 and the persons dependent upon it was secured by the expulsion from the country of upwards of 200,000 of our population in excess of what the ordinary exodus from the country had been. The hon. Finance Minister admitted that he had taxed the country largely in excess of the actual requirements of the State; but he said this, that it should not be counted as taxation on the people because it was unnecessary taxation. The Government did not require it for public purposes, and it should, therefore, be left out of account altogether. The argument of the hon. gentleman reminded me of an anecdote told of Curran, when engaged in a duel with a rival at the bar, who was very much larger than himself, and who complained that because of his large size he was more likely to be hit. Said Curran "I will chalk out my size upon you, and all shots that hit outside the chalk mark I will not count." The Finance Minister adopted very much the same policy. He collects an amount of taxes largely in excess of the requirements of the State, and says that because he did not require it, we should not count that as taxation at all. It is outside the chalk mark. The present condition of the country shows very clearly what the hon. gentleman has accomplished by his tariff. He has neither attracted thousands of emigrants from abroad nor millions of money. But he has misdirected a large amount of capital already in the country. He has withdrawn capital from one industry to be invested in another, and there are to-day millions of dollars invested in manufacturing establishments that are standing idle; and if those who have spent their money could get it again, they would not invest it in the enterprises in which it is now locked up. The hon. gentleman knows that the cotton mills of Canada to-day could produce, by working three days and a-half, as much cotton as Canada could consume, and during two days and a-half the mills must stand idle or a foreign trade must be had. It is plain, therefore, that one-third of the entire capital invested in cotton mills is wasted; that it is invested in a business which cannot pay, in a manner in which it cannot be profitably employed. If it had not been for the tariff this capital might have been profitably turned to some other business. But in consequence of the high profits which the hon. Finance Minister was able to secure for the investors during a very short time, a large amount of capital has been invested; and there are to-day in Hamilton, I am informed, establishments now standing idle which are in the market for sale and for which no purchaser can be found. The hon. gentleman, then, has disarranged industries. He has rendered employment in those various industries uncertain; he has introduced into the cities a large population whose means of subsistence is extremely precarious, and who may, for a considerable portion of the year, be obliged to depend on another portion of the population for means of subsistence. This is what the hon. gentleman has accomplished; and he has accomplished nothing more. We never said that a 17½ per cent. tariff was just enough and that no more ought to be imposed. All we ever contended for was this: That the rate of taxation should be such as to meet the requirements of the State; that it should be imposed in such a way as to interfere with commerce and industry as little as possible; that it should be fairly distributed over the different Provinces, in the proportion of their ability to pay it, and among the population of the country on precisely the same principle. I am perfectly aware that we cannot get back to precisely the position we occupied in 1878. Our liabilities have been enormously increased; a high rate of taxation is necessary to meet our obligations; but this we do know, that the taxation during the past five or six years has been far beyond the requirements of the State. The Finance Minister knows right well, according to his own statement, that he has taken from the people of this country $20,000,000 which he did not require. He has assumed that this money, in the pockets of those to whom it rightly belonged, would not be so wisely and well employed as if it were in the possession of the Government. We know how the hon. gentleman expended the public money. We know what income the country is deriving from that expenditure; we know right well that if the people of the country could not have made a better use of those $20,000,000 than the Government have done during the past six years, then there is very little hope of the prosperity of the country in time to come. Hon. gentlemen opposite have accomplished none of the things they promised. They said they would prevent the exodus from continuing. We have seen it increase fourfold.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, oh.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman laughs, but I say it is so. The hon. gentleman himself had no warrant for the statement he made in 1878. Not only has the expenditure of the country been enormously increased, but the progress of the country has been seriously retarded. The country is less prosperous than it otherwise would have been. The hon. gentleman promised he would introduce millions of money into this country. Those millions had not been forthcoming. The hon. gentleman said there was no limit to the number of skilled laborers that might find employment here; that the capital of the world was to flow into Canada, and the laborers of the world were to come here, in order that that capital might find profitable employment. Farmers were to find a home market for what they produced. There has not been established a home market. They export more largely than they did before. They get lower prices. The hon. gentleman promised there would always be good wages for the laborers. But the hon. gentleman dared not meet the laborers in Montreal. The First Minister in 1878, met those men; but in Montreal, when they were anxious for employment and wanted to know what the hon. gentleman was going to do, he could not see them; he was not quite prepared to answer that difficult question. How is the hon. gentleman going to give employment to the hundred thousands of our population out of employment now? The hon. gentleman knows right well that at no distant day those people will not trouble him; 300,000 have crossed the border already; 200,000 are in the State of Michigan. We read accounts during the past summer of people in the cities of southern Europe fleeing on account of the pestilence; and our population is fleeing in much the same way from the country since it has fallen into the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite. There is a pestilence in the country; the disease is on the Treasury benches, and it is most desirable that the country should get rid of it. I have not the least doubt that when the time comes, when the consequences of the hon. gentlemen's policy becomes fully known, when the depression has reached its lowest point, the public will realise fully the blessings that the hon. gentlemen have been able to confer on them. They are like the blessings conferred in the story told by the Duchess of Orleans upon her favorite child—they mingle a curse with all their blessings. The population of our towns and cities has been reduced, factories are closed, and many of them have gone into insolvency, and a large number of the cotton mills have never been opened, and the hon. gentlemen have increased the cost of government by $10,000,000. These are the things which those hon. gentlemen have accomplished since they have taken possession of the Treasury benches.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not rise for the purpose of making a speech. The hon. gentleman has repeated what I had heard before; he says I was afraid to meet the workmen of Montreal. Now, no workman ever asked to see me, ever came to see me, ever sent a letter asking to see me, nor did they go to see my secretary. It is an utter falsehood. The day I left—an hour before I left Montreal, I found some resolutions enclosed in some blank envelopes, just before I took my passage back to Ottawa.

Mr. CURRAN. The debate has been going on for some days past and has extended to such a length that, for my part, I shall endeavor to confine my remarks to a very few points. I think what has transpired since the opening of the discussion, especially by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), that the Minister of Finance has reason to feel exceedingly proud of the position he occupies at the present moment. We were told by that hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) that it had been understood and arranged that each in succession of the gentlemen on the other side of the House would choose a certain section from the Finance Minister's most admirable speech, which they intended to dissect, thereby admitting that it required the whole phalanx of the party to meet the statements he had made. I cannot, however, congratulate hon. gentlemen themselves upon manner in which they have subdivided the work, because, like the last speaker on their side—who, no doubt, enjoys a very high reputation among his friends, and perhaps deservedly so—they do not appear to have been able to confine themselves to any one branch. Like him they have spoken de omnibus rebus; we have heard of everything concerning, and what does not concern, the debate just now going on, from the Reciprocity Treaty down to the Washington Treaty, and the statements which are said to appear in the report of the commissioners upon the manufacturing industries of the country. There are matters said to appear there which do not appear there, and it is stated that allegations are made in that report when no such allegations appear in it. We have, moreover, the concluding part of the speech of the hon. gentleman, which I will undertake to show, before I get through, is wholly unfounded, as has been truthfully stated by the right hon. the Prime Minister of the Dominion, with regard to the—I may say—infamous falsehoods telegraphed over the length and breadth of the Dominion, with regard to public meetings, said to have been held in the city of Montreal, by the workmen. I say there was no meeting held within the limits of the city of Montreal by any workmen, or by any body whatsoever, having any claim or right to represent them; just as there never was, at the dinner or the magnificent demonstration given in that city, a single man who either approached the president who occupied the chair, or any of the city members, or any officers of the Junior Conservative Club—not one man who showed himself on the night of that magnificent banquet on behalf of any organisation of workingmen. And yet these people, after being convicted, as they have been by the press of the country, endeavor to repeat and reiterate what they know is not true; they have the audacity to come on the floor of this House and endeavor once more to disseminate these falsehoods throughout this country. And there is something more upon which the hon. Finance Minister has reason to feel proud and to congratulate himself. We have heard, not only in the beginning of this debate, but from the last speaker, of the enviable position held by New South Wales as compared with the Dominion of Canada. Now, Sir, it is not often that while a debate is going on, while a subject is still under consideration, a gentleman occupying the position of the Finance Minister finds himself sustained by the leading organ of the party opposed to him; nevertheless, gentlemen opposite are actually convicted out of the very publication that appears in that organ. I shall now read an extract which confirms in every particular the statement made by the Finance Minister a few evenings ago, taken from the Toronto Globe of to-day. Speaking of the floating of the loan, that paper says:

"We stated, soon after the Canadian Finance Minister put the last loan on the market, that the greater part of it was taken up by the financial agents and persons acting for them or with them."

That has been shown not to be true. The article goes on:

"It is scarcely pretended now that the public subscriptions amounted to more than two million pounds of the five millions offered."

The Finance Minister has shown, and the Public Accounts show, that £800,000 were held by these agents, and not one cent more. It goes on:

"A quarrel between the Government of New South Wales and the Bank of New South Wales, in London, respecting the issue of new loans, caused the bank to reveal how such matters are manipulated. The last New South Wales loan seemed to have been very successfully negotiated. The price obtained for the 3½ per cent. debentures was much higher than that obtained for the Canadian securities of the same denomination a few months before. In one of the letters written by the bank directors to the Government, they say:

"More than one of the recent loans of the colony, as you are aware, must have been publicly declared as marked failures, had we not, at your request, and to the extent of millions of money, directly and indirectly, upheld the credit of your securities." And in another letter the bank directors assert that they were instrumental in 'absolutely saving two of your (the Government's) loans from absolute failure.'"

Here is the confirmation almost verbatim of the statement made by the Finance Minister a few evenings ago, in reply to the strictures of the other side, wherein he said that a syndicate of bankers had bolstered and protected and thrown their mantle over New South Wales, and it was on that account that New South Wales had ranked so high as compared with Canada. But here we have, published in the organ of the Opposition, the confirmation of the words of the Minister of Finance, and we have the utter condemnation of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. Now, Sir, it is not my intention, at this hour of the night, to follow the hon. gentleman through his remarks regarding the question of reciprocity. I do not think, if the public do any of us the honor of perusing the speeches we are making in this debate, that what he has stated with reference to the policy of this Government on the question of reciprocity, and more particularly what he has urged with regard to protection in this country being a barrier to reciprocity, will receive the acceptance of one sensible man in the length and breadth of the Dominion. There is no Canadian, at all events, who has a manly heart in his breast, there is no man who feels the dignity of his position as a citizen of this Dominion, who will concur in the suggestion that we should show ourselves the humble, obsequious beseechers of the Government on the other side of the line; that we should exhibit four thorough self-abasement; that we must not for one moment think of protecting ourselves or of erecting any kind of barrier; that we should not dream of giving them the slightest offence; because, if we are sufficiently humble, if we are sufficiently servile, if we sufficiently forget our manhood, some fine day, perhaps, they may extend to us a benevolent and a merciful hand. Now, we have had also a reference by the hon. gentleman to the question of the Washington Treaty. I must say, for my part, that I am not sufficiently bright, intellectually, to see exactly how the hon. gentleman has wedged that question into this discussion; and not being able to discover the precise connecting link, I shall leave that subject, with several others of a similar nature, altogether untouched on this occasion. There was one subject, however, upon which the hon. gentleman was particularly unhappy. He tried to be very funny. He tells us he sent out a man to scour the country and to find out the value of the report which had been laid on the Table by the Government, with regard to the manufacturing industries of the country. It would seem to me, from the results obtained by that gentleman, whoever he may be, that he was more bent on finding the best means of turning a pun or making a joke than on learning the truth regarding the accuracy of this report. I hold in my hand at this moment this report with regard to the city of London, which my hon. friend opposite solemnly asserted was worthless, because therein it was alleged, amongst other things, that there was an oil-cloth factory in that city; and, said he, I find, after rambling about, that I could not stumble on any such institution. Well, I will allow the hon. gentleman, if he wishes, to accompany his friend and go pari passu with him through that report, and he will not stumble upon that oil-cloth factory there either. There is no such mention of any such manufactory. Here is the report, which I shall be most happy to send across the floor.

Mr. MILLS. I saw the report here in manuscript; I copied the statement myself; and if it is not in the report now, then the report as printed is not the report as laid on the Table.

Mr. CURRAN. All I can say is, here is the report. I am afraid there must be some cause for the difficulty about this original gentleman whom he sent out to discover these particular institutions. I will not say what it was or what it was not—whether he saw two institutions where there was but one, or whether he was so blind that he could not see anything at all. At all events, here is the document, and I send my statement to the country, along with the statement of the hon. gentleman; and I say, if all he has said to night is to be judged by the standard of this misrepresentation, his speech will not be of much avail.

Mr. MILLS. There is no misrepresentation.

Mr. BOWELL. You copied too far; that is all. You took the oil-cloth factory in the city of Kingston at the end of the London list.

Mr. CURRAN. I am much obliged to the hon. Minister. I was going to reserve that until the end of my speech. I thought I would leave the hon. gentleman in suspense for a little while, and then bring him around again. Really, Mr. Speaker, one would naturally have expected, from the experience we have had for some years past, that these hon. gentlemen would have come before this House rather as making an act of contrition than in the attitude in which they appear before us to-night. However, there are some people who cannot realise accomplished facts. The enemies of the old Bourbons used to say that they never forgot anything because they never could learn anything, and it would appear that the affliction which befell that unfortunate dynasty is really the one which has befallen the hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, we have been told to-night by the hon. gentleman who spoke last, that we falsely assert that they have been in the habit of maligning the policy of the Government. I say we never have indulged in any such assertion. It is their right to attack the policy of the Government; they may slander the policy of the Government if they like; but what we have complained of, what we complain of now, and what, no doubt, we shall be called upon to complain of in the future, is not that they have slandered the policy of the Government, but that they have slandered the people of this country and the country itself. I have no desire to utter one sentence here which I cannot substantiate. Allow me, Sir, to quote the following words; and I trust that such of the people of this country as will do me the honor of perusing these remarks, will ask themselves can this be possible?

"The parties who are to blame, to say the truth, are no doubt the majority of the electors of the people of Canada, who were ill-advised enough, knowing the antecedents of the First Minister, to elect him to the important office which he now holds, and to confirm him again in 1882. That these unfortunate people are likely to pay a most heavy penalty for their folly will be, I am afraid, only too clearly shown when we have an opportunity of perusing the Public Accounts, and holding some further discussion on the result of the follies they themselves have committed. But if we are to blush for anybody, it is not for Her Majesty's officers, but for that portion of the people of Canada who had so little sense of public honor and self-respect as, after what the hon. gentleman has done, to again intrust him with further powers of injuring his country."

That is a part of the hon. ex-Finance Minister's speech, a speech not delivered in the heat of argument, not uttered under the excitement of the moment, not caused by some sudden outburst, but spoken in cold blood, with calm deliberation and premeditation, when the debate was first opened here this Session, in reply to the Address. There was no occasion then for any such outburst, there was no provocation given then, but he hurled this insult, not at the policy of the Government, not at the officers of the Government, not at any member of the Government, but at the people; for he tells us we have to blush for the people of Canada, who are lost to honor and self-respect. Now, Sir, in the course of a speech delivered a few evenings ago by the ex-Minister of Finance, he referred, amongst other things, to a number of tests by which to establish the state of the country. He took the school statistics as one means of showing that the country was going to the dogs. Well, the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), I think, established pretty clearly the accuracy of the statistical reports upon which the argument of the hon. gentleman was based. He showed that they were of no value; he showed that they had not changed in certain localities, year after year; he showed that precisely the same number of pupils were supposed to be at school, year after year—an absolute impossibility. And my opinion is, that these reports were gotten up very much like the old sedentary militia reports that were sent in, year after year, in former times; when if we had, at any moment, wished to call on these brave defenders of their country, who were returned to the Government as being ready to die for the land, the response to be given by many of those who were marked in the list would not have been given to any other sound than that of the trumpet of the archangel. One-half of them, no doubt, were in their graves, and had been there for years. Just as these sedentary militia reports were valueless, so these school reports, as the hon. member for Cardwell has pointed out, are incorrect on the face of them. But the hon. gentleman said that he was perfectly willing to take the statistics of the Province of Quebec. He suddenly discovered it himself, and I hope it will be his permanent state, a reverence and love and affection for the clergy of Lower Canada. He was anxious to see their statistics; upon them he would place the most implicit reliance, and he hoped that some gentleman would take upon himself the duty of procuring from that source of infallibility the documents that would show exactly in what condition the Province of Quebec found itself; and with that prophetic spell which was upon him, with that insight into the future which characterises him generally, he had no doubt, not even the slightest doubt, but that the same state of affairs, the same blue ruin, and the same decay he professed to have found in Ontario would also be found to exist in the Province of Quebec. Well, Sir, I sent down to the city of Montreal, that great centre of the National Policy, that point which must suffer from it more than any other, because that is the place in which it comes more actively into play, and in which its results must be manifest—I sent down to Montreal and procured the report of the Catholic school commissioners. I asked for that report, not only for the past two years, but from the year 1877. Those reports contain those schools which are directly under the control of the Catholic school commissioners in Montreal. There are numerous Catholic schools just as there are numerous Protestant schools which are not under the control of the one board or the other; there are there as many schools outside, perhaps, as there are in this particular class; but as a matter of statistics, as going straight to the class we desire to reach and finding out what is the actual state of prosperity or ruin of the people, I do not believe there is a more faithful record to be had in the Dominion than the paper I am about to read. I have these reports, and they are for the consideration of any gentleman who may wish to take communication of them. My friend Mr. Edward Murphy, one of the school commissioners, who acts jointly with the clergy, because there are both laymen and clergymen on the board, sends me this statement:

"I send this statement to show the progressive school increase in school attendance. From 6,405, in 1877, it increased to 7,005, in 1881; from 7,316, in 1882, it increased to 9,932, in 1884. This is the attendance at the commissioners' schools and those assisted by them. There are, of course, a great many others independent of the commissioners, but the report of the commissioners shows an increase in school attendance from 6,405, in 1877, to 9,932, in 1884, or 55 per cent. in seven years."

Now I shall go a little further. I was anxious to find something about the independent schools. I could not be supposed to go to each school, although I might point out here some of the establishments that would really strengthen this, such as the St. Ann's school, in the St. Ann's ward, in my own district where the pupils have doubled. But I went to the Christian Brothers, a body of teachers who have schools all over the Province. I said to them: I would like to find out what is the exact state of the various schools under your control at present, and what was their condition in 1877. I found that in 1880—that was the report that the reverend gentleman could lay his hands upon at that moment, and I was coming away, and had to take what I could get—there were 10,000 pupils in the schools in different parts of the Province, controlled by the Christian Brothers. Since that time these gentlemen have had to close their establishments at Chambly, Côte des Neiges, Beauharnois, and St. Thomas de Montmagny, on account of the rapidly increasing attendance in the other establishments under their control. They had not the teachers necessary to maintain those schools, as they had to devote them to the rapidly increasing establishments in other parts. These four establishments had 1,200 pupils when they gave them up to lay teachers; and yet, although they had four schools less than in 1880, they have 10,300 pupils in 1884. The same gentleman who furnished me with statistical information regarding commissioners' schools also directed my attention to our own City and District Savings Bank. We have had a good deal of discussion as to the value of statistics with regard to the Dominion Post Office Savings Bank. We have been told that these Dominion savings banks are a cause of drawing away money from the commerce of the country. Well, let us, first of all, take a bird's-eye view of this institution, see what progress has attended it or what ruin and decay has overtaken it. The depositors in the City and District Savings Bank have steadily increased from 1877 to the present date. On the 31st December, 1877, the amount of deposits was $3,385,765, and the number of depositors

17,203. On the 31st December, 1883, the amount of deposits had gone up to $6,212,635, and the number of depositors had increased to 29,756. On the 31st December, 1884, the amount of deposits had gone on still further, and the amount was $6,328,093, and the number of depositors had increased to 31,241; and, as the report comes still further down, as we have still to show, now, in the middle of winter, what is the state of affairs, we find that on the 28th of February last the deposits had increased to $6,596,000, and the number of depositors had risen from 31,241, in the space of two months, to 31,906. These are figures which are utterly uncontrovertible, but it may be well to ask what is the interest paid upon the deposits? What is it that induces people to take the money out of commerce and put it there? Is it the large and overwhelming interest paid, which induces people to lodge their money on deposit, in order to make more than they could in any legitimate undertaking? Why, the interest is 3 per cent. The average deposit is $200, or less. It is the money of the mechanic, of the servant, of the small trader, of those who value that institution perhaps even more than the Government institutions. They have learned to know it and to love it; they have confidence in it; it is a standing monument of what an institution can grow to when it has the confidence of the people, and it is for that reason we find people depositing their money there and not because they are induced to draw it out of trade or commerce. Here we have this magnificent exhibit; we have this school attendance; we have this evidence of thrift, of industry, of sobriety, of the love of learning, of everything that contributes to make a people good, and that, in time, will make a people great. I ask you, Sir, in the face of these facts, need we blush for these people? Are they people without self-respect, people without honor, people for whom the members of this House need have a blush of shame upon their faces? If it were parliamentary to say so, if I dared say so here, might I not rather retort and say that the people who have thus been maligned and slandered might well stand up and say, that if there was any cause for shame, any cause for blushing, or any cause for feeling a sentiment of degradation in our land, it was that a constituency could be found in this Dominion to return a man to this House who would use such language. But there is more than all that. These figures answer an argument that has been used here. We were told the other night, by a gentleman who felt the prophetic spirit moving him, exactly the time and the date when this country was to fall to pieces. We were told the number of years it was to take. Well, we know that it is stated that as two suns cannot shine in the firmament at the same time, so two equally great men cannot figure in the same sphere in the same country at the same moment. It was a dangerous thing, now that we have Wiggins, the weather prophet, in this country, that we should have this other prophet springing up. It is a terrible thing. But there is the fact. What becomes of this prophecy that in eighteen years the workingmen and women in this Dominion are going to be wiped out of existence, are going to be taxed out of existence; are going to be ground literally out of existence by the exactions of this terrible Government with this terrible National Policy? With the progression which is going on in the school attendance and the doubling up of the millions in the savings banks of the workers, what is going to become of this prophecy? Now, Sir, we had a statement made that the workingmen of Montreal had shown that they did not appreciate the right hon. Premier. I have said, in my opening remarks, that when the hon. gentleman on the other side had made an allusion to this statement, he alleged what he ought, at all events, to have known was utterly untrue. I say, Sir, that I know full well that sometime before that great demonstration took place there was a movement sought to be put on foot by a small number of people in the city of Montreal, to counteract that magnificent demonstration. But, Sir, a gentleman who is now in his grave, who was an honor to his country, whose loss was a terrible loss to the party opposite—the late Thomas Cramp, of Montreal—said: “Don’t attempt it, gentlemen; don’t do it. The people of this country may not all follow Sir John A. Macdonald, but every man in the country, with the exception of a few, love and admire and respect him.” Sir, that little movement was crushed, that was nipped in the bud. The ward politicians who thought they could bring it to a focus, were told: The indignation of the people will wipe you out of existence. You may cause a few broken heads of your victims; perhaps you will interfere with the demonstration, but that demonstration will take place. Sir, I do not speak merely of the magnificent banquet at that celebration, where were met together the citizens of Montreal, the delegations from different parts of the Province, and people from other Provinces—not the rich men alone, not the great manufacturers alone, not the great merchants and bankers and others, but men whom I know are hard-working men, men who earn their bread by the sweat of their brow, went there to do honor to the old chieftain whom they were proud to hail as the father of his country. I say not merely at that great dinner but in that grand celebration that was held in the streets of Montreal, where all took part, where the city turned out as one man, where the streets were one blaze of light, where no effort could resist the grand outburst of enthusiastic demonstration—I say that on that occasion there was an attempt made to belittle the meaning and significance of that great uprising, for whilst that was going on the agent of the Toronto Globe met in solemn conclave with some persons whose characters I have had the pleasure of dissecting on another occasion, and these parties, professing to represent the workmen of the city of Montreal, and meeting in the municipality of St. Cunegonde, outside the city limits, undertook to put up a little job of sending a deputation to wait on the Premier—not at the Windsor Hotel, however; they dare not show themselves there; there was not a workman in Montreal who would not have been insulted by one of these men calling themselves his representative. They did not venture to go to the Windsor, but they sent a report broadcast that they had done so. Then they had a meeting a few nights afterwards, which I took the liberty of attending myself, in which they sought to ventilate this matter still further. Then it was announced in the Globe that the largest hall in the city of Montreal had been engaged. But it was the little hall of St. Cunegonde, a place that had been used as a small chapel a few years ago and had been converted into a public hall; it was outside the city limits. Who were there? How many workmen were there? Look at the names of the men on the platform. Workmen! Why, Sir, the thing is absurd. There was, however, one gentleman there, a personal friend of mine, although a political opponent. And what did he state at that public meeting, and in presence of those who were assembled there? I speak of Mr. L. O. David, a gentleman at all events on whose statements we can rely. He stood up in that meeting and he said: “Gentlemen, if this party now in power goes to the people again, with protection as their policy, and my party goes to the polls again with their old flag, I cannot go back upon my own party, I cannot work against them, but I am a protectionist in principle and I will stay at home. I shall be neutral, for I could not embark in that contest, I could not throw my voice and influence against the policy which I consider to be for the best interests of the country.” I spoke to those people there; the audience was not very numerous, and I said: Here, in this place, outside the city of Montreal, we know there may be, we know there is, a certain amount of depression.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CURRAN. Yes, you will hear a good deal before I get through. I said: What about these factories? What about these foundries? What about these industrial establishments on the very ground we stand upon? I say there is not one of them that is not open and in full blast at this very moment. That statement remained unchallenged. And, Sir, what did I find the Saturday before we opened the present Session? I happened to look at the Montreal Witness, the Free Trade paper par excellence of this Dominion, the paper that has never hauled down its Free Trade flag, the paper that has complained of the vacillating policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite, the paper that has told them they were trying to sail under false colors, that they ought to come out and take their stand boldly—and I am glad to see they are taking it now—what did that paper state, with reference to this very locality where that meeting was held? Under the heading "St. Cunegonde News," it said:

"Considerable building improvements are contemplated in the spring. More house accommodation is urgently needed. The several industries of the municipality are on full time, and there is no scarcity of employment. The Dominion tin factory employs 100 hands."

Now, Sir, I think testimony of this kind is really of some value in a discussion such as the present one, for we are now appealing far more directly to the hearts and minds of the people of this Dominion than we could do in reference to any speculation on the question of reciprocity or in the resur-rection of speculations upon the Washington Treaty. However, we were favored some time ago by a visit of the ex-Finance Minister to the city of Montreal. He went there to air his grievances, and amongst other things he said:

"I am, I admit, these men's determined enemy, and I am not so by reason of their assaults upon myself, though they have been uninterrupted since the time I took office. Providence sometimes tempers the wind to the shorn lamb, and having inherited an Irish constitution and an Irish temperament, and it may be some sense of humor, I must confess I rather enjoy the attacks made upon me."

This is from the Globe report of the speech of the ex-Finance Minister, delivered at Queen's Hall. He says he rather enjoyed those attacks. Well, I rather enjoy a part of that speech. It reminded me of what I have often seen before. Now, if there is one thing more than another that I hold in contempt, it is this particular snivelling about the Irish peculiarities of hon. gentlemen opposite, they never have the fit when they are in the hey-day of their prosperity—it suits when they happen to be in the cold shades. Then those people always discover that they have some Irish humor about them, some Irish blood in their veins; that their mother or step-mother was Irish, or something of that kind. And this hon. gentleman, no doubt, imagined he was making a deep impression upon the tender hearts of the Irish-Canadian people in this Dominion when he told them it was his Irish constitution, his Irish temperament, and his Irish humor that made him withstand and enjoy those attacks. I presume that an hon. gentleman who makes an appeal of that kind must, at all events, be following the course of public events in Ireland and elsewhere, wherever the people that he claims to be allied with are concerned. I will take this opportunity of saying that I imagine out of the mouths of those who are considered by the majority of the people to be the best judges of the best interests of Ireland I can convince the hon. gentleman that he is mistaken, in so far as that people goes. I am perfectly aware that very many hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House do not entertain the same views as I do with respect to the value of the opinions of the gentlemen I am about to quote. But, at any rate, so far as regards Irish interests, as compared with the interests of the adjoining country, England, a people of five millions lying alongside a people of thirty millions, as we occupy the position of a people of five millions lying alongside a people of fifty-five millions, there is a considerable parallel between the two cases, and some value must attach to the opinions of those who have studied out the question. I think no man in this country will dispute that Justin McCarthy, the member for Longford, in the Imperial Parliament, the brilliant writer, the author of "The History of Our Own Times," and of many other works of great merit, himself a free trader in principle, is a pretty good judge of the matter in question. I happen to have here under my hand a letter addressed, during the course of last summer, by him, to the editor of the New York Tribune on this very question of free trade and protection, as regards this five million country along side of a thirty million country. I will merely draw this difference in favor of the position of Ireland, that it is lying alongside of a free trade country, while we are placed alongside a country which has double the protection we have. After reciting the story of how the different industries were wiped out, by what statutes and so on, Justin McCarthy says:

"Now, I am not going to discuss the free trade question as an economic doctrine here. I am, myself, a free trader—that is to say, I believe the economic doctrine of free trade is sound, and is destined to prevail everywhere."

Then he goes on to state what is the peculiar position of Ireland, which we all know. This was touched upon by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries this afternoon to some extent, and I need not again go over the ground, but will satisfy myself by making a single quotation. Justin McCarthy further says:

"That is the position which Ireland occupies with regard to free trade and English economics generally. I believe there are some leading Irishmen who go further than this, and have convinced themselves that protection would be for a long time the fitting policy for Ireland. I believe this is Mr. Parnell's opinion, although I do not remember that I have ever had much talk with him on the subject. He is a man who prefers, as a rule, to talk of what is actually going on, and does not much care to anticipate controversies. Mr. John Dillon, I know, is in favor of a policy of protection—for a time at least. On the other hand, we have among prominent Irish politicians many men who, like myself, are free traders on principle; that is, who regard free trade as the principle which will ultimately prevail. But I do not know of one single Irishman who is pledged to free trade as the English doctrinaire is pledged to it, or who would not be quite willing to consider the effects of a different policy upon the Ireland of to-day."

We have, moreover, an interview, dated London, 2nd December, between Mr. Parnell and a reporter of a public journal, which was telegraphed to this side, in the course of which Mr. Parnell says:

"England's unfair competition in trade is a great difficulty. Let me give an instance: Messrs. Lane, of Cork, started a starch manufactory. Coleman, the great English manufacturer, forthwith sent an agent over to Ireland, offering to sell starch 30 shillings per ton less than Lane's prices—in fact, under cost. Messrs. Lane retaliated by advertising their starch in England under Coleman's prices, who was ultimately glad to compromise."

This firm was strong and able to meet the enemy in his own country, and able to triumph. But what about struggling industries? He further says:

"With regard to tariffs, my opinion is that a certain measure of protection against foreign manufactures would benefit Ireland."

I do not think that any man on this side of the House, or any man in this country, who has either advocated or struggled for the introduction and maintenance of this tariff, believes that this protective tariff is perfection itself. No man has ever contended that this doctrine of protection for Canada was going to cure this country of all the evils which are attendant upon human affairs. There is no policy that can be promulgated that will not have such effects. But, all in all, it is the best policy, and the people believe it to be the best policy that could possibly have been inaugurated to take the country out of the slough of despair into which it was plunged, and raise it to the position which it has since occupied. The results prove it, and in the words of John Boyle O'Reilly:

"From soul to soul the shortest line,
At best will bended be;
The ship that sails the straightest course,
Still sails the convex sea."

No matter what you may effect, no matter what the human mind may conceive, there will be something about it that will leave traces of the want of perfection in our nature. But to say—for any man who knows anything about the condition of this country for the past few years—to say that this policy has ruined the people, that this policy has left us in a worse position than we were in in 1877, that it is calculated in eighteen years to wipe us off the face of the earth, to make such a statement, and accompany it by the slanders which are cast in the face of the people, because they have supported this policy and the men who promulgated it—I say is unworthy of any man who considers himself sane—is unworthy of any man who would wish to enjoy the confidence of his fellow-countrymen in any question which he may put before the them. We have had several statements here with regard to different industries. We have had statements, for instance, with regard to the sugar industry. We have had statements with regard to certain importations which could have been made. We have had statements with regard to the prices at which sugar could have been brought here from Greenock, in Scotland, and other points in that country and laid down here. Well, really it is too bad to think that these questions, which are so complex in their nature, which involve not only protection in our own country but protection in Germany and other lands, should be discussed upon such a basis as to say—to show how thoroughly the people of this country are imposed upon, we will bring gentlemen on the platform who will tell you that they could have imported sugar at 1 or $\frac{1}{2}$ a cent per lb. less than it was sold by the manufacturers. We know that the reason why certain qualities of sugar are to be found in the markets of Scotland is on account of the protective policy of Germany, where there is a bounty of $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents per lb. on all beet sugar exported. That is the actual bounty. This sugar, on the other hand, which is referred to, is nearly all of the kind which is equal No. 9 Dutch standard; it is the refuse of the refineries, and it is of so low a grade as to be unsaleable in the Scotch market; and I am told, on an authority which cannot be contradicted—that of a gentleman in Montreal, who has been engaged for years in the grocery trade, who has given great attention to the subject, who has written to the newspapers about it, but who is now out of politics and does not wish his name mentioned—that if we take the prices of both whites and yellows, for the last two years, we will find that the refiners of Canada have been selling at a less price than the same grades have been sold for in the United States.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Take the quotations.

Mr. CURRAN. Take the quotations of the past two years, and I am informed, on this authority, that the prices have ranged in Canada lower for the same grades than in the United States. Sir, this sort of argumentation, as was pointed out by the Minister of Finance, which is employed in certain places, where the people have to be told you are not suffering quite so much as your neighbors, this kind of argument will not go down in Montreal. It will not go down in Halifax, or in Moncton, or in any place where the true state of affairs is known. I know it, because I was there in Montreal; I was there arguing the cause of this policy, when $1,000,000 worth of the finest machinery in this country was lying idle in Point St. Charles; I was there when every third house in that place had "To Let" upon it; I was there when I said to these people: Drive these men out, who have eyes to see and will not see, who have ears to hear and will not hear; drive these men out; they will not listen to the voice of the people; you have rung it into their ears, but they will not listen; drive them out, and in twelve months that factory will be going and giving employment, not only within but without, to the carter, to the cooper, to a host of people outside, besides the two hundred or three hundred or four hundred men who will be employed, not merely in Redpath's great refinery, but in the St. Lawrence refinery; you will have the smoke curling out of tall chimneys, and you will not be, as you have been during the present winter, you will not have but one industry, and that the industry of the soup kitchen. The results proved my assertions. I go still further. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in his effort here the other night, told us that the agricultural interests of Ontario are suffering. We were told by one that the refiners were being destroyed, and now we have another coming forward, as most of them did, with a jeremiad about the agricultural industries. We were told that the statistics were there, and naturally, coming from that source, we thought it was all right; but to speak candidly, when I heard that creamery butter could be bought in the city of Montreal at from 16 to 18 cents a pound, when I have been paying for butter for some years back, and know something about it—I said the man who can say that can say anything. But what are the statistics taken from the annual report of the Ontario Bureau of Industries for 1883, volume 16, part 7, of the Sessional Papers for 1884, No. 55, page 35? Here they are:

Now, Sir, the fact is, that however we view the stand taken by hon. gentlemen opposite, we must come to the conclusion that they are not laboring in the interest of the country in the course they are now pursuing. I have some notes before me with reference to the immigration policy of the Government. I am happy to know that the policy, as now announced, is that no attempt is to be made to induce men of the class of mechanics to come to this country at all; and I see by the documents I have in my hand that nearly all the statements thrown broadcast by the Opposition press, with regard to the immigration policy of the Minister of Agriculture, and the result of that policy, were entirely erroneous. I do not believe at this hour that that I should be justified, after the exhaustive speeches that have been made, and having spoken myself longer than I had any intention of doing in making any further allusion to this point. But I will say that there was one thing in connection with this debate that made me feel sad, that made me feel indignant, and that was that, not content with this system of vituperation of the best interests of the country, of the country itself, and of the people, these hon. gentlemen should have made the statement in this very debate, accompanying all the damaging statements and calculations, and miscalculations and misrepresentations, that have been sent broadcast by these hon. gentlemen, especially by the ex-Minister of Finance—the statement, Sir, that to-day the people of Canada are a more disunited people, or a less united people, than they were twelve years ago. That, Sir, coming from a gentleman who tells us that he is not afraid or ashamed to stand up and talk in favor of Canadian independence—that, coming from a man who professes that this country is ripe to take care of its own affairs—what, Sir, must we think of it? If we are a disunited people, if we are dragging, one in one direction and another in another, if we are people against people, race against race, Province against Province, if every interest in this country is dragging in a different direction, what becomes of the argument of that hon. gentleman and of the friends around him? But I say that is another slander on the country; that is another untruthful statement. I know the people of Canada, and I know them well. As a native of this country, myself born and brought up here, brought up amongst a race different from my own, but with whom I have become identified by every interest that can identify a man with a people, I know and I feel, appreciating the different races of whom this country is composed, that there is going on amongst the people of Canada a cementation of interest, as well as a linking of hearts, that no man, especially no young man in this country, can realise. No man in this country can realise how thoroughly and deeply and sincerely there is in his heart the feeling that this great Canada of ours is our country, that the interest of one Province is the interest of all the Provinces, that the interest of one people is the interest of all the people. I believe no man has yet realised it, and no man will realise it until the matter is put to the test by one of those emergencies to which every country is subject at some time or other. Then, these men will find—then, those who glory in the disunion of the people will find—that this country is peopled by a brave, a united and harmonious people. I send that out to-night, and I hope my words will be quoted; and I hope that long after the names of the growlers and grumblers and those who seek to sew discontent and disunion among the people shall have been forgotten, a great and united people will live and flourish here, and love the land even more patriotically than we love it now.

Mr. RINFRET. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, whatever may be the opinions entertained on the best system of tariff, viewed from a purely abstract or theoretical standpoint; whatever may be the opinions heretofore upheld, either in favor of a protective tariff, or free trade or a revenue tariff, from the general standpoint of the science of political economy, there is one essential and practical point towards which all ideas should converge to-day, and on which it has become impossible to differ; and that is the fact that protection has not been useful here, and is not the system of tariff which is suited to Canada.

During the first few years after the establishment of the tariff, it was quite proper to discuss the question from a theoretical point of view, and to compare the opinions of the several economists who have judged from absolutely contradictory standpoints, according to the influence of the places where they lived, according to the population and resources of the countries for which they have written. But to-day, Mr. Speaker, after an experience of several years, of which some were prosperous while other years were not, we are enabled to judge, not upon theory put upon facts. We are called upon not merely to give our opinions or to make suppositions; we are to give a judgment upon facts and results, compared to previous estimates. It may not be out of place at this juncture, to make a review of the opinions which have been put forward until now by both political parties now contending for power in order to judge which of the two has been borne out by the facts. I have already had occasion to state in this House that it is possible that absolute free trade may be the most useful system for England, who holds an exceptional position in the world at large owing to her geographical position and to her almost boundless commercial relations. It is possible, although it is not my own private opinion, that the protective tariff has not been injurious to the neighboring Republic, because that rich and immense country can, in a great measure, dispense with foreign trade, and can be self-sufficient owing to the great variety of its productions. The United States have all that is required from an agricultural, mining and manufacturing point of view. Besides they have a population of 50,000,000 of souls, distributed in several States, who have between them the most absolute free trade. I am inclined to think, Mr. Speaker, that by reason of their peculiar position, it ought to have been immaterial to the United States, as far as their general prosperity was concerned, whether they adopted protection or free trade. No fiscal law could crush out or even delay, to any appreciable extent, a prosperity which was inevitable in a country having so much wealth and natural resources. As far as Canada is concerned, its position is quite different from that of those two countries. It is obvious to any one that neither of these two systems can suit Canada if carried as far as their most extreme limits will allow. Canada is an agricultural country and does not possess what would be necessary to make it a manufacturing country. I do not infer from that that it would be good policy to have no manufactures at all. On the contrary, I hold and I have always held, that although Canada is not essentially a manufacturing country a great deal can be gained by having a sufficient number of manufactures, provided that the establishment of these manufactures does not become a burden on the farming community or the country at large, and provided the goods manufactured are not much higher to the consumers than the goods which may be imported from abroad. I have always said—and the facts bear me out to-day—that no manufacture created here through artificial means, maintained by means of a high tariff, can be useful in any way whatever; first, because such manufactures are a burden to the country, and secondly, because it will only be able to stand while there is general prosperity, and in years of depression will accelerate general ruin and accumulate on our markets goods that are useless and consequently injurious to trade generally.

During a few years, Mr. Speaker, owing to the enormous amounts invested in the various industries of the country, owing to certain special circumstances, such as abundant crops, the general revival of business, which have existed throughout the whole world, there has been real prosperity among a few manufacturers, and factitious and transitory prosperity among others. The real and even legitimate prosperity has existed among that class of industry which had no need of protection to stand their ground and to which protection has been given, at the expense of the people, an increase of wealth—such are the cotton manufactures, sugar refiners, and certain iron manufactures. That kind of industry existed before protection was adopted, and might have lived without protection. But manufactures which have been started here in spite of natural obstacles, which have only lived through governmental favor, could not expect any better than a factitious and transitory prosperity. What do we find to-day? After one year only of depression all these manufactures which had been fostered by the protective tariff, and whose existence was an economical nonsense, are disappearing, one after another, after having glutted the market. True, some of them are still alive, but they are dragging their wings; they have thrown half of their operatives in the street, and they are only paying reduced and inadequate salaries to those whom they still employ. The disaster would have been still greater had not the commercial world been forewarned by the crisis of 1876, which had rendered trade more timorous. The price of goods has been maintained to a certain extent, as was said some time ago by the hon. Minister of Finance, but the prices have only been maintained by means of a special agreement between the manufacturers. Any one can see to-day that our markets are fairly glutted, that there is too great a number of manufactures in our country for the consumption and wants of Canada, and that we are unable to find a market abroad for the sale of our manufactured goods. I believe the revenue tariff would have afforded sufficient protection, and under that system we might have had a sufficient number of manufactures, but none too many. The number of manufactures would have increased slowly but surely. There would have been no effervescence during the first years; the overcrowding of the market, which is to be seen to-day, would have been prevented as well as the crisis which threatens to extend to all the industries of the country. This is one of the cases in which the injustice consummated by the legislation of the Dominion Parliament has been detrimental, not only to the consumers who have been victimised, but even to those who, from the outset, appeared to be gorged with Ministerial favors. In 1879 the hon. member for East York predicted what has happened since—that the protective tariff would increase the price of manufactured goods and would therefore impose a heavy tax on the consumers while making the fortune of those who would invest capital in manufactures. That is precisely what has happened. It is useless to recall here what has already been said about the enormous dividends which have been paid by the cotton manufacturers of Montreal, Valleyfield and other parts of the country, by Messrs. Redpath's sugar refinery and by some of the iron manufacturers. The second result predicted by the Liberal party, as a consequence of these uncommon profits, is the increase of the number of manufactures and the creation of monopolies or special agreements between the manufacturers, in order to keep up the prices. The third which has not been slow in coming is the overcrowding of the market and the manufacturing crisis which must necessarily ensue from over-production. All this has been realised with a degree of accuracy which is most discouraging. What do we see to-day? Manufactures which are closing their doors, operatives who are left without work; people who have given up farming to work in manufactories and who are now either working at a reduced salary, or working only three or four days in each week. The manufacturing cities of Canada, such as Montreal, Hamilton, St. John, Halifax, are suffering more from the present depression than any other part of the country, and it is quite clear, to any man who does not willingly shut his eyes, that their position must still, necessarily, be aggravated within a few years to come. One thing is certain; the crisis is felt more or less everywhere, but manufacturing cities are suffering more than others from it. All that which happens to-day has been foreseen by the Liberal party, and the prediction had been realised even sooner than had been expected. Facts are most emphatically giving the lie to the false representations which had been made by the Conservative party in order to court public confidence. Let us now examine what has been the effect of the tariff on the agricultural class. The promises made to farmers, during the election of 1878, were such as to induce them to support candidates who were in favor of protection. They had the promises of a national market, of good prices for breadstuff, coarse grains and farm produce, in exchange for the enormous taxes which are imposed by the present tariff. We said that the tariff could not increase the price of these products, because we have a surplus of almost every kind of farm produce, and we are obliged to export and sell them at whatever prices they will bring on the Liverpool market; that under those circumstances, the creation of a national market was physically impossible; and that the only result of protection would be to compel farmers to pay a higher price for what they buy, without giving them any benefit whatever on what they have to sell. What has happened? Since the adoption of the tariff the price of grain has been, as heretofore, regulated by the laws of offer and demand. If we take the average of the six last years as compared to the six years next preceding we find that these products have not brought a higher price. Neither have they been sold much cheaper; it has been about the same thing in spite of the three years of commercial prosperity which we have had out of these six years. I will say even more; if we compare the prices of 1873-74-75, which were years of prosperity, although we had no protection then, to the years 1880-81-82, which were also years of prosperity, we find that grain and other produce were then sold from 10 to 20 per cent. higher under the revenue tariff than under the protective tariff. All that the present tariff has been able to do was to extort from the farmers, by means of the enormous taxes which were imposed, an average of $6,000,000 to $8,000,000 for each year more than the old tariff on goods imported from abroad, and another amount of from $8,000,000 to $10,000,000, perhaps $12,000,000, on goods manufactured in Canada. This increase is equal to $1 per head of the population, or $40 for an ordinary family of ten persons. This is a serious affair, if we bear in mind the general condition of Canadian farmers, who are obliged to live with the strictest economy. I do not think I am liable to the charge of exaggeration when I state that this unjust subtraction of $40 per annum out of the income of each family has sent a great number of families to the United States. Those representatives of the people who live in the country places know that to the average farmer an annual deficit of about $10 is a very serious affair, which must be a cause of ruin in the course of a very few years. It is a striking circumstance that the emigration of farmers to the United States has increased in the same proportion as the wealth of the tariff's favorites—for the good reason they were impoverished by the unjust contributions which the law of the country compelled them to pay out each year in order to enrich manufacturers. While dealing with this subject it might be proper to say a word about the famous theory set forth by the hon. Minister of Finance on the balance of our importations and exportations, or the balance of trade, of which so much has been said during the elections of 1878. To hear the hon. gentlemen in 1878, we were to be ruined, irretrievably ruined, if we did not find means to balance our importations with our exportations. They represented the excess of our importations over our exportations as being so many millions, vanished, wrenched from the national wealth. It is useless to repeat to-day the explanations which were given then and which were based on the science of political economy. I shall only give the conclusion; it is that the balance of trade is invariably against us during the years of prosperity, and that it seems to be in our favor in years when a crisis prevails. Facts have proved that the ideas of the Liberal party were right. The following took place since the adoption of the tariff in 1879. In 1879 there was an excess of the exportations over the importations, but it will be remembered that we were then undergoing the most acute period of the crisis and we had during that year, the first of the operation of the present tariff, a deficiency of nearly $2,000,000. In 1880, our importations and exportations were balanced, but since then our importations have greatly exceeded our exportations. The following is a comparative statement of our importations and exportations from 1878 to 1884, according to the tables of the Trade and Navigation returns:

	Importations.	Exportations.
1879	71,491,255	81,964,427
1880	87,911,458	88,489,747
1881	98,290,823	105,330,840
1882	102,137,203	119,419,500
1883	93,085,804	132,254,023
1884	91,406,496	116,397,043

The above statement shows that the tariff has not had the desired effect of reestablishing the balance of trade. Its most direct result was to increase in an enormous proportion the taxes which bear so heavily on the people. The following is a comparative statement of the receipts from taxes during these few last years: In 1867, $11,700,000; when the Mackenzie Government came into power in 1874-75, $20,664,878; in 1878-79, when Mr. Mackenzie went out of power, $18,476,613; in 1882-83, $29,269,698; in 1883-84, $25,483,199. In 1874-75, with $20,664,178 of taxation, the Mackenzie Government had a surplus. In 1878, with a taxation of $18,476,613, they had a deficit of nearly one million, thus clearly establishing the fact that an average taxation of $19,000,000 or $19,500,000 was sufficient to cover the expenses of the Government of the country. Well, Mr. Speaker, the fact that in 1883 the Minister of Finance had a large surplus is not to be wondered at when it is borne in mind that the taxes levied on the people amounted to nearly $11,000,000 more than in 1878-79. The surplus for the year ending in June last has hardly exceeded $700,000 in round numbers, in spite of the enormous taxes paid by the people, by reason of the large increase of public expenditure. The era of deficits will probably begin next June; and if the present system of extravagance is continued, if the Ministers continue to add millions to the public debt and to public expenditure, I think I am justifiable in predicting for next year still larger deficiencies, deficits which will probably amount to millions of dollars. Mr. Speaker, good Governments are those who economise the people's money, and who levy the least amount of taxation on the country. It matters very little whether they are called protection, National Policy or such other euphonious name, they are still a burden to the ratepayer. The present Government, which are a bad Government, have not only overtaxed the people, but they have also used their surpluses, the receipts of an unjust taxation, as an argument to justify their extravagance and their shameful waste of public money. The year which has just passed has been really disastrous for the country, not only on account of the commercial crisis and of the evil results of the tariff, but also on account of the increase of public expenditure, of the charges assumed by the Parliament of Canada, and of the enormous increase of the public debt. It may be useful to increase the debt of a country, provided there should be an equivalent received in the way of public works for the general interest of the country, provided the sacrifices imposed on the people should increase the importance of the country, its resources, its navigation, its territory. In this manner it is often possible to receive more than one has given. Therefore, it is not the amount of the debt itself which I intend to discuss to-day; it is only the manner in which the borrowed millions have been used. But the increase of the debt is a bad thing in itself, if it is not justified by reasons of necessity or of public interest. It is a pleasure for me to believe that part of the amounts which make up our public debt have been legitimately employed for the best interests of the country, and that this expenditure has been profitable to the country; but I cannot help regretting the improvident policy of the Government as regards the construction of the Pacific Railway, and whose evil results are daily becoming more apparent, until they will lead, in a few years hence, to actual disaster. I think I may remark here that a great portion of this debt should not have been contracted. I shall endeavor to prove that we have unnecessarily expended large sums for these purposes, and that the policy of the Government, as regards the construction of that railway, is an absurd policy. If the policy propounded by the Liberal party had been adopted the road might have been built without increasing the public debt to any great extent. The question of the construction of the Pacific Railway was first raised in 1871. Between 1871 and 1880 both parties repeatedly had to alter their views, their opinions and their mode of construction, before they adopted a well-defined line of policy. This is not to be wondered at; their ideas had necessarily to be modified as the North-West became better known. It is not my intention to make a review of the different policies followed since the last nine years. It was only in 1880 that both parties adopted a well-defined line of policy as regards the construction of the Pacific Railway. In 1880, when Sir Charles Tupper proposed to the House that the construction of the road should begin in British Columbia, the hon. gentleman who is now leader of the Opposition made a speech, which was echoed all through the country, and which defined the policy of the party on this important question. The hon. member for West Durham predicted on that day, with mathematical accuracy, that which is taking place to-day. His eloquent utterances did not fail to make a deep impression on the whole House. But as usual the whole thing ended by a straight party vote. The hon.

member for West Durham then made the following proposition: Not to build for the time being the British Columbia section, which was to be some 600 miles in length, through a sea of mountains, a country not very well suited for agriculture, to build the Pacific Railway through the fertile prairies of the North-West, but to build that section slowly, only as fast as emigration flowed to the North-West, and as fast as the resources of the country would allow; to build at the same time branch railways to be used as feeders to the main line. In the following year the Liberal party objected to the immediate construction of the line north of Lake Superior, because that line being 600 miles in length was to be built through a country in which there are no inhabitants, and which, in fact, is uninhabitable. They proposed at the same time to subsidise a company for the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie branch line which was to connect with the American lines on the south shore of Lake Superior. The rest is well known. The syndicate was then making proposals which Sir Charles Tupper, by his great eloquence and by a skillful exaggeration of the advantages offered by the syndicate, has made popular among his friends. Let us see what has been the result of that disastrous policy. During the first two years we have seen what can be produced by the best organised puff of any puff that has ever been organised in Canada. The railway was making giant strides in the prairies of the North-West. The construction of the railway was drawing thousands of immigrants. The great North-West has become a great field of speculation freely opened to all. Colonisation companies have been organised. Certain lands were acquiring great value as if by magic. During two years we have seen there something which had all the appearance of prosperity. But there was wanting a basis to this scaffolding; it was a policy of colonisation for the North-West, a system which would have made life more agreeable to the settlers and would have facilitated to them the buying of lands. All of that was wanting. The settlers have begun to emigrate and all the scaffolding has gone to pieces. A great number of those who came to settle in the North-West have emigrated to the United States. People who had made a little money by speculation at the outset have lost it, and some of them have become very poor. To-day we are face to face with a crisis in the North-West and we are left with the Pacific elephant on our hands, a road whose management will sooner or later be the ruin of the country, whether it is returned to us or whether we pay subsidies upon subsidies to make it go on. Those who are not totally blind are now beginning to see that that section of British Columbia which was to give us an immense trade with China and Japan, will be a road on which but very little traffic will pass. The hon. member for Cardwell, who is, undoubtedly, one of ablest men in his party, candidly admitted in this House, on the 13th of February last, that for several years to come there would necessarily be but very little traffic on the British Columbia section. As regards the section situated on the north shore of Lake Superior it was certainly very unwise to build it. It is becoming more and more evident that, during the winter season, it will be utterly impossible to work this line, owing to the dangers arising from cold weather and the total want of settlements along the line. If engineers are to be found who will run trains, very few, indeed, will be the passengers who will have the rashness to travel on them, passengers who will run the risk of being buried under snow storms with the thermometer marking 30° or 40° below zero, when there will be no possibility of receiving assistance from any body. The summer traffic might pass through it, but it will have to compete with the navigation of Lake Superior and with the lines of railway running on the south shore of that lake, which have for them the advantage of running easily in all seasons of the year. The British Columbia and Lake Superior sections have unnecessarily added millions upon millions to our debt. The Ministers should be the first to perceive the great mistake they have made in building those two sections immediately. Another objection to the policy of the Government is the almost vertiginous rapidity with which the construction of the Pacific Railway has been carried on. I believe I am not exaggerating when I say that this rapidity must have added from 20 to 25 per cent. to the cost of construction. A higher price must be paid for men, materials, transportation, and the work must be pushed forward during seasons which are the least favorable. All these drawbacks, put together, have a great deal of influence on the price of construction. I would not recall these facts had not the people of Canada been called upon to pay for this as well as for the rest. It is a well known fact that in order to build the road rapidly the company has been obliged to take thousands of foreigners from the United States and from Europe to do this work, which for years to come might have given employment to Canadian laborers, as it would have done if the policy of the Liberal party had been adopted. By building the road slowly through the prairies of the North-West; by building branch lines, according to the proposition of the hon. leader of the Opposition, the following would have been brought about: The Government lands which are at a distance from the line would have had a far greater value than what they have to-day; we would have sold them to settlers instead of giving them away to colonisation societies. We would not have had the monopolies granted to the Pacific Company, and which have been so injurious to the colonisation of the North-West. The sale of these lands would have fully covered the cost of construction. The road which we would have built would have been a paying road—a road which would have ultimately become a great source of revenue, owing to the sale of lands in the North-West, and owing to the receipts of the railway itself. As it is constructed to-day, with the two lines of British Columbia and of Lake Superior, the road cannot be anything else but a burden, either to the Government if they take it back, or to the company, which will probably come to the same thing, if we are to judge by the intimate connections existing between them. We will have to pay subsidies every year, both for the construction and maintenance of the road. The consequences of the evil policy of the Government are, as I have said, an immense increase of the debt, an increase of two or three millions yearly on the interest of this same debt, an increase of public expenditure for running expenses in the future, the too great absorption of the capital of the country, owing to the too rapid construction which has obtained in the North-West, a crisis whose effects must have had something to do with the financial crisis which now prevails. I shall venture to make a calculation establishing the difference in the cost of construction under the two systems. In 1880 there was, under contract or actually constructed, all that part of the road between Port Arthur and Winnipeg. The construction of that part of the line which is to connect Winnipeg to Lake Superior being equally binding to both parties, I leave aside all that has been expended on this line, as well as on surveys and telegraphs lines. By the proposal of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), the construction through the prairies of a couple of hundred miles of railway each year, including the branch railways, would have cost a couple of millions of dollars yearly; adding a subsidy of two millions and a half for the Sault Ste. Marie Branch, we arrive at the conclusion that during the last five years we should have expended in all a little over a dozen of millions. The sale of lands alone would have been sufficient to pay this expenditure to the last cent; at all events this only represents at most the amount of interest on the present amount of the capital of the Pacific Railway. Besides we would have a paying road representing in value at least the amount which it would have cost us. But it may be said: You would have spent no money, but you would only have a part of the road. That is true; we would not have the British Columbia and Lake Superior sections—but it would be the greatest possible advantage not to have them; it would have saved us a heavy burden, that is all. Let us now see what we have paid in money since 1880, exclusive of land grants. The Government has expended in British Columbia for the sections from Yale to Kamloops and from Kamloops to Port Moody about $15,000,000. Besides that, we have given $25,000,000 to the syndicate under the contract of 1880; last year we have made them an advance of $30,000,000, which makes $55,000,000; if we add the $15,000,000 expended in British Columbia, we have a total of $70,000,000. And that is not all; everybody knows that new demands for money, which we will have to consider at a more advanced stage of the Session, are now before the Government. One thing is certain; it is, that, when the road is built we will have paid out in cash, from 1880 only, over and above the land grants, between $85,000,000 and $90,000,000, or $20 per head of the population, or $200 for every ordinary family of ten persons. This amount, high as it is, represents the exact difference between the policy of the Conservative party and that of the Liberal party, as regards the construction of the Pacific Railway. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think I have shown that the policy followed by the Government in the construction of the Pacific Railway has been an absurd policy. What did we gain by it? I must say that this is just the question the people of the Province of Quebec are now asking themselves. We will now examine what has been promised when this enormous amount was asked, in order to make the people consent to vote in favor of the supporters of the Government. First of all, general prosperity for the country at large was promised as a consequence of the increase of trade generally. Besides that, there were special promises made by Sir Charles Tupper. He promised to give the railway terminus to several important cities in the country, such as Montreal, Quebec, St. John and Halifax—in short, to every part of the country where difficulties might have arisen if it had not been for these promises. One thing is certain, and that is, that none of the cities to which the terminus was promised will have the terminus. Another fact is very certain, and that is, that the Pacific Railway Company has one great object in view—and we have repeatedly warned the hon. members opposite of that fact—they want to establish a connection with New York and Portland. All that is wanted to complete that connection is the construction of a bridge at Lachine. The moment that bridge is built, one thing is inevitable, and that is the terminus of the Pacific must be at Portland, because the distance between Montreal and Portland is about 300 miles, while the distance between Montreal and Halifax is 750 miles, either by way of Sherbrooke or by way of Quebec. It seems to me very evident that if the Lachine bridge is built the terminus of the Pacific Railway cannot be elsewhere than at Portland. Therefore, I say it is the duty of the Government—if they wish to fulfil the promises they have made to the Province and district of Quebec—to prevent the construction of the Lachine bridge; otherwise, they would have to admit that all their promises were delusive and that the electors of that part of the country will receive nothing to compensate them for the enormous sacrifices which they have made for the construction of the Pacific Railway. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to detain the House much longer, as the hour is late, but I do not think I can close my remarks without saying a few words on public expenditure. In 1878, when the Liberal party went out of power, the public expenditure amounted to $23,503,000. In 1884 it was $31,107,000, or an increase of $7,500,000. In the first estimates of 1885-86 we find a demand for $31,757,000. No doubt by the time the other estimates are introduced the expenditure will amount to $33,000,000. It is easy to understand that there should be an increase of the public expenditure to a certain extent, owing to the increase of the population and to the additional amount to be paid for interest on the public debt. There are many reasons why public expenditure should increase, but I think it has been proved to the satisfaction of the House that there was a possibility to increase the expenditure much less rapidly, and that it is impossible to justify the extravagance of the hon. gentlemen occupying the Treasury benches. I will give a statement of the ordinary expenses under the control of the administration for the period which has elapsed between 1878 and 1884:

I do not wish to take up the time of the House by commenting on each of the comparative items which I have just given. If I did so I would only be repeating what has already been said by the hon. gentlemen who spoke before me. I shall only insist on some of them. I have already had occasion, during last Session, in answer to the hon. Minister of Public Works, to call the attention of the House to the expenditure of the Emigration Department. Over half a million was spent last year for immigration. I think that the House will agree with me that we do not receive the value of our money. I will go further; a large part of the amounts expended under that head is used in direct opposition to the best interests of the country. It has been proved that the enormous expenditure made to draw into this country immigrants belonging to the laboring class has been made in a worse than useless manner; the result has been detrimental, because people have been brought here to compete with the laborers of the country, and the consequence has been the increase of the flow of Canadian emigration to the United States. It seems also that there has been real abuses in that Department. Public moneys have been distributed right and left, without economy, for appointments to offices more or less unnecessary; for printing and advertisements of all kinds. In this respect we find a large increase on previous years. The printing accounts are numerous and generally pretty high. There are numbers of officers, paid agents, travelling expenses, accounts of all sorts. All these items, taken as a whole, cannot but convey to the public and to hon. members the most unfavorable impression on the administration of that Department. What has been the result, as far as the settlement of the North-West is concerned? Nobody knows. The Government did not even take the trouble to find out what has been the result obtained by that immense sacrifice of public money. How many immigrants settled in the North-West? How many came here and went right through to the United States? How many Canadians emigrated to the United States? Is the number of those who left larger than the number of those who came? Nobody knows. One thing is certain, and that is, that the system is defective and ought to be changed. What is perfectly known is, that the policy of monopoly and of favoritism adopted by the Government, the bad system of sales of lands, the bad system adopted as regards settlement, has succeeded in discouraging the settlers, in deterring them from going to the North-West, in spite of the enormous sums expended yearly to bring them here. Let us adopt a good policy of colonisation; let the Government give justice to the settlers, and they will come of their own accord without any expenses for immigration. Last Session I felt it my duty to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works to the repatriation of our fellow-countrymen who emigrated to the United States. I reminded him of the speech he made at Montreal, and to which the hon. member for West Durham alluded in the motion he made this afternoon, asking that the papers concerning the repatriation of our fellow-countrymen be brought down. Are we still to hope that the hon. Minister of Public Works will make it his duty to carry out his promise and that he will, during the present Session, introduce a measure to aid repatriation. The question of the repatriation of Canadians was mooted not only in the speech made by the hon. Minister eighteen months ago, but it was one of the planks of the platform of 1878. Therefore Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. Minister of Public Works will soon fulfil his promises on that point. I will venture to make a few remarks as regards the militia expenditure. In 1878 that expenditure amounted to $618,000; it amounted to $989,498 in 1884. In the Estimates of this year there is a demand for $1,135,000. From a military point of view, Canada occupies a very peculiar position. Our possessions are immense and our population is really small. The boundary line which separates us from the United States is hundreds of leagues in length. In case of war with our neighbors a powerful army and a large amount of money would be needed. Fortunately, Mr. Speaker, if it is within the range of possible events that we may have war some day or other, it may be said that it is highly improbable. There is at the bottom of almost every war a general reason, which is often hidden under pretences; it is the desire of acquiring and the hope of extending the limits of States which have become too small for the population by which they are inhabited. One fact which is perfectly established is, that the general causes for war, which exist in Europe and in other countries, do not exist here in Canada. Indeed, I think we have absolutely nothing to fear from our American neighbors, who are noted as being the reverse of a war-like people, so much so, that they have been spoken of as a model people by philosophers and humanitarians of Europe, who consider them as a peaceful people, as people who only care for the material progress of their country, without thinking for a moment to invade the neighboring countries. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if we bear in mind the fact that we have very little to fear from our neighbors or from other nations, it seems evident to me that the maintenance of an army would be quite useless to the country and that all we want is a few troops, in view of the internal difficulties which might arise, and in order to maintain authority within the limits of the country itself. To attain this object the forces at our disposal are far too numerous and involve unnecessary expenditures. We have now a force of 36,000, at least on paper. Our active militia does not probably exceed 18,000 or 20,000 men; it is not numerous enough to resist an attack from outside, but it is by far too numerous for the maintenance of peace and authority in Canada. There is another consideration to which I desire to draw the attention of the Minister of Militia, and that is, if we see fit to have soldiers we must also have arms. It is a well known fact that Canadian soldiers have not the kind of arms that they should have. For instance, our volunteers are still armed with the old Enfield rifle and the soldiers of "A" and "B" batteries with Snider rifles. Therefore, if we were to send our soldiers to battle with these arms to oppose modern arms, we would be sending them to certain death. I might add, that we should have less soldiers and have the necessary arms. To-day, war is not only a question of bravery, it is also a question of arms and strategy. I will now say a few words about the military college at Kingston, another plank of the Conservative party in 1878. There was a great deal of noise made then about this college. Still, that institution is alive yet, and besides we are expending to-day for its maintenance double the amount which was expended in 1878. Here are two planks of the platform of 1878, of which I took the liberty of reminding the House—the repatriation of our fellow countrymen and the abolition of the Kingston military college. In the Province of Quebec, during the elections of 1878, these are the two questions on which we have been the most fiercely attacked; the abolition of the Supreme Court was also spoken of. The hon. Minister of Public Works made it one of his strongest arguments in the county of Rimouski. He was to abolish the Supreme Court as soon as he would come to power. Well, instead of abolishing it, we have been greatly surprised when we saw him the other day voting against the Bill of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry), which only asked to limit the jurisdiction of that court. Another plank in their platform was the reduction of public expenditures. It is unnecessary for me to repeat that the hon. Minister of Finance had promised to govern the country with an expenditure of $22,500,000. To-day the expenditure amounts to $32,000,000, and, no doubt, next year it will reach $33,000,000. There was also a great deal said during the elections of 1878 about the increase of the public debt. The fact that the debt had been increased to the amount of $32,000,000 was considered as an enormous crime on the part of the Mackenzie Government. Well, Mr. Speaker, I believe that on the 1st of July next the liabilities of the country will be increased to the amount of nearly $100,000,000, and for the last eighteen months, from 1st January, 1884, to 1st July, 1885, the Government have contracted engagements which will amount to not less than $65,000,000 or $70,000,000. Another complaint made against us in 1878 was the increase in the number of public employees. The Liberal party was charged with overcrowding the public offices. However, the Civil Service expenditure only amounted then to $823,000; in June last it amounted to $1,084,417, and in this year's estimates there is a demand for no less an amount than $1,200,000. Thus it will be seen, Mr. Speaker, that far from reducing the expenditure of the Civil Service, it has been increased by 30 to 35 per cent. Another plank of the Conservative platform was the re-adjustment of the tariff without increasing taxation. I have proved a while ago that the taxes have been increased, on an average, by $6,000,000 to $8,000,000 yearly. There are other articles of the programme on which I would have desired to say a word, but I shall leave them aside in order not to take an unfair advantage of the attention of hon. members. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is far better not to have any programme at all than to have one of that kind, and not follow it at all. The electors must see to-day that their votes have been extorted through false promises and under false pretences. The programme of the party in power is to expend the greatest possible amount, and to waste the public money. It is extravagance erected into a political system. It is to favor the wealthy and influential classes which may be useful in election time, to the detriment of the farming and laboring classes. Add to that the fomentation of prejudices of all kinds and you will have the whole programme complete. We are charged with having no programme. It is a very vague charge, and it is, above all, a very false accusation. Is it possible, Mr. Speaker, for anyone to set forth their opinions or views with more frankness than the hon. leader of the Opposition has done on every question that has been discussed in this House? What we ask is this: The equitable apportionment of taxes, without any privilege to manufacturers. No privileges for the wealthy and influential classes at the expense of the farmers and laborers of Canada. The abolition of monopolies and favoritism of all kinds. The abolition of the duties on light, fuel and bread. A good policy of colonisation for the North-West. Economy in the administration of public affairs. In this respect we have shown what we could do when Mr. Mackenzie was in power. We desire that in the Dominion all Canadians, whatever their nationality, whatever their creed, may work together to insure the greatness and prosperity of Canada. To attain this end we must respect every creed while claiming our religious and national rights. It is for that reason that we have resisted the encroachments of the secret societies, whatever may be their nationalities. It is for that reason we have resisted, especially, the encroachments of the Orange lodges in the Dominion of Canada. We believe, Mr. Speaker, that our religious and national rights are intimately bound with the rights and privileges of the Provinces in their relation with the Dominion Parliament. It is for that reason that the Liberal party have made themselves the champions of the Provinces with regard to the granting of licenses, and in all cases when the Dominion Government interfered with our provincial affairs. What we ask is to do away with all barriers which stand in the way of our trade; we ask for reciprocity with the United States, and, if possible, commercial treaties with all the nations of the world. What is wanted, Mr. Speaker, is a market for our agricultural produce and the immense products of our mines and forest, if we wish to make Canada a wealthy and prosperous country.

Mr. TASSÉ moved the adjournment of the debate.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 13th February, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 94) to incorporate the Western Ontario Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. McCallum.)

ENQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. KIRK. Before the Orders of the Day are called I would again call the attention of the Secretary of State to the fact that a report brought down a few days ago, ordered by this House, is in an incomplete condition. The Secretary of State stated that all the return that was in the office of Inland Revenue was brought down, and that he could not bring down anything which was not there. Now, I am very anxious to have the return, and I know of no other means of obtaining it than through the Government. The officer appointed by the Local Government to look after this matter is required to make a return to the collector of Inland Revenue, whose duty it is, of course, to make a return to the Department. Unless this return is made to the House through the Department I do not know how we are to obtain it at all, and I am desirous that the Secretary of State, the Government, or any member of the Government whose duty it is to perform this business, will see that the return is obtained from the Inland Revenue officer in Nova Scotia and laid on the Table of the House. I wish further to correct the hon. gentleman, when he said, the other night, that I had accused him of knowingly placing an incomplete return on the Table. I accused him of nothing of the kind; I used no such words.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I said the other night that the House was given to understand that the report I put before the House was not a complete report. I said I had been accused—and I added, jokingly, that the accused had the right to give evidence in his own favor—by the statement that the report was not complete, and I said that it was complete, that the Secretary of State had given the whole report as made by the officers in Nova Scotia. The hon. gentleman has read the law which says, that druggists selling liquor should send a report every six months, or every year, of the quantities sold, and for what purposes. That is true. I have not, however, found in the law by what process those persons can be forced to make a report. I only stated that the report was not in the Inland Revenue Department, that I had received all that was there, and that there ended my duties.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed adjourned debate on motion of Sir Leonard Tilley to go again into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. McLELAN. Before the debate be resumed, I desire to make an explanation to the House in connection with the remarks I made yesterday. It will be remembered that a statement I made was flatly contradicted by the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), and as positively contradicted by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie); and when the hon. gentleman for East York, at a subsequent period of my remarks, rose with the report of the Railway Department for 1878 in his hand, and from that report stated to the House that I was entirely in error and was making a misstatement, I felt that the House expected me immediately to apologise for having attempted to deceive the House and the country. If you will allow me, I will just read the report of yesterday's remarks in order to give the House a better idea of what took place. I asked:

"What facilities did they provide for going into the country?"

"Mr. LANDERKIN. Railroads.

"Mr. McLELAN. Railroads where?"

"Mr. LANDERKIN. From Emerson to Winnipeg.

"Mr. McLELAN. You had not a single mile.

"Mr. MACKENZIE. We had 50 miles.

"Mr. McLELAN. There was not a single rail laid.

"Mr. MACKENZIE. It was all laid.

"Mr. McLELAN. It was graded for three or four years, and you had piles of rails rusting in the North-West, but not a single rail laid."

Subsequently the hon. member for East York, rose with a volume of the Sessional Papers in his hand, containing the railway report to the 30th of June, 1878, when the following took place:—

"Mr. MACKENZIE. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to correct his statement?"

"Mr. McLELAN. Well, he can do so after I get through, as I want to finish before recess.

"Mr. MACKENZIE. I have merely to say that every rail was laid before 1st July, 1878, and the road was finished to Selkirk, 22 miles beyond Winnipeg.

"Mr. McLELAN. That is from Selkirk to Winnipeg.

"Mr. MACKENZIE. That was completed, and from the boundary to Winnipeg every rail was laid. Here is the report.

"Mr. McLELAN. I went specially to the Railway Department to enquire and was informed that every rail was laid from Selkirk to Winnipeg, but between Winnipeg and Emerson not a rail was laid.

"Mr. MACKENZIE. That shows how well informed the present railway management must be.

"Mr. McLELAN. If I am wrongly informed, the fault is with the Department and there is an oversight on their part.

"Mr. MACKENZIE. The Minister ought to know.

"Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman will not claim that the railway was opened?"

"Mr. MACKENZIE. I will.

"Mr. McLELAN. And running?"

"Mr. MACKENZIE. Yes.

"Mr. McLELAN. Why, it was not opened and running until the winter, if my memory serves me at all. However, it is better that we should not enter into a discussion now, before we have the papers from the Railway Department.

"Mr. MACKENZIE. This [holding up his book] is from the Railway Department.

"Mr. McLELAN. It is not of very serious importance. The hon. gentleman had not opened it for traffic, he had not commenced the running of trains—I am satisfied on that at least—and there was no communication or traffic when the Government went out of power.

"Mr. MACKENZIE. You said there was not a railway.

"Mr. McLELAN. That is what I was informed. There was no traffic at all events.

"Mr. MACKENZIE. Yes, there was traffic."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I went to the Railway Department this morning and procured the original estimates, which I have here. By them I find that on the 30th September, 1878, the return for track-laying is a blank—that there was not a rail laid on that date; I have the returns to the 31st October, 1878, after the present Government took power, and they show that there were 24 miles laid on the line between Emerson and Winnipeg; I have the original estimates for November, 1878, showing that the amount of work done to the 30th November, 1878, ran up to 58 $\frac{3}{4}$ miles; and I have the original estimates for the month of December, showing that the whole line was completed by the 31st December, 1878. Now, the House may, perhaps, enquire how it was possible that the hon. member for East York could have been so mistaken, and could have so positively contradicted me, and could have shown to the House this book containing the report, in order to put me in the position of having attempted to deceive this House and the country by such a statement. The explanation is plain. This report of the progress of the railway up to the 30th

June, 1878, was written on the 31st of December, 1878, and at that date it says :

"On the Pembina branch, between Selkirk and St. Boniface, 22 miles have been completed, including track-laying and ballasting, and from St. Boniface to Emerson (62 miles) the grading has been completed and the track laid."

But in brackets here, which escaped the eyes of the hon. member for East York, are the words, "31st December, 1878." The hon. gentleman overlooked these words, and therefore he was in the position of contradicting me and conveying to the House the impression that I had made a false statement. I endeavor to be as careful as possible in the statements of fact I make to the House and the country, and it would be a matter of great regret to me if I should even give the appearance of having made a misstatement, and it would cause me great pain if an hon. member should convict me out of the books of making a deliberate falsehood to the House and the country. I lay these papers and the report on the Table, and any hon. gentleman interested in the matter can see how the error, to say the least of it, arose yesterday.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I have merely to say that I accepted the report as correct, and my impression still is that the rails were laid at the beginning of 1878, not in the fall of 1878.

Mr. McLELAN. I will place the papers on the Table of the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Well, the papers the hon. gentleman has read do not prove anything at all. There was a contract entered into in the fall signed by myself, I think some time in September, for finishing the road, that is, ballasting it and rebuilding bridges, and various matters of that sort ; but I still maintain that the rails had been laid long before that.

Mr. LISTER. I just wish to say, in answer to the hon. Minister of Marine, that I went to Winnipeg in July, 1878, and the road was then open—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LISTER—and then running ; no "oh" about it.

Mr. FOSTER. After the many able speeches we have had in the present discussion upon the finances and the condition of the country, and especially after the elaborate statistical statements which have been made by the Finance Minister and the hon. gentleman for Cardwell (Mr. White) upon this side of the House, and the statistical statements that have been made by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) on the other side, I do not intend to go at any length into further statistical statements in reference to this matter. As we listen to the statements which are made and which are backed by figures brought from different standpoints, on different sides of the House, it may very well be that we find our minds a little unsettled, especially if we have not an accurate knowledge of the real state of the case and of the condition of the country in its broad and general aspects. However, there is one tribunal to which we may appeal, and that is the common sense, the common experience, not only of members of this House, but as well of the intelligent business men and thinking men of the country at large ; and very often when statistical statements and arguments seem to lead to different conclusions or cause confusion in the mind, one may come to a proper conclusion simply by referring the matter to the tribunal of common sense and common experience. In this House we have some 200 members or more who come from different constituencies of Canada, every one of us having more or less intimate knowledge of the condition of his constituents, and I think we can very well, in this matter, bring our experience and knowledge together, and come to a pretty fair conclusion with reference to the broad aspects of the condition of the country and the state of the people who live in it, and it is to that tribunal that I propose to address my remarks more especially to-day. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, although enemies of monopoly, seem disposed to get up a little corner for themselves and have a monopoly of their own in respect to two or three different things. If we look over the statements of their press outside, and take the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite inside, we will find that the three articles in which they are disposed to form a monopoly and have a corner, are: firstly, independence; in the second place, integrity; and in the third place, truth-telling. If you go through their press, and watch its different phases from year's end to year's end, if you listen to the statements of the hon. gentlemen opposite in this House, you will find nothing more common nor more prominent than the idea that, on their side and belonging to their party is all the independence, all the integrity, all the truth-telling that is worth anything in this Dominion. Why, it crops out so far, that once the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) brought himself under the rules of this House when he stated that hon. gentlemen on this side were here merely to register the wishes of the Government. The hon. gentleman plumes himself upon his independence, and talks to us of our lack of that quality. I remember a circumstance which took place not a thousand years ago nor a thousand miles from this House when that same hon. gentleman, upon a certain occasion, made his exit from this House in double quick time, and gave a vote neither for nor against a certain railway resolution which was introduced and ably spoken to by his leader. If he has so much of that article he talks so much about, why was he not independent enough to face the music and give his vote one way or the other? Last night I noticed another specimen of that same independence. The hon. gentleman in the beginning of his remarks came full tilt against that most monstrous tax on coal and flour, and was just launching out into a wholesale denunciation of it when a thought struck his mind, and, contenting himself with mentioning the total sum of the tax, he referred no more to the matter. Was it possible that when he struck the item of flour, he began to think of some flour mills in the Province of Ontario? Was it possible that the idea came into his mind just then that a great number of influential millers were here in Ottawa, the seat of Government, having something to say in reference to that same duty, and he let that subject drop as if it were a hot bullet from his hand. Now before hon. gentlemen talk so much about a lack of independence in others, they should show more independence in themselves. I am told the hon. gentleman is philosophically inclined. If so, I think I can give him something upon which to exert a little of his philosophy. Let him go down to Bothwell in the early summer months after the Session, let him visit one of his supporters there, let him visit a farmer, and in the morning let him go to the farmer's barnyard and there he will probably see something like this. He may see a fine looking motherly old hen with eight, ten or twelve chickens, nicely grown up ; he may see that old hen, proud in her consciousness of motherhood and in the strength and progress of her flock, walking along as peacefully and as self-possessed as possible, for she has a strong brood and knows it, without making any noise or clucking. He may see another hen who, after having sat a fortnight or thereabouts, brought out two or three little scraggy chickens, and he will find that hen strutting about and clucking far more than the other. And of all the hens there, he will find that the one that clucks most fiercely and bristles up most defiantly, is the one that the farmer had that morning thrown off from a nest of addled eggs, and the one which has no chickens at all. The hon. gentleman can bring that comparison as near to his own case as he chooses. His boasted independence may be compared to the addled eggs; a wholesome regard for the rules of the House prevents me carrying the parallel any further. They claim also the monopoly of integrity, and the mild mannered member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) went so far, in the opening of the Session, as to declare that the Government were the tools of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The evident deduction being that the supporters of the Government are the tools of the tools of the Canadian Pacific Railway. And, on a later occasion, the leader of the Opposition had not the very good taste, in replying to an argument from my hon. friend from Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), to say that that hon. gentleman gave his vote servilely—in a selfish way—because he was looking after a vacant portfolio, or one that would soon be vacant. And the member for Norfolk, in the ending of his speech, turned to this side of the House and characterized us as ignorant and reckless and indifferent supporters of a Government. Sir, I think we had better keep to argument and leave insinuation. It is a pretty good test that a man has run out of rocks when he commences to throw mud, and, if argument cannot be found, insinuation will not do the work. But it is when they come to that third article of the cherished monopoly, truth-telling, that we find these gentlemen on their strongest point. They are truth-tellers; they cannot do anything else than tell the truth; a woe is upon them if they do not stand up in this House and tell the truth; so they make it a point to state that they must tell the truth, and that, damage whom it will, the truth shall be told by them. There are some cases in which it may be contended that it is not necessary to tell the truth. There are a great many things that occur in the family circle, but we do not think they will be mended or helped much by one member of the family getting up on the street and publishing them to every passer-by. There may be many things which occur in a business concern, but it will not help that business much to have one prominent member publish them to the world; and I say, with the assent, I believe, of every member of this House, that, by persons who occupy a high and representative position in the Legislature of the country the greatest care should be taken, when statements are made with reference to the condition of the country that these statements are the truth, that they are the whole truth, and that there is not so much left out that what is stated will convey a false and erroneous impression to the world at large. The first speaker after the Finance Minister commenced with an apology. He reiterated the strong desire and the strong necessity that was upon him to speak the truth. He says he wishes he could have been relieved from the necessity of telling the truth, but he feels it must be done and the facts with reference to the country brought out. I desire to bring, out of many that might be brought, some few of those facts that were alleged by the member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright)—the facts which he stated he did not want to publish, but which duty compelled him to publish, in order to see how much they are worth. The first of these facts that he published was this, that the outlying Provinces of this Dominion are clamoring for annexation. Now, that comes from a representative man standing in this Parliament, speaking where those words can go to all parts of the country and to all parts of the world that are interested in Canada, and he states here in his representative position that the Provinces of this Dominion are clamoring for annexation. I leave it to the good sense and common experience of the members of this House if there is one word of truth in that statement, and I want to call the attention of the House to the mischief that such a statement is apt to create. Do we not know that a great many people inside and outside of this country looked upon the Confederation of these Provinces as an experiment?

Mr. FOSTER.

They said: There are Provinces different and distinct from each other in many respects; they lie along side a great republic with a population of forty or fifty millions; is it possible that they will stand by themselves, is it possible that they will keep their independence, or is it not a great probability that they will go over to that greater republic to the south of them and cast in their fortunes with it? And, while that is the thought in the minds of a great many people in this country and more out of it, a man in a representative position stands up here and publishes to the whole world what he says is a fact, that the Provinces of this Dominion are clamoring for annexation. I say there is mischief in a statement like that, and the mischief is just proportioned to the standing and position of the person who gives it publication. I defy any gentleman in this House to prove that. Clamoring for annexation? Can any gentleman point out a single public man who has appeared upon the hustings of this country and has advocated annexation to the United States of America? Can you point out any Legislature in which any resolution has been passed asking for annexation? Can you find any prominent paper on either side of politics which makes annexation its watchword and advocates it in its columns? I say you cannot; and, in these years past that I have had experience of, I know of no single public meeting from Cape Breton to British Columbia that has ever been called anywhere, the object of which was to urge the annexation of these Provinces to the United States of America. The second statement this hon. gentleman made which I will take up is this, that there is less real union among the people of Canada than there was twelve years ago. Let us look at the mischief that may be caused by a statement of that kind coming from the source it does. Do we not know, as I said before, that the Dominion of Canada was looked upon by a great many as an experiment, because they said the Provinces are different, they have different interests, they have different races, they have different religions, is it possible that Confederation can ever be successful, that these diverse elements can ever be amalgamated and that out of them can be built a great, a united, and a prosperous people, or will it not come to pass in the wear and tear of their political organization, with their diversified interests, that the rope of sand will give way and they will become dismembered? And here we have a gentleman who occupied a prominent position in the councils of the nation, and who occupies a foremost place in the ranks of a great party, who stands here in his representative capacity and publishes to the world that there is less real union in this Dominion now than there was twelve years ago. I appeal to the common sense and experience of the men who are here to know if that is true or not. Less real union? Why, how can it be possible that there is less real union? Have we not bound the different Provinces together by a line of railway stretching from Halifax and St. John into the very heart of our country, and is it not as true as truth can be, that along with the union of commercial interests there goes the union of social and political interests? Have we not bound or nearly bound the Provinces in the central and eastern portion of our Dominion with the Pacific coast by a great line of railway which, when completed, as we hope it will be in a few months' time, will give commercial and social and political intercourse to every Province of this Dominion, one with the other? Is it possible that gentlemen meet here to transact the business of the country, that they meet in commercial lines, that they meet in legal lines, that they meet in political and social lines, and have been doing it for twelve years, and yet that to-day there is less real union in the country than there was twelve years ago? The statement I do not believe to be a true statement, and the mischief, as I said before, is just in proportion to the standing and position of the man who publishes the statement,

Again, he states that our population remains stationary. That has been dealt with by gentlemen who have preceded me, and it has been dealt with well. I hold that these statistics that have been given have not been impugned, and no gentleman has proved to the satisfaction of this House or of the country that the population of the greater Provinces of the Dominion is stationary, while all precedent, and all calculation, and all experience that we have, goes to show that it is not stationary, but that, taking all in all, new with old, it is progressing, and progressing satisfactorily. Again, he states that we have handed over the most valuable part of the continent to a monopoly—and mark the words—the like of which was never created and never existed in any country under the sun. Sir, that marks the extravagance of a statement which is a characteristic of the speeches of the member for South Huron. No country under the sun; ever; that goes from the earliest dawn of history to to-day. I think history tells us that there were some pretty hard monopolies in the old Roman empire, when the Praetor farmed out the Provinces, giving a certain sum of money to the central Government and taking everything for himself which he could wring out of the poor people in the Provinces—that was a monopoly. But the Canadian Pacific Railway monopoly beats that “higher than a kite,” as the saying is. I think there have been great monopolies in the middle ages. In England there were great monopolies under the Kings before representative Government was established, but here is a monopoly worse than any that ever existed in the world. I take up the Ottawa Free Press of last night, and I see a statement in it which I will read to the House and which I will leave alongside of the statement of the hon. gentleman opposite:

“In the Immigration and Colonization Committee this morning Mr. McKay, from the vicinity of Crystal City, Manitoba, was examined. He considered Manitoba a desirable field for immigration and as an instance of the way settlers could succeed, he cited his own case. In a year and a half he had paid for his farm, and saved up $312.”

Under this, the greatest monopoly that ever existed under the sun.

“Railway communications are an absolute necessity. He said the farmers were well satisfied with the way they were treated by the Canadian Pacific Railway and the grain elevator companies at Port Arthur. The people in the Canadian territory were treated much better by the railways than were the Dakota settlers, and some of these were bringing their wheat across into Canada and sell it there. No objection could possibly be made to either the soil or climate of the country, and he said that he knew no place where, with good farming and good seed, a better return could be received for labor expended.”

Is that a monopoly, the greatest and most grinding of any that was ever known in any country under the sun, which has opened up communication with the great North-West, and the most valuable part of our continent, which has enabled the settlers there to get in their effects for almost a third or a half less than they could a few years ago, which has opened up the coal regions under the Rocky Mountains, and brought to Winnipeg the comforts of coal heating at one-third the price they paid for their coal only a few years ago? Is that a monopoly which has opened up the country, and which takes the settlers' grain out and the settlers' goods in, on a comparison of point after point, at a cheaper and better rate than either of the great railways that run through the north and centre of the United States—is that a monopoly, “The like of which was never created and never existed under the sun?” But, Sir, there is more. “As a simple matter of fact,” said that hon. gentleman “capable of mathematical demonstration”—there are no “ifs” and “ands” about that—“which is capable of exact mathematical demonstration, this country has lost more in six years of evil government than the whole of the United States, in comparison with its population and resources, did in four years of desperate civil war.” That is to say, the six years of Government just past have cost this country more, according to the chosen financial light of the party opposite than that desperate and devastating civil war, relatively to their population and resources, cost the people of the United States. Has the hon. gentleman ever looked at the cost of that war? Does he know that the individual States paid out in hard cash for bounties 286 million dollars? Does he know that a Federal war debt of 2,708 million dollars was incurred? Does he know that interest has been paid on that war debt since amounting to 2,070 million dollars? Does he know that pensions for persons engaged in that war and for the relatives of those who fell, amount to 617 million dollars? That taking these items together 5,704 million dollars is the cost of that great American civil war? Now, then, I take it that by the lowest estimate the resources of Canada in population and wealth are surely one-tenth that of the United States. That is, reduced to a mathematical demonstration which he so much talked about, this country, in six years of the Government just passed, has lost $600,000,000, or at the rate of $100,000,000 per year. But, Sir, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) stated that in this war 500,000 brave men were lost on the battle field, and we know that the destruction that took place north and south, the retardation of industry, the taking of valuable labor out of the field, are something that, if counted up, would be equal to the total I have given. Yet the hon. gentleman opposite, the chosen financial mouthpiece of their party, rises here in Parliament and states that in six years this Dominion of Canada has lost more proportionately, than it cost the people of the United States in that desperate civil war. Sir, he made another statement. In 1878, I think it was, when he made his last financial statement, he stated distinctly that there could be no fair parallel as to the incidence of taxation in Canada and the United States unless the municipal taxation and debt were taken in. You have heard him discuss that question in this House. Did he touch the matter of municipal debt and taxation? Did he do it when he discussed the question in Toronto, in Montreal? But when a certain interruption was made, I think by the Minister of Finance, this is the statement that the ex-Minister of Finance made: “The municipal taxation of Ontario compares with the state and municipal taxation of the United States of America.” Sir, in the United States census of 1880 we have a complete statement of the per capita debt and the per capita taxation of all the States of the union. Let me read you a few figures to show you how they stand. In Maine the State and municipal debt is $34.50 per capita; in Massachusetts, $51.19; in New York, $43; in Wisconsin, $9; in Minnesota, $11; in Nebraska, $15; in Colorado, $18; in Dakota, $7.39; in Montana, $19.25; in the whole of the United States, $21; in the New England States, $11; in Ontario, in that same year of 1880, it was but $8.60 per head. The authority I have for the statement as to the municipal indebtedness of Ontario is Treasurer Wood, in his speech of 1881, and he based it upon two returns which had been called for from different parts of the Province of Ontario, and from these returns he totalled up his amount. Now, Sir, what must we think of the financial genius, of the financial ability, of a gentleman who has, presumably, studied this question—and if he has not he should have done so before he made this statement—but who seems to know so little about it as to venture the assertion that the municipal debt and taxation of Ontario compare with the municipal debt and taxation of the United States of America? And more than that. If we take the state and municipal taxation in the different States and compare it with that of Ontario, what do we find? In Maine it is, per capita, $7.99; Massachusetts, $13.64; New York, $11.10; Wisconsin, $5.77; Minnesota, $5.77; Nebraska, $6.17; Colorado, $11.07; Dakota, $3.54; Montana, $9.80; the whole United States, $6.23;

the New England States, $10.47; Ontario, $4 per head. And yet the statement is made that the municipal taxation of Ontario will compare with the State and municipal taxation of the United States of America. I leave these statements with the House and with the country. But suppose we take the towns and cities and compare them. The debt per capita of Bangor, is $157.87; of Portland, $127.84; Boston, $77.84; Detroit, $19.62; St. Paul, $36.81; Buffalo, $52.93; New York, $30.71, and of Toronto, the Queen City of Ontario, $64. Thus all those I have named, with the exception of two, are higher than the per capita debt of Toronto. When we come to taxation what do we find? The taxation per head in Bangor is $12.11; Portland, $22.32; Boston, $21.13; Detroit, $10.47; St. Paul, $8.10; Buffalo, $10.10; New York, $23.40; in fifteen cities of Connecticut, $12.31; in 23 cities in Illinois, $9.53; 39 cities of Massachusetts, $14.74; in 32 cities of New York, $16.75; and of Toronto, but $10 per capita. So much with respect to this question of municipal taxation. I leave it with the House, and I challenge hon. gentlemen to disprove the statement; and I say again that an hon. gentleman who has been a Finance Minister of this country, who goes about the country declaring that relatively as compared with the United States we are more heavily taxed and have heavier expenditures, should either have looked into the question or should not have ventured the assertions he did with respect to it. Sir, these hon. gentlemen pretend that in the quartz of condition and circumstance, which lies all around us in the Dominion, there is pure gold; that they are the men who have the hammers and mallets which alone can break out the nuggets, and they are the men who alone can coin them and send them current through the country. And yet when they break up the quartz of condition and circumstance, this is the kind of gold they take and coin and send current through the country and world! I say if there be any man who secretly strikes down his fellow-man and the blood of an individual dyes the sand, that man is a murderer and an assassin. If there is a man who does not do that, but attacks that which is more than life, reputation and character, he is doing what Shakespeare rightly described as worse than taking a man's property for himself. What, then, shall we say of a man who was born under his country's flag, of a man who was nurtured under its protection, admitted to its secret councils, of a man pledged to protect her, of a man distinguished with her honors, and who yet has nothing better to do than to stand up in this House and send forth these statements to tarnish the fair name and fame of his country. Now, Sir, I wish to look at some other statements. Not only is it bad when a directly false statement is made and attempted to be proved, but there is another way by which the true is concealed and the false is brought out, when men forsake the proper grounds, the legitimate conditions of argument and of discussion; when they take premises not true and argue from them, when they discuss things from different premises, different conditions and circumstances where no proper parallel can exist. What do we find? Take the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). He is fond of playing the Don Quixote. He has a hobby horse, which he mounts here year after year. He tilts at an imaginary enemy, whether it be a windmill or whether it be a flock of sheep it makes no matter. And the hobby that he mounts here every year is the balance of trade. Every year that I have been in this House the hon. member for North Norfolk has mounted that hobby and ridden full tilt as if at a real enemy. He rides his hobby horse: he puts the rowels in the side of his steed, and he gallops first over the Finance Minister of this Dominion; he gallops over him, and then he gallops back again, and then he takes a third ride over him; and then he makes his steed mount up on its heels, and looking at the prostrate form he says: I have ridden you down. Why did you ride me down? I have ridden you down because you could not bring about equalization of the exports and imports, because the balance of trade was not made equal in this country. That is why I have expended my force upon you, that is why I have taken all this trouble of giving you battle. Then the hon. member spends a full half hour in proving to his own satisfaction, if not to the satisfaction of this side of the House, that there never can be a balance of trade in any well regulated and prosperous country, and that there must be more imports than exports in order that a country may be rich and prosperous. If the hon. gentleman believes that it is not necessary to have a balance between exports and imports in order to have a country prosperous, what is the use of spending one hour ever Session in trying to knock over what is simply a straw man. He believes it is not necessary, yet he spends the time of the House and his own argument in condemning the Government and condemning this party because the proper equality is not brought about between imports and exports. I want to show to this House a characteristic way of arguing adopted by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). In order to prove that the balance of trade was not necessary, he took England, and compared England's exports and imports. He says that the imports have exceeded the exports by millions upon millions, and he states that England has been prosperous and is wealthy; and he concludes from that fact that a balance in these two items, exports and imports, is not necessary. How does he make that out? In this way: He says that 11 per cent. of the value of exports must be added as profits of carriage, 11 per cent. of the value of imports must be added, and this 11 per cent. of each comes into the coffers of the British people; therefore that offsets the larger imports. He goes on to state that England has a great deal of money out in different parts of the world, from which she receives in interest, £56,000,000 per annum, equivalent to $10 per head of the people, and that helps to do away with an adverse balance. Then he states that England is a great manufacturing and trading country, and that she draws immense profits from these sources. Then he concludes that we do not need a balance of trade in Canada, because this is the condition of things in Great Britain. What he should do in order to make his contention good, is to prove that Canada earns 11 per cent. of the value of her exports by her carrying trade, and 11 per cent. of the value of her imports by the carrying trade; that Canada receives $10 per head of her population on account of wealth invested in foreign countries; that Canada has this particular energy and power all over the world to enable her to make up these profits. The hon. gentleman compares things not similar, and he comes to a conclusion from a comparison of inequalities. I think there is no member in this House but will come to the conclusion that, other things being equal, it is a sign of the prosperity of a country when the exports of a country equal or go beyond the imports; and yet the hon. gentleman opposite laid down this queer law, this law that an excess of exports over imports shows the indebtedness of a country. The hon. gentleman states that the United States has enormously increased in wealth, and yet, taking his own calculation, the United States, from 1877 to 1883, has run in debt to the tune of $1,320,000,000, because, by exactly that amount did her exports exceed her imports. Sir, I think I can give the hon. gentleman an illustration which will convict him before his own constituency any day. A farmer goes out with his produce, exports it to town and sells it for $100 and takes manufactured produce from the town, out of the stores to the value of $80. His exports were greater than his imports by $20, and he goes home with $20 more cash than when he started out; and yet, Sir, according to the hon. gentleman's reasoning, the farmer is $20 the poorer—is that much more in debt! Well, Sir, it is the common fashion for hon. gentlemen opposite to condemn the Government because they have not done thus and so. The hon. gentleman who represents South Brant (Mr. Paterson) gets up and condemns the Government—for what? He leans over his desk in a threatening attitude, points his dexter finger at the Finance Minister, and on pain of almost instant death demands that the Finance Minister shall bring up the prices to where they were at a certain time—shall bring up the price of wheat to where it was at a certain time, shall bring back the old wooden ships and the old shipping trade to the city of St. John, shall clear away the depression and shall in fact do away with the confusion of business which exists over the wide world. He says, you must do that; I demand it on pain of instant execution, or I will publish you to the country as no Finance Minister, and as a member of a Government which has no claims upon the people. Then he turns round and for an hour or more he sets himself to the most diligent and consecutive argument he could possibly make, to prove that no Government in the world could keep up the prices, that no legislation could prevent depression from coming, and that it is impossible that disturbances in trade could be prohibited by the action of Parliament. I say again, What is the use of the hon. gentleman coming here and condemning the Government and the party because they do not keep prices up or keep the depression away, because they do not keep the shipping trade on a good basis, and at the same time believing and arguing that it is impossible for any Government or any legislation to do so? Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite will tell me that they condemn this Government and this party because they promised to do this sort of thing. I say to them, that they cannot bring any statement, made by any responsible member of the party, they cannot bring its platform of principles, they cannot bring what was enunciated at its convention in 1878, they cannot bring any authoritative statement to show that this Government or party have pledged themselves to keep prices always good, to keep trade always level, to keep depressions always back, or to influence to the point of continual or absolute control the great markets of the world. So I say that hon. gentlemen pursuing that line of argument are condemning us for what, afterwards, they take time to prove it would be impossible for us to perform. While I am on that point I wish to call the attention of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) to this one fact; he said the balance of trade was not kept, and he condemned the Finance Minister for not keeping it. Now, Sir, I read the very statement he read, and in that statement the Finance Minister makes no pledge to bring the imports and the exports to a perfect equality. He makes no statement that it is necessary for the progress of the country that the imports should be made equal with the exports, but he states that it is well and should be striven for, looking at the immense excess of imports in the Dominion for a number of years, that equality should be more nearly approached, and that the great excess of imports should be diminished. And this has been done by the Government, as the figures taken from the Trade and Navigation Returns will show. Since Confederation $20,119,084 is the average yearly excess of imports over exports for the whole period. In the period from 1875 to 1879 the excess was $21,022,213, or nearly one million of dollars per year over the average for the whole period; and from 1880 to 1884 the average yearly excess has been but $16,411,873. Not only does the period from 1880 to 1884 show about $4,500,000 as a yearly average less, as the excess of imports over exports over the period from 1875 to 1879, but it shows as well pretty nearly $4,000,000 less than the average excess of imports over exports since Confederation. The hon. member for Botolph (Mr. Mills) last night when he was nearing the end of his speech, and getting ready for his peroration, said that this Government were to render foreign markets unnecessary, that they were to turn all urban districts into towns, all towns into cities and all cities into great marts and metropoli like New York and other great cities of the United States. He says the pledge of the party and the Government policy was to keep wages always good, and he says that the policy is hollow and baseless because it has not done that. I say it is only necessary to state the hon. gentleman's contention to show that it is an absurd one, and that it is not possible, as it never was contemplated, that any Government or legislation should do this.

Mr. MILLS. It was promised.

Mr. FOSTER. It was not. I challenge the hon. gentleman and I will give him time now to do it—I challenge him to read a statement of any responsible member of this party or Government which proves that they were to make foreign markets unnecessary, that they were to turn all urban districts into towns and make all towns into cities and turn all cities into metropoli. I challenge him to show a single written or published statement where it was authoritatively pledged that wages should always be kept good. If he can do it let him do it.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman calls on me to give such a statement. I have not the papers, but I can refer him to several speeches and I can produce them. I refer him to a pamphlet of which it is stated that 80,000 were circulated in Ontario by the Conservative Association, a pamphlet which was prepared by Mr. Phipps, where those very expressions were employed.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman knows as well as any person, with the intelligence he has, that you never could judge a party from the utterances of men who are not in sympathy with its policy, that you never can judge a party by the utterances of stray persons here and there. What I challenge the hon. gentleman to do is this—and let him laugh and say "hear, hear" if he chooses, I challenge him to bring the platform of the party as brought out in convention, to bring the resolutions of Sir John Macdonald, the statements of the second Minister, or of any Minister—I challenge him to bring these, and to show to this House that it was ever promised or pledged that foreign markets would be rendered unnecessary, that towns would be turned into cities and cities turned into metropoli, and that wages would always be kept good. It is a habit of exaggeration that hon. gentlemen opposite have fallen into. They take the partial to include the universal, and then boldly declare that the general assertion was made.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman asks for the utterance of the First Minister, or something of that sort. Would the utterances of the Finance Minister do him?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. CASEY. I have one extract which seems to claim a great deal of what is proclaimed. He says:

"The hon. gentleman opposite (Sir Richard Cartwright) imposed burdens on the people, but gave them no food to supply them with strength to carry them. We asked Parliament to give us such changes in the tariff as would not only protect the industries of the country, but give us an increased revenue. Was there a response? I stated at the outset that the response was ample, provided the money had been paid in for the year 1879 that belonged to that year. And the year that followed what was the response? They gave us a surplus of $4,000,000 and upwards, because we found employment for the people, because, by obtaining for them employment and higher wages, they were able to buy more than formerly. Men who were formerly working at half time and on low wages received their higher wages and were working overtime. Farmers who had low prices and found sales difficult received high prices and prompt cash sales."

"High prices and prompt cash,"—that did not mean 70 cents a bushel.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the hon. member for West Elgin the least appreciation of the difference between references to facts that have occurred and promises which are to stretch over an indefinite future? The hon. Minister of Finance was speaking of facts which have occurred; he was speaking of a certain year; and hon. gentlemen opposite do not contend and cannot prove that his statements were not true of that year. But that is different from promising that markets would never fail, that good times would never pass away, that confusion and distress would never come, that all towns should be turned into cities, and all cities into marts. Sir, the kind of argument that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) depends upon is shown by the reasoning he used last night. He wished to condemn the immigration policy of the Government, and how did he do it? He cited a newspaper extract stating that two poor Danes had got into trouble somewhere in the United States. He said that these were scalliwags, and therefore the immigration policy was bad—that they were a sample of the whole. Does the hon. gentleman know that it takes more than one swallow to make a summer? Does he know that the condition of two Danes out of 100,000 immigrants, is not a good proof as to the condition and quality of the immigration as a whole. Now, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) compared Canada with the United States; but with the United States of what period? With the United States of 1800, 1801 and 1802. Why did not the hon. gentleman, when he was at it, go back further? Why did he not go away back to the patriarchs of Palestine who lived very economically? Why did he not go back to the Germans of the time of Tacitus, and read from the history of Tacitus to show how cheaply and how well they fared? Does the hon. gentleman not know that in order to come to any reasonable conclusion, he has to compare things similar in kind and equal in time and circumstances? He compared the United States of 1800 with the Canada of to-day to our disadvantage. Sir, what was left out in that comparison? He left out in the first place the difference in the scope of the expenditure of the United States then and that of Canada now. He will find if he looks into the matter, that the scope of the expenditure is very different in the two countries. They have no subsidies in the United States to the different States. The States have to take care of their Governors, of all their legislation, of their whole judiciary, of their savings banks, their fisheries, their prisons, their militia, their canals, their railroads, their immigration, and to a large extent their harbors and rivers, and quarantine. And so I say the parallel does not hold. Neither do the times nor the circumstances make the comparison at all reasonable. 1800 and 1884 are very different times in the world's history, to afford the basis of a comparison of expense of family living, of the world's work, of the world's government. If I were to take a farmer of 1884 and attempt to compare his scale of expenses to that of a farmer of 1800, he would very quickly tell me that he did not admit any such parallel or comparison as that. To-day the farmer has to have his improved implements, and to pay for his municipal advantages and for all those improvements which result from development and advancement. The same is true with reference to states and countries. Railroads abound now; they did not then. All those improvements in the development of the world and in the transport of its commodities, have come in and have added to the expense. Therefore, Sir, there is no parallel between the United States of 1800 and Canada of to-day on the scale of expenditure. Now, the hon. gentleman said that time was solving the protection question. Yes, I think he is right. Time is solving it in Europe, and the legislation of the last few weeks has shown in what direction it is solving it. It is solving it in the lines of increased protection among the great powers of Europe, so that the Cobden Club, instead of converting Europe and the world to their principles in the short space of ten or twenty years, find themselves very nearly in the line of being themselves convinced by the stern logic of events, and the necessities of the commercial situation around them. Sir, time is solving the question in Canada, and each year that the people look more thoroughly into it, and see what we are doing and what we must do in order to preserve our commercial autonomy, they must see that it is solving it in the line of a settled conviction that a moderate protection cannot be dispensed with in this country so long as we are alongside of and have to deal with countries that have high protective tariffs. I think I see two indications that time is solving the question also for hon. gentlemen opposite. What are these? The hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), says:

"What is really damaging to our position is not the effect of the protective system so much as the effect of the enormous extravagance of the Administration."

Is that the beginning of a road which shall lead them out to the next elections, to go on the hustings upon the line of not attacking the protective policy in its principle? It seems so. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) gave it an additional lift last night when he said: We never declared that a 17½ per cent. tariff was all that was sufficient; we contended for what was necessary. That is an elastic provision. He may stretch it to take in the National Policy itself; and the fact that we have not now many resolutions or speeches in the direction of free trade is additional proof that time is solving the question for hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MILLS. The public debt is solving it.

Mr. FOSTER. Sir, it is well to contrast the opinions of hon. gentlemen opposite when they come to speak of the condition of the country as the hon. gentleman who has preceded me did, especially in the few last sentences of his speech. What do they think of this country? Why, Sir, the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) thinks that the last six years of Government have been more disastrous to this country than the civil war was to the United States. The end is near in this prophetic deliverance. The hon. member for North Norfolk says in the concluding sentence of his speech, or nearly so: What is the state of our country? What have we to show for our expenditure? This is his opinion of the condition of Canada: Public Works paying $\frac{1}{3}$ of 1 per cent; \$40,000,000 sunk in the Canadian Pacific Railway; assets comparatively worthless; \$40,000,000 sunk in the Intercolonial Railway, which ultimately will have to be closed; in eighteen years the goal of ruin will be reached at the present rate of progress. Can you imagine a more doleful picture of the condition of Canada, to be sent broadcast throughout the world, coming from one who lives in the Dominion and occupies a leading position in the Liberal party, than that? The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is not more cheerful or happy for he says: What is the condition of Canada? Hundreds of thousands of unemployed; Canadians leave at the rate of 88,000 per year—not one less, not one more, mathematically demonstrated; people fleeing from the country as if a pestilence were upon it, and then declaring that there is a pestilence upon the country. That is the opinion of the hon. member for Bothwell, and I leave the admirers of that hon. gentleman to make the most they can out of it. But I am certain that the young men of Canada, the men who are growing up in its various Provinces, and who have hopefulness in their hearts and energy in their physical frames, who look forward to the time when their country shall be made great and strong with the resources it has and the energy and intellect its sons possess—I am certain that such utterances as these will only have the effect of weaning from the party of the hon. gentlemen opposite any young men who may have a leaning to it, and of binding the young men of this country in a common bond, stretching from ocean to ocean, of cementing them in the common determination to keep this country united, and to make it prosperous, and to relegate growlers and grumblers to the background. Then the hon. member for Bothwell has outlined a little plan of reciprocity, in which he has followed in the wake of the hon. member for North Norfolk. We have often wanted to know what particular stand hon. gentlemen opposite took on this question, and we have obtained at last an inkling of what they may possibly do, and of what line they propose to take. The hon. member for North Norfolk declared that we could not get a reciprocity treaty such as we have had before; He declared that if the Government get reciprocity, it will not be the one-sided reciprocity that we had years ago, but it will have to be a reciprocity which will include manufactures as well as natural products. The hon. member for Bothwell outlined practically the same plan. Is that to be the platform of hon. gentlemen opposite? Is their platform to be that they pledge themselves, in order to get certain advantages from the commerce and trade of the United States, to throw down all barriers and leave our manufacturing industries open to the in-sweeping tide of American manufactures? Will they allow our manufacturing industries, which have been established and which have prospered by means of the protected skill and accumulated capital, to be swept away the very moment these barriers are broken down? Do they intend to leave our mills without operatives and our industries in the condition in which they were years ago, when necessity compelled us to adopt a change in our fiscal system?

Mr. MILLS. That is very doleful.

Mr. FOSTER. It is very doleful, and it is doleful for a purpose. It is so doleful that when hon. gentlemen opposite go to the country and enunciate that as their platform, they will find that the people will tell them: We are willing to have a reciprocity treaty on fair terms, but we do not propose to give up everything for the sake of having a commercial treaty even with the United States. It has been noticed in this debate that more has been said about the condition of the country than about the tariff, and there are certain statements which have been formulated by the Opposition. One of these is that there is discontent everywhere in the Dominion. Let us analyse that statement, and I appeal to hon. gentlemen who represent the different counties and interests of Canada to say whether that be true or not. Is there great discontent in the Dominion of Canada? Of what kind is it? Is it that discontent which, unhappily, is rife in some countries where labor is arrayed against capital in a stern, strong fight against monopoly and privilege? Is that kind of contest, which shows itself in breakings-out like the Pittsburg riots and the Hocking Valley riots in the United States, and the disturbances which are taking place in Great Britain, going on here? Does any hon. gentleman hold that such discontent as that is rife in the Dominion? No, Sir. Is there discontent here of class against class, or sect against sect, as there is in some of the older countries of Europe, where the privileged autocratic classes above are being upheaved by the outbursting force of free impulses of the classes which have been trampled down? No, Sir. This is a free country; this is a country in which the ploughman's son may come from following the plough and afterwards step into the high position of Premier, if he has talent and character and energy sufficient to work his way. Is there any widespread political discontent in Canada? I deny it. But I will tell you what discontent there is; there is a discontent in this country—and here again I have to utter a dolorous and mournful strain—there is discontent in the party that is not in power and in such a case there always will be discontent. The man who has made a bee line for an open door and finds that another has stepped in just before him and closed it will always be discontented; his discontent will be chronic until the door is reopened, until the man inside is put out and the man outside gets in and warms himself. That is the only kind of discontent there is in this country; and it is that discontent of party which is engineered by its members, heralded by its press, and brought by its leaders as a piece of machinery into this House. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that annexation is clamored for in this country. I ask from which party comes the clamor? I ask them to point out a Liberal Conservative newspaper, a Liberal Conservative politician, or any gentleman prominent in the Liberal Conservative party, who has, during this past year, uttered one word in favor of annexation; but I take them to the only annexation organ I know of in this country, the St. John Globe, which belongs to the party of hon. gentlemen opposite, the proprietor of which sunned himself for a few years in the comfortable position of postmaster given to him by hon. gentlemen opposite, and who has been terribly discontented ever since he had occasion to leave that snug position and attend to his newspaper work. Is there any talk about dismemberment? Do you find it in the Liberal Conservative newspapers, in the Liberal Conservative party or from any member of prominence in the Conservative ranks? No, Sir, and the resolution moved in the Nova Scotia House of Assembly was not moved by a member of the Liberal Conservative party. You find it in the press and you find it amongst the politicians that belong to the gentlemen opposite. So I say you may take everything, the secession trouble in the North-West, annexation, dismemberment, independence, commercial treaties, whatever look to the unsettling of the present stable condition of affairs in this country, and you find it always voiced by the hon. gentlemen opposite and their press; that is where the discontent is. So long as it remains there and is a party discontent, it will not sink very deep into the vitals of the country and will not produce either dismemberment or disruption. It will all be cured in that happy day—we know not when it may arrive—when they step to this side of the House. Then discontent will disappear and happy smiles will take their place on the countenances of those gentlemen. The next thing they state as a general proposition is that the Liberal Conservatives are trying to make the country prosperous by Act of Parliament. That has been partly touched upon by remarks I have already made. I will simply refer to it. Everywhere through the press and through the country that epigram is used, and you know what power there is in an epigram, and most gentlemen who have looked into the matter know what untruth there is in an epigram. An epigram may be the most taking thing at first sight, and yet when you look into it the most deceptive of any in the English language. And this is put through the country. These men are going to make you prosperous by Act of Parliament; and ridicule follows upon that. That was not the pledge, that is not the platform of this party, but I will tell you what is the pledge and what is the platform of the party, as far as I understand it, and what, speaking for myself, is at all events my platform and my position. It is that you cannot pass a single Act of Parliament without in some respects affecting the fortunes and prosperity of the country, that you must assume that legislation at any given time is perfect if you do not hold the proposition that it may be made more perfect, and that consequently things may be made better by legislation. Do you mean to say that it is not possible to help a country by legislation? Look at the converse of the proposition. Is it possible to harm a country by legislation? There is no doubt that it is. Then it is possible to remedy the harm by legislation, and, unless you assert that laws are perfect now, it is a proposition to be contended for and sustained that it is possible to make things more prosperous by judicious legislation. It was judicious legislation which brought about the abolition of the corn laws.

It was judicious legislation which laid the foundation of those great railways in New South Wales and the other Australian colonies, which my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) spoke of last night as such a great source of revenue in those countries. I can imagine the counterpart of the member for Bothwell in those Legislatures, when they proposed to make a loan and build those railways, asking: Are you going to make the country prosperous by Act of Parliament? And yet the Act was passed, the loan was made, and the railways were built, with the great amount of traffic which goes over them and the great revenues which are brought into those countries by them. If ever legislation was necessary to the protection of the great interests of this country, that time is to-day, when over-production is rife as never before in the producing centres of the world; to-day, when there is a greater facility for the manufacture of goods at short notice than at any previous time in the world's history; to-day, when the means of transport are so great that commodities from the most distant parts of the world can be thrown into any market which offers an opportunity for them; to-day, when the great commercial interests in the world are merging together in common cause and for common purposes. I say it is now, when such a conjuncture of circumstances has taken place as that, that legislation stops in at its best, and protects the people of this country in their manufacturing interests, in their markets, and in all that pertains to a moderate protective policy. They say: Get markets in foreign parts. I say so too, but it is a fact that cannot be gainsaid that you must first establish yourselves in home markets before you can go out to conquer foreign markets. Here is the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1884. Mark the parallel between what he speaks of and our own country of Canada. He shows the immense expenditure made in the Western States for railways and canals and the like, and says:

"What this vast region needed was a market and facilities for reaching it, with both of which it was soon supplied. It is now penetrated in all directions by railroads, and the cost of transportation has been so cheapened that farming lands far west of the Mississippi have become nearly as valuable as the lands in the seaboard States. To the rise in the value of lands resulting in the construction of railroads, the wonderful increase of the national wealth is very largely attributable."

Our great west lies here. We must penetrate it and interpenetrate it with facilities for transportation before we can expect our lands to rise in value or expect to share the rich increase from our fertile country. The next thing that is stated by these hon. gentlemen is that we are trying to make the country rich by taxing it, or, as the member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) says:

"The force of folly can no further go Than taxing men that they may richer grow."

That is another epigram. They say: What! You make a country richer by piling up taxation? That, of course, at first sight, seems very absurd, but let us look into it. It appears to me that there are two kinds of taxation. One you may call productive taxation, and another you may call unproductive taxation; or, more closely, there is one which is the result of productive expenditures, and the other which is the result of unproductive expenditures, and the first thing to get at in any discussion of the matter of taxation is to find whether the expenditures were wise and productive, and, if so, it is a question which cannot be doubted that, through this expenditure and the taxation consequent upon it, the country is made rich and prosperous, and so helped in all its material interests. But I wish to draw the attention of the members of this House to the comparison between the United States, which is so much referred to, and this country of Canada with reference to its expenditures. In the United States, in 1883-84, Customs and Revenue taxation amounted to $316,653,561. Watch the expenditures out of that: Pensions for the war, $55,429,228; military expenditures, $39,420,603; naval expenditure, $17,292,601; interest on public debt caused by the war, $54,578,368; sinking fund, $46,790,229; redemption of war debt, $54,120,000; or a total of $267,640,039, as taxation for an expenditure which was not only unproductive, but destructive in every point. The per capita expenditure of customs and internal revenue of the United States was $5.75, and $4.85 of that was spent for these unproductive purposes. Otherwise put, 85 per cent. of the whole revenue from Customs and Internal Revenue was spent to pay the interest and cost which came from the expenses of war and the waste of war in the United States of America. The Canadian income from Customs and Revenue last year was $25,483,199, and for military purposes, corresponding to those above, what did we spend? On Dominion police, $20,124; militia pensions, $27,268; mounted police, $185,983; then there is militia, if you choose to put that in, though you should not, because that expenditure by the Dominion corresponds to the expenditures in the United States for militia by the States themselves. If you do not put that in, which you have no right to do, the per capita taxation of Canada spent on unproductive expenditures like those I have mentioned in the United States, is only 14 cents per head out of a total of $5.66 per head collected. So it is plain, that compared with the United States, the revenue which we have collected is expended—not for war, as an hon. member stated the other day, but for the development of our Provinces and the debts incurred therefor? They were expended for the opening up and improvement of the country, for the construction of railways, for waterways and canals, and for the great public works of the country, which alone can make a country prosperous. Now, I wish briefly to approach what is really the most important question I shall have to deal with on this occasion, and that is the comparison of the United States of to-day with the Canada of to-day. The hon. gentlemen opposite, in and out of Parliament, have compared the United States and Canada, and have come to a conclusion disadvantageous, as they say, to Canada. I ask hon. gentlemen present, could they not have taken a more fair comparison for a country like Canada, than to compare it with the United States? Is it fair to compare a grown, intellectually and physically developed man, with a child of tender age, and because the one has not the strength of the other, to make it disadvantageous to that one? Surely not. But in comparing Canada with the United States of America much like that is done. The United States have been more than one hundred years on their national course. They had provincial prejudices the same as we have, they had provincial differences as we have now. They had to merge those, to outgrow them; they have had one hundred years to do that and to become a great and united nation. I think it may be fairly said that Canada cannot be fairly compared with the United States of America. That country has been over one hundred years on its national progress, it has vast and varied resources, climatic and otherwise, it had a reputation as a nation extended all over the world when Canada was little heard of, it has received by immigration twelve millions of people in addition to its own population, from 1820 to 1883; it has a vast heritage of accumulated skill and accumulated capital, and a population of 55,000,000 of people; and I say it is not quite fair to compare Canada with such a country; if we expect to make Canada show equal it is not a fair expectation. But, Sir, let us look at this question of comparative debt. Now I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me when I say that if you are going to talk about the incidence of debt or taxation relatively in the two countries, you must take the whole debt and the whole taxation. You must take in the United States the federal debt, the state debt, and the municipal debt; and you must take in the Dominion of Canada equally its federal debt, its provincial debt, and its municipal debt. There is no other fair way, because the functions and scope of the federal powers in the two cases are as diverse as they can well be, as also are the functions and scope of the States as compared with the Provinces. Now, Sir, what do we find? The federal debt of the United States on November 1st, 1884, was $1,408,482,984; the net federal debt of Canada last year was $182,161,850. Now, Sir, I deduct from the net federal debt of Canada the debts which have been assumed from the Provinces, because they represented what would be represented by the State debts in the United States. The provincial debts which have been assumed by this Dominion amount to $106,815,214. Subtracting that sum from the whole net debt of the Dominion of Canada, corresponding to the United States federal debt, and we have left $75,346,636. Now, Sir, I say that that method of comparison cannot be gainsaid. The federal debt of $1,408,482,984 in the United States corresponds with what is the real federal debt of Canada, amounting to $75,346,636. Reducing them to per capita we find the federal debt of the United States is $25.60; while the corresponding federal debt of Canada is, per capita, but $16.40. Now, Sir, let us take the state and provincial debts. In the United States, by the official statistics for 1883, the State debt amounted to $267,762,175; and the corresponding provincial debts of Canada, that is the debts which are either now held by the Provinces or have been taken over by the Dominion, amounts to $112,815,214. Reducing these to per capita, we find the state debt in the United States is $4.83, and the corresponding provincial debt of Canada is $24.30 per head—only $4.83 per head in the United States, but $24.30 per head in Canada. That shows a great disparity against Canada, but let us look into it for a moment. What have the different States of the United States done with reference to meeting their indebtedness from year to year? They have met it by direct taxation upon the people of each State. Last year Massachusetts paid $1,500,000 in direct State taxation; while the Provinces of this Dominion have never taxed themselves one cent as direct taxation, but have rather put their expenditure in the form of loans and have preferred to carry it as interest. So that if we go back for ten, twelve or fifteen years, the States of the American republic have paid by direct taxation that which has prevented their debts from being much higher, per capita, than the debts of the Provinces of Canada. Then Sir, we come to the municipal indebtedness, and that is the most important point. The United States municipal debt in 1880 was $822,147,888; the increase during the last decade was about 22 per cent. Adding that percentage of increase, the municipal debt of the United States at the present time is $904,362,676, or a per capita municipal debt of $16.40. What is Canada's municipal debt? Well, Sir, I take the municipal debt of the Province of Ontario, which I believe is a high average. In the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia it is comparatively small, the municipal taxation is comparatively small. The same is true, I think, with regard to Quebec, while in Ontario we have the highest municipal debt. The municipal debt of Ontario is $17,000,000 or about $8.60 per head. The municipal debt of Canada, I have estimated at $6 per head. The municipal debt of Ontario being $8.60 per head, and that being by far the highest, I have taken the average as $6 for the whole Dominion, which I am certain is a high average to take. That makes $27,600,000 as the municipal debt of Canada, being a per capita municipal debt of $6 per head. Taking those totals over, what do we have? The United States has a federal debt of $25.60 per head. Canada has a federal debt of $16.40 per head. The United States has a state debt of $4.83 per head. Canada has a provincial debt, corresponding to that State debt, equal to $24.30 per head. The United States has a municipal debt equal to $16.40 per head, while the municipal debt of Canada is not more than $6 per head. Adding these together we have the total debt, federal, state and municipal, of the United States as $46.83 per head, and we have the total debt of Canada in the same way, $46.70 per head; or a balance in favor of Canada on the score of indebtedness of just 18 cents per head. So much with respect to debt. But the strongest point is when you come to the taxation which is paid, and which is a better measure of the burden than the debt which has been calculated per head. The United States federal taxation last year for Customs and Inland Revenue was $316,653,561, a per capita tax of $5.75. The state tax in the United States was $61,434,095, or $1.11 per capita. The municipal tax in 1884 was $282,591,694, or a per capita tax of $5.14, making a total taxation in the United States under these heads of $660,679,350, or $12 per capita. Let us take Canada. The federal taxes, taking Custom and Inland Revenue the same as in the United States, amounted to $25,483,590, or $5.66 per capita. The provincial tax is nothing. The municipal tax is $2.60 per head, or $12,000,000 for the whole, which gives $8.25 per head as the taxation paid, federal, provincial and municipal in Canada, corresponding with $12 per head paid in the United States. So that in the matter of total debt, Canada has 18 cents per capita of advantage, while in the matter of its taxes Canada has $3.74 per head, which is a yearly saving on taxes alone of $16,204,000 for the whole Dominion. I leave these figures and these calculations to be looked into by hon. gentlemen and by the country, and I believe they will stand the test in all important particulars. There is a little question as to the estimate for Canada's municipal debt, but I have made the estimate high so as to be sure I did not err in favor of my country. It is said by hon. gentlemen opposite that the people are being driven out of the country. I want to put one practical question. If they are driven out of Canada, by what are they being driven out? We will throw statistics all aside. We will leave these clashing and clanging statistics of the United States, school and other statistics all aside, and now appeal to common sense and common experience. Our people are being driven from Canada, say they. What drives them out? The answer comes: Debt, taxes, tariff—those are the three things that are driving Canadians from Canada. Where are they driven to? The answer comes: To the United States. I am going to put this question in such a form that we must either conclude that the people of Canada are almost born fools or else that they are not being driven out to the United States by debt, taxes and tariff. Driven out to the United States! Driven out by debt, taxes, tariff! Where do they go? Take the metropolis of my own Province. They are driven from St. John, are they? On account of debt, taxes, tariff? And where do they go? We will say that they go to Bangor or Portland, the two largest cities in Maine. They are, of course, going to a city and not to the country. The debt of St. John is $1,009,048, or $36 per capita. The debt of Bangor is $2,661,000, or $157.87 per capita. Any sensible man, if he is driven out owing to the heavy city debt, would go directly from a city in which the per capita debt is $36 to a city where the debt is $157 per head. No doubt about that. But perhaps the individual might go to Portland; and if he did so, he would find a city with a debt of $4,322,154, or $127.84 per capita. Driven from St. John, he would go to a place where the debt is three and a half times as great! But let us look at the taxation.

Mr. McMULLEN. Give us the figures for Baltimore.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not choose to go to Baltimore. If the hon. gentleman wishes to go there, he can do so. If he will, however, wait for a moment I will give him as many cities as he can travel over between this time and to-morrow. If the hon. gentleman will allow me to suit my own convenience in making this address I shall feel obliged. The taxes in St. John last year amounted to $223,687, or $8 per capita. In Bangor they reached $204,166, or $12.11 per capita. In Portland they were $754,623, or $22.32 per capita. But you will say that the individual will probably choose to go, not to a city, but to the rural parts. Let us see how the taxation of New Brunswick compares with Maine. The provincial debt in New Brunswick is $750,000, or $2.25 per capita. The state debt of Maine is $4,682,741, or $7 per head. The individual will, of course, go direct from New Brunswick, where the provincial debt is only $2.25 per head, to Maine, where the state debt is $7 per head. Or if it is taxation from which he is fleeing, it is, of course, likely that he will leave New Brunswick, where the provincial taxation is nil, to go to Maine where it is $1.63 per head. Or if it is municipal debt he is fleeing from he will, of course, leave New Brunswick where the municipal debt is $1,660,000 or $5 per head, and go to Maine where the municipal debt is $17,644,075, or $27.50 per head. Or if it is taxation he is afraid of, he will go to Maine where there is a municipal tax of $4,118,625, or $6.26 per head, when the municipal taxation in New Brunswick is estimated at about $3 per head. There is a practical answer. Suppose we take, for New Brunswick, the federal per capita taxation at $5.66 per head, the provincial at nothing and the municipal at $3 per head, the total is $8.66. In Maine the federal per capita taxation is $5.75, state $1.63, municipal $6.36, being a total of $13.74. That is to say that in New Brunswick the people have to pay only $8.66 per head as against $13.74 in Maine. We come now to Ontario, and if an individual goes from Toronto to Boston, what does he find? He goes from a city having a debt of $5,800,000 or $65 per capita to a city which has $28,241,018 of a debt, or $77.84 per capita. He will go from Toronto which has a yearly taxation of $901,376 or $10 per capita, to Boston, which has a yearly impost of $7,666,534 or $21.13 per head. And now as my hon. friend on the back seat wanted to have a few more cities, if he should take all the thirty-nine cities of Massachusetts and lumped them together he would find that the taxation per capita is $14.24, whilst in the City of Toronto it is but $10 per head. Perhaps, however, your fugitive citizen will not care to go from Toronto to Boston, but will go to the country places. He will leave Ontario and go to Massachusetts. He will leave a provincial debt of nothing at all, but instead a surplus in the treasury which is variously estimated at from $2,000,000 to $5,000,000, and he will go to Massachusetts where the state debt is $20,159,478, or $11.30 per head. He will leave Ontario, which has a municipal debt of $3.60 per capita and go to Massachusetts, which has a municipal debt of $40 per head. Or if you take the taxation he will leave Ontario, which has a municipal taxation of $4 per head, and go to Massachusetts, which has a municipal taxation of $13.64 per head. That, Sir, is why people leave this country, because of the debt and taxation; and what is more reasonable and common sense than to believe that they will leave a country like this for its debt and taxation, and go to a country where the debt and taxation are very much higher? The hon. gentleman wanted some States and I am going to give him some; and you will recollect that I have tried to be fair in this comparison in not taking the older States entirely, because they say the people leave our Provinces and go to the new territories. What do we find? Bear in mind that Ontario's provincial and municipal debt is $8.60 per head. He will find that the State and municipal debt of Wisconsin is $9; Minnesota, $11; Nebraska, $15; Colorado, $18; Dakota, $7.39, or 21 cents less than Ontario—enough to buy some bread to keep them on the way; Montana, $19.25. The same holds good with reference to State and municipal taxation. In Maine it is $7.39; Wisconsin, $5.77; Minnesota, $5.77; Nebraska, $6.17; Colorado, $11.07;

Mr. FOSTER.

Montana, $9.80, while that of Ontario is $4. Now, my hon. friend will listen to the figures for the cities. In 15 cities in Connecticut the per capita taxation was $12.31; in 10 Iowa cities, $9.24; in 23 Illinois cities, $9.53; in 8 Maine cities, $15.39; in 39 Massachusetts cities, $14.24; in 42 New York cities, $16.75; and in 10 Wisconsin cities, $8.47, whilst in Ontario, in Toronto it is but $10 per head, and taking the Province as a whole, it is but $4 per head. I have not got as far as Baltimore yet, but I have no doubt that if we took Baltimore with the other cities, they would be on the average about the same. As to whether these people leave for debt and the taxation, we must settle that question on the basis of common sense. But hon. gentlemen say the tariff drives them out of Canada and they go to the United States. In Canada the tariff on all imports, dutiable and free, is 17.32 per cent.; in the United States it is 30.05 per cent., while on dutiable imports in the United States, the percentage is 42.64. So that by their reasoning, the tariff drives them from a country which has a certain tariff into another country with a tariff from two to two and a half times as great. I leave that subject with the House and the country for further consideration. Mention has been made of my Province and of the Maritime Provinces. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) made allusion last night to the discontent which existed in Halifax and St. John, and he made allusion to the annexation boom which was sent through the country with reference to something which occurred in St. John not long ago. I have simply this remark to make, that I lay it down as a rule that wherever you find a man who talks or advocates annexation you will find that he belongs to the party of hon. gentlemen opposite; and as to the annexation boom in the City of St. John, I know it—I was there and I know all about it—there is not a man in this House who can tell me anything that I do not know about that so-called annexation movement.

An hon. MEMBER. Or anything else.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not say that. That is a sample of the way which hon. gentlemen have of exaggerating all the way through. I stated that I knew as much about this particular matter as any one else, and he says I stated that I knew as much about everything as anybody else. That is the way that they act with their tariff arguments. On this side it is said that legislation will so improve the country that laborers will be employed and better wages paid. They go out and say that we state that by legislation for a country we will always keep wages up. So with the hon. member for Halton. When I said I knew as much about the annexation boom in St. John as anyone else, he says I stated that I knew as much about anything as anyone else.

Mr. McCraney. I did not say that. When the hon. gentleman said that there was no man in this House could tell him anything he did not know about that question. I said: "Yes, and I suppose about anything else."

Mr. FOSTER. As to this annexation talk which took place in St. John, or as to the meeting which was subsequently held, there is only one man, if there was one, that did not rise up in the meeting and either openly denounce any sentiment of annexation, or who was not loud in his statements and his demonstrations of loyalty to the flag under which we live. I say the people of St. John are loyal, that they are descendants of men who were loyal. They came to the country, and to the city, which, when they landed, had little to recommend it; they carved out homes and fortunes for themselves, and against disadvantages which probably no city in this continent has had to contend with, the merchants, business men and people of St. John have held their own, and have striven manfully for their social, political and commercial position. And I say it is wrong to spread through this country on the wings of the newspaper press the statement that there is annexation or disloyal sentiment in the city of St. John or the Province of New Brunswick. With reference to St. John, it made large gains by its shipping trade which has gone down; it depended largely on the building of wooden ships and this industry has declined, and the people of St. John have had to contend with that drawback. They depended largely on lumber, and the depressed state of the lumber trade, due to no National Policy, but following the general over-stocking of the great lumber market and the supply necessary for it in the world, and they have lost on that. They lost in one day and night more than $10,000,000, of hard earnings, the accumulation of years of patient industry and hard toil, yet, under all these circumstances, the Province of New Brunswick stands to-day in the proud position of having doubled its trade from 1867 to 1884. In 1868 the exports of New Brunswick were $4,626,727, and the imports $6,523,395, a total trade of $11,150,122. That makes as near as can be the whole of the export and import trade of the Province at that time. In 1874, we find that the exports increased to $6,503,934 and the imports to $10,233,871, a total trade of $16,727,805. In other words, the exports increased from 1868 to 1874 40 per cent., the imports increased 56 per cent. and the total trade increased 50 per cent. When we come to 1879, we find that the export trade had decreased 17 per cent., that the import trade had decreased 48 per cent., and that the total trade had decreased 37 per cent. Coming to the year 1884, however, we find that the export trade has increased again 28 per cent., the import trade has increased 34 per cent., and the total trade has increased 38 per cent. These are the figures taken simply from the Trade and Navigation Returns. Now, I want to call the attention of hon. gentlemen to one fact. Whereas in 1868 the imports and exports represent what was about the actual trade, to-day the exports and imports do not show the total trade. There is the interprovincial trade with Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and with the Upper Provinces. Sir, I am in a position to state, and I do not believe I can be truthfully contradicted, that, adding the total interprovincial trade of the Province of New Brunswick, on a fair estimate such as has been made by some of the leading business men of St. John, the total trade of the Province has doubled since 1868. Various great changes have taken place since then. Then the city of St. John was almost the only outport and in-port of the Province; but since then other ports have taken trade; railroads have been built, and various lines of communication established; and trade has taken different channels from what it had in 1868. In that respect the course of trade has worked somewhat to the detriment of the city of St. John, although the total trade of New Brunswick has increased in the ratio I have stated. I say, moreover, speaking from my own knowledge, that I believe the people of the Province of New Brunswick now raise more agricultural produce and meat produce on their farms and get more for it, and that they live better and are worth more, than in any preceding year in the history of the Province. Mr. Speaker, I have in closing, only to ask the attention of the House to a matter which has been noted in this debate. We have had the medical men sitting in council; we have had the diseases diagnosed from every possible standpoint; we have had theory after theory stated; we have had fear after fear expressed; but I ask hon. gentlemen on this side to look at the whole course of this debate and say if they can what single nostrum has been prescribed for the diseases of the body politic. Everybody knows that it is far easier to destroy than to build up, but after all we might suppose that they would put something in the place of what they destroy, propose a substitute for what they condemn. They ask us to throw aside what we have at present, but what do they give as a plank to step on? They ask us to go aside from the plain beaten road we have been travelling on since 1878, and they give us nothing to travel on in its place. So long as the Dominion of Canada progresses as it has done, so long as it possesses a people so strong and hopeful and resources so wide and rich as it is every day finding that it possesses, so long as it looks forward to a career, alongside and independent of the countries that border it—a career that involves in itself difficulties which have to be met by hard toil—it is the determination of the young men of this country, and of the people of this country to hold their fortune in their own hands, to keep their own country together, and make it stronger and stronger by the bonds of common intercourse and commercial ties, and in a hopeful spirit to go on in the development of our great heritage, as men who believe they have a country which has a present as it has a past, and which will have a future more grand and glorious by far than either past or the present give us any indication of.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman from Pictou (Mr. Tupper) who addressed the House the other day congratulated the House and the country upon the fact that the hon. Finance Minister was able to draw a picture of the commercial sky tinged with blue. I am sure that he must have been much more gratified at hearing the hon. member for King's, N. B., (Mr. Foster), because that hon. gentleman was not content with putting in a bit of blue sky but painted the whole sky cerulean blue, unfecked by a single cloud. One would imagine from the speech of the hon. gentleman that there was no such thing as depression, that the country was satisfied with the existing Administration from one end of Canada to the other, that the people of the Maritime Provinces, the people of the North-West, the people of Ontario and Quebec were all satisfied with the existing condition of things; but if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) had heard the Finance Minister on previous occasions and had compared his speeches on those occasions with his last utterances, he would have found the style in each very different. On former occasions his style was one of attack and of glorification; to-day he adopts the style of defence and of apology. He was sorry that this and the other thing had happened, he was sorry that matters were not as bright commercially as he would wish; but towards the close he rose very patriotically, pictured a bright future for the country, and declared that there was not an annexationist to be found in the whole of Canada unless in the ranks of the Grits. I shall have a word or two to say about this later. The hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster) asked what particular nostrum had been proposed by the Opposition to relieve the country. But that is not the question at issue. The question arises out of the fact that the particular nostrum proposed by the Finance Minister and supported by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster) and all his friends, has brought this country to the condition in which it is, and it remains for them to give explanations as to how they are going to remedy that condition. I do not know that it would be a crime if a man honestly believed that annexation was preferable to the existing state of things in this country. I do not believe in annexation myself.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It would only be high treason.

Mr. DAVIES. It may be high treason. I do not know that the statute of limitations runs against that crime, and if it does not it is time for the Prime Minister to prosecute some of his colleagues. Our memories are not so bad after all, and I think it is within the recollection of more than one hon. gentleman of this House that not many years ago certain gentlemen published a manifesto to the people of Canada, in which they declared that annexation was the one nostrum, as the hon. member for King's calls it, which would save this country. Who were these gentlemen who went about proclaiming that annexation should be accomplished by any and all means? Were they Grits? When I give the hon. gentleman, the Premier, the names, I hope he will make a memorandum of them, and if he will not prosecute them I hope, at any rate, he will not associate with them. The first name I find on the list is no less than that of Sir John Rose, who formerly held a high financial position in this country, who was in the Cabinet of the hon. gentleman, and who is now in England, where at times he assists us in our financial operations; then there is the name of an hon. gentleman who often beams on us from the opposite side, the hon. member from Argenteuil (Mr. Abbott). His name, if I mistake not, is appended to that memorial. Then there is the name of a gentleman who for some years back has, by the good will and votes of the Conservative party, occupied the high position of mayor of Montreal, no less a person than Jean Louis Beaudry, ex-mayor of Montreal, a Tory of the Tories, a Tory incarnate; he signed the manifesto, and through occupying the high position of mayor of Montreal, he has had occasion to come before the Prime Minister again and again, and though the hon. gentleman knows Mr. Beaudry is guilty of the crime of high treason, though he knows he can be convicted because his name has been fixed to this manifesto, yet there has been no prosecution. I fear the First Minister has been derelict in his duty in this matter. The name of another gentleman, a gentleman occupying a high position in the country and in the council of the hon. gentleman himself appears on this treasonable document. The old adage says, "a man is known by the company he keeps." Would it be believed that an hon. gentleman who has had the accolade laid across both shoulders by Her Majesty, who is associated with the right hon. gentleman at this moment as Minister of the Interior, affixed his name to this manifesto? He, too, is guilty of high treason, and yet the First Minister associates with him, although he knows he is a man disloyal to Her Majesty whose subject the right hon. gentleman so proudly professes to be. And that is not all. High in the councils of his country and standing high in the confidence of the Prime Minister is the Finance Minister, and I am told there exists a document signed by S. L. Tilley—whether he be the Finance Minister or not the hon. gentleman will be able to state—declaring in favor of this high treason, and pronouncing himself an annexationist. I hold in my hand a proclamation from which the following is an extract:—

"The time has come for this Province to address the Sovereign with an explicit declaration that unless relief be obtained, separation from the Empire and the independence of the North American colonies will be desirable and inevitable."

(Signed) S. L. TILLEY,
Secretary and Treasurer.

He held all the offices in the society. My hon. friend beside me says that he always does hold all the offices. He was then in high repute as a financier. He was treasurer of the society for the annexation of this Dominion to the United States, he was guilty of high treason; Mr. DAVIES.

he afterwards received the honors of knighthood from Her Majesty and sits in the councils of the right hon. the First Minister, and I have never heard him retract his disloyalty yet or regret his high treason. Now I want to know what the Prime Minister is going to do about it? It is an important question. It deserves his serious consideration, for we find that hon. gentlemen in the year of grace 1885 associating and consorting with, and daily taking into his confidence, these gentlemen who have declared themselves in favor of annexation and who, according to the hon. gentleman himself, are guilty of high treason. Will the member for King's (Mr. Foster) say whether they are Grits or not? I have a suspicion that he follows their lead, and I say that, until they retract their high treason, he is an accomplice in the crime.

The hon. gentleman has said, echoing the cry which comes from many of his colleagues, that the truth shall not be told in this matter of the real condition of Canada, or rather that it is desirable as far as possible to conceal the truth provided the statement of that truth prejudicially affects the country in which you live. That I understand to be the result of the hon. gentleman's statement.

Mr. FOSTER. The whole truth.

Mr. DAVIES. He says that proclaiming that there is such a thing as an exodus to the States it is calculated to injure the country, and that it should not be stated though it is the truth. He has gone further than anyone else and has denied the exodus, and, with his logical mind, he has laid before the House the reasons which have induced him to come to that conclusion. He says this country is more lightly taxed, that this is a better country for farmers to live in, that it is a better country for merchants to make their living in, and that it is absurd to imagine that people would leave this country and go to the United States, where there is more debt, more taxation, and less opportunity to make a livelihood than here. Therefore, having proved that this is a better country, having proved that there is less debt and that there is less taxation here, the statement that there is an exodus cannot be true, because the people would be fools to go away. No doubt he has satisfied his own mind that the logic is good; but what are the facts? I would re-echo the statement which my hon. friend from Brant has made historical, quoting from the elaborate report of the gentlemen appointed to enquire into our manufacturing interests, and I would say to my hon. friends: A truce to sentiment, let us have facts. What are the facts? It is a fact contained in the census report, a fact well known to the hon. gentleman, a fact which he could not shut his eyes to, a fact which he has heard repeated and has never heard challenged in this House, that in the United States there are 712,000 Canadians to-day, and yet he says there is no exodus. If that is so, what is the meaning of the language the Minister of Public Works used the other day. He is not a gentleman who usually indulges in any gasconade. I have found him a pretty practical gentleman, one who talks about practical subjects in a pretty practical way, but a short time ago he was lamenting in the most eloquent language that so many of his compatriots had left this country and gone to the United States. What did he say?

"But, gentlemen, our mission would be but half accomplished if we forgot that we have on the other side of latitude 45 a great number of our fellow countrymen who would like nothing better than to return home and sit down to the family table and eat with us, and to earn their living under the institutions now existing in Canada."

The member for King's has proved to a demonstration that, if they could have earned their living here they never would have gone away. The Minister of Public Works says they have gone. The member for King's has proved with his inexorable logic that they could not have gone. There must be something wrong in the logic or about the facts. Probably it is so much the worse for the facts. The Minister of Public Works continues :

"I need not say, gentlemen, that it is with the greatest satisfaction and pleasure that I am able to announce to you this evening that the Government of Canada intend to take measures, and energetic measures, to recall into the limits of our own territory all our fellow countrymen in the United States who desire to return and live with us. You will understand, gentlemen, that in a banquet like this I must be excused if I do not give all details of the ministerial measures that we propose to bring down next Session. But in any case, it is well you should know that our compatriots in the United States, whether they be of French origin or of any other origin, they are not forgotten, and all that can be done to bring them back to this country we shall do most heartily."

What position will the hon. member for King's take when this Government measure comes down to spend the money of the country and bring back the people from the States who, according to his logic, never went there at all? Will he back up the Government measure, or will he have the independence to act up to his convictions and say: I have proved that it is impossible that these people can have gone, and therefore I must vote against the expenditure? But in addition to those 712,000 Canadians, who, according to the census of the United States were living there in 1880, it has been proved beyond doubt, it has been admitted by the gentlemen on the other side that over 400,000 of our population have gone to the United States since. There is over a million of people who should have been in Canada, who are in Canada according to the hon. member for King's, for it is only a figment of the imagination to suppose that they are not here; but the trouble is they do not pay their taxes here and do not earn their living here; an ungrateful country has turned them off and they are now in the United States. But, if he wants more authority, I would call his attention to a paragraph which appeared in the organ of the hon. member from Montreal who, in a very loud and very eloquent speech addressed the House last night. I believe this is known as his organ, and at all events it endorses the views the hon. gentleman is pleased to enunciate, and holds him up, I believe, as a man of very high authority in this House. I find in the issue of that paper of March the 12th, no longer ago than yesterday, a paragraph headed "Departure of French Canadians." And this in the year of grace 1885, under the régime of the hon. gentleman, assisted by the Minister of Public Works, and supported by the member for King's—

"During the last week more than 100 Canadian families'—

That is 500 people—

"have left from the different districts of the Province of Quebec, and have gone to establish themselves in the United States or in the North-West."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES. "Hear, hear," says the hon. member from North Perth (Mr. Hesson). Never sing out till you are out of the woods. Just wait till you hear the remainder of the paragraph, which is either penned by the member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) or published with his approval.

"Most of them, however, have gone to the United States, mostly to Illinois and Wisconsin."

And, worse and worse :

"Lots more are preparing to emigrate."

The hon. gentleman does not cheer that statement. Well, Sir, is it wise, I ask seriously, is it prudent, is it right, for the representatives of the people, with these facts staring them in the face, from all sources, from the census of the United States, from our own census, from the organs of the hon. gentlemen opposite, to shut their eyes to them and say: We do not believe them; or to indulge in some theories such as the hon. gentleman who spoke before dinner indulged in, to prove that they do not exist? No, Sir; our part as representatives of the people and as statesmen will be to acknowledge the facts and try to find some remedy for them. I remember that in 1878 hon. gentlemen went on pilgrimages through this country from one end to the other, proclaiming that the country was being ruined because there was an emigration to the United States. Oh, it was right enough then; it was their duty to do it; honest souls, they could not shut their eyes to what was before them. Their hearts were bursting and bleeding for their poor country, and they were bound to tell the truth. But now that they are in power, now that the exodus is going on worse than ever before—fourfold greater than ever in the history of Canada, those gentlemen say: Hush! not a word. Don't injure your country. Don't be unpatriotic. Keep perfectly quiet; perhaps things will right themselves. No, Mr. Speaker, that is not the way. We meet hon. gentlemen now with the statements that they made then. When they introduced their political nostrum, their National Policy; and made Canada a dearer country to live in than it used to be, we told them the result would be to drive the poor man out of this country to another country which was cheaper to live in. I am sorry to say, I regret it as a Canadian, I deeply regret that the financial positions of the two countries now, as compared with what they were sixteen or seventeen years ago, are such as to justify, to a great extent, the exodus of our people. Now, Sir, my hon. friend from King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster) says there is no such thing in the country as discontent; that it is all one beautiful harmony from the east to the west, cemented by the iron rails that run from Halifax away to the Rocky Mountains; that everybody is happy, everybody is contented; that there is no truth in the statement that there is discontent; that it is simply the outs trying to get in, and there is no principle in it. Well, the hon. gentleman may believe that the whole of his opponents are actuated by motives of the worst kind. He may choose to believe that there is no such thing as principle in public life—he may know there is no such thing as principle, for aught I know. He may know his own mind, but he cannot know the minds of those who sit opposite to him. I say there is such a thing as principle. I say the members of the Opposition in this House and their supporters out of it have as great a stake in this country as the hon. gentlemen opposite, and they know it right well. This is our home, it is where our families are, where our all is, and we desire to make it a fine country in the future. But it is madness, it would be folly, the height of folly, to shut our eyes to the facts staring us on every side. Why, Sir, take the very city of St. John, that the hon. gentleman says he lives in. What did I see the other day? I find the business men of St. John meeting in that commercial centre as a board of trade. I have the names, but I am not going to weary the House by reading them—the names of the leading men of St. John, the leading commercial magnates of the commercial emporium of New Brunswick, the men who form public opinion there, who control the commerce of New Brunswick, I may say. I find them meeting in solemn conclave and formulating their views in a resolution expressing very different ideas from those which the hon. member wishes us to believe exist in their minds. I would take the liberty to quote that resolution :

"Resolved, That the boards of trade of the Maritime Provinces, and the Local Legislatures and Governments of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick be requested to take such steps as to them may seem right for the pressing upon Parliament and the Government at Ottawa the need there is that the foreign and intercolonial trade of these Provinces should not be allowed to be injured by such adverse action as can be avoided, and that such steps should be taken by the Maritime Provinces as may enable them to exercise more influence at Ottawa upon the course of legislation and executive action than hitherto we have been able to; and that as far as this board has power to express its opinion, it declares, irrespective of political parties, that since the union of these Provinces the just expectations of the Maritime Provinces have not been realized, and dissatisfaction with the union has become a general sentiment among the people, who desire a remedy under, rather than against, the constitution, and whose loyalty to the Crown and respect for the laws of the country is the only reason why stronger and more unmistakeable action has not been taken in the matter.'

Sir, that language is strong and to the point, and I think it is true.

Mr. FOSTER. How many signed it?

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman opposite has not reflected in any sense the opinion of the commercial public of St. John, or of the people of New Brunswick.

Mr. FOSTER. How many signed it?

Mr. DAVIES. I am glad the hon. gentleman asked me the question, because my answer will enable the House to gauge exactly the public opinion of St. John. There were twenty-four merchants present; sixteen voted in favor of the resolution I have read, and eight voted against it. What does the hon. gentleman say to that?

An hon. MEMBER. All Grits, were they not?

Mr. DAVIES. Well, I have looked over the names; I happen to know some of the gentlemen. I do not live so far away that I do not know the leading merchants there, and I tell the hon. gentleman that some of the strongest Conservatives in St. John voted for that resolution, and the hon. gentleman knows it well.

Mr. FOSTER. Who?

Mr. DAVIES. I will hand the paper across the floor, if the hon. gentleman wishes to see it. It is not necessary to take up the time of the House by reading the names.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Names, names.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. member can take the paper. Any hon. gentleman who wishes the names can take the paper and see them for himself. Now, Mr. Speaker, I find this resolution declaring in unmistakeable terms that dissatisfaction has become a general sentiment among the people, and I find a vote of two to one in the commercial centre of New Brunswick in favor of that resolution. I find these facts recorded in the public press and forwarded to the members at Ottawa, and yet the hon. gentleman does not hesitate to stand up and say there is not a word of truth in the whole statement, that the merchants of St. John have been guilty of deception, that they have been guilty of more than deception—of deliberate lying—that is what it comes to; that they have not expressed in any way or sense the opinion of the people. Now the hon. gentleman went on to show further, that everything in the sky was lovely, that the prospects were delightful, and the existing state of things were everything that could be desired. I have had handed to me to-day a copy of Bradstreet's report, issued in the month of January, giving the report of the failures in the United States and Canada during the past year—I may say during the past five years. I would like hon. gentlemen to take note of the figures, for they speak louder than any mere words can speak, and they point to a conclusion very different from that which the hon. member's rosy speech would lead us to believe exists. I find that in 1880, in this Dominion, there were 907 failures, with liabilities of $7,900,000; in 1881, 635 failures, with liabilities of $5,751,000; in 1882, 797 failures, with liabilities of $3,587,000; in 1883, 1,384 failures, with liabilities of $15,940,000; and in the last year, 1884, 1,327 failures, with liabilities approaching $20,000,000.

Mr. HESSON. What were the failures in the Grit régime?

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman and his friends have given them often enough. They have been read from every platform in the Dominion; they have been the political stock-in-trade, and the only political stock-in-trade, of some hon. gentlemen for years. Why, Sir, it is not a matter of dispute. We know that in 1877-78 there was a great depression, not only in Canada, but over the whole commercial world. We admit there were failures in Canada, as there were failures in the United States, and as there were failures in Great Britain. We never sought to deny it. But our position at that time was this: We said that commercial depression was the result of natural causes, which were pointed out from time to time, and that mere Acts of Parliament, mere resolutions of the people's representatives, could not remedy that state of affairs, and that time was the only remedy for it. But they said, no; we can remedy it by Acts of Parliament. The hon. gentleman opposite denied to-night that they had said so. He issued a challenge, and assuming a theatrical position and raising his voice, he challenged any hon. gentleman on this side to come forward and give one single statement from any authorised leader of the party to the effect that they had declared they could remedy the then depression by Acts of Parliament, could make a country by Acts of Parliament more prosperous than it was. He issued that challenge not once, but two or three times. I accept the challenge, and I tell him we can do it. I tell him more, that they carried this country, not only by promises of the kind to which I have referred, but by other promises, which they have not kept and have not attempted to keep, but which they are to-day repudiating. I remember when Sir Charles Tupper, who will be acknowledged to have held as high a status in the party at least as the hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster), who had as much to do with the formulation of the National Policy as the hon. member for King's, or any hon. member on that side—I remember when Sir Charles Tupper went through the country, previous to the elections of 1878, and declared what the policy was and what remedies were to be proposed, in case the party were elected, to remove the distress. I remember his coming to Charlottetown and speaking there for a length of time. I remember, among other promises he made to catch the people of the Maritime Provinces and induce them to vote for the National Policy, was, that within two years they would give us reciprocity with the United States; and I say, and I say it deliberately and with a thorough knowledge of the views of a large section of the people of the Maritime Provinces, that these promises, reiterated as they were on every hustings, with all the solemnity and force that the hon. gentleman could give to his words, had as much to do, if not more to do, with returning the party to power than anything else which occurred. Hon. gentlemen opposite came into power on the strength of those promises, and they have repudiated them. They have betrayed the people who placed trust in their promises, and to-day, with this policy, we are further away from reciprocal trade with the United States, and they wish us to be further away than our people were in 1878. I quoted this language, which I shall read, in the presence of Sir Charles Tupper in this House, and he accepted it as correct. On the occasion to which I refer, that gentleman said:

"All you have to do to-day is to support the protective National Policy of Sir John A. Macdonald, in order to obtain a reciprocity treaty with the United States within two years."

Mr. WOODWORTH. What year was that?

Mr. DAVIES. In 1878, in the drill shed at Charlottetown, when there were between two and three thousand people present. That declaration and certain telegrams which came down from the leader of the Government, to the effect that taxation would not be increased, had much to do with their success at the polls.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). What carried the last election?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The colonisation companies and the Gerrymandering Bill.

Mr. DAVIES. We will see whether any leader of the party was guilty of the offence which the hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster) declared no leader was guilty of, namely, that of making what he called a puerile declaration. I hope some of the friends of Sir Charles Tupper will defend the character of that gentleman. The hon. member for King's said it would be puerile to declare that by Act of Parliament a Government could bring about commercial prosperity or commercial distress. We have been teaching hon. gentlemen opposite for years that doctrine; it has been one of the political platforms of the party, that mere Acts of Parliament cannot bring about commercial prosperity. What said Sir Charles Tupper in 1878, and I would not repeat it if we had not been challenged by the hon. member for King's. Sir Charles Tupper said, as reported in Hansard:

"The hon. gentleman ought to know that if Governments are good for anything, they are good to increase the prosperity of the country by Acts of Parliament."

Why do hon. gentlemen opposite not do it? There is distress now, there is depression now, from one end of the country to the other; where is the Act of Parliament? Bring it along; let us see it. But hon. gentlemen opposite know they are powerless, that they are flies on the wheel. They have to-day to accept the political axiom laid down by the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright); they have to adopt that in the sense of which he used the words, that Parliaments are powerless to remove great depressions of trade; Parliaments are powerless by means of Acts of Parliament to bring about commercial prosperity. Talk about political planks in a platform. What plank could the hon. member for King's have laid down firmer and stronger than the declaration of the gentleman who was second in command in the Government, a declaration given in his vigorous language, which cannot be misunderstood and which has no double meaning. He goes on to say, at page 556 of Hansard:

"The hon. gentleman [myself, I suppose] says that the prosperity of the country cannot be obtained and promoted by Acts of Parliament. We deny it. We say that you may make the very taxation necessary to sustain the public credit by meeting the interest on the public debt and discharging the ordinary administration of public affairs, a means of so fostering our industries as to give to the people the money that is required in order to pay the taxes."

Let hon. gentlemen opposite admit they have changed their views; let them say that those declarations were puerile, as the hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster) calls them, and then we meet on common ground. Perhaps we may even pardon some of their past transgressions if they come acknowledging their sins. Sir Charles Tupper further said:

"The policy the Government has pursued has had the effect of depopulating the country."

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." Then why do you continue it? Here is a document issued by the Finance Minister, a report of gentlemen who visited every town in the Maritime Provinces, who say there is great depression, depression in this branch of trade and in the other. Why do hon. gentlemen not bring in an Act to restore prosperity? What is the use of a platform if you do not act on it, and when you bring part of it forward it is so musty as not to be worth anything? Either acknowledge you are wrong and say you deceived the country, or bring in an Act and fulfil your pledges. These remarks had to be made in answer to the hon. gentleman's challenge. If they had not been made, hon. gentlemen opposite would have risen in their seats and said that although the challenge has been given, we had refused to accept it. Then, Sir Charles Tupper goes on to say:

"It has sent away the most skilled and intelligent labor, the finest sons of Canada, to a foreign country, to obtain the employment their own country denies them."

He said, in effect, that the then Government did not do anything by Act of Parliament, and the consequence was that the country was depressed. Apply the same reasoning now. The country is being depopulated in a ratio four times as great as then; and by your own showing you are the cause of it. Hon. gentlemen opposite are directly responsible, by their own reasoning, for the work of depopulation that is now going on. Sir Charles Tupper said:

"That is a fatal policy, and one which must induce us to forego all our aspirations for anything like a rapidly increased greatness for this country in the future, and to consent to become hewers of wood and drawers of water for our friends across the line in the great Republic of the United States."

This is a fatal policy, and still you are going to pursue it. Hon. gentlemen, so far as Acts of Parliament are concerned, are to remain inactive when they should fulfil their pledges; they called for Acts of Parliament then. It did very well in opposition to make that declaration; but now the member for King's declares that no responsible person ever used such language, and that if he did, it was puerile. It is too late to make that declaration now, for hon. gentlemen opposite rode into power on the strength of their promises, and they must either fulfil them or retract them.

Now, Sir, I will make one further remark on the argument of that hon. gentleman, and one only—an argument to which the Finance Minister has given his imprimatur and which he has endorsed several times—that the best evidence that there is prosperity exists in the figures respecting the savings banks. I do not accept that as conclusive evidence that the country is prosperous; I do not accept it as very cogent evidence that the country is prosperous. I contend, Sir, that the fact that money is being hoarded up in the savings banks at 4 per cent. to the extent and in the mode in which it is hoarded up, is evidence, not of prosperity, but of depression in commercial circles. It is an evidence that there is not that demand for money in paying channels which justifies the people in taking it out of the savings banks. The hon. member may laugh, but it would be better for him to answer the argument instead of laughing. I have great respect for the hon. gentleman, although I think he is somewhat bigoted in his views, but I call attention to one period, and I think they will not deny that if, in the most prosperous period in this country's history, there were not increased deposits in the saving banks, it will show that they are not correct in arguing that large deposits are a sign of prosperity. What are the facts? Take the years 1872-73-74, and I think it will be acknowledged that we never had such prosperous times. It is universally acknowledged that we were on the wave of prosperity, that a boom existed from one end of the country to the other. Were the deposits in the savings banks, at 4 per cent., increased during those years? No, they were not; and the reason was that money was in demand for profitable use in commercial circles, and men would not put their money in the banks at 4 per cent. if they could make 6, 7, and 8 per cent. in reasonable commercial ventures. In 1872 the deposits in the savings banks were $3,096,000; in 1873, $3,207,000, and in 1874, $3,204,000. Those are the figures and those are the years, and if hon. gentlemen are correct in stating that increased deposits in savings banks are evidence of prosperity, then they will have to ignore or repudiate the fact that the three years I have named, when the deposits did not increase, were prosperous years. They were prosperous years, and the amount in the banks did not increase, and therefore the fact that they have increased since is no evidence that the times are good. But I give the hon. gentleman another evidence. Does he remember, a few years ago, when the leader of the Irish party rose in the House of Commons and, backed by a number of his friends, told the Government of the day that Ireland was in great distress? Does he remember that the leader of the Government told them that starvation and famine were imminent, and does he remember the reply that came from the ministerial benches? It was said: That statement cannot be true, because the deposits in the savings banks are increasing. The very same evidence was pointed out, but the facts that depression and starvation were impending were true nevertheless, and before another year rolled by gaunt famine stared the people of Ireland in the face, and this Parliament rose to the occasion and sent a contribution of $100,000, I believe, to assist in getting bread for that starving people. At that time the deposits in the savings banks had run up to an unprecedented amount. What was the cause of it? The simple cause was, that there was not that confidence in the commerce of the country which justified the people in going into commercial ventures, and they preferred to hoard their money in the savings banks at 3 or 4 per cent. interest. I say this, that speaking my own mind, it is not conclusive evidence, it is not cogent evidence of the existence of prosperity, that these sums on deposit are mounting up as they are. I tell hon. gentlemen, those of them that come from the Maritime Provinces, at any rate, that we know, every one of us knows, it to be a fact that these savings banks deposits are not the savings of the laboring classes at all, to any appreciable extent. They are the moneys belonging to trustees, to well-to-do farmers and others, to lawyers and those kinds of people. We know that the laboring classes do not, to any appreciable extent, deposit in them. People can get 4 per cent. there, and we know that money has been withdrawn from the ordinary banks of the country, when they reduced the interest to 3 per cent., and put into the savings banks, which allow them 1 per cent. higher. Any hon. gentleman knows that no man would be foolish enough to leave his money in the ordinary chartered banks at 3 per cent. when he can get 4 per cent., with a Government guarantee, in the savings banks. I say that the savings banks returns do not bear out the conclusions which hon. gentlemen have urged they do.

Now, I propose to say a word or two with reference to the speech delivered by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. That hon. gentleman complained of the Opposition very seriously. He says a few years ago you denounced the Government because by their policy those who invested money in manufactories were drawing enormous dividends, and to-day you denounce them because they are not getting any dividends at all. He says you are inconsistent. Surely that hon. gentleman cannot have forgotten that the very effects that have followed the carrying out of this policy were foretold by the leaders of the Reform party, by the free traders of this country. They told him, time and time again, if you offer a premium to place capital in certain lines of business you will draw to those lines of business a larger amount than should legitimately go there, and the result will be that the first-comers who go into the business will derive large profits, and when more money is invested in those lines of business than they will justify, and when the result is over-production, the profits will be dissipated. Those who went in first will, perhaps, make large fortunes, and those who go in afterwards will get nothing at all, and so it has been. It is always the case. If you offer a high premium to induce capital to go into a certain line of business you are sure to get more capital into that business than it will justify. And so it has followed here. We have had two results. Capital went into cotton mills and sugar mills, and at first they were making 10, 20, 30, 40 and 50 per cent., but now there has been over-production when more capital went in than the business would justify, more spindles have been put in the mills than they required, more cotton was produced than could be consumed, and the results are depression, stagnation, the next thing to ruin—no dividends; and to-day many who have invested their money in cotton mills find that the fine promises made to them have not been kept, and while those who went in first got 40 per cent., to-day they cannot get 5. But the hon. gentleman must not conclude from that that there is any inconsistency in our argument. I say that the two things follow each other as the natural consequence of their policy. Then the hon. gentleman goes on to say that over-production has not been caused by the policy of the Government, but by the speeches of the Opposition. Well, Sir, I never heard such nonsense uttered in my life. How can the speeches of the Opposition cause over-production? Over-production has been caused by having more capital in business than the consumption of the country justified. You cannot compete with foreign markets; it has been proved here by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) and others, that your exports of manufactures are not increasing; you cannot compete abroad. It costs too much, under your policy, to make the goods; you are confined to the home market; you have over-stocked the home market, and the result is ruin—unemployed or unremunerative capital locked up. The tall chimneys which once emitted volumes of smoke are no longer active; the hum which the hon. gentleman found from one end of the Dominion to the other is silent; he takes no pilgrimages to-day to find out the truth for himself; his ear does not listen to the sweet hum of industry now, but he sends his friend, Mr. Willis, down to the Provinces, and he finds stagnation and depression. He thinks trade will revive. People, he says, are foolish to imagine, like Sir Charles Tupper, that Acts of Parliament can build up business; they were very foolish to put so much capital into the business, and they are now reaping the reward of their folly. No, Sir; they are reaping the reward of the folly of the Government, who induced them to put faith in a policy that offered a premium to those who invested their money in these manufactories. The result is, as I say, that many of the factories are shut up, and others are working at half or two-thirds time. Let the hon. gentleman go through the Province of New Brunswick to-day, and what will he find? Take his own report. His agent was sent out for the purpose of seeing if he could not find the hum. He found it only in a few instances; he found it very weak—only a little squeak, in some places. But the hon. Minister of Marine waxed indignant over the remark that was made on this side of the House, that his Government were not the friends of the workingmen. The best evidence he said that could be given that they were, was that they continued to pay 4 per cent. interest on deposits in the savings banks. That is assuming that the deposits are those of workingmen. I say that is not so, as regards the Maritime Provinces at any rate. But what was the policy of these hon. gentlemen towards the workingmen when they got into power? They had hardly got themselves safely and snugly ensconced into their seats on the Treasury benches before they issued an edict cutting down the salary of every workingman on the Intercolonial Railway and on the Prince Edward Island Railway. For fear that any man would get paid for bur-nishing the brass on the engines, they actually sent out an order that it should be painted with tar. That is the kindness they exhibited towards the workingman. The workingman may well say: Save me from such friends as the Minister of Marine and his colleagues. Sir, the hon. Minister waxed very eloquent—he does not speak often, but when he does he always waxes eloquent—over the fact that there was a large debt in the United States after the civil war, and that there was nothing left to show for it but the dead soldiers and the white tombstones that marked their last resting-places. I hope, Sir, that his remarks will be read not only in this country but across the border, so that the people of the United States may see what an intelligent appreciation some of our public men have of that brave struggle in which they engaged for so many years and out of which they came triumphant. I think most of the people in the United States believe that there was more left to them than the bodies of the dead soldiers and the white tombstones over their graves. I think the hon. gentleman will find that a great country arose out of that war—the greatest republic of ancient or modern times. I think he will find that one of the results of that war was the blotting out of the great curse of slavery, which was for many years such a drag on that great country. Yes, Sir, if that war did nothing else than to make all men, as their Declaration of Independence says, free and equal before the law; if it did nothing else than abolish the curse of slavery, and weld all those great States into one great nation, it would be worth double the money they spent on it. The hon. gentleman is very narrow-sighted or weak-sighted, or he must have read history backwards, to speak in the way he did of that great struggle. I do not propose to deal further with any of the remarks of that hon. gentleman.

I will, for a few moments, call the attention of the House to some facts and figures—and I shall be very short in doing so—which make me, Sir, at any rate, consider the situation in this country as a very grave situation—a situation so grave and so serious that a mere speech is not going to dissipate the gloom which hangs over it—a situation so grave and serious, Sir, as to call for the thoughtful consideration of the best men on both sides of the House and in the country. I remember that the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) the other day rose and said that after hearing the speech of the Finance Minister he felt as if a weight had been taken off his shoulders—that he felt somewhat reassured; and why? Because, he said, he, in common with a great many people in this country, after reading the speeches of the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), had come to the conclusion that this country was in a very bad plight—had come to the conclusion that we were doubling our taxation and debt at a rate unprecedented in the history of any other colony—had come to the conclusion that, in the brief language used the other day by the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. White), the time had come when we should call halt. I want to call attention to the facts and figures which so startled the hon. member for Pictou, and as he tells us, a large number of his constituents. The statement of the hon. member for South Huron was so serious that I repeat it. It was that this country could only thrive and become prosperous and great if it could succeed in inducing a large portion of the emigration from the old country to come and settle here permanently; that it could only do so by showing to them that this was a cheap country to live in, where a man could get an honest day's wage for an honest day's toil; and he said that was the kind of country it was some years ago. He said that seventeen years ago, as compared with the country to the south, which is absorbing so much immigration, Canada occupied a splendid position. In 1867 the United States emerged from the civil war with a debt of $2,500,000,000 upon its shoulders—a debt of $69 per head, with 36,000,000 of a population in the country—a debt great enough to make the strongest mind almost despair of the future of his country; while at that very time Canada, young, buoyant, hopeful, was bounding forward on the path of progress with the comparatively small debt of $75,000,000, or $22.50 per head, with a population of 3,400,000; and he pointed to the fact that the balance was so much in our favor that wherever it was known, those who were seeking new homes, where they and their children after them might live permanently, preferred to come to a low-taxed country and one cheap to live in, and with a debt so much less than that of the country to the south. He called attention to the fact that in the year 1884 all that has been reversed, and that while they have reduced their $2,500,000,000 debt to $1,438,000,000, or $25.39 per head, Canada, by the 1st of next July, will have a debt of at least $240,000,000, or nearly $50 a head.

Mr. HESSON. Did they raise it by free trade?

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman should understand that there is free trade over a greater area of country in that great confederacy of nations than almost anywhere else in the world. From the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the border line of Canada down to the Gulf of Mexico, there is not a Custom house existing. The trade between one State and another is free and untrammelled, and were it not so, that country could never have attained to the pitch of greatness which it has attained. We are not now entering into an investigation of that subject. In discussing the serious fact which I have just stated, that the relative positions of Canada and the United States have been entirely reversed within the last seventeen years, and that this country has now a debt per head nearly double that of the United States, I would like to ask the hon. member this question: If he were an intelligent artisan or farmer going to make a home for himself in the west, would he choose the country that is rapidly reducing its debt or go to the country that has trebled its debt in the space of seventeen years?

Mr. HESSON. Do you want an answer?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. A million of Canadians have, unhappily, already given it.

Mr. DAVIES. I suppose that the hon. gentleman's answer would be that he remains here; but as the hon. member for Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) pertinently remarks, a million of Canadians have taken the opposite view, and have gone over to the States in that time. Yes, a million; I will repeat it; these facts cannot be repeated too often; it takes a good deal of repetition to get a fact into some people's heads: 720,000 Canadians are in the United States, according to the census of 1830; 400,000 of our population have gone over since; that makes a total of 1,100,000. Those facts call for serious attention. It will not do to brush them away with a waive of the hand; and there are other facts in that connection that require to be considered. A few years ago everybody hoped that our progress would be steadily forward. We had every reason to hope so. The statement was made, and I believe it to be correct, that we have a great heritage, that we have a glorious future before us; and I believe there would be millions more people in the country now but for the mismanagement of hon. gentlemen opposite. We were told that we had a great heritage in the North-West, we were told that millions of acres were waiting the plough of the immigrant; we were told that our country must go ahead. I must say that I believe those gentlemen had faith at the time; I believe that they were in earnest; I believe, although their predictions turned out to be incorrect, that they were confident there were going to be millions of people in the country; and one secret of the reckless extravagance that has marked the expenditure of this country during the past five years is that hon. gentlemen opposite, five years ago, expected that by to-day there would be millions more people in the North-West. They unfortunately have been disappointed, their extravagance was not checked, the people did not come in to make up for it; and the result is depression and gloom, not only throughout the North-West, but throughout all parts of Canada. What has been the increase of the population of the country? Are we going on, not only adding our natural increase to our population, but bringing in fresh immigration? The outlook is a sad one, but it is true that we are relatively going back. What are the facts? In 1871 we had 3,481,000 people in the Dominion, according to the census; in 1881 we had 4,044,000 or an increase of 553,000. Let any hon. gentleman take the percentage of natural increase referred to by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) 2 per cent. per year, and he will find that in that decade this country, instead of increasing only 553,000, should have increased 697,000, by the ordinary natural increase; so that, as a matter of fact, during the decade from 1871 to 1881, as was shown by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), we have lost actually 138,553 people from the natural increase we should have had. And, this remember, is altogether irrespective of the hundreds of thousands of immigrants whom we paid to come to this country. That is a very serious fact. When we come to examine the census of each country, the United States and Canada, we find that one man out of every six born in Canada is now in the United States. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries said we had as many Americans on this side, relatively to their population. That is not so. We have only one out of every 570 people born in the United States; we have 77,753 Americans in this country, or one out of every 570, while in the United States they have one out of six of our population. We find our population not only stationary but going back; we find our people not only not remaining in this country but emigrating to the United States; we find that after an expenditure of millions and millions of dollars to open up the North-West, with its large areas of land to be brought into cultivation, with the millions of bushels of grain to be grown or about to be grown there—we find that the volume of our trade to-day is not as great as it was in 1873. In 1873 the volume of our trade was $217,800,000; to-day, instead of its having advanced by leaps and bounds, as we had a right to expect, and as I do not hesitate to say, it would have, had there been ordinary prudence exercised in the management of affairs in the North-West, had there not been reckless extravagance shown in the administration of our affairs, the volume of our trade is but $207,873,000. More than that; not only has the volume of our trade not increased, not only is our population decreasing in the sense that we are not keeping our natural increase, but we find also that the exports of our own products have remained stationary, when they should have gone on almost doubling in this period. Do hon. members remember that last Session, when we were asked to sanction the expenditure of some $22,000,000 as a gift to the huge monopoly of the Canadian Pacific Railway, that the hon. gentleman, the Minister of Railways, who proposed the grant, made a startling calculation, by which he proved that—I don't know how many millions on millions of bushels of grain would be grown in the North-West—if we could only get a certain number of immigrants into the country who would cultivate each so many acres—640,000,000 bushels was the figure he gave. The number was so great that I don't think one man in a thousand could appreciate it. What are the facts to-day? The Government tied up the country; they refused to let immigrants go on the land; they tied up the best homestead land; they harassed the people with regulations on regulations; they drove the people out of the country to a poorer country, I believe to the south, where they are not harassed by these regulations, and the result is, to-day our exports have remained stationary when they should have increased by leaps and bounds.

I heard an hon. gentleman opposite, and must ask pardon of the reading men of the House for referring to the fact, point out that England, the great commercial emporium of the world, is not progressing in the same ratio as other countries; that, as the result of her free trade policy, poor England is becoming crippled; and the paupers of England are increasing, says the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper), and there is dire distress in Clerkenwell and Marylebone and other districts in London. I was surprised at such an argument from a member of a learned profession. It would be bad enough coming from an ignorant man, but the hon. gentleman ought to know better. Let him take up any of the statistics published in England and he will find that pauperism is decreasing, that crime is decreasing, that the mass of the people are better fed, better clothed, and better paid to-day than they ever were in the past history of Great Britain. He will find figures which will almost startle him.

Mr. DAVIES.

He will find that the total trade of that country has not remained stationary, as perhaps it might be supposed in an old country like England to have remained; he will find that, instead of remaining stationary, as Canada has, she has gone forward by steady bounds until to-day the statements of her total trade can hardly be understood when it is mentioned. I find that in 1867 the total trade of England was £501,000,000, or $2,505,000,000. In 1882, instead of remaining stationary, as ours has done, the total trade had gone up to £720,000,000, or $3,600,000,000; and I call the hon. gentleman's attention to this important fact that, of the total imports of that country, 91 per cent. consists of raw materials, and barely 9 per cent. of manufactured articles; while, in contrast with that, 92 per cent. of her exports consists of manufactured goods, and only 8 per cent. of raw material, and that raw material is chiefly coke, coal and pig iron. These figures speak volumes. All the talk in the world will not lead to conclusions as clear as these facts and figures, which show that, while this young country, possessing millions of acres awaiting the plough of the immigrant endowed with youth and hope and energy, and with a finer population, I believe, than England is endowed with, is remaining almost stationary, the old country is going ahead, until she is mistress of the seas, not only in a naval sense, but commercially. Her flag floats on every sea; she enjoys a monopoly of the carrying trade of the world, and has swept the flag of protective nations almost off the seas. They talk about the protective tariff in the United States. What are the facts? The facts are that, in spite of a tariff which is almost prohibitory, they imported last year £31,000,000, or $155,000,000 worth of the manufactured goods of England. They may put on their tariff as much as they like, but the free trade country, that has cheap food and enables its products to be manufactured cheaply, can send $155,000,000 worth of her manufactures and undersell the people of the United States in their own markets. The hon. member for Pictou says that the poor people in England are getting poorer. I will recommend to his attention a little pamphlet which I wish he and other members on the other side would read, written by a distinguished political economist, Mr. Mongredien. It is a small pamphlet of only a hundred pages, but you will find from it that the poor people in England have better food and that the purchasing power of their wages enables them to buy double the quantity of food they did ten years ago. I may be pardoned for reading the figures in regard to five articles. In 1871 they consumed per head of bacon 1.38 lbs., and in 1877 8 lbs.; of wheat and flour they consumed per head 150 lbs. in 1871, and 203 lbs. in 1877; of raw sugar they consumed per head 41 lbs. in 1871, and 54 lbs. in 1877; of tea per head 3.92 lbs. in 1871, and 4½ lbs. in 1877; and of tobacco 1.36 lbs. in 1871, and 1.49 lbs. in 1877. Here we see that this coarse, good food—leaving out the article of tobacco—bacon, and wheat, and flour, and sugar, are consumed per head in double the quantities in England to-day that they were ten years ago. The wages of the English workman enable him to buy better and more food for himself and his family than he could ten years ago. Can you say as much for Canada to-day? I say you cannot. You cannot show me another country where such results have been produced in the same space of time. Then we remember very well that before 1860 the United States, in her shipping, competed with England on every sea, that the Union Jack and the Stars and Stripes were rivals for the carrying trade of the world. The war came, and after the war came the protective tariff, and by whom is the carrying trade done now? Where is the Stars and Stripes now? It is almost confined to the coasting trade and the inland waters of that great country, and the millions and millions of profits belonging to that traffic are flowing into that little isle, that gem of the sea, that free trade England.

Before I close, I want to express my regret that a very important industry in this country has been overlooked by hon. gentlemen opposite. I did not expect, perhaps, when the Finance Minister addressed the House, that he would have deemed it his duty to refer to it; but I thought, when some of the maritime gentlemen rose, representing shipping ports and the shipping interest, that then we should have had some reference to it. A year or two ago, before the National Policy had developed itself, I remember that reference was made to the shipping interest. They were not ashamed of it then, but to-day they are ashamed to refer to the statistics of one of the largest interests of this Dominion—the shipping interest. As they have not done it, I will remind them of it. I have extracted some figures from the Trade and Navigation Returns. When the Minister of Marine, the gentleman who controls that Department of Government, who should be cognisant of the facts, and who, through his Deputy, has sent us a report of the shipping, rose in his place to address the House, and, through the House, to address the country, I thought we should have heard from him something about the great shipping industry of this country. Is it increasing in volume, or not? What remedy was he going to propose to stop its decay? They had an Act of Parliament for everything a year or two ago; where is their Act now? Hon. members will remember how proud, and how justly proud, every Canadian was, a few years ago, of the fact that Canada stood fourth in the commercial world as the owner of shipping—fourth among all the nations of the world. We were proud of it and we were never weary of proclaiming it at home and abroad. What is the fact to-day? I find that, in 1873, we had 6,783 vessels, of a tonnage of 1,073,718 tons. I find that, from that year, when that dreadful Grit Government, led by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), was in power, that tonnage continued to steadily increase year by year until, in the year 1878, it reached the enormous figures of 7,469 vessels and 1,333,015 tons, an increase in that period of time of 686 vessels and 259,297 tons. Now I find, by the report the Minister of Marine brings down, that the value of that tonnage is $30 per ton. I find that that industry alone, in the years between 1873 and 1878, increased in value $7,778,000. It was something to be proud of. It was a steady increase that went on from year to year. Sir, what is the tale that we have to tell to-day? Has that increase and that prosperity continued? Has it remained even stationary? Are we to-day, so far as our shipping interests are concerned, holding the same position relatively to the other nations that we held when the abominable Grit Government went out of power? I am sorry to say it is not the case. I am sorry to say that since the National Policy came in that industry has been steadily decreasing from year to year, until, in 1884, we find the number of vessels have decreased to 7,254, and the tonnage to 1,253,747, or a decrease of 215 vessels and of 79,270 tons, of a value of $2,378,100. We went on increasing by 259,000 tons and nearly $8,000,000 in value between 1873 and 1878, and we have been steadily decreasing since 1879 down to the present time. We find the Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries making a report which the Minister himself was very glad to shy clear of when he rose in his place, and for fear he did not read his own Deputy's report I will read an extract from it:

"The total number of vessels remaining on register books of the Dominion, on 31st December, 1884, including old and new vessels, sailing vessels, steamers and barks, was 7,254, measuring 1,253,747 tons register tonnage, being a decrease of 120 vessels and 13,647 tons register as compared with 1883. The number of steamers on register books on same date was 1,073, with a gross tonnage of 207,669. Assuming the average value to be $30 per ton, the value of the registered tonnage of Canada, on 30th December last, would be $37,612,410."

If it had gone on progressing at the same ratio as it did previous to 1878, instead of the value being $30,000,000, as it is to-day, it would have really been $40,000,000. Now, Sir, still looking at the ship-building industries, we find that in 1874 we built 496 vessels, with a tonnage of 190,756. I will not read the figures for each year, but there was a steady increase up to 1878, marking a steady business, a business built upon a good foundation, and at the end of 1878 I find we had 2,163 vessels built during the five years; making an average per year—as the hon. Finance Minister is fond of averages, I will give him the average for these five years—of 433 vessels, or 139,000 tons per year, or an average yearly value of $5,560,000, and a total value of $28,000,000 for the five years. Well, Sir, since they came into power, what have they done? The country has only built 1,922 vessels, or 320 per year, as against 433 per year in the previous term; and 70,228 tons, as against 139,000 tons each year in the previous term; an average value per year of $2,800,000, as against an average value of $5,560,000 in the years preceding. Now, it must be remembered that this industry was in the main an industry of the Maritime Provinces, an investment for the money of the people of these Provinces. The National Policy asked them to do—what? It asked them to withdraw their money from the shipping and invest it in the cotton interest and in the sugar interest. They did so, and to-day they find themselves deceived. Instead of earning the profits they once did in their shipping, to-day they see their cotton mills are idle, their sugar refineries are idle, and their money invested is making no return.

Now, Sir, there is another thing I would mention. I wanted to hear from the Government what progress they were making on the great question which is agitating the Maritime Provinces—the question of reciprocity. I find them silent as the grave. The hon. gentleman repeated the statement—I suppose he spoke on the authority of the Minister of Finance—that the policy they were going to pursue was a do-nothing policy. Well, Sir, they are going to be flies on the wheel as regards reciprocity. But, he asks, why did the Maritime Provinces require it so much? I will tell him, Sir. Because, under reciprocity the commerce of the Maritime Provinces flourished as it never flourished since; because under that reciprocity treaty the Maritime Provinces grew comparatively rich; because they found a ready market for their produce; and because to-day they have not got such a market. And more than that, Sir: because the existence of these trade relations cemented the bonds of union, amity and good feeling which existed, and ought to exist, and which I hope will long continue to exist, between this country and our great neighbors to the south. We want it because it removed the causes of discord, because it put us in a position where we were reasonably assured there never would be any breach of the peace between us and our neighbors to the south. I will tell you another reason why we want this Government to act. We say it is treason to the people of the Maritime Provinces to remain inactive now, because at the present time, of all others, we have a better prospect of obtaining reciprocity; because the fishery treaty is about expiring, and because we know that complications must inevitably ensue unless some new treaty is negotiated. Do you tell me, Sir, that 100, or 200, or, as in old times I have seen myself, 300 American vessels can go down fishing upon the shores of the Maritime Provinces and that you are going to keep them beyond the three-mile limit? You may do it? You may do what the hon. member for Pictou asked you to do; you may carry out as vigorous a policy as you like, and spend as much money as you like, but you will only keep out the Americans from those fishing grounds by the expenditure of a great deal of money and after creating a great deal of discord and a great deal of ill-feeling and animosity. Sir, a vigorous policy will be necessary, I do not deny it, if you do not negotiate a new treaty. But we are willing to share with them and give them our waters, provided we can get proper commercial relations with them. That is what I believe nine-tenths of the intelligent men of the Maritime Provinces want. We want a market for our fish ; we want a market for our natural productions, and we must have it, or we become poorer every year ; and, I am sorry to say, we are becoming poorer in the cities of the Maritime Provinces. The markets of the United States are our natural markets. We want those markets for our potatoes, our fish, our pelts, our timber, our produce, our animals, and for our coal too. For everything we grow and are prepared to sell, we find our natural markets in the United States, and we do not want to be told, in language which, I say, amounts to an insult to the people, that this Government are prepared to act as flies on the wheel, in regard to this vital question ; that they propose to do nothing at all, because, forsooth, they are afraid of their dignity. What nonsense. The people to the south of us in the United States are a commercial people, they are a sensible people. Why, such action is worthy of one of those petty German princes who will not go into a room until he has studied a certain amount of etiquette, lest he should make a mistake as to the number of bows he ought to make. The people of Canada are not afraid of their dignity. We can lose nothing of dignity if we go to the United States and say: The old commercial treaty was advantageous to you and to us ; the erection of barriers has been disadvantageous to both. Take down, as far as you reasonably can, those barriers ; let us trade with you and we will make a profit, and you trade with us, and the profit will be on your side, mutual profits will result from mutual trade and both sides will reap a benefit. Is there any loss of dignity in making that declaration? Do you suppose you will insult the hard headed business man of the United States by telling him that you want to trade with him. It is an insult to the people who feel that this reciprocal trade is mutually beneficial. I hope our people will repeat what I say, and will tell this Government that it is of the greatest importance to the Maritime Provinces that they should get reciprocal trade relations of some kind. It is no use mincing matters. The Americans know it, and we know it. We are not, of course, going to be ruined, but we shall be very much poorer if we do not secure them. Reciprocal trade made us much richer before, and it will do so again. The United States is our natural market, and we ought to have it, if it can be obtained by fair negotiation, for I should be sorry to surrender our honor and dignity ; but such will not be necessary to do, if we go like sensible business men and ask the Americans if they are prepared to negotiate a treaty. Have hon. gentlemen opposite secured anything in this direction? Nothing. If we attempt, and fail, to increase trade with the Americans, who are our neighbors and our natural commercial dealers, we will be thought more of than if we should sit still and do nothing. I charge upon this Government that they are not only neglecting the interests of the Maritime Provinces in regard to trade with the United States, but they are neglectful of the trade of those Provinces with other countries to which we export. It is only a day or two ago the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) called the attention of the House to the fact, that owing to the neglect and indifference of the Government,—and I charge it all upon them—we have lost advantages which would have accrued to us from the negotiation of a treaty on similar terms to those secured by the United States Government with Spain. We export largely to Cuba and Porto Rico, and to-day, as the hon. member for Digby said, we are placed at a disadvantage, because we were not in time in asking to be placed on the same footing as the United States. I suppose dignity stood in the way ; and, at all events, the result is, that the people of the Maritime Provinces are to sustain a loss of some thousands and thousands of dollars. Why, we were told that we should not say anything about it, that we should speak with bated breath, we should have such a strong feeling of the dignity of the country, of the greatness of the country, and a fear of injuring the country, that we should say nothing. In modern times, the interests of a country are not sacrificed by the truth being known. It is an age of telegraphs and newspapers, an age when what is known in one country one day is flashed over the wires thousands and thousands of miles, and will be read in another country next morning. So we find that on this very subject on which the First Minister said it was so essential to keep quiet the facts have been published in a circular, and the gentlemen issuing it want the world to know the particulars, and they want members of this House to know, and this Government to know. The Chamber of Commerce of Halifax have forwarded a circular in which all the facts stated by the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) are embodied and set out, even more strongly than the hon. member placed them before the House, and the chamber calls on this Government to do something. They call upon them not to be false to their trust, but to use their position and the trust which the people have placed in their hands to enable us, at least, to be placed on the same footing as our neighbors in the United States. I call the attention of the House to this resolution. It was passed by the Halifax Chamber of Commerce only nine days ago. It presents the facts, and I may be pardoned for reading a portion of it. The resolution passed on 4th March says :

“ Your committee learn that a treaty has lately been made between the United States and Spain, whereby the flag of the United States is placed on the same terms regarding Customs duties as that of the latter country. The conditions of this treaty do not apply to British shipping, and we are consequently placed at a great disadvantage in Cuba and Porto Rico, to which the treaty more particularly applies, the difference in favor of the American flag, so far as we can learn, being equal to an average of about 20 per cent. on the whole tariff. On our fish, which is our chief export to the islands, it amounts to considerable more. By calculations made on date received, it would appear Porto Rico fish by British flag pays about 12 cents per quintal more than by American vessels ; and that the tonnage duty for landing and loading cargoes is 100 per cent., or just double, on our vessels, to what is exacted from the Americans. In Cuba the differential duty in favor of the Americans is still larger, amounting to about 27 cents per quintal. Cuba and Porto Rico are among our best customers, shipments to the latter having some years reached nearly 150,000 quintals, while to Cuba the demand is steady and increasing. It will, therefore, be seen that if the Americans continue to enjoy those great advantages, and we excluded, that it will be a heavy blow to our trade, and calls for prompt and energetic remonstrance from our Government.”

Has that been made? Has there been a whisper, a word spoken in this House or out of it, to remedy the grievances under which the Halifax commercial men are laboring, and which they say are about to destroy their trade? Not a whisper, not a word. The resolution goes on to say :

“ The charges made by the Spanish Government through the consulates, of 10 cents per ton on securing Spanish clearances, is also very burdensome, and has been objected to by the United States, who claim that no foreign Government has a right to impose such a charge, which is equal to an import tax on the product of their country. We have reason to believe that this unfair tax will be abolished in the United States, and our Government should take immediate steps to place us in the same position.”

Then follows a copy of the resolution of 4th March :

“ Your committee regret to learn that discriminating duties in favor of American fish and other products still exist in the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, and that representations of the chamber to the Dominion Government last year on the subject do not appear to have produced any effect.”

They are not sinning in ignorance. This subject a year ago was brought before them on the representations of these commercial men, just as we have brought it before them, urging the necessity of opening negotiations for a reciprocity treaty with the United States. They have done nothing in the matter. They are willing that the commerce of the country should suffer. The resolution goes on to say :

“ In the present depressed condition of the West India trade, these discriminating duties on our staple products is a very heavy burden, and calls for a prompt and energetic representation by the Dominion Government, who can alone deal with this matter.”

I have been asked in the circular, as others have been asked, to read it and reflect on the facts it contains. I have done nothing more than my duty in bringing these facts before the House. What answer has the Government to make to these complaints, which are not confined to Halifax but are re-echoed in St. John and all the ports at which there are fishing interests in the Maritime Provinces? This is a very serious matter. Hon. gentlemen opposite promised the people when they came into power, that they would secure reciprocity with the United States. They have broken faith with them: they have not secured it. But the most serious charge I have to make is that, while they were asked and urged, and the importance of the action pointed out, to take preliminary steps last year with respect to negotiations, so far as we can learn they have not taken any steps, and they are deaf to the remonstrances of the maritime people; they are deaf to the remonstrances of the Chamber of Commerce at Halifax—as deaf as they are to the remonstrances of the Chamber of Commerce in St. John. Sir, these are matters which, from the maritime standpoint, I can tell hon. gentlemen are very serious, and instead of energetic and prompt action by the Government upon them, we have a report issued upon the manufacturing interests in the Maritime Provinces, and a precious report it is. We have heard from gentlemen here from Ontario how utterly wanting in credit that report is, as regards the manufacturers of their Province, and I say it is more so as regards the Maritime Provinces. Why, Sir, in order to show that there was an increase in the industries of the Province of Prince Edward Island he actually counts in the fishing industry of lobsters. What had the National Policy to do to bring about that industry? What did it do for it, except to cause some irritation in the minds of the lobster packers last year, by an order that stamps were to be put on the cans, and after the people had gone to the expense of getting the stamps, down came a notification from the Inland Revenue Department that they did not require stamps at all. Regulations were made one day and broken the next. The National Policy has done nothing for the lobster trade. It does not enable them to catch more lobsters; it does not regulate the market price in England, the only market where they are sold. But, Sir, I call the attention of hon. members to this fact, that in order to make out a case of apparent prosperity in the Maritime Provinces, not only do they bring in the lobster interest, but they drag in the ship-building interest. It is true only one great ship-owner in Summerside is mentioned, and not another man who builds ships, but then he is a great Tory and a supporter of the National Policy. In 1878 there was a large ship-building interest in the island, but nothing is said about it at all; and when they want to show the number of factories, as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) pointed out last night, where an industry has changed hands, they give it as a new industry, and they show the amount of capital and the number of hands employed as a new industry. Why, Sir, there is a large manufactory of furniture in Charlottetown, and here it is given as a new industry, owned by Wright & Co. That factory was in existence almost before I was born. The late Mark Butcher, by whom it was carried on successfully during his life, employed almost as many hands as are employed in it now. Not a word is said about that. It is a new industry; and so on, all through the chapter. But when he wants to show how the National Policy is working, he goes to a few of the most double dyed Tories that can be produced in the Dominion, and he asks them their opinion. But when he goes to the starch manufacturers, most of whom are Grits, he says these poor people do not appear to appreciate the situation. It is the most laughable and, at the same time, the most lamentable report, I ever picked up. I want to know why this gentleman has steered clear of the places in which the commercial depression is deepest and the gloom is blackest. I want to know from the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) why no report is given of the state of manufactures in that place?

I remember when it boasted the largest tannery, turning out the largest quantity of leather, and employing the largest amount of capital in this Dominion. Where is it to-day? It has gone; its hum is where the woodbine twineth; the place that once knew it, knows it no more. No; it would not do to go through Pictou. Why did they keep clear of the town from which the hon. member for Sydney comes? Is there commercial prosperity there, I would ask him? I want to hear the hon. gentlemen representing those towns rising and saying that there is commercial prosperity in them. The country is not doing so badly, because we have been blessed with good harvests, and I do not think they will ask to share with Providence the credit for that, or if they do ask it, they will not get it. But I say that all those branches of industry that the National Policy was specially framed to improve are depressed; they are growing weaker and weaker, and depression and gloom exists throughout the commercial centres of the Maritime Provinces. I see the junior member for Pictou opposite me, and I hope he will enlighten the House as to whether Pictou is as prosperous, commercially, as it was in days of yore. I tell hon. gentlemen that it is not so, and the very fact that this commissioner shunned and avoided the places where the gloom was deepest and the depression greatest, is the best evidence of the truth of my statement. I agree that the situation, as pictured by leading gentlemen on this side of the House, is grave and serious; that it furnishes cause for serious thought on the part of members of this House and the people of this Dominion. I am proud to think that while years ago we could hardly catch their ears, to-day there is a willingness to listen to the truth; the truth is now being told and listened to, and I think, Sir, the wretched nostrum offered to the people a few years ago has been shown to be the invention of a quack; that we will soon have the people coming to their senses, and reverting to that policy of a revenue tariff, under which, alone I say, this country can become great, prosperous and happy.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I should not have occupied the time of the House but for a few moments, were it not that the speech of the hon. gentleman opposite teemed with statements that have been refuted in this House and in the country over and over again. I think, Sir, it is a waste of time that hon. gentlemen opposite, after the statements which have been made here, notably by the Finance Minister in the admirable Budget Speech which he delivered, and secondly by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), in answer to the ex-Minister of Finance, and after the exhaustive and able speech of my hon. friend this afternoon, the member for King's, N. B. (Mr. Foster), should again rehash the old statements which have been exploded over and over again, and shown to be misstatements of fact in every word and line. I put down a few notes on a piece of paper, referring to what the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) has been saying. I have covered a sheet and a quarter of paper, and I venture to say that every statement made in his place to-night—and he has taken up nearly two hours, and has certainly spoken with great volubility—was refuted not three months ago in his own county, by the electorate of that county. He told these people that they had lost their senses; he has followed in the footsteps of the ex-Finance Minister, who told the people they were fools, who has told them over and over again that they had lost their senses. He says that people will come back to their senses by-and-bye. The hon. gentlemen tried to drive some sense into them in the county of Queen's, and he brought the hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Paterson) there, and other members from different parts of the Dominion, and the whole of them endeavored to enlighten the people of Queen's, and they did to them what the people will reply to the speech he has delivered to-night.

They will say to him: We have lived long enough, Sir, to know that every statement that you have been making on the hustings in regard to the National Policy, and every statement you have made in the House of Parliament, where we sent you to represent the people and not to misrepresent them, is untrue in fact, for we have the facts and know them. The hon. gentleman talked in a very loud voice, and he beat his desk frequently. I do not complain; it is his desk; if he breaks it in two, I will not complain; but I think he was ingenious in beating his desk every little while. In countries where they have battles—thank God, we do not have them here—the drum is beaten in order to drown the cries of the wounded and the dying; and I can fancy that the hon. gentleman, who has had his ideas, if they be his ideas, but at least his statements, refuted over and over again in this House, I can fancy him believing them to be fallacious, and beating his desk in order to make up in sound what he lacks in argument. He started out with the statement that the Liberal-Conservative party in this House had deceived the electorate of the Dominion of Canada, and had got power under false pretences—that they had promised the people a reciprocity treaty, and had failed to keep that promise. I asked him when the speech was made. He said in 1878. Well, Sir, the Liberal-Conservative party were returned to power in 1878: In the winter of 1878 that speech was made; and in 1879, as soon as they could do so, they caused to be placed upon the Statute Book of this country an Act whereby they took power to remove the duty on all products from the United States coming into Canada in proportion as the United States Government would remove the duties on products going there from Canada. That is what they did, and in doing that they kept their promise to the people. But they did not do what the hon. gentleman wants them to do. He said it would be no lack of dignity for the Government of Canada to go to Washington and to tell the American Government that they could not live without reciprocity. Sir, the people of this country are little understood by the hon. gentleman when he makes a statement like that. When the Premier stated in Toronto, a few months ago, that he would not go down on his knees, and that Canada would not go down on her knees, to ask for reciprocity, he struck a chord that vibrated in every manly Canadian heart. There is not a man in the Maritime Provinces or in the Upper Provinces who would not scorn the idea of any Canadian Government begging at the feet of a foreign people, stating that they were paupers, and could not live without their help. If they did that they would not gain reciprocity by doing so. Everybody knows that the American financier or the American statesman does not give away a dollar for only half a dollar in return; he never gives a dollar unless he expects a greater return; and when the American people find that we are working out our destiny, that we are not asking them any favor, that we believe that while reciprocity would be desirable on fair terms, yet finding that we had asked in vain, that we had knocked at their doors and they would not listen to us, that we are now depending upon our own resources, which the God of nature has given us in the half of this continent. We will get reciprocity in raw materials sooner in this manner than in any other way. Let the hon. member, or anyone, travel through the United States to-day and learn the feeling that has existed there since this Government has come into power and inaugurated our present fiscal policy. Let him talk to American merchants, and see how much greater respect they have for Canadians than they had while the late Government were in power. Let any hon. gentleman who has travelled in the United States contrast that feeling with the feeling that existed from 1874 to 1878, when our industries were in such a depressed condition, when we were sending the late and lamented George Brown to Washington in vain to get a reciprocity treaty, and when the Government in power had not the nerve, or the courage, or the patience, or the plodding industry, to place a fiscal policy on the Statute Book which would meet that of the United States, and then say if we have not taken a leaf out of their book to our own profit. Why, Sir, there is not an American, be he Democrat or Republican, or whatever he may be, and I have talked with hundreds of them—they do not know the relations of our parties; they do not know that there is one party here trying to uphold the country and another trying to pull it down—there is not one of them that I have known, and I believe this is the experience of every hon. gentleman who has been among them, but says he wonders that we did not take that leaf out of their book long before we did. One gentleman said to me: "I used to sell stoves in Montreal; I do not blame you; but you have taken the pattern from me and you undersell me." That is one case, and there are many others I could name. Therefore, I say the fiscal policy of the present Government has earned for us the respect of United States statesmen and merchants, on account of our pluck, our courage, and our industry. Now, I want to say one word in regard to that industry. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., (Mr. Davies) spoke of this Government as flies on the wheel, and as derelict in their duty. Why, it was a very easy thing for the late Government to sit down and make a revenue tariff; they had nothing to do but draw their salaries and make the tariff. They did it something like this: We import $100,000,000; one-fifth of $100,000,000 is 20 per cent.; and that will give us $20,000,000. That is something like the way they made up the revenue tariff. What did the present Government do? They went into the factories in the cities and towns of this country and shook the workingman by the hand, and asked him how they could help him—the employer and the workingman together. After going through this country and seeing all the industries they could see, they sat down and framed the tariff; and it will be a never-dying honor to the Finance Minister of this day, long after he has gone to his rest, that he worked as hard as he did, received the delegations and the number of persons interested in the industries of Canada that he did, and after that framed a tariff that departed from the old rut, and that would meet the United States on their own ground. That friction would ensue, that there would be complaint here and there, was to be expected, it was a herculean job to sit down and frame that tariff in order to foster the industries and to shut out foreign competition, and at the same time not increase prices to our people, and earn a revenue. It was the work of statesmen, the work of men, not only of great ideas, but also with the heart, the head, and the hand, to execute the work they had undertaken. I sat as a spectator in this House when the fiscal policy came down, and I never saw such black looks on the faces of hon. gentlemen opposite as I saw then. They did not believe it possible that any body of men could frame a tariff that would meet the position of the United States, and at the same time not unduly oppress our people. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), the late leader of the Government, said: Well, you have kept your promise after all; I did not believe you would dare to do it, or could do it. It was not a perfect tariff. It could not have been a perfect tariff, for it was then an untried experiment; it was framed with a view of meeting the United States tariff and the tariffs of other countries; it was framed to steer as closely to the wind as possible, without affecting injuriously a single interest in Canada, or oppress the people, while at the same time raising sufficient revenue and encouraging interprovincial trade. That there were mistakes in it we all know. No Government is, no laws are, perfect; mistakes there were; but we had a Government that were not all self-sufficient, that were not above listening to representations, and the tariff was altered occasionally, so as to suit, as far as possible, the circumstances of the country; and, on the whole, it was as perfect a tariff as any fourteen men, occupying the position of a Government, could frame in the same time. I say I believe there is no other Government that could be formed in Canada who in that time would have revolutionised the fiscal policy as this Government did and have kept its relations intact with other countries and created the beneficial results they did. Then came the general elections of 1882, and one would have thought, on listening to the speech of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), that there had been no elections since 1878, that we had none on the 20th June, 1882. I recollect, previous to those elections, sitting as a spectator in this House, hearing the hon. gentlemen opposite, particularly the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and the hon. member for West Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), state that, let the people have an opportunity to decide on this barbarous, wretched policy, and they will scatter it to the winds; and as true as the sun rises, said the hon. member for Bothwell, pointing his finger at the Government, when the people pass upon this tariff, the Government will be swept away and the Opposition take their place. Well, the elections of 1882 took place; we had all these gentlemen and their press and everything they could circulate about the policy in force during the previous four years before the people, and what was the result? The people returned back to Parliament the men who inaugurated the National Policy, defeating the hon. member for West Huron, and the member from Bothwell, who made that declaration, defeating horse, foot and artillery, to use an old expression, the Opposition cohorts, all over Canada, and restoring back to power the men who had worked out this great question. It is labor lost for the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), or any other gentleman—in the light of facts, in the light of the facts that the people of Canada, as intelligent a people as there is on the face of the globe to-day, who have had all these facts before them and who understand this question, who, having sent these men into office, returned them again to power—it is labor lost for hon. gentlemen opposite in 1885 to take up the tariff again and go over all the statements they went over before, making the same speeches they made before, and declaring again the people only wanted an opportunity to pass on the tariff and turn this Government out on that question. The hon. member for Queen's said: Look at the Maritime Provinces! He thinks he can sow a little disunion down there. But does not every elector who has passed upon this tariff understand the question as well as he? Have there not been bye-elections in Cumberland, Lunenburg, Cape Breton and York, since 1882, in which we have beaten our opponents and taken constituency after constituency. In his own county he made the speech he made to-night, but the people did not believe him. The moment there is a vacancy the Government appeal to the people. Hon. gentlemen opposite send their orators and their press to meet the Government, and the Government still wrests from them constituency after constituency. Why should we be called upon to listen for hours this Session to arguments that have been refuted over and over again, and on a question on which the people have decisively passed. He wanted the hon. member for Pictou to stand up, and he wanted the hon. member for Sydney to stand up, and say what about this National Policy. Why, they stood up. It was not long since the hon. gentleman stood up down at Sydney. One would think that we never had an election since the National Policy was introduced. One would think that the National Policy had no defenders in the country but a band of conspirators led by the veteran, the Premier. One would think that all the people wanted was an opportunity to drive the Government out of existence on account of the National Policy. Is it not a little too bad that we should, for the sake of appearances, on this side of the House, have to get up and answer what had been ably answered over and over again throughout the length and breadth of Canada. With regard to Pictou and Cape Breton, let me give the hon. gentleman a comparative statement of the output of coal under the late régime and under the present one. In 1875, the output amounted to 706,795 tons; in 1876, it amounted to 634,207 tons; in 1877, to 697,065 tons; 1878, to 693,511; in 1879, 688,626. Then came in the National Policy and, in 1880—the National Policy then in full sway—it was 954,659 tons—a leap up like that—in 1881, it was 1,035,014 tons; in 1882, 1,250,179 tons; and in 1883 a similar amount. I have not got the figure for 1884, but I believe it is about the same. It was 1,300,000 in 1883 and about the same in 1884. That is the answer in regard to these two places. That output of coal means—what? It means bread and butter to the laboring men there, and it means 10 cents a ton royalty on every ton of coal put to the pit's mouth to the provincial exchequer of Nova Scotia. And again, Nova Scotia exported to the United States, in 1866, 404,252 tons of coal. In 1882, when the United States had a 75 cents tariff on every ton of our coal, it exported only 99,302 tons. Where did the balance of this vast output, of this increased output, go? It went to the Upper Provinces. Interprovincial trade was encouraged. Ah, but some of them say, there is the hated coal tax. I will undertake to say this, and I have looked into the question somewhat, that the tax on flour and the tax on coal have not raised to us, where we raise a surplus—to use the declaration of the member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), in the drill shed at Halifax—the price by a farthing. It has not raised the price to the consumer here. It has encouraged interprovincial trade; it has employed workmen; it has made an industry where there would be idleness and stagnation; it has distributed money; it has given us a carrying power that we had not before; it has given us an opportunity of carriage that we had not before. Coal at Ogdensburg is $6.50 a ton, at Montreal but $6—American coal; at Watertown it is $6.50 a ton; at Brockville it is only $6.25 a ton—American coal; at Toronto it is $6 a ton, at Chicago, $8.50—American coal. And it is a curious fact that, in Boston, Pennsylvania coal is lower than it is in Pennsylvania itself. When you come to consider that the coal industry, these coal mines, are run by a ring generally of speculators—it is so in the United States—and they put the price of coal just as far as the market will bear every time, you will see that, if this duty on coal was not in existence, the price would be that much higher in Toronto, Kingston, and all these other places. But they said it will not get further than Kingston at any rate. I am happy to say that Nova Scotia coal is used as far west as Galt, which I understand is 120 miles west of Toronto, with our present facilities for carrying; and when the short line is constructed, I believe that they will carry it for about half the present rate. We used to get laughed at—we do not now—when we stood up and said—and I remember the Finance Minister was laughed at for saying it—that the consumer did not pay the duty. There was a howl of derision from the other side. Did you ever hear such a statement? The able and statesmanlike member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies) was loudest in the shout of derision. Well, he raises potatoes on his island. The duty in Boston is 15 cents per bushel—it was 20 cents. Who paid the duty—the man who raised the potatoes in Prince Edward Island or the consumer in Boston? He knows—he almost admitted it to-night, for he asked for reciprocity to help the raisers of potatoes, and so forth—that the consumer did not pay the duty, but that the raiser paid it. When they got to Boston the price was 75 cents a bushel; a man from Malden, or some other place outside of Boston, would go into the market and get his 75 cents from the American consumer; the other man from outside of the United States took his 55 cents, 20 cents less, and went away. Did the consumer pay it where there was a surplus? He knows he did not, and therefore the statement is correct, that the consumer does not pay the duty in all cases. Who has to pay the duty on the coal? Is it the Toronto or the Kingston man? No. The Pennsylvania ring put their coal up to meet the market, and, if the duty was not there, the price would be just as high, and the duty is not felt; I have stated the facts, which are incontrovertible. Now, that is international trade. He does not seem to understand it; they do not seem to understand it. These fools, as they call them, as the hon. member for South Huron called them, on his entrance into Parliament, in 1879, so chagrined and mortified was he that the people had sent into the cold shades of Opposition, after five years of power, and after deficit after deficit, and after a declaration by him that he wished he had an income tax, that he could not meet the expenses with the revenue he had, after having stood up, and, in his bitterness, writhing; in mortification at the people, after his declaring he would be twenty years in power, because they brought back the old guard and the old premier to take once more the helm of the ship of state which had been going on the rocks for five years—call the people fools—you would think they were all fools, to hear the member for Queen's and his friends talk, and yet, the moment a vacancy occurs, out goes the writ from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery down to the place or up to the place where the vacancy occurred, and comes back, as sure as the sun rises to-morrow, to use the metaphor of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), a Liberal-Conservative almost every time. And still this debased, this foolish, this ignorant people, keep on electing a Liberal Conservative to support a National Policy Government. It is useless to talk to these gentlemen. The only place to get them is before the electorate, and to talk to them there, and to see the faces of the old farmers, and to see the faces of the merchants, and to see the faces of the ship-builders, and to see the faces of the artisans, and to hear the plaudits they give to the Liberal-Conservative, and the votes they give afterwards. That is the only place to answer them. It seems to me time wasted in answering them here. Now, I want to draw attention for a moment to another statement of the hon. gentleman. The ship-building interest, he says, look at that; and he quoted the number of tons there are now less than we had when they were in power. He knew that the ship-building interest has been in a depressed state all the world over for years, everywhere—in the carrying trade—the iron ships superseding the wooden vessels for a time—I do not believe they will for all time, and our vessels could only make freight where the owners could afford to insure them themselves. They could not afford to pay 11 per cent. insurance, and send them to sea and make money; and that is the reason the ship-building interest has not been as large. Did he ever hear of a man named Pope in Prince Edward Island, one who occupied a distinguished place in the councils of his country? Did he hear of his fortune being dissipated to the winds, and two or three ships being allowed to rot on the stocks, while the hon. member for East York and his friends held office? He knows that the ship-building interest was depressed enough while they were in power, and what did they do to help it? I was a member of the Local Legislature of Nova Scotia at the time, and the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) will remember what a howl of execration went up from friend and foe against this Government who had placed upon ship's materials a duty that the ship-building interest could not bear; and, Sir, through the strenuous efforts of the Opposition of that day the duties were reduced and the ship-building interest was relieved and saved. Sir, this Government has put the ship-building interest in a much better position than it was under the late Government. I have the fact even from Grit sources. I went into a ship-yard not long ago, and I met a man opposed to me politically in my own county. I asked him what about shipbuilding? And he said: I must confess that your Government has dealt fairer with us than our own friends did. They have given us a bounty and a drawback, which has helped us more than the entire reduction of duties made by our Government while they were in power. So much for the ship-building interest. Yet the hon. member pounded his desk and was as voluble in his remarks as if he was making a great point in regard to shipbuilding. Well, then he spoke of the exodus—four times as many people, he said, had gone away from this country while we were in power as when they were in power. Well, Sir, once-and-a-while we get a little light from them through crevices—not through a window; a little light is let in by hon. members opposite. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron), not very long ago had a little Bill in this House to provide for the representation of the North-West. I was delighted to hear him say that in Assiniboia there are 65,000 people, away up there towards the Rockies, and in Alberta there are 40,000—there he had 105,000 at once in those two provisional districts. But while they were in power there was nothing there but the wolverine, the badger and the bear. There was an Indian or two, it is true; we were sending them out blankets, pipes, a little tobacco and tea, once-and-a-while. But there was no white man there. And yet we had a statement from the hon. gentleman that we never would have had from him, only he wanted to get his Bill through the House. He wanted us to vote for the Bill, and then we had a little light thrown on the subject from a Grit source, and we had 105,000 people in two territories where there was not a soul before while they were in power. Yet the hon. gentleman who just spoke says, four times more of our people have gone out of Canada under the present Government than under the Mackenzie Government. He says the regulations of the North-West have been that harassing that you have driven them out. He uttered that with the same voice in which he uttered all the rest. Does he not read? Does he not know that the people of St. Vincent and the farmers around Pembina have been sending their grain to Emerson, Manitoba, to get better prices? And yet this hon. gentleman comes here, apparently without a knowledge of these facts, and declares to this House and the country that the harassing regulations of the Government in the North-West have driven the people out of it and into the United States. Well, Sir, we had a little more light upon the North-West from the member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie). That trip that he took to the Rocky Mountains last summer did this country incalculable good. The old gentleman saw the North-West for himself. We were all glad that he went up. The leader of the party did not go up. He contented himself in making speeches at Bowmanville and other places about this wilderness that the Canadian Pacific road was running through. But the old leader went out himself, and although it is very hard to turn a Scotchman, of his years, from any beaten path he has long trodden, yet he had the manliness, and the patriotism, and the courage to say, in the face of the large audience in the Opera House at Winnipeg, that, like the Queen of Sheba, the half was not told him of the natural wealth of that country and its advantages. He gave a rebuke to the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson), who was applauded last winter when he spoke of the rigor of the climate, how cold it was, and the poor fellows going forty miles for wood. The hon. member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Ferguson) asked him: Where did they go 40 miles for wood? He said to Regina. And yet he knew at the time that coal was down to $7 per ton at Regina, worth at least two cords of wood, and he was applauded to the echo because he did not state the fact.

We had also Sir Richard Temple in the Opera House, Winnipeg, speaking of the advantages of the North-West, and saying it had a splendid climate, and that the people of England, Scotland and Ireland would flock there, because that is just the kind of climate they would like. We had our own Marquis of Lorne here, who loved the climate, with his sturdy constitution and robust frame, and was sorry to leave our shores. Yet, Sir, in spite of all this testimony, in spite of the hon. member for East York making that statement—which the Opposition are sorry for now, no doubt—we have these men getting up in the House and through their press decrying this country, in order to throw odium upon the Government. What more, Sir? I was told, out in Brandon, by a man named Smith—and he told me I might use his name; I do not know whether he is John Smith or not, but I will particularise him a little farther and say he is the emigration agent at that place. He told me that he went to the United States last summer to see if he could not get some emigrants that were going out west to migrate to the Canadian North-West, and he went to the meeting, and the form of proceedings was something like this: The chairman would be given a newspaper marked in pencil. Mr. Chairman (an American) what paper is that? The Globe newspaper, Toronto, was the answer. Would you be kind enough to read the portions marked in pencil? And he did read. Well, Sir, he could not get any emigrants after that; he could not get one. This was told me by our emigration agent and he said I might use it wherever I liked. He said that the Globe was put into the hands of United States emigration agents, with the articles marked, and they circulated them in England to stop emigration to Canada. The United States people carefully preserved these papers and read them at their meetings; and this agent said he could not get a man to go into the North-West. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman says this tariff has been damaging to the interests of the people in the Maritime Provinces. Now, it is a little singular, if this were true, that every time a constituency is opened in those Provinces, as I have already said, the people return a Liberal Conservative. Well, they have got one year that they think is pretty hard—1884 has been a pretty hard year—not for Canada only, but all over the world there has been a depression of trade in 1884. I was curious to know how the country stood during the five years the Government was in power, and how we stood it during the five years the other Government were in power, and how the United States stood it, and so I took the failures. I know there were failures. But you can only argue this question relatively. It is not claimed that there is an absolute perfection on the part of any Government, or absolute wretchedness on the part of any other, but it is relatively that we have to judge them. Now, Sir, in the United States from 1875 to 1879, inclusive, the number of failures amounted to 42,840 and the liabilities $915,378,000. From 1880 to 1884, inclusive, the liabilities of bankrupts in the United States amounted to $647,672,000. In Canada, from 1875 to 1879, there were 9,103 failures, with liabilities of $132,436,192; or they failed $1 in Canada while they failed $6 in the United States; or, more correctly, it was $1 in Canada to only $6.93 in the United States. While this Government has been in power, from 1879 to 1884, inclusive, Canada has had 5,029 failures, with liabilities amounting to $57,146,568. The United States, during that time, had failures amounting to $647,672,000, showing that when depression came over the face of the globe in 1884, the United States people had failed $11.35, while we had failed $1. What has held this country as a bower-anchor would hold a vessel from going on the shore? It has been the protective policy which the Government inaugurated and which it has so successfully carried out. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to answer that question. They may say the electors are ignorant as to the effect of a National Policy, and they will teach them. But how is it that when this wave of depression swept over the face of the globe, Canada fails only to the extent, proportionately, of $1, as compared with over $11 in the United States; and when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power our failures here stood as $1 to $6.93 in the United States? There is some cause for this discrepancy. I say it is the National Policy which has held our ship of state from going on the breakers. Let me say a word more in regard to the United States. The Rev. De Witt Talmage, speaking at at Brooklyn, New York, December last, said:

"To-day there are 1,000,000 people out of work in this country—10 per cent. of the laboring classes with nothing to do but suffer, and another 20 per cent. to-day on reduced wages."

If our neighbors have 1,000,000 workmen with nothing whatever to do, and 20 per cent. more toiling on reduced wages, we are entitled, with one-tenth of their population, to have 100,000 persons idle. Have we got them? Is there any country on the face of the globe that enjoys more prosperity than Canada, relatively speaking, does to-day? There is not one. And yet those hon. gentlemen tell us that this is a country which our people are leaving to go to the United States, where there are 1,000,000 people totally unemployed. If they go there, they go there to starve. I have followed some of our people who have gone to the United States; I have seen them in their homes in New York and Boston, and have asked them how they were getting along. If they could pay their butcher's and baker's bills on Saturday night they considered they were doing well, and that they were clad very poorly I know as a fact. Having started out for the States with prospects of success, having been told that they would get good wages there, and not thinking how far the wages would go, they are ashamed to come back to Canada, where they would earn more wages and work less time. But the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) the other night attempted, with the usual fairness which characterises him, to show that President Cleveland had been elected as supporting a revenue tariff. I read from Debates:

"Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear."

"Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, it is worth hearing. It is suggestive. It points to a moral that we would do well to heed."

"Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The language Mr. Cleveland used was just such language as would be used on our side of the House as to this policy."

"Mr. CHARLTON. The language he used, the language his party uses, the language his supporters use, is that the tariff of the United States is an unjust and an oppressive tariff, and that duties should be levied for revenue purposes only."

I happened to be in the United States during two weeks while the campaign was in progress. I was stopping at the Hoffman House, which was the headquarters of the Democratic party. I conversed with some of their leading men, and they assured me they were not going to adopt the plank of a revenue tariff; they were running the election on different issues, with which personal issues were largely mixed. Mr. Blaine, seeing the tide setting in in favor of protection, issued his manifesto; but it was too late to give him the victory, and many of his supporters had deserted him on account of his previous actions. Let me read from the New York Herald, which supported Mr. Cleveland, might and main, in order that we may see what his platform was. This was his platform:

"In making reduction in taxes, it is not proposed to injure any domestic industries, but rather to promote their healthy growth. From the foundation of this Government, taxes collected at the Custom house have been the chief source of Federal revenue. Such they must continue to be. Moreover, many industries have come to rely on legislation for a successful continuance, so that any change of law must be at every step regardful of the labor and capital thus involved. The process of reform must be subject in the execution to this plain dictate of justice. All taxation shall be limited to the requirements of economical government."

The same hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) stated with equal accuracy that the Government laid $225,000,000 of debt upon the neck of Canada, knowing at the time, right well, that $106,000,000 was given to the Provinces by relieving them of their debts, the amount involving no expenditure whatever. The same hon. gentleman who cheered that statement cheered the statement which I have read. Cleveland, in his platform, says:

"All taxation shall be limited to the requirements of economical government."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODWORTH. That is the reason we are elected. That is the reason why we support this Government, and if they did no act we would not support them. I am glad to hear those expressions; we would have hon. gentlemen opposite over on this side of the House, but there is not room for them. Mr. Cleveland's platform is also as follows:—

"The necessary reduction in taxation can and must be effected without depriving American labor of the ability to compete successfully with foreign labor, and without imposing lower rates of duty than will be ample to cover any increased cost of production."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODWORTH. Why are there no expressions of hear, hear, from hon. gentlemen opposite? It continues:

"Which may exist in consequence of the high rate of wages prevailing in this country."

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. And his speeches are in the same way.

Mr. WOODWORTH. The New York Herald, after giving Mr. Cleveland's platform, says:

"It is one of Mr. Blaine's favorite tricks to cover up the real questions of the canvass. The trick has been thoroughly exposed by Republican protectionists of Pennsylvania, who mean to vote against Mr. Blaine, and who say in their address to fellow Republicans:

"With respect to the tariff, we in no way recognise that protection is at stake in the present canvass, in the sense in which the Republican managers would have us believe. Many of the members of this association are pronounced protectionists, whose interests are largely dependent, as they believe, on the continued prosperity of the manufactures fostered by the tariff, and they can recognise no danger to these interests from the success of the candidate of a party which, in the last Session of Congress, only showed in its efforts at tariff revision its own hopeless division on the subject, and was forced, at Chicago, to adopt an expression of policy so nearly akin to that of its rival."

And so on. Then I tell the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) when he makes statements like these—statements which are unequivocal and positive in their character, and the rule is that a member of Parliament is supposed to state that which is strictly correct—when he made that statement he made a statement which is inconsistent with the fact, and he should have known it, as he reads the American papers, I believe, almost as much as the Canadian papers. I shall not go into the ridiculous figures he gave here, with regard to the progress of manufactures by percentage. He wants them to increase 100 per cent. continuously. If, for instance, a factory is started, and there are fifty hands, the first year, and the next year there are 100, he thinks that the next year again there should be 200, and so on, and in a few years there would be all hands and no factory—all hands and no place to put them. If we had been a parcel of school boys instead of men, who have lived for many years with eyes and ears open, he would have been laughed at if he had asked us to solve the problem, in arithmetic, which he gave us. Now I do not want to weary the House, but we have to treat these hon. gentlemen like Alexander treated his foes, as pictured by Dryden, where:

"Thrice he routed all his foes,
And thrice he slew the slain."

We have to kill them over and over again, like the Irishman's snake, which he killed once after breakfast and then about dinner time, and again just before sun down. They tell the same story this year, that they told last, and we will have it again next Session. No matter what the elections may declare or what the electorate may say, if we are in our places next year as I hope we will be every one of us, we will have the same old speeches, varied a little, perhaps, by the events of the year, but the same skeleton running through them all. I remember a story about a physician who was called to see a boy who was in a comatose condition. An epidemic of measles had been in the neighborhood, and the boy was in that comatose state, sleeping gently, when the doctor came up and felt his pulse and said to his mother: "Your boy is dead." The boy woke up and said: "I am not dead," but the mother replied, "You are dead; does not the doctor know better than you?" The boy Canada is not dead; he is only a little sleepy; the measles have been in the neighborhood, but he is not dead; he is only slightly touched, and no Act of Parliament can prevent the epidemic from going through the world. I have given figures to show that while the measles were bad over the United States, we did not have them one-fourth as bad here; I think the child Canada is able to say: I am not dead, but that I feel the pulse of life through my whole body yet. I have answered the hon. gentleman in regard to reciprocity. He knew that there was an Act on the Statute Book allowing us to reciprocate with the United States, when they have shown their willingness to do so; but he little knows the people of his own country. He little knows the people of Canada, if he thinks we should go untruthfully to the Americans on our bended knees, proclaim that we are in rags and poverty, and tell them that we cannot live without them. We have taken the manly course; we have earned their respect, and we will have them knocking at our doors, and when they do we will let them in on fair terms. That was what Sir Charles Tupper said over and over again; that was the whole tenor of his speech: we met them before, and we will meet them again, but it would be folly for us to go to them until they are ready to meet us fully. Now, I think I have answered the hon. member again fully. It was not necessary that I should rise and answer him, only that I suppose that some of my constituents and some of the people outside of this House would want to know why he was not answered, and perhaps forget that he had been answered over and over again. And when they come to read the speeches of the gentlemen I have referred to—the speech of the hon. Minister of Marine; the splendid speech of the hon. member who spoke this afternoon; the Budget Speech, so exhaustive and fair, so accurate—a speech upon which we can nail our colors every time; when they come to read the speech of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) they will not have to read mine. I do not believe there is a man on this side of the House, supporting the Liberal-Conservative Government of this country, who, after being beaten at the polls, as they have been beaten, after being beaten at debate, as they have been beaten, would rise every Session and repeat the same speeches over and over again. I believe these hon. gentlemen are sui generis; they belong to a race of their own; there is nothing like them that I ever heard of. Where is the debating club in which, when one side was beaten, the same speeches would be made by them year after year on the same subject and renewed again with the greatest volubility, as if they were new speeches. But we have these hon. gentlemen doing this to the end of the chapter. Why could not they, for once in their lives, never mind about power—never mind about triumphing over their opponents temporarily, but take hold of subjects interesting to the people of this country. They should know how the pulse of the country beats—in what direction public opinion is; and why have not they enough political sagacity to watch the mistakes of the Government, when they make mistakes, but on the great questions upon which the people have pronounced—the Canadian Pacific Railway and the National Policy—why do not they help to build up the country—help to build the road and bring immigrants here, and show that they are with the country of the country, and for the country. If they did this they would get power some day almost before they knew it. The Government may make mistakes. We, on this side, are not sent here—as was stated by an hon. gentleman opposite—and for which statement he was properly called to order—to register the decrees of the Government. We are sent here by independent constituencies, after careful canvass, after feeling the public pulse, and having its views on distinct questions, we come and debate those questions, and live those questions and fight those questions, and we assist the Government in carrying them out. But if we find that the Government are making mistakes on the great lines in which we were sent here to support them we have the right to remonstrate and we will do it. But up to this time what Liberal-Conservative can say, after having run his election for the people, and with the people, can say that the Government are not following out, and its supporters are not following out, the lines upon which we were sent here. The North-West is the very right arm of this Dominion. Every hon. member opposite is interested in upholding that country and populating it; and instead of having their speeches going over to Europe to show how bad a country this is, if they would only do as the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) has done, after having seen it; or if they have not seen it, if they would take his experience and circulate the truth about the country, we would have enough immigrants going into Manitoba and the North-West to pay in ten years for the Canadian Pacific Railway twice over—if the people of the old world knew to-day what they will know in time—if they knew that that country in the North-West was as fertile a country as there is on the face of the globe, and that the climate was not too rigorous, as it is not. I passed two winters there, and I know it is not too rigorous, and it is especially healthy for persons with weak lungs. That country is one of the most healthy in the world; you can pass a whole winter there without a wet foot, and in the spring the snow goes off quickly, and ploughing is earlier than in most portions of the older Provinces. If people only knew that country as it exists with its great advantages, where they could obtain land on favorable terms, we should have thousands of settlers where we now have not hundreds. I lay it to the Opposition of this country and to their press that the North-West is not filling up more rapidly with settlers and happy homes. If they joined us patriotically, as the Americans do among themselves in order to build up that country, we should have millions of revenue from it where to-day we have thousands. I ask hon. members opposite if they should not cry halt, to use the words of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies)—if they should not cry halt in using their press in the way they do for the purpose of getting power. I do not know but it would be a good thing to give them power if they would carry out the policy of this Government, and would stop complaining. But we have no reason to believe that they would carry out that policy; I believe they would not. I think we should get back to the old days of depression, of no hope, of flies on the wheel, of a depressed people and a depleted Treasury, and a country fast going to ruin and into the hands of the United States. I thank the House for listening to me; I did not know I was going to speak until six o'clock to-night. I had about made up my mind not to speak. It was not necessary for me to make these remarks, for the hon. gentleman has been answered again and again. I suppose there will be other speeches made; and if so, there is not a man on this side of the House who cannot answer the best arguments of their most eloquent speaker with the facts and figures as they exist. And when the time comes when we shall have to go back to the people for an endorsement of our conduct, if we have nothing more to answer than we have now, hon. gentlemen opposite need not lay the flattering unction to their souls that they will be anywhere but in opposition, with even decimated numbers.

Mr. KING. I desire to say a few words on this subject before the debate closes, and I trust that I may be able to do so without resorting to abuse of those who differ from me in opinion. I see before me hon. members from my own Province, representing important constituencies, and I have no doubt, if the remarks I make or the figures I use during the course of this debate, are not in their opinion correct, that they will do me the honor to criticise them fairly. I know, Sir, that I am perhaps subjecting myself, by the course I intend to take, to the treatment which hon. members in this House generally receive at the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite. When they attempt to tell the truth with regard to their own Province, or any portion of this Dominion, they are told that they are unpatriotic and are decrying the country. I have very little regard for the opinion of hon. gentlemen opposite who meet me in this way. I was surprised at the statements made by the hon. member for King's, N. B. (Mr. Foster), who I see is not now in his place, in the course of the speech he delivered this afternoon. I took down some of the words he uttered at the close of that speech:

"People in New Brunswick raise more and get more, for their products are worth more than ever they have been at any previous time in the history of the Province."

I do not propose to say one word in reply to that statement. I am willing that it should go to the hon. gentleman's constituents and mine, and to the people of New Brunswick generally, and that they should be the judges whether it is true or not. Six years ago I was honored with a seat in this Parliament. I held views then similar to those I hold now, with reference to the trade policy of this Government. I took occasion, at the first meeting of Parliament, when that question was under discussion, to give expression to my views. Six years have elapsed since, a good deal has transpired, and to-night I feel that I am in a better position to pass judgment upon that policy than I was at that time. I might call the attention of the House, if it were necessary, to the statements which were put forth at that time by the gentlemen who now administer the affairs of this country, who were then in opposition and were claiming the support of the people from one end of Canada to the other. I know, Sir, that in my own Province strong inducements were held out and loud promises were made. The people of that Province were told that they were to become a great manufacturing people; that they were to manufacture not only for the Maritime Provinces, but for the whole of Canada, including the North-West—that the Province was to be, as it were, the Birmingham and the Manchester of this Dominion. I confess, Mr. Speaker, that the people of New Brunswick, notwithstanding that they sent a majority of gentlemen to this Parliament to oppose that policy, did, when it became the law of the land, go to work manfully to try if it were possible to avail themselves of the benefits which it was promised they were likely to derive from it. It is true, Sir, that almost immediately the people set to work to erect cotton manufactories, sugar refineries and other industries of a like character, in St. John and in other places throughout that Province. Considerable progress was made during the first three years. An election was sprung upon the people of this country, and there is no doubt in my mind that the feeling in the Province of New Brunswick at that time favored somewhat the National Policy. I am free to admit, Sir, that the faith of even of some of my supporters was shaken by what they saw going on around them. There was a boom. There is no doubt but the amount of money that was put into circulation at that time by the erection of these factories assisted very materially in helping many of our people; but it is equally true that about the same time an improvement took place in the lumber industry, which is the staple industry in that Province. These two things occurring together promoted largely the prosperity of New Brunswick, and I dare say of the other Provinces by the sea. It is true that at that election a majority of gentlemen were elected in New Brunswick who favored the policy we are now discussing, but a change has taken place since then, and it is to that change I wish to allude more particularly to-night. It is true that a number of factories exist at present in New Brunswick; but I think he would be a bold man who would claim that, at present, the large majority of them are in any way beneficial to the people of New Brunswick. This policy has had a six years' trial. The Government have taken what appears to me to be a proper step in dealing with this matter. A couple of gentlemen, Messrs. Blackeby and Willis, were appointed to examine into the progress and working of the manufacturing industries of this Dominion, and I have the report which was laid upon the Table. I purpose calling the attention of the House to some statements contained in it. I propose to present the condition of affairs of New Brunswick, more especially that of St. John city and suburbs, to-day, with the condition of affairs that existed there prior to the introduction of the National Policy. I hold that, in all fairness, a year other than 1878 should have been selected to institute a comparison. Everybody knows that six months prior to 1878 two-thirds of the city of St. John was laid in ashes, and it must be admitted that, in the case of such a large and devastating fire as took place then, a large number of the manufacturing industries of St. John must have suffered in common with others. That was, therefore, not the proper time to choose. I think the comparison was altogether more favorable than the Government have a right to demand. In 1875 the manufacturers of St. John held what is known as the manufacturers' exhibition. A few weeks prior to that the secretary of the association was employed in preparing statistics of the manufacturing done in the city and county of St. John. I have not the pamphlet before me, but I have the statistics, as taken from a speech in Hansard, and I now propose to show the condition in which the manufacturing industries were, in 1875, as compared with the year 1884. I may say also that in making that report the secretary of that association, understanding better than the gentleman who is employed to prepare the statistics now before us, what was properly called a manufacturing industry, did not include other than manufacturing industries in his report. That report shows that in the year of 1875 there were, in the city and county of St. John—I leave out Musquash and St. Martin, outlying parishes—I find that in 1875, 9,418 hands were engaged in manufacturing industries in St. John and suburbs. These include 2,225 men engaged in working in the saw mills. Deducting that number we still find 7,193 men employed. It may be said that at that time the country was prosperous; that there was no depression in ship-building, or in lumbering; that money circulated very freely. Well, I have a recollection of the circumstances myself, but I do not ask the House to take my word. I submit an extract from an address which was presented on the occasion of the opening of that manufacturing exposition to the then Lieutenant-Governor of the Province, our present Finance Minister, which reads as follows:—

“The present is, for many reasons, a fitting time for this demonstration on the part of the manufacturers and mechanics of New Brunswick, and this display of the wide scope and great magnitude of the industries they have built up and are successfully conducting.

“When saw mills are idle, in consequence of the stagnation in the foreign markets, ships hardly paying expenses, on account of the low-ness of the freight, and the commercial classes threatened with financial ruin, as the result of the dullness that affects every branch of business.”

This was the condition of affairs in St. John city and county at the time to which I allude, when 9,418 persons were carrying on manufacturing successfully. Before going further, I will read another extract. On the presentation of that address to the Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick, he, in his reply, states as follows:—

“In 1860 our manufactures only reached, in value, $1,130,000, but according to the census of 1881, which was virtually a statement of our position in 1870, while our agricultural products had only advanced 25 per cent., our fisheries 60 per cent., and lumber 80 per cent., this branch of industry has increased 160 per cent., and I learn, that in the five years, from 1870 to 1875, it was nearly doubled. It is marvellous to me, our progress has been so rapid as it has been, that the value of this branch of industry has increased to $8,000,000.”

That was not a bad showing for the Finance Minister in 1874-75. I wish I could point to a condition of affairs to-day which could at all compare with that period. I regret I cannot. I shall now examine the copy of the valuable document which is placed in our hands. I have gone carefully over the list, and I have placed besides, under the heading of each sort of industry, the number that was employed and the number to-day employed in the same industry. This statement refers to the city of St. John, Portland, Carleton, the parish of Simonds, Indiantown, which is part of Portland, and Lancaster:

With regard to the cotton operatives, I do not hesitate to say that, if things had been stated as they actually were, at the time the report was made, the account would not have been as favorable as it is; for one of the factories, I am satisfied, was shut down when that report was made, though it is true that it started up shortly after and is running now. Furniture manufacture was one of the trades which was to be specially benefitted by the National Policy, and perhaps there were no more ardent supporters of that policy than those who were engaged in that business. I know myself that one of them went out of his way to assist in defeating me in my county and came nearly 50 miles from St. John to attend a demonstration of the Liberal Conservative party, and to-day his factory is closed. He is still in the furniture business, but he is selling furniture made in the Province of Ontario, and has discovered that others know how to make a slaughter market of St. John as well as the manufacturers across the line. I may say that I will not vouch for the number of 750 milliners and dressmakers in 1875. I do not believe there ever were so many in St. John. I only give the figures as I have got them. I would call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the fact that this was not the year after the St. John fire, when so many persons were employed in the sash and door factories, but three years before the St. John fire. I am surprised that there is not an increase in the number of trunk manufacturers, because, if anything has been helped by the National Policy, it is that industry, for the exodus from that Province has to my knowledge created a great demand for trunks. In order to complete the list I add to the 4,422 shown in Mr. Willis' report, 1,693 persons employed in the saw mills, making 6,115. Still we have 1,816 hands to account for. It is true that this report furnishes us with the means of information which we require to find out where they are. One would naturally suppose that a considerable number of them would be found in industries created or fostered by the National Policy. We find in the blind factories, the rubber-stamp factory, soap powders, fish curers—I am not aware that fish curing is a new industry in St. John—cigar factories, hair workers, the nut and bolt factory—this is put down here as a new industry, though to my own knowledge it was there for years before the National Policy, though it is true that it is prospering to-day more than it was before the introduction of that policy—the vinegar factory—though it does not mention that since the introduction of the National Policy a larger vinegar factory has gone out—the woollen factory—I do not know where it is, but it is mentioned in the report—and then we have the increase in the cotton manufactures, making a total of about 300 hands, leaving 1,500 still lacking. We find 128 granite workers. I do not think anybody will contend that the granite workers of St. John owe anything to the National Policy. I believe their principal market is found in the United States. I know that a considerable quantity of granite is sold in Canada, but the largest portion manufactured in St. John finds a market in the United States. Therefore, I take it that the National Policy has nothing to do with that industry, or, at all events, in the quantity of granite exported to a foreign country. Then we have twenty-five wharf builders. This is an industry I do not think, in all fairness, can be characterised as a manufacturing industry. Then we have thirty-three brickmakers. Well, I cannot deny that making bricks might be called manufacturing; but I do say, in 1874, they were not called manufacturers in the list prepared at that time. Then we have ninety-nine lime burners. Nobody ever thought of classing lime burners with manufacturers. That gives 329. But there is something more ridiculous still. I believe Mr. Willis has acted honestly in the matter. He is taking everything, large or small, and so he has included the barbers. He includes the butchers, he includes the dentists, he includes the florists, and the laundrymen, and the photographers, and the buck-saw filers, and the sausage makers, and the taxidermists, and the tobacconists, and the umbrella-repairers, and the chemists, and such like. But there is still a deficiency. Mr. Willis is equal to the occasion, and he adds 322 fishermen and some thirty odd ice dealers and ice cutters. I have looked carefully over the report, and I have noticed that in several cases Mr. Willis has pointed out to the manufacturers of cotton and the refiners of sugar the dangers of over-production, and I am only surprised that he did not point out to the ice cutters of St. John the danger of over-production also. We have a splendid country to manufacture ice in, and I think the warning applies as well to people in the ice business as to people in the cotton business. But, if the gentleman who had charge of this report had still required a few new industries, we have got half a dozen skating rinks in St. John, roller rinks and ice rinks. He might have gone into the skating industries. I do not know any new industries better patronised or better paying, and I am quite sure he would have found a great many people in those skating rinks, and he might, with just as much propriety, put them down as manufacturers as he did the fishermen of St. John. Of course, he knew it was a ridiculous thing to do, but the reason he includes the fishermen is, because they are engaged in fishing only a portion of the year and when they are not engaged in fishing, they are engaged in some other mechanical operation. Well, I think that would apply equally well to those patronising the skating rink; therefore, I think he ought to have given us the number of people in the skating rinks as well as the number of barbers, butchers, ice cutters, etc. But, Mr. Speaker, we are not yet done with this wonderful production. Let us see how much the workingmen of St. John have been benefitted by the operation of this tariff. In 1878, according to Mr. Willis' own showing, there were 8,555 hands, including all these I have given you as employed in the manufacturing industries of St. John; they received in weekly wages $63,749. To-day, after six years, trial of the National Policy, how much of an increase do you think there has been? Why, Sir, seven hands, or one each year. But worse than all; although there is an increase of seven hands, there is a decrease of $1,769 in weekly wages. Now, Sir, the workingmen of St. John were told that they were to get a fair day's pay for a fair day's work. They were getting it then if they are getting it now, because they were getting much more then, according to Mr. Willis himself, than they are getting now. But if we take the yearly aggregate of wages, we find they are receiving $99,967 less than they received six years ago. Now, Sir, we leave St. John, to deal with the Province as a whole. Does it make a better showing? I am not sure that it does. On the face of the report it would appear to. Examined critically, it does not. I think I will be able to show, before I get through, that the report, even in that respect, is misleading. In 1878, according to Mr. Willis, we had 11,975 hands, receiving $4,680,841. To-day, according to Mr. Willis, we have 14,036 hands, receiving $5,299,754; or an increase of 2,061 hands, including all the barbers, ice men, butchers, dentists, florists and such like; and we have an increase in wages of $619,113. Well, Sir, this would be a better showing if it were true; but I am going to show by this self-same report that it cannot be true. If the hon. gentlemen who have the report in their possession will turn to page 134, they will find that the National Policy has been productive of some benefit to one particular place in New Brunswick; they will find in the table under the heading, "New Industries Started Since 1878," the town of Woodstock credited with fourteen new industries, giving employment to 113 hands, and a yearly aggregate of weekly wages amounting to $510,010. Will the hon. gentleman take the trouble to calculate how much these men are receiving per head in the town of Woodstock? I have gone into the figures—I may not be right; if I am wrong, I hope someone will point it out; but it would appear that the new hands employed in the new industries in the town of Woodstock are receiving, on an average, according to this statement, $4,513.36 per man. It cannot be said that the National Policy has done no good in New Brunswick. But it may be said this is a typographical error, that it is the fault of the printer or the proof-reader. I think, Sir, I am in a position to deny that. I do not think it is the business of the type-setter or the proof-reader to correct additions. I find the additions in this table are made correctly. If further proof were wanted, you have only to turn to another place in the same report and you find the same figures. Therefore, I think I may fairly claim that it is not a typographical error, but that it is—I will not say a wilful misrepresentation, I will not say a deliberate falsification, but I will say it is an unpardonable blunder, on the part of the gentleman employed, to force a report of this kind on the Government. This report shows that we have some $600,000 more paid in yearly wages to the number of hands employed than we had in 1878. It seems to me that this Government report should not be allowed to go to the country. It is certainly misleading, and I hope its statements will be looked into, and if they are found to be incorrect, as I submit I have shown them to be, I trust that at least no more copies will be issued. No one has any right to expect such wages as those to which I have referred, and I know of only one new industry in which they would be likely to be paid, and that is in a Government factory for manufacturing statistics such as the present report. In six years the natural increase of our population, if the census be correct, would have called for nearly, if not quite as large, a number of hands employed in manufactories to meet the wants of our people. It would not be unreasonable to have expected 2,000. We have had some good times, and if the census returns be correct, we would have made a considerable increase without any stimulus being applied. But we have something to console us. The Finance Minister informed us the other day that the commissioners, not naming Mr. Willis particularly, had not time to visit all the places in which new manufactures had been started under the National Policy, and therefore he took the liberty of adding 50 per cent. to the number. I am pretty well acquainted with New Brunswick—I do not know much of the county of Gloucester and other northern counties, but I know something of the river counties, and I failed to see, on looking over this report where that gentleman could have gone to find anything to add. The report says:

“There are in Woodstock, and conducting business, besides the foregoing, some 10 milliners and dressmakers, 2 newspaper offices, 3 undertakers, 4 painters, 5 watchmakers, 1 edge-tool maker, 2 gold and silversmiths, 1 or 2 bakers, 6 blacksmiths and shoers, several (probably half a dozen) carpenters or builders, and 3 or 4 masons, whose weekly payroll would, at least, run up to $650. In the county of Carleton there are, outside of Woodstock, doing business—54 blacksmiths who do general work, and most of them horseshoeing, 45 boot and shoemakers, 1 brick maker, 62 builders, 3 masons, 16 carriage or sleigh builders, 16 grist and carding mills, 9 harnessmakers, 16 tanners and curriers. These several occupations would very probably afford employment to some 360 men and say 60 boys. The wages of the men would sum up weekly, at a moderate estimate, $2,500; and the boys might, at a low estimate, be expected to earn $120 per week. The total weekly earnings of the several industrial occupations enumerated would reach $2,620.”

I am satisfied the commissioner never visited all those persons, but most of them were taken from the census returns. I am not sure, however, but that they may have been there at the time the census was taken, yet were they there in 1874. I should not be surprised if there was one place in New Brunswick that had made some substantial progress under the National Policy, or during the period which the National Policy has been in existence. I refer to Moncton. But I might safely say that with the enterprise displayed by that town, with the capital at its command, with a railway built by the Government, costing, according to returns submitted to this House, $40,000,000, making Moncton the most central and best distributing point in New Brunswick, it is not much cause for wonder if new industries have thrived, for they would have thrived there without the National Policy. But it is true that in the county of York a very large cotton mill has been erected, and I believe it is nearly ready to commence operations. I do not believe it will become a subject for criticism in this House because a stock list was not opened for subscriptions, the establishment is built by one man. It will not be surprising if the factory is a success. The well known energy and perseverance which the owner has displayed throughout his career is sufficient to ensure the success of that factory. It is well known that those characteristics have served him in times past and enabled him to make a success in certain lines of business when other people had utterly failed. I hope he may have good success in this the same as he has enjoyed heretofore in the other lines of business in which he has been engaged. I might say it is a little remarkable that hon. gentlemen opposite hold Mr. Gibson in much higher estimation now than they did formerly, when he submitted a tender for building the Canadian Pacific Railway and offered half a million dollars deposit. He did not get the contract, but he has since built this cotton factory. I venture to say to-night that no harder task could be given to any person than to send him from Ottawa to St. John for the purpose of interesting capitalists in manufacturing enterprises. It is certain such a mission would fail. The people of New Brunswick have had a bitter experience. We have had Parks' cotton factory enlarged, agricultural implement works, worsted goods, patent leather, lock and brass works, knitting factory, St. Croix cotton factory, and a number of other important industries, which were not fairly started until they were compelled to succumb. If it were right to characterise any industries in New Brunswick as waning industries, it would be those industries started under the National Policy, and not the lumber business. We are told in the report that shipbuilding has been abandoned in St. John. Yet it is remarkable that, according to the report of the commissioner, $500 more weekly wages are paid now in that business than in 1878. I do not understand how that agrees with the statement that the industry is depressed and is declining. I do not say that it is flourishing; I give the figures as I find them in this report. But, Sir, it is said that the hard times have been caused by the depression in the lumbering and shipbuilding which formerly flourished in St. John and the Province. It is true that at the present time the lumber business is depressed in New Brunswick, and I believe elsewhere. It would be folly for me or for any person knowing anything about the matter to deny it. But it is not true that in the last five years, as compared with the five previous years, the lumber industry has been a waning industry in New Brunswick. From 1874 to 1879 New Brunswick exported of the products of the forest $22,319,214 worth; from 1874 to 1884, $25,406,044, or an increase in the exports of the products of the forest, in those five years, as compared with the previous five years, of $3,086,828. And coming down to deals, I find that the increase has been on that article alone, $1,204,468. It has been stated here that the prices obtained in those five years were not so good as in previous years. I deny that; and I say that taking five years, from June, 1879, to June, 1884, and the price will compare favorably with the five years previous. Take the prices of saw-logs, the raw material, and I have no hesitation in saying that I can place saw-logs in St. John at an advance of 40 per cent. on the prices in 1878, for the reason that freights are lower than they were, so that our manufacturers are able to pay better prices than they were heretofore. Still, I do not say that the lumber business is not depressed at the present time, but the remedy applied is not an efficient one. Sir, we are having a depression in New Brunswick; we are having harder times than we had a year or two ago, and that fact is not entirely due to the depression in the lumber business, or the decline in shipbuilding. I shall endeavor to show, as briefly as possible, what, in my opinion, has contributed to bring about the depression. In the five years, from 1874 to 1879—and I take those years because they were alluded to by the Finance Minister—the imports of New Brunswick amounted to $36,706,037; in the five years, from 1879 to 1884, the imports had dwindled to $30,571,204, or a decline of $6,134,793; and yet, Sir, the hon. member for Kings (Mr. Foster) told us that the volume of our trade is rapidly increasing. He took the year 1878 and he compared it with 1874. He shows that there has been a great increase, but he took great pains not to compare, or, at all events, he carefully avoided comparing, the year 1874 with 1884, which he should have done if he really wanted to state the matter fairly. But the comparison which I understood him to make was an unfair comparison, and one which was unworthy of him. Well, Sir, in the first period of five years we paid of duties, including Excise, $7,207,757; but I deduct from that $400,000 paid on goods imported to supply the place of good lost in the St. John fire. I think it has always been conceded that those duties actually amounted to that sum; I think that has been stated here on good authority on the other side of the House. Deducting that amount, the balance is $6,807,757, the net amount paid in the five years. The duties paid in the last five years, including Excise, amounted to $7,877,173, or an increase, including Excise, of $1,069,416, and that, Sir, with a decreased importation to the extent of some six or seven million dollars. That is one cause of the hard times—the increased taxation imposed on us during the last five years by this tariff. But there are other causes. There is the capital locked up, and the amount of that capital I put as follows—that is on the capital of factories either lost or unproductive. There is the St. Croix factory, which I estimate at $200,000, and which my hon. friend from Charlotte will correct if I am wrong; the St. John Cotton Company, $200,000; Parks & Company, $150,000; Moncton lock works I estimate at $60,000; and other smaller industries closed down, $90,000. This gives us a sum of $700,000 of New Brunswick capital, because I do not include in this the amount of American capital invested in the St. Croix factory. This is exclusively capital belonging to or invested by the people of New Brunswick, and a great deal of it by men who can ill-afford to spare it, and I am satisfied that in many cases if the stock of these enterprises were put on the market it would not realise 10 cents on the dollar. I propose now to consider the increased cost of goods we have been compelled to purchase in Ontario and Quebec. I use the word "compelled," because I believe it is the proper word to use, and I get my figures on this phase of the subject from a paper which was read before the St. John Board of Trade by a prominent supporter of hon. gentleman opposite, Mr. C. H. Fairweather, who states in that paper, which has got a good deal of publicity, having been referred to in the Address, as well as by the member for Pictou and other hon. Members in this House—that the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick purchase from Ontario and Quebec and Manitoba about $12,000,000 annually. Our proportion of that, according to population, would be about $5,000,000. I think I may fairly put down $25,000,000 for the five years, but I will put it at $20,000,000. It may be said that we are not paying any more for goods we purchase in Ontario and Quebec than we would have had to pay under the tariff which prevailed before the National Policy. That may be true to-day, but I am satisfied that for the first one or two, or three years after the introduction of this policy, we paid largely in advance of the costs of goods as they could have been laid down under a revenue tariff, as it existed under the previous Government. I think I put it at a low figure when I estimate the increased cost in round numbers, on goods purchased, exclusive of flour, at $200,000 a year, or in five years $1,000,000. Then we have Mr. Fairweather's estimate for flour purchased in the Upper Provinces, amounting to something like 400,000 barrels a year, and we have the best authority for saying that the cost of that flour has increased to us under the operation of the tariff, by the amount of 10 cents per barrel. I will give you my authority. In Hansard, of 1881, at page 1024, the Minister of Finance is reported as saying:

"I know it is a vexed question, and hon. members on both sides of the House argue it from different standpoints; but it is clear that the effect of the tariff has been to increase the price of flour, wheat and other cereals; and, from the most careful enquiry that can be made, I have arrived at this estimate, that flour is increased to the consumer in Canada 10 cents per barrel."

Now, I add $200,000 duty on the flour for the same period, and I get $3,000,000 taken from us in five years under the operation of this tariff. This, I fancy, will account, in a large measure, for the depression that exists in New Brunswick to-day, quite as much, perhaps, as the depression in the shipping or the lumbering industries. I propose to refer briefly again to this paper of Mr. Fairweather's. We are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that we have something to offset this loss of foreign trade in the rapid growth of interprovincial trade. Well, let us examine into this for a moment. Mr. Fairweather has taken considerable pains to place this matter before the St. John Board of Trade. It is quite evident that either that gentleman has erred in his calculation, or a committee of this House, who were appointed about two years ago, expressly to enquire into this matter, were sadly astray; for I find, on referring to the report of the select committee in the Sessional Papers of that year, that we are put down as actually purchasing, including Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, $2,000,000. From that I deduct $1,000,000 for Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, which would leave us $1,000,000, or just 50 per cent. more than the amount given by Mr. Fairweather. Well, what are those exports, taking his figures? Flour, $2,750,000; oatmeal, $320,000; oats, $75,000; bran, barley and peas, $30,000; canned meats, $25,000; preserved fruits, $10,000; cheese, $40,000; butter, $30,000; malt, $60,000; mill feed $35,000; making a total of agricultural products exported from Ontario and Quebec to the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia of $3,375,000, coming into direct competition with the products of our own farmers in their own markets. I would not object to that if there was any reciprocity of trade. But let us turn to the other side of the question, and what do we find? What are our farmers able to find a market for in Ontario? $10,000 worth of wool is the only export of agricultural produce to Ontario from the Maritime Provinces. Divide that among the 100,000 farmers in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and it just gives them 10 cents apiece. Of the remaining $8,625,000 sold us as shown by Mr. Fairweather, over 85 per cent. is goods manufactured from materials produced in the country, and therefore it gives Ontario and Quebec an addition to their market to that extent. Now, let us for a moment examine the other side of the account, and do we find that New Brunswick and Nova Scotia are as favorably situated. In Mr. Fairweather's statement we find $1,695,722 worth of sugar as the export from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to the Upper Provinces. Well, Sir, I have taken the trouble to get posted somewhat on this subject by a gentleman who is considered in this House a pretty good authority on the sugar question; and he tells me that that would represent about $1,000,000 of actual cash expenditure on the part of the refineries for the raw sugar, and that about $400,000 would be required to pay the duty, leaving a balance of $295,000 as the amount which would go into the pockets of the people of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick for handling and refining that quantity of sugar. Then we have $750,000 worth of cotton; but that, though it is a manufacture, is not wholly a product of the Lower Provinces. Deduct, for the raw material, $100,000, and you have a balance of $350,000 as the amount derived from the manufacture of that quantity of cotton. Then we have coal, a Nova Scotia product, valued at $766,000; iron from Nova Scotia, $474,221; and a sum total of all other articles, $587,339; making, in the way I have stated, $2,422,560, which, divided by our 800,000 population, gives us a market in the Upper Provinces for our own products, to the extent of $3 a head, against a market in the Maritime Provinces for the Upper Provinces to the extent of $15 a head. I think it may be fairly said that if there is an interprovincial trade, it is almost or entirely one-sided. In saying this, I may, perhaps, be putting an argument in the mouths of some hon. gentlemen from the Province of Ontario, in favor of continuing to impose upon us this policy. If I do, I cannot help it. But I now propose to show what this interprovincial trade is worth to New Brunswick. I am surprised that Mr. Fairweather, a representative of the Board of Trade of St. John, did not deal with the matter from that standpoint, but was so willing to group Nova Scotia and New Brunswick together. He must have had a purpose in doing so; for the feeling that exists between St. John and Halifax is not such as to induce him to deal with the question in that way. Take sugar, $295,000; cotton, $300,000; cars and car wheels, $38,000; canned goods, $35,000; wool, $10,000; skates, tacks, nails, etc., $30,000; fish, $150,000; and leather, $84,000; making a total of $942,000, furnished partly by Nova Scotia and partly by New Brunswick. New Brunswick's proportion of this, according to population, would be $400,000. Add to that $53,899 for red granite, $6,000 for grindstones, and $10,000 for finnan haddies, wholly New Brunswick products, or $82,899 for these three items, which gives $482,899 as our proportion, or less than half a million dollars sold by New Brunswick to Ontario and Quebec, while our proportion of the $12,000,000 amounts to over $5,000,000. Now, I think I have proved conclusively that the lumber industry during the past five years, whatever it may be in the future, has not been a waning one; and if it were, the tariff has not supplied other industries to take its place. I think I have demonstrated, also, that manufacturing made greater and more permanent advances under a revenue tariff than under the National Policy. I think I have satisfied a good many gentlemen that the report of the factory commission is valueless and misleading. I have pointed out how taxation has been increased without giving us corresponding benefits, I have pointed out that depression does exist and that it is due, in a large measure, to the causes I have stated, and not to the causes assigned in the report. Before taking my seat, I would ask the Government to make a sacrifice, in order to secure for the people of New Brunswick what they demand. They wish to have a reciprocity treaty with the United States and the countries further south, if possible. As the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Davies) said, we do not ask the Government to go down on their knees to our American neighbors; we simply ask that the Government should approach, in a business-like manner, a practical business people, with whom we are trading continuously. If the Americans resent our approach, we will have no further reason to complain of the Government; but until some further attempt be made, you may rest assured, Sir, that the people of the Maritime Provinces will insist upon something being done. It is not too much to remind the Government there is an east as well as a west in this Dominion; it is not too much to remind them that in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick we have undeveloped resources quite as great as those in the North-West, and the day may not be long distant when the Government will discover that they have a better heritage in the east than they have in the west. The day may not be far off when the spell cast over the people of this country, with regard to the North-West, will be broken; and I hope, when it is, justice may be meted out to the older Provinces in the east.

Mr. BURNS moved the adjournment of the debate.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.15 a.m., Saturday.

PRAYERS.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. SPROULE. Before the Orders of the Day are called I wish to refer to an article which appeared in Friday's Free Press, under the heading, "Dividing the Spoils." It states that a number of Conservative members of Parliament were interested in timber limits in the North-West, and, amongst others, mentions the name of P. S. Sproule, M.P., which, I presume, is intended for mine. Some time ago a list appeared in the Globe, called the "Black List," in which, amongst a number of names, I saw mine figuring. I only rise to say that I never have had, either directly or indirectly, any interest in timber lands, mining lands, agricultural lands, or any other lands in Manitoba or the North-West, with the exception of some few village lots which I bought at private sale and at auction. I have had to do as many other members of this House, I presume, have done. When parties have written to me asking me to put in applications for timber limits for them, I have, out of courtesy, done it. And that is how my name appeared in that list. I may say that seven out of the ten or twelve I have applied for are Reformers, who happened to live, previously, in my riding, or who were acquainted with me in some way or other. I have only applied in their behalf when they have written to me, and further than that I have had no interest at all.

ENQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to ask the Premier if he can give me any information as to the time I am likely to receive that list of stockholders of the Grand Trunk Railway, which was ordered last Session?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have explained to the hon. gentleman the unfortunate error by which the return for last year was not transmitted to the Grand Trunk Company. I understand, however, that it, as well as the return moved for by my hon. friend this year, have been transmitted to the board of the Grand Trunk Railway Company in England for the purpose of their obeying the command of my hon. friend and this House.

Mr. MITCHELL. Would my hon. friend state, if he can, at what time it is probable that these returns will come before the Session closes?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have not the most distant idea. I am told they will involve the copying of several volumes.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 51) for granting certain powers to the International Coal Company (Limited).—(Mr. Desjardins.)

Bill (No. 59) to incorporate the Brantford, Waterloo and Lake Erie Railway Company.—(Mr. Paterson, Brant.)

DAVIS DIVORCE BILL.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) Moved the second reading of Bill (No. 84) for the relief of Amanda Esther Davis—(From the Senate.)

Motion agreed to, on a division, and Bill read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 91) to incorporate the Winnipeg and Prince Albert Railway Company.—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria.)

HOMESTEADS—CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. BLAKE asked, How many homesteads have been entered within the Canadian Pacific Railway belt up to 31st December last, between,—1. The first and second principal meridians; 2. The second and third; 3. The third and fourth; 4. The fourth and fifth.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The first and second principal meridians, 7,949; the second and third, 3,917; the third, fourth, nil; fourth and fifth, 23; total 11,889.

INCREASED SUBSIDY TO NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. KIRK asked, Has the Government yet decided on the claims of the Government of Nova Scotia for increased subsidy? If so has the Nova Scotia Government been notified of the decision? What was the decision?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The matter has been referred to a sub-committee of the Privy Council, who, I hope, will report in a day or two, and the whole question, I hope, may be settled by the end of the week.

ALLAN LINE—ASSISTED PASSAGES.

Mr. BLAKE (for Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT) asked, Total amount paid by Government to the Allan Line from 1st July, 1878, to 1st July, 1883, for assisted passages and for all other purposes, except sums paid on account of mail service.

Mr. POPE. I have not the information, but if the hon. gentleman will put a notice on the paper and move for a return I will bring it down. I would like him to move for a return since 1873.

STEAM COMMUNICATION WITH FRANCE.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Whether the Government have made with any steamship company a contract awarding to such company the annual subsidy of $50,000 voted by Parliament for a line of steamers between France and Canada? If such contract exists, has Mr. J. X. Perrault, of Montreal, at present in France, been delegated by the Government to negotiate with the Government of France with a view to obtain for such Company a subsidy equivalent to the Canadian subsidy, or some other pecuniary advantage? Is Mr. Perrault accredited to the Canadian Government as the representative of the Company to which the contract has been awarded; and has he, in that capacity or otherwise, been entrusted with any mission whatever to the French Government or to the High Commissioner in London?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. 1st. The Government has passed an Order in Council authorising the execution of a contract with the Halifax Steamship Company. 2nd. The Government has not delegated Mr. J. X. Perrault, of Montreal, to the effect mentioned in the question or for any other purpose. 3rd. The company has not accredited Mr. Perrault to this Government, and therefore that gentleman could not be intrusted with any mission in that respect,

MONTREAL TURNPIKE TRUST.

Mr. AMYOT asked, At whose request, and in virtue of what authority, order or statute, was the sum of $7,200 paid and entered to the debit of the Province of Quebec, as on the "30th June, 1884, for one year's interest on Montreal Turnpike Trust Debentures," as it appears on page 4 of part IV., of the Public Accounts of Canada for the year 1884?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. By the 3rd section of the award the arbitrators appointed to adjust the debts and assets of Ontario and Quebec, the Montreal Turnpike Trust was declared to be the property of Quebec. By the 4th section of the award the arbitrators adjudged that as the sum of $188,000 (representing the Trust) was secured by debentures issued upon the credit of the Trust and guaranteed by the late Province of Canada, and the Trust had hitherto met the payments upon such debentures, and the payment thereof had therefore not been assumed by the Dominion of Canada, nor had the said sum of $188,000 been charged by the Dominion in the debt of the late Province of Canada and the said arbitrators had assigned the Trust as an asset of the Province of Quebec, that Province should thereafter indemnify, protect and leave harmless the Dominion and the Province of Ontario against any charge upon, or payment by the Dominion in respect of the said debentures or the said guarantee or in respect in any way of the said Trust. Of this $188,000 of debentures $120,000 are in the hands of the public and interest thereon at 6 per cent. $7,200 have for some years past been paid half-yearly by the Dominion, the Province of Quebec having for some time made periodical remittances to cover the amounts so paid. The whole matter is now being investigated and I trust will soon be closed.

CHINESE COMMISSION.

Mr. BLAKE asked, At what date, for what term, and at what rent were premises rented for the use of the Commission on the Chinese question? Is the Secretary still under pay? If not, when did his pay cease?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Rooms were rented in the Senate until the beginning of the Session, when a room was rented outside for a few weeks. I have not the price of the rental at hand. The secretary was under pay until the Commission closed its labors on the 28th February.

THE BOUNDARY QUESTION.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Has the Government yet decided on any proposals to be made to Parliament with reference to the boundary question? When will such proposals be made?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I thought it right to communicate first with the Government of Manitoba on the subject, and I have just received their answer. I find from it that they would desire Imperial legislation, so far as they are concerned. Therefore this matter will be dealt with without any delay.

SHORT LINE RAILWAY.

Mr. CASEY asked, When will the plans and reports of the engineers respecting the Short Line be laid on the Table of the House?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Soon.

STEAM COMMUNICATION WITH FRANCE.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Have the Government of Canada taken steps to inform the French Government that they have already treated with a Transatlantic Steamship Company between France and Canada? Are the Government prepared to state what steps the said company have taken towards their undertaking, and how many steamships they will have at their disposal in the spring?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The Government has asked the High Commissioner to inform the French authorities that the subsidy of $50,000 voted by Canada has been granted to the Halifax Steamship Company, represented in Europe by Mr. Wood. One of the members of the company is obliged to commence a fortnightly service next spring. The Government understand that the company are making satisfactory arrangements for placing their steamers on at that time.

PRECAUTIONS AGAINST ASIATIC CHOLERA.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Whether the Government has taken or intends to take any and what preventive measures against the attacks of Asiatic cholera, and other epidemic diseases? Has a special system for the inspection of vessels, coming up the River St. Lawrence been established for this purpose? Will the rags imported for the manufacture of paper be specially inspected?

Mr. POPE. A proclamation containing regulations was issued on the 28th June, 1884, and was sent to quarantine officers and Customs officers. The Customs officers at the several ports where there are no quarantine officers are the quarantine officers for those places. A proclamation dealing with vessels coming up the St. Lawrence was issued on the 9th August, 1884, and sent to quarantine officers and Customs officers. Every vessel coming into the St. Lawrence to Quebec, excepting steamers, which are examined at Rimouski, is examined at Grosse Isle. The proclamation of the 9th August deals with rags from infected ports. They are entirely prohibited now.

NEW BRUNSWICK JUDGES.

Mr. DAVIES asked, Has the attention of the Government been called to the fact that the appointment of judges for the year's circuit in New Brunswick has not been made in Hilary term past as usual? Has the vacancy on the bench of the Supreme Court of that Province been filled up? If not, when will the appointment be made?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The attention of the Government was not called till the other day. The appointment will be made within a few days.

CANADIAN CONTINGENT FOR THE SOUDAN.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether any offer has been made by the Government of Canada, or whether any offer has been made by any individuals through the Government of Canada, to equip and send a military contingent to the Soudan at the cost of Canada or of individual Canadians? Whether any offer of military assistance at the cost of the British Government has been made by the Government or by individuals? Whether any reply has been received to any such offers? And whether the correspondence will be laid on the Table?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No offer has been made by the Government of Canada to equip and send a military contingent to the Soudan at the cost of Canada or of individual Canadians. It is understood that some offers have been made by individuals. Some were sent directly to England, I believe; some were sent to the Governor General as an Imperial officer; and some came to the Department of Militia—these were sent to the Governor General for his information. I am not aware that any offer of military assistance at the cost of the British Government has been made by the Government or by individuals.

Mr. AMYOT,

INDIAN SCHOOLS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. KIRK rose to ask:

- (1.) How many Industrial schools for the instruction of Indian youth have been established in the Province of Manitoba and the North-West Territories respectively, under the authority and by permission of the Government of Canada, and where are they located?
- (2.) At what places have lands been surveyed and set apart for Indian schools in 1884, and what quantity at each place?
- (3.) Through whose representations and recommendations are these schools established from time to time? Is any request from the Indians themselves required for the establishment of a school?
- (4.) What subjects of instruction are provided for these schools in regard to industrial pursuits, moral and religious? Are both sexes included in the general school provisions?
- (5.) Are any of the Indian schools placed under the care or supervision of any religious body or denomination? If so, what are the conditions upon which control is granted, and what is the extent of the denominational control, and is it to the extent granted, a temporary or permanent control? If there are denominational schools, what is the number belonging to each denomination, where are they located, and what quantity of land is owned or controlled by each, and what is the number of pupils?
- (6.) When the moral and religious instruction of an Indian school is placed under the supervision or control of any denomination, does it give to the denomination the control of the land and buildings of such school?
- (7.) At whose cost are the Indian school buildings erected and furnished and under whose directions are the text books selected or compiled? By whom are they paid for?
- (8.) What standing of attainment is required of teachers in these schools? How and from whom do they receive certificates of qualification? Is there a system of governmental inspection of these Indian schools?
- (9.) Are the teachers and trustees or managers of these schools required to make any periodical returns to the Government of the attendance, general condition, progress and expenditure of each?
- (10.) Have any of the religious denominations obtained lands for church or school purposes from the Government or from any Indian reservation by treaty or otherwise?
- (11.) Have any of the religious bodies on their own responsibility established schools among the Indians, and if they have did they receive any assistance directly or indirectly by land grants or otherwise for the support of such schools, from the Government?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the hon. gentleman must give notice of that and move in the ordinary way. It is not a question.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE STATUTES.

Mr. TROW asked, Is it the intention of the Government to send the statutes of Canada to Coroners?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, it is not the intention.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY BELT.

Mr. BLAKE asked, How many acres of their land grant have been finally accepted and taken over by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company within the Canadian Pacific Railway belt: 1, between the first and second principal meridians; 2, between the second and third; 3, between the third and fourth; 4, between the fourth and fifth; 5, in Southern Manitoba outside the railway belt?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am very sorry I cannot give an answer at present, but I hope to be able to furnish the hon. gentleman with that return in a few days.

ANTIGONISH AND SHERBROOKE—MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. McISAAC asked, Is the contract for carrying the mails between Antigonish and Sherbrooke given? If so, to whom, and for what amount? Were tenders asked, if not, why not?

Mr. CARLING. The contract has been renewed with Mr. McGrath, the former contractor; for $1,092, that being the price at which Mr. McGrath performed the work prior to 1885.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY — CONNECTION WITH THE ONTARIO SYSTEM.

Mr. MULLOCK asked, What is the lowest price per mile by way of bonus from the Dominion Government at which any person or corporation offered to construct a railway connecting the Canadian Pacific Railway with the Ontario railway system at or near Gravenhurst?

Mr. POPE. I would ask the hon. gentleman to move that in the usual way by an address.

ST. JOHN BRIDGE AND RAILWAY EXTENSION CO.

Mr. WELDON asked, What amount has been advanced by the Government to the St. John Bridge and Railway Extension Company, on account of work done by them to February 1st, 1885? What is the estimated value of the work done by the company to that date?

Mr. POPE. The chief engineer's estimate of 8th January, 1885, was $338,567; the first payment made thereon, on February 1st, 1885, was $270,800.

REFUND OF RAILWAY BONUSES TO ONTARIO.

Mr. COOK moved for:

Copy of the memorial presented to the Government by the County Council of the County of Simcoe, Ontario, praying for a refund of bonuses granted by the different municipalities of that county to railways that have been declared by this Parliament to be works for the general advantage of Canada, together with copies of all correspondence and other papers relating thereto.

He said: After Confederation the railway era of the Province of Ontario began. The Government of the day passed an Act by which railways were to be granted a certain amount of money, I think $1,500,000, for their construction in the Province of Ontario. That stimulated municipalities, who had the power under a general Act to grant bonuses to roads that were being constructed in their midst. The people, smarting under the monopolies of the different railways then in existence, endeavored to relieve themselves by the construction of rival roads which were promoted by individuals and bonused by the Provincial Government and the municipalities. The county of Simcoe formed no exception to this rule. The Northern Railway, it is well known, was constructed years ago from Collingwood, on the Georgian Bay, to the city of Toronto. That railway had no competition, and therefore it charged whatever rates it saw fit. The people of the county of Simcoe, desiring to break the monopoly, decided to assist a number of gentlemen to construct a road from the village of Allandale, near the town of Barrie, to the city of Hamilton, connecting there with the Great Western Railway and the water communication of Lake Ontario. On that occasion the county of Simcoe, or the municipalities in the south riding of it, contributed very largely to the line, their object being to do away with the monopoly of the Northern Railway. The county solicitor was called upon by the different municipalities to draw up an agreement between them and the gentlemen who were to construct the road, but it appears that the document was so loosely drawn that a coach and four could have been driven through it. The Hamilton and North-Western, of which I am now speaking, received from the municipalities altogether in the way of bonuses $719,000, and it also received Government aid to the extent of $428,852.22. It is not necessary for me to mention the amounts each municipality contributed to the fund, but I have gone through the figures and can give them in detail if necessary. Well, Sir, as I said before, owing to the looseness with which the agreement had been drawn, soon as this road was constructed, it amalgamated with the Northern Railway, and the consequence was that, instead of weakening the monopoly, it was intensified and rendered more burdensome. The result is that last summer the company charged eight cents a bushel for carrying wheat from the village of Allandale, or the town of Barrie, to the city of Toronto, a distance of sixty miles, while they carried wheat for two cents a bushel from the town of Collingwood over the whole road, some thirty-five miles farther than from the town of Barrie. You will, therefore, see at a glance how unfairly the people of that county are being treated by this great monopoly. Well, Sir, then the Midland Railway was constructed, it was constructed largely by loans from the Government and from the municipalities through which it runs. The municipalities gave the Midland Railway $142,500, and the Government gave them $155,798.14, enabling the company to build their line. Towards the portion running through the county of Simcoe the municipalities of that county contributed $46,370.85. But that did not do away with the difficulties the people of that section of the country were laboring under. Then, Sir, we had the Northern Extension, costing a large amount of money. This road ran through the county of Simcoe tapping the district of Muskoka, where the people of this section got the advantage of it. I must not overlook the North Simcoe Railway, to which the municipalities rendered assistance to the amount of $75,000, and the Government gave $46,874.52. Now, Sir, we find in the whole Province of Ontario, that the amount of money granted in bonuses by the Provincial Government amounted to $6,520,240.80, while the municipalities gave $6,385,980. Municipalities of the Province and the Provincial Government have contributed a total amount of $12,806,220.80. You will see therefore, Mr. Speaker, that a large sum of money has been expended by Ontario on the construction of railways from which no doubt benefit has been derived. But those roads have been taken from the Province by the Dominion Act of 1883, by which they were declared to be for the general advantage of Canada. Neither the Provincial Government nor the municipalities have any control over these railways—although they put their money into them—because of the action of the Dominion Government which has taken them without leave or license. I may say that the memorial presented to the Government was from the County Council of the county of Simcoe, a memorial passed unanimously by that body, which is one of the largest of the kind in Ontario, about two-thirds of the members of which are Conservatives. It cannot, therefore, be said that this is a party question or a party movement. I am sure, moreover, that there are as zealous Tories in that Municipal Council as can be found on the other side of the House. I beg the First Minister's pardon, for I remember that at the last convention held in Toronto by his friends the name of the party was changed; they are no longer called Tories or Conservatives, because the First Minister said they were Conservative-Liberals. I remember during my campaign in 1872 holding a meeting in a part of the country where the people were largely Highland Scotch. My opponent, Mr. McCarthy, did not happen to be there, but he sent a Highland Scotchman from Collingwood, Mr. Dudgeon, at present mayor of that town. Knowing that the place in question was one of my strongholds he commenced very mildly, and after he had spoken about twenty minutes, one of the electors asked him: On which side are you? what are your politics? you have been speaking twenty minutes and have not indicated what your politics are? Well, said the speaker, I belong to the party which was once called the Tory party; we then changed our name to the Conservative party, but we are now called the party of union and progress. While making that statement an elector rose and said: Thieves like to change their names. On looking at Webster I find that Tory is said to be an Irish word meaning robbers and savages. The party has changed the name, but the members of it appear not to have abandoned their predatory instincts. I notice that in a speech made by the hon. Premier to a deputation that waited on him some time ago he stated :

"The words of the Act of 1883, declaring certain roads for the general advantage of Canada, are of no consequence. They are put into every railway Bill granted by the Dominion Parliament in cases where a railway or railways affected are considered within one Province, in order to show that the Federal Parliament had a right to deal with the subject. The words 'for the general advantage of Canada' are merely a phrase."

That phrase, to my mind, means that the railways taken from the Government and the municipalities are now in the hands of the Dominion Government, and there are precedents by which they can refund the cost of their construction not only to the Provincial Government but also to the municipalities. We have a precedent in the refund given to the town of Pembroke. In 1882 a bonus had been given by that town to the extent of $75,000, and at the time the election campaign was going on, the present member (Mr. White) received a telegram from the leader of the Government saying that the Dominion Government would recoup the town the amount of that bonus, which, together with the interest added, say $10,000, would make the sum of $85,000. We have, therefore, a precedent in Ontario itself. If we go to the Province of Quebec we find another precedent in the case of the North Shore Railway. I am confident that if an attempt were made to deprive the Province of Quebec of their railways, as has been done in the case of Ontario, there is not a Blue in this House who would not rise with indignation. I call on the Conservatives or the Liberal-Conservatives or the Conservative-Liberals, if they prefer the last name, to insist on the Government handing back to the municipalities and the Provincial Government that which rightly belongs to them. There is not, I repeat, a Conservative member from Quebec who would allow the Government to do anything of this kind. We have had instances in which the Quebec Conservatives have shown how they make the Government accede to their wishes. Not long since you heard a speech from the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet) in which he stated that last Session they drove the Government to do certain things in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway vote. On that occasion, I understand—I was not present, but I read the report—the Secretary of State also made statements to the effect that they, the Quebec Conservatives, in their Maison Bleue last Session in No. 8 had driven the Government into doing that which they wanted them to do. I call on Conservative members from Ontario—and I believe there are some honest ones among them—to stand up for the rights of their Province, and not allow the Dominion Government to take that which rightly belongs to the Provincial Government. I consider this act of the Federal Government a gross breach of faith to the municipalities and Provinces, and not conducive to the well being of the autonomy of the Provinces forming this Confederation. They should not now hesitate to pay the small sum of $12,806,000—it is nothing to hon. gentlemen opposite to pay—when even on a single corporation coming to them and asking for $30,000,000, they immediately put their hands into the Treasury and hand in the money. They should not, therefore, I repeat, hesitate to pay the small sum of $12,806,000 to the Provincial Government and those municipalities who form part of the Province of Ontario.

Mr. McCALLUM. My hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Cook) in discussing this question said that it was not a political one, but I know very well that when this question of railway aid came up in another place, in the Province of Ontario, it was a very strong political question; and as a member coming from the Province of Ontario I do not like the threat which has been thrown across the floor of this House that if we do not help the Province of Ontario in this matter we shall not come back to this House. As one who has the honor of representing a constituency in Ontario, I desire to do my duty by my county and by my Province, but at the same time I wish to do my duty by the whole Dominion. There are over 100 municipalities in the Province of Ontario, and out of this number there are 162 which have granted aid to railways, and these hon. gentlemen come here and they wish to tax the balance of the people of Ontario to enrich them—to enrich the municipalities who gave the aid to the railways and thereby improved their property. As a representative from the Province of Ontario I strongly object to that. It is stated that we should re-imburse the Province because certain grants have been made on account of railways in the Province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman forgets to look at the advantage which the Province of Ontario has gained by the construction of the Pacific Railway through large portions of that Province—the Canada Central, the line from Gravenhurst to Callander. Will they say that these roads have not been of great benefit to the Province of Ontario? They say they do not want to make this a political question, but it certainly looks very much as if they did; but at any rate I repeat that when I held a seat in another place in the Province of Ontario it was made a political question, and a very extravagant political question. I know that in that Legislature every man who supported the Government of that day, if he had a railway to build, could obtain the help of that Government, and the Province of Ontario was so much embarrassed that if they had not the money in the treasury they mortgaged the Province to the extent of hundreds of thousands of dollars a year for twenty years, making two millions of dollars for that purpose, and to-day the Province of Ontario is borrowing money, or it did last year, because of these grants to railways. I will not be allowed to refer to a previous debate, but I may have something more to say when this question comes up again. I may have something to say about the city of St. Thomas, which wishes to fasten on this House the amount which was given by the people of that city and the county of Elgin in aid of the Canada Southern Railway to provide them with railway accommodation. I would ask them if they are any worse off now than they were before? They say that that road was made part of the Pacific Railway, but I would point out that that very fact makes the road of far more service than it was before, and they would be willing to pay double the bonus they have paid rather than the road should not be part of the Canadian Pacific Railway system.

Mr. MILLS. There are some features of this question which the hon. gentleman has left out of consideration altogether. The various railway corporations created by the Local Legislature were under the control of that Legislature and the municipalities created by that Local Legislature had their interests protected by the Local Legislature. Now the hon. gentleman was one of the persons who voted to declare these various roads for the general advantage of Canada. They were taken from under the control of the Local Legislature and placed under the control of the Parliament of Canada. The interests which the Local Legislature had at their creation has been taken away, and it has no longer the power to protect provincial interests as it had before. Here we have representatives from the Province of Quebec, the Maritime Provinces, Manitoba and British Columbia, who are wholly beyond the control of the people and the Legislature of the Province of Ontario. The hon. gentleman has changed the right of property. He has taken what was a valuable interest that the Province of Ontario had.

Mr. McCALLUM. Not at all.

Mr. MILLS. I say he has, I say the Local Legislature has no longer the power to control these corporations which they created; they have no longer the special power of protecting the interests of their Province. The hon. gentleman voted to take away those roads from the control of the Local Legislature and place them under the control of the Parliament of Canada, and he is bound to compensate the Province for the interest he has destroyed. Why, Sir, it is not many Sessions since the First Minister charged—

Mr. McCALLUM. The hon. gentleman speaks of property being destroyed. I would ask him where is the destruction?

Mr. MILLS. The Local Legislature thought they had a public interest in these roads, or these grants would not have been made. They have aided the institutions they created, which were under their control, which were governed by provincial policy, and the hon. gentleman has taken those roads away from their control and placed them under the control of another body. What is the difference between doing this and the cession of territory? If the hon. gentleman, if he had such a power, were to take a portion of the Province of Ontario and hand it over to the United States, would not the Province demand some compensation? Yet he has ceded or taken violent possession of provincial property—~~for~~ all property is the creation of law, the creature of some legislative body or other—he has taken this property away which owes its existence to the Legislature of Ontario, and placed it under the control of the Government of the Dominion. The Legislature is no longer capable of protecting those interests for which it paid; it has been deprived of them without compensation.

Mr. McCALLUM. Why the hon. gentleman does the very thing he accuses this Government of doing. By the Act of 1874, passed by the Mackenzie Administration, when the hon. gentleman for East York was Prime Minister, it was declared that the Canada Southern Railway, one of the very roads which has been brought up in this House, was for the general advantage of Canada, and now the hon. member for Elgin the other day claimed that this was done by the act of this Government.

Mr. MACKENZIE. My hon. friend will remember that the Canada Southern was placed in that position on account of its crossing the two boundaries; that was the sole reason. The hon. gentleman will look in vain for any statute passed during my administration of the kind which has recently been passed in this House.

Mr. O'BRIEN. As this question will come up again it is hardly worth while to discuss it at any length at this moment. I would simply remark in reply to the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Cook) that the great injury really done to the county of Simcoe by the amalgamation of the Hamilton and North-Western Railway with the Northern Railway, in the road which is now called the Northern and North-Western, was a result which, if the Legislature of Ontario had chosen to interfere, they might have prevented, if any legislative power could have prevented it. It is absurd to charge that upon the Dominion Government, for the thing was done before this legislation at all, and it might have been prevented by the Provincial Legislature, and not by any possibility by the Dominion Government.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Could not they have done it?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I say that it was under the control of the Legislature of Ontario, which might undoubtedly have passed an Act as effectually as this Parliament, or any other Government, with reference to railways which were wholly under its control. If anybody had the right to interfere to prevent the injury it would be the Legislature of the Province of Ontario, and not the Dominion Government. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) will have to argue for a very long time before he will convince the people of Ontario that they have been really, in any degree or any respect, injured by the legislation which took place in this House to which he refers. I know that the county of Simcoe has been very largely benefited by the fact that the Northern Railway has become virtually a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway; because it is now part of a great through line by which the whole country will be supplied with better railway service in every respect. Therefore, I think that the mere theoretical value which is attached to this matter by hon. gentlemen who are raising this sectional cry is one which the people at large will not pay the slightest attention to. The County Councils, who have been stirred up for sectional and political purposes, by hon. gentlemen opposite and by their friends in Ontario, when they come to reflect seriously on the question, will see that they have been brought down here on a fool's errand, to ask things which no Government would grant them, and which I think they have no equitable right to ask. I say that, because the county of Simcoe is deeply interested in this question; but the hon. member should remember that the principal interest which the county of Simcoe has in this matter arose long years ago—even before Confederation. To bring up matters of this kind, and to seek to make the whole Dominion answerable, is to ask that which the country will never assent to. However, as this matter is to come up again, it is not necessary to discuss it now, more than to say that hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have no standing except on sectional issues, and so long as they cannot rise above sectional issues—

An hon. MEMBER. Sectional issues?

Mr. O'BRIEN. Yes, it is a sectional issue, because it is an endeavor to raise a prejudice in the Province of Ontario against the Province of Quebec—so long as they continue to pursue a sectional policy, so long will they remain as they are—a helpless, hopeless minority.

Mr. COOK. Is the hon. gentleman aware that the memorial was passed by the unanimous vote of the County Council of the county of Simcoe?

Mr. O'BRIEN. What difference does that make?

Mr. COOK. And will he say that all these men were fools who came here, or that they came on a fool's errand?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I did not say they were fools. I say that they were sent here on a fool's errand.

Mr. MULLOCK. I rise to correct a remark that fell from the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). He stated that the amalgamation of the Hamilton and North-Western and the Northern Railways could have been prevented by the Legislature of Ontario, and that therefore one might properly argue that the Legislature of Ontario is responsible for any evil consequences that flow from that amalgamation. The amalgamation in question was consummated under the provisions of the Consolidated Railway Act of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. FLEMING. The county which I have the honor to represent is largely interested in the subject of this memorial. The council of that county have also adopted a memorial and forwarded it to the proper authorities somewhat similar in terms to the one forwarded from the county of Simcoe. The county of Peel bonused the Credit Valley Railway to the amount of $70,000, the town of Brampton to the amount of $20,000, and the village of Streetsville to the amount of $20,000; that small county and these municipalities together giving $110,000 to that railway. The township of Albion gave $38,000 and the township of Caledon $45,000 to the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway. Portions of Albion, Caledon and Chingacousy gave $30,000 to the Hamilton and North-Western Railway. The total sum granted by way of bonus by that county was $223,000. Now, all these railways have by the Act of this Parliament been declared to be for the general interest of Canada, and have passed out of the control of the Local Legislature. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that the railways are there—that they have not destroyed the property or taken away any of the rights of the people; but they have taken from the people the rights of the Statute under which these railway bonuses were granted. The Legislature of Ontario in its Railway Aid Act provided:

“The Lieut.-Governor in Council may require any railway company so aided to enter into an agreement or agreements with any other railway company or companies containing such terms and details as the Lieut.-Governor in Council may approve of, in order to secure running powers or rights of user to such company or companies over the line or portion of line of railway of the company aided under this Act, or under former Acts, in the discretion of the Lieut.-Governor in Council, for the haulage thereover of the cars and traffic of such other company or companies upon such terms as, in default of agreement between the respective companies, may be settled by the Lieut.-Governor in Council.”

The powers of the Local Government under that section have been taken away, and these powers are now assumed by the Governor-in-Council of Canada. The Governor-in-Council of Canada is not amenable to the people of Ontario; he does not answer directly to the people of Ontario. This Government answers to the people of Canada, and the municipalities that have aided the railways have by their memorials and their deputations urged upon the Government the necessity of placing these municipalities in the position they were in before—either giving back the control of the railways, or giving back the money that the municipalities have advanced for the purpose of securing the construction of these railways. The Government of Ontario, under the conditions which I have read, granted aid to these railways. It not only granted them direct aid, but as the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) says, it mortgaged the country for 20 years at the rate of $100,000 a year to aid these railways, and the aid is being paid by the Province of Ontario to the very railways which are now taken out of its control. What right has this Government to take away the control of these railways from the Provincial Government which is still paying them its aid? The hon. member for Monck seems to think that the people of Ontario have no rights at all in this matter. He and the hon. gentlemen who agree with him, seem to think that the giving over to the people of Canada of the control of these railways and of this money which has been advanced by the Province and the municipalities to them, is in the interest of the people of Ontario. The people of Ontario fail to see it; the county councils of Ontario fail to see it; and although the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) says that the county councils were stimulated by the advice of persons hostile to this Government to make their claim to reimbursement, it is not possible to conceive that any intelligent man, knowing the intelligence of the members of the county councils of the Province of Ontario, will say for a moment that these men came down here not knowing what they were doing. And the hon. leader of the Government recognised their intelligence, for he told the delegation that they could not expect the aid they sought. He told the delegation also, I believe, from the report of the interview in the Mail newspaper, that rather than put the municipalities in a false position he would advise the House to repeal the Act of 1883, and give back to the control of the Provincial Governments these railways and refuse to charter any local railways in future. I do not think he has put that last resolve into force, because I observe several local railway Bills have been passed by this House. Had the hon. gentleman repealed the Act of 1883 and given back to the Provinces the control of their railways and refused to aid local railways, he would have adopted the principle that was the correct principle from the first. He should never have interfered with the local railways at all. The moment this paternal Government assumed control over the affairs of the municipalities and the provinces, that moment it departed from its true position and sapped the foundations of

Mr. FLEMING.

Confederation. The true basis of Confederation, as I understand it, is that the Provinces are to have complete control over purely local affairs, and so long as the Provincial Governments are allowed to exercise full control within their own sphere the foundations of Confederation will remain secure. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) says that this motion is an endeavor to set the Province of Ontario against the Province of Quebec. It is nothing of the kind. The hon. gentlemen from Quebec who are supporters of the Government have my entire sympathy and admiration, because they stand up true to the interests of their Province, and neither in this House or out of it have I ever endeavored to cast any stigma on the efforts of members from the Province of Quebec to obtain what they think to be their just rights under Confederation. I am not surprised to see some hon. members from Ontario becoming restive under a motion of this kind. I am not surprised to hear some hon. gentlemen from Ontario, supporters of the Government, say that they have no interest in the matter at all, nor am I surprised that an hon. member should say as the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) has just said, that although he would stand up for the rights of his county and the rights of the Provinces, yet the rights of the Dominion are to be taken care of. The rights of the Dominion are to be served by a conservation of the rights of the Provinces, and so long as the rights of the Provinces are observed the interests of the Dominion will be satisfied. Confederation came into effect in 1867 upon a purely financial basis. There were fixed financial arrangements among the different Provinces of the Dominion, and this Parliament has no right, without the consent of the different Provinces, to alter that contract. This is nothing more than a side wind; it is nothing more than by a side wind attempting to make an alteration in the financial terms of Confederation itself. But we are told the Province of Ontario has no right to ask that these moneys be returned; and we are told the Province of Quebec has this right, because the railway in respect of which aid was granted last Session is one of Dominion interest, that it has become a part of the great Canadian Pacific Railway, part of the all-rail route from ocean to ocean. To show the position of affairs I would state that the Canadian Pacific Railway control the North Shore Railway as far as Montreal, but beyond Montreal the Canadian Pacific Railway have no lines running over the North Shore at all. The railway from Montreal to Quebec, to which $6,000 a mile was granted is not a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway at all. Now the Credit Valley Railway is a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway; the Credit Valley Railway and the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway will always be a portion of the main line; for notwithstanding the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway on the north shore of Lake Superior, a large part of the traffic of the Canadian Pacific Railway will pass by means of water communication from Port Arthur to Owen Sound or over the Credit Valley Railway. There is no doubt that during a large period of the year this railway will continue to be the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway for all its traffic, notwithstanding the construction of the line is said to be for the benefit of Ontario. Hon. gentleman say $30,000,000 have been spent in Ontario for the benefit of Ontario in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. But the Canadian Pacific Railway is an undertaking for purely national purposes; it is not for local purposes or for local benefit. The Canadian Pacific Railway is a purely national undertaking, and as a national undertaking the Government of Canada undertook to build it from Callander to the Pacific Ocean. As an advantage to the Province of Quebec, for the purpose of connecting the Province of Quebec with the Canadian Pacific Railway, the railway was constructed from Renfrew to Callander. That was for the purpose of connecting the Quebec system of railways with the Canadian Pacific Railway in the interests of the people of the Province of Quebec. As an offset to that, it was agreed by the Minister of Railways that the people of Ontario had the right to have communication by means of Government aid with the Canadian Pacific Railway between Callander and Gravenhurst, and the bonus given by this Parliament for the construction of a railway from Gravenhurst to Callander is an offset for the aid given to the Province of Quebec for the construction of the railway east of Callander; and it is no answer to the demands of the Ontario Government and the Ontario municipalities to say that this undertaking ran through a large portion of their territory. If it is an answer we are entitled to consideration for the construction of the Intercolonial Railway which was largely built with the money of the people of Ontario and which runs largely through the Province of Quebec and the Eastern Provinces. The hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) says the Government of Ontario had to borrow money last year for the purpose of giving the aid to railways voted by that Legislature. If the hon. gentleman be true to the interests of his Province he will see that the Ontario Government is reimbursed to a certain extent for its outlay. What is the condition of the Province of Quebec? They had sold their railway, their finances were in a condition that demanded some assistance from the Government, it was necessary in order to the carrying out of the Government of Quebec that in some way further aid should be granted to them, and in that view this Parliament did grant further aid. Now, if that is the position in Ontario, too, the hon. member for Monck will be recreant to his duty, as a true patriot, as one thoroughly interested in Ontario, if he does not urge upon the Government to relieve that Province from the necessity of borrowing money to bonus these railways. But the right hon. gentleman the leader of the Government, I understand, told a delegation from the counties of Ontario that these railways were taken over simply for the purpose of protecting life and property; that the words "in the general interest of Canada" were merely a phrase, and it was simply for the purpose of protecting life and property at crossings that this Government assumed the control. Why, if that were the purpose, then the Act taking over the control is ultra vires, because it is not in the province of this Parliament to take any work over simply for the purpose of protecting life and property. The declaration that a work is for the general interest of Canada must be a substantial declaration and not a phrase, otherwise the hon. gentleman has been assuming control of these railways without the right, without having the pretence of a right, without even the pretence of declaring that they are for the general advantage of Canada. If these words, as they are used in that Act, are only a phrase, then that phrase has been adopted for the very purpose of depriving the Province of Ontario of the control of the railways she has so largely aided. The Province of Ontario has never knocked at the door of this Parliament for aid. The Province of Ontario has never asked that the terms of Confederation either in letter or in spirit should be altered. The people of that province have been able out of the funds that belong to themselves to develop the Province to a very large extent, they have been enabled to spend large sums of money for the purpose of opening up the new country, granting aid to railways, establishing local works of interest to the Province, and they have never asked that in any way the financial terms of the Confederation should be altered. They have resisted the alteration of those terms. The municipalities of the Province of Ontario have not asked aid from this Parliament, the municipalities of the Province of Ontario, by their delegations and by their memorials which are now before Parliament, simply ask that, if the funds of the Dominion, if the moneys to which they contribute the largest proportion, are to be expended in local works and local railways, and if municipalities and provinces are to be reimbursed for the construction of local railways, that general principle being adopted, they too shall be recognised and a portion of the money contributed by them shall be refunded to them, because they have constructed their own local works. If this Government had taken the position in 1867 that they are taking now of interfering with local works, the provinces would not have granted their money to these local works, but would have reserved it for other purposes. But the Province of Ontario having so largely expended its money in this way, the municipalities of that Province having so nobly voted money for these local railways, they now find that after having developed their country, after having spread over their Province a network of railways such as no other portion of the world can boast of, they are to be taxed in order that other local railways in the Dominion may be aided. That is why the municipalities are before the Government to-day, and, if no other result flows from the deputation, I hope the result indicated by the First Minister will come about—that the Act of 1883 will be repealed, and the control of these railways given back to the Provincial Government, which is amenable and answerable to the Province whose money has so largely gone into the construction of them.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The particular motion upon which this debate has arisen illustrates to my mind how utterly without warrant have been the general statements made from the Opposition benches and promoted by hon. gentlemen of the Opposition in the country in relation to this question. The complaint made by the hon. member who introduced this motion was that, in the county of Simcoe, great injustice had been done because that county and the municipalities in that county had given bonuses to the Hamilton and North-Western Railway, and that that railway, thus constructed and thus aided in order that it might become an opposition line to the Northern Railway, had been absorbed by the Northern Railway Company immediately after its construction, and so the people lost the advantage which they had expected to gain. There is no doubt that the hon. gentleman has correctly stated the case. There is no doubt that the Hamilton and North-Western Railway Company was aided by the municipalities on the distinct understanding that it was to be an opposition road to the Northern Railway; that, when the gentlemen went out in the interest of that railway from Hamilton, principally, if I do not mistake, friends of the hon. gentlemen opposite, such men as Mr. John Stuart and Mr. John Proctor, of Hamilton, they made the most distinct promises that this was to be an opposition railway, and upon that ground they got the assistance of those municipalities. There were what purported to be bonds between the municipalities and the Hamilton and North-Western Railway Company which it was supposed would ensure the opposition of that railway company to the Northern for all time; but the extraordinary thing is that it was found, before the railway was practically opened—locomotives were running over it, but it was before it was practically open for traffic—an arrangement was made by which the late Mr. Cumberland, then the manager of the Northern Railway, became the manager of the North-Western as well, and the two railways practically became one. That was long before there was any question of declaring in this Parliament that the Hamilton and North-Western Railway was a road for the general benefit of Canada; but the curious point is that this was done under a clause in the Act incorporating the company passed by the Provincial Legislature which gave to the company the power to do the very thing which they subsequently did. If anyone, therefore, was responsible for the power which existed for the amalgamation of these two companies and under which these two companies became amalgamated, it was the Provincial Legislature of Ontario which failed to protect in any way whatever the municipalities which had granted large and liberal bonuses for the construction of this railway. All the injury that resulted to the municipalities in consequence of that amalgamation had resulted to them long before there was any question whatever of the Act passed by this Parliament about which so much is now made. That is not the only case in which this occurred. I notice, for instance, that, in the petitions presented to the First Minister by that deputation which was here the other day—a very large and influential deputation, a thoroughly representative deputation of the different parts of the Province of Ontario—one of the counties that asked for assistance on the ground that their road had ceased to be a purely local road in consequence of the Act of this Parliament, was the county of Bruce. It happens that I personally know as much about the railway history of the county of Bruce as perhaps any other gentleman in the country. I had a great deal to do with getting the bonuses for the Wellington, Grey and Bruce Railway Company, for which a demand for return of bonuses was made, and the remarkable thing is this, that so far from that being a local road, the special ground upon which the company made their appeal to the people of the county was, that it was not a local road but that it was going to be leased by the Great Western Railway of Canada and would become one of the great thoroughfares of the country, and that in direct opposition to our opponents from the city of Toronto who were in favor of the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway Company, and who insisted that their railway, being a narrow gauge railway, must be, in the very nature of things, a local railway, and therefore of greater advantage to the locality. We beat them, Sir. Nowhere in the country where the two railways came into competition at all, did the Toronto, Grey and Bruce succeed in getting bonuses; but on the contrary the Wellington, Grey and Bruce obtained its bonuses mainly upon the ground that it was not to be a purely local railway, but that, falling into the hands of the Great Western Company, it would be a public railway and practically for the advantage of Canada, inasmuch as it would form part of one of the great thoroughfares of the country. Now because an Act has been passed here declaring all railways which are through lines to be for the advantage of Canada, they ask that the bonuses may be returned to them. Why, Sir, the very ground upon which they gave the bonuses in the first instance was the ground which I have stated. Then, Mr. Speaker, take the whole Midland system, the Toronto and Nipissing Railway, the Toronto and Port Perry Railway, the Victoria Railway, those railways which have since fallen into the Grand Trunk Railway; after having been in the first instance started as local railways, built as local railways, built under the idea that they were to furnish a competition with existing lines of railways, we find that they were all amalgamated or absorbed by the Grand Trunk Railway, under the powers of two Acts of Parliament, one passed by the Local Legislature, which ignored altogether the interests of the municipalities in connection with the matter, and practically handed over the whole of them to the Grand Trunk Railway, and the other by an Act passed in 1878, which gave to the Grand Trunk Railway great powers of absorption and amalgamation of any other railway that might wish to be united with it. Now, Sir, that was what was done in connection with that system of local railways. No one that I ever heard of contended that the municipalities were going to be injured so far as railway facilities were concerned, although they were, I believe, seriously injured in connection with the Midland system, seriously injured by the Local Legislature at Toronto under Mr. Mowat's control, which handed over that system of railways to the Dominion. Now, Sir, a great deal has been said by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, in relation to the Province of Quebec having obtained a large remission of moneys which they had paid for the building of these railways; and the compliment has been paid to the members from that Province upon the ground that whenever they want anything for their Province they unite and succeed in getting it. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, one of the gentlemen of the deputation who addressed the First Minister the other day in the Railway Committee room, made a statement there showing the lack of correct information that prevails in the country in regard to this matter, saying that the municipalities in the Province of Quebec had obtained a return of the moneys which they had voted as aid to their railways. As a matter of fact they got nothing of the kind. The city of Montreal voted $1,000,000, the city of Quebec voted $1,000,000, and the city of Three Rivers voted $200,000 to railways which were local railways at the time they gave the money. One was the North Shore Railway and the other the Northern Colonisation Railway, both chartered by the Province of Quebec as provincial railways. Afterwards, when it was felt that these roads were to be part of a great through system, the companies came of their own motion to this House and got amendments to their charters, and in order to get these amendments they had the railways declared to be for the benefit of Canada, and from that time they came within the jurisdiction of the laws passed by the Parliament of Canada. Did the people of Montreal, or of Quebec, or of Three Rivers, or of the county of Ottawa, or of St. Jerome and St. Therèse, or of any other municipality that voted bonuses—did any of them ever come to the Government saying: You have taken our railway away, you have declared it to be for the advantage of Canada, although it was a local railway when it was assisted by us, and now we want our money back? Not at all, Sir. The city of Montreal gave $700,000 of the million; they were relieved from paying $300,000, not because of any action of this Parliament, but because the line from Montreal to Quebec was built by a northern route instead of a river route. The city of Quebec, by arrangement with the company, also were relieved of part of their bonus, paying only $700,000 or $800,000; the city of Three Rivers paid $100,000 instead of $200,000; but after these municipalities had paid their money no one ever dreamed that because these railways had been declared to be for the benefit of Canada they were therefore entitled to get their money back; although when they voted and gave their money these railways were local railways, chartered by the Legislature of the Province of Quebec. Even the Province of Quebec has not got back the money which it spent upon these roads. The great railway from Quebec to Ottawa cost the Provincial Government somewhere about $14,000,000 or $15,000,000. What they got back was this: When the whole policy with relation to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was changed; when that policy which originally contemplated that the Canadian Pacific Railway should start from Callander and go westward as a great public work; other railways desiring to secure the advantage of traffic being required to meet the Canadian Pacific Railway at Callander, by extending the railway to that point by their own resources, aided by such provincial and municipal assistance as they could get—when that policy was changed, and when the Government of which the hon. member for East York was leader, granted $12,000 a mile for the line from Renfrew to Callander, he upset the whole arrangement made at that time. Then, Sir, when this Government, two years ago, gave $12,000 a mile for the railway from Gravenhurst to Callander, in order to bring the traffic of the Pacific Railway down to Toronto, they altered the conditions altogether. So that what was asked for in the Province of Quebec, and what alone was given to the Province of Quebec, was this. They said: We have, in good faith, under a policy which contemplated that there should be no assistance from the public Treasury to any railways reaching the Pacific Railway at Callander, expended our money in the construction of this railway, and we are entitled to the same treatment to the extent at least of $12,000 a mile that the other parts of the country have obtained; and they got $12,000 a mile—not what they had spent on the railway; because, as it stands to-day, they have actually given more money to these local railways which have become part of the Canadian Pacific Railway than the Province of Ontario has given to their local railways. That fact is concealed when this question is discussed in the country. The people are told that the Province of Quebec, because the members from the Province of Quebec have united upon the subject and made a formal demand upon the Government in relation to it, have got back from this Government the money they have spent on these railways. Sir, they got nothing of the kind; they got back simply an equivalent for the amounts granted to railways which finally became part of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and which were constructed outside the original charter of that railway, to enable the lines to go down to Renfrew on the one side and down to Gravenhurst on the other. Then the hon. gentleman says that great injury has resulted, that a right has been taken away from the municipalities by the Act which declared these railways to be for the advantage of Canada. In what way has any property been taken? What did these municipalities give their money for? To get a railway. Now let me illustrate by the Toronto, Grey and Bruce, which the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Fleming) has just referred to. That railway, as he knows, was a local railway; when it was constructed it was a narrow gauge railway; and as he knows, when it was a narrow gauge railway, such as the municipalities had contributed to, it was so wretched a road that, instead of being an advantage to the country through which it passed, it was almost—if one may say that of any railway at all—a disadvantage, with but little rolling stock, a bad roadway, and the whole system practically in a condition which indicated ruin and decay. I remember myself when a deputation came from Owen Sound to the city of Montreal for the purpose of getting the Grand Trunk Railway, if possible, to take possession of the Toronto, Grey and Bruce, so as to put it in a condition that would make it of value to the country through which it passed. Will that hon. gentleman pretend to tell me that as regards the Toronto, Grey and Bruce the country served by that railway is not infinitely better off under the railway as it exists at present, with a magnificent service upon that road, with the number of trains passing over it, with the accommodation afforded to the people along the line, than it was when the road was a narrow gauge local railway, to which, in the first instance, in their anxiety to get a railway at all, the people had consented to contribute. They have to-day a railway which they never dreamed of getting when that money was given. It may be, and I am told it is, with respect to the town of Orangeville, that the effect of this law, in the opinion of some lawyer—at least that is the representation made by the municipal council of that town—is to destroy some agreement in regard to station accommodation between the Credit Valley and the Toronto, Grey and Bruce in that town. All I can say is this: If any such interpretation can possibly be placed on that Act it is desirable there should be an amending Act, for the purpose of declaring that nothing in this Act should interfere in any way with arrangements entered into between municipalities and railway companies. But I cannot see how any such result can follow; and we know, in the case of the Hamilton and North-Western—because we have it from the lips of the hon. gentleman who brought up this motion—that the agreements which they made of a similar kind, those particular bonds which they entered into, were found to be so loosely drawn when the time came, that, to use the hon. gentleman's own expressive words, you might drive a coach-and-four through them, and so practically they were of no value whatever. To say that injury is done is to say that which—I cannot say hon. gentlemen do not believe it, because they state they do, and by courtesy we assume they believe it; but I am quite certain that people outside, who seriously consider this matter, cannot for a single moment believe. What has been done by this Act? Simply this: that one condition with respect to contracts should obtain on the railway. For instance, a man puts goods on a railway at Orangerville, on the Toronto, Grey and Bruce or the Credit Valley, to be sent to Montreal; the Act provides that the whole line shall be under the same jurisdiction, under the same laws and open to the same arrangements. In cases where a railway crosses another railway—and it is only in such cases that these railways have been declared to be for the advantage of Canada, inasmuch as the provincial law cannot possibly control the Dominion lines, inasmuch as by the constitution it is provided that the Dominion may, under certain conditions, if the Government think fit, control provincial lines, we therefore placed them under the same jurisdiction in regard to matters connected with crossings, high or low level crossings, so that they may be placed under one jurisdiction and dealt with by one competent authority. That is all there is in the Act—neither more nor less than simply a provision that those railways which, in their practical operation, are parts of great through lines, whether they are united by terms of amalgamation or otherwise, shall be under one common law, and that a man living near any part of them shall know that the law which regulates the railway at different parts of it is precisely the same. We have made two or three amendments to the Consolidated Railway Act—one a rather remarkable one, that in relation to line fencing. The amendment was brought up by the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White) because under an old judgment of the court it was found that where a railway passed through a farm and did damage to some cattle, there being no fences, the court held that the farmer should have given notice to the railway company in order to get the benefit of a right of action against the company. We passed an amendment to declare that the railway company is bound to keep up the fences, and that no such notice is required to be given by a farmer. We have simply applied that law to provincial as well as Dominion lines. That is one of the effects of the adoption of this Act. In the Consolidated Railway Act, which we are improving from year to year, in the direction of affording better protection to life and property and for the advantage of the people served by such railways, improvements which have been accepted by Ministers at the suggestion of independent members, with a view to rendering the Act as perfect as possible, we have simply declared that those particular provisions shall apply to local railways, or what hitherto have been local railways, as well as to Dominion railways.

Mr. FLEMING. The Ontario Act contains such provisions.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The Ontario Act may or may not contain such provisions—and we have no control over provincial legislation—and we had therefore no uniform law controlling these railways. I venture to say there is not a farmer living upon the line of one of those railways which has been declared to be for the advantage of Canada, on one of those lateral roads taken possession of by a great through trunk line, and worked by it, and in that way affording far greater accommodation and advantage to those localities than they were having under an independent and necessarily more impoverished local railway company, who will not realise, when the matter is fairly discussed, that the Act declaring those railways to be for the advantage of Canada has not destroyed any property in them, has not in the slightest degree interfered with what the municipalities wanted when they gave bonuses to the railway; but that the Government have secured for them a very much better railway, a much more thorough and efficiently equipped railway, and a better worked and operated railway than they could possibly have had so long as the lines were merely local works. The particular case which has given rise to this debate, and which occurred before there was any clause placed in our Consolidated Railway Act declaring those local railways to be for the advantage of Canada, proves to us how utterly, I was going to say dishonest, but how utterly unworthy is the whole agitation attempted to be raised in Ontario with a view, if possible, of giving hon. gentlemen opposite, when they are bankrupt in everything else, some local cry to enable them to get hold of the sympathies of the people, which they have so utterly lost.

Mr. CASEY. We have evidently made a mistake as regards some of our ideas with respect to coming Cabinet changes. We have had the idea that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat was the "man on deck," if I may use a somewhat slang phrase, for the position of Minister of Finance when the present occupant of that position shall be promoted to a higher sphere. But now it seems that the hon. member for Cardwell must be the coming Minister of Railways. The hon. gentleman who is Acting Minister of Railways has been sitting there evidently wearied with the discussion, with his head on his hand, as if the whole matter did not concern him but belonged to some other Department, or as if it was a little squabble between Ontario members—at all event, as if it was a matter of no interest to the hon. gentleman, while the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), has made the official defence of the Government, although hon. members had, of course, expected to have heard from the Acting Minister of Railways on the question under discussion.

Mr. POPE. You will, if you give me a chance.

Mr. CASEY. I have been sitting here in my seat for two hours waiting for the hon. gentleman to speak. Half a dozen other members have spoken, but the Acting Minister of Railways seemed to be asleep, and I therefore felt compelled to do something to awaken him. I, therefore, call on him to awake, arise, speak on this subject, and not leave the whole matter to be explained by the prospective Minister of Railways. The prospective Minister of Railways—there are three or four Ministers for that department—goes off on the old tack, that the only ground on which we asked to have these bonuses recouped was the grasping action of the Dominion in taking control of the local roads. Well, Sir, it must be repeated, because we have got a little away from it to-day, that although that is a ground for asking such a recompense, it is not the only, it is not the first ground for asking such aid. The special ground for asking this repayment is, that the Government have instituted a general policy of railway aid through the Dominion, not only to through lines but to local lines; and it will be admitted by all to be a just and fair principle that when they take taxes from one part of the country to build roads in other parts of the country, some consideration should be given to the people of those localities who have put their hands in their pockets and built their own local roads. The act of injustice to which I have referred, the taking of those roads under the control of the Dominion Government, an act which it has been hinted is ultra vires and may be found to be so, like many of the Acts of this Government, aggravates the injustice and intensifies the claim; but if that Act had not been passed, still less, if it were now repealed, would it destroy the claim held by the municipalities which have assisted these roads. Now, Sir, the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) has recited to us a short history of a railway campaign in which he took part on behalf of the Wellington, Grey and Bruce. I believe that road was bonused by parts of some townships forming part of his present constituency. I believe that parts of Chingacousy and Caledon and Albion together gave $30,000 to the Wellington, Grey and Bruce, at the instance of the hon. gentleman and the others who went from the city of Hamilton to carry on the campaign for that road, and to-day he tells his constituents, those who were urged by himself and by others to grant a bonus to that road, that they have no right to be reimbursed.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The hon. gentleman is mistaken. No township in my county gave a bonus to the Wellington, Grey and Bruce.

Mr. CASEY. I said parts of three townships grouped together did.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). No; they did not.

Mr. CASEY. I was informed so, but if not it was to the Toronto, Grey and Bruce. The township of Caledon gave $45,000; Albion, $38,000; and Chingacousy, $30,000; and I think those townships are in the hon. gentleman's constituency. Together, they gave $133,000 to the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway, and the hon. gentleman comes here and he tells the people of those townships that "he was going to say it was dishonest" to assert that they had any claim, but he says he cannot say that because he is in the House. But that is his thought; and it will go to his constituents and to the people along the line of the Wellington, Grey and Bruce, who were induced to bonus that road by his representation, that it is his opinion that it is "almost dishonest" to ask that they shall be recouped for these moneys. He says the municipalities who bonused roads in Quebec do not complain, because the control of those roads was taken by the Dominion Government. Why should they complain? Nearly every one of those roads which was thus assumed was assisted by this Government. Grants were given to the Gatineau Valley Railway, to the Lake St. John Railway, and half a dozen others, which I need not mention now. They received grants when they were taken under the control of the Dominion Government. Why should these municipalities grumble when they were getting money in consideration of the Government taking over the roads? It is we in western Ontario who have paid out our own money for building roads, and who have had the control of them taken from a Government which was directly responsible to us, and put in the hands of a Government which is responsible to all parts of the Dominion as well as to Ontario; it is we who have reason to grumble. I can assure the hon. gentleman that the complaint will not only be found in his own constituency, and along the line of road for which he assisted in getting bonuses, but that it will be widespread throughout the Province of Ontario. We have seldom seen—I think few members have often seen—a larger, more respectable or more earnest delegation than the one which met the First Minister and the first Acting Minister of Railways in the Railway Committee room the other day on this question; and the very composition of that delegation and the names of the gentlemen who were its spokesmen is sufficient to show that it was not a political demonstration. Who was the first to speak on that memorial? It was Mayor Smith, of Kingston; is he a Grit? The next was Mr. Cowan, of Galt; is he an Oppositionist? He is the man who has been exhibited through the country as the special trophy of the National Policy—the captive of its bow and spear—the man who was taken away from the Grits on account of the National Policy. Then we had Mr. Joseph Gibson, of Ingersoll, who certainly is not an Oppositionist, who has been a Conservative candidate on several occasions. I do not think anybody will pretend that this visit to Ottawa was a political act on the part of these gentlemen. They came no doubt against their will, feeling that probably this was a matter which would embarrass the Government more or less, that they would not be welcome to the Government, perhaps, but because they felt it to be their duty as reeves and deputy reeves and delegates, they came down and risked embarrassment to the Government, and risked everything to fulfil their duty to their municipalities and the people. They did their duty nobly and manfully, and what reception did they meet with? I do not know that they might have expected a great deal of taffy from the Minister of Railways, but I believe they did expect a courteous reception, a full hearing and a pleasant reply from the First Minister. But I am afraid they were disappointed in that respect. If the hon. gentleman is correctly reported in his own newspapers—I was not present myself when he made his reply—he told them very bluntly that the thing could not be taken into consideration, that there was no precedent for it, that no municipality in Quebec had been recouped for bonuses given to railway companies, and that, on the whole, the thing was to be pooh-poohed and treated with contempt. That was the impression to be derived from his remarks. In fact, one of the members of that delegation, a leading Conservative, was heard to say, in a public place, and without any pretence of speaking privately, that he had been on a large number of delegations and had been refused many a time, but that heretofore they had always “been slid out on a greased plank,” but that on this occasion the plank was in such a condition that he did not enjoy that kind of tobogganing at all. Sir, the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues will find that this is a cry which cannot be pooh-poohed. They may treat leading Conservatives who come to them with this sort of discourtesy, and give them short answers, but there are at the back of those gentlemen those who cannot be treated in that way. At the back of them are the farmers of Ontario, who, together, form a body which even the present Government, with their tremendous majority, cannot afford to pooh-pooh, to treat with contempt, or to “slide out on a rough plank.” In that case I think it would be the Government themselves who will be slid out in that way, rather than the farmers. The hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) has told us that we in St. Thomas, in particular, are a very grasping and greedy lot of people; that we in the county of Elgin, wanted the other parts of Canada to subscribe to make us rich. That does sound to me rich, coming from an hon. member who represents the neighborhood watered or drained, I do not know which I should say, by the Welland Canal. To what extent has the rest of the country subscribed for the benefit conferred on the constituency of Monck and the rest of the district through which the Welland Canal passes? Many millions have been expended on it. We are not asking to be recouped for the expenditure; but it does seem to us rich that that hon. gentleman representing that district should raise such an objection to this claim. Perhaps he will say that is a work for the general benefit of Canada. Well, that is the ground on which aid was given to it, and for that reason we do not ask to be recouped for it, although it does confer benefit on the district through which it runs. But will any one contend that the Napanee and Tamworth Railway, the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway, and Gatineau Valley Railway, are works for the general advantage of Canada in the same way as the Welland Canal? The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) also affected to pooh-pooh this whole affair. He thought that delegation had been sent down here on a fool's errand. He explained that he did not say they were fools, but were made to look foolish by the errand on which they were sent. I do not think, Sir, that that was the right language to use with regard to a body of men delegated by their county councils to come on this mission. I believe the hon. gentleman, knowing him as I do, had not the slightest intention to speak discourteously of these men; but he had the intention to speak discourteously of the errand on which they were sent, and to make the whole affair look as ridiculous as possible. Probably he will find that these gentlemen do not think the matter a ridiculous or foolish one; and any irritation they may feel in connection with it may possibly be on account of the reception they had from the authorities here when they came down. He said his own constituents were satisfied. Well, his own constituents are, to some extent, interested in the Gravenhurst and Callander Railway. They may have reason to be contented; but there are other municipalities in Canada which have given bonuses to railways, which have no Gravenhurst and Callander Railway passing through them, and which have as much right to the railway aid which is being scattered about as the constituents of the hon. member for Muskoka. I think it is hardly fair for those gentlemen whose counties happen to have received aid under this general railway policy to oppose the demand of other municipalities who have not received any such aid. I think, too, that there are in this House some Conservative members, representing constituencies through which bonused railways run, who have not yet been heard from, and who ought to be heard from before this debate closes. I believe the constituents of the hon. members for North and South Essex (Mr. Patterson and Mr. Wigle) have some interest in this matter, and will require some account from their representatives when they return home. I believe the constituents of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Smyth) will require some account from him, in regard to his action on this matter, when he goes home. I have special ground for my expectation in the latter case, because I see by the proceedings of the council of the county of Kent that it was proposed to petition the Government on this matter; but the majority, who were good Conservatives, I suppose, declared that they had perfect confidence in their member, that he would do what he could, and that they would leave the matter in his hands, without troubling him with a memorial or asking him officially to act. He will, no doubt, therefore, show them that he has done his utmost to obtain justice for the county of Kent in that respect. The other gentlemen, who will, no doubt, be heard in the debate, I need not particularise; but I think every member whose constituents have bonused railways will feel it his duty to stand up and give a deliverance on this question. Of course, we hardly expected the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) to take the Ontario view of the matter, with regard to recouping either the Government or the municipalities. But I think he ought not to have raised the sectional cry, that this was an attempt to arouse Province against Province. We have never done anything of the kind, and justice has been done to us in this respect by the French Canadian newspapers. It will be remembered that when this question was up last Session our contention was, if you give Quebec what she claims to be just you should do for Ontario as you have done for Quebec. We did not say, you are swindling Ontario for the benefit of Quebec. We said, if this be the established policy of the country, you must do justice all around. The deputation were told the other day by the two Ministers who met them that no municipalities in Ontario had ever been recouped for bonuses. Now, we have a precedent, and I am thankful to the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Fleming) for having called it to mind. One Ontario municipality at least was recouped, and at a time when the recouping was likely to have the best effect, namely, on the eve of an election. Perhaps before the next election we shall hear of more of such recouping. Perhaps it will be necessary, in order to secure the reelection of some hon. members to this House, and I throw out this hint to them, that to have bonuses recouped to them, as the bonus was granted to the municipality of Pembroke. If I wanted to make political capital I would not make this suggestion, but I hope they will carry it out, and so have justice done to Ontario.

Mr. WALLACE (York). I have listened attentively to the remarks of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), and to those of the preceding speakers on both sides of the House, and I have failed to hear of one injury which has been inflicted on any municipality or any railway by the Dominion Government declaring these lines to be for the general advantage of Canada; but I can see many benefits which have resulted from the policy of the Government in so doing. I will give one instance. In the West Riding of York, which adjoins the city of Toronto, there are four lines of railway crossing two important streets. For a long time they created great difficulty, and it was felt that a sub-way or overhead bridge should be constructed at that point. Well, we called on the Ministry for several years in the endeavor to have this matter remedied. But two of the lines, the Credit Valley and the Toronto, Grey and Bruce, were under the control of the Local Legislature, while the two others, the Grand Trunk and the Northern, were under the control of the Dominion Parliament. It was felt that one sub-way should be made to answer for the whole four lines. Until the Dominion Government assumed all these lines, and declared them to be for the general advantage of Canada, we were helpless, and the lives of people were endangered at that point; but as soon as that policy was adopted we had no difficulty. The Dominion Government at once made an order, by which the companies controlling those four lines built a sub-way, which has been found an enormous benefit to the citizens of Toronto and all who travel at that point. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Fleming) has told us what a great injury has been done to the town of Brampton, which gave $20,000 to the Credit Valley Railway, the control of which was taken away from the Local Government and handed over to the Dominion Government. In my opinion, Orangeville never made a better investment than when they gave $20,000 towards the construction of the Credit Valley Railway. They gave that $20,000 bonus in order to have a competing line; they have that competing line and a more advantageous market to-day than has any other town in that part of the country, outside of Toronto. Their $20,000 is being returned to them many times over, and that is principally due to the fact, not that they have the Credit Valley only, but that it became part of the Canadian Pacific Railway, by which means they have connections eastward and westward, and have thus facilities for shipping grain eastward to Montreal or westward to Chicago. We have been told what the Province of Quebec received bonuses, last year, and that therefore the Province of Ontario should receive bonuses also. If we received our money back, if the municipalities in Ontario were returned the bonuses they gave, what argument could be used in that case which would not apply to all the other Provinces? Why would not every municipality in every Province of the Dominion be entitled to receive back any bonus it may have granted to railways? Why even stop there? Why not return all the bonuses given by the different Local Parliaments of the Dominion? Because, if the argument is correct, that you must hand back the moneys voted by the municipalities, you must also return the moneys voted by the Legislatures. What is the amount we would have to pay back, and would it be a fair tax upon the people? I say it would be a most unjust tax upon the people. We were told the other day, and have again been told to-day, by hon. gentlemen opposite, that any member of this side who would dare to vote against this motion would not dare to go back to his constituents. I will dare to give my vote against it, I will have great pleasure in giving my vote against it; and I will have still more pleasure in going back to my constituents and justifying to them my vote. But I have not found out that hon. gentlemen opposite have had the courage to move a resolution. All that they do is to ask for the papers, correspondence and memorials, but they have not yet formulated a resolution. They are trying to make a little capital in some localities, but they will find their course to be a boomerang that will hurt most, on the rebound, the men who hurled it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to correct a statement or two made by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), with regard to the history of the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway. He said that at the time this Act was passed the Toronto, Grey and Bruce was a narrow-gauge railway, and when the Canadian Pacific Railway was leased and became, virtually, owners of that line, it was converted into a wide gauge road.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I made no such statement. I said that when the bonuses were voted by the municipalities it was a narrow gauge railway, but that it was changed before the Canadian Pacific Railway got it.

Mr. McMULLEN. Then it was a broad gauge road in full operation at the time the Canadian Pacific Railway became the owners of it. With regard to the unfortunate position in which the town of Orangeville stands, and that portion of the county which the hon. gentleman has the honor to represent, I wish to call the attention of the House to a few facts. The town of Orangeville contributed money towards the construction of the Credit Valley Railway for the purpose of securing competing roads. The Credit Valley Railway Company built their line in accordance with the terms of the agreement, one of which was that they were under no circumstances to amalgamate or enter into running powers with any other line without the consent of the corporation and of the Ontario Government. The Ontario Government was to be called on before any agreement that might be contemplated could be concluded; consequently, the Credit Valley Railway Company had not the power to enter into any running arrangements with the Ontario and Quebec Railway Company or the Canadian Pacific Railway without the consent of the Ontario Government. But by the Act of this House the Government declared the Credit Valley line to be one for the general interest of Canada. The company took advantage of the change in its position and entered into a permanent agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway, thus bringing both lines under the one control; and the result was, the people of Orangeville were deprived of the competition they anticipated when they gave a bonus towards the construction of the Credit Valley road. I was rather struck with the remarks of the hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace). He said that he did not know of any instance of injustice along the line of that road, but let any man who has any doubt with regard to the feeling of that particular section, in and around the town of Orangeville, make enquiries, and he will find that a very strong feeling of opposition exists against the continuation of matters as they now stand. It matters not what action the Government or the House may take with regard to putting these roads in the position they occupied before the Government assumed control, they cannot possibly be placed in the position in which the people would obtain all the advantages that they would be now enjoying, had the Government not interfered; because to-day the contract between the two companies is signed and sealed, the two roads are, beyond doubt, one, and I cannot see by what action the Government or this House can undo that arrangement. The people of that section have an undoubted claim for compensation. Of course it is said not a mile of road has been taken from them. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) says they have been deprived of none of the privileges they anticipated enjoying through the construction of this road; he says they gave their money for the purpose of securing railway accommodation, and they have got the railway accommodation they desired. That may be very well in a sense, but I contend that there is another side to the story. Suppose the hon. member for Cardwell arranged to build a commodious dwelling house for himself, and after it was erected another gentleman were to step in and say: I will occupy it along with you; it is plenty large enough for you and me; I will not take away a stone of the building or deprive you of any accommodation you would otherwise enjoy; I am willing you should have all the advantages you anticipated from the erection of the House, but I am going to enjoy possession with you. I rather fancy the hon. gentleman would say: If you wish to enjoy the advantages you must contribute towards the cost." I say that this Government, by their acts, have virtually declared the Toronto, Grey and Bruce to be a road for the general advantages of Canada, and the townships which bonused the road are perfectly entitled to be recouped their money; I hold that the municipalities along the route of that line have a special claim for compensation, because the line is virtually a link of the Canadian Pacific Railway. You leave Toronto, go to Owen Sound, take the steamer to Port Arthur and proceed on your journey over the Canadian Pacific Railway. It would be, therefore, impossible for the Canadian Pacific Railway, without this line, to carry on the extensive trade now carried on by them in supplies and in many other ways. The county of Dufferin granted towards the construction of the Toronto, Grey and Bruce something like $211,000. But, we find that, after giving this money and getting these roads for themselves, in the first place one railway and afterwards another, the Act of the Government places them in such a position that they are completely robbed of the advantages they anticipated from competing roads. To-day these people are paying from the town of Orangeville in excess of the amount paid from thirty miles west of that. I ask if they have not the right to complain of that state of things? I say they have, and that they have a right to some compensation from the Government and the people of this country. I hope this will not be made a party question. I do not desire to see it made a party question. I was surprised to hear it stated by an hon. gentleman opposite that it had been got up by members on this side of the House for party purposes. Nine-tenths of the men who came and represented that constituency were Conservatives. In one township, where they have an entire Conservative council, they moved in the matter themselves. They have strong views, and I am satisfied they feel sincere and think they have a right to be heard and to have some recoupment of the money they have advanced. It is very well to talk about their not being deprived of the advantages they anticipated. I know that the statement that they have not the railway accommodation taken from them appears to have considerable force, but when you pry into the matter there is not so much in it. You may say that before Confederation these buildings stood here in the Province of Ontario. The Confederacy has not taken away anything from the Province, and the people in the Maritime Provinces might say: We shall not allow you anything for these buildings; you are going to enjoy them, and we are going to enjoy them along with you. Was that the answer the Maritime Provinces gave? No; they contributed their share towards the expense connected with these buildings, and they have a perfect right to all the benefits, comforts and privileges connected with them.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) stated that he did not think those townships would undo what had been done if they had the opportunity. If he enquired carefully into the feelings of the people in the immediate vicinity of Orangeville, or of that section which he has the honor to represent, he would form a different opinion, and would come to the conclusion that they are honestly sincere in the approach they have made to the Government and are making to this House in the matter of these bonuses. I do not know that every other section of the Dominion can present as strong a case as the county of Dufferin can present. I do not know of any other place, even in the Province of Ontario, that has dropped into the same unfortunate position that that section has dropped into, in consequence of the Government declaring these roads to be for the general advantage of Canada. If those two roads had remained independent, and they had got the benefits of competition that they then enjoyed, I do not know that they would have very much to complain of, further than this, that they undoubtedly feel that, since the roads have been used so extensively in the interest of the entire Dominion, since they are now being used by the Canada Pacific as one of its main connecting lines from east to west, some reasonable justice should be done to them by the Dominion contributing to the service they are undoubtedly reaping by the construction of these roads some years ago. If they had not been built some other road would have had to be built, and these people feel very seriously the responsibilities they have undertaken in regard to this matter. There has been something said with regard to the petitions which have been presented. I might be permitted to read one clause of the petition presented to the House by the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton)—and I am sorry he is not in his place—to show the feeling of these people in regard to this matter. I do not think that any gentleman who had the privilege of talking to those men who appeared here would come to the conclusion that it was a political movement on the part of those delegates or on the part of anyone residing in the county. I am satisfied that they feel honestly and anxiously sincere in this matter and have no desire to harrass or annoy or bother the Government. They feel they have a claim and they are anxious that it should be considered. This is the paragraph of the petition:

"Your petitioner would call your attention to the changed circumstances of the above mentioned railroads, as also of the country, since the above grants were made. The roads were chartered and aided as local roads, to serve local purposes, and so long as they continued amenable to the provincial legislation, and maintained inviolate all agreements entered into with municipalities, your petitioner did not complain. But, under the changed circumstances, your petitioner feels it a great hardship, that townships, towns and villages which comprise its county should be compelled to contribute so largely to railways, of equal benefit to other municipalities which have in nowise contributed to their construction. Your petitioner would most respectfully submit that the municipalities that now form the county of Dufferin can, with every justice, ask your honorable body to assume their debenture issued in respect of the railways mentioned, and place the burden upon the Dominion, in whose interests your legislation has declared that the several lines of road exist."

I think that fully sets out the claim those people make to a refund of the money they have invested in those roads. There was something said with regard to the money that was granted to the Province of Quebec, and we were told that it was to recoup that Province for the money they had spent on lines that became a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I think that any person who heard that question discussed in this House came to the conclusion that one of the strongest arguments in favor of the refund of that money was the fact that the financial position of that Province was such that it was necessary that some relief should be extended to it. The Province of Quebec pressed their claim from that standpoint. Now, I contend that the people of the section of the county I have the honor to represent are suffering severely from the burdens they have been compelled to undertake in order to get railway accomodation. When they went into that section of the country they built gravel roads which they had to pay for out of their own municipal treasury, and these roads rendered them important service for a number of years. When the project of the construction of a broad gauge road was first presented to them, they felt that if it was as fully equipped and built as the Grand Trunk Railway or Great Western is built, they were not able to give a sufficient sum of money to build a road of that kind. In their struggling efforts they accepted, from the city of Toronto, a narrow gauge line, and they granted bonuses towards its construction. After that road had been in operation for some time, they found it did not give that connection with the wide gauge roads which was necessary, and in order to help themselves out of the difficulty they went to work, and in some cases contributed second bonuses, in order to enable the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Company, to widen their gauge and make an efficient line. After doing all that they felt, in this particular section of the country I represent, that the rates that were charged were somewhat excessive, and that they must have competition. In order to accomplish that they submitted further bonuses and granted further aid to the Credit Valley Railway, and the town I have the honor to represent got a branch of the Grand Trunk Railway. We got these roads for the purposes of securing the advantages of competition. Now the county of Dufferin is once more, unfortunately, placed, as I said before, in the position where they were before they granted a dollar towards the construction of a second road. It is very well for the Government to say that this House might give back to the Ontario Legislature the power that we took from them by the action of this House, by giving to them the right to deal with these roads. I must say I do not think it is a becoming action on the part of this House to take control of a road one year and the next year pitchfork it back again to the Ontario Legislature. I do not think it is right, after the Government have assumed the responsibility of the control of these lines, rather than meet the question fairly by compromising with the localities and making a refund, for them to say: We will give back the roads, seeing that we have got into a difficulty by the action we have taken. If we are not entitled to a refund of all the money we have invested, I think at least the Government should enter into some arrangement whereby a reasonable sum should be refunded. I think they should compromise the case, and if they are not disposed to pay back the full amount let them pay back a certain percentage of the money the municipalities have contributed towards the construction of these roads. When the Government declared that these roads were for the general advantage of Canada they surely meant that they were really so. Well, if they are really for the general advantage of Canada ought not Canada to pay for the general advantage? I think this position cannot be denied. The member for York made, some remark with regard to all the other Provinces asking a refund for the lines of railway they had built. Now I do not think that is a fair argument, under the present circumstances. The fact is that none of the other Provinces have been placed in the position in which Ontario has been placed. There is no other Province in which the Government have virtually declared all their lines to be for the general advantage of Canada but the Province of Ontario, so far as I know. If the other Provinces have lines that are declared to be for the general advantage of Canada, so far as I am concerned I do not object to justice being done to them, and to their being refunded the money that they spent on roads that are declared to be for the general advantage of Canada. I believe, Sir, if the First Minister would make it his duty to go through that section of the country, and if he saw the hardships and the struggles of these people to get along in life, I believe he would have some sympathy with them. I believe, if he had been disposed to take into consideration the question that these people have pressed upon him, he would consider it his duty to propose a scheme whereby some reasonable relief should be granted to them. Now, I was present at the time that the railway deputation met the First Minister and the Minister of Railways; I was amongst that deputation. I must say that I do not think any discourtesy was shown to them by the First Minister. I heard some remark of that kind, but I cannot agree with it. I must say that the First Minister properly explained to the deputation that the House was in Session and their time was very limited, and if his remarks were short he explained why they were short. I do not think that he intended to offer any insult; I am quite sure he did not. But I believe if more time had been given in which to talk this whole question over, if the thing had been fully gone into and he had come to realise fully the extent of the feeling that these people have on this question, I believe he would consider, and that the House would consider, that no section of country in this Dominion can present a stronger claim, a claim backed by so many strong and reasonable arguments, as the section of country from which I come. Now, we all admit that the Intercolonial Railway was built at the expense of this entire Dominion. It has, undoubtedly, been of great advantage to these Provinces through which it runs. But they did not contribute anything in the way of municipal aid; they were not asked, as Provinces, to contribute specially to the construction of that road. It would hardly be fair to say to them that we should charge them with the entire cost involved in that line, because it was built through that part of the country, when it is really used for Dominion purposes. On the same ground I contend that the roads to which I have referred are in the interest of the entire Dominion. Suppose the Government should decide to have the Short Line Railway carried through the State of Maine, would it be right and proper for them to go to the State of Maine and ask it to contribute towards the construction of the road. That State would not consider such an application. It is obviously for the accommodation of the whole Dominion, and for the Canadian Pacific Railway, that these lines have been declared to be for the general advantage of Canada. It has been argued that Parliament should not aid the municipalities, because the Dominion is spending a very large amount of money, in aiding the Canadian Pacific Railway to build a line along the north shore of Lake Superior. Of course, the building of that road may possibly be of some advantage to the immediate section through which it runs, but it will not be of any direct advantage to the people for whom I am speaking. It is on the other side of a great inland sea, and not 10 per cent. of the people will ever have the pleasure of seeing it. The Callander branch may possibly be of some advantage to Toronto, and we are all glad to see Toronto grow and prosper; and it may be also some advantage to other portions of the Province. This does not apply to the line on the north shore of Lake Superior, which was built largely in the interest of the through trade, more in the interest of Quebec than of Ontario. It will give the cities of Montreal and Quebec special trade advantages that will not be enjoyed by other cities. In fact, Montreal will be virtually the commercial terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway. We in Ontario are not going to derive such great advantages from the road. If the money spent is charged to Ontario, simply because the road is carried through the Province, you might as well charge the cost of the Short Line, if it should run through Maine, to that State. I repeat that the Canadian Pacific Railway will be of no particular advantage to some parts of Ontario. If anything, it will tend to reduce the price of produce, and will rather militate against the interests of people in the southern portion of the Province than advance them. I do not think it is becoming on the part of this House to say that it will give the people back what has been taken from them. This cannot be done; the people cannot be placed in the position in which they were. Arrangements have been entered into between the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Toronto, Grey and Bruce, and the Credit Valley, and they cannot be revoked, and the companies placed in the same position which they formerly occupied. You may as well say that a man who made a mistake in conveying away his property to another individual who, in turn, made it subject to certain encumbrances; and when the man found out his mistake, the second said he would convey the property back to him. But he conveyed it back with the encumbrance created whilst it was in his possession. This is the way in which you could re-convey the railways; they would be subject to certain agreements which would not otherwise have been ratified. That is the difficulty which these sections of country for which I speak have to face. I cannot see how they can be got over. Perhaps the Government may devise some method; but the proper thing to be done is to refund to the municipalities a portion of the bonuses they granted. If the Government say they cannot give all, let them give half. Perhaps, at the present time, the Finance Minister does not feel himself in a position to permit any extra drain on the Dominion Treasury. I do not know, but I believe the Government should acknowledge their indebtedness, and in justice they should admit, frankly and fully, that the municipalities were entitled to this refund; that the road in question was of great advantage to Canada, through the Canadian Pacific Railway, and especially by the large amount of freight sent over it to secure the construction of the national road. Last year the volume of trade was so great that the people along the line were not able to secure all the accommodation they required. The road is filled with through trade from Toronto to Port Arthur by the line of steamers. It has been said that twenty-one trains a day, day and night, were run, carrying supplies in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway. If this is not a link of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and a Dominion line, I do not understand what conditions would make a railway a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I am very sorry that any hon. member opposite should have permitted himself to make the insinuation that this discussion was raised for political purposes. I have no desire whatever to make a political issue of it, and I tell the First Minister that if he wants the constituents I represent to send a man here of a different political stripe from myself, the best way he can accomplish that object is to deal fairly and honestly with the municipalities in this matter, and I have very grave doubts as to whether he will be troubled with my presence in the next Parliament. In such an event I am satisfied the people will say that the hon. gentleman, notwithstanding the representations made, is prepared to deal justly with Ontario and the section of country in which I reside, and that the people will grant the hon. gentleman their confidence. If he wants to accomplish any such object it can be best achieved by refunding this money to the municipalities. I am very sorry the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton), is not in his place, for I am sure he would have deemed it his duty to have said something in support of this proposition, and to have frankly acknowledged that something should be done. I do not put forward the claims of any other section except that which I represent. We waited long for the construction of railways. Our taxes are now up to 3 cents on the dollar, and our people find it a great strain to meet the liabilities of our corporation. If the First Minister would take a trip over the Toronto, Grey and Bruce, he would be satisfied that that line is a link of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that our argument had great force. With respect to the remarks made by hon. gentlemen opposite, as to precedents, it appears that Pembroke is a case in point. I understand that when the First Minister and the Minister of Railways received a deputation, one of them stated that there was no precedent in Canada for any such action as this on the part of the Government. It appears, however, that Pembroke has been refunded money. There is a precedent—there is a case in point; the case of the town of Pembroke. Owing, I presume, to the fact that they contributed money to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, or to a line connecting with that road, or that the Government look upon it as a part of that line, they granted a refund to the town. Now if the town of Pembroke was entitled to a refund I ask the Government fairly to consider the claims of the section I represent. I believe that if they go into the whole question they will find that that section has just the same claim that Pembroke has; it is a simple matter of justice, and something should be done. I do not want to take up too much time, but I feel strongly on this question; I have expressed myself frankly, and I hope and trust that the Government will either see it to be their duty to refund the money or to appoint one arbitrator on their behalf and let the municipalities appoint another. The hon. the First Minister has a large number of friends there—more friends than I would personally like to see; they are all admirers of his, and I would say, let him appoint one arbitrator, let the townships or county appoint another, and let them sit in judgment on the claims, and after having fully considered the whole matter, if that arbitration comes back and says that the people are entitled to nothing, I will be satisfied and I think they will be satisfied. But I do not believe that any two honest men appointed to perform that duty, who will consider the whole matter, will come back and say that these townships are not entitled to some consideration.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I desire to say a few words with reference to this matter before the debate closes. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down has decried the introduction of politics into this question; but if there is no political question at issue I should like to know why these hon. gentlemen are raising this matter at the present moment? The ground upon which they assert their claims for a refund from the Dominion Government, of the bonuses contributed by the Local Government of Ontario and the different municipalities of that Province, is based upon the legislation of 1883, by which the Dominion Parliament assumed control over certain roads to which charters have been granted by the Local Legislature. As I understand their contention, that is the ground upon which they apply to the Dominion Government for a refund of the bonuses about which they are making so much clamor. Now, what are the facts? Did the Local Legislature of Ontario confine the bonuses they granted solely to roads which were chartered by the Local Legislature? Did the municipalities, in granting those bonuses, consider the question as to whether the roads to which they granted bonuses were chartered by the Local Legislature or the Dominion Government? I hold in my hand the railway aid resolutions passed in the Local Legislature of Ontario in 1872, and I find that at that time there were several roads to which aid was granted which were chartered by this Parliament. There was the Kingston and Pembroke, to which a considerable amount of aid was granted, and of which you yourself, Mr. Speaker, know something, I dare say. That is an enterprise the charter for which was obtained from this Parliament in 1871. There was also the Canada Central Railway Company, chartered by the Dominion Parliament, and to which a considerable amount of aid was granted by the Local Legislature in those resolutions which they submitted for granting aid to railways. There was also the Grand Junction Railway, and the Montreal and City of Ottawa Junction Company, which has since taken the name of the Canada Atlantic. But at that time aid was granted to those roads—roads which were chartered by the Dominion Parliament. And so, Sir, I say the contention these gentlemen make, that because this Parliament has assumed control over certain roads having connection with the great leading line of railway through the whole Dominion, they are entitled to receive back from this Parliament the bonuses granted by the Local Legislature or by the municipalities, is a contention which falls to the ground; because that distinction was not considered either by the Local Legislature or the municipalities when they granted these bonuses to the several roads so aided. Before I pass from this point, let me say that I have no sympathy with those hon. members of this House who are disposed to repeal the legislation of 1883. Circumstances I think justified the Government in adopting that legislation—the circumstance of having a railway system in the Dominion of Canada such that, there being a great net-work of roads through the whole Dominion, having connection with each other, having the same gauge, having communication with each other, being a system over the whole of which the cars of any one road may pass—in their very nature it is desirable that each road should be under one control and jurisdiction. Therefore, I repeat, I have no sympathy with the hon. members of this House who desire to see the legislation of 1883, in regard to the Dominion control over these roads, repealed. I do not think it would place these roads in a better position than they are in to day. Is there any hon. gentleman present (who takes the ground which is taken on the other side of the House) who will say that these roads are less efficiently worked at the present moment than they were when under the control of the Local Legislature, before the legislation of 1883 had been passed? Is there any hon. gentleman present who will say that the rates have been increased; or, if they have been so increased, that it has been done in violation of the agreements made between the municipalities granting the aid and the roads themselves. I take it, if any agreement were entered into between the municipalities granting aid and the railways of the Province of Ontario to whom such aid was granted, this agreement would be incorporated in the by-laws which were submitted to the ratepayers, and upon which the bonuses or aid was granted; and I would like to ask those hon. gentlemen opposite whether the legislation of 1883 deprives them of their remedy against the roads which have violated, or do violate, the contracts entered into by the municipalities with those roads. Another ground upon which those hon. gentlemen base their claims for a refund of the aid granted to those railways, is the aid which was granted to the Province of Quebec by the legislation of last Session. The amount which was granted to the Province of Quebec was made in return for expenditures made on a portion of the great national line—the Canadian Pacific Railway. I should like to ask my hon. friend, the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who knows a good deal about the disputed territory, whether he considers that the fact of the Government of which he was a member having granted aid to the extent of $1,440,000 to a railway running through the Province of Ontario, to form a connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway at its eastern terminus, did not justify, to some extent, the claim which was made by the Province of Quebec upon the Dominion Parliament for a refund of a portion of the money expended by them on the North Shore Railway? I should like to ask him also whether the fact that the Dominion has largely contributed—I think hon. gentlemen opposite will say contributed the whole amount of money that was expended—to the construction of nearly a thousand miles of railway from Callander to Rat Portage, in the Province of Ontario, does not to some extent justify the ground taken by the Province of Quebec in making application to the Dominion Government for a refund of the moneys which were expended on the North Shore Railway. I have heard hon. gentlemen on the other side contend that the expenditure of the large amount of money which was expended on the Canadian Pacific Railway proper and on its connections in the Province of Ontario has resulted in no benefit to that Province. I should like to ask my hon. friend, the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who understands this question very well, whether that magnificent territory which he has described as containing such a large amount of wealth, extending from Port Arthur to Rat Portage, has not been benefitted by the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. MILLS. Your leader says it all belongs to the Dominion.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Then the hon. member for Bothwell does not agree with him.

Mr. MILLS. No; I do not.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). It is within my own knowledge that in that part of the Province of Ontario about which no dispute arose—the district lying between Callander and Port Arthur—large areas of timber land have been opened up and developed by the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which, but for the construction of that road, would have been a sealed book; and the Province of Ontario is at this moment deriving, by way of timber dues, a very large amount of revenue from that district. I contend, Sir, that, inasmuch as these are indisputable facts, which I believe the hon. member for Bothwell himself will not dispute, the Province of Quebec was justified in applying to this Government last Session for a refund of a portion of the money expended on the North Shore Railway. Now, Sir, I have a word or two to say with reference to a personal matter which has been referred to by more than one hon. gentleman on the other side of the House. It has been suggested by several speakers that a precedent had been created for the return of those bonuses, by the action of the Government in refunding the bonus granted by the town of Pembroke to the Canada Central Railway Company.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I hope the hon. member who says hear, hear, will, when I get through, give his opinion on the action of the Government on this matter, which I urged upon their consideration with all the power I could command. The hon. member who referred to this matter had not, I presume, read the return which was brought down to Parliament upon a motion made by his leader, or he would have learned that the application of the town of Pembroke was not based upon a statement of the case parallel with that presented by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House in reference to the particular localities whose interests they are advocating. The hon. member for Bothwell, who says "hear, hear," must know (having been a member of the Government at the time) that his own leader came down to Parliament, in 1875, with a proposition to aid the Canada Central Railway Company to build a line from the vicinity of Renfrew to a point in the vicinity of Lake Nipissing. He must know that this House voted the sum of $12,000 a mile for 120 miles of road, going westward from Renfrew and following the valley of the Bonnechere. He must know that some three years afterwards the leader of the Government of which he was a member, came down to Parliament with another proposition—a proposition to make the portion of the road which he proposed to subsidise commence, not at Renfrew, but at Pembroke, a point some thirty miles westward, to which place the people of Pembroke had induced the Canada Central Railway Company to bring the road, by granting it a bonus in the interim. And what did the leader of the Government state to the House as one of the reasons to induce them to authorise his Government to make the change? It was that by adopting Pembroke as the starting point of the subsidised portion of the road, instead of Renfrew, they would bring the road to a point twenty miles farther west than would be reached for the same subsidy that was proposed to be granted in 1875, and that they would thus—according to Mr. Mackenzie's own words, contained in the Order in Council submitted to Parliament in 1878—save to the country the construction of twenty miles of road. That, Sir, was the ground upon which I based the application of the town of Pembroke to the Government of this country. It was upon the ground that by the action of the people of Pembroke we had saved to the country, according to the statement of the hon. gentleman's own leader, a sum equal to the cost of twenty miles of railway, which, I think, I am not very much astray in putting at $20,000 a mile, that we applied to the Government. And I hold that if there is any municipality in the same position in which the town of Pembroke stood at that time, it is justly entitled to receive aid at the hands of the Government. Sir, I have been told that an hon. member on the other side of the House—I think the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Cook)—took occasion, in the course of his speech, to say that the action of the Government in that matter was taken for a political purpose. He took occasion to say, if I am correctly informed—and if I am not I hope he will correct me, as I was not in the House when he was speaking—that the leader of the Government had sent a telegram, either to me or to some person in my constituency, during the progress of the election in 1882, to the effect that aid asked for would be granted. I have to say that that statement is not correct. I had no communication from the leader of the Government on this subject at all. It is true a communication was made to me by the Minister of Railways, whom I had been pressing for some time to obtain an answer of some kind to the request that had been proffered to grant aid to this particular municipality; and, Sir, I might, if I chose—but I do not want to repeat it here—retort upon the hon. gentleman and tell him that his own leader was not at all chary in sending telegrams at a more critical juncture than that to which the hon. gentleman refers. I think the statement was made—at all events it was hinted broadly—that but for the action of the Government in relation to that matter I should not have a seat in this House during this Parliament. I have not the returns of the election of 1882 by me, but I think I am not astray in saying that the hon. member for Simcoe will find, if he examines the returns, that I was able to secure a larger majority outside of the town of Pembroke altogether, where that communication could have no effect, than the hon. gentleman was able to obtain in his whole constituency, although he is, no doubt, a very strong and very popular gentleman in his locality. I have referred to these matters because they have been introduced by hon. gentlemen opposite. But to return to the main question—I say it does not lie in the mouths of these hon. gentlemen to say that because the Government, by the legislation of 1883, have taken control of certain roads connected with the great leading lines through the Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, therefore they have a just claim on behalf of these municipalities. The hon. gentleman who spoke last was mistaken in saying that the roads which were affected by that legislation were in Ontario alone. He could not have read the Act of 1883 or he would have found that he was mistaken in that assertion, because the Act applies to other roads as well as to those in Ontario. In view of the fact that neither the municipalities nor the Local Legislature of Ontario took into consideration the question as to whether these roads were chartered by the Local Legislature or the Dominion Parliament, they have no ground for the application that they now make. Hon. gentlemen opposite are very solicitous for the welfare of hon. members on this side. They have warned us that if we do not support the applications which have been made by certain of their municipalities to the Government for aid, in regard to this matter, we shall, after another election, be relegated to private life. No doubt it would be very pleasing to hon. gentlemen opposite to see us occupying positions on the other side of the House; but let me tell them that if they expect by a side wind such as this to obtain power, if they expect to get into office by appealing to the prejudices of the people of Ontario, they will find themselves very greatly mistaken. I, for one, have no fear to appeal to the constituency I have the honor to represent upon the policy of the Government, and I venture to express the opinion that hon. gentlemen opposite will find their solicitude for us entirely uncalled for.

Mr. SPROULE. Representing a constituency that is served by some of these railways to which reference has been made, I may be permitted to say something on this question. If it were reasonable and possible that the municipalities and the Provincial Government could get back the money given in aid of these railways, it would be very desirable to have it returned. I am sure all my constituents would be pleased to get their money back, but the reasons given for making this demand seem to me to be extremely inconsistent. What are the reasons? The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Cook) said great injustice was done to the people of Simcoe by the amalgamation of the Hamilton and North-Western with the Northern Railway. I am aware that a great amount of money was given by the municipalities to have competition between those two roads, but I would like to know what the Act passed by this House last Session, declaring them to be roads in the general interest of Canada, had to do with any injustice committed through this amalgamation. That great injustice was consummated long before this Act was passed, and the municipalities were suffering under it without being able to obtain redress or remedy. They appealed to the Parliament at Toronto, to which they thought they had the right to appeal, for redress, and the only answer they got was that nothing could be done. In the charter which was obtained in the Local Parliament there was a clause giving power to amalgamate, and when the municipalities supposed that they had so drawn up their agreement as to prevent the possibility of an amalgamation, they found the agreement was so lax in this respect that they could not prevent it nor obtain redress; and to say that this House is in any way responsible for that is nothing else than the sheresst nonsense. Reference has been made to the Toronto, Grey and Bruce, and the Credit Valley Railways, and made by whom? By a gentleman who is now condemning the very principle he strove for years to carry out himself. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who was president of the Palmerston and Durham road, now a part of the Grand Trunk Railway, did all he could to bring about the amalgamation of these two companies. When municipal aid was given to build that road, even before it was ready for the rails, deputations waited upon the Grand Trunk Railway Company, to induce it to take over the Palmerston and Durham line and make it a part of the great Dominion line, believing that that would be in the interest of the people; yet this hon. gentleman condemns the Government for declaring the Toronto, Grey and Bruce line to be in the general interest of Canada, and therefore a Dominion line. If there is an hon. gentleman in this House whose acts appear to be entirely inconsistent with the interests of his constituents, in regard to this question, it is the hon. member for North Wellington. That hon. gentleman stands in a peculiar position. When the Palmerston and Durham road was built he wanted competition with the Toronto, Grey and Bruce; he appealed to the Grand Trunk Railway for assistance. The Grand Trunk Railway came to his aid, and the result was competition between the Palmerston and Durham road and the Toronto, Grey and Bruce. What great injustice has been done by the amalgamation of the latter with the Canadian Pacific Railway? The great injustice he complains of is in the fact that there are as many as seventeen trains a day over the Toronto Grey and Bruce now, while previous to the amalgamation during one winter it had not a train over for six weeks; and I remember one of the hon. gentleman's constituents in Mount Forest then stating that they were out of almost everything in the groceries line for want of railway accommodation, even out of whiskey. I only give this as evidence that the people of that county are much better served to-day that they ever were before. If you travel through that country and ask the people along the line of the Toronto, Grey and Bruce whether they are better off to-day than they were previous to the time it became linked with the Canadian Pacific Railway, they will tell you they are a hundred times better off, because they have an all-rail through route to Montreal, when previously they had to ship to Toronto and then tranship; and they can also ship their goods by Lake Superior to Manitoba and the North-West at rates much lower than ever before, and without the additional trouble they formerly experienced, of having to ship their goods, first to Owen Sound, where they had to remain a considerable time before they could be transhipped by the boats. Now the goods are sent right through without any trouble. The hon. gentleman made reference to the condition of things around Orangeville, and he says the result of this Act has been to destroy the competition between the Credit Valley Railway—the branch which extended to Orangeville—and the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway. He seems to know very little of the matter or to hide the information which will lay it fairly before the country. He should know that that was caused by Mr. Stephen buying up the stock of the Credit Valley Railway and running the two roads under the same management, before this Act was passed; so there has been no change of circumstances since the passing of this Act. If you take any part of the country supplied by the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway, with which I am acquainted, the people will admit that it was a most desirable change, for this reason, we have the Grand Trunk to the west and the Northern and Hamilton and North-Western to the east. We are between these two roads, and as long as they remain as they are to-day, we have a competition between three different lines; and as long as that exists, the greatest benefits must result to the country. The argument of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) seemed to me to be extremely shallow as a whole. He started out with the contention that a great injustice was done to the people by proclaiming these roads to be for the interest of Canada, or, as he was pleased to call it, taking over these roads; and afterwards, when it was intimated that this Act might be repealed and the roads given back, he said that would be no benefit at all. If there is reason in his first contention, why would it not be a benefit if the roads were given back? What injustice could be done? He says that would only be a half way measure; that it would not satisfy them. It seems to me that it is like the old story of the wolf and the lamb—it is impossible to satisfy them. It is not for the purpose of satisfaction that they bring this up, but in order to make political capital. He says, in a very calm voice, that he hopes this will be kept out of the political arena, and he knows that his friends have no desire to introduce politics into the question at all. Either he must have a short memory, or he must read very few papers, or he would recognise the fact that the papers which support him and his party have almost invariably, since this question was introduced by the member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), been attacking the Government in reference to it. Why do we find these gentlemen—the hon. members for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), North Grey (Mr. Allen), Lambton (Mr. Lisgar), two of the members for Elgin (Mr. Casey and Mr. Wilson), the member for Peel (Mr. Fleming), the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen)—getting up, one after the other, and making an attack on the Government in reference to this question? Why do we find the papers which support them also attacking the Government? Simply because they believe it would be good political capital to use when the next general election comes around. The sincerity of the hon. gentleman is evidenced by the fact that he is pleading to get the Government to give back this money, contending that a great injustice had been done by this Act, and yet the same man, who is the president of the short branch of the Grand Trunk Railway, from Palmerston to Durham, used the most strenuous efforts to get the Grand Trunk to take over that line, the Grand Trunk being one of the great Dominion lines. He believed that in that way he was securing a great good to his constituents in that part of the country, and I believe he was. But if he is sincere to-night, was he working in the interest of the people then? If he was sincere in believing that it was a great injustice to the people that the Toronto, Grey and Bruce line should be attached to the Canadian Pacific Railway, it seems to me a strange kind of logic. When he says that politics should be kept out, and adopts the course which all these hon. gentlemen have adopted, I think it will not go down with the country, I think they will not be inclined to believe that they are speaking in the way they profess to be, purely in the interests of their constituents. Our condition in the county of Grey is especially pleasurable, in consequence of the chance which has been made. We have much better railway facilities than we had before. Before this line was taken over, when the Toronto, Grey and Bruce was so run down that it did not serve the wants of the country, we endeavored to get the municipalities to give additional aid to put it in proper repair. What were the advantages we represented to the people that they would derive from that? The very advantages we enjoy to-day; those were, that we would have a line that would enable us to take our stuff past Toronto to Montreal, to the east or to the United States, or to any other part of the country, that produce could be taken to any place in or outside the country without transshipment and break of bulk. We wanted to have a line of the same gauge as all the other lines, and not be handicapped as we were by shipping our goods to Toronto, changing to other cars there, and making fresh arrangements with other roads; or, if we went to Owen Sound, with the steamship lines which carried them to their destination. We are much better off to-day, because we can ship from any station on the line to the east or west, or to any part of the country we like. We can have the advantage of a through road, and can ship with much less trouble. In addition to that, we have some sixteen or seventeen trains passing over the road each day, and I deny that there is any want of accommodation for the requirements of the local trade along the line. I believe it is claimed that the rates are raised. I think there is nothing at all in the declaration of this Act which empowers either the Canadian Pacific Railway or any other road which is declared to be for the interest of Canada, that gives them power to impose additional rates over what was stipulated and agreed with the municipalities in the first place. I can only say, as I did in the first instance, that if this money is to be given back, we would like very much to get it. I am sure the people in my constituency would be pleased to receive it. But another question is involved. It means the opening of a door, it means the establishment of a precedent that may be commenced here but ended—where? Is it not reasonable for hon. members to suppose that if the Dominion of Canada comes to the aid of the municipalities which ask not only the money given by the municipalities, but also that given by the Provincial Government in aid of railways, other Provinces would follow suit and ask for the same thing? Provided they did, what would be the result? I find that the money given to railways by the Provincial Governments and municipalities amounts, in the aggregate, to something like $35,850,000. Would the hon. gentlemen, who advocate giving back this money, be prepared to support a measure to raise that amount to distribute to the various Provinces of this country? I think not; but, again, I apprehend there is an injustice or an unfairness in this; the papers which are advocating the giving back of this money, said, when we voted money for the Canadian Pacific Railway last year, that Ontario had to bear the greatest share of the burden; that it had to raise at least three-fifths of the money given to that railway. If that is correct, and the money has to be raised by the Dominion, we, as a Province, would be taxing ourselves to raise three-fifths of this amount of $35,850,000, which would amount to $21,310,000. We could not claim that we should get $21,000,000, because the highest amount their own papers say we are entitled to is about $15,000,000; if, in the aggregate, it would require $35,000,000, and Ontario had to raise three-fifths of that, as is contended, which would be $21,000,000, we should be doing no justice to Ontario by asking the Dominion Government to raise this money and pay $21,310,000 in order to get $15,000,000. We should, in effect, be giving $5,310,000 to the other Provinces. Provided that were done, what would be the result? Why, Sir, the hon. gentlemen who are supporting that motion in the House to-night would go back to the country and hold it up as an evidence that we were increasing the debt; that we were raising the taxes. How would these taxes be raised? Would it not be by Customs and Inland Revenue? Then, if these additional duties were imposed, it would be used as an argument in their favor. But I claim their action is only in harmony with that on the boundary question; it is for the purpose of raising a political cry, that may be used, and used effectively, by these parties when they go back to the country again. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Fleming) said that the Province of Ontario never appealed to the Dominion for anything before. I think he forgot that the Minister of Education, in the Legislature of Ontario, a short time ago, declared that he had secured between two and three millions to the Province of Ontario by applying to the Dominion Government for additional aid. Well, I can only say that he was not in harmony with his political friends in the House at Toronto. The hon. gentleman who said there is no political significance in this question seems to forget the fact that the Hon. Attorney-General Mowat, a few days ago, in the Provincial Legislature, when application was made to him for additional aid to some local road, made this reply: "Your friends at Ottawa and Quebec have taken these lines over, therefore I am not disposed to give them any aid." Was not that of political significance? I say distinctly it was used for the purpose of creating mistrust and prejudicing the people of Ontario against the Dominion Government. He endeavored to make them believe that because these roads had been declared to be for the general advantage of Canada—because they are not taken away from the Province—he endeavored to make the people believe that a great injustice is being done them, and that some benefits they would otherwise receive are withheld on account of these roads having been declared to be in the interests of the Dominion. Now, for myself, if I could see that the country was less or worse served by these roads being declared to be in the interest of Canada, that the people had less railway facilities, that they had not as low traffic rates, or that they were being deprived of any right, I say I, for one, would be prepared at any time to stand up and oppose any Government, no matter what Government might be in power here, if I thought such a policy was prejudicial to the interests of the people. But I believe that if we raised this money, it would be raising the duties which the people of Ontario would have to pay, and I do not believe they want us to raise any more money than what is essentially necessary. I think, however, we are entitled to ask the Dominion Government to repeal this Act. I do not say that it can do any good; I do not know that it can do any harm; but if it is repealed, and there was any injustice done by enacting it, then that injustice is done away with. But the same complaint mentioned by the hon. member for North Wellington will still exist, and the repeal will not satisfy the hon. gentlemen of the Opposition. Then, when we go back to the country again, the question will be used on every platform in the Province of Ontario against the supporters of the present Government, used effectively, used in the same way the boundary award was used, as the Streams Bill was used, by being held up as taking away provincial rights, and doing a great injustice to the people. It is for that purpose I believe this motion was made in the House to-day, and for that purpose it is so strongly supported by the large numbers of the members of the Opposition who have spoken so forcibly on this question.

Mr. LISTER. It is certainly very refreshing to see hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House so zealous in opposing the Province of Ontario getting the same measure of justice that was accorded to the Province of Quebec last Session. I can only say that if the members from the Province of Quebec had acted as the Ministerial members from the Province of Ontario act, Quebec would not have received at the last Session of Parliament $3,500,000. Now, Sir, I can easily understand the excitable condition of the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Sproule). I can easily understand how he anticipates trouble at the next election. He feels to-day that he is false to his county; he appreciates the difficulty he will have at the next election to explain the conduct he is guilty of to-day. Now, Sir, the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this question from the other side of the House have travelled out of the record. They have not taken into consideration the real question at issue. The point is, not whether these railways were better worked before they were taken control of by this Government, or whether the people were better satisfied than they are now; but the question is, have this Government or Parliament the right to take away from the Province railways which belong to the Province? These hon. gentlemen can stand up here to-day and say that the Government are justified in doing what they did do; but they give a different reason from the reason given by the Government. The Government said it was in the interests of the whole Dominion that these roads should become Dominion roads, not that they were not giving satisfaction to the people, or that they were not being properly worked, or that the rights of the people of Ontario were not being properly protected; but because it was in the interests of this whole Dominion that these roads should be Dominion roads. That is the question, and looking at that question we have to consider the facts as they were before the passage of that Act. It is admitted that these roads were, at all events, aided by the Province, that they were aided by the municipalities through which they ran. They received their charters from the Provincial Government of Ontario, and under that charter the people of Ontario have certain rights under the statutes of Ontario. The aid was given under a certain state of facts, under certain rights which were secured to the people of Ontario by the laws of their own Legislature, a Legislature answerable to the people of Ontario, a Legislature that could be controlled by the people of Ontario, and whose behests the representatives in the Local Parliament were bound to obey. This Parliament, without rhyme or reason, without any excuse in the world, but the excuse, to my mind, of enabling these roads to be absorbed by the large roads running through this country, passed this Act into law. They took away from the people of Ontario the rights which those people had to control these roads. They deprived the people of Ontario of the rights which the statute law of that Province gave to them; and does it lie in the mouth of any hon. gentleman to come here to-day and say that Ontario, having spent $6,000,000, and the municipalities $8,000,000, in building these roads, in building the roads controlled by the Local Legislature, and controlled by themselves, these roads should be taken possession of by this Parliament, and the power the people have over them should be swept away? I say it is nonsense. I can understand the hon. member for North Renfrew and the hon. member for East Grey anticipating difficulties at the next election. Now, then, hon. gentlemen may say what they like as to the service of these roads; the service of some roads may be better than the others; but, certainly, the service of the St. Lawrence and Ottawa road is not as good as it was some years ago.

Mr. BOWELL. When was that taken over? Was it taken over under the present Act?

Mr. LISTER. Every road touching or crossing a through line, and it touches the Grand Trunk Railway.

Mr. BOWELL. That is not the question I asked the hon. gentleman. That road was taken over years ago, long before the passage of this Act, and made a Dominion road.

Mr. LISTER. Well, it was wrong then, and that is no justification for the present Act. Two wrongs do not make one right—perhaps they do in the mind of the hon. Minister of Customs.

Mr. BOWELL. You did not object to it; it was your party that did it.

Mr. LISTER. Now, let us see what the rights of the people of Ontario were. As I said, the Provincial Government is responsible directly to the people of Ontario. Under that statute which they have, hon. gentlemen say these roads have amalgamated with other roads, and they deplore that, perhaps. But whether they amalgamated or not under the laws of Ontario, the Lieutenant-Governor in Council had a right to regulate the tolls so that if the people were suffering from excessive or exorbitant railway charges the Lieutenant-Governor had a right to reduce these charges. You have taken that right away from the Provincial Government and the people, and I say that depriving them of that right is depriving them of a very great advantage indeed. Yet hon. gentlemen venture to say they have been deprived of nothing. Our law also gave the Lieutenant-Governor in Council power to grant running powers over other railways. That has been taken away from the Provincial Government; it may be vested in this Government. But I say this Parliament is not so amenable to the people of Ontario as is the Ontario Legislature. This Parliament consists of members from different Provinces of the Dominion, and it cannot be made to respond to the wishes of any one Province, as the Legislature of each Province can be made to respond. The speech of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) was very amusing if it was not logical. He justified the taking away of those railways because, forsooth, the Province of Quebec or the city of Montreal or some other place had asked the Government to pass this Act; because Montreal had asked the Government to take over these roads that is held to be a justification for a violent seizure of roads in Ontario. That is the argument of the hon. gentleman. All we, on this side of the House say, is, that our Province should be placed in the same position as Quebec. This Government has taken our railways without the consent of the people. The people have protested as strongly as it is possible to protest; the Local Government have protested; delegations consisting of the most respectable and leading men of the different municipalities which these roads traverse have gone to Ottawa and protested. They have told this Government that these were provincial roads; they have urged upon the Government to do an act of justice, by recouping the people the money which they have expended on those roads. If it is in the interest of the Dominion that these roads should be Dominion roads, then the Dominion should pay to the Province and the municipalities the money which they expended on their construction. It is not fair that one Province should expend money for the benefit of the whole country and not be recouped. I was surprised to hear the language used by the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum). No doubt that hon. member, like the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. White), would like to see Local Governments abolished, and have one grand central Government here. The hon. gentleman never loses an opportunity of rising in the House and denouncing the Government of Ontario. But if there is one Government in this whole vast Dominion which is entitled to the admiration of the people it is the Ontario Government. There are no men from one end of the country to the other who have stood up so manfully for provincial rights as the Government of Mr. Mowat and his colleagues. They have fought the Dominion Government during seven or eight years, and have defeated them in every fray, and the reputation which the First Minister possessed as a great constitutional lawyer has been driven to the four winds. So far as the Government of this country is concerned, there is no Government that is entitled to the credit, yes, the admiration of the people, from one end of the Dominion to the other, as is the Ontario Government, which has steadfastly defended provincial rights and resisted the encroachments of this Government and this Parliament on each and every occasion. If it had not been for the Ontario Government the federal system would be a myth to-day, form without substance; but owing to the defence of provincial rights made by that Government, we are bringing our country into some shape, we are bringing the people to realise the fact, that unless we stand up for those rights first, last, and every time, our present system of government stands the chance of being swept out of existence. I was going on to say that the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) takes advantage of every opportunity to attack the Ontario Government. I desire to tell him that the Local Government, notwithstanding the fact that they have spent vast sums of money in building railways and in constructing public institutions, in different parts of the Province, at an expense of millions, they have millions in the Treasury to-day; and when the hon. gentleman says they have to borrow money to meet their railway liabilities, he utters a slander on the Local Government. They are not obliged to borrow money, but they were obliged to sell securities which are bearing a large interest, and when the debt became due there would be a saving to the Province of $50,000. It does not redound to the credit of the hon. gentleman that he should decry his native Province. Perhaps, if hon. gentlemen opposite were in power in Toronto, he would not be so ready to make such an attack. I am sorry to see it. I like to see a man loyal to his Province; but I am afraid he is more loyal to the leader of the Government than he is to the good old Province of Ontario. I repeat again that this Act is a confiscation; it is unjustifiable in every way you look at it; it cannot be defended, and when hon. gentlemen opposite come to defend this Act before the Province they will be told by the people: Why have you opposed the rights of the Province, and stood up in the House, not for the purpose of offering a word in its favor, but of refusing that which is justly due. I believe the honest, sincere and true people of the Province will say that hon. gentlemen opposite who oppose this motion are not worthy of occupying seats in this House.

Mr. DAWSON. It seems to me rather singular that when hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House rise to speak about these great railways, they cannot avoid having a fling at the constituency which I have the honor to represent. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) said that the line running along the north shore would be of no use to Ontario. We have heard too much of such language in this House. The hon. member for North Renfrew stated very properly that the Ontario Government is deriving a large revenue from timber dues and the sale of timber berths in the new territory; and I may say they will, in the future, derive a larger revenue, owing to the opening up of that railway. I believe our section of the country, all in all, is quite equal, as a revenue yielding district, to any other section of Ontario. Moreover, the opening of this line from Gravenhurst northward, to connect with the Canadian Pacific Railway, may make Toronto the commercial capital of the Dominion in the place of Montreal. But it appears to me that it is a rather poor argument to bring forward to say that, because the railways, which are in fact extensions of the Pacific Railway in Quebec, have been bought up or have been granted a certain amount of money from the Dominion Treasury, Ontario should get just as much. The Canadian Pacific Railway and its branches within Ontario extend to at least a length of 1,480 miles. That is, if you take the Canada Central line, the line from Callander to Rat Portage and as far west as the disputed territory runs, you will have a distance of 1,250 miles within this Province. You have with this the Algoma Mills branch, and the Callander and Gravenhurst branch, making in all close on 1,500 miles which have certainly cost more than $30,000,000, expended in Ontario by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. But the expenditure of a few millions for a road which is actually, from its geographical position, a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway—on the north shore of the St. Lawrence—is regarded as a decided error by these hon. gentlemen. But let us take another view of the matter. I have listened very carefully to all the speeches made on this subject, and I have endeavored to ascertain what was the real grievance in declaring these roads to be for the general advantage of Canada. It seems to me, so far as hon. gentlemen have explained it themselves, to be a sentimental rather than a real grievance. The roads are still there; they are still as useful as ever they were; they have not been removed from their places, and they are all doing the traffic, as they formerly did, and many of them are much improved. I was in the Legislature of Ontario when the grants to some of these roads were made. I was there when the grant was made to the Credit Valley, and whether I was right or wrong, I opposed the grant to that road, because it seemed to me to be at that time a somewhat useless line, running, as it did, parallel to and between two great lines of road. I may have changed my opinion now, to a certain extent; but at any rate, it was urged in favor of that road that it would be to the general advantage, that it would eventually be a leading line of road instead of being a local line, and it was on that ground that it received the grant. Then there was the Hamilton and North-Western Railway. I was there when aid was given to that road. It was urged that it would be of great use, that it would be a competing line to the Northern, on which it was represented that the charges were too high. But it was no sooner completed than the two roads amalgamated, to form what is now called the Northern and North-Western Railway; they pooled their earnings, and are run as one road, so that the object which the Legislature had in building and giving a grant to that road was completely frustrated. Well, Sir, the Toronto, Grey and Bruce is certainly as useful now as ever, and I have not heard that the rates are higher on that road than they were. There is no doubt that Ontario deserves a great deal of credit for her enterprise, courage and spirit in aiding the construction of these roads; but I think a great deal more credit would have been due to Ontario if she had gone hand in hand with the Dominion Government in assisting to build the Canadian Pacific Railway. Why, Sir, in the time of the Reform Government an application was made to Ontario to grant land in aid of the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the Government of Ontario, at that time, in rather a memorable letter, written by a member of that Government, objected to granting land to aid the Canadian Pacific Railway. As to the political aspect of the matter, the gentlemen on the Opposition benches have expressed great fears that the result of a refusal on the part of the Dominion Government will be to render hon. members on the Government side unpopular. I am sure these hon. gentlemen will be exceedingly alarmed; I dare say it would grieve them greatly, if such were to be the result. That, however, is the manner in which they express themselves; but I think that they will meet with disappointment in that respect, and that it will not have the tendency of rendering the Government unpopular; because, when the matter comes to be understood in the country, it will be seen and known that the grievance is more imaginary than real; that the roads are still there and are being maintained; that many of them are better than they were, and that the country has not suffered loss by the action of the Dominion Government, in declaring them to be roads for the general advantage of the country.

Mr. DESJARDINS. The prominence which has been given to the Province of Quebec and to the Conservative members coming from that Province will explain why I think it convenient to interfere at this stage of the debate. I would have expected some of my friends from that Province, on the Liberal side of the House, to have come to the rescue, and express what they think of the position which the Conservative members from the Province of Quebec have taken with regard to the grants made to railways during last Session, and to what they have obtained from Parliament to the benefit of their Province. They have listened to the eulogies passed on them by their own allies from the Province of Ontario, but I have vainly expected from them an expression of opinion either in approving those eulogies or protesting against them on their part, so I think I am justified in speaking a little, if not for them still from them. The great object of the debate, so far, has been to establish an invidious comparison between what they pretend to be the indifference of our friends from Ontario, as compared with the greedy demands, the persistent claims, coming from the Conservatives of the Province of Quebec on behalf of that Province. As I have already said, we have, so far, not heard our friends from the Province of Quebec express their opinion of that matter; but if they do not speak here their papers in the Province of Quebec speak for them, and we can easily understand that it would be really difficult for them to interfere, and show how they can agree together and work if not only towards defeating the Government, if they were able to do so. But we see they are resorting to the same kind of warfare. They want to arouse the prejudices of one Province against another, making people believe that one Province is not as fairly treated as another, and vice versa, so as to raise public opinion against the Government, and if they could destroy or ruin the Government at the expense of the harmony or peace of the Confederation, they would only be too glad to do so. I happen to have in my hand a paper published during this month, and it is considered to be the Quebec organ of the Liberal party. If the House will allow me I shall quote and translate some extracts from an editorial of that paper—L'Electeur. It is entitled "The Justice of our Claims:"

"We publish elsewhere figures, which give the evidence in what an odious manner we are robbed and spoliated by the Federal Government."

Of course this speaks of the Province of Quebec—

"These figures which have been transmitted to us by Mr. J. C. Langelier"—

If I mistake not this is the brother of the hon. member for Megantic—

"will prove that the Province of Quebec has thrown into the treasury of the Confederation, during the first sixteen years, nearly $20,000,000 more than it has received, whilst the other Provinces have received several millions more than they have expended towards the Confederation.

"After having made so many sacrifices, after having furnished, without any compensation whatever, the greatest part of the millions, which the Government have expended lavishly in the other Provinces, we should have the right to ask something in return, especially when we have an incontestable right to obtain it."

This is quite different from what has been said by our friends from Ontario, who pretend that all we have exacted, all we have obtained, was not because it was just to receive it, but because the Government was afraid to refuse what we were asking. We find the men who are taking common action with the Opposition from Ontario denouncing us for not obtaining from the Government what they say the Province of Quebec is justly entitled to. They publish tables of figures to show that while the Province of Ontario has received some $6,000,000 more than she has contributed towards the revenue of the Confederation, the Province of Quebec has paid something like $19,000,000 in excess of the expenditure; and continuing, they show, by figures which, of course, they claim to be correct, having been taken from the Public Accounts, that the Province of Nova Scotia has received $18,000,000 more than she has expended, the Province of New Brunswick $21,000,000 more, and so on. So that you see there is a wide divergence between what is said here, with regard to what the Province of Quebec has received, and what it is publicly claimed by the same party in our Province we are entitled to receive at the hands of the Government. But I think it will be interesting to continue these quotations. L'Electeur, which is speaking for the party, says:

"The French Conservative members from Lower Canada, who give their help to such an abominable policy, cannot profess to be in ignorance of the figures we have been publishing in another column, which show too clearly that in the absence of any other reason the sacrifices the Province of Quebec has made give us an incontestable right to what we are asking. They could easily obtain it had they heart and dignity enough to lay aside their own personal interest and to be satisfied only with what the interest of the Province demands."

How such denunciations can be reconciled with what we have heard during this debate it is not for me to say. And it proceeds to threaten that if the Province of Quebec does not receive the justice which she has a right to expect, and if the Conservative members from the Province of Quebec are not courageous enough to claim and exact that from the Government, we shall very soon see the end of the Confederation. So, we have before us a party united to defeat the Government, and taking such divergent views of what the Government has been doing in the way of rendering justice to the different members of the Confederation. The conclusion evidently to be drawn is this, that the Opposition in raising this debate, are not so anxious to obtain anything from the Government as to raise prejudices in the different parts of the Confederation, and to build up their own popularity at the expense of peace and harmony in the country; and it is well that the public should know it.

Mr. DESJARDINS.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. At this late period of the debate I have no intention of making anything like a speech. I simply wish to notice two or three of the arguments which have been brought forward against the contention of this side of the House. The hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White) commenced his speech with the argument that because Ontario had made a grant in aid of a road chartered by the Dominion Government, therefore the Dominion Government was right in seizing the rest of the railways.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I said it did not lie in the mouths of hon. gentlemen opposite now to say that because these roads were taken under the control of the Dominion Government, therefore they had a claim, inasmuch as the Local Government did not discriminate in making their grants between roads chartered by the Local Legislature and those chartered by this Government.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I understand the full force of the argument; and I ask, if one man out of the kindness of his heart shares his goods with a needy neighbor, is that any reason why that neighbor should turn round and seize upon the whole of the other man's property? In the same way, if the Province of Ontario, of its own free will and accord, seeing that is going to be a partial benefit to the Province, saw fit to give a grant to a road chartered by the Dominion Government, is that any reason why the Dominion Government should turn round and seize the whole of the railways? Again, the hon. member for North Renfrew advanced the argument that this action is perfectly justifiable, because the Dominion Government is taking as good care of the roads, and is serving the country as well with them, as the Local Government was doing. I ask this hon. House if that argument is any stronger than the other. If one neighbor, by force of fraud, seizes on the farm of another neighbor, will any man in his senses plead in a court of law that he was perfectly justified in doing so because he was taking as good care of the farm as the other did. The same hon. gentleman, as well as the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), brought up the case of the North Shore Railway as a case in point. Now, I am not very well acquainted with the transactions relating to that railway; and in any statements I make I speak subject to correction. But if I understand the matter rightly, there is no parallel between the two cases. The North Shore Railway was built by the Province of Quebec, and the Province of Quebec sold it and got the money for it. It may be said for that Province that they did not get all that the road cost them. That is a matter entirely beside the question; that is their own lookout. If they made a bad bargain there is no reason why the other Provinces should be called upon to make it good to them. But I ask, is that any reason why the roads in the other Provinces should be seized upon? How stands the matter with them? Not a single dollar has been paid for a road in any one of the Provinces, that I know of, except for that North Shore Railway. I do not know what the other Provinces have done, but I know that the Government of the Province of Ontario has granted at least $8,000,000 to aid in the construction of railways, and the municipalities throughout the Province have supplemented that grant by $14,000,000 or $16,000,000, and to my knowledge the municipalities have never been refunded one dollar of that money.

An hon. MEMBER. Pembroke.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Oh, yes; I beg pardon; there was one, in a critical moment. Well, I think one of the strongest arguments used to-night was used by my friend the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum). He said that there was only a certain portion of the municipalities where these roads had been built that had taxed themselves for building these roads, and that there would be a larger number of these municipalities who would receive nothing back and who would have to pay their share of the sum refunded. At first sight that seemed a very strong argument; but if you examine it closely you will find it is no argument at all. If there is one principle more firmly fixed than another in the commercial mind it is that every man is bound by the action of his regularly appointed agent. The action of the agent is the action of the principal, and the same idea holds good with regard to the Government. For what are Governments and Parliaments? They are simply the agents of the people, responsible directly to the people, and when the people elect a certain set of men to conduct their business they are bound by the actions of these men. It makes no difference, in this respect, whether the municipalities have contributed anything or are going to receive anything. They are bound by the action of the men they have sent to represent them in Parliament. It seems to me that this action of the Dominion Government is a direct breach of one of the fundamental principles of Confederation, one of the strongest reasons for entering into Confederation. It was not very judicious on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to try to raise up a feeling in this matter between one Province and the other. The action contemplated here has no reference to one Province more than to another. If Quebec has railways in the same position as those instanced in Ontario there is not an hon. gentleman on this side who will not do his best, by vote and voice, to obtain for her remuneration. It is not by setting up one Province against another, but by giving to every Province the same mode of justice, that the Confederation will be held together. This action on the part of the Government was a breach of one of the fundamental principles of Confederation. You are aware, Sir, and the House is aware, that the chief reason which prompted the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec to contemplate Confederation at all at first was to obtain control over local matters and over local property, and when the Provinces retained certain rights and certain powers, these rights and powers should be held sacred; and I cannot imagine anything more dishonorable than to try and snatch away with a strong arm those rights. I do not know how many roads there are in the other Provinces in the same circumstances as the Ontario roads mentioned, but I repeat wherever such a road exists, it matters not in what Province, there are no gentlemen in this House who will be more anxious to do justice, to do all that lies in their power to obtain justice for them than hon. gentlemen on this side of the House.

Mr. WILSON. I had no intention of making any remarks upon this question, until I heard the hon. member for Monk (Mr. McCallum) remark that the municipalities in the county I represent were more favored on account of amalgamation and becoming Dominion roads. He referred to the manner in which they were supplied with railway facilities. He said that the people of that locality would not, on any consideration, exchange their position, since the Credit Valley road had become part of the Canadian Pacific Railway, for the position in which they stood previously. He also referred to the fact that it was under the previous Government that the Canada Southern was taken as a work in the interest of the Dominion; and tried to draw the conclusion that, therefore, the arguments offered on this side, in support of our demand upon the present Government, would bear no weight. I do not base the case so strongly upon the fact that the Government assumed control of those roads, although I contend that the Dominion Government ought not to have assumed the control of roads constructed by the municipalities and the Local Government, as thereby the Government encroached on provincial rights as I do upon the policy the Government adopted last Session in granting aid to roads already built. It is the bounden duty of every hon. gentleman who has the interest of Confederation at heart, to show a firm resistance to every act of encroachment by the Dominion Parliament. If we are to remain a part of Confederation, we should, on each and every occasion in which provincial rights are encroached upon, resist such encroachment. The Quebec Government having granted a certain amount of aid for the construction of a road, that is now in the interests of the great International road, they were recouped by the Dominion Government, and the Dominion Government having adopted that as their policy, we, in Ontario, similarly situated, have a right to demand similar consideration. I would here state that we have no disposition to raise sectional feelings, but we believe that we have a fair and just claim, and we merely ask for our rights, in the same manner as hon. gentlemen last Session felt disposed to demand their rights, with this difference, that we merely ask what they were in a position to demand from the Government last year under peculiar circumstances. Had the hon. gentlemen from Ontario who supported the Government had the same determination as the members from Quebec, we would not be in the position in which we are, but would have equal rights with the other Provinces. But I would give my hon. friend to understand that, although we may not be deprived of railway facilities at the present time, adequate perhaps for the wants of that locality, it is not from any aid or assistance that we have received from the Dominion Government, and I further claim that that locality would have had the same railway facilities whether the Government had assumed, as they did, in 1883, the control of all the roads in Ontario or not. That had nothing to do with the facilities we are now enjoying. That was not a part of their Act, to offer us any advantages or any benefits on account of their assuming those roads. Therefore, if there was any argument in what he said, though I do not think there was, it certainly would not apply, as far as that locality is concerned, as the people there had all these facilities regardless of the Act of 1883. Further, I suppose that hardly any members on that side of the House, those who were in the House during the last Parliament, would have recorded their votes for the agreement entered into between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway. I suppose the members supporting that bargain would not have supported it if it had been announced from one end of the country to the other, that not only the amount they were then granting to the road, but millions afterwards, would be demanded for the construction of that road, not only through the North-West but through the older Provinces of the Dominion of Canada. If that scheme had been presented to them, if the representatives from the Province of Ontario had known, as they now know, that the Government would have said: We must recoup the Province of Quebec for the amount of money it has expended, they would have hesitated before they recorded their votes. In the original agreement for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, it was not entertained that the Government should assist that company in the construction of roads through the older Provinces. I believe, and I have just grounds for believing, that it was no more than reasonable and fair to expect that, if this company built the road through the North-West Territories, they should seek to make connection with existing lines to convey the freight from the North-West Territory to the seaboard through the older Provinces. I therefore feel that the Government were not justified in the course they took, of granting aid to Quebec last Session; but, if so, I say their duty is now to deal in the same manner with the Province of Ontario as they then dealt with Quebec. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) and many of those who have spoken on the subject, seem to offer as an excuse, a reason and justification for the course the Government has been pursuing, that we at the present time, although the roads have amalgamated, although they have been assumed by the Dominion Government, as good if not better facilities are now offered to the municipalities than before that assumption by the Dominion. This has nothing to do with the subject under discussion. That is no part of the argument. No doubt those roads could have amalgamated; very likely they would have amalgamated, if they had remained under provincial control, and while remaining under that control, we would have had perhaps better facilities than existed prior to that time, on account of the roads with which they amalgamated offering better facilities for the traffic and the conveyance of freight. Therefore, that portion of the argument, amounts to nothing. My hon. friend from Algoma (Mr. Dawson) seems to think that he was justified when he was in the Local Legislature in opposing a grant to the Credit Valley, on account of its being a local road, and the section through which it passed being well supplied with railway facilities. But what was there stated very explicitly was that it was to be a road constructed for the purpose of conveying freight and traffic from Toronto westward, to offer cheaper rates and facilities, that they were not enjoying under the existing railways, the Great Western and the Grand Trunk. That road was serving a useful purpose; it was performing an important service in that section of the country. It may be at present performing as useful service under the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is now a part and parcel of that great trans-continental line, and must be the most important link in the traffic between the east and the west; because, I contend, as I have stated before in this House, that if you build the North Superior line, if you construct the line from Gravenhurst to Callander, and go around the north shore, the greater portion of the traffic will go by the Ontario and Quebec and by the Credit Valley westward, making its connection at Detroit, either with the Michigan Central or the Wabash road, and so getting to Chicago, and they will use this road all the year round, and will carry more traffic over it than over the main line. That being the case and the natural outcome of the construction of the road, I say that part of the road—the Credit Valley—if no other portion, will be entitled to consideration at the hands of the Government, similar to what Quebec received on account of that portion of its road assumed by the Canadian Pacific Railway. As an evidence of this, showing the intention of the Government, showing the object they had in view, during last Session they asked this House to grant a charter for the construction of a road, or a portion of a road, so as to reach Detroit. What object could the Canadian Pacific Railway have in view? Was it merely to have running arrangements with other roads? No; the object was to reach Detroit, and there to enter into an arrangement with the Wabash, or, very likely, to purchase it (as it is in difficulties at the present time), and reach Chicago over that road. When once there, they are quite safe in reaching the North-West, and then they will have one of the finest lines from the seaboard to the North-West, in an old section of country, that will always furnish them with a very large amount of freight; and that portion of the road, from Gravenhurst to Callander and from this point to the North-West, will, for a portion of the year at least, be comparatively of little use. I think that my friend from Monck (Mr. McCallum) should have been a little chary of his opposition on the present occasion. We know he had a seat in the Local Legislature; he occupied a position there at the time a large amount of money was voted by that Legislature for the construction of railways; and that he supported the Premier of the day in granting $1,500,000. Some of that money was not expended until a few years ago; the whole of it was not expended at the time he left the Local Legislature; but he supported the Government of John

Sandfield Macdonald; he aided and assisted the Province of Ontario in the expenditure of this money; he gave his countenance; he gave his vote. True, when the present leader of the Opposition formed a Government, my hon. friend then found he had granted a million and a-half and should not grant any more railway aid. He voted consistently every time from that day onward, that no more aid should be given to railways. Prior to that time he was not so careful of the people's money. He gave his aid and his assistance to the hon. Postmaster General on every vote that was recorded on that occasion, and they got the $1,500,000. Therefore, I say that he ought to have some consideration and some sympathy for the Province; he should have some consideration for the just claims of the people on whom he helped to impose the burden of $1,500,000. Since this system was adopted of granting aid to railways in the Province of Quebec, it was found that the time had come when a halt had to be declared. I must say that unless we come to some arrangement and settlement of this difficulty, this agitation will continue. I believe that those who put forward the claim for a recoupment of the aid they have granted have a just and fair claim, and it ill becomes any hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House to say that we make the claim for a political purpose. If we look at the individuals who have been down here on deputations, and the various county councils who have passed resolutions asking for recoupment, and the city councils who have sent in petitions to the same effect, we shall find that a majority of them are Conservatives and friends of the present Government. I therefore feel that they ought not, at the present time, to charge members on this side of the House with having a political object in view. The hon. member for Renfrew, as an illustration showing that the Ontario Government made no distinction in granting aid to roads, whether they were Dominion or local roads, referred to the Kingston and Pembroke Railway. I believe that was chartered under the old Parliament of Canada; and I know that when I occupied a seat in the Local Legislature, amendments to that charter were granted by that Legislature, and therefore it was considered in every sense of the word as a provincial road, and therefore the argument he attempted to base upon that road falls to the ground.

Mr. ALLAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words to advocate the wishes of the strongly Conservative county council of the county of Grey. At their session in June last they passed resolutions requesting this Government to take this matter into consideration, and to recoup those municipalities who had paid large sums as bonuses to the different railways. I think this House will believe me when I say that, so far as North Grey is concerned, this question is purely non-political. That county is more burdened with railway debts than any county in Ontario, in proportion to the value of the lands. It has given within a trifle of $700,000 in municipal bonuses to the various railways passing through it. I could mention one township which gave $55,000 in bonuses; and, Sir, to-day, I believe, such is the position of that township that, if the land were sold by auction, it would not bring an average of $15 per acre. Many of the townships in the country which value their property at $50, $60 or $75 per acre, are not indebted to the same extent. This county council, representing those farmers who are so heavily indebted, believed that the Government had established a precedent in recouping the town of Pembroke and the Province of Quebec last Session, and that they also had a just claim in demanding some remuneration to those farmers who had paid so liberally to railway bonuses in the county of Grey. I think the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) stated that it was a great advantage to us in having the railway changed from a narrow to a broad gauge; and I understood from his remarks that he insinuated that the Canadian Pacific Railway were the means of that change and of this advantage. Well, Sir, long before the Canadian Pacific Railway had an existence, or any intention of taking over the Toronto, Gray and Bruce, the latter company had broadened the gauge to the uniform gauge of the country. And, Sir, in addition to the bonuses which the Ontario Government had given towards the construction of that road, the municipalities along the line, which had given every dollar they could in bonuses, and in many cases more than they could afford, requested the Ontario Government to advance a still further amount to enable that company to broaden the gauge and place it in a position to be worked with the other railroads of the country; and the Ontario Government gave, in addition to the former bonuses the sum of $150,000, to enable that company to rebuild the road, before the Canadian Pacific Railway Company obtained possession of it. The hon. member for Cardwell mentioned that we were very anxious to place that road under the control of a Dominion line, and that we requested the Grand Trunk Railway to take possession of it. We acknowledge, Sir, that we were very anxious to get that road under the management of a large and wealthy corporation, and to-day we do not deny the fact that we are in a better position than we were before. We do not deny the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have added materially to the advantages that road confers upon the county. But, Sir, I endorse the sentiments expressed by the county council, to the effect that as the Government had established the precedent of recouping the Provinces for the bonuses paid by municipalities, we were undoubtedly entitled to a share of the reimbursements thus made by the Government. I hope the Government will take into their consideration the reasonable request of the county council, of Grey, and grant that aid to the farmers to which I believe they are thoroughly entitled. It was rather amusing, Mr. Speaker, to hear the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) advance the idea that we should be generous, and not try to create discord or jealousy between the Provinces. It is all very well for that hon. gentleman, after his Province has received all the loaves and fishes that have been going, now to ask the members from Ontario not to create ill-feeling by pressing their claims for an equal share.

Mr. FAIRBANK. The railway legislation of last Session not only added largely to the Dominion debt, but laid the foundation to many claims. While various municipalities are pressing their claims against the Government, I wish to file a small claim on behalf of the township in which I reside. I cannot contend that it is a very large portion of the Dominion, but it is an important one, particularly to those who reside there. It is so located, also, that its highways were constructed at considerable expense and are maintained at great cost. In addition to its ordinary expenses, it has contributed its proper quota to Dominion works, also to distant local railways, and has been forced to build its own railways or largely contribute thereto. This has been done to the extent of $30,000 by the township, including its town and village, and when these claims for recouping are being considered I want the township of Enniskillen to be remembered. I ask for this on what I believe to be a sound principle, and if the principal is paid we will not say anything about the interest. I wish for a moment to allude, although it has been mentioned before, to the manner in which the railway account is being kept with relation to Ontario, and in this connection I will quote no less an authority than the First Minister. During last Session, when railway aid measures were before the House, a discussion took place, in which that hon. gentleman said:

"If we look back for some years to the time when the original project of building the Canadian Pacific Railway was initiated, we find that Callander was selected as the most easterly point of that railway. It was chosen so long ago as 1872. It was then understood that because our ideas were not so large and our means were not so great, and the prospect of the development of this country was not so assured then as it is now—it was understood that under the terms of the arrangement with British Columbia the railway should start from British Columbia and come east until it joined the Canadian system of railways; and it was held that if the eastern terminus was fixed at Callander that would be a convenient point, where Toronto, which represents the great commercial portion of Ontario, could join it, and that the eastern portion of Ontario could join it, and that the eastern portion of Ontario and the Province of Quebec could work westward as fast as they could and all join at Callander."

Then he goes on to refer to the change made by granting aid to the railway from Callander to Pembroke, and says that "everybody of common sense must have seen" that the same aid must be given to the line to Quebec. On a former occasion I referred to the location of Callander, and I think I shall be justified in referring to it again. Hon. gentlemen opposite have forgotten where Callander is; or, more likely, they doubt that other people understood where it is, because it is argued that bonuses having been granted from Callander to Pembroke it became necessary to continue that bonusing on as far east as Quebec. But it should be remembered that Callander is located a few miles from Ottawa river, which is the boundary between the two Provinces, and it is continued down that boundary all the way to Pembroke. In whose interest was this done? Was it in the interest of Toronto, which is said to be the commercial centre of Ontario? Does it point towards Toronto? Does not every mile take it away from Toronto and lead direct to Montreal, the commercial metropolis of Quebec? It is said that it comes to Ottawa. It is true that Ottawa is all in Ontario. This argument is continually mentioned by representatives from Ontario. A somewhat broader view was taken by the late lamented member for Maskinongé (Mr. Houde), who, in referring to the Pembroke Railway, said:

"To the Aylmer and Pembroke Railway, $272,000, of which amount, as that road runs between the two Provinces, I will assign one-third to Ontario and two-thirds to Quebec"

This is the manner in which an hon. gentleman from Quebec treated the question.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). The fact is, that a portion of the road is located in the Province of Ontario.

Mr. FAIRBANK. Unquestionably; but the great proportion is so near the boundary that you can throw a stone into Quebec.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I am speaking of the road to which Mr. Houde referred. A part of it is located in Ontario, and the proportion is, as stated in that hon. gentleman's speech, about one-third.

Mr. FAIRBANK. The whole is on the boundary of Ontario which shows that he was more liberal than I have given him credit for being. Not only is the extension from Callander to Pembroke charged entirely to Ontario, although I have shown that it goes directly to Montreal and points away from the commercial metropolis of Ontario, but when a road which is constructed, leading to Toronto, that is, the road from Callander to Gravenhurst, it is also charged entirely to Ontario. The two distances would very nearly balance each other, one being 120 miles and the other 110. But hon. gentlemen opposite, following their leader and the ex-Minister of Railways, charged the entire amount of both of them to Ontario. But the charging does not stop here. The whole Canadian Pacific Railway on Ontario's soil and rock is charged to Ontario. I wish the people of that Province to understand thoroughly the manner in which this railway account is kept. Deputations are not told when they come here, as they did the other day, that their application is wrong in principle, but they are told that the Dominion has already given so much to Ontario there is no possible basis for a further claim to rest upon. It will be interesting to know to what is claimed the aid given it amounts to. We are given an idea of this in the speech delivered by the Minister of Railways last Session :

"Nor need I remind the House that in the carrying out of this great work of an inter-oceanic railway, we have provided for the rapid construction of no less than 650 miles of road from Port Arthur to Callander, involving the expenditure within the Province of Ontario of over $20,000,000 in connection with the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway."

The hon. gentleman also referred to the construction of the railway from Callander to Pembroke, and also to the construction of the Callander and Gravenhurst Railway. Adding the cost of these together gave a total of $22,780,000 as the expenditure within the Province of Ontario at that time. But you will have noticed in the discussion to-day that the amount has grown. We have heard of over $30,000,000 referred to. How does this come about? The reason is obvious. Last Session the calculations were only made from Callander to Port Arthur or Thunder Bay, but now we have the larger amount. The reason for this may be illustrated by a map which I hold in my hand. We find from this map that the boundary of Ontario was placed at Thunder Bay, or rather at a line drawn due north from Thunder Bay, near Fort William. It is clear and well defined, the color is clearly shown, and the name of Manitoba is clearly printed upon the map up to that line. I find this map was issued by the Department of Public Works and the name I find attached to it is "Sir Hector L. Langevin, K.C. M.G., C.B., 1883." I am not an authority upon colors. I do not think the color is "blue;" I think it is more of another color. In speaking further upon the question of railways and the obligations of Ontario, the First Minister remarked :

"But we cannot forget that all the advantages hitherto have been to the Province of Ontario, to my own Province. Why, Sir, the whole of the railway from Ottawa to the far North-West, until it strikes Manitoba, runs through Ontario; and besides the subsidies that have been given, the railway running round the north shore of Lake Superior has opened up a country magnificent in its future; magnificent forests have been found to exist there, and its mineral wealth is enormous; and, Sir, that whole country has been developed; the $12,000 a mile granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway, so far as Ontario is concerned, will pour an enormous wealth into her Treasury by the opening up of that country; good as we know, for its forests; good, as we believe, for its agricultural capabilities; good, as we believe, also, in its mineral resources; therefore, we are only granting justice to the Province of Quebec in paying them the same amount that we have done to the Province of Ontario.

We get from this an idea of the amount we have still to pay—we get an idea of the "development" of the county. We have some further information upon the county "developed" at a more recent date, from the chief organ of the Government in the Province of Ontario. I read from the Mail of quite a recent date:

"If it be said that the mountain section of the Northern Railway was more costly than the mountain section of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that in the case of the Canadian Pacific the heavy work on the Pacific slope has been assumed by the Government, the answer is that the Northern Pacific had no rock division, 650 miles long, such as that which stretches in unbroken desolation between Port Arthur and Callander."

That is the development which the First Minister speaks of. Justice is referred to very forcibly in the extracts I have read; and the question suggests itself, If the claims of last Session were simply justice, only justice, why did the Ministry, as has been said, "wait until the second bell had rung before they surrendered?" In stating the railway indebtedness of Ontario last Session at $22,500,000, and finding it now increased to over $30,000,000, we have a new showing of the watchful parental care which this Government exercises over that Province—a parental care which I fear will not be fully appreciated by that Province. Their desire to prevent the extension of the Province west of Thunder Bay seems to have been because they wished to prevent the increase of the railway debt of Ontario—because the further west we went the larger would our indebtedness become. I think that there is no doubt that our railway resolutions of last Session were a bad business, bad now, and bad in the future. We, on this side of the House, thought then it was a bad business; we believed that "anybody of common sense" must have understood it was a bad business. And what is the summing up of the whole matter? The Government had determined to give a large sum of money to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and it became necessary for them to give subsidies to Quebec, and also to partially sugar-coat the pill for the Province of Ontario, by giving them certain sums. But I think that in this matter we have got into a difficulty which it is hard to see the end of.

Mr. TROW. I would not have risen to my feet—for I am very diffident on this, as on all other occasions—had it not been for the remarks made by the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. White), and the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins), who apparently accused the mover of this motion of bringing up the resolution merely for some political purpose. Now, I know that was quite foreign to him, and that he brought it up for no such purpose, but merely in the interest of the Province of Ontario. It is a matter of indifference how long we discuss this matter on this side of the House, for we are unfortunately not in a position, in point of numbers, to bring that pressure on the Government which supporters of the Government may do, if they feel inclined, in a similar manner to that in which the supporters of the Government from Quebec did last Session. We on this side of the House attach no blame whatever to the supporters of the Government from the Province of Quebec in getting justice done to their Province. What we say is, that the supporters of the Government from the Province of Ontario are silent in the interests of their own Province. It strikes me very forcibly that those hon. gentlemen, even in the arguments they have used, have stood diametrically opposed to the interests of their own Province. It seems to me it would be better for them to take a leaf out of the books of the hon. members for Quebec, even if they had to retire for a few days or hours to No. 8, and deliberate calmly over the matter. It might happen that the leader of the Government would ultimately succumb to their persuasive efforts. My own county has probably done more than any other county in western Canada in the way of bonuses for railway construction. We have one line running from Lake Erie to the Georgian Bay, a distance of some 160 miles, and there is not a municipality on the line but has contributed very largely towards its construction. I know that the county I represent has given at least $350,000. The town of Stratford alone gave $60,000 to aid in the construction of that road; the county voted $120,000; the township of Mornington, $40,000; the township of Wallace, $40,000, and other municipalities corresponding amounts. So that if any county is interested in being recouped by the Government it is the county of Perth; and I do think the Government would be justified in giving these municipalities something in compensation, as they have done to other municipalities heretofore.

Mr. COOK. Before the motion is put, I wish to correct a statement made by the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. White). He stated that when that bonus was recouped to the town of Pembroke he had a larger majority outside of the town of Pembroke than I had in my whole county. He said he had the returns before him.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I said I had not the returns.

Mr. COOK. I saw a book that looked very much like the returns on your desk. But I want to tell the hon. gentleman that he was wrong. I do not suppose that he meant to state what was not correct, but he did not read rightly the returns, or if he had not the returns, he ought to have been more careful in making a statement without them. His majority outside of the town of Pembroke was 104; my majority was 138. There is only a difference of 34, but his majority outside of Pembroke was not as large as the majority I had in my county. The hon. member also stated that the Province of Ontario received large revenues from the late disputed territory.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). No; what I said was, that in that portion of the territory which was not in dispute a considerable amount of money had been received through the opening of the railway.

Mr. COOK. Well, they have been receiving something, but not very much, from the fact that lumbering operations are not carried on there to a very large extent. He also stated that the Pacific Railway developed that country very greatly, and I understood him to refer to the territory which has been decided by the Privy Council to belong to Ontario. I want to say that I do not think that road has developed that country, as regards the timber. Of course, it sent in a number of gentlemen there; John Shields and other men of that ilk have received from this Government large timber limits illegally in that section; but I do not think they have developed the country to any extent whatever. I have not heard of those parties having commenced lumbering there. There are a few companies operating there that were there years before this Government came into power. My hon. friend also said that this was a political move. Of course, he measures other people's grain in his own half-bushel. I suppose he knew it was a political move when the town of Pembroke was recouped to the extent of the bonus it gave to the Canada Central Railway. It was done just before the election, when the campaign was going on, and that was a very suspicious time. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) stated that the county council of Simcoe had sent a deputation here on a fool's errand. Well, I must protest against such language. I think the county council of Simcoe, although largely Conservative, with a majority almost two to one, is a very intelligent body of men, as intelligent a body of men as you will find in any county council, probably in any Legislature, in this country, although a large portion of them are Conservatives. I suppose my hon. friend has no kindly feelings toward them, from the fact that I believe he was at one time an aspirant for the position of reeve in one of the townships of the county, but they rejected him, and he wishes to take this opportunity now of paying them back, by giving them a slap in the face. I am obliged to the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), for endorsing the statement I made, that the county solicitor had drawn the agreement so loosely between the municipalities and the railway company that a coach-and-four could be driven through it. I am sure the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) will not thank him very much for this endorsement of my statement.

Mr. POPE. I have a few words to say on this subject before the debate closes. You would think, from what we have heard from the other side of the House, that Ontario was very unjustly dealt with. You would think that this policy was pressed upon Ontario by the lower Provinces, and particularly by the Province of Quebec. I fail to see that Ontario has been so very unjustly dealt with, though I can quite understand how this important delegation from Simcoe came here and pressed their claim for the return of the subsidies. Is there any one in the world who will object to take money when he can get it? That was their position. If money was due to them they were ready to take it; and they acted like gentlemen. But what is all this row about? Is there any man who can show me? I find that there are forty-two roads which have either declared themselves to be under the Dominion Parliament or that do not come under the operation of this Act. Then, I find that there are roads affected by this Act; and I wish the attention of those hon. gentlemen who have declared in this House, and who go into the highways and streets, declaring that they are ready and willing to do justice by everybody, and only want others to do likewise by them. I am not speaking of those roads in Ontario, which are themselves at liberty, under Provincial charters, to lease their roads or to lease other roads; nor am I speaking of the Grand Trunk or other roads enumerated in the Act of 1883 as coming under that Act. I am not speaking of those lines leased by the Grand Trunk, but of those which have not been leased, and come within this Act. Well, Sir, of those seventeen roads, how many do we find in the Province of Ontario? You will be surprised when I tell you that there are two roads affected by this Act, which these hon. gentlemen are making such a noise about, and only two. All the other roads which were chartered by Acts from the Legislature of Ontario amalgamated themselves with or leased themselves to the Grand Trunk or other leading railways before the Act of 1883 was passed. Now, Sir, of those seventeen, how many roads do I find in the Lower Provinces? I find fifteen—the Waterloo and Magog, the St. Martin's Junction, the South-Eastern, the Stanstead, Shefford and Chambly, the Quebec Central, the Quebec and Lake St. John, the Northern and Western of New Brunswick, the Montreal and Vermont Junction, the Montreal and Sorel, the Massawippi Valley, the Kent Northern, the Jacques Cartier, the Albert, the Chatham, and the Grand Southern. And yet you do not see them coming here. Now, I ask these gentlemen who get up here and declare that they are ready to pay every other Province, to step up and show that they are willing to do it. Let them put their hands in their pockets, and we are willing to meet them. I claim it is absurd for men to come to this House and ask to be paid back subsidies on account of the amalgamations of railways when, as a consequence of the amalgamations, they have much greater accommodation than previously, when instead of one train a day there are six trains a day. Let them go to the Lower Provinces, where the roads are four or five times as numerous, and recoup them.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 17th March, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that he had received from the Registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada, certified copies of the judgments and decisions of the said court in the election appeals relating to the electoral district of Levis, in the Province of Quebec, and the electoral district of the West Riding of Northumberland, in the Province of Ontario, by which judgments the elections in the said two electoral districts were declared to be void.

Mr. SPEAKER also informed the House that, in conformity with the Act, 37 Vic., cap. 5, sec. 36, he had issued his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, to make out two writs of election for the said electoral districts.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY—ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CURRAN. As the presence in so many button-holes of the green immortal shamrock indicates that this is St. Patrick's Day, I beg leave, without further preface, to move that when this House rises at six o'clock this evening, it do stand adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock in honor of the patron saint of old Ireland.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Mr. Speaker, —

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CASGRAIN. It appears to be the opinion that when I rise to speak in this House I ought to be shut down.

An hon. MEMBER. Shut up.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I do not intend to oppose the motion which has been made. On the contrary, I have a double reason for not doing so, because my children have some Irish blood in them. But that is not the point at present. I think the hon. member who has taken the lead in this matter has taken a part that should have been taken by the leader of the House; but as the First Minister is not here, though he ought to be here, if my hon. colleague from Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) will delay the motion until the First Minister is here, he will render me a service personally, and perhaps the public also. If he persists, I may not object at the present moment, but I will take an opportunity on another occasion to express my views. But I think he ought to accede to my request.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that the House go into Committee on Thursday next, to consider the following resolution:—

Resolved, That it is expedient that hereafter the officers and servants of the Library of Parliament should consist of:—

1. Two officers, one to be called the General Librarian, the other the Parliamentary Librarian, and to hold a joint commission as "Librarian of Parliament" and to have equal powers.

2. Two first-class clerks.

3. Two second-class clerks,

4. Three third-class clerks.

5. One chief messenger.

6. Three messengers.

Resolved, That the salaries of the officers holding said joint commission shall be fixed at sums not exceeding the sum of three thousand ($3,000) per annum for each officer, and that of the Chief Messenger shall not exceed seven hundred dollars, and that the salaries of the other officers and of the servants of the Library shall be fixed from time to time by Order of the Governor in Council according to the scale of salaries provided for in any Act or Acts relating to the Civil Service which may be in force at the time of passing the said Order.

Provided always, that the salary of any officer or servant now employed in the Library shall not be diminished.

Motion agreed to.

DISPUTED TERRITORY—INDIAN TITLE.

Mr. MILLS. I would like to enquire of the Government when we may expect to receive the information relating to Indian matters, correspondence between the Governments of Ontario and the Dominion, in reference to the Indian title to the disputed territory. These papers were asked for several weeks ago. We know the Government will make some claim to these territories adverse to the claims of the Province of Ontario, and we have no means, without these papers, of knowing the nature of their claims.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I will have the matter attended to.

TRANSLATION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I have been asked to draw the attention of the Government to the fact that the French versions of the Hansard and the Votes and Proceedings do not reach the press in due time. I do not say that is the fault of the Government, but simply call their attention to it so that it may be remedied. The French newspapers complain that they are four or five days late in getting their Hansard reports and Votes and Proceedings. Another grievance on the part of French-speaking members and the French Canadian press is that they do not get the French versions of the blue-books as soon as the English blue-books are issued.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) In answer to the hon. member, as to the remarks he has just made concerning newspaper men, I must tell him that this matter does not at all lay in the power of the Government. It is a matter which is altogether within the jurisdiction of the House and, therefore, application should be made to the House. There are committees appointed for that purpose and these committees are obliged to see that the both versions of Hansard should be distributed at the same time. As regards the hon. member personally, and also other hon. French-speaking members of this House, I must tell him that the returns brought down in the House are generally published in English first, and that, consequently, the translation must be made afterwards. That is the reason why these returns are not published in both languages at the same time. However, if the hon. member will recollect what has taken place during last Session and during the present Session, he will find that, in several instances, the two versions have been issued at about the same time. At all events, the moment the English version is issued by the members of the Government it is sent to the translators, and from that moment it is taken out of the control of the Government and is put under the control of the House. I answer in French to the hon. member because this matter concerns more especially the French members of this House.

REPORT ON MANUFACTURES.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I beg to call the attention of the Government and the House to a defect in the report relative to the manufacturing industries of Canada. I have perused this report carefully, and am unable to find in it any mention of the manufacturing industries of British Columbia. Although the commissioners went as far east as Prince Edward Island, the most western Province, the Province of British Columbia, is left out entirely. Why, I cannot understand. It cannot be because we have no industries there, for we have more industries in British Columbia than have some other Provinces which are mentioned in this report, and it therefore appears to me that a slight has been cast on the Province of British Columbia by this omission to pay a little attention to her industries, especially as the people of that Province pay more per capita into the Dominion Treasury than do the people of any other Province in the Dominion. Perhaps some hon. gentlemen opposite imagine that we have no industries in British Columbia, and to remove that impression I will refer to a few of them. We have the lumbering industry on a very large scale, our fishing industry, our canned fish industry, which is larger than that of the rest of the Dominion put together; we have the manufacturing of furniture industry, the organ factory, boot and shoe industry, cigar factories, sash and door factories, brass works, boiler yards, stove factories, glove and shirt factories, foundries, soap factories, marble works, carriage factories, several breweries, a ginger ale factory, and many others too numerous to mention, and I may say that within the last three or four years those industries have considerably increased in capacity, and it is in the interest of the Government and the country at large that something should be made known about them as well as about other industries in the other Provinces. Our coal industries also are of vast importance to the Dominion, giving as they do employment to hundreds of men. The area of our coal fields is immense, and the quality of our coal is unsurpassed. I sincerely trust that a supplementary report will be made and submitted to this House which will embrace the industries of British Columbia.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I can assure the hon. gentleman that if a supplementary report be made British Columbia will be included. The object the Government had in view was to obtain such information as could be secured between the first of June and the first of January, with reference particularly to the more important manufacturing centres. It was not intended to take in the whole of the Dominion, but only the principal manufacturing centres, and this will explain also why, as regards the Maritime Provinces, more prominence was given to St. John, Halifax and other leading points than to less central points. If any supplementary enquiry be made, of course it will embrace British Columbia.

Mr. BLAKE. I have observed the defect in the report to which the hon. gentleman alludes, but I have imagined a different explanation of it from that to which the hon. gentleman alludes. I thought that in the mind of the Government, their exports were entirely overshadowed by their great importing industries, especially the importing of Chinese.

DAILY ISSUE OF THE DEBATES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I desire to call the attention of the Hansard Committee to the fact that several journalists complain that they never receive the Hansard for a week after it is published. We agreed to give up one of our additional numbers for the sake of supplying the journals. If they are to be supplied at all, I think they should be supplied promptly.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). We did not agree as a matter of fact to give up anything. The Committee desired to give up one of the bound volumes in order to supply the newspapers. But the distribution takes place in the same way as the ordinary Sessional Papers, and sometimes some two or three papers or the issues of two or three days go out together, instead of one going out every day, as it should.

THE BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to ask the Government if they can give us any idea how long this protracted debate on the tariff will continue. I understand that a list of fifteen or twenty speakers has been made by the whips, and the people of the country are anxious to know when we shall get to business.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We have no rule for shortening the debates.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed adjourned debate on motion of Sir Leonard Tilley to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BURNS. Convinced as I am that the subject under discussion is pretty well exhausted, I rise with a great deal of diffidence, and feel that in doing so I am perhaps not only trespassing upon the patience and temper of the House and on our time here, but that I will cast but very little new light on any matter which has been referred to. The subjects which have been referred to by the Minister of Finance are certainly of very great importance, and have been very fully dealt with by members on both sides of the House. Every argument which has been advanced by gentlemen on the opposite side, every statement which has been made by them, not only in the present debate but in years gone by, has been answered not only by the gentlemen who sit on this side of the House but by the country, and by the country more than once. Therefore, as it would be only to take up the time of the House to again answer them, and as I am especially reminded of that fact by the enquiry just addressed to the Government by the hon. member for Northumberland, I will only occupy a short time as I am as anxious as any hon. gentleman can be to proceed to the serious business which has brought us here. There were a few observations made by gentlemen on the other side, which I can only characterise as reckless statements, which I think make it necessary that some one who is in some degree conversant with some of the matters referred to should make a few remarks in reply to them. The situation has been described by the hon. member for Queen's, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), and the hon. member for Queen's, New Brunswick (Mr. King), as grave and gloomy. They have told us that the taxation of the country is increasing. I think they went to the length of stating that taxation had increased at a greater rate than in any other country, at even four times the rate that it had increased in any other country. They stated also that the exodus was going on at a far greater rate than at any other period in the history of Canada, and many other things. I will attempt to show by some statistics that I have prepared that, so far as the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia are concerned—and it is to those two Provinces that I intend to confine my remarks—the gentlemen I have referred to, as well as the member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), who seems to pay special attention to those Provinces, are in error. They have attempted to show that previous to the election of 1882, the imposition of duty, or, as we say, the readjustment of the tariff, would have the effect of crushing the industries of those Provinces, that the effect of the National Policy would be to injure the lumber trade, to injure those engaged in the fishing industry and those engaged in farming. The statements which I will read to the House will go to prove I think that under the operation of that policy, those special industries have not been destroyed, but that on the contrary they have increased and prospered. We find a large increase in the exports of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. We find that in 1878, the export of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia amounted to $13,768,810, and in 1884, under the influence of this National Policy, which was to crush out the lumber trade and the fisheries and the farming industry, they had increased to $17,352,428, an increase of $3,583,618 in the short space of six years. I might remind the House that this increase is made up altogether of the very things which this policy was to stamp out of existence—lumber, and the products of the fisheries, and the produce of the mine and the product of the farm. In 1878 the export of fisheries from New Brunswick and Nova Scotia—for I take them together—amounted to $5,197,840. In 1884, they had increased to $6,213,152, or an increase of over a million dollars. The product of the mines in 1878 was exported to the extent of $652,231, while in 1884 it had reached $954,980, or an increase of $302,749. The lumber exports of 1878, from those two Provinces were $5,573,469, and in 1884, under this National Policy they had increased to $7,317,647, or an increase of $1,744,178. Grouping together the agricultural and animal products, we find that in 1878 the exports were $910,252; in 1884, $1,697,130, or an increase of $786,878. The gross increase in the exports of minerals, fish, lumber and farm produce from 1878 to 1884 was $3,849,117. Now, Sir, if the National Policy was so disastrous in its effects as those hon. gentlemen prophesied it would be, some years ago, and as they assert it is to-day, I ask why it is that our exports of products have gone on increasing? In proof of the fact that our increased exports have been productive of an accumulation of wealth to the country, and as some proof that the wealth of the country has increased, I propose to read some figures with reference to the state of those Provinces as regards the amount of extra capital which they have now compared with that which they had in 1878. In 1878 the balances in the Government Savings Banks in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island were $4,371,310.60; in 1884 they had increased to $12,212,675, or an increase of

$7,840,765. The paid-up capital of the chartered banks was $5,794,760 in 1878; in 1884 it was $6,380,246, or an increase of $585,486. The gross deposits in chartered banks in 1878 was $5,816,212, while in 1884 they were $9,753,446, or an increase of $3,937,234. I ask, is that any proof that the condition of those Provinces is less favorable under the influence of the National Policy, that they are less wealthy and less prosperous to-day than they were in 1878? I will take one industry alone which, in the elections of 1882, we were told would have to bear the heaviest burthen under the National Policy, and that is the fishing industry. That is an industry with which I am well acquainted; an industry in which the people of my county are more directly concerned than in any other; an industry which gives employment in the county I have the honor to represent, as well as in other counties of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, to a very considerable portion of the population. Now, Sir, in 1878, the amount of capital invested in fishing material—exclusive of the capital invested in fishing craft, boats and schooners, which is a very large amount—the capital invested in those two Provinces at that time was a little over $200,000. In 1883, which is the latest date up to which I can find any reliable statistics, the capital invested was $1,200,000, or an increased investment in that industry of over one million dollars. The value of the fish caught in 1878 in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia was something over $7,600,000; and in 1883 it had increased to very nearly $11,000,000. Taking the amount invested in fishing material in the year 1878 and the value of fish caught in that year, we find they represent the sum of $7,872,741; while in 1883 they reached $12,043,183. Speaking specifically, the increase in the value of materials in 1883 over 1878, was $956,490; and the increase in the value of fish caught was $3,213,952, making a gross increase of $4,170,442 in that industry alone. That, Sir, is exclusive of a very large increase in the amount of capital which we know as a matter of fact had been invested in the building and fitting out of schooners and boats with which to prosecute that industry. Now, Sir, after referring to those special industries in which New Brunswick and Nova Scotia are more largely interested than any other Province of the Dominion, I may be permitted to make reference to the cause of the depression—to make the same reference that has been made by gentlemen on both sides of this House. The depression in trade in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, if any depression in trade exists, is only in one or two particular industries, but mainly in the shipbuilding business. To a certain extent there is a depression in the lumber trade, but that depression is not in the direction of any decreased output, or of any decreased export, but it is in the direction of lower prices for our products. But while that industry may be affected in this respect, and while our lumber may be bringing a less price to-day than it did in former years, every person engaged in that industry, every person outside, I may say, of the shipper, the farmer who sells his produce to the lumberman and the man who works in the woods, in fact everybody connected with that trade, from the farmer to the manufacturer of the lumber—every person, I think I can safely say, with the exception of the shippers, has derived large gains from that industry during the last four years. The shipbuilding industry is, no doubt, very depressed, and I see no reason to hope that so far as wooden ships are concerned that trade will be revived. The days of wooden ships are gone by, and we are brought face to face with the fact that in the future the carrying trade of the world will be done by steamers, or if not altogether by steamers then by iron vessels. To show to what extent steam vessels are superseding sailing vessels I will quote to you some figures which I have prepared as showing the amount of tonnage arriving from sea in the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, in the years 1878 and 1884 respectively, and it will show the large increase of steam tonnage over sailing tonnage. In 1878 the number of steamers that arrived in the ports of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia was 1,040, with a gross tonnage of 635,457. In 1884 the number of steamers was 1,528, with a gross tonnage of 1,081,163, showing an increase in number of 448, and of tonnage 440,706. The number of sailing vessels that arrived in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia ports in that year was 5,637, with a gross tonnage of 1,132,899. In 1884 the number of sailing vessels had increased very considerably; but, as you will notice, the tonnage had increased but very little. As against 5,637 sailing vessels in 1878 there were 7,324 in 1884; but as against 1,132,899 tons in 1878, there were only 1,213,456 tons in 1884, showing a very slight increase in tonnage but a decided increase in the number of vessels. At this point let me give to the House my idea as to the cause of the increase in the number of vessels without any corresponding increase in the tonnage. The explanation to my mind lies in this fact, that the increased number of vessels which arrived was largely made up of fishing and coasting vessels, vessels of very small tonnage; because, if you take the number of vessels in connection with the extra tonnage, you will find that the vessels only averaged about 50 tons each. So we have, comparing 1878 with 1884, an increase in steam tonnage of 440,706 tons, and an increase in the tonnage of sailing vessels to the extent of 100,557 tons. This will go to show, as I have stated, that steam tonnage is rapidly superseding sailing vessels, and that the decline in shipbuilding in the Maritime Provinces is not due to any cause we can control or due in any respect to the effects of the National Policy. I hope to live to see the day when we, being determined to keep pace with the age and retain for ourselves the large carrying trade we have enjoyed for so many years, and which we still continue to enjoy to a very great extent, though to an extent rather more limited than heretofore, will be building not only iron sailing ships but iron steamers and in that way showing our determination to maintain our place as the fourth or fifth maritime power in the world. I may be pardoned if I refer in this connection to the increase in the fisheries that has taken place in the county which I have the honor to represent; for disguise it as we may, while we are disposed to take a statesman-like view of questions and view them from a national standpoint, we are disposed to look at what more immediately concerns us and at the state of affairs which exists in the locality in which we have special interest. I find that in the County of Gloucester the value of the fish caught in 1878, added to the value of the fishing material was $544,000. In 1883, only five years afterwards, it had reached $700,000, or an increase of over 25 per cent. in that brief period. If the fisherman is so oppressed as hon. gentlemen opposite would lead us to suppose, and would lead the fishermen to suppose, I ask, why have they gone on year after year adding to their production and their wealth? An hon. gentleman opposite asked, what have the Government done for the fishermen; what have they done for the lobster men? My answer to that hon. gentleman is this: The Government of the day, owing to the large increase in the revenue of the Dominion, were enabled to devote $150,000 a year as a bounty in order to stimulate and develop our fishing industry. That is what the Government of the day have done for the fishermen and lobster-men of the Maritime Provinces. The Government have, moreover, given to those engaged in the lobster industry free tin. They have also given free salt, free lines, and free twine.

Mr. VAIL. They already had it.

Mr. BURNS. Admit that the fishermen always had free salt. But if we were to believe what hon. gentlemen opposite asserted time after time, if we were to believe what hon. gentlemen opposite stated during the campaign of 1882, the fishermen would be taxed on salt and on everything else that entered into their industry. I recollect very well that during the campaign in New Brunswick that was one of the strongest points which hon. gentlemen opposite attempted to make. They said to the fishermen, if you go for the National Policy and return members pledged to support it, you will find not only that lines, twine and everything else you consume and use will be taxed, but salt also.

Mr. VAIL. That is not so.

Mr. BURNS. I have a lively recollection of what occurred during that time. It was distinctly stated that a tax would be placed on salt.

Mr. MILLS. And you said the producer pays the tax.

Mr. BURNS. I did not say that the producer pays the tax. The Government have given the fishermen and lobstermen of the Maritime Provinces, as well as people in other parts of the Dominion, not only the articles I have mentioned duty free, but also free tea and free coffee. We know as a matter of fact that tea is almost a necessary of life, and that it enters very largely into the consumption of the lumbermen and fishermen; and were it not perhaps for the National Policy which obtained from luxuries a sufficient amount of revenue, we would have been unable to get free tea and free coffee.

Mr. FORBES. How about free meal and free flour?

Mr. BURNS. I say that practically in New Brunswick we get free flour. The number of barrels of flour imported from the United States into New Brunswick is very small as compared with the quantity we receive from the Upper Provinces. And I ask these gentlemen who asked that question, Has the 50 cents per barrel imposed on flour, increased the price of flour to the consumer to that extent? I answer most unhesitatingly, no, it has not; and for this reason, a reason which has been cited more than once, that so long as we have in Canada a surplus product, so long will we not feel the effects of the imposition of the duty. We might as well say that the imposition of a duty of a dollar a thousand on spruce deals—of which my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. King) is quite au fait—would enhance the price to the extent of the extra dollar. An hon. gentleman on the opposite side has asserted with that recklessness which characterises many of the assertions of the gentlemen on the opposite side, that there are thousands out of employment in the Maritime Provinces. I ask him, did he consider what he was going to say before he made that statement; did he ask himself, Is the statement I am about to make a correct one? I challenge hon. gentlemen to prove that to-day there are thousands out of employment in the Maritime Provinces. No such thing, Sir. On the contrary I assert that to-day the workman of New Brunswick is in as good a position, if not in a better position, than he has been at almost any time in the history of New Brunswick. I say that to-day the farmers of New Brunswick—and the farmers form a large proportion of the population of that Province—are in as comfortable circumstances as they ever were in the history of that Province; that to-day they are getting as good prices for their products as they ever got, when you take those prices in connection with the prices of the articles which that farmer has to buy. I say that the purchasing power of the farmer's money, of the artisan's money, of the laborer's money to-day is greater than it has been at almost any time in the history of the Maritime Provinces. Not only did the hon. gentleman assert that thousands are out of employment in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia to-day, but he went further and asserted that the laborer and the artisan of England were in a better position to-day than at any time before this. I ask these hon. gentlemen if they have read what has been published at a very recent period of the troublesome times they have had in England—of the number of unemployed in the great manufacturing city of Birmingham, or in the city of London? If they have read those reports, they are the best answer that can be made to the assertion that the laborer and the workman of England are in a better position to-day than at any time heretofore. Now, Sir, in this country labor—to quote the language used by the hon. member for Queen's—is in this position: A man can get an honest day's wages for an honest day's work, and with that honest day's wages he is enabled to buy sufficient food and clothing for his family to live in comfortable circumstances—far more comfortable circumstances than the laboring men can in that great country of free trade—England. Let us contrast the position of the laborer of this country with that of the laborer in England a little further. You will find, Sir, that here he lives in a style entirely different from that in which the laborer of England lives. What are considered every day necessities of life here, are denied the working men of England. The food which is considered a luxury in England, is here considered an article for use every day and hour. We find, Sir, that in comparing rates of taxation in the two countries, hon. gentlemen opposite steer clear of telling this point; they fail to tell us that while England has free trade—a policy from which I say she is suffering—taxation there is far greater than it is in this country. It is not necessary for me to enter into details; I think they have been produced for the information of this House before. It is enough to say in general terms—enough to make the statement which I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to deny, that the rate of taxation in free trade England is much greater than it is in Canada. We have in this country no such thing as an income tax, or at least not one which bears the slightest resemblance to the tax so called in England. My hon. friend the member for Queen's, New Brunswick (Mr. King), in the statement which he made to the House the other night, rolled up a very large bill against the Upper Provinces. In his efforts to show that New Brunswick was heavily taxed he went into calculations showing the increased amount we have to pay to Quebec and Ontario for their manufactured goods. The same hon. gentleman would have us believe that it was our interest to trade with the United States; he would have us believe that we could buy goods more cheaply in the United States than we can in Canada, and yet we find that in the United States those goods were produced under an impost much heavier than exists in Canada to-day. The hon. gentleman must have been driven to his wits' end to make out a grievance for New Brunswick when he showed that a large amount was due New Brunswick, because of the higher prices we had to pay for the productions of Ontario and Quebec. True, he said that state of things existed only in the earlier years of the National Policy, and that to-day we are buying those goods at a very moderate price. Is it not better that we should buy our manufactured goods from Quebec and Ontario—assuming for the moment that we are not able, as hon. gentlemen say, to compete with those Provinces in the production of manufactured goods—is it not better to buy from Quebec and Ontario than from the people of the United States, who are strangers to us? I remember, Sir, reading a speech delivered by the hon. member for Queen's, I think in 1879, in which he made the statement that if the Government wished to depopulate the country they had only to apply the National Policy. Now, Sir, has that statement been verified? Has the country become depopulated? Is New Brunswick depopulated under this tariff? I see my hon. friend nodding—making that assertion by a movement of his head. Now, Sir, if the country is depopulated why is it that by the last census the population of the country has increased? Why is that so much wealth has been accumulated? Why is it that the savings of our people in both the savings banks and the chartered banks are much greater now than they were under the larger population, as my hon. friend would have us believe. My hon. friend stated the other night that while New Brunswick and Nova Scotia in 1882 supported the National Policy by sending representatives here to support the Government which instituted that policy, a change has come over them since that time. I ask him, Sir, where is the truth in that statement. Did the county of York at a very recent date say that the people there had changed their minds? Did the county of King's, shortly after the general election, when my hon. friend behind me had to face the music of a second election, say that it had gone back on the National Policy? Did the county of Albert, which for the second time since 1882 sent a representative to support the Government, say that it had changed its mind on the National Policy? No, Sir; on the contrary, not only in New Brunswick, but throughout the whole Dominion, the National Policy continues to be endorsed by the people. My hon. friend in his speech the other night referred at great length to the report of the commissioner on the manufacturing industries of the Dominion, and tried to make a point by showing that in the town of Woodstock the new industries started since 1878 gave employment to 113 extra hands, receiving $510,000 in wages. In that way he attempted to throw discredit on the whole report. I do not think the hon. gentleman did himself justice on that occasion. It is quite evident that that statement is either a misprint or a clerical error, because if you turn to the general comparative statement on pages 130 and 131, you will find the increases correctly given. According to that comparative statement the county of Carleton, Woodstock in particular, is shown to have had in 1878, 318 hands employed, receiving a yearly aggregate of weekly wages of $128,174, whereas in 1884 there were 475 hands, receiving $165,365.22. Now I find that in the whole Province of New Brunswick in 1878 there were employed 11,974 hands, while in 1884 there were employed 14,035, showing an increase of 2,062 of hands employed in our manufacturing enterprises, notwithstanding that trade was in a depressed condition and that our factories have been stamped out of existence by this National Policy. We find also that while in 1878 the yearly aggregate of weekly wages paid in the Province was $4,680,641, in 1884 there was paid an aggregate of $5,298,754, or an increase of $618,113 during those five years. An hon. gentleman on the opposite side, I think it was the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), stated that the Government had broken faith with the country because it had failed to get reciprocity of trade with the United States. I do not think, Sir, that that gentleman was warranted in making that statement. I have seen no evidence to lead me for a moment to believe that the Government have broken faith with the country. On the contrary, I believe that the Government at every favorable opportunity has done all that it honorably could do to secure reciprocal trade relations with the United States. When the National Policy was introduced, and when the tariff framed under that policy was made, we find, as part and parcel of that measure, that a law was placed on our statute book authorising the Governor in Council by proclamation to admit the natural products of the United States duty free whenever the United States would open its doors and admit our natural products duty free. We know that since that time every reasonable effort that we honorably could make has been made to induce our friends on the other side of the line to enter into freer trade relations with us; and Sir, I believe it is not in the interest of Canada, or in accordance with the dignity of the country, that we should make any greater efforts in that direction than we have already made. When the United States desire to trade with us, they will find that we are willing to trade with her. But in connection with this matter, I might, with the gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, draw the attention of the Government to the necessity of continuing their exertions and making greater efforts to secure for the Maritime Provinces reciprocal trade relations with a market which to my mind would be more advantageous to us than that of the United States, that is, the market which can be had in the West Indies. While it is not a matter of vital consequence to the Maritime Provinces to secure that trade, it is a matter of very great consequence indeed, and I do not think any member from the Maritime Provinces is travelling outside of a proper line when he expresses the opinion that the Government of the country should be fully alive to the necessity of making a treaty with the West India Islands that would open to us the markets of those islands for our products. We in the Maritime Province produce largely everything which the West Indies require and consume. Our principal productions are lumber, fish, and farm products. We produce everything they require in these lines, and we consume their productions, so that a treaty which would be fair and beneficial to both sides might be made. I repeat that the Maritime Provinces expect that the Government will continue to use every legitimate effort to secure for us that trade. The hon. member for Queen's (P.E.I.), in his allusions to the United States, made the statement that the greatness of that country could be attributed to this fact, that there were no custom houses from the extreme north to the extreme south—or from the extreme west to the extreme east, or between the States. That is exactly the state of things that exists in Canada to-day. That is exactly the state of things we wished to bring about when we entered Confederation to have free intercourse between the Upper and the Lower Provinces and that we have secured. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that the natural market of the Lower Provinces is the United States. Is the United States any more a natural market for the Lower Provinces than England is for the Western or the Southern States of the American Union? Yet though the Southern and Western States, to which the tariff of the whole Union applies, find their largest market in England, no prominent man in the United States would say that because the Eastern States do not furnish the Southern and Western States with a market, their productions should not be protected. We find that the union of the Maritime Provinces has had the result of bringing about the very state of affairs alluded to by the hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies). We find that the trade among those Provinces has grown very largely and continues to grow. Let me repeat here a statement made in another place, that, though it may not be apparent to most minds, yet it is a fact that the trade between the Upper and the Lower Provinces, so far as the productions of the Lower Provinces are concerned, is growing very much, that the goods consumed by the Upper Provinces and which are brought from the Lower Provinces amount to a very large sum. In one year the amount increased some $250,000. I know that in the article of fish alone, there has been an increase of 40 or 50 per cent. during the last five years, and that with the opening up of the North-West, with the general binding together of the country and the increase of population, the Maritime Provinces, if they cannot compete with the Western Provinces in the matter of manufacturing goods, can, at all events, send them their natural products. After the period of depression will have passed away, and when the demand for manufactured goods becomes greater, it will be found that the Maritime Provinces will be able to manufacture not only the goods they consume themselves, but will also be able to manufacture goods for the supply of the west. We will have a revival of business. This period of depression, which is not confined to Canada, but extends to every country in the world, and notably to free trade England, will become a thing of the past, and we will have an improvement which, I think, will satisfy every reasonable man that the influence of the National Policy has not all events been injurious. I labor under the very great disadvantage that so much has been said on this question that it is difficult to make a new point, and therefore I hope the House will overlook the very imperfect manner in which I have put my views before it. I rose more especially for the purpose of controverting the statements made by the hon. gentlemen from New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and I hope I have succeeded in showing that the Maritime Provinces are not in that gloomy serious condition in which they would have us believe them to be. I believe on the contrary that during the past five years, the period in which the National Policy has been in operation, the various industries of the Maritime Provinces have gone on prospering, the people have accumulated a very large amount of wealth and have reason to be hopeful for the future. I have reason to believe that not only in the staples of lumber and fish their position will improve, but that they will be able, by their energy and through their proximity to the sea to, compete with the older Provinces in manufactured goods.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has devoted a good deal of time to showing that the Province of New Brunswick is much more prosperous now than it ever was before, and that the prosperity of that Province is the result of the National Policy. What industries does he cite to prove this assertion? What statistics does he give to prove that the National Policy has been a success? Has he given the statistics of manufacturing industries? Not to any extent; he attributes the increased prosperity of New Brunswick chiefly to the increased prosperity of the farming, fishing and lumbering industries. He is the first gentleman I have ever heard in this House assert that those industries were in any way favored by the National Policy, or that their prosperity could be taken in any way as a proof of the success of that Policy. What has the National Policy done for the exports of farm products to the foreign markets? Has it improved the foreign market? Has it obtained the entry of these goods into the United States at a lower duty than formerly? Has it increased the demand for them in the United States? Has it increased the demand for fish in the United States? We all know that the success of the fishing industry depends entirely upon the American market. What has been done in that respect for the fishing industry by the National Policy? We know that at present our fish is admitted free into the United States; we know that this free admission will cease next spring, but we do not know that the Government have taken any step towards securing a continuance of the treaty, or towards substituting a new treaty which will continue to the fishermen of New Brunswick the privilege of free admission of fish into the United States. It may be taken for granted that the Government have taken no such steps, because if they had they would have been certain to tell us and take credit for it, and the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces must condemn the policy of inaction of the Dominion Government, and demand that some steps be taken to assure the continuance of the privileges which they now enjoy. This leads me to what the hon. gentleman has said about reciprocity. He says the Government have done all they could to obtain reciprocity. I thought he was going to make some ministerial revelations, because we had never heard of any steps being taken by the Government to that effect, but he went on to explain that all the Government had done was to put a provision in our tariff laws authorising the Government to abolish Canadian duties when corresponding duties were abolished by the United States. That is what he claims is doing all the Government could do to obtain reciprocity. Now does the hon. gentleman suppose that reciprocity is obtained simply by making an official arrangement like that in our tariff laws? The hon. gentleman must know better than that; he must know that it is necessary to send an ambassador to a foreign country with authority to agree upon the terms on which a reciprocity treaty can be entered into. That was the course adopted when the late reciprocity treaty was secured, it was the course adopted by the Government of my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) when they sought to obtain reciprocity with the United States, and it was a course which succeeded, so far as the negotiations with the Government of the United States was concerned, the treaty having been afterwards blocked by the United States Senate. It is not the people of the Maritime Provinces alone, although they are specially interested in this matter, who will call on the Government to carry out the pledges they have made with regard to obtaining reciprocity. The great end and aim of the National Policy, it was said, was reciprocity. In the historic National Policy resolution, it was formally declared that the effect of the National Policy would be ultimately to bring about reciprocity with the United States. That was regarded as the climax of all the perfections of the proposed policy, and that was the main argument used to induce the people of Canada to adopt a policy which, in other respects, was admittedly hostile to many of their interests. What has been done? What negotiations have been opened with the United States? What commissioner has been sent there to treat with them? What attempt has been made even to meet them half way? We find even in the President's message this year that it is the policy of the United States to obtain reciprocal treaties with the other nations on this continent. We do not find that the Government has been meeting them half way. If it has been taking any steps in that direction, if it has been carrying out its pledges, it is time that it should make the country aware of it, because the expiration of the Washington treaty during the coming spring will intensify the desire which exists in many parts of Canada to obtain a treaty of this kind. But no doubt the statements of the hon. member for Gloucester will be dealt with in greater detail by those who are more familiar with the local interests concerned, and I shall pass at once to consider briefly the points brought before us by former speakers. I cannot do better than commence with the remarks of the hon. Finance Minister himself, the great authority on all questions of finance, the great oracle on all questions of policy. That hon. gentleman this year, as usual, opened his Budget with a great flourish of trumpets. He was going to prove to this House, to make the House and the country believe, that things were in a very prosperous condition generally. He opened his speech with a remark of that kind, but as he went on, we were led to think that the flourish of trumpets was intended to conceal the emptiness of the Budget itself which he was to disclose to the House. He posed, as he has always posed hitherto, as the prophet—I might say more than the prophet—the high priest of the National Policy. He stood before us with all the fervor of a new convert in that attitude. We know he is a convert, we now that not many years ago he was an opponent of protection, and we know that a new convert is always more fervent than an old and steadfast believer. He has shown us that fervor this year in the capacity of a new convert.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. I hope hon. gentlemen who make those sounds on the other side do not wish to ridicule the position of the Finance Minister.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. I know it is an awkward position for the hon. gentleman to be placed in, and I hope they will spare his feelings and not make any more of those noises. In that capacity of high priest, he has felt it his duty to explain the perfections of the idol, of the deity he worships, and he has clothed that deity with all the perfections that are possible; he has not only told us the actual perfections of the creature, but he has been carried away by his brilliant imagination, and the whole of his utterances in reference to it has been that of an enthusiastic devotee rather than the calm and staid utterances of a Finance Minister. Let us see how he proceeds. I find, on looking at his speech, that it is not only in respect of his fervor, and of his devouring admiration of the deity he worships, that he represents a false prophet or a high priest of the old pagan times, for he is like Mahomet, he is getting new revelations all the time. He has a new revelation this year, which is that it is possible to increase the expenditure of this country without increasing taxation; in other words he set out with the declaration that, although we spent a great deal more now than under the old régime, it costs not simply no more, but in fact the magnificent amount of $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per head less than under the old régime. In dealing with a statement of this sort, we must, I think, adopt the plan which Mark Twain and his comrades adopted when travelling in the Holy Land. After detailing some tremendous yarns which they heard from their Arab guide, Mark Twain says: "We managed to believe the yarn by dividing it up amongst the seven of us." No one of them believed the whole, but by dividing it up amongst the seven they managed to believe it. So, with the whole of the Finance Minister's statement. He may think that, if they were divided up amongst the Opposition, or if they were unequal to the task, the whole House, they might be able to believe his statements. For instance, he tells us that the increased expenditure on public works and harbors is \$1,910,256 since 1878. He says himself it has nearly trebled, but it has not cost us any more than it did in 1878. He goes on to defend his action in spending three times as much as his predecessors. He says:

"But who will say that, if the Government or the country has a surplus sufficient to induce Parliament to vote some of the money for the construction of public buildings, for the improvement of harbors, and the navigation of our rivers, the Government is not justified in spending in that way? These works and buildings, you may say, Sir, are the assets of the Government and the public."

This is just what we used to argue when he boasted of his surpluses, that it did not amount to much, because it was merely an inducement to extravagance, and here he boasts of this expenditure and asks: Who will say, that, if the Government or the country has a surplus, they are not entitled to spend it for all sorts of purposes? He does not go on to show us that these expenditures were necessary, or that they are returning us a fair profit. He says they are assets. On the same principle you could wipe away the whole debt of this country and consider it as nothing. If you can treat an expenditure as nothing wherever you have some asset to show for it you might wipe out the whole debt of this country, because for the whole debt we have some asset or other to show in which the money has been sunk in different amounts. As to this particular statement, that it cost less to provide this amount of $2,908,851 than it did to provide the third of that amount six years ago, I do not think I can believe it, I do not think I can believe even my fair share of it as a member of the Opposition, one seventieth part of it. Then he goes on to tell us that the taxation per head has been reduced. He says the total taxation from 1874 to 1879 was $93,295,770, and that the deficits were $4,818,000. He adds the deficits to the expenditure, with which mode of book-keeping I shall not quarrel at present, and assuming the population then to be 4,021,000, he makes the taxation $4.88 per head. But we come to the taxation for his own five years. He says that, for these five years, the amount was $157,687,879. Now, on the face of it, there is an increase in the total taxation of $64,392,109—during these 5 years, or an average of

\$12,878,500 per annum. He assumes the population now to be 4,364,800 or an increase of 343,800. Now, Sir, we find the population in those years has increased nearly $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., while the taxation has increased 65 per cent. according to his own figures; and yet he asks us to believe that the taxation per head has not increased, although the increase in taxation has gone on eight times as fast as the increase in population. Now, Sir, this is a still less credible statement than the former. I not only fail to believe my due share of it as a member of the Opposition, but I cannot believe the 211th part of it, my proportional share if it were divided among the whole House. I believe if you scatter it broadcast through the country and lay that statement before every individual in the Dominion, you will not find half a score who could believe the five-millionth part of it. Now, in estimating this taxation per head he goes on to play some remarkable tricks with the \$20,000,000 surplus he claims to have had during those five years. He says the surplus should not count, that it is no part of the taxation, and therefore he proposes to take the \$20,000,000 of surplus from this \$157,697,000 of receipts. Now, why should not the surplus count as a part of the taxation? Is it not contributed by the people? or is it manufactured in the Finance Department? Did the astrologer in that Department find it somewhere amongst the stars, or is it one of the manufactured products of the National Policy? I do not think so. I think every dollar of that \$20,000,000 came out of the pockets of the tax-payers, came out of the general business circulation of the country; and that it is as utterly unsound and baseless a proposition to say that does not form part of the taxation of this country, as to say that any other part of that taxation, no matter how directly collected, no matter how immediately expended on public works, should not be considered as such part of the taxation. But he is not content with this. He takes the surplus away once from the total tax receipts of the country, and then he takes it away again from the total expenditure of the country. He has put down \$137,258,000 as the total expenditure for those five years, and he takes the surplus away again from that and leaves \$117,000,000; and by some further operation that I do not understand he gets rid of another \$13,000,000 of this expenditure and comes down to a figure of \$104,293,934, which he calls the "necessary taxation" of the country for those five years. I do not know how he has got rid of this last \$13,000,000. Perhaps the figures in the Hansard have been misprinted and that has misled me; I have not seen the corrected copy, but at all events those are the figures given in the Hansard report of his speech. But I take his own word for it that that was all the taxation that was necessary for these five years. If we subtract that from the amount of taxes actually received—for all receipts are taxes in one shape or another—from the sum of \$157,678,879, we find over \$53,393,000, which the hon. gentleman himself confesses and declares was not necessary taxation during those five years. Now, Sir, the result of his wonderful juggling with the surplus is to show that he took from the pockets of the people \$53,393,000 in those five years more than he considers was necessary. The hon. gentleman is a master of figures, no doubt. He has a complete mastery of these figures; he can prove what he likes with them; he can make them do or say what he likes; and I am only sorry he did not carry the same process further and prove to us that during these last five years we have had no taxation at all. It would have been just as easy, just as logical, and just as correct as to put forth the argument he has made to this House. Now, Sir, let us take the true facts in regard to this question of taxation. Let us take the total amount of money received from the people in these five years of \$157,687,879, and divide it by the population which the hon. gentleman himself estimates at 4,364,000; and we find that the taxation is

$7.34 per head, or an increase of $2.35 per head over the taxation imposed by the late Government. Now, Sir, this amounts to $11.75 a year for an average family of five persons, and to $58.75 per family for the five years. Now it is right the people should know this; it is right they should know how much the hon. gentleman and his National Policy have cost them. It will be perfectly legitimate and in order for me then to try and show them that he has been worth what he has cost; but when he tries to show them that he has not cost them anything, he is taking an unfair, an illogical, an incorrect, and an unbusinesslike view of the question. I must say that his argument in regard to our taxation and expenditure has been sufficiently ingenious to prove to the House that he felt himself in rather an uncomfortable position; it has been ingenious enough to show that he made an effort to explain away a prima facie case, as it appeared to an impartial observer; but has not been ingenious enough to produce the desired impression, and he leaves us with the conviction that he found himself in a tight place and has not been able to see his way out of it. We come now, Sir, to take a little note of the changes which the hon. gentleman proposed to make in the tariff. He has proposed to relieve the poor man to some extent from the burdens laid upon him by his heavy system of taxation. How does he do it? He puts woollen rags on the free list. What does this mean? What do people import woollen rags for? Woollen rags are imported to make shoddy. What is shoddy used for? It is used to manufacture shoddy cloth. Why is it used to manufacture shoddy cloth? Because it is cheaper than wool; and the hon. gentleman is putting on the free list an article for the manufacture of shoddy cloth to be allowed to come in here free in competition with home-grown Canadian wool. He is protecting the farmer by allowing woollen rags, the refuse of all the beggars in Europe, perhaps, to be brought in here free in competition with our home-grown Canadian wool.

An hon. MEMBER. Along with small-pox and cholera.

Mr. CASEY. Yes, Sir, attention was called to that point the other night. It is a very serious matter that these rags may be the means next summer—and are certain to be if the season proves as sickly as is expected—of importing cholera and small-pox into this country, and the hon. gentleman's proposal specially to encourage an importation of this kind is one that I can only characterise as monstrous.

Mr. BOWELL. How long have they been on the free list?

Mr. CASEY. I do not know how long they have been on the free list. The resolutions propose to amend the tariff of Customs duties by adding to the free list a number of articles amongst which I find woollen rags. It appears that they are now admitted free by Order in Council. I do not know how long they have been so, but I suppose the fact of taking an article off the list of articles which were admitted free by Order in Council, and putting it upon a list of articles which are admitted free by Statute, means the perpetuation of that free admission, means that it has become a settled policy of the Government to admit woollen rags free. I congratulate them, Sir, upon the heroic resolution they have shown in coming to that decision. They have also come to the heroic decision to perpetuate the free admission of musk in pods, a boon, no doubt, to the laboring man of Canada, to the horny-handed son of toil, but opening up again a most injurious competition with the native musk-rat. Then we have another article which is to be admitted forever free of duty, an article which is mysterious in its nature and uses—foot grease. I do not know why the hon. gentleman did not put hair oil on the same list. If foot grease is to be free, I do not see why hair oil should not likewise be free.

Mr. BOWELL. Do you know what it is?

Mr. CASEY. No, I want to be informed on that point.

Mr. BOWELL. I am quite sure you would not talk such nonsense if you did.

Mr. CASEY. No doubt the Minister of Customs knows what it is, but I am very sure that the Finance Minister was quite as much puzzled as myself by this item when it was first presented to him as one which should go on the free list. Then there is the item of "locust beans for the manufacture of horse and cattle food." I have urged from time to time that Indian corn should be admitted free of duty for use as cattle food, not as artificial cattle food, but in its natural state. I have urged that for the benefit of our farmers, who are largely engaged in fattening beef for the English market. While that relief has been denied, this foreign material, locust beans, is going to be admitted free for the manufacture of artificial cattle food. It is quite evident that the proprietor of some artificial food has got this item inserted for his own benefit. I cannot go through all the items intended to alleviate the lot of the depressed working man of Canada. I might mention fancy grasses, precious stones,—agate, amethyst, aqua marine, crysolite, crosordolite, emerald, sapphire, topaz, turquoise; I will not read the list because I might seem to be reading a description of the Heavenly city from the Holy Book, and I will not appear to be guilty of such irreverence. But it is quite evident that with such material free of duty the cotton operative who has long been desirous of a holiday, as one of the Conservative papers tells us, will employ a large period of his well-earned rest in accumulating sets of precious stones which he will now be able to import free under this arrangement. One point is righted by these changes. We have time and again urged that it was unfair to tax the cheap stoneware imported for the poorer classes at as high a rate as the china and porcelain imported for the rich, and this wrong has been righted. How has it been done. Has the duty on the cheap stoneware been deducted? No. The duty on china and porcelain has been brought up to the same point, 30 per cent. The Government have followed the system of levelling up instead of levelling down. One or two factories have possessed too much influence to allow the Government to reduce the duty on the common ware, so the duty had to be put up on china ware to make it equal. A friend of mine was once travelling in an island which shall be nameless, but where the people are very witty, and he saw an inhabitant actively digging up the earth floor of his cabin. My friend said: What are you doing? The inhabitant replied: "Sir, I am raising the ceiling of my house." He was raising the ceiling by digging out the floor. By some such humorous method of how to equalise things or to get rid of acknowledged inconveniences the Government have equalised the poor man's duties with the rich man's duties, by retaining them in the former case, and increasing them in the latter. I want to pay a little attention to the hon. and eloquent member for King's, New Brunswick (Mr. Foster) who treated us to a very interesting lecture the other evening on everything connected with this subject. He began by saying that we complain about monopolies, and that he had to go back to the days of Imperial Rome to find a parallel to the monopolies now in existence in Canada, if we were to be believed in regard to that matter. He said if our statements were true, there was no comparison except the state of affairs when the publicani, the farmers of Rome's public revenue were sent to distant colonies to exact what they pleased and return part of their ill-gotten gains to the public treasury. I thank the hon. gentleman for the illustration. I do not think he could have more forcibly illustrated the way in which protective taxes are collected. They are collected indirectly through a class of farmers of the public revenue. The manufacturers are given a bonus by protective duties and put in their own pockets in the shape of higher prices as long as the protective action of the tariff really subsists as large a proportion of what is collected, if not a larger proportion, than that which goes into the public Treasury. The system of collection of revenue by protective taxes is similar in wastefulness to that which obtained under the old Roman Empire, and in some cases equally oppressive to the people taxed. The hon. member for King's went on to tell us that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had made the subject of the balance of trade a hobby-horse, that he had dragged it into the discussion and had tried to make a great deal out of it by showing that a balance of trade against us indicates a state of things inconsistent with prosperity. But it was not the hobby-horse of the hon. member for North Norfolk; it was the hobby-horse of the Finance Minister. It was the Finance Minister's hobby-horse some years ago, when the balance of trade was in our favor. I was going to say he rode it to death, but he did not quite ride it to death; he rode into a very comfortable place for himself and then turned it out to grass or stored it in a lumber room. At all events he did that which is usually done with a worn out hobby-horse; I do not know exactly what, as I never had one. In order to show to whom the ownership of this now despised animal belongs, I will quote some remarks made by the Finance Minister in regard to the balance of trade at the great Conservative convention, held in Toronto on March 1st, 1881. The hon. gentleman said:

"During the last two years we have nearly equalized our exports with our imports.—Cheers. Whatever free traders may say, our people cannot understand the theory that the larger the excess of our imports over the exports the more prosperous is the country. We say that as with the individual so with the nation; and that if he expends more than he receives poverty stares him in the face. If on the other hand his receipts exceed his expenditure his condition is hopeful. The latter is the position of the Dominion if we take into account our receipts for freights.—Cheers.

The Conservatives cheered these utterances at that grand Conservative convention. But hon. gentlemen opposite do not cheer these statements now. I have read them with as good emphasis as I could possibly use so as to afford hon. gentlemen opposite an opportunity of cheering the statement of the Minister of Finance; but they do not cheer worth a cent. That hobby-horse has been ridden to death; all that was possible has been got out of it, and now it is cast aside. The balance of trade is now against this country, and instead of that being an evidence of poverty, it is now regarded, I suppose, as one of the most hopeful signs in our financial and commercial condition. The hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster) went on to call us to account for asserting that certain wonderful things had been promised as results of the National Policy. he said that we could not prove by a responsible member of that party that it was promised that we would have continuous prosperity if the National Policy came into force, and he played the neat little oratorical trick of calling upon us on the spur of the moment to produce documents to prove our assertion that such promises had been made. Well, we do not go about all the time with our pockets stuffed with such documents, but it is not because they do not exist, and I will give him specimens of one or two of them. On July 2nd, 1878, the Mail, which I suppose he will admit to be a responsible organ of the party made some assertions like these:

"Our manufactories of locomotives and cars are amongst the things that were"—

How are they now, Mr. Speaker? I think I can ask you with some confidence that you have a knowledge as to how our manufacturers of locomotives and cars are at present, for in the city in which you reside is the largest manufactory of locomotives, I believe, in the Dominion. I had the pleasure of inspecting that manufactory during the latter part of last summer, and I found that splendidly equipped machine shop, which is capable of turning out I do not know how many locomotives per year, which is capable of employing and did employ about 500 men, had not a single locomotive under construction, and only 45 men employed. They were not doing locomotive work at all in that shop, but were doing odd jobs for the Quebec waterworks or some other waterworks—something entirely out of the ordinary run of their business and unconnected with the making of locomotives. They had several locomotives on hand already made, which they could not sell even at a reduced price. That is the condition of our manufactories of locomotives at the present time, and though I have not visited the car factories I understand that they are not in a much better position. The Mail goes on to say:

"Our woollen mills, our machine shops, our publishing houses, one by one go to the States, drag out a languid and debt-burdened existence, or collapse. * * * This is undoubtedly what the Government [Mr. Mackenzie's] intended, and so far they have reason to be pleased, but there have, unfortunately for them, appeared some disagreeable concomitants of the situation on which they did not calculate. * * * In due course of their scheme thousands lack work in Montreal and Toronto."

How is it now? Do not thousands of men lack work in Toronto and Montreal at the present moment? Ask the people of Toronto if that is not the case and if they are not contributing money for the support of those who are out of employment. Ask the people of London, a comparatively small city in Western Ontario, but one in which the manufactures are pretty large in proportion to its size. Are the people out of work there? Ask anywhere you like in Canada, and you will find that thousands of people are out of work. The article goes on:

Workmen's families live two and three in a house to make up the rent. many have exhausted their savings last winter and know not how to face the next. Our townsmen who still remain have little money to buy farm produce.

How is it now? Have they much money to buy the farmers' produce, and if they have, why is it that the price of farm produce has been reduced instead of increased?

On the other hand the States under our Free Trade system send in what produce they choose. Between the two, the great majority of our farmers get poor prices or no prices for cattle, butter, cheese, pork, oats, wheat and many other articles.

The two things which kept the price of butter, cheese, etc., low, were according to the Mail, the poverty of the workingmen and the fact that the Americans were able to send in their produce free of duty. Now that has all changed. The Americans do not send in their produce free of duty, and hon. gentlemen say that the workingmen have lots of money, but how are the prices of these articles? The price of wheat on that very day was 90 cents per bushel; in May of the same year it was $1.50 per bushel, a figure which it has not reached since, and is not likely soon to reach. It is now under 80 cents in Toronto. As to butter and cheese, the National Policy could have no effect, because no change has been made on the duty on those articles. The Mail of the same day quotes from the Sarnia Canadian:

"The price of wool this year is one of the farmers tribulations. For the very best article he only gets 22 cents. Across the river the price is 32 cents. * * * Our wool on being exported to the United States pays a duty of over 50 per cent., added to the price here brings the figures up to what is paid in Port Huron. Our wool growers are entirely at the mercy of the Yankees. Our Government does not protect our farmers, and wool is allowed to come into Canada free of duty. A Government that would submit to such injustice does not deserve the confidence of the people."

The Mail quotes that and puts it in a prominent place. What have the Government done? Have they dared to tax the kind of wool we import? No, the woollen manufacturers will not let them tax wool, and American wool, Cape wool, and Australian wool, the kinds used by our manufactures come into Canada free; we are still at the mercy of the American and foreign producer, and we can still say "that any Government which would submit to such injustice does not deserve the confidence of the people." It has been asserted time and again that we should have protection on the kind of wool our manufacturers use, so as to induce our farmers to grow that wool, and yet at present, with wool at 18 cents per pound, cheaper than when this wool went up, there is no duty on that kind of wool. The farmers of western Ontario at any rate are beginning to grow short wool in considerable quantities, and a duty on that kind of wool would raise the price to the full extent of that duty, and yet the farmer is denied this protection as an offset to the increased price he has to pay for his goods to the woollen manufacturer. I now come to a speech made by the Premier himself at Parkhill, on July 3rd, 1878, when he quoted an old story which had been told him by a friend when he was making a speech in Peterborough in 1872:

"A very good friend of mine, a great personal friend, who is what we would call a Grit—said to me the other day: 'What fortunate fellows you are, Macdonald. Here you are with everything prosperous around you, the sun shines on you, our fields are teeming with prosperity, and everything is smiling on you; while in days of old, when our friends were in the Government, we had clouded skies and dried up fields and no crops.' 'Sir,' said I, 'it only shows you that Providence is on our side, and if you are a wise man, and a prudent man, if you wish a continuance of the same skies and of the same rain and of the same crops, you will keep us where we are. Be sure, my good friend, the weevil will come again with the Grits.' He was very nearly a prophet for although the weevil did not come the Colorado bug did, and he did not know that that insect was a greater favorite with farmers than the other."

With regard to the Colorado bug I must join issue with the Right hon. gentleman. The Colorado bug did not come in with the Grits; it was in full force in my section of the country in this very campaign. It was one of those Yankee importations, like the National Policy, which have been brought over by the Conservatives from the other side, and which have done us so much injury. As to the weevil coming with the Grits, we have not seen one in our part of the country from 1857 until this summer and last, when two-thirds of the crop was eaten by them, and therefore we turn the tables on these hon. gentlemen and say that the weevil comes in with the Tories. In connection with the assertion that Providence was favoring them, the right hon. gentleman went on to say:

"We were going to have a big crop now, although there was a Grit Government in—but that was because the Grits were going out. The clerk of the weather was a good sound Conservative, and he took good care of the crops, knowing that a Conservative Government was going to get the advantage of them after the next election."

Well, Sir, they had not imported Wiggins at that time, and I do not know whom he referred to as the clerk of the weather. At all events it is quite certain that Providence did give them every chance in the way of good crops, good climate and productive soil, to show what was in them and their policy; and what has been the result? Is Providence with them now? Do the skies smile on them as of old? Do prices keep up to their old figure? Have they reason to say, in regard to the poverty and destitution of the working people, that Providence is smiling on them and averting misfortune from them? I do not think they have. If hon. gentlemen are going to make that the test of the soundness of their policy, it is condemned at once. That good Providence who favored them has gone against them, finding them unworthy, and is teaching them the lesson that He has taught more than once to men He has favored and put in high positions. We read in holy writ of men whom Providence has favored and raised to a great height of prosperity, in order that he might cast them down from the greater elevation; and I think that hon. gentlemen will find that the kindness that Providence has shown them will be turned into condemnation in the long run, and that they will say very little of the favor of Providence at future elections. But, the hon. gentleman said:

"The National Policy would build up cities everywhere; and instead of having to send to a foreign country for so many goods, we should have our clothing made from wool of our own production, and our shoes made out of our own leather."

How much Canadian wool is made up into cloth by Canadian manufacturers?

Mr. FARROW. Lots of it.

Mr. CASEY. Well, the hon. gentleman had better go and consult the owners of the blanket factory at Cornwall, who gave evidence before the Committee on the State of Trade a few years ago, and he will learn that Canadian wool is used almost solely for the manufacture of blankets, coarse rugs, one or two kinds of carpets, and things of that kind. With this exception, and with the exception of small local factories, where a few hundred yards of cloth are woven for the neighboring farmers, Canadian wool is not used in Canadian manufactures to even as great an extent as was the case ten or twelve years ago. As to making shoes out of our own leather, the tanner has a protection, but the farmer has none. Foreign hides from South America and from the ends of the earth are allowed to come here to enter into competition with our own production. If that is what the hon. gentleman meant by making clothing out of our own wool and shoes out of our own leather, I do not think it is a very great gain to the farmer. But now we come to a very sarcastic remark of the hon. gentleman. He said:

"Mr. Mackenzie had said that he wanted to make this a very cheap country to live in. Well, when wheat was down to half a dollar a bushel, and barley down to a third of a dollar, and oats were 10 cents a bushel, this would be a cheap country to live in. But he did not know that that was exactly what the farmers wanted. (Great cheers). He could tell them that it was not what the manufacturers wanted, for when there were good prices there was plenty of business, and when there was plenty of business prices were good. The workingman, too, if he got a fair day's pay for a fair day's work could afford to pay a liberal price to the farmer; and the farmer could afford to pay a liberal price to the manufacturer if he got a fair price for his products. Where cheapness was the chief characteristic of a country, that country could not be prosperous."

The hon. gentleman was very sarcastic and very severe on my hon friend (Mr. Mackenzie) who sits in front of me, about making this a cheap country to live in. He said cheapness was inconsistent with prosperity. Now, what has been the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite during this whole debate? Why, that things are cheaper than they used to be—that sugar and woollens and cottons are cheaper than they have ever been before; and we know that wheat and barley are cheaper than ever before. If cheapness is inconsistent with prosperity I leave him to judge what must be the condition of the country to-day. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman was not content with the declaration that the policy of the Grits was keeping us down, and the policy he proposed would raise us up, but he compared Canada with other countries. At the Amphitheatre in Toronto, on the 31st of July, 1878, the First Minister said:

"We must grow up manufactures by a judicious system of protection, and if we do, the laborer and the workingman will get employment. If we have only a sensible system of protection, if we have only a common sense system of law, we will find that the workingman and the capitalist will work together, and this country will blossom as the rose. If you desire this country to prosper, if you desire it to rise out of the slough of despond into which it has sunk, if you desire to see manufactures arise, to see labor employed—if you desire to see the value of land arise, if you desire prosperity, you will support the National Policy, and say we must have Canada for the Canadians."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. I am glad to hear hon. gentlemen applauding. We shall hear how they will applaud when I finish the quotation. After referring to the United States, which he said was underselling England at home, he said:

"If we can do this, and in our own modest way, encourage our manufacturers by reasonable protection to supply our four millions—our increasing millions, for they will rapidly increase under a system of protection—we shall then be able to do what the United States are doing now, export the surplus of our manufactures at a cheap rate, sell in foreign markets, and establish a foreign trade."

Is that a definite promise, or is it not? Hon. gentlemen have cheered when I have read that the workingmen would get employment. Well, the workingmen have got employment part of the time; there has been a boom in industry part of the time; but hon. gentlemen opposite know, as well as I, and the workmen know better than I do, that they are not employed more than they were under the former régime. We all know that these promises have not been carried out, that prosperity has not been continuous, and we know particularly that this promise that we could export the surplus of our manufactures at a cheap rate to foreign markets has the effect of casting ridicule on the whole system of the National Policy, now when we are able to compare the results with that promise. Exporting to foreign markets! Why, only a few months ago, when the cotton millers found a plethora of goods on their hands, they talked about exporting; they considered whether they could sell any of their goods to other countries at cost, or even slightly under cost, and they found they could not. They concluded it was better to shut down and limit production for a time, until the home market would revive. To talk about exporting to foreign markets, when these very goods are made dearer by the system under which they are produced, is absurd. I do not know that I need quote anything further. These quotations alone show that the right hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald), the author of this policy and the man who carried it into effect, did make promises of great and continued prosperity, which have not been carried out. It is my duty, as a representative of a farming constituency, to consider how far the tariff benefits the farmer, if I can find it benefits them at all. I have been trying to find out whether it does or not. I have made a couple of tables of the relative prices of wheat and barley at a few points in the United States and Canada, so situated that the comparison of the different prices is a fair one. I take the prices of wheat at Chicago, Oswego, Toronto, Detroit and London. Of course Chicago and Detroit are a great deal further west than London and Toronto, and the prices there should be lower than the prices at Toronto and London, to the extent of the difference in freight. The prices at London and Toronto should be higher than those at Chicago and Detroit, even if there were no duty at all, on account of the difference of freight. Let us see if that is the case. The following table shows the rates at each point on the different dates mentioned:

I have given the range of prices for all classes of wheat because I have found it impossible to always secure quotations for the same grade of wheat at all these markets. It is clear from this table that not only has the duty not increased the price of wheat in the Canadian local market, but that owing to some cause—I do not say owing to the National Policy—but owing to some cause which the National Policy is powerless to overcome, the price of wheat have been kept lower in the Canadian markets than in the American markets situated further from the sea coast. It may be that the tax on coal has made the cost of freight so much higher on Canadian railways that they cannot afford to compete with the American roads. I do not say that that is the cause, but it looks as if it were one cause; but whatever may be the cause, the effect exists and it is injurious to the Ontario farmer.

Mr. O'BRIEN. What was the feeling in the country when there was talk of taking off the duty last year? Was there not a general outcry against it?

Mr. CASEY. There was no outcry in my part of the country, because our experience is that the duty does us no good. There may have been an outcry in some parts of the country, but the figures I have quoted show that the duty, on the face of it, is no benefit to the farmer.

Mr. HESSON. Was not the difference greater four or five years before the duty was put on?

Mr. CASEY. I have found that on looking back four or five years a difference did exist, sometimes to the same extent, and sometimes to a less extent, and the inference I drew was, that the wheat duty has no appreciable effect on the prices of wheat in the Canadian market. Barley is another staple about which we heard a great deal when the National Policy was in discussion, and thousands of farmers favored it, under the idea that it would in some way improve the price of barley, but the following table will show how unfounded that idea was

There is a wonderful break at times in regard to quotations in the Belleville Intelligencer, which I consulted as being a good Conservative newspaper.

Mr. BOWELL. A thoroughly reliable paper.

Mr. CASEY. Yes, when it makes statements at all; but it would appear that when the prices of barley were low it gave no quotations. Now, Sir, here is a difference of 10 cents to 25 cents between the prices at Belleville and at Oswego. The duty on barley is only 10 cents a bushel. The difference cannot be accounted for by the freight between these two points which are so close together; and it is clear that barley is higher in Oswego compared with Belleville, even with the freight and duty added. Perhaps the Intelligencer will find it convenient to explain here the great difference which exists between these two points. In connection with this question of how the tariff affects the farmer, we must consider not only the wheat duty, but the flour duty. The hon. member for Gloucester has told us that the flour and wheat duty does not affect the people in the Maritime Provinces; that it does not cost them anything; that it does not raise the price, because we export a surplus. That is a good free trade doctrine in theory, but there are circumstances known to the people in the Maritime Provinces which prove that it is not true in practice as regards those Provinces; and if the hon. gentleman will consult his friend, the member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), who was very indignant when a flour duty was alluded to the other night, he will find that the duty does mean something.

Mr. MITCHELL. What is that?

Mr. CASEY. I was saying that the hon. gentleman could point out the effect of a flour duty.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is quite unnecessary; you are doing it so well.

Mr. CASEY. It is quite unnecessary to say more, as between the arguments which I am able to present to the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Burns), and the snub he has just received from the hon. member for Northumberland, he will be able to see that it does mean something.

Mr. MITCHELL. This conversational style of debate is not very—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. This conversational style of debate gives me—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I rise to a question of order. I rose for the purpose of saying that this conversational style of debate prevents my hearing references to myself and my county. I asked the hon. gentleman to explain what he had said, because, in consequence of the conversation going on all around me, I could not hear what he said.

Mr. CASEY. I was not disturbed by the hon. gentleman's interruption. It is rather pleasant, in the course of a long speech—

Mr. MITCHELL. Make it shorter then.

Mr. CASEY—to have an interruption, and I hope the hon. gentleman will favor me again, and whenever I have anything to say about the Grand Trunk shareholders, I will call his attention to it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope you will make it a little more clear than you have the flour duties.

Mr. CASEY. An effort has been made by some of the millers to have an increase in the flour duty. The Millers' Association, I believe, have tried to obtain it. The singular fact stares us in the face that the Finance Minister has not chosen to deal with the question in his Budget Speech. We are pretty certain that it is before him for consideration, and it is certainly usual, when a change of that kind is contemplated, to refer to it in the Budget Speech—either to indicate that the change will take place or that the request has been refused. However, I am bound to say that the principal millers in my own county have not chosen to sustain that demand. I have written to them to get their opinions, and they have intimated that they do not care for any change, unless it amounted to a dollar a bushel.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. A dollar a bushel.

Mr. CASEY. I should say a dollar a barrel. Because they say, in effect, that the American millers have the opportunity of selling their finer grades in the Eastern States, and with the high prices obtained for these, and with access to the finest qualities of western wheat at low prices, they are able to sell inferior grades to the constituents of my hon. friend from Gloucester and my hon. friend from Northumberland, and quite undersell the Canadian miller by selling the inferior grade cheaper. If the Ontario miller were allowed to import these grades of American wheat at reduced rates, to mix with the better quality of our wheat, they could keep their mills going the whole year and could supply their Lower Province customers at a lower rate and with better flour. I have not investigated this argument to its utmost extent, but I intend to lay the arguments of my milling friends before the Government and to ask them to come to some decision on the subject. I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

House adjourned at six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 18th March, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

TERRY DIVORCE BILL.

Mr. TAYLOR moved first reading of Bill (No. 97) for the relief of Fairy Emily Jane Terry—(from the Senate).

Motion agreed to, on a division.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. MULOCK moved first reading of Bill (No. 98) to amend the Acts respecting Controverted Elections. He said: This Bill is to repeal section 1 of 39 Vic., cap. 9, which has been found not workable, and substitute what I hope will be found workable machinery for it. Under section 1, 39 Vic., cap. 9, provision is supposed to be made for proceedings against third parties, which the courts have held to be unworkable, and recently the courts of the Province of Ontario, have recognised some of the regulations of the Legislature of Ontario as workable and have proceeded under them. It is to some extent incorporating those provisions in lieu of our own. It is a matter of practice, not a matter of principle.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

TEMPERANCE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. BOURBEAU moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 99) to amend the Canada Temperance Act, 1878. He said: This amendment is to authorise the priest and the minister, in a parish where it is required, to grant a certificate for medical purposes. The second part of the Temperance Act of 1878, section 99, sub-section 4, says:

"Provided also that the sale of intoxicating liquor for exclusive medicinal purposes, or for bonâ fide use in some art, trade or manufacture, shall be lawful only by such druggists and other vendors as may be thereto specially licensed by the Lieutenant Governor in each Province, the number not to exceed one in each township or parish, nor two in each town; and in cities not exceeding one for every 4,000 inhabitants; such sale, when for medicinal purposes, to be in quantities of not less than one pint, to be removed from the premises and to be made only on the certificate of a medical man."

By the amendment that I introduce, it will be provided that the priest or the minister serving the parish where the person requires the liquor will be able to grant certificates.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

WORKS ON NAVIGABLE WATERS.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 101), to amend the Law respecting bridges, booms and other works constructed over, or in navigable waters under the authority of Provincial Acts. He said: The object of this Bill is to correct an error that occurred when a certain Bill was passed, in the clause giving power to the Governor in Council to make rules and regulations in order that the works on navigable waters might not interfere with navigation, or, when the plans were approved and the site selected, if obstacles were found to be created by such works, by such Order in Council the company or party having so erected a work over a navigable water might be compelled to remedy the evil caused by such work, and this is to reinstate the power.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE FACTORY BILL.

Mr. BERGIN. The Factory Bill has been printed in English and to-morrow morning, we are assured by the printers, we shall have the French copy. Large demands have been made by members and by parties outside of the House—manufacturers and workingmen and workingmen's associations and others—for copies of the Bill, and we require to get the authority of the House for the printing. About 500 copies will be required. I move that 500 extra copies of the Factory Bill be printed for general distribution.

Mr. SPEAKER. This motion goes to the Printing Committee without being put.

FLOODS ON THE RICHELIEU RIVER.

Mr. BÉCHARD asked, Has the Government received any petitions or memorials from riparian owners on the Richelieu River complaining that the piers constructed in the said river, near the Town of St. John, by the Stanstead, Shefford and Chambly Railway Company, raise the waters of the said river, and that their lands are consequently flooded, and praying for relief? If so, have any measures been adopted or are any measures to be adopted for the relief of the petitioners?

Mr. POPE. There have been some petitions received, but the Government have not come to any decision in reference to the matter.

EXPORTS OF CANADIAN PRODUCE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What is the total amount of goods the produce of Canada (not including short returns) exported from the 1st July, 1884, to the 1st March, 1885? Total amount of same goods exported from 1st July, 1883, to 1st March, 1884?

Mr. BOWELL. The total amount of goods the produce of Canada, exported from the 1st July, 1883, to the 1st of March, 1884, was $56,861,122, and from the 1st July, 1884, to the 1st March, 1885, $56,347,281.

LICENSE COMMISSIONERS IN ESSEX.

Mr. LISTER asked, Have License Commissioners been appointed under the McCarthy Act for the county of Essex for the current year? If so, state name and date of appointment of each commissioner.

Mr. COSTIGAN. No new appointment has been made. If any changes have taken place, it will be with regard to the second commissioner, who might be the warden of the county. He would be subject to election, and there might be a new commissioner without any departmental action.

INSPECTOR OF WOODSTOCK, N.B., DOMINION BUILDINGS.

Mr. IRVINE asked, Who was the inspector of Dominion building in Woodstock, N.B., during its construction? What was the date of his appointment, also salary received up to date, and the rate per day? Is he still employed on said building?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The inspector of works was Mr. J. P. Fletcher who was appointed on the 1st June, 1883. The salary paid to date is $1,575. The rate of payment is $75 a month. He is still employed, as the fittings and the heating apparatus are not quite complete. His services will be dispensed with at the end of the month when the work is completed.

Mr. MACKENZIE. When will the general return asked for as to the names and salaries of all inspectors of public works be brought down.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I suppose it is being prepared now. I will enquire.

Mr. BERGIN,

Mr. MACKENZIE. It was moved for three weeks ago, I think.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It has not been brought down?

Mr. MACKENZIE. No.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will enquire.

INSPECTION OF FACTORIES.

Mr. BERGIN, on the Order for Committee of the Whole to consider resolutions to provide for the appointment of inspectors and medical inspectors of factories, being read, said: I propose to ask the Government to allow this to stand, for the reason that until the principle of the Factory Bill is affirmed by the House, it cannot be discussed. As this Bill is a very important one, and is looked upon with very great interest by the country, and is a Bill which is looked for with great anxiety by the manufacturers and by the working classes, I would ask the First Minister and the permission of the House, that on Wednesday next it should be made the first Order of the Day. This would ensure its being carried through this Session, and, I know, would give very great satisfaction both to the House and to the country.

Mr. BLAKE. If it stands in its present priority it will come up first next Wednesday.

Mr. BERGIN. No, it would not; there will be so many before it.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman should observe it is at present a Notice of Motion.

Mr. BERGIN. The motion cannot be discussed until the principle of the Bill is affirmed.

Mr. BLAKE. I understood it was the motion the hon. gentleman was speaking of.

Mr. BERGIN. No, it is the Bill; I want the Bill to be made the first Order of the Day for Wednesday next, or Wednesday evening; and when the principle of the Bill is affirmed by the House, as I feel it will be, then the motion can be discussed in its usual place.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There can be no objection if it is the general consent of the House.

Mr. BERGIN. I will move, therefore, that Bill (No. 85) respecting factories, be the first Order of the Day for Wednesday evening next.

Motion agreed to.

MILITARY MAGAZINE AT ST. JOHN, N. B.

Mr. WELDON moved for:

Return of all properties owned by the Government for military purposes in New Brunswick, disposed of or leased since the transfer from the Imperial Government; the parties to whom sold and at what price, and as to leased properties, to whom leased, for what period and at what rents.

He said: I wish to call the attention of the Department to the situation of the powder magazine at Fort Howe, in the city of Portland, N. B., coterminous with the city of St. John. Many years ago the barracks were situated at that place, and after the barracks were moved to their present situation at the lower end of the town, the magazines were stationed there, and during the time the Imperial troops were stationed at St. John the magazines were guarded by the military. After the Imperial troops departed the guard, of course, was taken away, but the magazines remained. Since then, as appears from the answer to a question put in the House by myself, one of the magazines is let to private parties. Now the firm to whom it is leased is, no doubt, highly respectable, and probably, so far as the head of that firm is concerned, will take all proper precautions; but I would submit to the Department whether it is right that these public magazines should be used for private purposes. When they are under the control of the Department, of course I assume that every care will be taken by the officers of the Department so that there will be no danger of an explosion. But that care and protection of the Department ceases when the magazines are in the hands of private individuals, and it does appear to me that it is not a proper use of public magazines to lease them to private parties. From the position of this magazine, if an explosion should occur, it would cause great destruction, not only to property, but perhaps to life, as they are situated near a thickly populated portion of the city of Portland, and an explosion would cause great damage to that city, and also to the city of St. John. I do not know whether the attention of the Minister of Militia has been called to this matter by the City Council of St. John, or the City Council of Portland, but I am aware that the question was brought up in the City Council of Portland, and they agreed to memorialise the Department about it. At present there is great risk and danger from the magazines. Of course where magazines are required for public purposes, they are under the charge of the Militia Department and of officers detailed for that purpose; but when they pass into the hands of private parties the magazines are passed under the control of the individuals to whom they are leased, or to their servants. The city is consequently exposed to considerable danger which would not exist if the magazines were employed for the legitimate purposes for which they were established.

Mr. CARON. The papers which have been asked for by my hon. friend will be brought down. I did not expect that the hon. gentleman would have made the explanation which he has made before the papers were brought down. I can tell the hon. gentleman that a portion of this fort is used by the Department of Militia for storing powder, but another portion, the Fort Howe which he has referred to, is under lease, but as far as my memory serves me, it is leased from year to year, and the lease is terminable at any moment when the fort is required by the Department of Militia. I may say to the hon. gentleman that in several other cities of the Dominion it has been considered of great advantage to the city to have the military powder magazines when not required for that purpose by the Militia Department, handed over for the use of merchants, in which to store their powder, as it could be more safely stored there than anywhere else in the city. I can also say to the hon. gentleman that, whether the fort is leased or not, the supervision of the Militia Department is still maintained over those stores during the time the lease is in existence. I shall bring down the papers, and after they come down I shall be glad to supplement the information they contain with any further information in my power.

Motion agreed to.

ANNUNCIATION DAY.

Mr. SPEAKER. My attention has been called to the fact that Wednesday next is Annunciation Day, and will therefore be a holiday. I suggest, with respect to the motion of Mr. Bergin respecting inspectors and medical inspectors of factories, that the hon. member be allowed to change the motion so that it shall stand first on the list of Public Bills and Orders, not mentioning Wednesday next. This will be done with the consent of the House.

CLAIMS OF THE ISLAND OF CAPE BRETON.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness) moved:

That it be resolved,—

That after the Treaty of Paris the Island of Cape Breton was annexed to Nova Scotia by Proclamation on October 7th, 1763.

And that it was ordered by the Governor and Council of Nova Scotia, on the 10th of December, 1765, "that the Island of Cape Breton should be erected into a distinct county, to be known by the name of the 'County of Cape Breton,' comprehending the Islands of Madame and Scutarie and all islands within three leagues, and that a writ should be issued for choosing two representatives; and further that the freeholders should be at liberty to choose non-residents."

That "John Grant, Esq., and Mr. Gregory Townsend were elected, and proceeded to Halifax to take their seats in the Assembly, on June 3rd, 1766."

That the said John Grant, Esq., and Mr. Gregory Townsend, on the report of a Committee of the Assembly composed of Messrs. Butler, Morris, Smith, Brenton and Burbridge against the validity of their election, were prevented from taking their seats in the Legislature.

That the Legislature of Nova Scotia exercised the power of taxing the people of Cape Breton without allowing them any representation in the Assembly for 21 years, thereby creating discontent so intense and lasting that the Imperial Government as a remedy separated the island from Nova Scotia in 1784.

That during the twenty years preceding its separation from Nova Scotia, owing to the injustice done Cape Breton, its population decreased from 1,500 in 1763 to 1,100 in 1783.

That Cape Breton, while ruled by a Governor and Council, was so favorably known and desired by immigrants from the old country, that as Governor Desbarres, of the Island, writing to the Under Secretary of State on the 17th August, 1785, says: "Nova Scotia is jealous, and don't wish with thorough sincerity the success of the Government, lest its growing importance and value should raise it to the first rank amongst His Majesty's and the national favorites."

That the population of Cape Breton during the thirty-five years of its separate Government increased from 1,100 in 1783 to 26,100 in 1820.

That the persistent jealousy and intermeddling of Nova Scotia secured the re-annexation of Cape Breton without the consent of its people by a Proclamation issued on October 16th, 1820.

That the people of Cape Breton during the succeeding twenty-four years used every constitutional means to remonstrate against the re-annexation, but without success, as the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council confirmed it in 1844.

That the unjust treatment of Cape Breton by Nova Scotia from 1820 to 1867 appears manifest from the fact alone that while, during that time $9,000,000 had been expended in Nova Scotia proper on public account, only the comparative trifle of $168,523 was expended in Cape Breton, and that on St. Peter's canal, in the County of Richmond.

That since 1867, under Confederation, notwithstanding the enormous increase of the public debt of the Dominion, for which both political parties are responsible, and for the interest on which the people of Cape Breton are taxed in common with the people of other sections of the Dominion, no expenditure chargeable to capital account was ever yet made excepting St. Peter's canal.

That the prosperity of Cape Breton up to the present time had been retarded largely by the exercise of preponderating influences favorable to such portions of Nova Scotia as Halifax, Cumberland and Pictou, whose interests are not supposed to lie always in fairly recognizing the importance of Cape Breton.

That the area of Cape Breton is more than double that of Prince Edward Island, its population nearly as large, and in addition to their many common interests, the former possesses unlimited mineral resources which remain undeveloped owing to the want of facilities afforded to rival counties in Nova Scotia proper.

That in the opinion of this House the isolated position of Cape Breton, apart from the consideration of its inexhaustible mineral resources, entitles it to that consideration at the hands of this Parliament, which is given to Prince Edward Island, in the way of affording facilities for the development of its various industries.

He said: Before placing these resolutions on the subject of the claims of the Island of Cape Breton, apart from other sections of the Province of Nova Scotia, in your hands, Mr. Speaker, I desire to explain as concisely as possible my reasons for submitting them to the consideration of this House. The history of Cape Breton is an interesting one; but it is peculiarly interesting to the present inhabitants of the island. I do not intend to discuss the history of that island previous to the fall of Louisburg, in 1758, but I desire to call attention to the treatment which it has received since that time. In doing so it is not my intention to find fault with the dead past. I simply desire to call the attention of this House and of the country to the fact that, if the Island of Cape Breton had been treated in a manner similar to other sections of the Dominion, its population, which is now about 84,000, would at least be double. I have here a history of the island, which I hold is the only reliable history of the island ever published, simply because the histories published in former times were derived from sources which were not reliable.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read, read.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). It is not my intention, as has been suggested, to read the history of Cape Breton; but it is my intention to call attention to sections of its history, which relate particularly to the injustice that has been done to the island by political parties in the past. This history was written by an English gentleman, who resided in the island for forty years, and it can therefore be considered an unbiased history. The facts were obtained from official sources, and from sources which were not prejudicial to the interests of the island. The name of the gentleman who wrote this history was Richard Brown an English gentleman, who was familiar with all the resources of the island as well as with its people. In 1869 he published the history and dedicated it to the youth of the island, whom he addressed in this language:

"When I first visited the island, more than 40 years ago, my professional duties led me into various districts, at that time quite destitute of inns and the ordinary means of locomotion. Thus I was frequently compelled to ask from the inhabitants both shelter and subsistence, as well as aid in moving from place to place. I need hardly say that in the comfortable houses of the merchants and the farmers—in the log huts of the new settlers—in the wigwags of the wandering Indians—in short, everywhere I received a hearty and hospitable welcome. In later years, during a long residence at one locality, I had the happiness of enjoying the friendship of a wide circle of neighbors of all ranks."

That is his opinion of the people then resident upon the island, and of whom the present stock are the descendants. He obtained his information from the most reliable sources, as will be seen from the following:

"For the great bulk of the most important matter embodied in the following letters. I am under great obligations to Sir Roderick Murchison, for free access to the extensive library of the British Museum, and to His Grace the Duke of Buckingham and Chandos for permission to examine and make extracts from voluminous colonial documents in the Public Record Office. To the courteous and obliging officers of both these truly noble national institutions, I beg to tender my sincere thanks for their valuable aid in guiding me in my researches."

This conclusively proves that this history is a reliable one. It may be said, that Cape Breton progressed as rapidly as any other section of the Province of Nova Scotia or the Maritime Provinces; but this does not, however, prove that sufficient attention has been given to affording facilities to the people for prosecuting the various industries of the island. I find that as early as 1758, the fishing industries of that island were far in excess of what they are at the present day, and it is not only very interesting, but highly necessary to quote the statistics of that day, in order to show that notwithstanding the progressive increase of population in the island, it is not owing to any special attention, or in fact to any attention at all, having been paid to that island since that particular time. The historian says:

"The loss of Cape Breton was a severe blow to the navy of France, as the fishery on the coast was one of the chief nurseries of her seamen. According to a document placed in my hands by the late Chief Justice Dodd of Sydney, about forty years ago (in 1829) no less than 15,000 were employed in the fisheries of Cape Breton, when Louisbourg was taken in 1758. I cannot do better than give you the following copy of this document:

"State of the fisheries carried on by the French in the Island of Cape Breton previous to the British taking possession in 1758.

In 1878 the total number of men employed in the fisheries of the island was 4,491; the number of boats, 3,226; the number of vessels, 98; the tonnage, 2,691 tons, and the value of the fisheries, $1,276,193. In 1758 there were 15,138 men employed; number of vessels, 726; shallops, 1,555; and the value of the fish taken at that time was more than double that of the fish taken in 1883. This conclusively proves that one class of the inhabitants of the Island of Cape Breton will be largely increased in number for some period of time yet, because if the ability to maintain the fishermen on the island will be equal to what it was over 100 years ago, it would treble the present fishing population of the island. That the island was considered important at that time is proven from the following fact which the same writer refers to:

"There can be no stronger proof of the value of Cape Breton in, the estimation of the French, than the fact, when negotiations for peace were mooted in the year 1761, the French Minister, the Duc de Choiseul, offered to cede the whole of Canada to England upon certain conditions, of which the most important was the restitution of Cape Breton. As Mr. Pitt would not consent to this condition the French Government broke off the negotiations and recalled their agent from London."

Just because the British Government at that time refused to restore the Island of Cape Breton to the French Government, the war was continued two years afterwards. Peace was, however, declared in 1763, and the Island of Cape Breton was annexed to Nova Scotia. After Cape Breton was annexed to Nova Scotia it was ordered that two representatives be elected for the island—which was constituted into one county—to the Legislature of Nova Scotia. At that time the population of Cape Breton was about one-third of the population of Nova Scotia, but notwithstanding this, only two representatives were allowed the county of Cape Breton, which embraced the whole island, in a House composed of forty representatives. This shows how utterly impossible it was for Cape Breton at that time to procure any show of fair play in the Legislature of Nova Scotia; and notwithstanding that only two representatives were allowed for the island, they were refused the privilege of taking their seats in the Legislature because there was no homesteads on the island. The franchise of Nova Scotia at that time was a freehold franchise, and unfortunately there were no freeholders on the island, and after two gentlemen were elected to sit in the Local Legislature they were refused the privilege of taking their seats, because they were not elected by the freeholders of the island. Then their seats were declared vacant, and the island was refused representation in the Nova Scotia Legislature for 21 years. During that time the responsibility of representing the island in the Local Legislature was thrown on the City of Halifax. It was promised from time to time that freehold tenure would be given to the residents of the island; but notwithstanding this promise, lest Cape Breton should be represented in the Legislature, the right was withheld for the whole period of 21 years. But, according to this history, I find:

"Although Capt. Holland's survey had been long completed, and grants of land had been issued in the neighboring Island of St. John's, the bonâ fide settlers at Louisbourg and other parts of the island, for no assignable reason that I could discover in the record, were still denied the privilege, or rather right, of obtaining any other title than licenses of occupation to the lands they had improved. They were therefore still disqualified to send representatives to the Assembly, not from any fault of their own, but simply because the Government would not give them grants. To remedy this grievance, the House passed a resolution on April 2, 1770, 'That no writ shall issue to the Island of Breton, because of the want of freeholders to make an election, and that the isle be deemed to be represented by the member for the County of Halifax, into which it has resolved and become a part thereof as heretofore.' This, you will observe, was no remedy whatever, as the inhabitants had no voice in choosing representatives for the County of Halifax. We may presume, however, that John Butler and Robert Campbell, who took their seats for the County of Halifax when the House met on June 6, 1771, looked especially after the affairs of Cape Breton."

There is a lurking suspicion in the minds of the people of the Island of Cape Breton that the privilege the people of Halifax obtained at that time has continued to exist ever since. I hope, however, that transpiring events will convince them that their suspicions are not well founded. Notwithstanding the great length of time during which the representatives of Halifax enjoyed the privilege of representing the island, I am happy to say that a public expression of opinion now in the city of Halifax convinces me that there is a growing feeling of sympathy for the island in that city, and I hope that feeling will be made manifest not only in the Local Legislature but in the Dominion Parliament. In 1774 another remedy was proposed for the very great wrong which was done to the island at that time. The historian says:

"We have now arrived at a momentous era in the history of the British Colonies—the breaking out of the American Revolution. As all the events of the war of independence must be quite familiar to you, I shall say nothing concerning them, except so far as they affect Cape Breton, which, happily, owing to its insignificance at that period, suffered less from the depredations and attacks of the enemy's privateers than the adjacent colonies. Energetic measures were, of course, taken by the Governor of Nova Scotia for the defence of the Province, not only against external but internal enemies also; for it was well known that there were many disaffected persons scattered through the country who had originally come from New England, disposed to aid the revolted colonies. On 28th August, 1775, a proclamation was issued, ordering light infantry companies to be raised throughout the Province. The total number of men required was only 1,010, of which 'Cape Breton Isle and Isle Madame' were each ordered to raise 'two companies of Acadians and others well affected,' of 50 men each—200 in all. It cannot escape your notice that Cape Breton, including Isle Madame, was not fairly treated in this apportionment. The whole population of the island, exclusive of the Indians, according to Governor Legge's census in 1774, was only 1,011, whilst that of Nova Scotia proper was, at the lowest estimate, 20,000; and yet the latter was called upon to furnish only 800 men, or one to every twenty-five, whilst the former was required to supply 200, or one in every five."

Thus you will see that Cape Breton was called upon to furnish five men to each one that Nova Scotia was required to furnish according to population, and I regret to find that that policy has been continued up to the present time. When fighting men are required, the military authorities are very anxious to look to the Island of Cape Breton for men to fight their battles; but when we are at peace, the Minister of Militia of this Dominion—and I regret that he is not in his place—fails to accord to us a fair apportionment of the public money devoted to that service. Now, Sir, I come to the most delightful era in the history of the Island of Cape Breton, that is, its separation from Nova Scotia in 1784. When I first visited that island there were many residents who recollected that particular time. There are many still living on the island who regret the day that it was made part of the Province of Nova Scotia, in 1820, and since these resolutions were made public I have received many letters from the residents of the island congratulating me on my efforts to secure the separation of the island from Nova Scotia proper, notwithstanding that the resolutions have no intention of asking for separation at present. As soon as it became known that Cape Breton was separated from Nova Scotia, many persons directed their attention to the island, and a large tide of immigration set in towards it in 1784:

"About 800 persons arrived, and settled in various parts of the island in the early part of the summer. It is stated by Desbarres that an accession of 3,397 speedily followed the publication of his proclamation on September 1st, describing the natural advantages of the island and offering a liberal supply of provisions for three years to immigrants, with clothing for themselves and their families, lumber and materials for farm buildings, and tools and implements for clearing land."

Shortly afterwards, in 1785:

"The great rush of immigrants, and the bustling scene presented by so many people busily engaged in erecting barracks, storehouse and dwellings, seemed quite to have turned the head of the Governor, and made him fancy that Cape Breton would soon eclipse all the neighboring colonies. From the very first he appears to have imbibed an idea that the people of Nova Scotia were jealous of Cape Breton, and looked with dissatisfaction at its rising importance. Writing on August 17 to the Under-Secretary of State he says: 'New settlers are coming in fast; the New England people do not like the settling of the Island of Cape Breton at all; they know it will be the loss of every advantage they derive from the fishery. Nova Scotia is jealous, and don't wish with thorough sincerity the success of this Government, lest its growing importance and value should raise it to the first rank amongst His Majesty's and the national favorites.'"

We find at the close of its career as a separate colony its population increased very rapidly during its period of self-government.

"All the best lands fronting on the lakes, rivers and sea-coast were taken up previous to the year 1820; since that period the lands in the rear of front lots have been occupied by the later immigrants, who are in consequence distinguished by the name of 'Backlanders.' The great influx of Scottish immigrants (said by some authorities to have exceeded 25,000 souls), gave quite a new complexion to the population of Cape Breton, if it can with propriety be said that it was, before their arrival, distinguished by any complexion whatever, being composed only of a few hundred Micmacs, Acadians and English and Irish settlers. The island is now decidedly 'Scotch,' with every probability of its continuing so to the end of time. Although many of the first settlers came to Cape Breton sorely against their will, none, I believe, have had reason to regret the change from the wretched abodes they left to the comfortable homes they now occupy."

Unfortunately, in 1820, Cape Breton, without the consent of its people, was re-annexed to Nova Scotia by a proclamation. The proclamation reads as follows:

"DOWNING STREET, August 15, 1820.

"SIR,—I had the honor of intimating to you, previous to your departure from this country, the decision to which His Majesty had come of re-annexing the Island of Cape Breton to the Government of Nova Scotia; and you must have observed the alteration which had in consequence been made in your commission and instructions.

"His Majesty considers it most desirable that this arrangement should be no longer delayed, and has commanded me to instruct you to take into your immediate consideration the measures which may be necessary to give effect to His Majesty's instructions. For this purpose it will be necessary that you should in the first place direct the issue of writs for the election of two members from the County of Cape Breton, to sit in the Legislative Assembly of Nova Scotia; and in this you will follow the course adopted in 1765, when two members were actually so returned."

This proclamation was issued by Bathurst, and a proclamation was also issued by the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia, shortly afterwards, which reads as follows:

"Whereas His Majesty, with a view to promote the welfare of his faithful and loyal subjects of Nova Scotia and Cape Breton, hath been graciously pleased to direct that the Island of Cape Breton should be re-annexed to the Government of Nova Scotia, and the same island should from henceforth be and remain an integral part of the Government of Nova Scotia,—

"I do therefore, in pursuance of His Majesty's instructions and by and with the advice of His Majesty's Council, declare that the Island of Cape Breton is, and from henceforth shall be and remain, a several and distinct county of the Province of Nova Scotia, to be called and known by the name of the County of Cape Breton, and to be represented, and the civil government thereof to be administered, in like manner as the other counties of the Province are administered and governed.

"And in pursuance of His Majesty's instructions I have caused a writ in the usual form to be immediately issued, directed to the Provost-Marshal or his Deputy, resident in the island, for the election of two members to serve in the General Assembly of Nova Scotia, being the number directed to be summoned to such Assembly before the time when the said island was first separated from the Province of Nova Scotia.

"And I do hereby, in obedience to His Majesty's commands, dissolve the Council of the said Island of Cape Breton.

"And that the peace and good order of the said island may be preserved, and justice duly administered therein, until more effectual provision shall be made by the Legislature of Nova Scotia, or until further order shall be duly made therein, I do hereby authorise and require that all judges, justices of the peace, constables and other civil officers in commission in the said island do continue in the execution of their respective offices, agreeably to the several ordinances passed by the Governor and Council of Cape Breton, and under which that colony since its separation, has been hitherto administered."

This was, unquestionably, the greatest calamity that ever happened to the Island of Cape Breton. During the thirty-five years in which the island was governed by a Governor in Council, the progress of the island equalled, if it did not surpass, the progress of any other British contemporary colonies on this side of the Atlantic. Since that time, having regard to the discontent which prevailed on the island, principally owing to the fact that the island had only a representation of two in a House of forty, the interests of the island were, to a very great extent, neglected by the Legislature of Nova Scotia. During twenty-four years the people of the island remonstrated, in every constitutional manner, with the view of securing separation from Nova Scotia, and I find that a special session of the Local Legislature was called for in 1844 to determine whether the island would be set at liberty or not. I find that the Legislature of Nova Scotia was convened on the 20th July, 1844, and that the Governor of the day delivered his Speech from the Throne as follows:

"Mr. President and Honorable Gentlemen of the Legislative Council:

"Mr. Speaker and Gentlemen of the House of Assembly:

"I have called you together, in obedience to the instructions of Her Majesty's principal Secretary of State for the Colonies, in order to give you an opportunity to determine whether you will appoint an agent to represent the Legislature of Nova Scotia at the bar of the Privy Council, in the case now pending before the Judicial Committee, regarding the legality of the annexation of the Island of Cape Breton to this Province, in 1820. I will cause the despatches I have received, having relation to this subject, to be immediately submitted to you. I regret very much that it should have become necessary to convene you at a season of the year at which it must be inconvenient for many of you to leave your homes; but it is satisfactory for me to know that the business on which you are summoned to deliberate is of such a nature as leads me to hope that it may be readily despatched, and that its early completion will enable me at once to release you from further attendance."

This was the Speech from the Throne, and I find that the resolution, the only business of importance which was submitted to the Local Legislature, reads as follows:

"Resolved, that an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Lieutenant-Governor, to inform His Excellency that the House of Assembly having taken into its deliberate consideration the despatches and documents submitted by His Excellency to the House, relative to the question now pending before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, have determined that, having full confidence in the learning, knowledge and ability of the Attorney and Solicitor-General of England, and the wisdom and integrity of the eminent tribunal before whom they are to vindicate the legality of the annexation of Cape Breton to this Province, it is unnecessary to employ an agent to represent Nova Scotia before the said tribunal; and further stating that the re-annexation of the Island of Cape Breton to this Province, by the Proclamation of 1820, and the Act of Assembly passed in pursuance thereof, was a measure very advantageous to the great body of the inhabitants of that island, and that it has largely benefitted by the care and protection of the Government and impartial administration of justice; and praying that His Excellency will be pleased to appoint a commission of five persons, to collect from the public archives of this Province such records, documents and information as may have a tendency to aid the said tribunal in coming to a decision upon the said question, and that His Excellency will be pleased to transmit the same to the right honorable the Secretary of State for the Colonies."

During the period from 1820 to 1844, owing to the discontent that prevailed in the Island of Cape Breton, the Legislature of Nova Scotia wisely increased the representation of the island; but even at this time the representation of the island was only 6 out of about 50. What is very significant is the fact, that out of the 6 gentlemen who represented the Island of Cape Breton in 1844, not one of them voted for this resolution passed by the Local Legislature of Nova Scotia. This proves the fact that, in 1844, a very grave discontent prevailed in the Island of Cape Breton in regard to the treatment it received at the hands of the Province of Nova Scotia. Since that time the people of Cape Breton have had the privilege of grumbling, which is accorded to every British subject, but, notwithstanding all their grumbling, they are yet of opinion that very little attention was paid to the interests of the island from 1844 to 1867, although we had some hope that, in the near future, after that period, some attention would be paid to the interests of the island owing to the very large expenditures made in Nova Scotia proper from 1851 until 1867. In 1851 the railway policy was inaugurated in the Province of Nova Scotia, and no railway scheme could ever have been passed in the Local Legislature without the assistance of the representatives from the Island of Cape Breton; and I am happy to say that the intelligent representatives of the island at that time always favored the building of railways and public works in all sections of the Province of Nova Scotia, as they are willing to do now in all sections of the Dominion where it would appear that public works are necessary for the development of the country. In 1867, then, owing to the policy pursued from 1851 until that time, no less than seven million dollars were expended by the Local Legislature of Nova Scotia on railways, but, whenever any railway policy was advanced by the Local Legislature, the leaders of the Government of the day always promised that, as soon as the railways were extended east and west in Nova Scotia proper, then and not till then would steps be taken to build railways on the Island of Cape Breton. We were left to live in hope, but, unfortunately, hope has been long deferred, and up to this time neither at the expense of the Local Legislature of Nova Scotia nor at the expense of the Dominion Parliament have we one foot of railway on the Island of Cape Breton. However, in 1867 and for two years previous to that date, owing to the very peculiar position which the people of Cape Breton occupied relative to the Province of Nova Scotia, the feeling in reference to Confederation was most intense. They feared, and I was one of those who feared, that the interests of the Island of Cape Breton would be neglected to even a larger degree when we were connected with the great Dominion of Canada than they were while we were connected with the Province of Nova Scotia. The opposition was so intense on that island that not one representative was returned from any of its constituencies in favor of Confederation. Since that time, many changes have taken place in all sections of the Dominion, but on the island, with the exception of the fishing and mining sections, very little change has taken place, and I regret exceedingly to admit that, in many sections of the island, a very large exodus takes place. It takes place not owing to the National Policy, because from all the statistics I have in my possession the exodus took place while the Government adopted a revenue tariff. We have no statistics to show what the increased population may be under the National Policy, but I anticipate that there will be a very material proportion of increase in the fishing and coal-mining sections of the Island of Cape Breton owing to the adoption of that policy. In 1874 this Parliament adopted a new policy in reference to the Province of Nova Scotia. Before 1867, railways were built east and west in Nova Scotia, but this Government adopted the policy in 1873 and 1874, of giving the Windsor Branch in the Province of Nova Scotia as aid to railways in the western part of the Province, and the Pictou Branch as aid to railways in the eastern part of the Province. The Windsor Branch cost $1\frac{1}{2}$ million dollars, and the Pictou Branch over $2\frac{1}{4}$ million dollars. The aggregate amount which these railways cost was not less than \$3,500,000, so that this Parliament adopted the policy of giving that amount as a bonus for the extension of railways in Nova Scotia proper. Of course, that policy gave very general satisfaction, general satisfaction throughout the Province of Nova Scotia particularly, but I was one of those who felt at that time and now feel that, notwithstanding this and other concessions made to Nova Scotia proper, it did not benefit the Island of Cape Breton, directly or indirectly, to the extent of one dollar, any more than similar expenditures in the great North-West or in Vancouver Island, or in any other portion of the Dominion to which our people would be compelled to go to earn their bread by the sweat of their brow. This is a feature of our isolated position which our friends from Nova Scotia itself can never realise. They fancy that if large expenditures are made in Nova Scotia proper, the Island of Cape Breton, as a matter of course, must benefit thereby, but I submit that any expenditures in Nova Scotia proper cannot be of any more benefit to the Island of Cape Breton than to Prince Edward Island, which has never contributed one dollar to public expenditures in the Province of Nova Scotia. This is one feature of our position which I desire to strongly impress on our friends from Nova Scotia, who I believe to be very sympathetically inclined, and which I desire to impress upon the representatives of all the constituencies of this Dominion. Besides giving these large sums to Nova Scotia for the railway system of that Province, in 1874 the Government of the day placed at the disposal of the Local Legislature of Nova Scotia, in round numbers, two millions of dollars in cash, which were placed to the credit of the Province in the Dominion Treasury. At that time I remonstrated strongly against placing either the railway or the money at the disposal of the Local Legislature, because I felt then, as I feel now, that doing so would not benefit the Island of Cape Breton to any extent; and I am sorry to say that my fears and anticipations have been realised. Notwithstanding that all these subsidies have been expended in the extension of railways east and west of Nova Scotia, not one dollar of it has ever found its way into the Island of Cape Breton, unless our people earned the money, as I said before, by the sweat of their brow. However, while this money was appropriated for railways east and west, the Local Legislature apportioned a very fair proportion of the amount for the Island of Cape Breton, and, under the pretense, I am sorry to say, as it appears now, at least under the promise that the money would be expended on the island, they secured the expenditure of all in Nova Scotia proper, and now the Local Legislature turns round and tells us that, after having expended all the subsidies placed at their disposal by the Dominion Parliament in Nova Scotia proper, they shall decline to vote a dollar out of the local revenue for the island. I want to call the attention of this House to the fact that, if this Parliament had not placed \$2,000,000 cash, to say nothing of the railways in Nova Scotia proper, at the disposal of the Local Government, the Legislature of Nova Scotia would annually receive 5 per cent. interest upon the money. This would place \$100,000 at the disposal of the Local Legislature for local purposes; and the portion of that which Cape Breton would receive at the hands of the Local Government, if applied for local works, would certainly not be less than one-fifth, or \$20,000. The expenditure of that money, therefore, in Nova Scotia proper, has deprived the Island of Cape Breton, forever, of the revenue for local purposes on the island of not less than \$20,000 a year. I hold that the money expended on railways in Nova Scotia proper, on account of the \$2,000,000 then placed at the disposal of the Local Legislature, did no more to advance the interests of the Island of Cape Breton than it did to advance the interests of Prince Edward Island, which did not contribute one dollar to the expenditure of these railways. In order to show the apportionment of the money, I desire to call your attention to the language used by the Provincial Secretary in introducing the Bill into the Local Legislature in 1875:

"He explained that the Bill proposed to give $4,000 per mile to the Nictaux and Atlantic Railway, and a like sum to the Broad Cove Road, and also to add $2,000 per mile to the subsidy already granted to the Western Counties Railway. As it appeared that the work was in some places difficult to carry on, and the company required increased aid. In considering the question whether the Province was warranted in granting the sums mentioned in the Bill, he stated the subvention already granted to the Yarmouth Road was at $6,000 for 90 miles, equal to $540,000; that of the Spring Hill and Parrsboro' Road at $5,000 a mile for 28 miles, equal to $140,000; the New Glasgow and Canso Road $5,000 a mile for 80 miles, equal to $400,000; and the Canso and Louisburg Road $5,000 a mile for 80 miles, equal to $400,000, making in all $1,480,000 for 278 miles of road already provided for. The present Bill proposed to subsidise the Nictaux and Atlantic Road, 70 miles, with $4,000 a mile, equal to $280,000; the Broad Cove Road, say 50 miles, with $4,000 a mile, equal to $200,000, and the Yarmouth Road of 90 miles, with additional subsidy of $2,000 a mile, equal to $180,000. These sums added to the sums already provided for as subventions, gave a total of $2,240,000."

Now, Sir, the first Session of this Parliament I suggested that a subsidy be granted for a line from the Strait of Canso to Broad Cove, and I also suggested that a subsidy should be granted for a line from the Strait of Canso to Louisburg. I was approached by more than one hon. gentleman in this House—and I am not sure, but some of them were from Nova Scotia—who assured me that owing to the fact that I asked for a subsidy for the two roads on the Island of Cape Breton, it was a hopeless case to obtain a dollar for any of them.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Where is Broad Cove?

Mr. CAMERON. Broad Cove is in the County of Inverness, Cape Breton, one of the finest counties in the whole Dominion of Canada. Now, Sir, as I have already stated, the expenditure of the whole of this money in Nova Scotia proper, has entailed a tax on our people—an indirect tax, it is true—because it has deprived our people of $20,000 a year for local purposes. The whole amount of the money has been expended in Nova Scotia proper, and we are now asked by the Local Legislature to look to the Dominion alone for aid for railways on the Island of Cape Breton. However, Sir, since that time, although it is not very long ago, I am happy to say, that the whole policy of the people of Nova Scotia has somewhat changed in the direction of favoring Cape Breton. Now, there is a great deal of sympathy expressed for the island. Sympathy has been lately expressed, as I have already said, from the City of Halifax, where we least expected it. I have no doubt that every representative in the Local Legislature or in the Dominion Parliament who understands the position of Cape Breton, will feel that the people of the fine County of Halifax realise the fact that Cape Breton, up to this time, has not received the assistance which she deserved at the hands of the Local Legislature, at least. I have no hesitation in saying that we have the sympathy of Nova Scotia, and I believe to so large an extent that the representatives of Nova Scotia realise that something more must be done in the interests of the island hereafter than has yet been done—at least that fair consideration should be given in the construction of railways and other improvements which are necessary for that section of the country, for the carrying on of the various industries of the island, and for the distribution of our surplus products to the markets of the world. I find that we have sympathy in the Local Legislature, and I have no hesitation in making the assertion that if we had any sympathy from any part of the Province expressed publicly in the past; it was from the west. I say this with some regret, because I am a native of the eastern part of the Province. But the sympathy which exists now in the Province is of such a character that it cannot be ignored by the representatives of the people in Parliament. In 1883 that sympathy was very strongly expressed in the Local Legislature by representatives from all sections of the Province of Nova Scotia. It was expressed by the representatives from Halifax, and from all the counties in that neighborhood. It was so universal indeed that it was not considered safe for any person to appeal to the people of Nova Scotia unless he was in favor of doing justice to Cape Breton. I know that in former days when the subject of justice to Cape Breton was before the Local Legislature of Nova Scotia it was generally turned into a burlesque; but lately, owing to the fact that Nova Scotia occupies a position with regard to the great Dominion of Canada somewhat similar to the position which we have occupied for 47 years relative to Nova Scotia proper, they feel there is a good deal in what we complain of. They feel, Sir, that while they contribute very largely to the revenue of this Dominion they have reason to complain, or think they have, that a fair proportion of the expenditure has not been made in the Province of Nova Scotia proper. This, I presume, has been to some extent the cause of the feeling which is now very prevalent in the Province in regard to Cape Breton. I will not refer to sympathy expressed later than the present Session of Parliament. The leader of the Opposition, on 20th February last, said :

"Another matter which has been left out of the speech was one which had been prominent for a good many years—a railway through the Island of Cape Breton. Railway extension in the eastern counties of the Province no longer enjoyed the attention of the Government. It was agreed last year that the Government in giving up Eastern Extension put this House in such a position that they would no longer be able to help the eastern counties. He recollected that his hon. friend, the hon. Premier of that day stated, in language perhaps prophetic, that in transferring the Pictou Branch the Government had merely transferred a trust and that they had transferred it to abler hands. That remark was not satisfactory to many here and it was partially explained away afterwards, but the fact that in his honor's speech this year no mention whatever was made of that eastern railway, proved conclusively that in their action last year the Government had done as much or more than any other Government, who had the subject under consideration to blast all the hopes of the people of Cape Breton who had been looking for years to this Legislature and this Government for what they ought to claim as their own. Probably this matter would be brought up again and there was no need to deal with it longer at this moment."

In answer to this very expressive language of sympathy for the island, the leader of the Government of Nova Scotia said :

"The remarks of the hon. leader of the Opposition were, for the most part, in the highest degree satisfactory, but the reference he made to Cape Breton was hardly fair. If the Government were to ask that hon. gentleman what solution he would propound he (Hon. Mr. F.) was afraid the answer would not be a satisfactory one. The Government might have introduced in their speech a meaningless paragraph on this subject, but he did not think such a course was advisable. Cape Breton had enough of 'paper railways.' He believed that both of the political parties of this country had made honest efforts to settle the question, and if unfortunate circumstances and unlooked for difficulties prevented those efforts from being successful, it should not be said that the Legislature had done so much for the west and nothing whatever for the east. The Legislature of Nova Scotia had never offered subsidies to the west without evincing the same liberality in their treatment of the east. If companies came to grief it was unfortunate, but the fact should be recognised that the Government offered east and west the same conditions, and if Cape Breton had not been as successful in regard to railway extension, he believed that it had not arisen from any want of willingness on the part of either political party to carry out the work."

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Any gentleman in this Dominion reading that speech would come to the same conclusion as the hon. gentleman who has just now said "hear, hear," but I can tell my hon. friend who says "hear, hear" that they never gave the same subsidy for Cape Breton as they did for the western part of the Province. I have just read from the mouth of the Provincial Secretary that the Yarmouth Road received $8,000 per mile, whereas the Inverness Road was promised only $4,000 per mile. Will the hon. gentleman say "hear, hear" to that. And he will find also that while the Yarmouth Road received $8,000 per mile, the Louisburg Road was promised only $5,000 per mile. Is there any reasonable person, then, who will not come to the conclusion that the statement made here, namely, that the Legislature of Nova Scotia had never offered subsidies to the west without evincing the same liberality in their treatment to the east, must be taken with a grain of salt. In point of fact we are still wanting railways. The admission is now made, it would seem, that there is no serious intention to extend railways into the island, because the subsidies given were always such as were insufficient to induce a company to undertake work of that kind; and small as those inducements were, the acts were so drawn that the subsidies lapsed, and there is not one dollar to our credit to day in Nova Scotia for railway extension in the island. We had the further assurance from one party in Nova Scotia at least, if not from more than one, that there is no intention of ever voting a dollar in the Local Legislature for railway extension in Cape Breton. Notwithstanding the fact that a very large subsidy was given by this Parliament, in the Pictou Branch case, with the intention of carrying a railway from New Glasgow to Louisburg, by some means which it is difficult to explain, the railway was built to the Strait of Canso only. On this subject the senior member for Guysboro' (Mr. Weeks) said :

"As the ominous omission referred to—the omission of all reference to railway extension eastward and into the Island of Cape Breton; with regard to that question, which has been a burning question in this Legislature for a number of years, we must almost heartily deplore the necessity for that omission—if such necessity exists."

Having referred to this matter at length, he said :

"I am not of that class who are disposed to cavil unavailingly over a question of this kind, nor have I any intention of reverting to a bye-gone struggle; but looking back for any instant only I must say that I do not regret my public action, that it must be admitted that the prognostications of those whose fervid imaginations saw in the action of the Dominion Government last Session ground for the belief in the construction, by that body, of the Cape Breton road, have not been fulfilled. Upon whose shoulders the onus of building, or assisting in building, that road, now rests, is not for me to say. If, after looking across to the larger Legislature beyond us, no response is made to the cry that comes up from Cape Breton, if the bright anticipations of last year come to barren nothingness. If Nova Scotia, denuded of her railways, is powerless to assist that island, then, indeed, is Cape Breton placed in a most extraordinary position. Always aiding others, unaided herself, she must remain without the shadow of a hope of seeing a line of railway constructed within her borders."

This, then, is the opinion of the representatives in the Local Legislature in Nova Scotia in reference to the injustice, or, possibly—to put it in milder language—the neglect which Cape Breton, up to this time, has received at the hands of the whole of Canada. It may be said that the Nova Scotia railways, which cost over $15,000,000 are a benefit to Cape Breton. I admit that they are conveniences just as every railway in Canada is a convenience for obtaining supplies and distributing, at rather an expensive cost, the surplus products of the island; but they are not any more a benefit to our island than to the adjoining island of Prince Edward, which was never called on to contribute a dollar for their construction. They did not lessen the cost of the distribution of the products of our island; on the contrary, the cost of the distribution of those products has been very largely increased on account of the extension of the railway from New Glasgow to the Strait of Canso. Before that extension we enjoyed steam communication to the north-west coast of the island and Port Hawkesbury, and it did not cost much more then to transfer the products of the island from Hawkesbury and other points on the north-west coast of the island to Pictou, than it costs now to transfer similar products across the Strait of Canso alone, and we pay extra for the transfer of the same commodities from the Strait of Canso to New Glasgow, a distance of 80 miles; so that so far as facilities for the distribution of the products of the island are concerned they are rather against us. It affords of course the people of the island great facility at this particular season of the year, to leave the Island of Cape Breton for the purpose of manning American vessels to prosecute the fisheries on our coasts during the summer season. There is a very large number of persons employed in that calling, who in the spring of the year were compelled to go by sailing vessels from the Strait of Canso to the United States, or walk from the Strait of Canso to New Glasgow, a distance of 80 miles, because that class of people could not afford the cost of travelling by stage, which was expensive. But now the railways enable them to leave in the spring, and the tide has already commenced to flow from the eastern part of the Province to the Eastern States. I observe by the press that a large number have already departed, and that more will follow them for the purpose of prosecuting the bank fisheries, and, later on, the fisheries along the coasts of our island. But, Mr. Speaker, while I earnestly advocate the building of a railway from the Strait of Canso to Louisburg, or the building of the other road from the Strait of Canso to Broad Cove, either by the Dominion or by the Local Parliament, as was promised us more than once, I hold that there are other public works on the island which are as necessary for the prosecution of some industries on the island. I refer now to the improvement of harbors, to the construction of piers for the purpose of facilitating the prosecution of the fisheries and the exportation of the products of the coal mines from the island. I find that on the north-west coast of the island—and now I come to the county which I have the honor to represent—the Local Government built, exclusively at the expense of the local treasury in 1866, a pier at Port Hastings, and since that time the Local Legislature has ignored the responsibility of maintaining that pier, and that consequently the pier is now almost useless. There was also a pier at Long Point, which was a very useful one to that locality; there was one at Port Hood, at Sight Point, at Broad Cove Marsh, at Margaree Island, and one at Cheticamp. Those piers were maintained at the expense of the Local Legislature till 1878. The Local Legislature, then finding that they had not the means for maintaining those piers, have publicly declared it to be their policy to ask the Dominion Government to maintain them. There were other improvements undertaken on that island since Confederation which were of greater magnitude—the improvement of harbors; and I hold that the improvement of harbors, extensive harbors, or harbors which would give an outlet for the products of certain localities should not be made a charge on the consolidated revenue, or on income. The works on Benacadie, Catalone, Cow Bay, East Bay, Grand Narrows, Ingonish, L'Ardoise, Mabou, Militia Point, Port Hood, West Arichat, Cheticamp, Margaree, the St. Peter's canal, and works of that class should be chargeable to capital account; and I should be most happy, as an individual representing the island, to have it pointed out to us time and again that Cape Breton received more money on capital account than the money expended on the St. Peter's canal. When those works were undertaken by this Parliament, it was with a view of placing them on the same footing as the canals were placed in Ontario and other places. The representatives of our island always favored the improvement and enlargement of the canals in the west, and I for one shall be always most happy to vote the sums necessary for enlarging those canals, whenever it shall be made to appear that doing so will be to the general interest of the Dominion. There can be no question that the improvement of large harbors of this kind, the improvement of the entrances into those harbors, will be of general advantage to this Dominion—of general advantage to the shipping of the Province of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick particularly. The improvement of the harbors on the north-west coast of Cape Breton where along an extensive coast of over 150 miles no harbors exist, except one, on the lee of an island adjoining Port Hood, but which cannot be used as a harbor for exporting products from the mainland, as it is distant at least a mile from the mainland, and as a deep channel intervenes, which precludes the hope of ever exporting from the mainland the product of the very extensive coal area which exists in that locality, unless that channel is bridged or closed. In order to show you that it was not the intention to have those harbors chargeable to income, I beg to call the attention of this House to the Act which was passed in 1869, and assented to on the 22nd of June in that year, which declared those harbors were of such great importance that they should be placed in the same category as the canals of the Dominion. The preamble of that Act reads as follows:

"Whereas it is expedient to provide means for improving the harbors and channels and rendering the navigation more easy and safe at the several ports of Bathurst, Shippegan and Richibucto, in the Province of New Brunswick, Mabou, Port Hood, Margaree, Cheticamp and Liverpool, in the Province of Nova Scotia, Amherst Harbor and House Harbor, in the Magdalen Islands, and several ports and harbors between Cross Point and Cape Chat, both ports inclusive, in the Bay of Chaleurs and the coast of Gaspé, all in the Province of Quebec, and the Port of Chatham in the Province of Ontario; therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—"

This Act provides that these harbors should be improved, and that tolls should be imposed on the shipping entering them, in the same manner as tolls are imposed now in the other sections of the Dominion on canals. And while the grants necessary to enlarge and improve the canals of Ontario and Quebec, and other portions of the Dominion, are charged to the capital account, I hold that since the policy of this Government has been changed, any votes passed by this Parliament for the improvement of the entrance to these harbors should also be charged to capital account. Thus our people would be called upon to pay the interest on the expenditure instead of the principal, as they are required to do now. Taking this view of the case, I find by the annual report of the Department of Public Works, in 1884, improvements were made in the Island of Cape Breton in the following places, which include the whole island: Benacadie, $10,518; Catalone, $1,500; Cow Bay, $137,628; East Bay, $2,045; Grand Narrows, $3,000; Ingonish, $87,556; L'Ardoise, $10,545; Mabou, $101,948; Militia Point, $2,000; Port Hood, $35,000; West Arichat, $11,294; Cheticamp, $10,000; Margaree, $5,000; aggregating $409,034 in the four counties of the island, being an average of perhaps $25,000 a year. In addition to this, $607,000 have been expended on St. Peter's canal since 1820 up to the present time both by the Local Legislature and by the Dominion Parliament. It will thus be seen that on public works, which, I believe, should be chargeable to capital account, $1,000,000 have been expended on the Island of Cape Breton. I think the aggregate debt of the whole Dominion is not less than $200,000,000. Cape Breton comprises about one-fiftieth of the population of the Dominion. We are therefore entitled to an expenditure on capital account in view of our isolated position of not less than $4,000,000. Yet we find that since 1820 the expenditure on public works only aggregates $1,000,000. It is, therefore, evident that we have an equitable claim to an expenditure of not less than $3,000,000 on public works in order to place us on the same footing as other sections of the Dominion. Notwithstanding that, in the Trade and Navigation Returns, the imports and exports and duty paid are not given by counties and by Provinces, yet there is no difficulty whatever in calculating from them the amount of imports and exports and duty collected in every county in the Province of Nova Scotia. There is so little difficulty in doing so that as it is each representative who rises in his place here proudly points out that his county contributes an enormous amount to the revenue, that the imports and exports of his county are very large, and that it is, therefore, entitled to a very large expenditure on capital account. I find that the aggregate exports from the Province of Nova Scotia in 1884 were $9,599,353, that the imports were $9,658,104, that the goods entered for home consumption were valued at $9,183,346, and that our Customs duties were collected to the extent of $1,907,285. Therefore Cape Breton, containing one-fifth of the population of the Province of Nova Scotia, and with its people occupying as comfortable a position as an equal population in any other part of the Province, must necessarily contribute $400,000 to the revenue of this Dominion. Now, as I have said, the amount expended on public works in Cape Breton, chargeable to capital account, up to this time, has been $1,000,000. The amount of interest paid on one million of dollars is only $50,000; we have then to our credit $350,000, a large proportion of which I claim should be paid by the Government of the Dominion as interest in the shape of expenditures on public works in the island. I have no hesitation in asserting that there is not a representative from any section of the Province of Nova Scotia who will not admit that Cape Breton contributes one-fourth of the revenue collected in Nova Scotia proper. We all contend, and with reason, that owing to our population being composed largely of miners and fishermen who require for use and consumption every article on which duty is paid, we contribute more than our proportion according to population; but I only take the ground that we contribute according to population, and even on that ground I am confident that our friends from Nova Scotia proper will extend us their sympathy and urge a practical return in the way of dollars and cents expended in public improvements on the island. The exports from the Island of Cape Breton, as given in the Trade and Navigation Returns, are as follows:

From Arichat.....	$ 50,645
" Baddeck.....	89,926
" North Sydney.....	142,698
" Port Hawkesbury.....	236,863
" Port Hood.....	2,795
" Sydney.....	205,725
Total.....	$728,657

In view of the fact that we raise coal to the value of $1,000,000 a year; in view of the fact that we catch fish to the value of $1,000,000; and in view of the fact that we export agricultural products to the value at least of $750,000, every reasonable person must admit that our total exports must amount to more than $1,286,577. They must admit that the exports from the Island of Cape Breton must amount at least to one-fifth the exports from the whole Province, and that instead of the exports being as shown by the trade returns, $728,658, they must aggregate at least $2,000,000. In the trade returns all the exports from our island are not credited us, as a large proportion of our exports are sent to the City of Halifax and distributed from that point; and that is the reason why the trade returns are misleading, leading those who examine them to believe that Cape Breton cannot be of very much importance. In the shire town of the county which I have the honor to represent the exports are only put at $2,795 a year in the trade returns; but I have no hesitation in saying that the exports from that neighborhood are as large as those from any other town in the island, with the exception of Sydney and adjoining ports. The imports are:

Arichat.....	$ 36,321
Baddeck.....	6,030
North Sydney.....	93,116
Port Hawkesbury.....	41,150
Port Hood.....	2,030
Sydney.....	45,575
Total.....	$224,222

Instead of imports, as shown by the Trade Returns, of $224,223, it should be one-fifth of imports to Nova Scotia, or $2,000,000. I have here statistics which are very interesting, and which it will not take me long to place before the House. They establish that the increase in population from 1871 to 1881, when this Dominion was blessed with a revenue tariff, was only in the sections where the fishing industries and coal industries are carried on, and that in some of the agricultural sections there was a decrease. It is absolutely necessary, therefore, that facilities should be afforded the people of that island for the distribution of the products of the soil similar to those given to other sections along the length and breadth of the Dominion; it is absolutely necessary to give our people these facilities in order that they can have at home that which they can obtain abroad. This I urge as a reason for railway extension particularly. I urge as a reason for the improvement of harbors and piers that the population of those sections interested in the fisheries increases so rapidly that it is in the interests of the Dominion they should have all the facilities necessary to prosecute their business. The following table shows the increase in population in the County of Inverness from 1871 to 1881:

I find that there was a very large increase in population in the fishing sections of the county which I have the honor to represent, and, unfortunately, a decrease in some of the agricultural sections. Now, in a pecuniary point of view, I hold that it is the interests of this Dominion to give us facilities for the development of the resources of the island similar to those given to other sections of the Dominion, because if the increase in population during the decade from 1861 to 1871 were progressive, it would not be less than 4,683 in my county alone in 1881. Unfortunately, however, the net increase was only 2,235, showing unquestionably there was an exodus from that county alone during that period of not less than 2,448, without allowing for the progressive increase according to population. The class of people who, unfortunately, leaves our island is a class most desirable to retain in the Dominion, and I regret exceedingly to say that, notwithstanding my ardent desire that they would emigrate to the western portion of this Dominion, they unfortunately find their way across to the United States, and it is almost impossible to influence any of our people who leave the island to take up their abode in any of the western sections in this Dominion, they will rather settle around the New England portion of the United States, or, as a general thing, go further west and settle on the Pacific slope. But, valuing the population, which we lose at $1,000 per head, which is a very low estimate, it aggregates during that decade, $2,448,000. I have not the slightest hesitation in asserting that, if $2,448,000 had been expended on that island during that time by the Governments of Nova Scotia and the Dominion, that population would have been retained, and at least as great a number more of the same class of people would have been restored to the island, because, if there is anything in our people, it is a love of their island home, and, if they have any opportunity whatever, of returning to the island, they always embrace the very first opportunity to do so. I find that, during that time, the class of emigrants that unfortunately left our island, have distinguished themselves in the United States and in other portions of Canada, and I am happy to say that the State Senate is represented by Cape Bretoners, I find that Legislatures in the United States are represented by Cape Bretoners, I find that the mayor's chair is occupied by Cape Bretoners, I find that the seats of aldermen are filled by Cape Bretoners, I find that some who emigrated from the island have gone to the Pacific slope in this Dominion and have returned as members of Parliament, and I find also that we have supplied Prince Edward Island with a representative. In view of these facts, I hold that strenuous efforts should be made to retain these people in our country. I will not refer to the population of the island any more than to its population by religions. I find that the island is peopled by 2,167 Baptists, 45,901 Catholics, 411 Congregationalists, 3,735 Church of England, 2,425

Methodists, 29,688 Presbyterians, and that there are only 190 who cannot be classed in some religious denomination. Therefore I think we have a very strong claim upon nearly, if not quite, all the religious denominations of this Dominion. By nationalities, I find that the island is inhabited by 58 Africans, 543 Indians, 148 Dutch, 7,960 English, 12,430 French, 347 Germans, 7,329 Irish, other nationalities of a mixed character only 241, Scotch 55,436, and I am happy to inform my friends from British Columbia that in our island there is not one "Heathen Chinese." The area of Cape Breton is 2,800,680 acres. The area of Prince Edward Island is 1,365,400 acres. The population of Cape Breton is only 84,500, although in 1820 it was 26,000, to a population of 16,000 for Prince Edward Island, but, since that time, the population of Prince Edward Island, which was more highly favored in many respects, and particularly in a political respect, has largely increased in proportion, and is now 108,891. I beg to assure you that I do not complain of the expenditure in any portion of this Dominion, I do not complain of the expenditure in any section of the Province of Nova Scotia, and, while my resolutions would imply the fact that the City of Halifax, Pictou, Cumberland and other counties in Nova Scotia, owing to a preponderating influence in the Local Legislature, secured advantages which we do not possess, it, unfortunately for us, only reveals the fact that they were truer, or rather that their representatives were truer, to the interests of their respective counties, or were more successful, at least, in securing public expenditure in their respective counties than the representatives of the people of the Island of Cape Breton. But, while I am willing, as it has already been said in the Local Legislature, to support measures for expenditure in all sections of the Dominion where it can be shown that such expenditures tend either to encourage immigration into our country, or to induce our people to remain at home, or to encourage them to return from the United States, I claim that a similar expenditure and for similar purposes should be made on the Island of Cape Breton. In conclusion, I may assure this House, as I have already, I believe, shown, that Cape Breton had many eventful periods. It had its periods of tragedies from its discovery about 200 years before the discovery of America by Columbus until the fall of Luisburg in 1758. It had its period of persecution, when its people were taxed without a voice in the Legislature of their Province for 21 years. It had its period of prosperity from 1784 until 1820 when ruled by a Governor and Council. It had its period of unjust treatment from 1820 until 1867, when it enjoyed not much more than the privilege of grumbling. On local works, they received only a fair share of the amount expended, but they complained, and with reason, that they had not expended on public works, chargeable to public account, on which they had to pay interest in other parts of this Dominion, a proportion of that which the people of other sections enjoyed. There was also a period of hopeful appeal to the Local Legislature and to the Dominion Parliament for aid for public works on the island; and lately we have arrived at a period of very general sympathy, which extends, I hope, from the Atlantic to the Pacific and which will find expression in expending money for the necessary public improvements required for the distribution of the products of our island. I think that in all those circumstances our people were patient beyond measure, and they now look hopefully forward to better treatment in the future. I beg now to appeal to all the nationalities in this Dominion, except the heathen Chinese, and to all religious denominations as well, for sympathy, and to all political parties in this Dominion, for aid in securing the money necessary to give us railroads and improvements, on harbors, and breakwaters, which are necessary for the development of the inexhaustible resources of our highly favored island.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am sure this House has listened with great interest to the hon. gentleman, and with more approbation of the general line of his speech, which is no more than it deserves, from the elaborate history he has given of the birth, parentage and education of Cape Breton. I fancy the hon. gentleman feels that he has gained what he desired to gain by bringing the position of Cape Breton and its wrongs before this House. I do not think, however, that this House is prepared to vote for this resolution as it stands, because I do not think we are sufficiently well acquainted with the wars between Nova Scotia and Cape Breton to decide which was in the wrong. To vote for the adoption of this resolution would be merely stating, among other things, that Nova Scotia has wronged and tyrannised over the people and crushed the energies of Cape Breton. Well, that may be so, but I do not think the House is prepared, without giving a study equal to that of the hon. gentleman on the subject, to declare that Cape Breton has been so deeply injured by the Province of Nova Scotia. We had great pleasure in hearing the hon. gentleman's speech, and we will have still greater pleasure in perusing it at our leisure in Hansard, and after we have studied it fully we will be in a position to decide how far Nova Scotia has injured Cape Breton, and what are the best means of redressing the wrongs of that interesting island. So far as Parliament is concerned, we have tried to get at Cape Breton by the extension of the line towards Canso, and that extension being, I may say, finished, I hope we will succeed in extending it across the straits to Sydney, or Louisburg, or some other point, perhaps to be selected by the hon. gentleman. Everything has been done in that direction, and I hope that the great capabilities of Cape Breton will be developed ere long by the construction of a railway through the island which will bring it into immediate and easy connection with the rest of the Dominion. I hope the hon. gentleman will be satisfied with the statement of his case, and will withdraw the motion.

Mr. CAMERON. In view of the remarks made by the right hon. gentleman, the leader of the Government, and with the consent of the House, I beg leave to withdraw the resolution for the present.

Motion agreed to, and resolution withdrawn.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE NORTH SASKATCHEWAN.

Mr. McCALLUM moved for:

Copies of all reports, correspondence and surveys, if any, in the Department of Public Works as to the improvement of the North Saskatchewan river for the purpose of navigation.

He said: I make this motion in the interests of the people of the North-West, as well as in the interests of the whole Dominion. I understand that we can navigate that river now at certain seasons of the year for a distance of a thousand miles, and it is desirable that we should have a thorough survey of that river to see if it is capable of improvement. Since we have acquired that territory the Government of this country have expended only $20,000 in the improvement of that river, in removing boulders and taking obstructions out of it. According to the information we have, for 800 miles along that river the land is fit for settlement, the climate is excellent, and the soil produces good crops. I have myself been as far north as Edmonton, that is 200 miles north of Calgary; I was there in harvest time, and I know that the land produces first rate crops. Edmonton at the head of navigation is quite an important place—it is a large village. Out of the river gold is taken; coal is obtained from the river banks, and splendid crops grow on the lands adjoining the river. It was formerly considered, and it was stated in this House, that the Canadian Pacific Railway had chosen the wrong route to the Rockies and thence to British Columbia. It was considered that the line should have crossed the narrows of Lake Manitoba and been carried through the Yellow Head Pass. I spent two months last summer in that country, and I am satisfied that in the interests of this country the Canadian Pacific Railway is properly located, for this reason: The road passes through what I call the southerly portion of the fertile belt. A glance at the map will show that the main Saskatchewan and North Saskatchewan run almost parallel with the railway at a distance of some hundred miles, and when that river is properly opened for navigation there will be two highways for that country. All the branches to build from the Canadian Pacific Railway running northward go to that river. We are now chartering roads to cross the Saskatchewan, and all these lines will be feeders to the Canadian Pacific Railway and not opposing railways. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Dominion Government deserve the thanks of the people for the manner in which they have carried on the work, for the way in which the railway had been built, for the manner in which the country has been opened up and for the way in which they are dealing with settlers. While Government have done so much, I trust they have not yet done all they intend to do. The railway is going to be finished. I further hope that the Government will place a sufficient sum in the estimates to secure a complete survey of the Saskatchewan River. I call the attention of the Government to this matter, and particularly the attention of the able Minister of Public Works, and I trust a sum will be placed in the estimates for the improvement of that great river. In my examination of that country I could not, of course, go all along that river; and I regret that I am able to find very little information with respect to it. It has been navigated for 1,000 miles at a certain season of the year, but you cannot go to the head waters with a craft drawing eighteen inches. Anyone acquainted with water carriage is aware that you cannot carry freight or passengers with only a depth of eighteen inches. Before the Canadian Pacific Railway was built 8 cents per lb. was paid for the transportation of goods from Winnipeg to Edmonton, or in other words, $160 per ton. Since the railway has been built, the rate has been reduced one half. It cost 1½ cents per lb. last summer to take freight from Winnipeg to Calgary, and 2½ cents per lb. to take freight from Calgary to Edmonton, a distance of 200 miles. If the Government would spend $100 a mile on the trail from Edmonton to Calgary that expenditure would make a first class road. You can go three-quarters of the distance in your slippers, for it is like walking over a carpet. In some places there are some little creeks and sloughs which will have to be bridged, and that is all that is wanted to make the trail a first-class road. It is a very easy country through which to build a railway. I did not see so much of the Saskatchewan country as I desired, but I have here a report made to the Manitoba Legislature by Mr. Thomas Spence, and I cannot do better than read a portion of it. Mr. Spence says in regard to the Saskatchewan country of which I have been speaking:

"Considering the character of the Saskatchewan and its country it will be advisable to limit this pamphlet to a brief description of the best localities in its country suitable for more immediate settlement. Ascending from its mouth at Lake Winnipeg there are over two miles of strong current up to the Grand Rapids, which are nearly three miles in length, with a descent of 43½ feet."

Those rapids form the principal obstruction to the river. The descent mentioned could easily be overcome by building three or four locks, and then there would be free river navigation from Edmonton to Winnipeg. Mr. Spence continues:

"The country in the vicinity of the Grand Rapids has a considerable depth of good soil, and the banks of the river are high; there is also abundance of timber for fuel and building and game of all kinds, and between this point and the lake would be very favorable for the establishment of fisheries. The Pas mission, situated at the mouth of the Pasquia, is about eighty-five miles in a direct line from Lake Winnipeg; the banks here are ten or twelve feet high at low water, and the soil a rich dark mould over a drift clay. At this place there is at present a small but prosperous settlement, and a Church of England mission has been established for many years.

"The next most favorable country for agriculture commences at a point about 140 miles above this, the soil being rich and the timber of a fair quality, the soil consists of a rich alluvial deposit, 10 feet in thickness above the water on both sides of the river, and well wooded with large poplar, balsam, spruce and birch, some of the poplars measuring 2½ feet in diameter. This character of country continues till approaching Fort La Corne, about 150 miles, and is well watered and drained by many fine creeks. A few miles west of this is the new and flourishing settlement of Prince Albert, situated on the south side of the north branch of the Saskatchewan, about 45 miles below Carleton. This settlement extends for about 30 miles along the Saskatchewan, the farms fronting on the river and extending back two miles. The settlers, though principally Scotch, are composed of English, Irish, German, Norwegians, Americans and Canadians. This settlement has increased rapidly, especially within the last two years, and now number about 300 souls, and the people are beginning to farm extensively. . . . The North and South Saskatchewan run in a north-easterly direction for about 120 miles before they unite. The channels are almost parallel, and with an average distance of 20 to 25 miles apart. The land between the rivers is all good. Along the south side of the south branch the land also is good and fertile."

"The country drained by the north branch of the Saskatchewan from Prince Albert up to Edmonton—a distance of over 500 miles by the river—as well as that by its extensive tributary, the Battle River, is of a general uniform character, more or less interspersed with woods sufficient for many years to come, but not sufficient to supply the wants of a large population; but this drawback will be overcome with the gradual development of the country and opening up of the vast coal deposits and the forests westward on its immediate banks; and by river or rail coal can be carried in all directions for every purpose; and it is highly probable that we have the most extensive, perhaps the finest coal fields in the world."

I might go on reading other portions of this report, but I do not desire to weary the House. I ask the House whether it is not necessary that people settling along that great river should have communication afforded in order that they may get the produce of their labor to market. I believe the Government, at an expenditure of less than one million dollars, can make the navigation of that river profitable in the interests of that country.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

REFUND OF RAILWAY BONUSES IN ONTARIO.

House resumed consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Wilson—

For copies of petitions from the County Council of the County of Elgin, praying for a general measure of relief to Municipalities of Ontario which have aided railways declared to be for Dominion purposes by granting bonuses to them.

Mr. McCALLUM. Before the motion passes I wish to say a few words on this question. The County of Elgin has made a complaint to this House, and asks that this House should reimburse that county for the amount she has spent in railway bonuses. In the first place, I believe that the county of Elgin and the city of St. Thomas took stock in the London and Port Stanley Railway to the amount of $140,000, which amount they got pretty largely returned to them from the municipal loan of Ontario. They gave a large bonus to the Canada Southern Railway, and to the Credit Valley Railway, and having got these two roads they come here and ask that the House should repay them the money they expended in getting those advantages for their city and county. I remember passing through the city of St. Thomas, and though I came to the conclusion that the people deserve a great deal of credit for the assistance they gave these railways which had the effect of making St. Thomas a city, still I think they have already been well repaid for that expenditure. The mere fact that these two roads were declared to be roads for the general advantage of Canada is in my opinion no excuse for them asking the House to reimburse them for money they spent for their own advantage. I repeat that the people of that county deserve a great deal of credit for their enterprise, but I strongly object to the people whom I have the honor of representing in this House being asked to pay money to reimburse the county of Elgin for the advantages they have got. In fact, I think they have a good deal of, shall I say cheek, to ask that that money shall be repaid them. Why, Sir, the 162 municipalities which have aided railways want to have 591 other municipalities pay for improvements which they made. The hon. member for South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong) said the other night that he thought there was something in my remarks until he analysed them, and he said that he was the agent of these people. Well, if the agents do not do what is right, if they squander the people's money, the agents themselves may be dismissed for not doing their duty. These hon. gentlemen are trying to make a political matter of this question. Where did it originate? First in the Local Government of Ontario, and next in the county of Oxford, and now they come to this House with a view of stirring up political feeling. The boundary question having been settled, they now want to raise another row. But they cannot raise a plea of that sort, because the people of Ontario will not be satisfied with relief to 162 municipalities until it reaches the other 591. The members for the county of Elgin think they have a special claim on the Dominion Government. Why, I was told the other night that I should not say anything on this question because I happened to live in the neighborhood of the Welland Canal, on which a large amount of public money was expended. It is true, there was a large expenditure there in the interest of the country; but if any man will look at the Public Accounts he will find that there has been a large amount of money expended for the benefit of the county of Elgin. I have a return showing the amount expended in the neighborhood of the County of Elgin, to enable the people there to take the products of their labor to market. Previous to Confederation there was expended $310,537, and since Confederation $258,574. in all $569,111, over half a million dollars. Yet the hon. members from that county now complain; and because they happened to help themselves a little they want the rest of the country to reimburse them. Why, Sir, I can call this nothing but parish politics; and we had a whole day devoted to it the other day. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) found fault with this Government because he said they had taken away roads belonging to the Province of Ontario. But the people have got the roads, and they have got better service than they could have in any other way; they have three or four trains a day where they used to have only one. Sir, what do the people in the hon. gentleman's own county say about this matter? I see that the hon. member for West Elgin is not in his seat; but one of the papers of St. Thomas, in that county, the St. Thomas Times, says:

"A word with regard to the Canada Southern. Mr. Casey saw fit the other day to make a demand on behalf of the county and city for a return by the Government of the amount of aid granted to that road. The return given is the same as that urged as to the other roads—that the Dominion has taken it over. We wonder if Mr. Casey, when urging this demand upon Sir John Macdonald's Government, recollected the time and manner of the Canada Southern's being taken over. His constituents will recognise the inconsistency of his position when we point out that the Canada Southern Railway was taken over in 1874 by the Mackenzie Government without a word of protest from Mr. Casey! Mr. Mackenzie himself brought in the Bill on the ground that as there were some bills for bridges connected with the road before Parliament, it was deemed advisable to assimilate the jurisdictions. Sir John Macdonald appears to have been the only one who raised any question as to the bill. Mr. Casey had nothing to say against it, and nothing has been said against it from that day to this, when Mr. Casey gets up to demand $225,000 for this county and city from the Government for having passed the Bill brought in by his leader, Mr. Mackenzie, and supported by himself! Could inconsistency go farther?"

To prove that this is all true, I have the Act of Parliament here for taking over the road; but it is not necessary to read it, as it is admitted; and I ask, could inconsistency go further, when the hon. member for West Elgin comes before this House and urges it as a sin against this Government that it did what the Government he was supporting for five years itself did? Does the hon. gentleman think we have short memories? Any one listening to this discussion would imagine that the Province of Ontario was not in the Dominion of Canada at all. Why, Sir, the hon. member for West Elgin the other night said that we were giving bonuses to railroads that we had no more interest in than in building a railway to the moon.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McCALLUM. Well, I often think, from the actions of hon. gentlemen opposite, in trying to belittle the country in every way and to make out that it is poverty stricken, that some of them are moonstruck, and I am more convinced of it now than ever when the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says "hear, hear" in approval of that. Another gentleman on that side of the House got up and said that we had as much right to ask a bonus from the State of Maine to build a railway through this country. The hon. member for West Elgin says that we pay in full for this road from here to Montreal. We only pay $12,000 a mile. Suppose the Canadian Pacific Railway had stopped at Callander, what good would it be to this country? Is it not necessary that it should reach tide water, and that the whole line from the Atlantic to the Pacific should be under the control of one company? If we paid $12,000 a mile in order to get a through line to tide water, I think it is nothing more than we ought to do. The hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson), I must say, is a little more consistent than the hon. member for West Elgin. I had the honor of having a seat with that gentleman in the Legislature of Ontario, when that Government, which the hon. member for Lambton the other night said was the best Government under the sun, commenced to bonus railways, in order to make political capital, and in order, if it is parliamentary to say so, to buy up the members of that day. But to the honor of the hon. member for East Elgin be it said, he did not support his leader in that course. He voted against him on every occasion except when there was a vote of want of confidence, and I believe he voted against him sometimes then. Now, the Government of Ontario have spent their money and are face to face with direct taxation, and they come down and ask this Government to reimburse them. They talk about party politics. Why, Sir, the very expenditure of public money on railways in the Province of Ontario which was commenced when the leader of the Opposition came into power there, was in the interest of party politics. Any man who looks at the Journals of that House of that day, will find that he turned out Sandfield Macdonald's Government by a majority of one, and in less than two weeks he turned that majority into a majority of twenty-five.

Why, Sir, every man had a railway Bill, but to the honor of the hon. member for East Elgin, he did not support those appropriations. They spent that money, and they were not satisfied with the amount of money that had been voted, but they mortgaged the Province of Ontario for twenty years for $100,000 a year; and, as I said the other night, they had to borrow money last year to pay some of those loans. They had to sell annuities in order to get money to meet this expenditure. I was told by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) that we had the greatest Government in the Dominion in the Province of Ontario. He may be in love with that Government, but I do not think the people of Ontario will show any love for it long. That hon. gentleman ventured to adopt the role of a prophet and prophesied that we would not come back to this House unless we supported this motion. I should think that a young member of this House, no matter how able he might be, ought to hesitate before adopting that role. I venture to say that if I want to come back to Parliament, my vote on this question will not only not prevent my return but will assist it. I venture to say that the people will endorse the stand I take, when I say that we should not allow 162 municipalities to rob 591. That is the position I take, I say that in this matter we have a duty to perform towards the whole Dominion as well as to the municipalities, and we must not shirk performing that duty. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that I am very much like my hon. friend from Hastings; they say I would like to do away with Local Governments altogether. I have never expressed any such opinion in the country, but I say that if the different Local Legislatures decide, if it should be the wish of the people that we should have legislative union, it would be a question for them to consider. I hope we have had enough of these parish politics, I hope this discussion will finish tonight, and I am satisfied this resolution will turn out to be a boomerang that will rebound to those who throw it; I am certain that when this question is put to the people of Ontario they will not take the stand expected by hon. gentlemen opposite. I protest against the Dominion giving the municipalities assistance in this shape because to do so, they will require to rob the other municipalities, and I will continue to protest against any such course being adopted until I hear better arguments for it than have been advanced so far.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to correct the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) in his statement that the riding I have the honor to represent borrowed the sum of $140,000, and that we obtained the money from the Municipal Loan Fund. I have the satisfaction to tell the hon. gentleman that we did not get a single dollar from the Municipal Loan Fund, either that time or subsequently, having borrowed the money from a loan society, and, unlike some other municipalities, we paid every dollar we borrowed; we borrowed it from private sources and were called to pay the principal and interest when they became due, so that the statement that we had borrowed our money from the Municipal Loan Fund was utterly incorrect.

Mr. McCALLUM. I did not say you did; I said it was paid from the Municipal Loan Fund.

Mr. WILSON. I accept the hon. gentleman's denial, but I must say I took his statement down and am quoting him correctly. If he says we received the amount we expended on the construction of the road from the Municipal Loan Fund, he is as far in error in that statement as he was in the one I charged him with. He ought to know that none of the municipalities, even those that borrowed from the Municipal Loan Fund, received more than $2 per capita and a certain consideration on account of the money they had expended on railways. Further, he says that we ought to have but very little to say in the matter, because in the county I represent we have been greatly benefited by the railway, that we are in an enviable position, having splendid railway facilities, and that St. Thomas is now a city when a few years ago it was but a small village. Well, if we are in that position, we gained it by the energy and devotion of our people to the interests of their county. They were not, perhaps, like the people of the constituency he represents, anxious to hoard up their funds and expend but a small pittance, some $20,000, to improve their locality. The hon. gentleman is the last man who should say he was bold enough and would dare to vote against doing justice to the people of Ontario. I have not a Government at my back as he has which would readily gerrymander a constituency for me and make my seat safe in the future; but on the contrary, I represent a constituency that has been gerrymandered in the interests of my opponent and to keep me out of the position I have the honor to occupy. The hon. gentleman referred to the amount of money expended on the Welland Canal. No one in that part of the country, from one end of Welland Canal to the other, knows better than the hon. gentleman what money has been expended in opening up the Welland Canal. Further, he states that I, while a member of the Local Legislature, opposed railway grants, which I admit, and I did so on the same principle and for the same cause which leads me to oppose them now. The hon. gentleman gave the whole of his party away in saying that in the Local Legislature grants to railways were brought down—for what purpose? For a purpose I would hesitate to mention in addressing members of a Legislature—for the purpose of corruptly influencing their votes. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the resolutions brought in here last Session were brought in for this purpose? If he applies such a charge to the members of the Local Legislature he must give it equal application to the members of this House. Had the railway resolutions introduced here last Session the effect of corrupting members of this Legislature and inducing them to vote for grants they would not otherwise support. I do not wish to apply the charge made by the hon. member to the representatives and supporters of the Reform Government of Ontario, to hon. members of this House. I could hardly believe that they would be induced to record their votes, under these circumstances, in any way other than what they conceived to be in the best interests of the Dominion, but we may have seen votes recorded which, if the resolutions had been brought down individually, might have been recorded differently, but I as an individual have always believed, and still believe it, to be a vicious principle, that any Legislature should be asked to vote in reference to a large number of railways at one time. The system adopted by the Local Legislature was far superior to the system adopted here. Each Order in Council was brought down, the papers in connection with the railway which was to receive aid were printed and laid on the table of each member, so that he might have an opportunity of looking over them and coming to a correct conclusion as to whether he considered that the road should or should not receive aid. Here we had nothing but a resolution presented to the House, we had no opportunity of forming a conclusion whether the roads proposed to be aided were entitled to aid or not, whether they were in the general interest or not. I therefore say that the system proposed to this House in 1883 was, in my opinion, a very vicious system, and it was not only proposed in 1883 but followed up last Session, and if we are to have each and every Session resolutions of this kind proposing aid to various and sundry railways, I fear that some members of this Legislature may at times be compelled to record their votes in a way other than they would if they were left free to choose their own course. As I have said, I did not intend to make any further remarks about this question, and I would not have done so had it not been for the special reference the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) felt it necessary to make in reference to myself.

Motion agreed to.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 4) to provide for the distribution of assets of insolvent debtors.—(Mr. Curran.)

PUNISHMENT OF SEDUCTION.

Mr. CHARLTON moved second reading of Bill (No. 27) to provide for the punishment of seduction and like offences. He said: In moving the second reading of this Bill, I ask permission of the House briefly to call attention to its provisions. The 1st section provides for the punishment of seduction under the promise of marriage of any unmarried female of previously chaste character of 21 years of age, and provides that, in case of the marriage of the parties, it may be pleaded in bar of conviction. Section 2 provides that it shall be a misdemeanor to effect a feigned or pretended marriage. The 3rd section provides that it shall be a misdemeanor to inveigle or entice any female of virtuous and chaste character into a house of ill-fame. The 4th section provides that the evidence of the female shall be corroborated by other material evidence. The 5th section provides that the evidence of the party accused shall be taken. The 6th section provides that no prosecution under the Act shall be commenced after the expiration of one year from the time of committing the offence. The punishment for these offences is two years in the penitentiary or a less term in any other place of imprisonment. This Bill has been introduced on three previous occasions. It had passed the House of Commons on each occasion, but has failed hitherto to secure a majority in the Senate. I think I may assert that public sentiment is in favor of this Bill; the expressions of public sentiment, so far as they have been made, have been strongly in favor of this Bill. Some of the religious bodies during the past season have taken ground in favor of it. The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church passed a resolution strongly endorsing the position taken in this Bill, and that resolution passed without a dissenting voice. The principle of the Bill is not a novel one. A law substantially of this character has existed in various countries and does at this time exist. In most of the European countries it exists in some modified form, and it also exists in nearly every one of the American States, and I shall call attention to a Bill much more stringent than this which was reported from the House of Lords in England to the House of Commons in 1883. The scope of the Bill is a narrow one. It only deals with two offences, seduction under the promise of marriage and a feigned or mock marriage. It has been said that the Bill does not provide any punishment for the woman. Well, the Bill in this case provides only for offences which may have been committed by means of false pretences or by a mock marriage, and I do not think it can be argued that, in either of these cases, the female is a guilty party in any sense whatever. The Bill which I mentioned as having been reported from the House of Lords will be found in the volume of Lords' Papers, Public Bills, Volume 3, of 1883.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It did not pass.

Mr. CHARLTON. It did not pass the Commons last Session, but I am not certain that it has not passed this Session. We have no record of the Bill. But I will call attention to the Bill as it passed the House of Lords. It was entitled "An Act for the protection of women and girls." The second section of the Bill provides, that "Any person who procures or endeavors to procure any woman under twenty-one years of age to become, either within or without the Queen's dominions, a common prostitute; or procures or endeavors to procure any woman or girl to leave the United Kingdom, or to leave her usual place of abode in the United Kingdom, for the purpose of entering a brothel abroad, whether he shall or shall not inform the woman or girl of such purpose, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

The third clause provides:

"Any person who by fraud, intimidation or false pretence",—

Such pretences as are covered by this Bill.—

"False representations, or other fraudulent means, procures, or endeavors to procure, any woman or girl to have illicit and carnal connections, either within or without the Queen's dominions, with any man, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

The fourth section provides that it shall be a felony to have carnal connection with a girl under 12 years of age; and the fifth section provides that it shall be a misdemeanor to seduce any girl under 16 years of age, and it shall be a criminal assault even if the purpose is accomplished with her own consent. The Bill is much more stringent than the Bill now under the consideration of this House. It is a Bill that passed the House of Lords by a large majority, and I cannot doubt that this Bill will become the law of England, if it is not already the law of England. It was reported from the House of Lords to the House of Commons in 1883. We have not the Journals of the House for the Sessions of 1884; the Bill probably reached the House too late to be acted on in 1883. This Bill reported by the House of Lords, is entirely in consonance with the legislation of the most civilised states to-day. As I said last Session in advocating the proposition of this Bill, the law exists in various forms, and in almost every instance in a more stringent form, than the Bill under the consideration of this House. It exists in almost every one of the American States, and in many of those States it has been on the Statute-books for many years. In the State of New York, I think it has been on the Statute-book for over forty years; a very stringent law providing punishment both by fine and imprisonment—five years imprisonment and $5,000 fine, either one or both, in the discretion of the court. This law has been found to work so well that in no single case has there been any agitation for its repeal in any State where it exists, and where it has been on the Statute-book for many years. I think the experience of other countries in this matter will lead us to believe that the law is perfectly safe, perfectly proper. Certainly in this country the law with reference to offences of this kind is in a most unsatisfactory state. I shall not detain the House by a lengthy argument of the Bill. It has been under the consideration of the House now for three Sessions, and has been fully discussed, and I have no doubt the members of the House have their minds made up as to the propriety or necessity of passing this Bill. I have the honor to move that the Bill be now read the second time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In looking at this Bill while I object to several of the clauses, I think the second and third clauses are sufficient, in my opinion, to save the Bill. The second clause is this:

"Any man who procures a feigned or pretended marriage between himself and any woman, or any man who knowingly aids or assists in procuring such feigned or pretended marriage, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished as hereinafter provided."

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me if there is a crime in the world that ought to be punished, it is where a man gets up a pretended marriage, and induces an honest woman to believe that he is about to make her his wife; and gets a man under pretence of being a clergyman, for instance, who is not a clergyman, to perform a mock marriage, and induces her, honestly believing that she is becoming his wife, to submit to this pretended marriage, and all the unfortunate consequences that must arise on the proof that the marriage is feigned. I think this clause of itself is quite sufficient to save the Bill. Then I think also that the third clause is a good one, which provides that any person who shall inveigle or entice any female of a virtuous or chaste character into improper places shall be punished. I think these two clauses, at all events, are sufficient to save this Bill from being thrown out. With that view, and in consequence of these two clauses being in that Bill, I shall vote for the second reading.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

BANKING AND LOAN FACILITIES.

Mr. ORTON moved second reading of Bill (No. 36) to provide banking and loan facilities to those employed in agricultural pursuits. He said: In moving the second reading of this Bill I shall not repeat some of the remarks I have made before in this House on this subject. I may state that the chief object of this Bill is to remove certain disabilities under which the farmers of Canada labor in not having the same banking facilities that are afforded to other classes of our community. I desire to point out that though the wealth produced by the agricultural class in this country can be manipulated and handled by a large class of middlemen, with all the facilities that a proper banking system can afford, the very farmers who produce this wealth, and who enable these manipulators to operate, have not that facility which should be afforded their industry in this country. That is one of the chief objects of this Bill. Another object is to enable the agriculturalists of our country to co-operate one with another in providing banking facilities and loan societies so that they may not be obliged to pay more than a reasonable rate of interest for the accommodation that we hope to give them under this Bill. Now, Sir, a few years ago I had the honor to move a Bill in this House the object of which was to remove certain great grievances under which the farmers of this country labored in consequence of the exorbitant rates of interest charged by loan societies. A Bill was passed which had a partial effect in that direction, but owing to certain opposition in this House it did not go as far as it ought to have gone, and we find to-day that some of the evils that we attempted to remove by that Bill have not been as thoroughly removed as they should be. This Bill proposes to remove some of those disabilities. One of them I shall refer to more especially, and that is the difficulty under which farmers labor when they desire to have mortgages removed from their property. This Bill proposes to give power to establish loan societies or banks which will loan to the farmers and give them an opportunity of being relieved from their loans at a short notice. Now a great deal of dispute arose with reference to the time that should be allowed for a farmer to get relief from a mortgage, and it was argued that he should be bound hand and foot to his bond for five years. Under the old system there was a 20 year or a long term plan in existence which was very injurious to those who borrowed largely, from the fact that when they desired to take up their loans, through their property becoming so cumbersome in their hands, and desired to obtain loans on more favorable terms, they had to pay a high rate of interest to the mortgagee in order to get that relief. In other words, instead of the mortgagees allowing them the same rate of interest for the money which they had to pay in order to get that relief, the capitalists allowed them but half the rate of interest which they charged for the loan. I am sorry to say that this same process is in operation to a very large extent to-day, not only by loan societies, but also by private individuals. I know of cases in my own county where loans are made upon the same system, that is that instalments are made payable either yearly, half yearly, quarterly or monthly, and if the unfortunate borrower is not able to meet the instalments as they become due, he is liable to be punished by those who hold mortgages against the borrowers' property. This is certainly one of the most outrageous grievances the people of this country have to endure. Although this Bill does not give full relief, because it is not retrospective in its action, it at all event affords an opportunity, if these banks are carried on upon the principle I have suggested or any other principle that can be devised by this House, of paying off loans for any period on three months' notice being given; and it will relieve the farmers from a great hardship under which they suffer, for it will provide a banking institution from which they can borrow small sums of money, from $10 to $500, in order to carry on their operations, and can obtain those loans at a reasonable rate of interest and at short dates. I believe, if this Bill should be adopted by the House, both the position of the Government and the positions of the shareholders and borrowers will be met. I do not say that this Bill is framed with that wisdom and precision which would characterize a Bill framed by one thoroughly versed in all the intricacies of banking institutions. But so far as my humble ability goes, I have endeavored to incorporate in this Bill the great principles which have been applied for this purpose in other countries. So seriously is this question viewed in Great Britain that last year it was ordered by Lord Granville that a report should be furnished the House of Commons of the operations of banking institutions based on almost identically the same principles as those of the present Bill. That report has been made; it is a very interesting document, and is well worthy of perusal by hon. members who desire to see the farmers of our country prosperous, and when I say that I think the phrase covers the general prosperity of the people of Canada. I will not detain the House by further remarks, but will simply move the second reading of the Bill, which, I trust, will receive that consideration which I hope and believe it deserves.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

LIQUOR LICENSE ACT, 1883, AMENDMENT.

Mr. FOSTER moved second reading of Bill (No. 58) to amend the Liquor License Act, 1883. He said: I desire to make a few remarks with respect to the very short amendment I propose to make to the Liquor License Act, 1883. So far as printed it reads simply as follows:—

"Section one hundred and forty-five of the Liquor License Act, 1883, is hereby repealed."

That, however, does not meet the whole of the case, and I propose, when this Bill goes into Committee, to add the following:

"And it is hereby declared that the true intent and meaning of the Liquor License Act of 1883 was and is that the provisions of 'The Canada Temperance Act, 1878,' relating to offences, penalties and punishments, and the procedure relating thereto, were not and are not affected or impaired by any provisions of the Liquor License Act, 1883, or any Act amending the same."

The difficulty that has arisen is simply this: That section 145 of the Liquor License Act, 1883, with which this amendment deals, has been held by the Supreme Court of New Brunswick to have repealed the penalties and procedure of the Canada Temperance Act. A large number of cases which were brought up by the different inspectors appointed under the Liquor License Act, 1883, were carried before that court, and in their decisions the judges have ruled as I have stated. It might not at first sight seem to be, even though that ruling be held to be true, an unmixed evil or an evil that had to be remedied, because under that judgment it was possible to take the forms and procedure of the Liquor License Act, 1883. But that is not what is wished, that is not what was contemplated. The procedure with respect to the Canada Temperance Act has been fought out in the courts from 1879 to 1883, and the different points have been very fully gone over, and have been, in the main, settled. To go from that to the procedure under the Liquor License Act, 1883, which is new, would make it necessary to fight over those technical points again, and that is not a good thing to do, and therefore it is of very great moment to the different counties and cities which have adopted the Canada Temperance Act, and those which may adopt it hereafter that this matter should be made clear, and that there should be no doubt as to the procedure or the penalties of the Canada Temperance Act holding good. It was not the intention of the framers of the Liquor License Act of 1873, and not at all the intention of Parliament, that the Canada Temperance Act should be impaired in any of its provisions. In fact that was implicitly stated in a section which preceded this. But section 145 has been held by the Supreme Court to have done that, and it is to remedy that state of things that I propose this amendment.

Mr. WELDON. Of course there is no doubt that a great conflict has taken place between the Canada Temperance Act and the Liquor License Act of 1883. I do not propose to oppose the amendment, but I think it should not apply to cases which have been before the court. There are a number of cases which are considered to be settled, and if this clause is repealed without any proviso those cases might be brought up again. That would be contrary to the spirit of justice, and contrary to the principle that cases once having been decided there should be an end of the matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) must see from his own statement that we cannot well proceed with the second reading to-night, because he says this Bill as laid before the House is insufficient without an amendment. Now that amendment we have only just heard for the first time, and it states that the true intent and meaning of the Act of 1883 was so and so—and in the face of the decision of a court of competent jurisdiction that the true intent and meaning is otherwise. Therefore, I think we cannot without fully considering the effect in the first place of the judgment—which we will be able to see—and of his amendment, proceed with this Bill. It is a very strong thing for the House to do, in the face of a judgment given by a court, to say that the true intent and meaning of a statute is otherwise than a court has decided. We may come to the conclusion that the court is right, and that therefore the Act should be amended instead of having a declaratory Act providing otherwise than as the court has decided. Perhaps when the matter is fully considered the House may come to the conclusion that the Act is right, that it should be amended as not carrying out the intent of the Legislature. For that reason I think the debate should stand over, that the amendment should be printed on the face of the Votes and Proceedings, and that we should have before us a copy of the judgment of the court, which I suppose we can obtain. With these before us we can do one or two things, either declare that the true intent and meaning of the Act is as the hon. gentleman contends, or that the court is right, and that as the language of the Act failed to carry out the intention of Parliament it should be amended.

Mr. MILLS. I understand that the Supreme Court of Prince Edward Island has taken a different view from the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, so that though the declaration proposed to be made by the hon. gentleman may differ from the judgment of the court in New Brunswick it would be in accord with the decision of the court in Prince Edward Island. The matter does not therefore exactly stand in the same position as if it were a positive and unsupported declaration by the House that the court was entirely wrong.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I had not heard of the Prince Edward Island decision, but it only gives greater reason for our seeing both judgments and dealing with the whole question.

Mr. MILLS. Yes; but as to what is really necessary in the way of legislation it is for the House and not for the courts to decide, and it may be proper to proceed in some other way than the hon. gentleman proposes. It is very clear it is not desirable to allow a law to remain in a position in which it is not operative. Parliament has an opinion on the subject, and the country has an opinion on the subject, and it would be well, if there is any doubt as to what the meaning of the law is, that it should be made perfectly clear and workable, and it may be so made by a declaratory section such as the hon. gentleman proposes or in some other way; but it would be very undesirable that we should postpone all action until action should become impossible.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, no; it would have to be one way or the other.

Mr. ORTON. I am not going into the legal points which have been raised with regard to this Bill, but I think what has come up is an important reason why the House should show some hesitation in aiding any legislation on this subject. I think we must all feel that notwithstanding the apparent feeling of the people of this country in favor of the continuance of the Scott Act, the fact that hardly in any county in this country—I think I may say without fear of contradiction in no county or municipality in Canada—in which the Scott Act has been submitted to the people, have a majority of those entitled to vote declared themselves in favor of the Act,—when we recollect that fact, and the other fact that the operation of this Act is bringing ruin and disaster on a large portion of our people who have a right to claim the protection of the Government of Canada simply from the fact that they have been carrying on a legitimate and honorable trade, a trade legalised and authorised, not only by the consent of the people of Canada, but by the whole people of this country, I think we should hesitate before proceeding with legislation in that direction, and we should enquire whether the Act is calculated to carry out the very desirable object which is sought by hon. gentlemen who are such earnest and serious advocates of that Act. I think the time has arrived when it should be demanded and ascertained by the people who are going to suffer financially from the operation of that Act, whether it is really calculated to be a temperance Act or the contrary. If it is calculated to be an Act which will demoralise our people, which will increase intemperance among our people, which will lead to evils which do not exist now, I think the hon. gentleman who is so anxious to agitate for the passage of this Act, if he only found that he was acting in the wrong, would be willing to stop in the further pursuance of that object. I think that is another reason why the amendment tending to increase the operation of the Act should be fully and carefully considered by the House.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne). I trust the promise which has been made by the Premier will be carried out, and that we will have a chance to consider these various amendments to the Canada Temperance Act. This Act has been adopted in a large number of constituencies of the Dominion, and notwithstanding the objections made by the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton), I think a large section of the people of this country are favorable to the Canada Temperance Act. I rise simply to ask the Premier if he will permit these Bills amending the Canada Temperance Act to be placed at the head of the Order Paper, so that they may be reached at an early day. Perhaps they might be referred to a special committee. I think it is due to the temperance people of this country that prominence should be given to these measures, and I ask the Premier, on behalf of the temperance men on this side of the House, to use his influence to have these Bills placed at the head of the Order paper. To-day an hon. member asked that a day should be fixed for the discussion of an important Bill with reference to the Factory Act, and I think it would be well that the Premier should, in deference to the temperance men in the House and in the country, give prominence to these measures in order that they may be all discussed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. All I have to say is, if the hon. gentleman desires that my hon. friend's Bill should be thrown over, until all the Bills, relating to the whole question—to the Scott Act and the McCarthy Act—can be discussed, my hon. friend behind me may perhaps lose his Bill. He brings down a Bill with a specific object, and I think, in the interest the hon. gentleman speaks for, he had better speak on this Bill, and not let any extraneous matters come in; otherwise the whole thing may be lost.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne). The most important Bill relating to the Canada Temperance Act, is that containing the amendments asked for by the Dominion Alliance, in the hands of the hon. member for North Lanark (Mr. Jamieson); and I wish to have discussed not only the Bill of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster), but also that of the hon. member for North Lanark.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It will be time enough to discuss the Bill when we arrive at it.

Mr. McCARTHY. I only rise to say that if the Liquor Act of 1883 has the effect which one of the superior courts of one of the Provinces says it has, it was certainly not the intention of the framers of the Bill; and I think it right to say that the way in which this double or second section crept in was that the anxiety of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster), which I then concurred in, was that the legislation then proposed should not in any way affect the Scott Act. The clause as it was would, perhaps, have been sufficient to have that effect; but the hon. gentleman was very anxious, and the House will remember that it was at the close of the Session that the matter was proposed, and in that way the second clause was put in. I do not make this explanation on my own behalf so much as on behalf of the hon. member for King's, who, I believe, has been assailed for allowing it to slip in designedly or without proper attention.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

PATENT ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. McCARTHY moved second reading of Bill (No. 64) to further amend the Patent Act of 1872. He said: The Bill, as I explained when I had the honor of introducing it to the House, is for the purpose of amending one provision of the Patent Act, namely, that particular section which gives to the Minister who has charge of patents jurisdiction to set aside a patent on the grounds mentioned in this section. The Bill provides, as the House will know, the machinery for an appeal, and also makes provision for the examination of witnesses under oath, and for a proper examination by the Minister who is to try and determine the question as to the validity of the patent. Attention has been drawn to the extraordinary provision in the law by a recent case of very great importance, known as the Bell Telephone case. In that case, on complaint being made to the Minister, he felt himself compelled—and I do not know but that he was doing quite rightly, if the law is a proper law—to hear the complaint that was made against the Bell Telephone Company, and after hearing evidence to adjudicate and determine upon it; and the result was that he held that the patent was void. Now, that is an extraordinary procedure, and one which I think had better perhaps be swept away from the Statute Book altogether. I am not at all quarrelling with the provisions of the law, or saying that it is not a proper law; but when we have properly constituted courts, with judges who are above suspicion, to hear matters of this kind, I do not think it is necessary that a Minister should retain a jurisdiction such as this section gives him. He is an executive officer, and is necessarily a politician; and for many reasons which are sufficiently obvious, it is evident that this particular kind of jurisdiction should not be in the hands of a Minister or his deputy, but if it is to be in the hands of a Minister, I do not suppose any hon. member will say that there ought not to be an appeal. In the case I mentioned, one man has had the power to determine absolutely that a property valued, as I am told by the proprietors, at something like half a million dollars, is forfeited, and at one stroke of his pen, to sweep it away. Now, whether it be half a million or a quarter of a million dollars, or whatever the value may be, it does appear to me an extraordinary thing that the right of determining the question of property should be vested in one man without the right of appeal. Moreover—and in this I have no doubt I shall receive the support of my hon. friends who stand up for provincial rights, and who are very anxious that no legislation should be had that trenches on the rights of the Provinces—I think it is a very serious question whether the clause to which I refer is not unconstitutional. When a patent is granted under the authority of this Parliament, or by a Department created by this Parliament, that patent becomes a matter of property, and if the property in that patent is taken away, I submit, it can only, and ought only to be taken away according to the law of the Province in which the holder of the patent may reside. Now, this particular clause gives to a Minister, and also to the deputy of that Minister, jurisdiction to try the question as to the validity of the patent. I think the two things can be very easily separated. The one part of the clause which states the terms and conditions on which a patent shall be held is clearly within the competence of this Parliament; but the manner in which the question of the breach of the conditions is to be tried is a matter which appears to be wholly and exclusively within the competence of the Legislatures of the Provinces. To illustrate my meaning: suppose that the patent, instead of being a patent of the kind I mentioned, was a patent of land in the North-West, where we have power to grant patents; I do not suppose any person would contend that in granting a patent of land in the North-West this Parliament could annex to it the condition that in case any dispute arose as to its validity it should be tried in any particular way or before any particular tribunal. I can see no distinction in that respect between a patent of land and a patent of this kind. What I am saying now has no reference to the question as to whether the law should be swept away; but if it is to remain, I do not think anyone will have any objection to the Bill. The first clause provides power to summon witnesses; the fifth clause provides for the power of examining witnesses under oath; the sixth clause gives the power to the Minister to issue a commission to examine witnesses who may not be within his jurisdiction, so as to be summoned by subpoena—and so on. I will not weary the House with details. Objection may be taken to one word in the ninth clause and I am not at all certain that it should not be eliminated: "There shall be an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada from any present or future decision of the Minister." The right to appeal from "the present decision" will, of course, be retroactive. It is a matter of procedure, but it is questionable whether we should pass anything in the character of retroactive legislation. However, this will be left for the committee to determine. For these reasons I hope the House will accept the principle of the Bill, and in committee any amendments may be made which the House will, in its judgment, think proper.

Mr. COLBY. I do not at all concur in the views expressed by the hon. gentleman. The 28th clause of the Patent Act which he proposes to amend was inserted as a matter of public policy, and the manner of enforcing it was deliberately decided by this Parliament at the time the clause was under consideration. It is very well understood that in England and the United States a patentee is under no obligation to utilise his patent for the public good. He has an absolute proprietary interest in it, whether he uses it or not, during the entire period of the patent. The contract is simply, on his part, that he shall, in his application, in his specification, in his drawings, and in his models, so discover the invention that when his property ceases it becomes public property, so that any person skilled in the arts can then have the full benefit of the invention; but during the life of the patent, in England and the United States, the patentee is under no obligations whatever to use it. He may lock it up; he may prevent any other person from using it or infringing on it; he may give the public no advantage whatever from it, if he chooses. That is not the policy of our law. Our law is more in accordance with that adopted by the continental nations of Europe—France, Belgium, and, I think, Germany. Under our law the contract is a conditional contract. The patentee is to have no right to utilise his invention unless he makes it beneficial to the country which gives him the privilege of utilising it. He must make it beneficial to the country by putting it in operation, by giving the public the advantage to be derived from its use. We deliberately, by this clause 28, make it a condition between the patentee and the public that the patentee must use it in this country under certain conditions, and we further state that the conditions must be entered in the body of the patent itself as conditions of the patent. He takes the patent subject to those conditions, which are in the interest of the public at large. One condition is, that he shall not import that invention after a period of twelve months from the time he takes out his patent. That condition is imposed in the interests of Canadian industry, in order that this country may have the advantage of the manufacture of the invention. Another condition is, that within two years he must cause his invention to be manufactured in some manufactory in Canada, so that any person wishing to obtain it can obtain it at a reasonable price. This condition is subject to modification; it is in the discretion of the commissioner, if proper reasons be advanced, to give the patentee an extension of time; but the principle of the law is distinctly laid down, as a binding condition of the contract itself between the patentee and the public, that he shall not import, after a certain period, and that after a certain other period he shall give this country the benefit of the manufacture of the patent. How is that carried into effect? The law says that the patent may be set aside by the ordinary courts for other reasons, but as regards the violation of this particular clause the Department of Agriculture is the tribunal to decide the question. That provision was made in the interest of the people of this country and of the manufacturing industries of this country. Any question arising under it can be but a simple question of fact; it can be but a question as to whether the invention has or has not been imported after the period of twelve months, or as to whether it has been, or has not been manufactured in the Dominion within the period of two years. Both are simple questions of fact, with all the proof of which the respondent himself, the party charged with having voided his own patent, is fully seized. If he has not imported or has not manufactured, or if he has imported or has manufactured, the facts are clearly to be shown by his own books. Why was this not put into the hands of the ordinary courts? Why was it not made a question on which the ordinary tribunals could pass, beginning with the original court, thence to the Court of Appeal, thence to the Supreme Court, and finally to the Privy Council? The reason is evident. It was simply to protect the people, to protect the manufacturers of this country, to protect those who may desire to manufacture and work an invention in their own interests and the interest of the public, because these men would not enter on the formidable task of attempting to break down a patent if they saw they would be compelled to go from one court to the other, ending with the Privy Council, and probably be kept in the courts for years. The Department of Agriculture is the place, the tribunal, a cheap and summary tribunal; there every man, without the intervention of an attorney, without the intervention of my learned friend who introduces this Bill, dispensing with that valuable class of people, may go before the Minister of Agriculture, where the patent is, and where the model is, and where the proofs are, and make out his prima facie case that this patent has been voided on these two questions of simple fact; and then the Minister can call up the other party and satisfy himself with regard to the case. There are no abstruse legal points whatever to be decided but a simple question of facts; and if any incidental question of law should arise the Minister of Agriculture has the advice of the Minister of Justice at his disposal, who is in a position to give a legal decision. My hon. friend who introduced this Bill was worsted recently in a case he had before the Minister of Agriculture. He is not now a Daniel come to judgment. But my hon. friend's colleague, in speaking of other decisions of the Minister of Agriculture, did not speak of them at all in a disparaging way. His colleague, Mr. Cameron, who was an associate with him in this important case, said, on a former occasion:

"This interpretation has gone forth to the world. It is to be found in every patent office, and in every patent and solicitor's office. * * * It is, moreover, a decision which has received the approval of our highest courts."

That was a decision in a previous case, not in the last case.—

"It has received the approval of the Court of Appeal in Ontario, and it has received the approval of the Supreme Court, who not only have endorsed the conclusions, but have endorsed the reasons given by Mr. Taché, in what is described as his able judgment."

My hon. friend's colleague had no fault to find with the decision of that tribunal. My hon. friend's associate speaks of them as able decisions, which have received the approval of all the courts; but in this last unfortunate decision, in which my hon. friend's client was injured, the matter was a very serious one, and what is the serious effect and consequence? The serious consequence is simply this, that a great and gigantic monopoly has been broken down in this country; that the people of Canada, by the wise decision, the just decision, the careful and unexceptionable decision of the Minister of Agriculture, find that a gigantic monopoly has been broken down, which my friend in this Bill wishes to revive—for he makes it applicable to present decisions—and the people of Canada for all time to come are to have cheap telephoning instead of paying the excessive rates they would have had to pay had not these patents been voided. There could not be a better case in point. Would any weak company, desiring to give cheap service to the people of Canada, have ventured to attack that great monopoly, with all its wealth, if they had known that they were to be dragged from one court to another, from the original court to the Court of Appeal, and from the Court of Appeal to the Supreme Court, and from the Supreme Court to the Privy Council? I say that the very case which he cites as a case which justifies the modification of this law, is a case, of all others, which shows the absolute necessity of this law, if the people of Canada and the manufacturers of Canada are to have the advantages which the Legislature intended them to have, and which it is wise and in the interests of all the people of this country that they should have. The whole effect of that law will be nullified. We have a model room. A manufacturer goes into that room and sees something which he can manufacture conveniently in connection with his own industries. He goes to the office and asks: Who is the patentee? Is this thing being manufactured in Canada? If not, I desire to manufacture it. He satisfies himself that it is not being manufactured, and he lays his prima facie case before the Minister of Agriculture. He can do it without the intervention of any solicitor. He can go himself and can fill up documents which he can obtain. Then the Minister of Agriculture calls for the patentee and the matter of fact is sifted, and this man can then go on, having voided that patent, and utilise, for his own advantage and for the advantage of the people of Canada, this invention which the patentee bound himself, when he obtained his patent, to give to the people of Canada. Would that poor man, that man of ordinary means, that manufacturer, venture on that if he saw he was under the necessity of employing able counsel like my hon. friend, the introducer of this Bill, and was liable to be taken from court to court and to be kept a long time waiting for a decision? He would not. Then the whole beneficial effect of this law would be nullified by making it a matter for the courts. The Legislature foresaw this, and saw that the only way to make the 28th clause useful to the country, the only way by which it could be carried out beneficially to the manufacturers and the enterprising men of this country, was to provide some cheap, some summary and easy and speedy remedy by which these questions of fact could be decided. The law has operated well. Every decision which has been rendered, except the last, has been satisfactory to the public at large, and the last has been satisfactory to all the public, except to my hon. friend and his associates and his clients. But no decision ever rendered by any court will, I believe, be attended with more beneficial results than the decision of which my hon. friend complains and which he states as a reason why this law should be changed; for, during all the future, this instrument can and will, by fair and legitimate competition, be brought at a cheap rate to the door of every man who wishes to use it throughout the land, and can be obtained at rates which could not have been dreamed of if this monopoly could have held this patent, so justly voided in consequence of their own acts, their own failure to do what was clearly pointed out in the contract given them at the time they took the patent. I object entirely to the Bill which my hon. friend has introduced. I think it is wrong. I think it is not at all in the interests of the country. I think that clause will be a nugatory clause, if the matter is taken from the present jurisdiction and thrown into the hands of the courts, and I shall feel called upon, if my hon. friend insists upon retaining that feature in the Bill, to divide the House upon the subject.

Mr. MULOCK. My hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), presents this Bill to the consideration of the House on the grounds, as he argues, that the present law is unconstitutional. He argues that the law, as it stands at present, is an infringement on civil rights which were delegated to the Provinces alone, and as an illustration of that argument, he states the case of the grant of lands by the Dominion, and then asks whether the Crown could afterwards cancel those patents, and concludes his illustration by saying he sees no distinction between the position of a patentee of lands and a patentee under the Patent Act. Well, if he does not see any distinction between the two cases, I think others will. There is a vast difference between the two. In the case of a patent of lands, what is patented? Something tangible, something that has a locality—immovable land. But, under the Patent Act, what is patented is a bare privilege, the creature of Parliament, which can be granted on such conditions and subject to such terms as the creator of that privilege may choose to assign to it. The patentee, under these circumstances, does not at any time own the absolute property. He has only the enjoyment of his right sub modo at best, and he cannot say, when the rescission of the patent takes place, that there has been a forfeiture of any right. There has been simply a carrying out of the contract which gave him a conditional privilege only. There is no absolute withdrawal of the right from him.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think my hon. friend has misunderstood my argument. I did not pretend to say that the imposition of the conditions is beyond the competency of this Parliament, but that the trial of that question, the creation of a tribunal for the trial of that question, unless it was the creation of a court, was beyond the competency of Parliament.

Mr. MULOCK. I understood my hon. friend to say that the property of a patentee in a patent was a private right; that it became property in the technical meaning of the word "property" under the British North America Act; and, that being so, that it was solely under the jurisdiction of the Provinces.

Mr. McCARTHY. Merely as to the trial. I quite admit, of course, that conditions may be imposed, and that they have been properly imposed.

Mr. MULOCK. My hon. friend argued that the House, in delegating the power to deal with the matter to one of its own officers, was proceeding unconstitutionally, and that cannot be, unless it is shown that the subject matter of the trial is not under the jurisdiction of this House. If the subject matter to be dealt with is under the jurisdiction of this Parliament, as this is, then I submit that Parliament, or the agent of Parliament, the Minister, or any other agent, can deal with it. He has not shown any necessity for this legislation, and I do not think that Parliament is called upon to amend or repeal measures, unless it can be shown to be in the public interest that the repealing or amending should take place. The only case that can be cited, the most recent case, the rescission of the patent of the Bell Telephone Company, I do not think amounts to a public grievance. In the part of the country that I am familiar with I am not aware that the public see that any injustice was done to the patentees or to the general public. On the contrary, it is my great pleasure to be able to testify to the general approbation with which the decision of the Minister of Agriculture in that case was received. My hon. friend from North Simcoe says: Why not delegate this to the courts? We have courts, and as long as we have upright and impartial judges, let them deal with the matter. Does he say that the Government, either this Government or any succeeding Government, is not equally fit to be entrusted with this power? It is true that there is a nominal decision in each case of an individual, but he does it upon the responsibility of himself and his whole Cabinet. If he is wrong his whole Cabinet will bear more or less of the blame, and he is, we must assume, ready to take the responsibilities of his act. He feels that he is only one individual deciding that case, but he knows that the whole remaining twelve of his colleagues share the responsibility of his action. Therefore, I think the public have equal, if not greater, guarantees in this case, with the advantage that the Minister of Agriculture will deal as intelligently and carefully in the matter as if it were in the hands of the ordinary courts of the land. Further, I think, Mr. Speaker, there are very great objections to having mere questions of fact taken away from the judge in the first instance, and transferred to other courts. It is a cardinal rule, and has become almost an absolute portion of our law to-day, that no appeal on mere questions of fact can be entertained. We know that in all cases of appeal the judges are almost conclusively bound by the decision of the first judge on the question of fact. And what is the Minister of Agriculture called upon to decide here? Not questions of law; merely questions of fact. He is called upon to decide whether the patentee has or has not complied with the conditions of the Patent Act—namely, has he imported contrary to law? Has he manufactured or has he not manufactured? Bare questions of fact. What matter is there for appeal in such cases? The question under this Act is, did the patentee manufacture the article within two years? Now, is not one man as capable to decide that as fifty men? Another question is, whether he imported contrary to law. That is a bare question of fact. We require no Supreme Court to tell us whether he did or did not; we do not require to go to the Privy Council to ascertain that fact. Therefore, I say that even if we admit, for a moment, that it were proper subject matter for the provincial or other courts, nevertheless I say it is in no sense a case in which an appeal should be allowed if you have confidence in the court of first jurisdiction. Now this motion is only the first step. Let the House to-day pass this measure, and what will we have our friend here applying for next year, or the succeeding year? He will say: Why give this jurisdiction to the Government at all? Why not, in the first instance, take the whole matter to some of the courts? What is the life of a patent? Five, ten, or fifteen years, at the option of the patentee. Why, before the right can be determined, the patent will have expired, and thus, practically, there will be no power to enforce compliance with the conditions on which the patent was granted. If that principle is admitted, if what my hon. friend is contending for is granted, then you may as well say there is no power left to compel the patentee to comply with the requirements of the law. It is entirely in the competence of this Parliament to attach such conditions as it may see fit as to any privileges it may grant. No public necessity has been shown for this measure. Therefore, neither on local grounds nor on grounds of public necessity, can any argument be advanced in favor of the measure. One part of the Bill, however, I think might be agreed to—that portion of it which provides that the Minister may obtain evidence under oath. That is merely in order to further enable him to do complete justice, and to ascertain the truth and the whole truth. To that part of it, without having heard any argument upon it, I can see no objection.

Mr. WHITE (East Hastings). I am glad to hear that we have one common sense man in this country, and that is the gentleman who presides over the Department of Agriculture. The hon. mover of this Bill, on another occasion, said there was to be one common sense man on the Railway Commission. Now, Sir, when we have a gentleman who presides over that Department, and gives such excellent decisions, and so satisfactory to the public, I think we had better allow this matter to remain in his hands. I am very glad there is one court in this country from which we can get a decision so sound, and so early after the action is entered. The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) asked how long after a person entered a case would he be able to get it through? You can commence the action in the County Court; it is then taken to the Court of Queen's Bench, then to Toronto, then to Ottawa, and then to the old country. It takes a great many years and a great deal of money. Mr. Speaker, I move that this Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read this day six months.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am a good deal surprised at the great warmth displayed by my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Colby) in his opposition to this Bill. The accusations that he levelled at me might perhaps entitle me to return the compliment. I do not know, therefore I do not say, whether my hon. friend was interested or not in the company that presented the petition to the Minister of Agriculture. If I did know I could not say, according to the rules of this House. Every hon. member, however, must be left to draw his own conclusion from what we saw and what we heard, and certainly I have not found any difficulty in drawing my conclusion upon the subject. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not at all quarrelling, and therefore my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) need not have argued so strenuously against a position which I certainly did not take up, and that is, that this Parliament had not power to impose any conditions upon the patentee. On the contrary, I said I approved of those conditions. I do not think it will very much advance the National Policy, but I congratulate the member from North York for his adhesion to the National Policy to that extent, because it will to some extent, at all events, be promotive of industry in the country. But, Mr. Speaker, I object to another clause, and that is that any one man, even a man so great and so just as I quite freely admit my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture is, should have the power to determine the rights of any person in this country by his mere ipse dixit. I am astonished to find that any member of this House will stand up and say that one man is to determine vast questions of right, where property may be in question, of very considerable value, as frequently is the case, without an opportunity of calling witnesses, and without examining them under oath. We are told it is a question of fact; that there is no question of law involved; and yet this question of fact is to bind the patentee, and to bind the complainant, because it binds one party as well as the other; this question of fact is to be determined upon the papers sent into the Minister, not even sworn to, and he, not having the power to swear them, and without the men being brought to be cross-examined, without an opportunity afforded to everybody, to every subject, of having the witness brought face to face, and of having an opportunity to cross-examine that witness. I am astonished that there should have been found any hon. gentleman in this House who would stand up in favor of a system such as that. My hon. friend says, and insinuates, that it is done in the interests of the profession which I have the honor to belong. Well, so far as that is concerned, I do not think, speaking for myself, that I require to make practice; I certainly do not feel as if I desired in any way to promote legislation with that end in view. But it is not a fact that the lawyers are not now employed to go before the Minister, for I think a number of lawyers appeared in this case, about three or four times the number that would have been allowed to appear before any ordinary court; and the Minister, with his usual good nature, heard lawyer after lawyer—I think about a dozen, all told. I only appeared before him on one occasion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And probably got as high fees.

Mr. McCARTHY. And probably got quite as high fees as in many ordinary cases. That is an argument which might be addressed to a body different from this—that it is a poor man's court where questions can be cheaply and quickly determined. All those are arguments which might be characterised in language not very complimentary to the hon. member. The question is this: If the patentee gets the patent upon those conditions, conditions which are fair, is it proper or right that his patent should be taken away by a tribunal constituted as this tribunal is? Why, the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) who has no confidence in the Minister of Agriculture or in any of his colleagues, as I understand him, thinks we ought not only to have confidence in the hon. gentleman but should accept his decision as a higher authority than the courts of the land, than judges sworn to do their duty impartially, judges only removable by joint address of both Houses of Parliament, men who hold office during good behavior in that way. The hon. gentleman must be—I am not desiring to make any attack on the hon. gentleman, I am not desiring to express an opinion about his decision in the last case, for I desired, and I thought I made myself plain when I introduced the Bill, to say that if he thinks proper there should be no appeal in the last case, and I think it would be better there should not be—but I say that this very important case, in which a vast amount of property is concerned, has brought prominently before the people the fact that their property may be taken away by the decision of one man, and he not a judge, a man not possessing legal training, not amenable to public opinion; by one man who is necessarily a politician, and whose judgment will not be accepted in every case, whatever may be his decision, as one of a satisfactory character. There have been Ministers of Agriculture, and there will be other Ministers of Agriculture, and I ask hon. members to try and remember who they were, and perhaps to look forward and see who will probably fill that position, and let them ask themselves whether they are willing that matters of such importance should be dealt with and decided by a Minister who happens to fill the position of Minister of Agriculture. Moreover, his deputy is vested with the same power as is the Minister, the deputy who is not even amenable to this House, who does not carry with him in his decisions that tremendous weight which is to be given to the decision of a Minister, according to the member for North York (Mr. Mulock), because he sees in it the decision of the whole Cabinet, a doctrine which members of the Cabinet will not desire to accept.

Mr. MULOCK. I did not wish to give the House to understand, for a moment, that I supposed the whole Cabinet personally were aware of the decision, or gave it as their judgment. I simply meant that in giving that decision the hon. gentleman compromised his Cabinet, and as regards the effect, made not only himself responsible but his twelve colleagues.

Mr. McCARTHY. Can there be any better argument than that offered by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, for doing away with such a law? He says the decision compromised the Cabinet, and that the decision must be viewed with respect to the effect upon the Cabinet and upon public opinion, and with reference to the chance of an adverse decision in this House, and matters of that kind, which certainly would not enter into the consideration of a judicial officer in determining a matter between two people in this Dominion. No better argument can be offered than the suggestion made by the hon. member for North York in the explanation he has given to the House. I desire not to be misrepresented by the hon. member behind me or by the hon. member for North York. I desire the House to understand that this is, as I have said, a one man's decision, the decision of a man who has no power to call witnesses, who decides upon evidence that is not sworn evidence, and upon statements made behind the back of the party interested, without opportunity being afforded for cross-examination. All this, I say, is, to my mind, so monstrous that I can hardly imagine it being brought to the attention of the House without the House desiring an amendment made to the law. My hon. friend has endeavored to mix up the rights of patentees with the general and abstract question. He says in particular no more beneficial decision could be given. What has been effected? For this time forth we shall have cheap telephoning, and will get that accommodation which is becoming so very essential to men of business at a cheaper rate. Is that an argument worthy of the hon. gentleman; is it an argument that ought to have fallen from a man so distinguished; is it an argument which could have fallen from any person but one who might have something more than a public interest in the question? Surely the hon. member will hardly say it was right to present that as an argument against this amendment of the law, this amendment as regards the abstract principle, as to whether it is right that the gentleman whom I have already described should have the determination of a question of this kind. Surely it was not in any sense as a bribe that it was held out to members of the House. But I can tell the hon. gentleman—I mention this for his private information—that, perhaps, so far as that case goes, he has not heard the last of it. According to an ancient and well known jurisdiction, the Court of Queen's Bench has the right to revise proceedings of tribunals created as this tribunal is; it has a right to call on the Minister to certify to the court all the proceedings that have taken place before him, and I do not think it is a very dignified position for the Minister to occupy.

Mr. COLBY. Have you not failed to get such an order from the court?

Mr. McCARTHY. I have not failed. The hon. gentleman is not very familiar with the procedure taken. There is at present an application before the court, for the purpose of compelling the Minister to certify to the Court of Queen's Bench all the proceedings that took place before him, and it is an ancient jurisdiction of the court which has been exercised, because that court always claimed to exercise supervision over proceedings of what, according to the view of the law, is an judicial tribunal. I say if that is a proceeding which is open, it is not a dignified position for a Minister to be placed in, to be called on to certify his proceedings to a judge sitting in Toronto, St. John or Halifax, for his revision and decision.

Mr. COLBY. Then we do not need this law.

Mr. McCARTHY. I submit we do need the law. The proper way to determine such rights is by a properly constituted court of law. If such a trial is surrounded by too many obstacles and difficulties the law should be amended by the proper Legislatures. But I do not know why the law disposing of questions of patents should be different from the law with respect to rights in regard to other questions. Rights of property, of character and reputation, we are willing to leave to the courts of the land; but, forsooth, a question of patents is one which some hon. members think the courts are not capable of dealing with, simply because it involves questions of fact. I deny in toto that this is merely a question of fact. The Minister knows that in this very case rather difficult questions of law came up, or at all events were argued. The question was as to the importing of portions of instruments said to be patented, and it was a rather difficult question of law to determine whether the parts imported were those which involved a forfeiture of the patent granted. If, of course, there had been an importation of the instrument in whole there would be no difficulty; but in this particular case, and probably in many cases, the difficulty would arise as to the importation in part, and as to whether they were such portions as the law contemplated should be manufactured in the country, and should not be imported. I propose, Mr. Speaker, to ask the House to read the Bill a second time. I think in doing so I will only be discharging my duty as one of the representatives of the people. It is perfectly true that my attention was brought to this subject by the case to which reference has been made; but, as I say, my own opinion is, that it would be better that the power to review the decision should be omitted from the discussion and consideration of this particular question. It should be treated, and I trust it will be treated, simply on its merits, and the merits of the question are: Should it be a matter to be disposed of by a Minister, or by a Deputy Minister, without any special training or experience, the question of whether a person's property is or is not forfeited? Hon. gentlemen will remember that my Bill is not repealing; it is assuming this right, though I would willingly accept the other conclusion; but if the Minister is to have that power ought he to have the power of summoning witnesses? That is the first clause. Ought he to have the power of examining witnesses on oath, or of issuing a commission for the examination of witnesses who cannot attend? When he decides the matter, should there be the right of appeal; or is his decision irrevocable? If the House does not care to accept the main provision, there are some provisions which the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) thinks should be adopted, and certainly the House should not say that the Bill should be read the second time this day six months, but that it should be read the second time on this occasion.

Mr. POPE. I have listened very attentively to my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and I have listened to the slurs—I may say, the rather impudent slurs—which he has cast upon my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Colby). I do not think he had any right to say that my hon. friend was influenced by having an interest in this patent. Whether he had an interest in the patent or not I do not know, but I would ask the hon. member for Simcoe whether he did not have a large fee for carrying this matter before the courts? and having obtained that fee, whether he thinks he should not do what he can for those clients of his, and show them that he is doing his best to earn his fee? I ask him this question, though I do not suppose he is influenced in that way. I know he is far removed from influences of that kind. But still lawyers and attorneys are like other men—they are apt to be influenced. Not that I think that my hon. friend would be influenced, but still I think he would like to serve his client, and to show him that he had done what he could to support a measure in this House which he thinks would suit his client. I think he would like his client to feel that he had earned his money, and certainly he has no right to cast aspersions on my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Colby), for anything he has done in this House, unless he is prepared to take the same himself. Now, what is the condition of these men who came to get this patent? Did they come here blindly? Did they come without knowing what they were doing? Has anything been forced on them? They came to get this patent under a contract between them and the State. They came here and said: We want a patent; and the Government replied: We will give you a patent under certain conditions, one condition of which is that you shall manufacture that instrument in this country, within a certain time, and that you shall not import it after a certain time. These are the conditions; and if those gentlemen had complied with them, there would have been no case of this kind; there would have been nothing of this description here. But they failed in those conditions—they thought they could dodge those conditions. It is true that they did bring in these articles, and although they failed to bring them in within the time prescribed by the Act. I did not think the accident of their not getting them in within the time was a criminal matter. But they attempted to dodge the conditions by manufacturing all the parts, by punching all the holes, by making all the bars and other parts that could be made outside, and bringing them in and putting them together. I would ask if that was manufacturing them in this country? I say that the industrious people of this country, who give privileges to these patentees, have their rights in the matter. But that is not all. The next complaint is, that I, the Minister of Agriculture, or my deputy, for whose every act I am responsible—that I am not responsible to the people of this country.

Mr. McCARTHY. No.

Mr. POPE. "Not amenable to public opinion"—those are his words. Now, I would like to ask, Is a judge sitting in court more amenable to public opinion than I am? Is it possible the hon. gentleman means that I am not amenable to public opinion in any decision I may render? Am I not more so than are the judges who are appointed for life, who do not have to go to the people, who do not have to appeal to this House for support? Is such a man less amenable to public opinion than I am?

Mr. McCARTHY. I said the hon. gentleman was too much amenable to public opinion; that he had to come to this House—to go to public opinion, to court public opinion, and that a judge should not be in that position.

Mr. POPE. I say, in the next place, that if the hon. gentleman's Bill passes there will be no relief to the poor man; there will be no chance of his getting justice. I am not saying this in any sentimental way, or because I am crying out for the poor man's interests; but I do say that the public would not undertake these cases, as the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) has said, if they had to go to the courts for justice. And more than that, Sir; if they were to be dealt with in that way, when, do you think, decisions would be rendered? The very object of the Act is that in matters of this kind decisions shall be promptly given. Of course, there may be other questions of law, etc., arising out of the Act, in which I have no right to decide; they go to the tribunals; but these mere questions of fact between the State and the patentee I am bound to decide, and the result is, I think, that justice, and speedy justice, is done. There was another point raised by the hon. gentleman with regard to the examinations, but I would just say that in this case I had no great difficulty in getting at what I believed to be the rights of the matter. I found no difficulty in cross-examining the witnesses, and they were thoroughly cross-examined. I am certain we got at the truth; but I felt, during the investigation, that if I had had the power—if I had had power to bring before me some men who did not come there, they might have thrown some light on the subject. Upon that I do not disagree with the hon. gentleman very much; but upon the other aspect of the matter I must say I shall have to support the motion of my hon. friend for the six months' hoist.

Mr. COOK. I wish to make a few observations in connection with this matter before a vote is taken. We have now in this House the leader of the Government and the Government benches, the leader of the Opposition and the Opposition benches, the left centre in the person of the member for Northumberland, N.B. (Mr. Mitchell), and we have now the right centre in the person of the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). Well, Sir, we are getting quite a number of parties here. We find that the hon. member for North Simcoe does not agree with his friend the Minister of Agriculture upon this question, and he taunts the member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) with being interested in this telephone business. It has been said by other speakers that it might be said that the hon. member for North Simcoe was interested. Well, whether he was interested or not, of course, in his position as solicitor, this matter entered into his mind from the fact of the question coming before the courts. Now, Sir, I am entirely opposed to taking away this power from the Minister of Agriculture and relegating it to the courts. I believe, as has been said by the Minister of Agriculture, that decisions of this kind should be speedy and inexpensive. I know, in the particular case of the Bell Telephone Company, that universal satisfaction was given by his decision to the people of Toronto. The Bell Telephone Company have not rendered good service, at all events in the city of Toronto. They have not only not rendered good service, but they have been impudent. They were a great monopoly and had the business of the whole country in their hands, and the manager of that company was really insolent to those who were using their wires. I am very glad that the question has been decided so promptly by the Minister of Agriculture, for the very reason that the officials of companies of that kind will be civil towards their patrons, and we shall also have a better service. I believe myself that that part of the Bill which gives the Minister power to subpoena witnesses and examine them under oath is quite right; but to allow an appeal from the Minister would be as bad as taking the matter out of his hands altogether, because it would be relegated to the courts; and so financially strong is the Bell Telephone Company, that God knows if we should ever have a decision. We know the gullibility of lawyers; they like money as well as any other class of men, and we know that they would like to have matters of this kind dangling before the courts, so that they could get as much out of it as possible, particularly when they have a good customer. I remember a circumstance of a man who was pretty wealthy, in a country town of Ontario. He had a case in the courts, and a lawyer in his town kept it in court for years and years, until at last the client became restless, and said he would go to Toronto and consult some other lawyers. His lawyer said to him: "If you are bound to go to Toronto and consult a solicitor there, I will give you a letter introducing you to a good firm." He gave him the letter and sealed it. On his way to Toronto the client began to feel suspicious as to what was inside of this letter. He opened and read it, and it ended by saying: "This is a good fat goose; pick him well." That is the way the lawyers act with these good fat geese sometimes—they pick them well; and I have no doubt my hon. friend would be no exception to the rule if he got a good client like the Bell Telephone Company.

Mr. MILLS. While I do not approve of all that the hon. gentleman's Bill contains, I am disposed to vote for its second reading. I know that the property in patents is a property created by this Legislature. It is under the control of this Legislature, and exists under such conditions as the law relating to patents provides, and as this Legislature chooses to attach to the continuance of that kind of property. But once the property is created it does seem to me that there is no reason for making it an exception to the general rule, and providing that a Minister, in the discharge of his ordinary administrative duties, shall sit in judgment and say whether a certain party has property in a particular patent or not. In fact, the observation made by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) in regard to this subject, reminds me of an observation made by a Minister in this House some years ago—Sir Charles Tupper—in reference to the objections which were then being made to the patent law, that it was cheaper to steal than to buy. The hon. member for Stanstead assures the House that the country has largely profited by the decision of the Minister of Agriculture in the particular case in question, because that decision has put an end to a monopoly. In fact, the argument of the hon. gentleman, if it had any value at all, would be an argument against the existence of a patent law; because if we were to permit any person to engage in the manufacture of any particular article, and refuse him the protection of the patent law, although we might seriously interfere with the progress of invention within the country, it is certain that in the production of the article there would be nothing to pay for the invention itself. But, Sir, I do not think, whether the decision of the Minister of Agriculture, in that particular case was a proper decision or not, is the question that we have now before us. We are not called upon to review what the Minister of Agriculture did in that instance; but we are called upon to consider this question, whether in an important matter, where complex facts may arise, where the question as to the right of property may depend upon considerations which the Minister of Agriculture may not be the most competent man to decide, we should depart from the usual practice of protecting every man's rights and interests by the judiciary of the country. It is perfectly obvious that in questions where the dispute as to a right of property in a patent may arise, important questions of law may be involved, and it may be wholly impossible to separate the law from the facts, and the law as well as the facts must be passed upon. One feature of the gentleman's Bill—that allowing the Minister to deal with the question of right in the first instance, and giving an appeal from his decision—is, I think, objectionable. I do not think the Minister ought to be charged with judicial duties in the matter at all. He may be called upon to report; but it is an unusual proceeding, and one to which, in many instances, the Supreme Court of the United States has taken exception. They will not listen to an appeal from any but regular and properly constituted tribunals. It must be a judicial body before they will consent to consider an appeal from it. Thus, in the case of the Court of Claims, as first constituted, that court was an advisory body of the Ministers, and the Supreme Court said its action, not being final as a judgment, they would not consider an appeal from it. It does seem to me that, while it may be very proper that the Minister should make a report on the case and express an opinion, that report or opinion should have no judicial value, and that wherever a contest arises as to the right of property in any patent, that question ought to be judicially passed upon, and the claim which any one puts forward ought not to be decided, except by due process of law had before a competent tribunal.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is just the present case. Under the patent law there, is a judicial tribunal, and it is by the course of the law and in the course of the law the decision is made. To be sure the judge has not been called to the bar; he does not wear a gown; still, he is a judge appointed by law and acting as a judge, and, as has been already argued by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby), the question is not a matter of law but of evidence, a matter of fact, and I think the Minister of Agriculture, who has got his subordinates all around him, trained in the study of the patent law, acquainted with it in all its particulars, experts in patent law—I think they are better judges than the judge on the bench of the evidence laid before them in appeal. If this is a matter to be tried before a judge the judge should have a jury to assist him. The jury are not lawyers; the jury decide the fact, not the judge; and here we have the whole of that branch of the Department of Agriculture, the Patent Office, as a judicial authority and as a jury as well; and certainly, both as judge and jury, as competent and more competent than any judge could be, that judge not having the assistance of a jury to decide upon the fact of the credibility of witnesses. I agree with my hon. friend that that portion of the Bill which provides that the witnesses shall not be sworn, and that they should be liable to be summoned, as at any other court, and that this tribunal should have power to issue a commission to examine absent or invalid witnesses, should be passed. I quite agree that power should be given, but that is a very small portion of the Bill. This Bill attacks, in fact and in substance, the jurisdiction of the Minister of Agriculture as a court to decide such questions.

Mr. McCARTHY. No; there is the appeal.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He has the power to sit upon the case, but in every matter of this kind there will be an appeal. That is only one of the clauses of the Bill. I think, therefore, my hon. friend's Bill ought not to receive a second reading, and I think, also, that the Minister of Agriculture should feel himself bound to bring down an Act to give himself the powers claimed by this measure.

Mr. EDGAR. As it is perfectly evident a large majority of this House are in favor of a portion of the Bill, I do not see why my hon. friend should not move that portion of the Bill, amending the Bill by leaving out the remainder.

Mr. McCARTHY. I would ask leave, on the contrary, to move the discharge of the Order. If the Government will deal with the Bill I would prefer they would deal with it. When the Government measure is brought down it will be in the competency of any hon. member to move such amendments as he may think proper to it. I do this on the understanding that the Government will deal with the matter.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings) asked for leave to withdraw amendment.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. McCARTHY asked for leave to withdraw the motion for second reading.

Motion withdrawn and Order be discharged.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10:45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 19th March, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DEPARTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE.

Mr. CHAPLEAU moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 102) to amend the Acts respecting the Department of the Secretary of State. He said: The Bill is quite unimportant, except in one clause which provides that the Deputy Registrar General shall be appointed by Commission under the Great Seal instead of by an Order in Council. The name of the Deputy Registrar General appears in all the most important documents, and I think he should be appointed by Commission and not by Order in Council. The other part of the Bill is only to mention more particularly by name different instruments which are to be registered in the Registrar-General's Office.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 103) respecting the Electoral Franchise. He said: It is not necessary to go into a discussion of the Bill. The Bill is substantially on the lines of the Bill of last year, of which the general principles were stated to the House. I move the first reading of the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose, after the announcement the hon. gentleman made the other day as to the proper course being to make an expository speech, with reference to a Public Bill upon its introduction, we should have had from the hon. gentleman an explanation of the principle of this Bill. The hon. gentleman says that he has not given us that explanation, because the Bill is upon the general lines of the measure of last year, the principles of which were then explained to the House. That is rather an elastic expression, "upon the general lines." One would like very much to know how far it varies from those lines. But I must say that, according to my recollection, the hon. gentleman did not give any explanation at all upon the introduction of the Bill last year. I think such explanation as it was, was upon a still more remote occasion, because if this Bill is the same old Bill, it is an older friend than of last year—I think it was in the year before last that the hon. gentleman said something, and he said then very little. For example, one of the very important proposals the hon. gentleman then made was to extend the electoral franchise to the women of the country. But he gave no reasons for that; he entered into no exposition of the grounds of his action. The hon. gentleman did give some explanation upon that occasion with reference to another feature of the Bill. He told us he was about to appoint revising officers who were also to make up the lists; they were to make and revise the lists; and he declared that those officers were to be appointed by the Government of the day, as was done in England, where they were appointed by the Lord Chancellor, a member of the Government. Well, that was an explanation as far as it went. The only difficulty about that explanation was that it was an utterly erroneous explanation, that it did not state the facts of the case as they were in England, that the fact is not such as the hon. gentleman described. The hon. gentleman is now about to make—I cannot exactly remember—but I think his sixth or seventh attempt of passing a Franchise Bill for the Dominion of Canada; he is now proposing for the third time in this Parliament the passing of the Franchise Bill. He had decided, as it appeared by the Speech from the Throne, that the time had come to press this measure again. But I think it was his bounden duty to have brought it forward earlier; I think it was his duty to have brought it forward amongst the very first Bills. We had a great display of activity on the part of the members of the Government at the opening of the Session. There were a half dozen little—I cannot call them Bills—little pellets, thrown across the House on the first days immediately after the Address was passed. We had a little Bill from the Minister of Finance about precautions as to advances from the Provinces. We had a little Bill, I think, from the hon. Minister of Railways, and a Bill, I think, from one or two other Ministers, perhaps. The hon. gentlemen look surprised; I dare say they have both forgotten.

Mr. POPE. I am surprised because you happened to hit the thing just as it was.

Mr. BLAKE. I thought I hit the right spot. These simple measures were presented amid the cheers of their followers, as evidences of their appreciation of the extreme diligence of the hon. gentlemen opposite in the conduct of public business; but it was much cry and little wool. And now at the end of the seventh week of the Session, when we are told we are to get into the serious business, it is that the hon. gentleman, takes the first step towards bringing forward such an important measure as the Franchise Bill. The hon. gentleman has not favored us with the expository speech that we certainly had a right to expect from his former utterances, and therefore he has given me nothing to reply to as yet.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CONSTITUTION OF THE TREASURY BOARD.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 104) relating to the constitution of the Treasury Board. He said: I may state to the House that the alterations proposed will make the Treasury Board consist of six members instead of four, one of whom shall be the Secretary of State. A large portion of the business in connection with the examination of candidates for the Civil Service passes through the Department of the Secretary of State, and, therefore, it has been considered desirable to add that Minister to the Treasury Board, and in order that each of the principal Provinces, at least, should be represented on that board, it gives power to the Governor in Council to appoint any member of the Government as the sixth member of that board.

Mr. BLAKE. I am sorry to hear this announcement. As a general rule it has been laid down by a person who had considerable knowledge, I think, of these things, that boards are screens, and the thicker the board the larger the screen, in my opinion. In practice I have regarded the Treasury Board as rather a useful institution, and largely in consequence of the smallness of its numbers. I think that its efficiency and its sense of responsibility will be very much diminished by the proposed enlargement of its numbers, and that the results will be less satisfactory than those results which have hitherto accrued. The hon. gentleman's statement as to the reason for the addition of the Secretary of State is, I suppose, with reference to examinations, and that sort of thing, but the Secretary of State might be made a member of the Treasury Board without enlarging the numbers of the board. Then the hon. gentleman announced that it is necessary to have a representative of each of the Provinces upon the board, and therefore he adds another. It is altogether a new idea. I had thought until this moment that we had already seven Provinces—

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I said the leading Provinces.

Mr. BLAKE. Well, who is to be the hindmost of those six Provinces, to be left out of the Treasury Board? Which Province is to receive the honor and satisfaction of being out of the Treasury Board? Are there six Provinces represented in the Administration of the day? And if they are not, how is the hon. gentlemen going to get members of six Provinces into the Treasury Board? Obviously, therefore, we have a Bill to alter the present constitution of the Cabinet.

Mr. MITCHELL. They intend to make an alteration in the numbers.

Mr. BLAKE. Ah! it is to allow the hon. gentleman to come in.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am much more likely to get in than you are.

Mr. BLAKE. I believe that, because the hon. gentleman who leads the Government knows the hon. member better than he knows me.

Mr. MITCHELL. And perhaps likes him better, because he appreciates him more.

Mr. BLAKE. He has tried him, and there is where he is.

Mr. MITCHELL. He has not found him wanting as you have been found.

Mr. BLAKE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to understand this. If it is important that the six leading Provinces should be represented on the Treasury Board therefore we are to have another edition of them. Is it Manitoba or is it Prince Edward Island which is to stand in the rear, because at present neither is represented in the Administration of the day? Is it British Columbia? Which of these Provinces is it that is behind hand? It is too late, I think, at this time-of-day to make this suggestion. We have had great difficulties already in this country in consequence of the false principle upon which the hon. gentleman started out in 1867 with respect to Cabinet representation, laying down the rigid rule that there should be at least two members from each Province. I very well remember when the hon. gentleman defended the number of the Cabinet upon, not merely the reasonable ground that, as a rule, the public feeling of each of the Provinces should be consulted through men who had their special confidence—a very reasonable proposition to lay down—but upon the ground that these Provinces were to be represented by at least two members. That was the principle stated by the hon. gentleman. Since that time it has been found impossible to apply even the first principle, that they should be represented at all, because half of the Provinces are unrepresented in the Cabinet to-day. Still less was it possible to carry out the second principle, that each Province should be represented by two members of the Cabinet, as the hon. gentleman then declared was necessary. There are wheels within the wheels, and it is now claimed to be necessary to increase the representation of the Treasury Board. If that is the principle upon which we are to act, it is obvious that instead of the Union being greater, instead of the confidence of the people of this Dominion in their public men being greater, that confidence is diminishing, and it is becoming more than ever necessary that this wheel within wheel arrangement as to the Treasury Board should have regard to provincial representation, representation to a certain extent so far as the leading Provinces are concerned.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman has rather forgotten my statement in the discussion on the formation of the First Cabinet. The arrangement, I said, was absolutely necessary at the inception of Confederation. We knew there was a considerable amount of apprehension in the different Provinces, especially in the smaller Provinces, in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, that they would be overcome by the weight of the two larger Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. I stated that such was necessary in the first instance, but if the hon. gentleman will look at the "Debates," he will see that I distinctly guarded myself against the idea that this would continue for all time; but at all events, for the time being, I said, it was desirable that every Province should be represented in the Cabinet. I said further, that in the early stage of Confederation it would be well that each Province should have two representatives in the Cabinet; that a single member would feel himself solitary and alone, without any one to act with from his Province against the voices of the other Provinces, it being considered at that time, though it now remains only a memory, that we were comparative strangers to each other, that the interests of the Provinces were not clearly brought together, that the public men of the Provinces did not know what would be the consequence of a certain course of action, and also because, until a very recent date, one or more of the Provinces had declared in the first place against Confederation at all. In order to oil the wheels of the carriage that was going to travel the constitutional road of Union, it was thought well that the smaller Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick should have equal representation with other Provinces in the Cabinet at the inception of Confederation. I am happy to say that the suggestion has been successful. If the hon. gentleman will look back at the "Debates," I think he will find I said, judging by my recollection of what I stated then, that in process of time those sectional feelings would disappear, and while, as in Great Britain, it was always considered that Scotland and Ireland should have some influence in the Cabinet, yet, as in Great Britain, the principal point in forming an Administration here ought to be and would be power, influence and status in Parliament. That, I think, was the sum of my observations on that occasion, or on all occasions when the subject was brought up. With respect to this Bill I would say that the particular reason for increasing the number of members of the Treasury Board to six was not only that the number was limited to six, but to six specified officers—Ministers, and sometimes it might happen that one of those Ministers could more conveniently sit aside and allow another Minister to take his place. There is this further reason for making this arrangement that it was sometimes found that we could not get a quorum of the Treasury Board, four being a quorum, and we would have a much better chance of obtaining a quorum at all times by having six instead of four. With respect to the hon. member's remarks as to the work of the Treasury Board, I may say we have found that in its practical operation the Treasury Board operates to a very considerable extent, as their attention is directed to matters that are specially confided to them, and, like the Auditor-General, they are very efficient in the way of giving information to Council in regard to various matters brought before them. The quorum will be four, and I fancy, practically, the Board will be as it has been, composed of four members. But sometimes, as I have said, we have not been able to secure a quorum of the individual members of the Government certified by statute to form the Board.

Mr. MILLS. The right hon. gentleman has overlooked the complaint made by my hon. friend in front of me (Mr. Blake), that the Minister of Finance, in introducing this Bill, declared that it was necessary to give further provincial representation on the Treasury Board. It was to that point especially that my hon. friend directed the attention of the House. The First Minister has told us that this feature of provincial representation in the Cabinet was one which, although at the time the discussion took place he declared to be necessary, was one which would ultimately disappear; that it was necessary in the first instance because members of the House were, in a great measure, strangers to each other, and also because some of the Provinces were not favorable to Union. All that might be quite true at the time Confederation was established. But the right hon. gentleman has failed to point out to the House the necessity of giving further provincial representation on the Treasury Board. But the Finance Minister, in proposing this measure, has not declared that a larger Treasury Board was necessary; he has pointed out that some of the Provinces which are not now represented on the Treasury Board ought to be represented. That is the statement of the Minister who introduced the Bill, and in defence of that statement the First Minister has said nothing.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman has spoken about representation of the different Provinces on the Treasury Board. If any of the Provinces are not represented in the Cabinet they cannot be represented on the Treasury Board. That is quite clear. But this arrangement will give an opportunity to utilise on the Treasury Board the services of any provincial representative in the Cabinet. To show you how impartial we are in our operating of the present Act I may say that Quebec, one of the largest Provinces, is not represented on the Treasury Board at all. The four present members of that board are, two from Ontario, and two from New Brunswick; neither Quebec nor Nova Scotia has a representative on it.

Mr. BLAKE. Of what consequence then is it that the number should be increased?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not suppose it is of very great consequence.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am glad the First Minister says that, because I thought it was unfortunate that the Minister of Finance should have formally announced that it was the desire of the Cabinet to extend provincial representation to such a body as the Treasury Board. I am glad to find that the First Minister practically disclaims that idea, and I think he is deserving of all support from this side of the House for disclaiming the idea of extending this provincial representation further. I have heard him and other hon. gentlemen opposite again and again declare—and I agree with them—that our object in this House should be to become Canadians to a great extent—not forgetting individual Provinces, but still remembering that we are inhabitants of the Dominion of Canada, and that sentiment I most heartily agree with. I cannot, however, for the life of me, see what is the object, after the statement of the First Minister, of adding the sixth member to this board. All of us who have had an experience of this kind of thing know that a small board is generally more serviceable, and does its work better, than a large one, and even if there be a reason for adding the fifth member, in the person of the Secretary of State, I think it is a good reason for not having the sixth member. Five, an odd number, is always more convenient on a committee, as it prevents a dead lock; and I do not think, from my recollection of the attendance of hon. gentlemen opposite at the capital out of Session, that he will find it very easy to get four men together, or even three, which, I think, is the present quorum.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BANK OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 105) respecting the Bank of British Columbia. He said: I may read for the information of the House a memorandum which has been given to me, in explanation of the objects of the Bill:

"The Bank of British Columbia was incorporated by Royal charter dated 31st May, 1862, and supplemental charter dated 30th August, 1865, to carry on banking business in certain portions of British North America for twenty-one years from date of original charter, or until 31st May, 1883. By supplemental charter dated 11th May, 1883, this time was extended for a year, and by further supplemental charter dated 27th May, 1884, the charter was further extended for ten years from 31st May, 1884, subject to the general banking laws of the Colonies in which its business may be carried on. The object of this Bill is to declare what banking laws of the Dominion of Canada are applicable to the bank, and the provisions made applicable are those that relate to the general conduct of banking business, viz:—those providing for returns, the limit of circulation (which is not to exceed the amount of the unimpaired paid up capital), the denomination of notes allowed to be issued and the payment thereof in case of insolvency, dividends, reserves, powers of the bank in holding real estate, etc., and the penalties for the breach of all provisions made applicable to the bank, but the internal regulations are not touched. The provisions made applicable to the Bank of British North America are made applicable to this bank and for the purposes of the Act Victoria is made the head office of the bank. The charter of the bank provides for a double liability of the shareholders, in case of the winding up of the bank. The Bill has been submitted to the authorities of the bank in England and has been approved by them."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do I understand the hon. gentleman aright, that all the regulations of our Banking Act shall in future apply to the British Columbia Bank?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think at present they are not required to hold any particular amount of legal tenders?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And in future do you require that they shall hold the same amount as the banks of Canada?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes, they will be brought under the operation of the Banking Act.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. From what date?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. From the date of the passing of the Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE CHINESE QUESTION.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether the report on the Chinese question, signed by the Secretary of State and laid on the Table, is correct in stating that on the 12th August last, at Victoria, British Columbia, in his address at the opening of the Commission he used the following language:—"I have only to add that it is the intention of the Government to bring in legislation next Session."

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It is correct.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—GRADES AND CURVES.

Mr. BLAKE asked, What is the number of grades on the Canadian Pacific Railway exceeding 90 feet to the mile, and the aggregate length of such grades? What is the number of curves on the Canadian Pacific Railway of each degree over 6 degrees?

Mr. POPE. The answer to these questions require a good many figures, but I have answers to both, and I propose to accommodate my hon. friend so long as he keeps good natured. As to the number of grades exceeding 90 feet per mile, there are nine descending the Rockies; two ascending the Selkirks; twenty-four descending the Selkirks—an aggregate of fifty-two miles. As to the number of curves, there is one of 6'15; 2 of 6'20; 23 of 6'30; 12 of 6'40; one of 6'45; 103 of 7; 10 of 7'20; one of 7'45; 325 of 8—

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. POPE. No, not here; out yonder. One of 8'15; 3 of 8'30; one of 8'40; 62 of 9; 141 of 10, and one of 10'40.

Mr. BLAKE. You do not give the number of curves on the temporary line?

Mr. POPE. I have given all under six.

Mr. BLAKE. But not on the temporary line, because there was one there of 11.30.

Mr. POPE. I cannot say as to that.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—GOVERNMENT SECTION IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether the Government section of the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia is being worked for freight and passenger traffic, by the contractor for construction? Whether such working is by arrangement with the Government? Whether any tariff of tolls and charges has been agreed on between the Government and the contractor? Whether the Government has a copy of the tariff in use?

Mr. POPE. The contractor—as I believe all contractors do—is working the road for his own purposes as a contractor. I am told that he also carries any goods or passengers that come in his way, and I believe that is the case. There is no arrangement with the Government. No tariff of tolls or charges has been agreed upon between the Government and the contractor, and of course the Government has not a copy of any tariff.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant) asked, Whether the Government has taken steps towards developing trade relations between Canada and Mexico?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No official communications passed between the Government of Canada and the Government of Mexico.

ACQUIREMENT OF INDIAN TITLES.

Mr. MILLS asked, What is the nature of the title which the Government claims to have acquired from the Indians within the Province of Ontario, north and west of Lake Superior, beyond the Height of Land? Does the Government claim the fee in the land on account of their treaty with the Indians? Does the Government deny any title in the Crown or Province prior to the treaty with the Indians? Does the Government claim the timber upon the lands, the mines and minerals in virtue of the treaty made with the Indians? Does the Government claim to have a lien upon the lands for the sums paid or agreed to be paid to the Indians? Or does it claim the ownership of the soil?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Dominion has acquired, for money or money's worth, the rights to the Indian titles in considerable portions of country north and west of Lake Superior from the Indians. The Government claims to hold whatever rights the Indians had, neither more nor less. What those rights may be it is not for the Government to say, but for the tribunals to decide.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman has not answered my question. He has not stated what is the nature of the titles which the Government actually claim.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They claim whatever rights the Indians had.

Mr. MILLS. Well, what is that?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is for the courts to say.

Mr. MILLS. The courts cannot say if the Government do not say in the first instance.

ST. CROIX COTTON MILLS—PAYMENT OF CUSTOMS DUTIES.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Have all the Customs Duties upon machinery, plant, and other material imported by or for the St. Croix Cotton Mills of Milltown, St. Stephen's, New Brunswick, been paid to the Government, if not how much is still unpaid?

Mr. BOWELL. The whole amount of the duty payable upon the machinery imported for the St. Croix Cotton Mills, of Milltown, St. Stephens, N.B., has not yet all been paid. There is a balance of between $15,000 and $20,000 still due; I do not know the exact amount. Arrangements have been made for the liquidation of the debt.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). How is that?

Mr. BOWELL. Give notice.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. gentleman refers to the machinery

Mr. BOWELL. I refer to the whole. I read the question and said upon the machinery, plant, and everything that is dutiable.

GRATUITY TO CHARLES HUNTER TERRY.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, At what date was the Order in Council passed granting a gratuity of $600, or eight months pay, to Charles Hunter Terry, lately employed in the Finance Department?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. C. H. Terry was retired by Order in Council on the 20th of May, 1884.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. At which date the gratuity was granted?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes; a month for each year's service.

THE WRIT FOR LÉVIS COUNTY.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the Orders are called, I desire to learn from the Government whether they have given the necessary information to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to enable the writ to be issued for the county of Lévis. The information has been given for the West Riding of Northumberland, but up to a little while ago the information was not given for Lévis, and it is desirable that it should be given, so that both writs should issue without any delay.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have had no application as regards the county of Lévis.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman must mean of course no personal application. We had the statement from you, Sir, the other day, that you had issued your warrant for the issue of writs both for Northumberland and Lévis in pursuance of the statute which rendered that necessary on your part, and it is obligatory on the Government to give the information in order that writs may be issued to the returning officers. The same communication which would be made to the hon. gentleman on the subject of one county would be made to him on the subject of the other; but this statement was made to him in this House, and therefore the Government as a whole is seized of the fact that these writs await, or one at any rate awaits his action, and it seems to me that there should be no delay in giving the necessary information in order that that writ should be issued.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The usual practice has been this: When the warrant is issued, it is sent to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery communicates that to the Secretary of State, and the Government acts in the regular way in appointing the returning officer, and fixing the date of the election.

Mr. BLAKE. Then I am to understand that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, although communicated with as to Northumberland, has not been communicated with as to Lévis. I will take occasion to-morrow to enquire into the matter.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I do not remember to have received that information owing to the press of business in the House, but I shall enquire about it in the Department.

Mr. BLAKE. I shall expect to hear that the writ has gone to-day, Sir.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed adjourned debate on motion of Sir Leonard Tilley to go again into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CASEY. When you left the Chair, Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock on Tuesday, I was about to call the attention of the House to the question of the proposed increase of the duty on flour, and to the views of the millers and others in my own constituency in regard to that proposed increase, and in regard to any other means of attaining the desired object, namely, that of assisting the millers out of their present position, which they claim is an unfavorable one. Two modes, of course, are open to us of assisting the millers in this respect. One is to increase the duty on flour to such an extent as to exclude American flour from our markets altogether. The other is to reduce or abolish the duty on American wheat—at all events on American hard spring wheat, which is the only kind, I believe, that our millers care to import. I wish to state the case as presented by millers of my own riding in regard to these two proposals and will quote one or two authorities as to the views of the farmers, leaving it to the House to consider which of the two proposals is the preferable mode, or whether either of two should be adopted. I must first quote what I may call the official utterance of the farmers of all Canada on the subject of an increased flour duty. The nearest thing we have to an official utterance of the farmers is the utterance of the Dominion Grange, a large and influential body having branches in all parts of the Dominion and who meet and carry on their deliberations with the greatest care and in the most business like manner. At their meeting in Toronto on the 6th of this month, the Committee on Legislation reported as follows:—

"That we still endorse the petitions which this Dominion Grange presented to the Dominion Parliament last year with regard to increasing the duty on flour, and are strongly of opinion that any increase of such duty would not be in the interests of the farmers, and we therefore enter our protest against any increase whatever."

I know that attempts have been made at times to lead the farmers of this country, and especially the farmers of Ontario, which is peculiarly a wheat growing Province, to imagine that the increased duty on flour would in some way improve their position, that it would enable the millers to pay higher prices, or increase the demand for wheat, or in some other way benefit the producer. Here, however, we have the opinion of a large body composed of some of the most intelligent farmers in the community, expressed at their meeting in Toronto, that the increase in the flour duty would not be in the interest of the farmers of the Dominion, and this is not one utterance only, but an endorsation of the utterance of last year, an utterance now endorsed after a year's experience.

Mr. HESSON. Have you the report of the Provincial Grange?

Mr. CASEY. I have not; but the Provincial Grange is represented in the Dominion Grange. The Master of the Dominion Grange is a resident of Elgin, and a number of the officers are residents of Ontario. I believe Ontario is fully represented in the Dominion Grange, and their opinion would receive full weight and probably carry the opinion of the rest of the grange. I have, therefore, no hesitation in putting before the House this report of the Dominion Grange as representing the opinion of the farmers of Ontario as a whole. There may be some localities where the farmers think differently; I do not dispute that, as there are all shades of opinions; but this I take to be the mature opinion of representative farmers from all parts of Canada, in convention assembled, as near as we are able to get at it.

Mr. SPROULE. Are you aware that the Provincial Grange asked for an increase in the flour duty?

Mr. CASEY. I am not; but as it happens I am discussing the opinion of the farmers of Canada as a whole, and we have been often told in this House that we must not consider one section at the expense of others. I quite agree with that sentiment; I quite agree that in considering the interests of the farming community we must take the interests and the opinions of that community throughout the Dominion, and not those of any particular section. I have taken that opinion, expressed in the only way we know of in which it can be expressed, and I argue from that expression of opinion that the interests of the farming community, as a whole of this Dominion, would not be advanced by an increased duty on flour. I am sure my hon. friends from Quebec, representing agricultural constituencies, will not deny the truth of this assertion as regards their Province. I myself, as representing a wheat growing constituency in Ontario, am unable to see that an increased duty on flour would add to the price of wheat sold by our farmers to the millers. I make that statement in full view of my responsibility as a representative of a farming constituency, as one who has always lived on a farm and who claims to know as much of farming interests as any member of this House.

With regard to the views of the millers, some of them have communicated their views to me, and in the course of the correspondence we have interchanged I have arrived at a fair idea of what they want. One of them says—I will not quote verbatim, but give the general drift of the letters. One of them says, in answer to the question as to whether the abolition of the duty on American hard spring wheat or the increase of duty on flour to 75 cents a barrel would be most in the interest of the millers:

"We think it would be better for the millers to have the duty removed from hard wheat or, if possible, from all grades of American wheat, for, in our opinion, the increase of duty to 75 cents a barrel will make very little difference to the millers. We think it would require a duty of $1 a barrel to entirely stop the importation of American flour. We think it would be best to take duty off all grades of American wheat for milling purposes, but if there are serious objections against that by removing it from the different grades of hard spring it would help us greatly at some seasons."

In answer to a question as to whether wheat of a similar character to that imported was grown in Ontario, he said:

"We believe we grow better fall wheat here in Western Ontario than can be got from any American market—there is no competition in fall wheat—but no country produces so good a quality of hard wheat as the American North-West, except Manitoba. Nothing better can be grown in Ontario than fall wheat. It is far better for flour than any spring wheat raised here."

I asked if they could not import Manitoba wheat of the same character as the American wheat more cheaply than the American wheat and paying the duty, and was told:

"We have never yet been able to do so (import Manitoba wheat) and compete with the American flour made from the same quality of wheat (nor do we here especially in the west of Ontario ever expect to do so) as freights and other things are against us. Some of those millers who are situated so they can get Manitoba wheat by water might do so at some seasons, but even then it would not help the milling of the choice fall wheat of Ontario by our own mills."

I think this makes it very clear that, so far as our millers in Western Ontario are concerned, the duty on wheat does not inure to the benefit of Manitoba by inducing our millers to use Manitoba wheat; because, even with the discrimination against American wheat afforded by the duty, it does not pay our millers to import Manitoba wheat instead of American wheat. In answer to another question in respect to the effect the abolition of duty on United States wheat would have on the prices paid for Canadian wheat he said:

"At certain times the abolition of the wheat duty might affect the price paid to farmers for home grown wheat, but it is quite impossible that it should affect it permanently, as all are now aware that prices are regulated by the Liverpool market. We should only use American wheat when other wheat could not be got, as was the case last season."

They had explained in a former letter that the impossibility of getting wheat enough to keep their mills going compelled them to close them for part of the year.

"Ogilvies and some others may arrange to run their mills on Manitoba wheat, but the great majority must depend on the wheat that they buy at their mill doors. In regard to the views of the farmers on the wheat duty, they would hardly notice it. They look at the matter very much in this way, namely, that wheat is generally higher across the river or lake than in our own markets."

Bearing out the figures I produced to the House on the last occasion on which I spoke.

"We have very little faith in increase of duty to an extent to do good, and would sooner have the wheat duty off. It might often make things better for millers here."

Then he goes on to refer to certain improvements in freight rates that have been lately given to the western millers in the States. I will give also the effect of another letter from another firm of millers, which puts the case very clearly. They say:

"We do feel a great injustice is done the Canadian millers under the present duty and bonding arrangement on wheat, probably more grievous to some millers who are not so well situated for obtaining wheat as we are."

"You will see by this that the duty on wheat handicaps us in such a way that we find it very hard to obtain wheat and keep the mill running on full time, and require to stand still. It is utterly impossible for us to purchase wheat in Detroit or Chicago (which we would like to do at the present time) even without the duty, and export the flour and make anything more than a living out of the transaction. Take for Example No. 2 Red Winter which is same wheat as raised here in Chicago is worth to-day 78½c, 77½c., and 78c., per bushel. We cannot expect to have it delivered here for less than 7c. per bushel, that will make the cost delivered here, say 85c. per bushel. We are paying the farmers here from 80c. to 85c. per bushel. Now add 15c. per bushel duty would bring it to $1 per bushel. We could not ship any flour at such a cost of material, so the result is we stand still when we cannot purchase wheat from the farmers."

Now, this is a remarkable statement of practical men, engaged in milling and wishing to import wheat for milling purposes. They evidently did not take the duty into account at all when comparing the rates between Detroit and my constituency. They say it is as dear in Detroit or Chicago, with the freight added, as it is in my own neighborhood, so the duty has not raised the price of wheat in that part of the country, though it has prevented the importation of a certain amount of American wheat. It has had the effect of shutting down the mills for a certain time in the year without increasing the price to Canadian farmers, and appears to be mischievous to the manufacturing class in that part of the country without being of the slightest use to the agricultural class. They say:

"The expression of the duty benefitting the farmers is a fabulous theory, and won't hold water, for, when wheat gets over a certain cost, we do no business unless there is a general advance in breadstuffs. We have noticed the markets very particularly since 1878, and we have never yet seen the price of wheat in this section exceed the prices of wheat figuring the price in Chicago with freight to this point."

I gave you some figures the other afternoon for the past autumn. These gentlemen have watched the markets since 1878, and have found that to be true during all that time which I found to be true during last autumn.—

"This," he says, "I believe to be universal."

Then he goes on to point out the reason why they cannot compete in the eastern provincial markets. He says:

"As for perfection in machinery, the most of the mills in Ontario have the latest and best improved machinery, and can manufacture and finish the flour equal to anything in the United States, and those millers who could not would soon advance. There is a grade of flour known as strong bakers and high grade Minneapolis flour, which is meeting with purchasers in our cities, and it is used by the bakers. Now, if we could obtain the Manitoba wheat at a reasonable price, we could supply this trade ourselves. The cost of the wheat delivered here is too much."

They feel the pressure of heavy freight rates on Manitoba wheat as much as the Manitoba farmers do.—

"We do not believe much American flour has found its way into this market"—

This is, the Western Ontario market.—

"since the harvest of 1884. The writer did not approve of the Millers' Associations idea of an advance of duty on flour of 50 cents per barrel so as to make it $1. . . . Now we feel the greatest boon to the millers would be, get the duty on wheat removed, and you will soon find there will be no American wheat find its way into Canadian market, as the millers would arrange to supply this trade."

Then he goes on to point out that there are six first class mills in that county, with capacities varying from 150 to 350 barrels for every 24 hours, making a total production of 1,200 barrels daily, which are now running on half time, and hardly that for the last three months, the cause being that they cannot obtain wheat. He afterwards states that they employ an average of fifteen men each, so that ninety men are thrown on half time, and that there is a capital invested amounting to $270,000 in these mills, which is lying idle half the time. I think this is not a pleasant showing. It shows beyond doubt that the millers have grievances, it shows that the way in which the tariff is arranged is not favorable to their industry, and that something ought to be done for them. In what direction this something ought to be is a question for the Government to decide. It is for them to say whether they will remove a tax that does not seem to do much good to the farmers, or will reduce it, or whether they will increase the duty on flour. I do not know what the feeling of the farmers of Western Ontario would be in regard to the removal of this tax—they have not yet been consulted on the subject—but, as one of them, speaking only for myself, I do not believe it does us any good. I believe the only use of the wheat duty has been as an excuse to induce us to submit to other taxes which have been very burdensome to farmers as a class throughout the country. If it had not been for the bait of the wheat duty and the barley duty held out to us in 1878, we would never have submitted to allow ourselves to be taxed for the building up of large manufacturing concerns in other parts of the country. It was only these two taxes that induced the farmers to accept the other taxes. It was only the promise that was made that we would obtain benefit from these two taxes that induced us to accept the National Policy. We have found, from a long experience of six years, that this policy has not raised the price of grains. The price of grains has, since the adoption of the National Policy, gone down almost continuously; at any rate, it is lower now than ever before; and we believe that, as far as that tax is concerned, the policy has been a humbug and we would suffer very little from its abolition. I have no doubt that, after the subject has been further debated in the House, the farmers will express some opinion in regard to it, and that will deserve the fullest consideration; but, speaking for myself, I do not believe it does us any good whatever, or that we would lose one cent a bushel by its abolition.

Mr. HESSON. What is the price of wheat in Chicago to-day?

Mr. CASEY. I have not a newspaper by me from which to make the quotation. Perhaps the hon. member when he follows me, will give the prices in Chicago and the prices here to-day, and then he will have a comparison. I want to say something about the most remarkable document which has ever been laid before this House, the report on the manufacturing interests in existence in Canada by Mr. Blackeby and Mr. Willis. I find that the enquiry originated in a memorandum by the hon. the Minister of Finance dated in May last, saying that he had long considered "the desirability of procuring reliable information"—reliable information, remember—"as to the manufacturing industries in existence in Canada, as regards the number of persons employed, the amount of capital invested, the output thereof, the date of establishment and the progress of the several factories, and, in fact, all particulars that will be of use in aiding the Government in legislation with reference thereto." It seems the Government intended to propose some legislation in regard to these industries during the coming year, and they wanted information to base that legislation on. Of course they wanted full and accurate information. He recommends that Mr. Blackeby be appointed because he is a man "who has shown himself fully qualified for the work." We will see how full and accurate the information is, and how fully Mr. Blackeby has shown himself qualified for the position he undertook. He occupies about 40 pages of a pamphlet of 200 pages, in dealing with the industries of Ontario and Quebec, the rest being taken up with the industries of the Maritime Provinces. Now, Mr. Speaker, this may give us a hint as to the fullness of the information obtained by Mr. Blackeby. One-fifth of this book is occupied by statistics regarding Ontario and Quebec, the two great manufacturing Provinces of the Dominion, the two Provinces which outweigh the others as greatly in manufactures, almost, as they do in population. One-fifth of the report only is taken up with these two great Provinces, while four-fifths are given up to industries in the Maritime Provinces, principally in the city of St. John and neighborhood. It is clear, then, that the information obtained about Ontario and Quebec cannot be as full as that obtained about the industries in the other Provinces.

Now, Mr. Blackeby begins by a sort of general observation on the country. He admits, to start with:

"It is true, that in some industries, the privilege of supplying the Canadian market for manufactured goods with the produce of our own mills, has been too largely taken advantage of by capitalists, anxious to put their money to a profitable use, and in this way the market (which, although a growing one, has its limits), was, for a time, unduly stocked with these classes of goods."

This is a very pretty and polite way of putting it. They were too anxious to take advantage of the privilege of supplying our people with home manufactured goods at high prices, and they overstocked the market; in other words he admits there was an unwholesome boom in manufactures which produced a plethora, and which is the cause of the depression now. This information is thoroughly reliable, of course, because it is the Finance Minister himself who has transmitted it to us. He goes on to say:

"It is now a question of a very short time when, having a thorough knowledge of the requirements of the people, manufacturers in Canada will be prepared to supply, through the labor of our own mechanics and operatives, all the demands of the market, at a profit alike to themselves and the districts in which they are located."

It must have been from Mr. Blackeby that the right hon. Premier obtained his now celebrated expression "ere long." Why, Sir, when the National Policy was first adopted we were told its effects were to follow immediately; that we were to have manufactures the day after, that the tall chimneys were to spring up, manufactures were to boom, and everybody was to make increased profits. But, now Mr. Blackeby says "it is a question of but a short time" when all this will take place. We have had the National Policy in force for six years and now "ere long" we are going to get the benefits of it. Then he tells us something of his methods. He says:

"It must not be supposed that the statistics given are the total figures of any particular class of work or any particular section of Ontario or Quebec."

He has been appointed to get full and thorough information upon which to base legislation, and he says it must not be supposed that his statistics are full in regard to any section. Oh, no. And then:

"In the limit of time given only sufficient factories could be visited to give a proper idea of what the general state of trade was in the several classes and the various districts."

Of course, the factories that he visited in order to get a "proper idea" of the state of trade naturally would not be those which were not doing well. In order to produce a "proper idea" he would visit those which were doing very well, and which have increased their products since 1878:

"Many towns having large industrial works have not been visited at all."

There is his own confession, the confession of the Government's agent:

"For instance, Almonte, which may almost be considered as the seat of the woollen trade in Canada, was not visited owing to lack of time, and other large industrial towns do not figure in this report."

The seat of the woollen trade in Canada was not visited! Would it not give a "proper idea" of the state of that trade if the seat of the woollen industry had been visited? I am inclined to fancy it was that reason and not lack of time, which prevented its being visited. It would seem from the terms of this report that the woollen trade in the seat of that industry cannot be as flourishing as it was some time ago, or Mr. Blackeby would have found some time to visit it. Why, Sir, he has been to Aylmer, Simcoe, Tilsonburg, and various other small towns in my county and neighborhood that are not the seat of any particular industry. He has been to all sorts of places in Ontario and Quebec. He has been everywhere he thought there was anything flourishing, but he had not time to go to Almonte, which was "the seat of the woollen industry of Canada," and he goes on to confess to us:

"Factories which were in existence some years prior to 1878, but were closed down in 1878, are given as new industries."

The man confesses that himself! He gives as new industries in this list, factories that were in existence previous to 1879, but were then temporarily closed down:

"Such for instance as the sugar refineries in Montreal, the bridge works and rolling mills at Hamilton."

And yet, Sir, the supporters of the Government will be quoting these figures throughout the country showing the great increase of prosperity, the increase in the sugar business, and in regard to these works at Hamilton, and others, without telling the people that Mr. Blackeby himself confesses in this report that these industries had been in existence years before. Why, Sir, he does not even pretend to give full information of the industries which were in existence in 1878. He gives a list of each town and what industries were there in 1878, and what have been established since, but he does not pretend to tell us how he got at those that existed in 1878; but judging from the cases in which we can track him I believe he has only put down, of the industries existing in 1878, those that are in existence now. If there were in a town in which eight existed in 1878, and still exist, he would put down eight in 1878; but he made no effort to find those that were in existence then but have failed since. I know that must be so with regard to St. Thomas, the county town of Elgin. We find that he groups together Aylmer, Simcoe, St. Thomas, and Tilsonburg, and he says the whole four towns had only five industries between them in 1878. The statement is perfectly absurd. It is a statement that he must have known would seem absurd, on the face of it, to any resident of that county. The Town of St. Thomas at that time had, to my knowledge, at least twelve or fifteen establishments which must be classed as industries. I do not pretend to know the names of all of them, but I am sure there were that many that I know of myself, and there must have been more that I do not know. But he returns the industries in the whole of these towns now as only thirteen. Why, St. Thomas alone had more in 1878 than he returns for the whole group now, and I am sure the whole number now is considerably greater than he states. He does not know how to make the best of his case. He has not returned the towns now as being as prosperous, some of them, as they really are, though he has taken good care to put them down as much less prosperous in 1878 than they really were. Take all the western part of my constituency; take the towns of Ridgetown, Highgate, Duart, Rodney, Dutton, Bismarck and Fingal, which do a large milling, manufacturing and foundry business; he has not visited them at all. He has tried to make out the case he was sent to make out, but he has not known how to do it. In the Town of St. Thomas again he puts down a foundry and iron works as having started in 1882, whereas it was in operation before 1878, but the property changed hands in 1882, and therefore he put it down as a new industry. That is enough, perhaps, of Mr. Blackeby's report. If the Government wanted to obtain correct statistics of the industries why did they not adopt the plan which has been followed with such success in Ontario? Why did they not establish something like the Bureau of Industries which is in constant correspondence with every industry and every farmer throughout the Province, collecting from month to month, as well as from year to year, careful statistics of the progress of the country. Why, Sir, the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) the other day paid these statistics the compliment of quoting them in preference to the statistics of the Dominion Government because they were fuller, and more accurate, and more straightforward, I must say, than the returns from which I have just been quoting. I shall refer, perhaps, to these returns at a later period. In regard to the prosperity spoken of in Mr. Blackeby's report I am reminded of an article which appeared on Monday last in the St. Thomas Times, a Conservative organ; and I must pay it this compliment, that it is one of the ablest Conservative papers published west of Toronto. It ranks among the first Conservative papers for independence, honesty and straightforwardness. It is a strange coincidence that this article appeared in the next issue after the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster), visited St. Thomas. I can only hope that he had a conference with the editor of that newspaper, and that the very correct ideas as to the state of the country which are expressed in that article were inspired by the hon. member to whom I refer. If so, it shows that he acquired a truer opinion of the state of the country than he had when he addressed the House. The St. Thomas Times, of March 16th, says:

"We read, from time to time, in American papers, of large numbers of men in manufacturing districts out of employment; so of miners in the coal mining districts. We are told that there has been over-production and hence mines and factories have to be closed and hands turned out of employ. While this has been largely the case in the United States it has been the case in some districts in Canada. * * * It does not, however, appear so plain why tens of thousands of the people of the United States should remain in idleness while they have millions of acres of untilled lands in the south and in the west and in the north. * * * The same is true of Canada; we have room for millions and support for millions in the North-West. We employ immigrant agents and send them to Europe. We offer inducements to get men to take our lands for nothing, or at prices within the reach of the poor. Why should not means be taken to get the poor and the idle from our own cities to occupy the land that would afford the industrious at least a comfortable living?"

Here is a Conservative paper, a well informed newspaper, published in a city which has, perhaps, retained its prosperity during the present depression better than any other in Canada, declaring that it is a very strange state of things that people should be lying idle in cities while we have millions of untilled acres of fertile land. It continues:

"Why should not the unemployed be assisted to go and cultivate the soil? Why should they spend months doing nothing, waiting for the fitful employment that the factories afford?"

This is a very strange contrast to the report of Mr. Blackeby, who says that men are earning higher wages, that more men are employed, and that each man is getting a fair day's wage for a fair day's work. Does this mean that our workingmen are getting a fair day's wage for a fair day's work? Would a Conservative organ confess to such a state of things existing if it were not satisfied that there are thousands idle, and that there are men who cannot get a fair day's wage for a fair day's work? It continues:

"If some of the means spent on immigration agents to the old countries of Europe were applied to helping off some of the unemployed in our cities, it would be quite as good an investment, perhaps better. There should not be want and destitution in countries that possess millions of acres of productive lands lying waste."

The editor admits there is want and destitution. He says there should not be. Again:

"It is not necessary that thousands of a reserved force of workmen should remain idle in our towns for three or six months of the year, waiting for a boom in the factories."

Are we not told that the factories are booming all the time? Can we believe there is a boom among the factories at the present time? The St. Thomas Times says there is not. The article continues:

"That is how the dangerous classes are manufactured. Let as many as can find regular work stay, and let the others be assisted to go where they will become independent."

If you read this in connection with some of the promises and pledges I heard the other day from the lips of the hon. Premier about the coming prosperity, independence and riches of the workingman, of the coming time when he would be able to pay far higher prices for everything the farmer had to sell, you cannot help smiling; but I confess it is a sad smile, not a smile of pleasure, but a smile of pity for those poor men who have been duped by those promises into voting for the introduction here of a so-called national system of finance, which has brought them to the condition in which they now are, as it is described by one of the hon. gentleman's own organs. I say, then, that on the whole, by the admission of Conservatives themselves, the National Policy has been a failure. It has failed to produce the results promised to any single class in the community. It has failed to secure continuous prosperity for the manufacturers. It has failed to procure continual employment for the workingman. It has failed to procure good prices for the farmer. It has failed, last of all but not least of all, to procure reciprocity. I has failed, I say, to procure continuous prosperity, even for the industries which the Government most particularly desired to protect. Perhaps the most specially protected of the industries is the cotton industry. We all know there was a boom in that industry. It is shown in this report that the amount of capital invested has about tripled. What has been the result? Is that trade prosperous? If you look at the stock lists for the last few years you will find that the stock of the Canada, Hudon, Cornwall, and other mills formerly stood at 137, 190, or 200. In some of the companies the stock was quoted at twice the amount invested. Now these stocks range from 25 to 65. I think the Canada Company stock, that sold three years ago at 190 odd, now stands at 45, or about one-fifth of what it was three years ago. The stock of some of the others is at 25, or about one-fourth the capital paid when the company was first started. Is that a state of prosperity? I received Oswald's circular, which I believe is sent to all of us from Montreal at the opening of the year. I could not find from it that any of these companies had paid dividends during the last year. Here, then, are eight or ten millions of capital invested, which is not paying any dividend. There are no dividends paid to shareholders, no wages paid to operatives, and the stock of the companies has gone down, in some cases, to a quarter of the amount originally invested. Can that be called a state of prosperity? I am sure there are many, including some members of this House, who most loudly advocated, and most strongly supported the National Policy in the interest of this very manufacture, who have found that the protection of the cotton industry has not secured its prosperity.

Mr. HESSON. Where are the cotton lords?

Mr. CASEY. An hon. gentleman wants to know where the cotton lords are. They are now where a good many Irish landlords are—they are pretty hard up. They lorded it nobly during the time of the boom, so long as they could lord it over us; but now rates have fallen, their property has depreciated, and they are finding out that even a lord may sometimes find himself hard up, even though he be a cotton lord, and has all the influence and power of the Government at his back to try and make his property valuable. But their fall was inevitable. So long as there was only a certain number of mills, the boom continued. But when the home market was supplied, and over supplied, the boom had to stop. It is not a temporary depression. There are more cotton mills and machinery in Canada than will be required to supply the needs of this country for years and years to come. They are burthened not only with actual manufactures of cotton but, as this newspaper (St. Thomas Times) states, with the facilities for making more goods. The facilities for production are too great for the size of the country, and we are destined either to continued depression, or continued short production by the mills which are now in existence.

As to the farming class, the National Policy has been a special failure. It gives them no protection. The claim that they are given protection is now given up by almost everybody who discusses the subject, and although their's is almost the only unprotected industry in the country, agriculture is the only industry in Canada which has shown during these years an unabating and constant rate of progress. Agriculture has progressed steadily during these years; it is progressing steadily now, and I believe, taking it all around, apart from the low prices, it is in a fairly prosperous condition. The hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), who spoke the other day, quoted the statistics of the Ontario Bureau of Industries, to show that the price of farm land had gone up in Ontario. I believe he quoted them correctly, and I believe from my knowledge of the gentleman who collects those statistics that they are as correct as they can be made. I believe that the value of farm property in most parts of Ontario has gone up.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. But to what do we owe that? Is it to the National Policy?

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). To the Mowat Government.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman has taken the word out of my mouth—we owe it to the Mowat Government. He has taken the word out of my mouth, for we do owe it to a large extent to the Mowat Government; but above all to the enterprise, the business ability, and the general vigor and push of the farming community themselves, and of those classes of shippers with whom their prosperity is so closely bound up. We owe it to the development of the export trade in cattle and beef, in sheep and in cheese; to the improvement in the production of cheese and to some extent to the improvement in the character of our butter, though that improvement has not been so great as we would like. Besides all this we owe it to railway development, to the drainage of the land by open drains and tile drains, and to many other agencies of this kind entirely distinct from the National Policy, and for which we have not to thank this Government here in the slightest degree. I say that the farmers' own industry and energy have done a great deal, but without the aid given by the Government of Ontario these would not have accomplished as much as they have done, and I am glad that the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. White) has confessed his agreement with me on that point. I say that the increase in the value of land is owing partly to the development of railways, and our railway system has been developed tremendously by the assistance given by the Provincial Government. It has sent local railways, competing railways, into all parts of the Province, and it has assisted municipalities to build their own roads—it has done everything possible to promote the construction of railways. It has in the second place given facilities to farmers to borrow money at low rates of interest for open and tile drains, and any one coming from my section of the country will know that in those two respects alone, the measures of that Government have added more to the value of land in Ontario, and to the profits of Ontario farmers, than this Government could ever hope to do, by any National Policy they could bring down, or by any other policy they could establish. As a matter of personal experience I can say that tile drainage often doubles the value of lands and almost invariably pays a larger percentage on the money invested than could be got out of any other investment. The profits are frequently estimated at from 25 to 35 per cent, and the Government lends money to farmers at 5 per cent. interest for the purposes of tile drainage. Is it not a direct benefit to the farmer to have his land doubled in value, or his profits increased from 25 to 35 per cent. a year, and that at a cost to himself of only 5 per cent. on the money he borrows, if he has not the money of his own to spend? The improvement in the making of cheese has had a great deal to do with the increased value of land. How has that been brought about? Has this Government done anything to bring it about? The Ontario Government has assisted cheese making by assisting dairymen's institutes to which learned specialists in that line are brought to instruct the dairymen of Canada. By this means, and by distributing literature bearing on dairy work, cheese-making has been improved to such an extent in Canada that we are now almost confessedly at the head of the world. A few years ago we were nowhere compared with the United States; now we are ahead of that country in the English markets, and it is an actual fact that Ontario cheese-makers have been taken home to England and Scotland to teach the dairymen of that country how to make cheese.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Will the hon. gentleman permit me to give one reason why Canadian cheese has gone up?

Mr. CASEY. Certainly; state it.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Previous to the introduction of the National Policy the Americans shipped inferior American cheese through Canada as Canadian cheese, thereby lowering the reputation of our make, but now they must make themselves responsible for their own cheese or else pay the duty.

Mr. CASEY. This shows just about how much hon. gentlemen opposite know of the effect of the National Policy. The hon. gentleman attributes to the National Policy the fact that bad American cheese has ceased to be marketed as Canadian cheese, and he is not aware apparently that the National Policy has not increased the duty on cheese at all.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds.) I know we had two cents a pound before the National Policy.

Mr. CASEY. Two of the articles with which the National Policy has not interfered at all are butter and cheese, and I have, therefore, taken those two articles as illustrating, most particularly, the fact that wherever the Government kindly leaves an industry alone it prospers, and that wherever they do interfere they injure. No, Sir; I say the National Policy, as regards the farming industry, has been a huge and gigantic failure, and that the improvements which have taken place in agriculture—and they are great—have been due to the industry and enterprise of the farmers themselves, and to the assistance of the Local Government of Ontario, and perhaps the Governments of the other Provinces, though I am not so fully posted with regard to them.

But, Sir, the National Policy is only one of the many failures of which the present Administration has been guilty; and I say "guilty of failure," though we would not ordinarily say that, because when they came into power they professed that they were going to be always successful, that Providence was with them, and that they were sure of being successful at all times, so that if they failed it has been by some wrong doing of their own; they are "guilty of failure," and have not merely been unfortunate. There has been a superstition that the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government has a talisman which makes him always successful; and I do not know anything which has contributed so much to his success as the widespread opinion that he always would be successful, that everybody believed in his star. But that superstition is rapidly becoming obsolete; if not, it shows that those who once enter on the service of a leader—those who follow the fortunes of a prophet—cannot detach themselves from him no matter how severely they are admonished by facts that his star is no longer in the ascendant, and that the continuous success which they hoped for is failing him. It must shake the belief of those gentlemen in the right hon. gentleman's success—in his talisman—his star—to find that in regard to the liquor question, in regard to the boundary question, in regard to the disallowance question, he has led them into courses which have been disastrous to the party.

In regard to the liquor license question, first of all, he was wrong in policy in attempting to get control of the liquor business in the different Provinces. It was not a thing he should have desired as a matter of policy. It was a troublesome thing. It would give him a little patronage; but the trouble it would cost him would be greater than the good he would get from the patronage. But, Sir, actuated by a feeling of personal rivalry against the Premier of Ontario, whom he described as a "little tyrant," and to whom he was going to teach good manners, he determined to get control of that business. In doing so he was doubly wrong—wrong in policy, and wrong in the means he adopted for carrying out that policy; for after having one Act after another, we know that at present, by the decision of the highest tribunal to which the question has been carried, the McCarthy Act is not the law of the land in any of the Provinces, and we do not believe it is going to be. He has made enemies amongst the temperance people, and amongst the liquor dealers as well. That one blunder has cost him more votes than he could have hoped to obtain if the means he used had been successful. With regard to the boundary question, his blunder was equally great. He refused to accept the decision of a fair tribunal as to where the real boundary of Ontario was; he has fought for years against accepting that decision; and now we have the decision of the highest tribunal in the Empire, that the territory of which he tried to deprive Ontario, always did belong, and now does belong, to that Province. Now, I want to emphasise that he was not only wrong in contending as he did in reference to that matter, not only mistaken in law and in equity, but that he was committing a gross blunder in the way of policy. He could not have made a grosser blunder in policy than in setting the sentiment of Ontario against him as he did in the boundary matter. He has dashed forever the hopes of his lieutenant in the Local Legislature to lead a Government in that Province, by compelling him to follow him in that policy. Whatever hopes that gentleman had previously entertained, when he was compelled to follow the mistaken line of policy of his leader in this House, he lost his hopes in Ontario. Blunder upon blunder, not only in the nature of the policy to be pursued, but in the method of carrying it out! But now we come to the greatest blunder of all, the blunder of the Canadian Pacific Railway policy. I am not at present discussing whether the action of the Government in regard to that work during its whole history has been a crime or not, but I wish to show that it has been what is much more reprehensible than a crime in the opinion of many people, and that is a blunder. I am not going to give my own authority, but the authority of the official organ of the Government itself. The Toronto Mail in February last, said:

"A mistake was made at the threshold of the undertaking in supposing that the line could be constructed for 30,000,000 acres of land and $30,000,000. This blunder was perpetuated in 1881, when it was assumed that the road, as it then stood, with 426 miles from Lake Superior to Winnipeg, and 215 miles from Kamloops to Port Moody, under construction by the Government, could be completed for 25,000,000 acres and $25,000,000. If the land subsidy could have been sold for two dollars an acre within the period occupied in construction, both the first and the second estimates might have sufficed for the work."

Why could not the land subsidy be sold for that price during the progress of the work? Simply because the railway company, the creatures of the Government, followed the example of the Government itself, and blundered too. They blundered by constructing the road twice or three times as fast as was necessary. They were told, time and again, by the best minds of the country that this was a blunder, but they went on blundering as the Government had done in the first instance; and after unnecessarily increasing their expenses, and building faster than the country could be settled, they found their land subsidy left on their hands comparatively valueless. Then the Mail goes on to depreciate our country—to do that which the Globe has often been untruly blamed for doing—to say that our land is not worth as much as that across the line :

“ If our land subsidy of 25,000,000 acres be worth two dollars an acre, the Northern Pacific lands must be worth much more. For while the population of the whole Territory through which the Canadian Pacific runs, from Callander to the Pacific, does not at this hour exceed 200,000, the smaller and more compact region traversed by the Northern Pacific is comparatively well settled. * * * If it be said that the mountain section of the Northern Pacific was more costly than the mountain section of Canadian Pacific Railway, and that in the case of the Canadian Pacific the heavy work on the Pacific slope has been assumed by the Government, the answer is that the Northern Pacific had no rock division, 650 miles long, such as that which stretches in unbroken desolation between Port Arthur and Callander.”

Six hundred and fifty miles of unbroken desolation in Canada ! It is the Toronto Mail that is saying this ! Six hundred and fifty miles of unbroken desolation on the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway ! Why, Sir, if the Globe said that, it would be paraded through the country ; it would be shouted from every Conservative platform, and copied in all the papers, to the ends of the Dominion, as an instance of the virulent and libellous assertions of the Globe with reference to Canadian land. It is bad enough to have the Mail, the official organ of the Government, calling it a blunder ; but it was not alone in that. Shortly afterwards we had the Gazette of Montreal, which is credited with being the organ of the gentleman who is to be the next Finance Minister or Minister of Railways, or whatever he is to be, stating on February 20th :

“ Rumor has been busy for some weeks past with the affairs of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The company is reported to be seeking further assistance from Parliament, to have incurred a floating liability to a considerable amount, and to have failed to raise a loan in the money market, and it is no longer a secret that these reports are substantially correct.”

The Gazette says that the company has failed to get along so far with the money it has had. That is a confession of failure, a confession of blundering.—

“ The company has been compelled to obtain the money for these purposes on its credit and that of its directors, and has in this way created the floating liability now existing. But the expectation entertained by the company of being able to borrow in the open market such money as might be required to properly equip the property has been disappointed. Twice during the year means were sought for the extension of the branch lines in the North-West, but, though liberally subsidised with land, though promising to be profitable from the outset, capitalists have declined to invest in these enterprises, principally because of the arbitrary mortgage on the whole property of the company held by the Government.

Is not this a confession of failure—a confession that the credit of the company has declined ? Perhaps it is an attempt to destroy the credit of the company ; at all events, it is a confession that the scheme of relief devised last year was a blunder, because it did not succeed in relieving the company. The money given last year evidently was not sufficient ; and yet the security taken from the country by the Government was of such a nature as to prevent the company borrowing the money elsewhere. There is a failure on the part of the company to do what they expected to do with this money ; there is a blunder on the part of the Government in their policy with regard to the company, a blunder which has been fatal to the company's credit in the markets of the world. But that is not all. We have again in the Mail, of March 7th, a more determined attack on the credit of the Canadian Pacific Railway :

“ It is to be regretted that Mr. Stephen was unable to deal with the Opposition assaults upon the financial standing of the company. The Globe the other day produced a heap of figures to prove that the members of the syndicate had made and were making millions out of the work. The same tables were exhibited a year ago when the company was applying for the loan of $22,500,000 and the country was asked to believe that Mr. Stephen and his associates could not possibly require more money for the honest purposes of construction, inasmuch as by the Globe's figuring they had amassed colossal private fortunes even then. It was subsequently learned that, at the time that loan was hanging in Parliament, the leading members of the company stood indebted on their personal guarantee, as well as by the obligations of the road, to the extent of many millions, and that if the loan had been refused they would have been ruined and hundreds with them. If the truth could be told just now—I do not know why it could not—the same state of affairs would probably be exposed.”

The Mail thus says that probably the condition of the Canadian Pacific Railway is as bad now as it was last year before they got their loan of $22,500,000 ! If that is not a confession of failure on the part of the railway, and of bungling on the part of the Government, and of something worse, perhaps, on the part of both, I do not know what would constitute such a confession. They say they were in a desperate condition last year when they got $22,500,000, and are just as badly off now as then. Where have all the millions been sunk ?

“ If the truth could be told just now, the same state of things would be found to exist, but, as the Opposition well know, the company cannot lay their books before the world, nor by showing their sores claim exemption from illusage.”

Poor company ! They are covered with sores, these “ sores ” appear in the books ; and if they show the books to the world, the world will know all about them ? The metaphor is a very mixed one, and the only meaning I can get out of it is that there is something very rotten in the state of the company, which would be seen by the public if only the books were shown, and for that reason they cannot show their books. Talk about showing their sores and claiming exemption for ill usage ! What more could an exhibition of the books do to damn the credit of the company and make it utterly impossible for them to obtain loans in any part of the world than these revelations ? Was it the intention of the Mail, in making these revelations, to create public sympathy for the company just as mendicants create public sympathy by showing their sores to the public ? Or is it possible that after all they may only be artificial sores, as is sometimes the case with mendicants' sores, got up to create pity, and which can be washed off with soap and water as soon as the sturdy tramp gets his pocket full of alms and goes off with his companions to enjoy them ? Is it not possible that this plaint of the Mail is a mere pretext to excite pity, and that the case is not quite so bad as represented ? But, Mr. Speaker, this is a digression. The principal object of my quoting these expressions was not to discuss the Canadian Pacific Railway policy, but to show that, according to the Globe and the Mail, nay, on the confession of the Herald itself, the credit of the company is gone, and the policy of the Government has failed in making the company strong and prosperous, or even in enabling it to borrow money. The Herald, on March 9th, said :

“ Even the Government guarantee has not availed to provide any capital from private sources, even the credit of the company, backed by the Government, has not been able to provide the money needed.”

If the credit of the company is worth nothing, and the credit of the Government which backs them is worth nothing, is not that as thorough a confession of failure as can be imagined ?

But, leaving the question of failures of Government policy, I want to call attention to the fact that we have not merely our own experience to go by in dealing with Customs matters, in dealing with tariffs and expenditures, but we have also the experience of a great nation beside us. We all know that the favorite argument used for the National Policy in 1878 was the prosperity of the United States under a highly protective system. It was useless to tell the people that the circumstances in the United States were different, that the United States had practically free trade over half a continent, and that it was the internal free trade and not the external protection that built them up and caused them to prosper. The great facts stared the people in the face that the United States had protection, and that they were prosperous, and it was useless to argue that the one was not a consequence of the other. What is the state of things to-day ? We all know that the last presidential election turned on the great question of the tariff, and that the triumph of the Democratic party was the triumph of the revenue tariff principle. I have here a quotation from the speech of Mr. Hendricks, the Vice-President elect, which he made after the election. He was asked what was the Democratic policy of taxation? He said it was expressed in four propositions:

"First, taxation shall not exceed the needs of the Government—that was borrowed from President Arthur. Secondly, taxation shall only be for public purposes and not for private gain and speculation."

The declared object of taxation in this country for years has been private gain and speculation, and has led to commercial speculation as wild as any "wild-cat" boom in the North-West or elsewhere.

"Third, in the adjustment of the taxation care shall be taken not to hurt or harm capital. Fourth, taxation shall be heaviest upon articles of luxury and lightest upon articles of necessity."

We do not apply that rule, we put articles of luxury on the free list and tax the articles of necessity. I may say these four articles express approximately, that is having regard to the different circumstances of the two countries, the doctrine of the Reform party in Canada on the subject of taxation; and the triumph of that platform in the United States is the omen of a similar triumph in Canada for a similar policy. But that is not all. That comes from a man who is a supporter of a revenue tariff. Let us hear the opinion of a member of the outgoing Administration, the Administration which was elected as a protective Government, to hold office as such. The nearest corresponding official in the United States to our Finance Minister is the Secretary of the Treasury. His Report which corresponds to our Budget Speech was made to Congress on the first of December last, and in that statement after pointing out that after the war stimulus was given to the growth of protected industries, he said:

"Stimulus was found in railway building and in extravagant expenditures induced by superabundant currency, and the time has now come when the manufacturing industry of the United States is in dire distress from plethora of manufactured goods. Some manufacturing companies have been forced into bankruptcy; others have closed their mills to escape it."

Just like the position in Canada:

"Few mills are running on full time, and as a consequence a very large number of operatives are either deprived of employment or are working for wages hardly sufficient to enable them to live comfortably or even decently."

This is the utterance of the protectionist Finance Minister of a protectionist Government:

"Nor are manufacturers and their employes the only sufferers by the present depression of our manufacturing industry."

He admits they are the principal ones. He goes on then to point out that the only hope is the development of foreign trade, that to develop foreign trade a readjustment of the tariff will be necessary, that a commission should be appointed to consider what that readjustment should consist of, and he says:

"In the commencement of its work the commission should, I think, regard the following points as being settled:—First, that the public revenues are not to be in excess of what may be required for the support of the Government and the gradual reduction of the public debt."

This protectionist Finance Minister has given up the whole theory of protection, and lays down as the first principle to guide the commission in the United States that the tariff should be for revenue only! That, I consider, to be a triumph for the theory of a revenue tariff greater than any achieved for many years, because this is the utterance of a man who was in office because he had been a protectionist.

Mr. HESSON. That is the theory; what is their action?

Mr. CASEY. Their actions has not been anything, because they have gone out of power, but the revenue tariff Government, whose platform I have just read to the House, is in power now and will undoubtedly readjust the tariff in that sense. He goes on to say:

Mr. CASEY.

"That the existing duties upon raw materials which are to be used in manufacture should be removed, and that the duties upon the articles used or consumed by those who are the least able to bear the burden of taxation should be reduced."

So much for his ideas on tariff. The theory of protection was abandoned even before the new Government came into office. He goes on to deal with the shipping interest, and I must read a few lines in regard to that which will be my last quotation from Mr. McCullough:

"In direct connection with the condition of our foreign trade is the condition of our merchant service. The causes of the decline of our shipping are so well understood that any remarks on this point are quite unnecessary."

I think they are. I recommend this view of the case to my hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Burns), who thought shipping was so greatly improved by the National Policy:

"The humiliating fact stares us in the face that, while the United States not many years ago led all nations in shipbuilding, and was second only to Great Britain in ocean tonnage, it has almost ceased to be recognised as a maritime power; that nearly all of our agricultural productions and manufactured goods which find a market in Europe or South America and the articles received in exchange for them are carried in foreign ships; that the many thousands of Americans who annually visit Europe on business or for pleasure go and come in European steamers; that large foreign steamship lines are in fact supported by the people of the United States. All this is not only humiliating to our national pride, but it stands in the way of the improvement of our foreign trade."

That is the declaration of the Finance Minister of the United States in regard to shipping, and the effects of a protective tariff for 25 years on that industry. He goes on to say that there is no hope for the shipping trade except in bonuses from the Government:

"The let-alone policy has been tried for many years, during which our ships have been swept from the ocean, and we pay every year many millions of dollars to foreign shipowners for freights and fares."

He says they must give them subsidies:

"The amount of necessary aid would be insignificant in comparison with what has been granted to manufacturers by protective duties, and nothing would be paid until the services were rendered."

He admits that protective taxes are a subsidy to manufacturers:

"It is admitted that all protective duties and subsidies are inconsistent with the teachings of political economy, but, true as these teachings may be in the abstract, they are disregarded by all nations when they stand in the way of national welfare."

He admits they are true, but says "you must follow a false course sometimes in the interests of the country." They have been following that course for many years, and they have not found it to pay, and even the outgoing protectionist Government of President Arthur was forced to give up its protectionist theories and adopt a revenue policy before it left office and the Democrats took its place.

In general, our review of the state of the country is not reassuring. We have found failure upon failure. We have found the leader of this Government led into repeated rivalries with the leader of a Provincial Government and led into new failures in consequence of each of those rivalries. We have found him worsted in every one of them and bringing failure upon himself and embarrassment upon the country by these repeated blunders. We have found that the policy, by the promise of which he induced us to return him to office, has become a failure like the rest. He and his associates, when they left office in 1873 and for years afterwards, were discredited politically, I might almost say they were discredited personally as politicians, by the events which led to their exclusion from office. By the promise of this policy, which was to make us happy and prosperous all round, they induced us to return them to power again in 1878, hoping they would make us rich by the National Policy, and that the punishment they had already received would prevent them from falling again into the evil political courses to which they were formerly addicted. But we have been sold in both directions. Notwithstanding the punishment they then received, we have the same extravagance, the same corruption, the same degradation of political sentiment throughout the country, that characterised their former appearances upon the stage. We have all that repeated over and over, and we have in addition the fact that the price they were to pay us for returning them to power has turned out to be valueless—that the policy which was to make us all rich has made some of us a great deal poorer and cannot justly be credited with making any considerable class in the country richer. This cannot continue. The country is beginning to see that it has been sold in both directions. The indignation is growing through many sections of the country. It will not be denied that there is disaffection in Quebec, that there is disaffection in Ontario, that there is disaffection in New Brunswick and in all the other Provinces among the right hon. gentleman's own supporters. The difficulties he has created by his evil courses are coming upon him. The chickens are coming home to roost—whole flocks of them—some as members of deputations, some in the form of his own supporters in the House asking for impossibilities to be done to carry out the promises made to them and not fulfilled. The end cannot be long deferred, the end of broken promises and falsified hopes, the end of the reckless course of policy into which he has been betrayed. It may be postponed till the next election, but, unless that is brought on very soon, it is very probable that the disappointment of the hon. gentleman's own supporters with the lines of policy he has introduced will lead to a breaking up sooner, as happened once before when he had a large majority in the House and it melted away like snow in the sun.

Mr. RYKERT. What a pity. Would you not be sorry?

Mr. CASEY. The right hon. gentleman (Sir John Macdonald) laughs. We have seen him laugh before, when charges were made against him, but we have seen also his majority melt away from him.

Mr. RYKERT. When?

Mr. CASEY. In the autumn of 1873.

Mr. BOWELL. What did it cost you?

Mr. CASEY. They claimed a majority of 36, but the Government was defeated before it went to the polls, and, when it did go to the polls, it was defeated so crushingly that it was clear to every one that the people had pronounced a verdict of general condemnation against that hon. gentleman and his associates. I say that verdict was temporarily suspended in consequence of promises made to us which have not since been fulfilled. That verdict must now be carried out, and the hon. gentlemen, who have been out on bail, so to speak, must be called up for sentence and must suffer that punishment which they have so richly deserved.

Mr. STAIRS. Though it is rather a late stage in the debate, I desire to make a few remarks upon the subjects which have been discussed during the last few days in this House. I shall not reply very directly to any of the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, because I consider that he has been replied to most fully in the course of the debate by the different gentlemen who have spoken on this side of the House. I hope the House will bear with me if, in the course of my remarks, which will be more directly connected with the Maritime Provinces, and especially Nova Scotia, I dwell upon some of the general subjects that have already been treated. Several subjects have been touched upon during this debate in which we in Nova Scotia are very deeply interested indeed. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cartwright), I think, in reply to the Finance Minister, made some aspersions on the prosperity of Nova Scotia. I desire to reply to these; and I also desire, with the permission of the House, briefly to touch upon the question of the sugar tariff, and the sugar trade, in reply to the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson). But in the first place I wish to refer to some statements of the member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), in regard to the shipping interests of Nova Scotia and the Dominion. I think, Sir, that the hon. gentleman did not do himself justice in his remarks upon that subject. That I may not misrepresent what he said I would refer the House to his remarks upon that subject, as found on page 582 in Hansard. The general tenor of his remarks was in the direction of blaming the National Policy for the decrease in the shipping of the Dominion which has taken place during the last five years; and at the same time he claimed credit for the Government of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) for the increase which took place in the shipping during the time he was in power. Now, Sir, I need not point out to the House how untrue such a claim is. Every hon. member knows that the Government in power at that time had nothing whatever to do with the prosperity, or want of prosperity, of the shipping industries of Canada engaged in the foreign trade. I have gathered some statistics which show that nearly every country in the world engaged in shipping has suffered a decrease during the last four or five years greater than the decrease in Canada or Nova Scotia, or even in Prince Edward Island, from which that hon. gentleman comes. I regret that I shall have to weary the House with a few figures, but still in a case of this kind it is impossible to reply to the hon. gentleman's statements without making use of figures. Now, I think his comparison was very unfair in one respect and that is when he compared the shipping of the Dominion of Canada with that of the United Kingdom. Everyone knows that the shipping of the United Kingdom at the present time is largely composed of iron steamships. It is well known, too, that the increase in the shipping of that country has been in iron steamships, and not in sailing vessels; and I shall be able to show that not only has there not been any increase in the sailing vessels of the United Kingdom during the period to which that hon. gentleman referred, but there has been in reality a decrease to a very much greater extent than has taken place in the Dominion of Canada. In the list which I shall read the tonnage refers only to sailing vessels, and I would ask the hon. gentleman to note especially the percentages of decrease or increase:

In the case of the United States, I admit there was a slight increase in the shipping engaged in the home trade that is called the licensed or enrolled, and which is engaged in the coasting trade. In the case of the United Kingdom there was a decrease of 14 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. But in the comparison instituted by the hon. gentleman, he said there was an increase in the shipping of the United Kingdom. Of course I do not say that he said there was an increase in the sailing ships of the United Kingdom, but he said there was an increase in the shipping, and then he made a comparison of the sailing vessels of Canada, and the sailing vessels and steam vessels of the United Kingdom, which everybody knows was not fair.

Mr. DAVIES. In all sailing vessels and steam vessels of Canada. I included the sailing vessels and steam vessels in my comparison.

Mr. STAIRS. I accept the hon. gentleman's correction, but I am certain it does not affect the case at all, because every one knows that the steam vessels of Canada are in such small proportion to the steam vessels of the United Kingdom that really his correction does not mend the matter for him at all. I would be perfectly willing to revise the figures to suit him, and still I would be able to prove my position. Nova Scotia was estimated in 1878 to possess 553,368 tons of shipping; in 1882, 546,778 tons, or a decrease of $1\frac{1}{10}$ per cent. only, which I claim is a very favorable showing considering the condition of the shipping trade throughout the world. Canada possessed in 1878, 1,330,000 tons of shipping, as against 1,260,000 in 1882, or a decrease of $5\frac{1}{10}$ per cent. The figures taken by the hon. gentleman included both sailing vessels and steamships; but as the number of steamships in Canada is small the difference will not have much effect on the calculation. Prince Edward Island in 1878 possessed 54,250 tons of shipping; in 1883, 49,446, or a decrease of $8\frac{1}{10}$ per cent. In 1882 the shipping was not so large; there was a very big jump from 1882 to 1883, and there must have been some exceptional circumstance in 1882 which reduced the shipping unnaturally. I think I have proved that the cause of the decrease in Canadian shipping during this period of four years cannot be ascribed to the National Policy or to anything connected with it. It has been due to something outside of Canada altogether. I believe the portion of the shipping of the Dominion in which there has been a decrease is that engaged in foreign trade, crafts which leave our ports on long voyages and seldom come back to our shores again. What is the competition which has caused this small reduction? There is no doubt but that it is the large increase in the iron ships of England and of some few other countries. It is due to those iron freight steamers which are now going all over the world, which are taking freight to all parts of the east through the Suez canal, which trade many years ago was done entirely by wooden ships. It so happens that it has not been so much a case of iron against wood as a case of steam against sail, and I am very sorry to say that Canadian sailing ships have not been able to compete in many important trades with the steamships of England. This change is noticeable in our own harbors. Take Montreal. Year by year more of the products of Canada are taken away by steamers, and more and more of our imports are brought to this country by steamers. So it is that our sailing vessels are not able to compete with steamships. We hope and trust, however, that in time Canada may be able to compete with England or any other country in building iron steamers, and that is the only way we shall be able to continue that increase which we made for many years, from 1867 down probably to 1878. It is very difficult for us to compete with the iron steamships of England. It is not only difficult for Canada but for every other country in the world; and therefore, if we are not able to do it here I am sure under the circumstances we need be ashamed of ourselves; nevertheless we must endeavor if possible to attain that end. I should not like to say, or even to hint, that the hon. gentleman's remarks on this subject were made with the intention of deceiving the House; but I think when he came down with figures respecting shipping he should have looked a little more closely into the subject before he presented them to the House and sent them through the country, endeavoring to make Government liable for something entirely beyond their control. A brief remark was made by that hon. gentleman in regard to the export trade of England, and he dwelt upon it, and upon the large increase made in it during the last few years, and also on the value it was to that country. I want to point out here that I think there is something in this export trade of England which we must not overlook. When we observe that it has been holding its own during the last few years we must remember that it is very generally acknowledged by many men in England who are well qualified to judge, the export trade of England during the last few years has in very many important articles been maintained at a loss, or if not at a loss at a very heavy reduction in profits. The people of England have been holding their own, they have been exporting their goods to very many countries of the world, and in very many cases have been sending them in against protective tariffs; but the manufacturers have been obliged, in order to do so, to sacrifice their profits. Is it not a proof that in a large number of important manufactures in England, cotton and iron notably, there are very many of the manufactories idle. This, I believe, is the result: That protective tariffs, which they have been endeavoring to meet, have obliged them to bring down their prices so that in cotton and other particular industries it is now impossible to manufacture at a profit; and the effect of it, I believe, will be that in a few years we will see that English manufacturers will feel still more keenly, than in the past, outside competition.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. STAIRS. When you left the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I had been showing that the statements of the hon. member for Queen's, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) with respect to the shipping of the Dominion were totally inaccurate. I had shown most clearly that the causes to which he had attributed the decline of shipping from 1878 to 1882 were not the right ones, and that those causes were entirely beyond and outside the control of the Dominion Government, or in fact of anything within the Dominion itself. I had also shown in the course of my remarks that the hon. gentleman's claim that the increase in shipping from 1874 to 1878 had been caused by action taken by the Government then in power, was altogether inaccurate and not borne out by facts. Both of those things had occurred for reasons altogether beyond and outside the control of the Dominion Government and the people of Canada. I will now go on, with the permission of the House, to take up another question of very great importance to the whole Dominion, that is the question of the effects of the tariff on the sugar trade of the Dominion. This question was argued a few nights ago by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), and in reply to him I am glad to be able to assure the House that it only needs careful consideration of that hon. gentleman's own figures to allow every one to see the fallacy of them. And in treating the question this evening I shall not go out of his figures at all, but shall proceed entirely upon the data he has put before the House. The hon. gentleman in opening his discussion on this particular subject said:

"I think I can make the matter sufficiently plain and can give figures that any hon. gentleman can work out for himself, and ascertain the accuracy of the statements of the Finance Minister, that under this tariff of his the people are getting it as cheaply as under the Mackenzie tariff."

Now I would point out that his first comparison on this subject was made between the price of sugar in bond and the price by retail in a small town in the interior of Canada. His comparison at this time was made at a public meeting, held in the town of Belleville, not long since, I think, and I presume he imagined that perhaps his audience might not see fully the fallacy of his statement. But I can hardly think that any intelligent audience such as is brought together in a Canadian public meeting should have heard his figures without seeing wherein he was wrong. What did he do? In the first place he took the bond price and compared it with the duty paid price, and when I get along a little further I shall elaborate more fully how he did this. He compared the bond price, or the wholesale price, with the retail price, and he compared the prices in the larger town of Kingston with the smaller town of Belleville. The hon. gentleman must see that such an attempt to arrive at any true opinion of the state of the sugar trade of Canada was erroneous and wrong, and that it was unfair to go before a public audience and take the bond price, the price at which sugar could be laid down in bond at Kingston, and compare it with the retail price in Belleville. With reference to a conversation he had with a dealer he says:

"He said: I have sugar, No. 9, Dutch standard, that I bought for 8s. 3d. sterling per 100 lbs."

I presume he means 112 lbs. He went on:

"I then suggested we should make a calculation of the cost. We sat down and made a calculation; we added the commission, the freight, and all charges incurred before the sugar could be placed in bonded warehouse, and the result was, that we found the sugar cost him, laid down in his bonded warehouse, $2.15 per 100 lbs. You can sell that, I said, for 2½ cents per lb. and do well. He answered: Yes, I wish I could sell all the sugar I can shovel out at that profit for a year, and then I would soon retire. At the meeting, in the course of my speech, and after referring to the way in which this sugar question had been placed before the people the previous night by a Conservative speaker, I asked the audience, at what price can you get your sugar to-day? A gentleman in the audience—whom, I presume, was a friend of the Government, because, as he replied, there was a ring of triumph in his tone—said, I can get 20 lbs. good yellow sugar to-day for $1. Yes, I answered, sugar is very cheap; I believe you can, but all I have to tell you is this, that here, on this platform, is a gentleman, well known in Kingston, with whom many of you have traded, and he is prepared to-morrow, if you will go to Kingston, to give you 40 lbs. of sugar for $1, provided you will pay the duty."

Now I say that in that comparison he endeavored to lead that audience to believe that it was fair to take sugar at 40 lbs. for the dollar or 2½ cents per pound, and set it against sugar at 5 cents per pound, the retail price in Kingston. He said further:

"If you have faith in that, and if it be true, you will find that you can get 40 lbs. for $1, but I fancy before you can get it out of the bonded warehouse Her Majesty's officers will demand from you a very large sum per lb."

Now I say again that where the hon. gentleman erred in this case was that he endeavoured or wished the meeting to assume that under the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite they could get their sugar out of bond in Kingston without paying the duty at all. The hon. gentleman laughs, but if he did not intend that, his remarks had no point at all.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant.) Did I not say that they paid the duty?

Mr. STAIRS. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON. How could they get it without paying the duty?

Mr. STAIRS. Yes, but your comparison was to show the difference in the price of sugar under the present tariff, and the price under the tariff of the preceding Government.

Mr. PATERSON. No; it was not.

Mr. STAIRS. Then there was no point in what you said. In proceeding with his remarks he went on to argue that Conservatives have professed that the duty in all cases does not add to the price. Now we know that in one class of duties that proposition may be true, but there is another class in which it is not true, and it has never been claimed by Conservatives in this House or in the country that it was true. If the duty is a revenue duty, such as it is on raw sugar, we must add the duty to the price, and it was never otherwise claimed. Let us see how the duty stands in this particular class to which the hon. gentleman alludes. Taking his own figures, he says that it may be bought for 8s. 3d. sterling for 112 pounds in Glasgow. That was the estimate in his own figures and those of his friends, according to which landed in Kingston it would be $2.15 in bond. I assume that to be correct, as it probably is. Now what duty is paid upon that sugar under the present tariff? The duty which would be paid on that sugar if it graded between No. 9 and No. 14 would be 75 cents per 100 lbs., or ¾ of a cent per pound; and 30 per cent. on 8s. 3d., or 54 cents, making $1.29 per 100 lbs. So that sugar could have been laid down in Kingston duty paid at $3.44, and the selling price would probably be in Kingston as he estimated it, $3.79 per 100 lbs. He should have compared sugar which cost $3.44 per 100 lbs., landed duty paid, in Kingston, against a price which he said was 5 cents per lb., or a selling price of $3.79 per 100 lbs. against a selling price of 5 cents. Now let us see what would have been the cost under the tariff of the late Government. Under that tariff the sugar would have cost to sell on the same basis which he fixes, $3.70, or landed, $3.35, which is only 9 cents more per 100 lbs. which the people of Canada are now paying for that sugar under the present tariff than they would have paid under the tariff of the late Government. So much for this aspect of the case as applied to yellow sugars. Let us now apply it to the case of granulated sugars. He accepts the price of that sugar as given in the Mail at three and one half cents. Now, I do not mean to say that that is a correct statement of the price at which granulated sugar could perhaps be bought, or the correct price at which granulated sugar can be entered for duty; and I did not claim so. But I claimed that the people of Canada can get sugar at 3½ cents a pound, which is very nearly equal in quality to granulated sugar; and let us see what that sugar, costing 3½ cents in Glasgow would cost landed in Canada. The cost would be 3½ cents, to which add 1 cent per pound, and 35 per cent. on 3½ cents, or $2.22 per 100 pounds, making the cost of the sugar $5.72 duty paid, against the least 6½ or 6¼ cents per pound which the hon. gentleman claimed was the cost in Canada, or from 87 cents to $1 per 100 pounds more than sugar of the same quality could be imported for. Now, it may be said in reply to this, that granulated sugar could not be imported at this price. The hon. gentleman has erred in the latter part of his speech respecting the import price under the present tariff. I wish to point out that granulated sugars form but a small proportion of the consumption of sugar by the people of Canada. It may not be amiss here to say that the hon. gentleman's figures prove a great deal too much for his case. If the people of Canada choose to pay 5 cents a pound for sugar which they could import from Scotland and retail at 4 cents, I am sure the hon. gentleman will not complain that it is through the fault of the tariff or the Government; I am quite certain that he will not make either the House or the people of this Dominion believe that it is. Then, Sir, I think the hon. gentleman very much exaggerated his case when he talked about the increased cost of sugar to the people of Canada under the present tariff. After giving the total consumption of sugar in the Dominion as 170,000,000 pounds, he said:

"The 170,000,000, allowing for the waste, would make about 150,000,000 pounds of sugar; 150,000,000 pounds at $1.28 cents per 100 pounds would be just $1,920,000, the export price for a year's consumption, if it were all granulated sugar."

Now, as I said before, not more than one-fifth of all the consumption of sugar is granulated. If we take the sugar, on his own showing, at 3½ cents, the difference in the cost of that sugar from Scotland under the present tariff and under the tariff of the late Government is exactly 35 cents per 100 pounds, or 10 per cent. on $3.50. But take the Glasgow sugars, the yellow sugars, which are the cheapest—take the grades costing 8s. 6d. in Scotland, and what we pay under the present tariff more than under the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite is only 9 cents per 100 pounds. Now, the hon. member has said an increased duty of 9 cents per 100 pounds has cost the people $1.28 per hundred pounds. Such a claim is too extreme to command any attention from moderate men. But let us see how he makes it up. The increased duty on the sugar he claims would be on about 30,000,000 pounds of granulated at 35 cts., or $105,000, and on 120,000,000 pounds of yellow sugar at 9 cents per 100 pounds $108,000 or $213,000 altogether, instead of $1,920,000 at which the hon. gentleman estimated it. We know that if Canada were buying yellow sugars from Glasgow, they would on the average cost more than 8s 3d per cwt., but double that cost would only make $100,000 a year more than my figures above given, which the people under this tariff have to pay more than under the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite. But even that is more than offset by the sugar being made in our own country, and by the competition which is now so general among the sugar refiners of the Dominion in keeping down the price. It is utterly impossible then, as said before, that the tariff of the present Government could have increased the cost of sugar to the people of Canada to the extent claimed by the hon. member for South Brant. I am rather inclined to think that instead of the hon. member's figures proving that there is too much duty on sugar, they rather prove the reverse, and show that the protection to the sugar refiners is not sufficient. As I am talking on the question of sugar, I will, before passing to anything else, touch briefly upon some remarks which were made by the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) on the same subject. The hon. member, referring to the Minister of Finance, says:

"The hon. gentleman boasts of his success in dealing with the sugar question, and in establishing the West India trade."

Thereby implying that the tariff has not improved the West India trade. Now, I will prove later on that the tariff of the present Government has done very much indeed to improve that trade. The hon. member says further:

"Whereas in Glasgow to-day you can buy a fair quality of sugar, I am informed, for $2 per 100 pounds, in Canada we have to pay $5 per 100 pounds for sugar of the same quality."

In this statement the hon. gentleman has made exactly the same error as the hon. member for South Brant. He says a little further on:

"Why, from the importation of a little over 100,000,000 pounds in my time, we got a revenue in excess of that which the hon. gentleman now receives from 170,000,000 pounds. True, that is not of first class quality; true, about 20,000,000 pounds of that is wasted in the process of refining; but even so, we are probably to-day importing the equivalent of 150,000,000 pounds of refined sugar. Now, that sugar stands us at least 3 cents a pound more than it could be bought for in the open market."

Now, the hon. member for South Huron terribly exaggerated his case, for if he does not there intend to imply that this 3 cents per pound is in addition to the tariff put on the sugar by any Government in this country, there is no point in his remark against the National Policy at all. But we know that the price of sugar has not increased to the extent of 3 cents a pound over what it was under his own tariff. The difference in the cost of yellow sugars under the two tariffs, as I have already pointed out, is not more than 9 cents per 100 pounds in the cheaper kinds, and perhaps from 12 to 15 cents per 100 pounds in the better kinds that would come from Glasgow. Possibly, under the present tariff, we may be paying from 9 to 15 cents per 100 pounds more than we did under the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite. But let us look for a moment into some figures in connection with the trade in sugar during the last few years. In 1878 there was imported into Canada 101,000,000 pounds of refined sugar. There was imported into Canada sugar coming from the countries of production raw sugar 7,900,000 lbs., of which 92 $\frac{7}{10}$ per cent. was refined and 7 $\frac{3}{10}$ per cent. raw sugar. In 1880 a great change took place in these figures. Only 26 $\frac{6}{10}$ per cent. of refined sugar was imported and 73 $\frac{4}{10}$ per cent. of raw. In 1882 10 $\frac{6}{10}$ per cent. refined was imported and 89 $\frac{4}{10}$ per cent. raw; in 1883, 6 $\frac{4}{10}$ per cent. refined and 83 $\frac{6}{10}$ per cent. raw; in 1884, 9 $\frac{5}{10}$ per cent. refined and 90 $\frac{5}{10}$ per cent. raw. I rather imagine that of this 9 $\frac{5}{10}$, some raw, might have crept into the returns which I have been obliged to assume as refined, coming from certain countries, probably England, and which is likely raw beet sugar. These figures prove beyond doubt that the policy of the present Government has not only stimulated the refining industry, but has also very much assisted trade between the Dominion and those countries in which sugar is produced. But they show something more; they show an increased consumption of sugar in Canada from 109,000,000 lbs. in 1878 to 171,000,000 lbs. in 1884, and that the people in 1878 paid a larger sum of money for 109,000,000 lbs. of sugar than they did in 1884 for 171,000,000 lbs. In case it should be said in reply that sugar at present is much lower in price, I would also point out that we paid out in 1880 for 116,000,000 pounds of sugar about \$2,200,000 less than we did two years previous for 109,000,000 lbs.; so that much less money went out of the country for sugar in 1880 than did in 1878. These figures further prove that our trade with the countries of production has been very much encouraged, but I want to draw also the attention of the House to a phase of this trade in which the people of the Maritime Provinces are much interested, that is the amount of sugar that comes from the West Indies. In 1878, of all the sugar imported into the Dominion, 7 per cent. came from the West Indies, including British Guiana; in 1880, two years later, under the fostering policy of this Administration, this quantity had increased to 62 per cent. In 1881 it was 60 per cent; in 1882, 60 per cent., in 1883, 58 per cent.; and in 1884 it had fallen to 44 per cent. It will be worth while, I think, to enquire into the causes of this falling off in 1884. One of the causes undoubtedly is the very great production of beet sugar in Germany, Austria and some other of the European countries which have been competing very heavily with the cane growing sugar countries of the world and besides this the tariff, as arranged at present, operates, to a certain extent, against our trade with the West India Islands. The beet root sugar trade, as it injures for the present the West India trade, deserves the consideration of the Government. The tariff at first accomplished the purpose for which it was intended; it encouraged our West India trade, and a larger portion of our importation of raw sugar came from the West India Islands, but during the last few years a great change has come over the sugar trade of the world, sugar being produced in different ways and handled in different ways; it is being bought and sold in different ways; and these facts—the facts connected with the beet root sugar especially—affect our trade in sugar with the West India Islands. The East Indian archipelago has also been competing heavily with the West Indies; but if our West India trade suffers, no doubt this Government will seek a remedy, for if we are certain of one thing it is that there is now in power a Government who, when a case is clearly put before them and they are convinced that any particular trade in the Dominion is suffering, are not only willing but able to take steps to remove the difficulty. I am convinced hon. gentlemen on this side will take the proper steps. Can that be said to be the case with gentlemen opposite? It is known all over Canada that during the time they were in power numberless deputations waited upon them, numberless petitions were sent to them, in matters of trade, praying that they should do something to remedy the difficulties under which our manufacturing and other industries were laboring, but all the representations were unheeded by the ex-Finance Minister (Sir Richard Cartwright) and his colleagues. There was one way, I believe, in which it was thought some stimulus could be given to our West India trade, and that was by enforcing a heavier duty on our beet sugar; but it was soon seen that would not have been in the interest of the West India trade and that it would at the same time injure the refining interest of the Dominion. Into this question I need not enter, as it has already been dealt with by other hon. gentlemen. What the remedy is for this state of affairs I am not going to point out; I have simply given these figures to show the state of the West India trade, to show the improvement which took place in this trade during preceding years, and the falling off that it has exhibited during the past year; and I simply ask the Government to give the question that attention they are always prepared to give every subject connected with trade and commerce which comes before them; and I have no doubt that once they are convinced of the facts, they will apply the proper remedy. With regard to the adoption of the polariscope referred to by the hon. member for Cardwell in his remarks, I wish to correct a slight inaccuracy into which he fell. I understood him to say, respecting the wishes of the people of Nova Scotia, as regards adopting a change in the mode of collecting sugar duties, that the adoption of the polariscope, as a means of collecting sugar duties, would be prejudicial to our trade with countries of production other than the West Indies. I want to remove that misapprehension. The present position of the West India Islands, as regards the duty collected on sugar from these islands, is that they have to pay a little heavier duty than the sugar from the more distant countries, on account of the greater value of sugar in the West Indies, owing to the lesser distance they have to traverse to get to market. What the people of Nova Scotia, who are engaged in the West India trade ask is, not that any differential rates may be made to operate against our trade with other countries, but that our trade with the West India Islands may be put on a fair basis. The present contention of these gentlemen is that the islands are at a positive disadvantage, and it is well known that it is more to the interest of the people of the Dominion to cultivate trade with the West India Islands than with a part of the world ten thousand miles away. Not only, therefore, is it in the interest of importers of sugar in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick that if possible some remedy should be applied, but also in the interest of the whole Dominion, because we want to build up a trade between the West India Islands and the Dominion, not only in sugar but in a great many other articles which the Dominion of Canada can manufacture and is now as well able to supply to those islands as the people of the United States, who have a large proportion of the trade at the present time. Having dealt for a few moments with the question of the sugar trade, I will take up some of the matters referred to in the speech of the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) in relation to the Maritime Provinces, and especially in relation to the Province of Nova Scotia, I will quote a few lines from his speech:

"When I come to the Maritime Provinces what do I find? Their's, I must admit is a hard case. They were brought into this Confederation by distinct promises on the part of the hon. gentleman and his colleagues which have been ruthlessly violated. It was at least a tacit understanding that no such tariff as that we now labor under should be imposed upon them."

I do not need to answer this point, because it was most ably answered by the member for King's, N. S. He distinctly explained that the question of the tariff was the issue before the people of Nova Scotia in 1878 and that a large majority of the representatives from Nova Scotia came here pledged to support the policy of the right hon. the leader of the Government. He also pointed out that the bye elections between 1878 and 1882 resulted on the whole in a continued support being given to this policy. He pointed out as well that in 1882 the policy was still sustained in the Province of Nova Scotia, and that since that time the bye elections which have taken place have not only shown no loss but have resulted in a gain of one member to support the policy of the present Government. In the face of this, I do not think it needs that any supporter of the present Government from the Maritime Provinces should get up and give any other reply to the charge made by the member for South Huron on this point. If the people of Nova Scotia have accepted this tariff, if they pronounced upon it in 1878, if they supported it in the bye elections since that time, and again in 1882, and if they still support it since that date, he needs no other answer and the people of Canada need no other proof that the people of Nova Scotia by their vote at the polls have supported and continue to support the policy of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. He does make some brief references to the resolutions laid upon the Table of the Nova Scotia House of Assembly a few days ago. It is not necessary in this House that I should seriously attempt to answer this. I would not waste the time of the House by making a speech upon it. The question has never assumed a serious phase in Nova Scotia at all. The hon. gentleman who moved the resolutions in the Legislative Assembly of Nova Scotia I believe is sincere in the policy he then promulgated. He has been a consistent supporter of repeal since 1867, or at least since I have known him in public life, but I assert here that he finds very few to support him even among his own friends. The organs and the members of the party to which he belongs will not go so far as to advocate repeal in Nova Scotia, and that being the case, his reference to this question needs no serious reply from any member from Nova Scotia. The hon. gentleman from South Huron, a little further on in his speech, refers again to the position of the Maritime Provinces, speaks of our languishing industries, says the people are not profiting in the slightest degree by the National Policy, "but are earnestly looking forward to see whether the hon gentlemen are taking any steps whatever to ensure them reciprocity with the United States." And then he goes on to criticise the policy of this Government in the way in which they have handled the question of reciprocity. I am not going into that at all. I believe that reciprocity, if we get a fair treaty, would be a very good thing for Nova Scotia, and I believe as well that the hon. gentleman on this side of the House are not only perfectly willing but have also shown most fully by their legislation of years ago that they are prepared to meet the Government of the United States whenever that Government and people are willing to come forward and meet us, but I am thoroughly convinced, judging by the experience of the past, that the talk of a reciprocity treaty with the United States is only words thrown away. But, though they attempt to charge us with something on this question of reciprocity, I think we are very well able to show that the difficulties in the way of obtaining a reciprocity treaty are not altogether on our side of the House. Just let us see. Here it will not be amiss to refer to a short remark which was made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey), who criticised the member for Gloucester (Mr. Burns) for his remarks upon reciprocity, and the Government for not having made any announcement whatever on that point, and assumed that, because they had not made any announcement, therefore they had not taken any steps at all to secure reciprocity. Such an assumption was altogether unwarranted. In fact, it is quite certain that, no matter what the Government has done in the matter, they are not going to take that hon. gentleman fully into their confidence; but I have the best authority to say that every step is being taken to secure a reciprocity treaty that can be, I have here a report of an interview which took place with Mr. S. J. Ritchie, of Akron, Ohio, President of the Central Ontario Railway, and I will read you a few lines from it:

"In conversation with one of our reporters Mr. Ritchie stated that, while at the United States Capitol, he had met a great many representative men with whom he had talked about Canada, its resources and possibilities. Touching upon the question of a policy of reciprocity between the two countries, he found that the general feeling prevailed, based upon the bad character which Canada received from some of its public men, that a reciprocity treaty was hardly necessary, as, in the course of a short time, the country must come to the United States Government for relief from their present condition."

Now, if we can turn to the utterances of some of these hon. gentlemen and show that they really have made them to the effect that is there described, I think it will show that the contention I just made, that the hon. gentlemen opposite are themselves to blame, at least in part, for the difficulty which is now found to rest upon the present Government in securing a reciprocity treaty, will be proved. I will take a very short extract from a speech of the hon. the leader of the Opposition at New Glasgow. He is reported in the Eastern Chronicle as follows:—

"If you had not liberty to exchange your property you would find it useless to continue to produce more than you required for your personal wants, for you could not get rid of it. To restrict or prevent you from exchanging what you desire to exchange would be a restriction against which you would rebel. Restrictions which have a tendency to divert trade from its natural channels are injurious to the many. Your natural channel of trade is with the neighboring Republic; your exports will find the best market there, and your imports should come from there."

Now I will read from the speech made by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) in Charlottetown:

"Now I believe that free trade is best for all sections of our community. But look at your present interests, your agriculture and fisheries. How are they helped? Can it be said they are protected? If it is a good law that some men should be protected, why should not all be protected? But can labor be protected? There is no law to prevent an employer from looking where he will for labor."

Now I acknowledge that does not touch the question of reciprocity, but I want to remark that if there is no law to prevent the employer from looking where he will for labor, there is no law to prevent the employee from looking where he will for employment; and if the policy of this country increases the number of employers, it will therefore increase the number of employees. That is a proposition which is just as true as the proposition of the hon. gentleman:

"You want the free exchange of productions with other countries. You want free access to the markets of the world. What prevents you having these? The hand of man debars you by legislation. Your natural market is the United States, but by the laws of both countries free exchange of productions is prevented. That country would be a market for your potatoes and a large number of other articles, if their laws would allow it to be so."

Now I think, Mr. Speaker, that assertion of the hon. member is not borne out by the facts. I think it cannot be claimed, even at the present time, that the laws of both countries prevent the exchange of the natural products of Prince Edward Island with the United States. There is a law at the present time, as every hon. member knows, which will compel the Government of the Dominion, just as soon as the Government of the United States are willing to enter into a reciprocity treaty, to take off the duties on those articles which the United States would admit free from our side. I think when the hon. gentleman made that assertion he forgot that law, and was not quite correct in claiming such was the law in both countries. The difficulty that affects the people of Prince Edward Island in their trade relations is not owing to the Government of the Dominion, but entirely to the Government and people of the United States. I have read these extracts to show the difficulties which lie before the Government of the Dominion in obtaining a reciprocity treaty. They not only have to contend with enemies from without but they have to contend with speeches which are not made in the interests of Canada by our own people. Now, Sir, to return to the question of the prosperity of the Maritime Provinces and of Nova Scotia. The hon. member from South Huron does not object, in running down the Dominion Government, to include the Maritime Provinces; but if he says anything against the Maritime Provinces in an assembly where I am present, I shall endeavor to disprove his statements and show they are not correct. I contend the picture he has drawn of the condition of Nova Scotia is not a true one, and I am prepared to prove it. If I can prove that the country has continued to gain in wealth from 1869—as I could not get the statistics from 1867—to 1878, that it has not only gained absolutely in wealth, but has gained relatively with other Provinces of the Dominion, I shall have proved that during the period the National Policy has been in operation that Province has improved even more rapidly than previously. If I can prove that the capital in the savings banks has increased to a large extent I shall have proved that the prosperity of the country has increased, a proposition which I defy any hon. member to dispute. On the 31st December, 1869, the paid-up bank capital of Nova Scotia was $1,890,000—perhaps a little more, as the returns at that time were not very complete. On 30th June, 1884, the paid-up bank capital of the Province of Nova Scotia was $4,858,000 or an increase of $2,967,000, or about 154 per cent. The deposits in the chartered banks not bearing interest on 31st December, 1869, were $1,157,853; and on 30th June, 1884, $2,000,000, or an increase of $844,000, or about 73 per cent. Then the deposits in these chartered banks bearing interest, which I think will more clearly show the saving of the country, were, on 31st December, 1869, $1,366,000; and on 30th June, 1884, $6,518,000, an increase of $5,151,844, or 377 per cent. Now we come to the savings banks. On the 1st July, 1869, the deposits in the Dominion savings banks—we have no post office savings banks in Nova Scotia, but we expect to have them soon—were $722,000; and on 30th June, 1884, they were $6,493,000, an increase of $5,770,000. I have not calculated the percentage, but if the hon. gentleman from Digby (Mr. Vail) wishes to reply he can make up the percentage; it is somewhere in the neighborhood of 600 or 700 per cent. Now, Sir, I submit these figures show that there is an absolute gain in the capital and prosperity of that Province from 1869 to 1884. The sum of all these figures shows that the increase in what you might call the available capital and savings of the Province of Nova Scotia during those years was $14,735,000; at the same time all the ordinary investments of the country and all the ordinary improvements went on as usual. During the last few years there was a very much larger sum than ever before invested in manufactures, and in the improvement of the farmers' houses and outbuildings throughout the whole Province. No one who knows Nova Scotia from one end to the other but must admit that amongst our people generally there has been a very great increase in their prosperity, and they are now living much better and in a more prosperous manner than they were in 1867. Now, Sir, let us see how the increase in these particulars in the Province of Nova Scotia compares with the increase in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. The paid-up bank capital in Ontario and Quebec on 31st December, 1869, was $30,727,000; on 30th June, 1884, it had increased to $55,063,000, an increase of $24,336,000, or about 50 per cent., as compared with the increase in Nova Scotia during the same time of 154 per cent. The increase of deposits in chartered banks not bearing interest was, in Ontario and Quebec, on 31st December, 1869, $16,849,504, as against $41,541,195 on 30th June, 1884, an increase of $25,691,691, or 148 per cent., compared with Nova Scotia's 73 per cent. In that particular class of deposits I am prepared to admit that those Provinces did go a little better than Nova Scotia, but I will show that in some other particulars we went a little better than they did. The deposits in chartered banks bearing interest, in Ontario and Quebec, amounted, on 31st December, 1869, to $26,283,248, and in June, 1884, to $45,800,382, or 74 per cent. increase compared with Nova Scotia, 377 per cent. The House will see that, as compared with the increases in Ontario and Quebec, the increase in Nova Scotia has been not only equal, but I believe superior. Not only did I say I was prepared to prove that there had been an increase from 1869 to 1884 in Nova Scotia's prosperity, but that the increase had been very fair indeed during the last five years of this period as compared with the previous ones. Before I go into that proof I will just say that the increase in the paid-up capital of the chartered banks, in deposits bearing interest, in deposits not bearing interest, and in deposits in the savings banks in Nova Scotia was from $5,137,069 to $19,822,084, an increase of $14,725,000, or 286 per cent., as against an increase in the same classes of deposits and bank capital in Ontario and Quebec of 128 per cent. I have shown there has been a steady increase in the available capital savings from 1869 to 1884, that the increase compares favorably with that of Ontario and Quebec; and I will now establish that during the period, 1879 to 1884, the increase was quite as great as during either of the previous periods. The paid-up bank capital in Nova Scotia was, in 1869, $1,890,696; 30th June, 1874, $3,466,931; 1879, $4,295,878; 1884, $4,858,207. The House will see from the total figures that the increase during the last period has been a very fair one.

Mr. VAIL. Not so large as before.

Mr. STAIRS. It was very much larger from 1879 to 1884 than from 1874 to 1878. I admit it was not quite as large as from 1869 to 1874, during which time hon. gentlemen on this side of the House were in power. If that argument will suit the hon. gentleman he is quite welcome to it. Deposits not bearing interest in 1869 amounted to $1,157,853; in 1884, $2,002,677; increase, $844,824, or about 73 per cent. I notice in the bank returns something exceptional in the deposits not bearing interest in 1879, because there was a very large falling off in one of the banks during one or two months, showing that there was some special cause in operation. From 1874 to 1879, however, there was a decrease in the deposits not bearing interest from $979,164 to $841,488; from 1879 to 1884 the increase was from $841,498 to $2,000,677. We now come to deposits in banks bearing interest, and if the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) can obtain any consolation from these figures, he is welcome. Here are the figures: 1869, $1,366,734; 30th June, 1874, $2,177,100; 1879, $2,990,310; 1884, $6,518,582. The savings bank balances in Nova Scotia were as follows: 30th June, 1869, $722,419; 1874, $1,530,981; 1879, $2,499,406; 1884, $6,493,277. Hon. gentlemen will see that the last figure shows an increase within a fraction of $4,000,000.

Mr. VAIL. Give us the dividends.

Mr. STAIRS. I want hon. gentlemen opposite to know that the enormous increases, as I have shown, have taken place in the deposits in the chartered banks, bearing interest, and in the deposits in the savings banks, a class of deposits which show most quickly and clearly the increased savings of the country. If it be said that those increased savings took place at the expense of the business of the country, I deny it emphatically. I say that the available business capital of the country was increased; that the business of the country absorbed the usual capital, besides which there was a very large expenditure of capital for the ordinary improvements going on through the Province generally. I have endeavored to prove that the people of Nova Scotia at the present time are, as a whole, much better off than they were in 1867. To those who know the Province well it needed no proof at all. Anyone who has travelled from one end of it to another is aware that improvements are constantly going on. The markets for the farmers are much better than formerly, and the return I have given shows that all classes are very much better off. If this be the case, what is the reason of the depression of which we hear so much? There must be some reason, and I will endeavor to explain what I think is the cause of it. Whereas, throughout the whole of Canada there has been a great increase in the prosperity of the masses, still we must admit, and all who are acquainted with business will admit, that during the last ten or twelve years a very great change has taken place over the whole world in trade and business. All who have engaged in active business know that whereas twenty years ago it was very easy for a man in any ordinary community to make a good living with care and economy, at the present time competition is so great that it is a very difficult matter indeed. We have had over-competition, over-trading. It seems now-a-days that people are in such a hurry to get rich that they fail to get rich at all. If you admit this is the case, you cannot show that there has not been at the same time a steady improvement in the condition of the mass of the people throughout the whole country. The trader may not be as well off as formerly, the wholesale merchant may not be so well off, and is not so well off as formerly. But at the same time the working classes are a great deal better off. The difficulty is not that the men are not well able to buy articles and pay good prices, for they are buying more goods every year; but the difficult is in the merchants themselves, though not from causes over which one merchant could have control, but from causes that are affecting the whole mercantile community throughout the world. Now it has been said that Confederation and the abrogation of reciprocity has something to do with the dulness of the times in Nova Scotia. No doubt the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty was a disadvantage to Nova Scotia. No one who knows anything about that Province will claim to the contrary, but I hold that it is not the main reason of the difficulty that is troubling us in Nova Scotia just now. I believe that the people of Nova Scotia have largely got over the trouble which was experienced when that treaty was abrogated. They have settled down to new modes of business; they have found new markets, and they are prospering fairly well. The difficulty with regard to the prosperity of the trading community is that it is now impossible for merchants, out of the larger businesses they now have, to maintain the profits which they had twenty years ago, and I regret to say in some respects that condition of things applies more to Nova Scotia than to any other part of America. Nova Scotia is a small Province; the trade of our dealers is confined pretty much within the Province, and it happens, from our geographical position, that every town there is a port of entry—every town of any size is a sea port, and it is as easy for the merchants in these towns to import as it is for the merchants of Halifax. This condition of things is much to the disadvantage of the merchants of Halifax, but no gentleman should complain of that, because it is to the advantage of the merchants of Nova Scotia. From the position and size of Halifax—this is the ground for many of the complaints of the Halifax wholesale merchants about the state of business—we cannot do much of the business that we used to do, or rather the business cannot realise the profits which it used to realise. A large portion of the import trade of the United States goes through New York; so in Montreal, in regard to the Canadian trade. If the goods are not bought in Montreal they must pass through Montreal to go to their destination. That is not the case in Nova Scotia. No doubt, in the course of time, these things will settle themselves; but at the present time business is undergoing a change that has produced disadvantages for many of our people, but these disadvantages are ascribed to causes which are not the right ones. Some complain that Confederation affected the merchants of Nova Scotia very injuriously, but I must say that these are generally gentlemen supporting the opposite side of the House; and no matter how much they may suffer from the competition which comes from Canada, no free trader can legitimately complain of any competition which gives the purchaser cheaper goods. I am quite confident, in reference to the Province of Nova Scotia, and the city of Halifax—and I believe the remark applies to a very large number of the dealers throughout the country. I believe they are to-day doing a larger business than they did in 1867. I do not think there is a prominent wholesale business house in Halifax that is not doing a greater volume of business than in 1867, but I regret to say that on account of those circumstances connected with the change of business to which I have alluded, they cannot make the same profits out of the larger business as they previously did out of the smaller ones. Now, Mr. Speaker, I had intended to take a little more time in making some replies to hon. gentlemen opposite, but as I see the hour is getting late, as I do not wish to weary the House, as I have been giving a good many figures, which are always wearisome to listen to, and as the debate has gone on for some time, I think it is better that I should conclude. I would just say, in concluding, that I have faith in this tariff; that I have faith in this country, in spite of all the criticisms of hon. gentlemen opposite, from their leader downward; I have full faith in the prosperity of the country in the future; I have faith in the policy of the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government, and his colleagues; I have faith in our North-West, in the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I have faith that in the future they will, as they have in the past, carry out those measures which will best conduce to the prosperity of this great Dominion.

Mr. GILLMOR. I, Mr. Speaker, sympathise with you when a debate of this kind is before the House. I am sure you often feel that of making many speeches there is no end, and much listening is a weariness to the flesh. I am not your right hand man. Other things being equal I might prefer it, but I am the next to it, your left hand man. I do not propose to criticise the speech of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs), who has just taken his seat. He may have made an able argument in defence of the policy of the Administration, but I failed to appreciate it. It reminded me of a story I once heard of a Negro preacher who attended a meeting. He gave out a hymn and they undertook to start the tune. They tried "Old Hundred," but failed, and then they tried "Coronation," and they failed in that. They tried some other tunes unsuccessfully, and then they sat down. The preacher turned round to them and said: I thank you; because I think you did the very best you could. So I think that whether this hon. gentleman succeeded or not, he tried hard enough and, therefore, he should be thanked, for he did the best he could. One thing I can promise, with regard to the remarks I am about to make, and I am sure you will be pleased with the announcement, that is, I have not any figures to present; I have not looked into the Trade and Navigation Returns for the purpose of presenting statistics. I know they have been perused from end to end and that the House will be sick of statistics. This is the twelfth Session in which I have listened to the debates in this House, and I have never missed an important debate, or any important speech in a debate. You would hardly think that, because I am not strong, but I think that very few men can say that in twelve Sessions they have not missed a day in Parliament. I have sat here a great many days when I did not feel very well, but I prefer, during the sittings of the House, to be in my seat. I have listened to the speeches which have been delivered in this debate and I have enjoyed them, though there has been just one interruption which I have sometimes felt like making—though, of course, it would be out of order—when some hon. members were speaking. I was often tempted to get up and shout "Ananias and Sapphira." I do not mean that I was disposed to shout "Ananias" when a mistake is made, or when a man is really making an error. But when I hear a statement made after study for weeks, and it does not exactly accord with my ideas of what is proper, I want to shout "Ananias." I have had occasion thus to do very frequently, although I have thoroughly enjoyed their speeches. Now, it must be apparent to anyone who observes closely, that there is a great difference in the style of speeches now with regard to the policy of the present Administration compared with those of last year and the year before. Then, there was great exultation; now we hear an apology; things are not quite as bad as they might be, and even the little deficiency in the policy is not chargeable to the policy, or to the authors of the policy, or to the party, but to the Opposition. If it had not been for the Opposition, who opposed the policy in season and out of season, in the House and in the country, and said it was bad; if it had not been for their opposition, there would have been no failure at all in the National Policy, or in any other policy of the present Administration. Now, Sir, there is no reason why the Opposition should favor the policy of the Government. The Opposition have opposed that policy because they thought it was bad. The Government were warned by our leader and by other gentlemen on this side of the House, night after night and day after day, that their policy was bad. Their policy is not our policy; their ways are not our ways, and their thoughts are not as our thoughts—they are as different from ours as light is from darkness. Therefore we are not responsible for their policy. We did not desire that the country should suffer, but we were satisfied that it would, and I am satisfied that it has. They are hunting around now for some crumbs of comfort, some spots where prosperity exists. If their policy was a success, it has now been five years in operation, and prosperity would be seen everywhere. In order to find some little prosperity somewhere, they sent commissioners all over the Dominion. I think it was Diogenes who took a lantern and went out to see if he could find an honest man. Diogenes would now require two lanterns if he went through the country to find the success of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. We find depression everywhere; everybody knows that business is depressed. I do not mean to say that any policy could be devised to prevent depression; but when these hon. gentlemen were on this side of the House they were continually holding the Government of that day responsible for the depression in business. That was their policy, and therefore they ought not shirk the responsibility that now rests on them, from their own standpoint. They told us that their policy was going to make the country prosperous—that steady, upward, progress was to be the effect of it. That has not been the case; but the platform on which they based their promises of prosperity has been an utter and entire failure. Now, I do not intend to deal particularly with each branch of what they term their policy. You know my attention has been directed more to the protective tariff than to any other part of their policy; I think that is more important than any other part. Any mistakes hon. gentlemen may have made in any other respects will be more easily remedied than their mistake in adopting a protective policy, because the evils it entails gain strength as they roll on; they fix a burden on the country which the longer it lasts the more difficulty it will be to remove. Therefore, I look on the National Policy as the worst part of their policy. Now, in looking amongst my papers I find a memorandum book containing some sentiments which I gleaned, some from essays on political economy, some from newspapers, and some from my own thoughts; and before commencing my speech, I will read them:

"It is as much a law of our nature to exchange with one another those things we have to sell for those things we have to buy as it is to breathe. It was clearly the design of our Creator for the benefit of the race. Notice the different articles in a household which we cannot produce or sell, but can produce something else and purchase them. Society is one vast hive of buyers and sellers, every man carrying something to the market and bringing something away. Everybody exchanges. You do something for me, and I will do something for you. The farmer brings the fruits of the field; the mechanic brings his skilled labor; the laboring man brings his strong arm; the fisherman brings the various products of the sea; the school teacher brings his knowledge; the merchant, the physician, the lawyer, the clergyman, all exchange their abilities and skill for something that other men have to give them. It is impossible to divest ourselves of the fact that this desire to exchange is a universal law of our nature and of society, and any system which interferes with the fullest freedom of exchange is wrong. Freedom of exchange is as much a natural right as the right to think or breathe. Every man has a natural, self-evident right to put forth efforts for his own well-being; and whenever two men find that by exchanging efforts with each other they can add to their own happiness, they have an indisputable right to do so; and it is a high-handed infringement of natural rights when any authority interferes to restrict or prohibit the freedom of exchange, except that act is justified by solid proof that other private or public rights are infringed which are as well founded as the right of exchange. All the restrictive laws which have ever been made overlook entirely the mutual benefit to the parties of every act of exchange, without which benefit the exchange clearly would not take place at all."

These are words of wisdom; these are like apples of gold set in pictures of silver; these are principles which the National Policy controverts; these are the rights which the National Policy seeks to deprive the inhabitants of this Dominion of; these are the fundamental principles of political economy. Now, I always listen to the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) with a great deal of interest. He is, evidently, an able man, and I listen to him with great pleasure for the ability he displays and the eloquence he possesses. We are never disappointed in a speech from the hon. gentleman. It is always well prepared and well delivered, but there is no man I have ever listened to who understands how to make error appear interesting any better than does the hon. member for Cardwell. Of course, that is not exactly the word or the phrase that I would prefer to use, but I have not the command of language sufficient to find any term to express my opinion of his speech better than that. In that speech he said:

"We have been enjoying for some time past the free traders' paradise—a cheap country to live in. The real trouble has been that articles have been too cheap, and that very thing which hon. gentlemen opposite have been arguing we should endeavor to bring about is the very thing which has produced the difficulty from which, to some extent, we have been suffering during the last twelve months. Go to a merchant and ask on what his hopes rest for a revival of business. He will tell you, in the fact that prices are beginning to stiffen, as he expresses it, and there are likely, therefore, to be better times."

I accept the paragraph in so far as the free trader's paradise is concerned. I know that this is not the best world of which we have any knowledge, but it is next to the best, and to be able to procure what we need to make life pleasant, adds much to make our journey through it agreeable. The desire to live in a cheap country and to have a cheap market is universal, and that sentiment marks the difference between the Government and their opponents. They believe in having a dear country to live in; we believe in having a cheap country to live in; they believe in high prices for the necessaries of life, and all we require; we believe in low prices. I am always happy when in an open, free market—I can get what I want at the lowest possible price, and I am sure hon. gentlemen opposite think the same way. Despite their professions they themselves have the same feeling, for it is a universal feeling. Nobody goes out to find where he can buy at the highest price; everybody wants to buy at the lowest price; but of course it makes greater difference to the poor man than to the rich, whether they can buy at the lowest price or at a higher price. I know how much a dollar is worth; I am a workingman myself; I have earned my bread by my toil; I know what it is to earn a dollar in the woods, in the mill, with the spade and the shovel and the hoe, and when I have so earned a dollar I ought to have the right to spend it in the cheapest market, and the Government has no right to enact laws to make that market dear when it would otherwise be cheap. Another expression I have heard in this debate is "cheap and nasty." I believe the hon. gentleman, the leader of the Government, has the credit for that saying. I do not agree with him; I do not consider that anything nasty can be cheap. Everything nasty must be dear, and we ought not to have it at all. With regard to the Ministers, I tell you, Sir, those who are in Government employ, those who rule the country, do not know the value of a dollar. They get their dollars quite differently from those who toil for their livelihood, and those who toil are the great mass of the people, for whom these hon. gentlemen ought to legislate. They out to legislate so that the people may get as much as possible out of their earnings. Of course the hon. member for Cardwell does not know what it is to be poor, and I am not anxious that he should ever know it; it does not make much difference to him whether a barrel of flour costs $5 or $10, but it makes a great difference to the mass of the population. It is very important for the poor man who has earned $5, whether he can get a barrel of flour or only half a barrel of flour for it, and many a time have I seen a poor man struggling to sustain his family, after he had accumulated sufficient to get a barrel of flour, express the wish, over and over again, that he had enough money to get a bag of meal as well, so as to stretch out the flour until he could earn enough to get another barrel. Of course I will be told this is mere sentiment; that I am only trying to curry favor with the poor. But, Sir, I do not want to curry favor with the poor or the rich; all I want is to express my sentiments here fully and freely, and I only wish I had more ability, more power, with which to urge the claims of the people. However, I do the best I can, and that is all any one can expect. With regard to purchasing in a cheap market, I have never been a Minister of the Crown, I have never been on a mission to England, but I venture to say that the very best apparel in the wardrobes of hon. gentlemen opposite have been purchased in England at the people's expense. I venture to say that the West of England broadcloth and everything else they wear, and they have the best, was bought when they were on the other side. There was nothing wrong in that; they were in a country where goods are cheap and where it is cheap to live; they found cheap goods and purchased them; they arrayed themselves in purple and fine linen at cheap rates and brought them home. There was nothing wrong in that, but if any one of these hon. gentlemen forgot to open his trunk on his way back, and let the Custom house officer examine it, that would be rather nasty. I do not know whether any one of them did forget or not, but if he did it would be a nasty matter. Of course, in this country, there are not many people who are very poor, and for them there are fortunately institutions of benevolence where their wants can be supplied. This idea of a dear country being a good country for any body to live in is a mistake; and it is now re-acting. Dear coal means less coal, and less coal means want, and cold, and suffering. Dear bread means less bread, and it means hunger for a great many when it is dear, and want and suffering. Dear clothes means less clothes for the poor, and in some cases it means rags. And dear blankets means less blankets and suffering to be endured by the poor in consequence of the high price of blankets. I remember reading a little story in some book, of a poor woman with a large family, who was in very destitute circumstances. She got her little ones ready for bed at night, and had very little to keep them warm. It was a cold night, and she piled over them some straw and some rags, and last of all she got an old door and laid that upon them. After she had got them covered up, she asked one of them: "Do you think you will be warm?" "Oh, yes, mother," said the little one, "we shall be warm and comfortable, but what will the poor children do who have no old doors?" There was more heart in that little child, that will live and shine when all those who want to increase the cost of living for the poor have gone to their reward. I never think of that without feeling for the poor, and feeling that the gratitude of that poor thing under those circumstances it would be well if some of us felt when we are enjoying the blessing and comforts of life. This idea of dear things, this curse of poverty, this curse of hunger and of rags, travels right back through society. These rags go back to the manufacturer. Dear clothes means less clothes, and that means less business for the merchant, and less business for the manufacturer, and so the rags travel right back through all the industries. Dear bread means hunger for the poor, but it also means less sales for the grocer, and that means less sales for the miller, and that means less sales for the farmer; and so we cannot violate a natural law without feeling the effects of it somewhere; and, therefore, it is best for all concerned that everybody should be allowed to buy in the market as cheap as can be found. There is not so much difference between the rich and the poor at last. The rich and the poor must lie down together, and God is the Father of us all, and therefore we ought to remember that as we journey through life, and no class of men ought to consider it more than those who are at the helm of affairs. I think the National Policy ignores all that; I think it is opposed to all these benevolent and humane principles. In this Dominion we are blessed with abundance of coal. That is a gift from our Creator. That is intended to be cheap, that everybody may participate in the bounty of the Giver of all Good. In this country we have vast wheat fields, for which we ought to be thankful. That is intended for the good of the race, for the good of the country, and these gentlemen propose to make that dear for the people. The Creator intended that it should be cheap for the people, and plenty of it. We have great herds of cattle and flocks of sheep, in order that we may be fed and clothed, and this we ought to be thankful for, for "the cattle on a thousand hills are His," and all comes from Him; but we are trying, by our legislation here, or at least the gentlemen on the Government benches are making all things dear, trying to fix taxes upon them and to make it difficult for the people to be comfortable and happy. A cheap country to live in—if that is not the Grit's paradise, it is mine. Take it all in all, England, with all her faults, is the greatest, and the wisest, and the best nation the world has ever seen. England has led the way in art, and in arms, and in commerce, and in freedom, and I hope she may long continue to lead the van; but, in all that England has ever done, there is no part of her history that shines out more brightly than when she fought out the battle against protection and made England a cheap country to live in. The statesmen and the philanthropists of England saw the millions of starving poor. I was there myself once when a boy. The agitation was going on at that time for the repeal of the corn laws, and I took occasion, in my rambles through the cities, to talk with the poor, and I went into those bazaars which were situated all over England, in the towns and cities I visited, and gave my small contribution to help that work. They succeeded in removing that curse, and I did not think that, forty years after I was there as a lad, I would be standing in Parliament trying to combat the evil under which that nation had groaned from generation to generation. But that is the fact, and as they had had to struggle many a long year, I fear that that is a fight still before us, and that many a man is to fall before this incubus, this evil, this curse is removed from this Canada of ours. I know that perhaps it is expedient for some men, and may be for many, not to express their opinions, because the combined influence of Governments, and manufacturers, and monopolies, is almost more than a man's election or position is worth if he ventures his opinions, but timid as I am constitutionally, when I feel it my duty to express my opinion on a great question of this kind, I shall do it, no matter what the consequences are. That battle has been fought out in England, and no statesman, whether he be Tory or Liberal, will ever reverse that verdict. You do not hear this agitated in England; and why should they? Do they want to go back to rags? Do they want to go back to hunger? Do they want to go back to depression? Do they want to go back to the condition in which they were before they arrived at the conclusion that people in England should live as cheap as the world could give it? They should have bread as cheap as the world could give it; they should have meat as cheap as the world could give it; they should have every necessary of life as cheap as the world could give it, from the hat on their head to the shoes on their feet. Do you suppose they would ever undertake to go back to that condition? No, never. But we have gone back, and we are in the position they were in before that change was made. I will read an extract from the speech of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White):

"Ask any commercial traveller who has been in England buying goods what condition he found there; ask any one who has an opportunity of testing the feeling of the commercial circles in Great Britain; look at the records of people out of employment, and at the record of failures, and you will find the statement is absolutely accurate, that for a quarter of a century no such depression has existed in England as that which has existed during this last year."

I have no doubt that is correct. I dare say that there is great depression in England, and that the commercial traveller was correct in his statement. I have not seen any commercial traveller that has been in England, but I have seen a good many commercial travellers that have been in Canada. He did not see them, and I did not see the gentleman he saw; but I have seen a good many commercial travellers, and I have talked with them in regard to the condition of commerce in the country. Some of them have been on the road for twenty years, and they have told me that they have never seen such commercial depression during their time as there is at present: such a stagnation of trade, so hard to dispose of their goods, and especially in the Maritime Provinces. I know that to be the fact myself, although I am not away much from home, but I have correspondence, and I am aware of the fact that commercially the country has not been so depressed for a great many years. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not charge the Government with this depression, except so far as increased taxation has helped to produce it; I do not refer to it because I think they were the cause of bringing it about. But let them remember when the Liberal Government was in power what they used to say. I can see a face here and there that was here at that time. I remember their faces; I remember their speeches; I remember their voices, and I remember their unreasonable demands, and their unreasonable charges against the Government, of being flies on the wheel, of letting the people leave the country, of allowing business to become depressed, of getting a small revenue, and all that sort of thing. And that gives rise to much of the speech-making that there is at this time—it is just to bring to the recollection of those hon. gentlemen how they treated their opponents then. Now, I am not silly enough to suppose the Liberal Government could prevent a depression; and I am not silly enough to charge the present Government, seriously, with having caused this depression; but I can say they told the people they could do it. They told the people that if they were in power they could bring back prosperity. I ask them now to do it; I ask them to fulfil their promises now. I ask them by their policy to create such a prosperity that they will not have to go about with a lantern to find it.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Take a lantern to Lennox.

Mr. GILLMOR. You had better take some light into your own noddle. I will read another extract from the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) where he says :

"Now, Sir, times have been less active, perhaps—that would be the better way to put it—less active recently than in 1882 and 1883, and there are reasons for it altogether apart from the question of the Government's policy, or any policy that might be adopted. We had first a large withdrawal of capital from legitimate enterprises to put into speculative enterprises in the North-West. In Toronto, for instance, when the North-West Land Company, which had bought a large amount of land from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, opened their books, I am told there was almost a riot in the effort to get into the room to subscribe for the stock of that company, so valuable was it supposed to be. People were anxious to go into all these new enterprises. The tendency of the age, I am sorry to say, is a gambling tendency, in commercial as well as in other matters."

He might have added politics.

"There is an eager disposition to make fortunes rapidly. People may sit down and play draw-poker—that is an innocent game, for draw-poker, in its practical sense, is to play for quarters; and the people who play draw-poker for quarters would object to being regarded as gamblers. We know that there was an idea that in the North-West there was a remarkable opportunity for making rapid fortunes, and people took money from their ordinary legitimate business and put it into North-West enterprises and lost it, to the great injury of the credit and business of the country at large."

Now what a humiliating position. "Less active;" "a little depressed," the hon. gentleman says: it never was so bad in England for twenty-five years; commercial travellers tell him so; everybody knows it; there never was such distress there for a quarter of a century; times were horrid in the United States, but here in Canada they are less active. Now there is where the skill of my hon. friend comes in—just a little less active here. Oh! no depression here, but it is not quite as good as it used to be. It is not quite so good as we could desire, but it would have been fully as good if it had not been for these terrible Grits, if it had not been for the opposition to the National Policy. Well, now, with regard to the evils. I do not know anything about draw-poker; I never played the game; but I agree with my hon. friend that it is not a very serious matter. It is not half as bad, even if everybody was playing draw-poker, from British Columbia to Halifax, as the National Policy is. Now, about this boom. I wish I had the ability just to describe this boom. What brought about this boom? These gentlemen are responsible for all these things, so far as that is concerned. They lauded the North-West to the skies. They told the people: There is a chance there for great fortunes. They wanted their predictions to be fulfilled, and they encouraged the people to go there. They started the lottery, and told them there were great prizes to be drawn. Only invest your money, said they, and become rich. The people took the tickets in this lottery and invested their money, but the hon. gentleman never cautioned them. He heard there was a great rush in Toronto to invest in lands in the North-West. Did he go up there, in the kindness of his heart, for fear they would lose money, and did he crowd in and raise his voice, and tell them not to invest in the North-West, not to invest in Winnipeg; that the prospects were illusory, and that the result would be bad for them? He says it now—he is very wise, after the thing has happened, and he wants to shirk the responsibility of having encouraged that speculation. I charge the loss upon them. They encouraged it. And the Finance Minister himself—what more could he say? He said no more than the rest. He told the people all over the land: Now is your time, boys. Seven years of plenty, seven years of prosperity before you. Start out now, and make your fortunes. About the end of the seventh year I would advise to take in sail. And here is a gentleman making this able speech and throwing the responsibility off on to other people. From week to week, and from month into month, did not our ablest men on this side of the House raise a warning? Did they fail for a moment to caution hon. members of the mischief that would result? But I never heard one of them detract from the country. However, I am satisfied the country was lauded very much above what it deserved. I am satisfied, if the truth was known, that there are not 150,000 persons in the North-West, including Manitoba. They told the people in their speeches there was nothing but sunshine up there; that it was a paradise. Now, the settlers have been disappointed. You have been taking the people's money to bring them here, and pay the expenses of many of them, and they have gone into the neighboring Republic. I charge the responsibility upon the hon. gentlemen opposite, and the men who have lost their money have a right to charge them with having encouraged this gambling speculation, with having established this lottery; and when the drawing has taken place the prizes are not there, and the country is suffering for it, and is depressed in consequence. Many have taken tickets and have lost their all, and have cursed the National Policy.

Mr. IVES. Still they vote all right.

Mr. GILLMOR. Yes they do; and that astonishes me more than anything else. I have no more extracts to read from the hon. member's speech; but I really am not joking when I say that I think he is one of the ablest men in this Parliament, and he makes excellent speeches; but I was really amused when I saw the laudations of that speech in his own paper. I was a little amused, and it brought to my mind a little circumstance which happened down near the border. There was a Sister White, who was a member of the church, and very egotistical and conceited, but still she was an able speaker and very attentive at prayer meeting. She was at prayer meeting one night, and on the way home called at Brother Jones'. She said she was sorry he had not been at the meeting; that Sister Cartwright had been at the meeting and she was a very good speaker, very able and very orthodox; but some way or other she was so harsh in her expressions, she had had so much vinegar about her, that no one could enjoy religion when she spoke. She also told Brother Jones that Sister Paterson was there; that she had a good voice and was a good speaker; but she was at the other extreme—she had so much sugar about her that there was a reaction the other way. Then there was Sister Charlton, a good speaker, perhaps the best of all; but she was a new convert and people have not much confidence in them. And, therefore, she failed to get up a good feeling. And right here comes the simile. Sister White said to Brother Jones: I wish you had been there to hear me. When I addressed myself to the sinners I made them open their eyes; I made them feel they were right on the verge of destruction; but when I turned to the saints and described the future for them, they shouted, Glory, Hallelujah. Indeed, Brother Jones, I tell you, I spoke most beautifully. I do not vouch for the names in this story, for I have forgotten them; I vouch simply for the circumstance and the occasion. The evils of this protective policy are coming back sooner than I expected. I never expected to see the National Policy succeed. But fortune favored the Government for a time; but retribution is coming on them now; they have shown it all through this discussion, in their countenances and in their speeches, and no one can fail to understand that they were being punished for their folly. I feel like saying to them: Bear in mind, gentlemen, that you have had a good deal of prosperity, many years of rejoicing, but remember the days of darkness, for they will be many; you are getting whipped now with the lash, but before long you will be chastised with scorpions. My prophecies will prove more true than yours, unless

I am very much mistaken. If it does not there is no use in having a devil. The country is this year having the first spasm. Desperate diseases require desperate remedies. If the spasm will cure the country and defeat the Government I am willing to stand the spasm. I am willing to run the risk. That reminds me of a circumstance that happened to a man who became unfortunately addicted to drinking, and who became a drunkard. He suffered a great deal from the indulgence and had to endure the awful horrors of delirium tremens, and other effects that follow. At last he resolved to knock off, and he did it suddenly. The consequence was that the reaction was so great he became very sick and had a spasm. His friends went for a doctor. The doctor came and said he has stopped drinking too suddenly. You must take a little liquor; if you have a second spasm you may get over it, but if you have a third spasm you will die. The man replied: I want to live, doctor. These spasms are dreadful; but I know what it is to suffer the effects of drunkenness, and much as I want to live, I think, doctor, I will try the second spasm anyway. I feel just as that man did as regards the Government. As far as this country is concerned, I will try another spasm, if that will cure the evil. I read, during the recess, in some paper, the following:—

"A meeting of the manufacturers of white cotton was held to-day in the office of Messrs. David, Morrice & Co., for the purpose of deciding the best means to relieve the market of surplus stock, which keep prices depressed and checks the demand. Some days ago the manufacturers of grey cottons had a meeting, and, it is understood, decided to export the surplus stocks of grey cotton to England. Two courses are to be considered to-day by the manufacturers of white cotton. The first course is to close down the mills altogether for some months. This would involve the scattering of operatives some distance, and cause a depression and also some injury to mill machinery, which gets out of order when not in use. The alternative is to follow the example of the manufacturers of grey cottons and export goods, at a great loss, to some market, probably England. How great a loss such a course would involve may be gathered from the fact that cotton dealers are protected in the home market by duties amounting to about 30 per cent., besides the protection which the cost of freight on English goods gives. The loss would probably amount to about one-half of the actual costs of the goods. The result of such a course would be to immediately relieve the home market of the surplus stock and a consequent sharp advance in prices here."

Now, Mr. Speaker, when this policy was being inaugurated, when it was being lauded to the skies, and we were told what it was going to do, we were assured that competition would always keep the prices low. Now, what have we here? How have they carried out this promise? We find that as soon as stock accumulates and prices are likely to go down they immediately propose to send their surplus abroad, to slaughter their goods in a foreign market, and supply them cheap to the people of another country. While the poor of this country are buying their cotton goods and paying them good prices, whenever competition arises they want to slaughter their goods in a foreign market, and thus always keep the prices high for the poor people at home. That is my hon. friend's idea of a good country to live in. I do not agree with him. I think it is a bad country to live in, and I think a policy which has that effect is a bad policy. It will not do for them to have competition and keep prices low; they have to get rid of their goods somehow. The first thing they should do, and the Government should do, if they are lovers of their country, if they wish to benefit their own people, is to give their cotton cheap to the poor people of this country. But if they did that they would not make money; and so, in order to keep the prices high for the home consumer, they send their goods abroad and give the foreigners instead of their own people the benefit of low prices. If they can manufacture here so as to send their manufactures abroad and sell at a profit, they are always sure of the home market. If you manufacture anything cheap enough to go abroad you will never allow the foreigner to come into the home market, whether free or taxed; they will always have this market, for they have protection enough in freights and commission to give a profit, anyway, if they can only do that. Now, whatever hon. gentlemen may say, there is a great commercial depression in the Dominion. I am glad to say that I have seen the time when it was harder for people to live. Fortunately for the Government the prices of the necessaries of life are low, notwithstanding the protective policy. Bread is cheap; sugar is cheap—no doubt about it—and many other things which the people have to use or wear. If they were not I would not want to take a risk on your lives. If those things were not cheap for the people, notwithstanding your tariff, I tell you you would look a good deal bluer than you do to-day; and you deserve no credit because these things are cheap. What is troubling the Government now? The National Policy has been five years in existence and why are these delegations coming here? The protected industries have had five years of a fair chance, four of them very prosperous, and yet they are still coming; they are never satisfied. Scripture tells us that there are three things which are never satisfied, but if that Scripture were to be written now-a-days they might have added another—the manufacturers. They are never satisfied; they are here day after day: one delegation about this thing, and another delegation about that; some wanting a little more duty on flour; others wanting a little more duty on something else. The truth is, your policy is not, and it never can be perfect. But I notice that there are no delegations coming up here from the farmers, from the lumbermen, from the fishermen—three classes that compose a large majority of the people of this Dominion. They do not come to this Government or this Parliament asking for any favors on that score. They are depressed; they suffer from the depression in commerce in common with others, but they know that they need not apply here—they know that no lumberman, no fisherman, no farmer, need apply here. They must grin and bear it. There was once a poor woman who was in deep affliction, and a minister called in to comfort her in her distress. He said, "My dear woman, do you rest on the promises?" "Yes, I do," she replied. "Please tell me," he said, "what promise you rest upon." She said: "I find most comfort in that blessed promise, 'grin and bear it.'" That is the promise that the fishermen and the farmers and the lumbermen have to rest upon; they have the blessed comfort of grinning and bearing it. I hope they will not have to grin and bear it for a great many years, but I am afraid they may. It may be asked why are these manufactures so depressed, after all the advantages which have been given to them? If they have the right to take so much money out of the consumer why are they so depressed? It is a natural question. Now, that is very possible, too. A law may be so enacted that a great many people can be fleeced and yet nobody be made the richer. That has been the effect of the National Policy. Inducements were held out to manufacturers and capitalists to go into manufactures, to invest their money, in order that they might become suddenly rich. They took the bait; they invested their money; but, instead of going on reasonably fast, instead of going on moderately and cautiously, as they should have done, they have invested millions in these enterprises; and what is the result? They have invested their money, and it is idle, if not entirely lost; and, I think, the Government and their policy are responsible for that loss. They told a story when I was a boy, which illustrates the idea that misery loves company. A sharp Yankee came to the town with an extraordinary kind of an animal in a box. You paid a quarter of a dollar and you looked through a little glass into a box, and got a view of this wonderful animal. First one came, paid his quarter, saw the animal, and went away. Another came, and then another, and so on, until the whole community had paid their quarters, and got a view, and the last man let out the secret and told them that the wonderful animal was only a common house cat, with a very long tail, which the man had turned up over her back and fastened to her ears. These gentleman have all been looking at the wonderful animal. They have lost their money and you do not hear so much grumbling as you would under other circumstances, for the reason that misery loves company. They were anxious to get rich too fast, and they overloaded, and they went down. I remember, and some others here will remember, the time when the steamer Royal Star was taking a circus from Eastport, to Boston. She had a menagerie on board, and in their company was the American giant; I remember him very well; he was a very large man. The steamer took fire, and a great many lives were lost, and a great deal of property. In the coffers of the circus was a good deal of gold and silver. This man, being a very strong man, and a good swimmer, thought he might get rich on the occasion, and make a grab. He filled his pockets with gold and silver. He had only a short distance to swim to the boat from the burning ship; he jumped over the side, and went to the bottom as quick as lightning. He was greedy, and wanted to get rich at once out of the spoils, and that was the result of his greed. He took his riches down with him; he had that satisfaction; but those who rested on the advice of the Government cannot even do that. I come now back to the tariff question. Direct taxation, is the most equitable, and decidedly the best system of raising a revenue that can be devised, if you could only make the people believe it; but I do not expect anybody for some time to come to venture on that mode of raising a revenue in Canada. Up to the time of the adoption of the National Policy we had what might be called a revenue tariff, although there was a great deal of protection in that tariff. Under it, for every dollar that went into the Treasury, the people I think paid half a dollar or perhaps 75 cents into the pockets of the manufacturers. That was a very large protection under that system. Now, my idea of the correct policy for raising a revenue is that prevailing in Great Britain. They put taxes on nothing that is produced in the country. To illustrate what I mean; the duties are here taken off tea and coffee, and the Government claim that they have done very much for the people in removing these duties. Well, if they wanted to help the people, it is not from tea and coffee that they would have taken the duty, but from flour and meal something that is produced in the country. If there was a tax to-day on tea and coffee every cent of that duty would go into the Treasury, and the country would get the benefit of it, because it is not produced in the country. Now, with regard to the taxation of the people under this policy, I am not thoroughly informed about it, but I have thought of the subject; and I believe that for every $20,000,000 collected from the people under this National Policy, we have paid more than $20,000,000 into the pockets of the manufacturers of this country. Now, that may astonish hon. gentleman; but I say, in order to raise $20,000,000 for the Government of the country, you take $40,000,000 and more out of the pockets of the people. I may be extravagant in my estimate; but I think I am under rather than over the mark. Here is the way I illustrate it, as I have done before. I go into into a merchant tailor's shop in Ottawa to buy a pair of tweed pants. I ask him to show me a piece of Scotch tweed worth about $1.50 a yard. He shows it to me. I ask him to show me a piece of Canadian tweed about as good as that. He does so, and I ask him: What is the price of that? That is $1.50 a yard, too. Now, you will understand that there is about three times as much Canadian tweed, taking all the grades, used in Canada now as there is of Scotch tweed. I take the Scotch tweed for my pants, and the duty I pay on that goes into the Treasury; the merchant paid it when it was imported, and I pay it back to him when I purchase the goods. But, suppose I took Canadian tweed of the same value, where does the extra price go? Because the duty raises the price of the goods manufactured in the country as high as that of the imported article, or it is worth nothing; then the extra price I pay for the Canadian tweed goes to the manufacturer. The thing is plain, to my mind; there is no doubt about it; and as we use three times as much Canadian tweed as imported tweed, I say for every $100 we pay into the Treasury on imported tweed we pay $300 to our manufacturers. Well, you ask, why do they not get immensely rich at once. There are a good many reasons. They may not be able to make tweed to compete with Scotch tweed, therefore they have to tax the people to enable them to make it, or they may go into other investments. But the greatest loss, I think, is in trying to manufacture articles which they cannot manufacture successfully, and so they have to tax the people; and if there is anything that will cause depression it is that. Whenever you take so much from the people that they cannot buy the luxuries of life as freely as they could under other circumstances, if they had the money you take from them, that I believe, to a great extent, causes depression. I have here a table which I copied from some magazine, showing what amount of taxes goes into the Treasury, and what amount to the manufacturers on certain rates of duty. These tables are made from statistics gathered in the United States, and I believe the principle they are based upon to be correct. The proposition is, that the sum of $100 is to be raised on imports, and of course the amount may vary under different circumstances.

If this estimate, however, is correct, and I have no doubt it is and if people understood the real nature of this tariff, or any other protective tariff, they would not tolerate it for a moment. But so many fallacies can be made to bolster up this protective theory that it is hard to make people understand it. The illustration used by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), with regard to sugar was a very good one. A gentleman offered to sell 40 lbs. of sugar to some one for $1, if he would only go to the warehouse to get it. He takes his order for the sugar, the customer goes down to the warehouse and asks for the sugar. Oh, yes, he is told, you can have the sugar, 40 lbs. for $1, but you must first pay $1 duty. That gives him an idea of what the tax is. In my county we have perhaps one of the best cotton mills in the Dominion, a mill which turns out the best goods of the class manufactured of any mill in Canada. I will give the National Policy credit for having started that industry, and the report of the Government commissioner with regard to our industries shows that there are four or five hundred hands employed in that mill. I wish that mill success, as I wish every other enterprise success; it is not pleasing for me to see any body lose his investments; but that mill has been in operation for a year or two; I do not know particularly about its financial condition; I know that there were large bonuses given it and that a very large sum of money in stock was subscribed and paid up; and if I am creditably informed that stock, though not valueless, is very low, and if placed on the market would realise very little. I am satisfied to-day that if the thing was to be done over again the stockholders would be very shy of making an investment. I do not know that any body is to blame for this, but there is no doubt that it is due to the encouragement given under the National Policy to investments of that character. I believe that any man who chooses to open his eyes and take one honest and earnest look at protection will see that it is dishonest and selfish in principle. I do not mean by this that everybody that advocates it is dishonest or that everybody that profits by it is dishonest; but I believe that it is very difficult to make any one think that a policy is wrong which gives him some advantage over his neighbors. It is the hardest thing in the world to convince a man a law is not good which gives him an advantage over others; but the policy, I contend, is wrong in any case. The best way to judge of this policy is to individualise it, to take it separately and alone, not connected with any other industry. Take, for instance, coal, and imagine for a moment that we have no protective policy. Supposing the representatives from Pictou were to ask this Parliament to enact a law which would give them 50 cents protection on coal. They might make all the arguments in favor of that proposition that they can now; they might give the output of coal, the number of men at work, the large capital it would set afloat, the great good it would do the farmers of Nova Scotia by giving them a home market for their produce. All these arguments, under these circumstances, would be just as proper as under other circumstances. Let them then submit a proposition to this House to put a duty on coal; what would be the result? The two gentlemen from Cape Breton, where the coal deposit is, would stand alone on that proposition. Other members would fail to see that it was in the interest of their constituents to put a duty on coal for the purpose of enriching the people of the coal mines in Pictou county. They would say it would be robbing our people, we cannot afford to give you a protection of 50 cents on coal and make it dear for every other industry and every other person who uses coal in the Dominion. People would think it was robbery if only the coal duty was proposed; but you go to the flour men, and the flour men and the coal men come into Parliament together and propose a duty on flour and coal. The flour and coal men would then stand alone. Other hon. members would say again: We cannot afford to protect flour and coal, because that would be robbery; that would be making dear bread and fuel to all the people of the country; we could never do that—and there would only be the coal men and the flour men to vote for it. But you go on and get the cotton and the woollen manufacturers, and the iron manufacturers, and a host of other manufacturers, and you get them all to put their heads together and carry the whole thing. That which was robbery when you proposed the coal duty separately has become quite a different thing now; that which was robbery when you proposed a duty on flour, and thus proposed to make dear bread for the people, becomes quite a different thing. You have to put this thing in its naked deformity; you have to show it up in all its hideousness, to make the people understand it. Hon. gentlemen opposite laugh; but if Robin Hood had too many highway robbers in his company, if all the population were enlisted, it would be no use to take the trouble of robbing, as there would be no victims. There must be victims, and the moment you have enough robbers you stop. You could not carry on this game for flour and coal alone, because the people would not stand being plundered, but you get all these interests combined—you carry your protective policy. But you must stop at a certain point, for it would not do to protect all; you must have somebody to skin or you will have to go on skinning yourselves, and there is no money in that. That is why you carried protection and continue it; there must be victims in the country whom you must plunder. The victims are the great classes of farmers, fishermen, lumbermen and laborers. These are the men you have to fleece, because your protection is of no use if you have not victims. You must have victims, and therefore when you have enough spoils to be able to divide up something, you stop and do not go further. Hon. gentlemen opposite may pretend to laugh, but they don't feel like laughing all the same. When you get all these in, is it any less robbery? Is it any less unjust than it was when the coal men first came and asked protection? Does that alter the case? It only increases the evil, separately none of you would vote for a duty on coal. Why would you not vote for protection on coal if there was no protection on any of these? I see the member for Perth laughing. Why would you not? I wait for an answer. Why would you not? You would help the men in Pictou, and you would help the members for Pictou to be popular and get elected, and you would help it to make a market for the produce of the farm, and all that. And why would you not do it? You would not dare do it, because it would be unjust to your constituents to do that for the benefit of the coal men.

Mr. HESSON. Correct.

Mr. GILLMOR. Correct; yes. Is it any less unjust because you get more in? No; but there are more of you to divide the spoils and more to help on the system, which is legalised robbery—that is my opinion of it. No; this protective system will not work without victims. Somebody has to suffer under protection—no doubt about it. I find on my notes here a reference to the hon. the Minister of Marine. It is not my purpose, I never wish to criticise gentlemen's speeches—I try to make the best I can out of my own material—but I was surprised at the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. It carried my mind back twenty years. I remember, when the question of Confederation was being discussed in the Lower Provinces, I was opposed to that measure, and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was of the same opinion; he was opposed to Confederation. I remember having received a speech from the hon. member—I do not know whether he sent it, or somebody else—but it was a speech made by Mr. McLelan, of the Nova Scotia Legislature, and that speech I read with a great deal of satisfaction. It was witty and able, and I derived a great deal of pleasure from reading it, and it afforded me a good many valuable arguments and strong arguments in opposition to Confederation. When I noticed by the press that that hon. gentleman was elected to the first Parliament in Canada, I wished him success, and I felt that if anything would induce me to offer, it would be to be in Parliament with a gentleman with whose views I could coincide and that I endorsed so fully, and I really wished him success and wished I could be here to act in concert with him. Of course, the battle had been fought and we had failed; but I never heard that there was any change in his opinion, I never heard that he had changed his views in regard to that, and you will not be surprised that I was astonished to hear the speech I heard from him the other night. The speech I heard from him the other night was just the kind I had to meet from those who were in favor of Confederation. I remember one opponent of mine who was continually talking about a railway starting from Nova Scotia in a gold field, and passing up through Quebec, and through the wheat fields of Ontario, and out over the broad prairies, and landing in a gold field in British Columbia; and that was the beginning of his speech, and that was the end of his speech. We had to meet just such hifalutin', extravagant speeches all over the Province of New Brunswick, and my hon. friend's speech the other night, when he talked about the iron band which was about to cement the Union, reminded me very much of the speech of the person to whom I allude. I do not believe there is any more feeling in favor of Confederation now than the day we entered the Union. I believe a majority of the lower Provinces, if they were out of Confederation now, would not enter the Union. There can be no bond of union under the policy of the Government. The only bond of union that cements us—no, I will not say cements us, that holds us together—is a debt of $250,000,000, which has been rolled up since Confederation, and we have to grin and bear it, for we cannot get out of it, I suppose. The Lower Provinces have suffered most; their trade relations have become so altered that they suffer exceedingly with regard to this matter; and I believe now that, although of those who were opposed to Confederation in those days, many have gone to their reward and others have deserted their post, a few are left, and I believe to-day, that in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, the majority of the electors of those two Provinces are with them. I have never heard the hon. gentleman speak in reference to this matter of Confederation until the other night, and from his laudation of Confederation one would think he was always a convert when he talks of this bond of union that cements us together, as the shuttle in the loom weaving us together and cementing us. Where is the cement now? Is there very much harmony in British Columbia? The Chinese war with the whites and the whites war with the Chinese, and a commissioner is sent at the public expense to try and reconcile things there. There is not very much harmony there; they pay per head two or three times as much to the Dominion Treasury as any other part of the Dominion. There is not much harmony. There is a volcano at the bottom; and were it not for the enormous amount of public money being expended there, you would see a different state of things in British Columbia. Is there harmony in the North-West and Manitoba that is binding and cementing the Dominion together? It may be more or less exaggerated; there may be more or less party in the matter; men are not perfect; but have you harmonised that Province by your legislation and by your National Policy? Is not everybody convinced there that your National Policy is wrong? And your policy with regard to the disallowance, and preventing these people from getting local railroads by local taxation, has not that been a bad policy? And in Ontario is there harmony, in view of your interference with the Streams Bill and disallowance of it, which was unjust? I understood that question, and there never was a more righteous and just law than that. No one was injured by that Bill that was disallowed. You failed in that, and that did not cement them. And, in regard to the boundary between the Provinces, did you not have the two Provinces in hostile array with each other in reference to your management of that question? There has been discord by your mode of action, whether owing to the policy or not, all through. And, in regard to Quebec, I do not know that there is much discord there. They have got it all their own way; they may get to fighting among themselves, which I hope they will. I have understood that they are. I have seen the combatants looking at each other like two cats on a rail fence, both wishing to spring but both afraid, because they thought the result might be that they would both fall off. Is there harmony in New Brunswick? Look at St. John. We imported the year before Confederation $10,000,000 worth of goods. At that time warehouses were well filled, the wharves were lined with ships, and there was activity, business and prosperity. But ever since Confederation St. John has been declining, and to-day it is much worse off than it could possibly have been out of Confederation. That revenue tariff, that low tariff of 15 per cent. that we had, maintained our institutions, and we were in a prosperous condition. I know depression will come from time to time under any system of taxation. But your policy since Confederation has not tended to cement this Union. There are not 5,000,000 of people on earth who are more at variance with each other than in this Dominion. This Dominion is one of the hardest countries in the world to govern. Its location, its trade relations and its necessities are very difficult to harmonise; they are such as any Government would find it very difficult indeed to satisfy, and no Government can expect to satisfy all. If Confederation is to be a success, that success has got to come in the future, for it has not come yet. The policy of this Government has been a failure, so far as I am able to judge, in almost every particular. Their measures have failed. Is there harmony amongst the licensed victuallers throughout the Dominion? That was an interference, an unjust interference, with provincial rights. Their law has been upset since. Their knowledge of constitutional law seems to be defective. The License Act also comes into conflict with the Scott Act. There is a large class of people throughout the Dominion who want to see the Scott Act have a fair trial, but this License Act comes in and makes that unworkable, and the Government will not remedy it. The License Act itself does not work, and there is nothing works harmoniously in their policy, from beginning to end. Then, down in Nova Scotia, are the people contented? Do you suppose, if there was not a great deal of discontent in Nova Scotia, that any man would lay upon the Table of the Local Legislature the resolutions that have been recently laid there? I do not believe they will carry. I do not believe there is any wisdom in doing it; but that evidently shows there is a great feeling of discontent in Nova Scotia. Take it all in all, Confederation is not a success. I think that picture out in the lobby was quite premature. I think, if the memory of the authors of Confederation is to be handed down to posterity, they ought to wait until they see a little more harmony in their work than can be seen at present, so far as I can observe. The hon. gentlemen opposite promised that every workingman should be employed—well, perhaps not in so many words; but the people were leaving the country for want of work, and they said the Government were flies on the wheel because they could not give them work. Parties in the country were leaving it to find work, and to find a home in a foreign country. But you have not found very much work for the workingman. You have taken a great deal of the workingman's earnings away to bring competitive labor into this country, and I am glad to know that that policy is changed now, and that you do not intend to pay the passages of immigrants to this country in future. There is really too much stress put upon this cry about finding work for men. I know it is a good thing to have a chance to get work when you want it. But men naturally do not want to work just for the fun of it. They want food, clothing and comforts; but they want to get them with as little work as possible. Now, I wonder how much of a compliment the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches would take it if somebody proposed to find them work. Just suppose that such a proposition was made to them; they would not take it as a great compliment. They do not have to work. They toil not, neither do they spin, and yet Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like some of these. Men want a chance to earn their bread and to advance in life, to make their condition in life better, to have something for a rainy day, and something for old age, but they cannot get it under this policy. You are taking all their surplus earnings from them, and you think they are in a good condition because they are not starving, because they have from day to day that which they can barely subsist upon. You have a great many people in this country who have worked from generation to generation, and yet they have got nothing to the good. If you would tax them less and give them an opportunity to get the necessaries of life cheaper, they would have a surplus; they would have something with which to indulge in some of the luxuries of life; they could educate their children; they could have some luxuries in their houses; they could have many advantages that they cannot have when you take away their little earnings by increased taxation. Mr. Speaker, the Government certainly have done their duty with regard to finding employment in this Parliament building, and in the different Departments. I give them credit for having carried out their promise to find work for men here. When you come in at the lobby you will find two men at every door, a Frenchman and an Englishman, one to open the door in French style, and another in English style. You have to pass about fourteen men before you can get into this House. I would like to know how many doors there are in this House, and if you will tell me how many doors there are, I will multiply that by two, and that will give the number of doorkeepers. The messengers are in proportion; and in all the Departments it is the same. Perhaps I am a little extravagant in this; I may be coloring it too highly, but I am satisfied that it is pretty near the truth. I believe the Departments have a great many more servants than the business of this Dominion requires, or the people of this country are willing to pay for. I believe there is a great deal of extravagance. The Government can fairly congratulate themselves with having found work for a great many men here, and they have found work for a great many people away from here, to pay these men for standing here doing nothing. Now, with regard to the exodus, Mr. Speaker, I think there has been a great deal more said with regard to the exodus than there is any necessity for; and I think there was a great deal more said when the Liberals were in power, about the exodus, than there was any propriety in saying. It is not a pleasant thing for any of us to see people going away from this country. But you cannot help it; no Government can help it, and no policy will help it very much. People will come and go as they like; whenever they think they can benefit their condition they will go. I think Canada is a very good country to live in. We make a great fuss about people going, and we try to ascertain how many have gone by this mode of calculation and by the other; by school statistics, and so on; but we do not arrive at anything very definite. I think, however, we have arrived at this conclusion, that while the late Government were charged with permitting this exodus, it appears from the same sources of information that four times as many people have gone since hon. gentlemen opposite were in power than went before. But I do not blame hon. gentlemen opposite for that circumstance. How can they help it? Some go whom we should like to have here; sometimes men go whom we are glad to get rid of; but unfortunately many young men leave us. In the New Brunswick Legislature a young lawyer once rose and started to deplore the exodus, mentioning that thirteen journeymen tailors had left St. John a week before. An old farmer got up and said: It is a great pity those thirteen journeymen tailors did not take thirteen lawyers on their backs. I do not want to be personal; but if this exodus is going on, and we could get thirteen strong fellows to take the thirteen Ministers on their backs, I think it would be a good thing. I know it might be asked, with great propriety, how is it, if my views are correct, or at all correct, that this Government has gone twice to the country on their policy and been sustained each time by so large a majority. It has been said by some persons that they did not go exactly squarely to the country in 1878. But I think the people were not uninformed; they knew what the policy would be; the Government might not be just as outspoken as they would be under some circumstances, but the people were told what might follow. If the people were not informed what the policy would be it was not the fault of the Government. Hon. gentlemen opposite went to the country and were returned by an overwhelming majority. They brought in the National Policy boldly; they submitted it to Parliament and carried it through and made it the law. That policy was tried for three or four years, and in 1882 they went back to the people. The country returned them by nearly as great a majority as before. Those are arguments sufficient for hon. gentlemen opposite. I admit that they went fairly before the country, and the country knew what their policy would be if the Government was sustained. I know that a Government always has a very considerable following. David, at the Cave of Adullam, collected all in debt and all in distress, and all who were discontented, and made a goodly number. The Government influence. In their case we might add office holders and office seekers, and contractors, sub-contractors, and all the sharks that always follow a Government ship, in order to get some of the offal thrown overboard. But all that does not satisfy me as to why the Government obtained so large a majority. There must be something else which I cannot find out, some secret which the Government will not tell. I remember a story told about Lincoln. When he was a practising lawyer in Illinois, this case was placed in his hands. A man was indicted for stealing hams, and Lincoln had to defend him. At the outset Lincoln wished to know whether the man had stolen the hams or not, so that he might know how to conduct the case. The man said, I did steal the hams. Then, said Lincoln, you had better acknowledge your guilt and throw yourself on the mercy of the court. No, said the man, I have engaged you to defend me, and I will let the case go to the jury. The case went to the jury, and after a little while they returned with a verdict of not guilty, to the surprise of the court and council and every one else. After the court had closed Lincoln asked the man: How did you get a verdict in the face of such evidence? Why, replied the man, I wanted to go before the jury, because every one of the jury got a ham. I do not know whether every one of this jury got a ham, but they got something, or it would be impossible for the Government to return with such a majority. I want the Government to fulfil their promises. They have utterly failed to do so. In all ages there have been false prophets, men who have humbugged the people and promised to do things they could not do. There were the prophets of Baal, who kept continually humbugging the people, and making the people think they could do something they could not do. But at last came the test, and Elijah called on them to show their power. He told them to call on their Gods, and cry out to them; either the Gods were talking, pursuing, or peradventure asleep, and must be awakened. The prophets cried aloud, and cut themselves with knives and lancets till the blood gushed forth. Hon. gentlemen opposite have given us promises, and told us what they could do. They have had a trial and failed. Will they do as the prophets did, when they are asked to put the country in a prosperous condition? Elijah gave the prophets every chance, and taunted them a little, which was very naughty. Hon. gentlemen opposite never prayed more earnestly for anything than for the success of their policy. They have cried, and cried in vain. It is not in their power to carry out what they promised. The prophets of Baal cried until midday was passed, and on until the evening sacrifice; but there was neither voice nor anyone to answer, nor anyone that regarded their cry. Mr. Speaker, that is precisely the position they are in. They have been crying, and hoping, and praying, and wishing, but no blessing comes down. And Elijah said: Take the false prophets; let not one of them escape. And they took them, and brought them down to the Brook Kishon, and slew them there. And that is what the people ought to do with our false prophets.

Mr. WOOD (Brookville). At this late period of the debate, and the late hour of the evening, I shall not attempt a defence of the principles of the National Policy.

It must appear very strange to the people of the country that in the year 1885 we are still in this House defending on the one side the National Policy from the attacks made upon it on the other side of this House. But, Mr. Speaker, if that be the state of things, it must be conceded on all hands that the fault is not ours that this debate is being prolonged. Hon. gentlemen upon the other side, as was truly said by an hon. member on this side a few days ago, are like the Bourbons of old: they forget not, nor do they learn. Well, Sir, it seems most remarkable that notwithstanding that in 1878 the country pronounced so unmistakably and emphatically upon this issue—the only issue before the people at that time—that issue which restored to the First Minister the confidence of the people of Canada, which for a brief period they, much to their sorrow and regret, had withdrawn from him, and that again in 1882 they most emphatically re-affirmed the verdict they then gave—I say it is strange that notwithstanding all this we find hon. gentlemen opposite more pronounced in their opposition to this policy than at any period since its adoption by the people of Canada. I am sure, Sir, that we, speaking from a party point of view, and speaking also with a view to the best interests of the country, have no reason to regret the position which hon. gentlemen take in this respect, provided they were just a little more temperate in the language they use. I am aware, Sir, that when I make use of that language I am stating that which has been made use of by many hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. I am aware that leading members on the other side of the House, hon. gentlemen who have been raising their voices, not only inside of this House but outside of this House, on this subject, affect a grievous tone—a tone of deep-seated injury, when they refer to the fact that we on this side have occasionally stated that their remarks laid them open to the charge of not being just as patriotic as they should have been. But if you take the remarks of the last speaker, the hon. gentleman from New Brunswick, when he comes out flat-footed, not only as a free trader—that, he has a perfect right to do—but against the principles of Confederation; when you hear him make use of that statement openly to this House and to the country, we can gauge the extent of the affection which that hon. gentleman entertains for what they appear to think so much of—the autonomy of this whole Dominion. Mr. Speaker, I am very much amused when I see hon. gentlemen affecting this tone of grievous injury when we make use of language of this kind. Why, Sir, we, the Conservative contingent of the right hon. the First Minister, who reside in the Province of Ontario, have been stigmatised by hon. gentlemen opposite, and by the press of their party, as traitors to the Province in which we live. They have not hesitated to brand us as such, and still they affect the tone of grievous injury when we on this side of the House use very moderate language to describe the utterances they employ in speaking of this our native country. Sir, I was very much struck in the references which have been made so far in this debate to the so-called exodus from Ontario; and it is simply because these remarks have been made concerning Ontario that I have risen to address a few remarks to this House, and ask your indulgence for that purpose. At the very outset of this debate, when the ex-Finance Minister was making his lengthy criticisms upon the speech of the Finance Minister, he led off in the strain that the population of Ontario was decreasing, in consequence of this National Policy, and that seemed to be the cue which was taken by almost every hon. gentleman who followed him, down to the last interesting and highly amusing address to which we have just listened from the hon. gentleman from New Brunswick (Mr. Gillmor). Sir, it always appeared to me that the school reports from which the ex-Finance Minister drew his inferences and obtained his facts, and which he first made use of in Montreal, in the address delivered by him during last summer, must be wrong; and at the time I first read his address I had nothing more than other hon. gentlemen in this House have to guide them. I had simply the evidence of my observation of the locality in which I live. I knew that in my own town, and in the county I have the honor to represent, the population was increasing; the value of real estate was increasing, and general prosperity reigned. Well, Sir, I do not know but I might challenge hon. gentlemen in this House to get up and state whether or not the population in the constituencies they represent in this House is not increasing. I believe, Sir, if I threw out this challenge to hon. gentlemen opposite, not a single one, especially from the Province of Ontario, would dare to get up and state that the population in the county he represents was being decreased. Now, Mr. Speaker, if those statements are wrong, if the facts so carefully compiled by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) are true—and I believe they are, because they are borne out by the evidence of our senses, if not by the census to which hon. gentleman object—if these are true, who are the traitors to Ontario? Are they the men who, following the leadership of the First Minister are endeavoring to work out the legislation of this country in the lines and upon the principles laid down by the fathers of Confederation; or are they those who, if they studied the facts carefully, must know they are wrong, will yet persist in publishing to the world that the population of this their native Province—of which they pose as the special champions—is rapidly decreasing; that our sons are going to a foreign country and are turning their backs on the homes of their fathers and the flag that sheltered them? Who are the traitors to Ontario, if these facts are wrong? Now it is a strange commentary on the language of the ex-Finance Minister, and of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), both of whom stated, almost in the same words, that in their belief, taking the facts they alluded to, the population of Ontario was continuously decreasing—I say it is a strange commentary on the truthfulness of that statement that, almost at the very time the ex-Finance Minister was making use of that remark, there were proceedings going on in the Legislature of Ontario, having in view the idea of coming to this House for an increase in the subsidies granted to the Province under the British North America Act. During the course of that debate the Provincial Treasurer, in discussing the subject, made use of the following remarks, as reported in the Globe of 4th March:

“The increased population has brought to us an increased expenditure, but to the Dominion Government only increased revenue. So I say that if we are forced to look for a new basis on which the subsidy is granted, let it be on the basis of population, and give us an increased subsidy, say every ten years.”

Now, Mr. Speaker, who is right, the ex-Minister of Finance or the present Treasurer of Ontario? But that is not all. Another member of the same Government said:

“So, as Ontario grew in population, and the expenditure increased, it was seen that more money was required to carry on the affairs of the Province.”

In other words, we find the present Opposition in this House, for the sake of making some capital against this Government, crying out, to the injury of our Province, that its population is decreasing, that our sons are leaving our shores, while for the same reason, that of gaining a little party advantage or perhaps annoying this Government, in another Parliament the Provincial Treasurer says just the reverse. For the purpose of making party capital they are willing to ride two horses at the same time, and to take any position, however contrary it may be to the facts. I am aware, Sir, that it is a very bold thing in any man to say anything against the Mowat Government; I am aware that any one of the members of Mr. Mowat's

Cabinet must be more nearly right, according to the views entertained by hon. gentlemen opposite, than the ex-Minister of Finance; therefore, I conclude that the Provincial Treasurer is right, and that the population of Ontario is increasing; and, as an additional fact in support of that, I would allude to the evidence furnished by the report of the Bureau of Industries in Ontario, which is most damaging to their utterances on this subject. I would request hon. gentlemen to look to the information supplied by that report, as to the population in their own counties, before they undertake to publish to the world that the population of the Province is decreasing to such an alarming extent. I would specially suggest to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to look into that report, by which he will find that, under the operation of the National Policy there has been a very large measure of prosperity in the county of Norfolk. Of course, it is a fact that we cannot expect him to admit in this House; but we can expect these hon. gentlemen not to state what investigation on their part would prove to be untrue. Now, there is another question to which I wish to allude. I am aware that when any resident of the Province of Ontario declares that in this country the consumer does not pay the import duty charged upon coal he is sneered at by the friends of the hon. gentlemen opposite; but, Sir, I am one of those who believe that the consumer in Ontario does not pay the duty on coal, and I will tell you why. I listened with a great deal of attention to the argument used by Sir Charles Tupper in this House two or three Sessions ago on this subject. The idea was new to my mind, and though not altogether converted then to the fact, I believe to-day that the consumer in the Province of Ontario does not pay the duty on coal. In support of this, I wish to refer to what occurred during last summer in the city of Philadelphia. The inhabitants of that city complained that though they were on the brink of the mining district, they had to pay 65 cents a ton more for their coal than the people of Boston, hundreds of miles away, and quite as much as the inhabitants of Canada, whose coal was subject to heavy freight charges, and to a duty of 50 cents a ton. In Philadelphia the coal companies have no competition and they charge as they please, while in Boston and other eastern cities they are compelled to keep their prices low, to meet the English coal and that from Nova Scotia. It thus happens that notwithstanding the distance of 800 miles, which is against us as compared with Philadelphia, and in spite of the duty, we secure our coal at as low a figure as do the Philadelphians, whose nearness to the mines should be a point in their favor. Now, Sir, in the month of June last a committee of the Philadelphia city council was appointed to investigate the charges of discrimination of rates made against coal and coal carrying companies by one of the city papers. The enquiry is of interest to the Canadians, chiefly because it elicited evidence sustaining the view I have expressed. President Roberts, of the Pennsylvania Railway, in a letter dated 20th June, to the committee of investigation, says:

"The rates that are now charged by our company for carrying soft coal are made for the purpose of meeting the competition in the various markets in which coal is introduced."

And he defends this discrimination by saying:

"Pennsylvania does not suffer by it, but on the contrary is benefited by it, because without it coal would be no cheaper to local consumers, while with it a large force of coal miners and other operatives are added to the wealth producers of the State."

Mr. James H. Gowan, one of the managers of the Reading Co., also wrote to the committee, and this is what he says:

"It has been customary, for the past thirty or forty years, to allow drawbacks on coal bought for exportation. I cannot say to what extent the custom prevails now, but I can say that only for it Pennsylvania coal would not have been introduced at all into many places where it now is. The price of coal is regulated by competition, and we have to do business like other people; no man is in business who does not do the best he can for himself, and companies exist to make money."

Mr. Wood (Brockville).

Now, one of the strongest arguments against the National Policy made use of by the free traders in the Province of Ontario, is that the poor man has to pay 50 cents a ton on the coal he uses, and as coal is one of the necessaries of life, that is to the workingmen of this country a very strong argument against the National Policy. But it is a fact in proof of what I have read, that in towns along the River St. Lawrence, which are separated from the United States only by the river, the people pay no more for their coal than do the people of the towns in the State of New York, on the other side of the river. Last Saturday coal was $6 a ton in the city of Ogdensburg, and the same price in Prescott, just across the river. I mention this to show that in these matters, which are constantly alluded to by hon. gentleman opposite, the facts do not bear them out; and I bring forward this evidence with pleasure, as it is in strict confirmation of the very elaborate argument made use of by Sir Charles Tupper in this House. Now, there is another matter about which hon. gentlemen opposite have made a good deal of capital. They pose now as the friends of the workingmen. Well, Sir, it did occur to me that whatever might be the assumption of hon. gentlemen opposite as to the stand they have taken with reference to any particular class, they could hardly have the "cheek," if I may use the expression, to stand up here as the friends of the workingman. My opinion is that the workingmen of this country have a very lively recollection of the kind of affection hon. gentlemen opposite entertained for them in days gone by. It is within the recollection of every one in this House that the working classes, between the years 1873 and 1878, were in a state approaching poverty. It is a fact that they were crying aloud for assistance from this Government. It is a fact that the associations of workingmen throughout the country were pointing out, as did the manufacturers and agriculturists, and the representatives of all the industrial classes, the remedies which they required. But that Government turned a deaf ear to everything they said, and very arrogantly gave them to understand that they knew not whereof they were speaking. Now hon. gentlemen opposite say: You told us you were going to restore this country to prosperity. You told us that your leader would exercise his magical wand, of which the people at that time knew nothing, if they would only restore him and his friends to power. Have you done it they say? Have you been able to straighten out this difficulty under which this or the other industry is laboring and restore prosperity to it? There can be nothing more absurd than this. During the period of depression previous to 1878, it was not the representative men of the Conservative party who alone were making these statements. They were but giving voice to what emanated from the people. But at the present time there are no representations of that kind coming to the Government. This is a distinction which I wish to point out to hon. gentlemen opposite. From every place in which there was an industry of any kind previous to 1878, there came down to the city of Ottawa, to the Finance Minister of the day, deputations and petitions, representing to him the particular grievances of which they complained and telling him all they wanted was simply the opportunity of laying before him their case; but in no single instance did he accede to their wishes. It was in that state of things, upon that case, that the present First Minister took the position that these people should be heard. We were then simply giving voice to the wail that came up from the people all over the country, and the sympathy the First Minister entertained for them found practical expression in that now historical resolution, known as the National Policy. And the National Policy which he gave to the people is just as popular in Canada, just as strong in the hearts of the people to-day, as it was in 1878. It is the merest folly of hon. gentlemen opposite to compare the position of parties to-day with the position of parties then; to pretend to compare the present state of the country with the state of the country in 1878. What we tell them is this: Before you can charge us with inconsistency, before you can say, bring prosperity to this industry or to that, you must show that the proprietors and the working classes interested in these industries, that all the mechanical, all the industrial classes of the Dominion, are crying aloud for help, as they did then; but you cannot prove that, because no such proof exists. The people of Canada to-day are enjoying a degree of prosperity which is far beyond that of almost any people in the world. If you compare the condition of our people to day with the condition of the people of the United States or England, you will find that the National Policy has proved, not only a friend to this country in her days of sunshine but also the best friend she ever had in the time when the clouds appeared upon her commercial horizon. I believe I am but expressing the opinions entertained by the majority of the people of Canada when I say that the first thing that would weaken the confidence which the people now have in the First Minister would be the first indication on his part to depart from the principle of that policy. I believe we should adhere to this policy until the industries of this country are strong and firm enough to let down a bar, when we can do so to our advantage and the advantage of our people. Reference has been made by previous speakers to the remark made by the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster), and I wish to allude to that particularly, because it is in keeping with the subject upon which I am now speaking. It shows how very careless these gentlemen are in making their statements. This hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), in the very eloquent address he delivered to this House a few days ago, referred to the prosperity of the country. He was interrupted by some hon. gentlemen opposite, who referred to the fact that some men of the Conservative party, authorised to speak for that party, had declared that under the fostering influence of the National Policy hamlets would grow into villages, villages into towns, and towns into cities. Well, as fate would have it against these hon. gentlemen, in their organ of Saturday last, the Globe, just as if that organ never paid any attention to these hon. gentlemen at all, there appears a leading editorial under the heading of the extension of Ontario. I will only read from this editorial a few statements, but they will be quite sufficient to show not only the falsity of everything that has been said, not only against the industries of the Province of Ontario, but also the truth of what has been advanced on this side, with reference to increase in population and prosperity. The Globe said:

"But let us look at the growth and expansion of Ontario in 1872—the first year of Liberal Administration—there were 406 townships and 121 village, town and city municipalities in the Province. In 1884 these numbers increased to 451 townships and 205 village, town and city municipalities. In 1872 the total population, according to the municipal census, was 1,425,000; in 1884 it was 1,752,000. In 1872 the rural population was 1,050,000, and the urban 375,000; in 1884 the rural was 1,117,000 and the urban, 635,000. With such growth, what man in the possession of the five senses, will affirm that public expenditure should have remained a fixed quantity? It is not simply that some of the older counties have been making progress—that new townships have been organised, that hamlets have grown into villages, villages into towns, and towns into cities."

The hon. gentleman for King's, N. B., has his revenge. We all remember how he was taunted by hon. gentlemen across the floor, that such a thing would never be; that it was simply absurd; that it was a prophecy that would never be fulfilled. Speaking of prophecies, I wonder if any of the prophecies hon. gentlemen opposite made, prior to and immediately after 1878, have been fulfilled. I wonder if these hon. gentlemen, travelling over the hills of their memory, ever find that their prophecies at that time have proved most miserable failures. After the adoption of this policy we all remember we were told that the grinding monopolies which were created under this tariff would be most oppressive. Well, Sir, it is most remarkable that during the present Session of this Parliament we find hon. gentlemen assuming the role of sympathisers with these capitalists. We find there is no stronger position they have taken this year, than the charge against this Government, that they, by their introduction of this policy, have induced men to put capital into concerns that have not paid, and that these capitalists, these bloated monopolists, are now the objects of their special attention. In the one breath it is the poor man; in the other it is the bloated monopolist. Why, do not these gentlemen know that the result of all this capital being put into these industries, which if you will, in some instances has to some extent failed, is that the commodities produced by these factories have become cheaper, and that the poor man has been benefited by that. In no sense have the working classes been injured by the National Policy, viewed from any light in which you choose to view it. I wish simply to make a reference to another matter, in reference to which a good deal has been said. I have here a short table, giving a comparison of the sixteen years of our confederated life, and a corresponding period in the life of the United States:

PUBLIC DEBT—COMPARATIVE TAXATION.

Taking the population at the middle period we have for the United States a population of 45,700,000, and for Canada 3,900,000. This gives the average amount of taxation per head for the sixteen years at $110 for the people of the United States, $77 per head during the period of sixteen years for Canada. If we had been subjected during this period to the same taxation as the people of the United States we would have paid into the Treasury the sum of $430,000,000 instead of $300,000,000. I have not included the State taxation. There is one thing in the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite which must have appeared strange to those on this side of the House, that from the very commencement of their criticisms upon the statement of the Finance Minister, up to the present moment, they have not ventured to state, in any one particular, where they would alter this policy if they were so fortunate as to secure the Treasury branches. They dare not do it, because, when you go out into the constituencies and find hon. gentlemen seeking the suffrages of the people you do not find them coming out as flat-footed against the National Policy there as they do in this House. My experience in the election of 1882 was that an opponent in canvassing, the canvasser would get hold of a voter, one of their own men, and would be told by the voter: "I am in favor of this National Policy;" and then the gentleman who was canvassing would say: "Come here and let us have a talk; I am in favor of that, too; but if our friends get into power they are not going to change that." That is what I had to meet in my constituency, among other forcible arguments used to defeat me. That is the feeling throughout the country. I say that these hon. gentlemen, in coming out so strongly against the National Policy, in declaring that it has been of such great injury to the country, that it has hung like a blight over our industries and has retarded our prosperity and the growth of our population, are not representing the men who sent them here. And, if it be a fact, as has been stated on the other side of the House, that hon. gentlemen on this side are never going to come back for some of the votes they have given, I tell them that they will never succeed in assuming the reins of power in this country if they fight out their political battles on the lines they have during this Session. I would like to draw the attention of hon. gentlemen very briefly to the condition of the agricultural classes. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), who spoke yesterday and to-day, and who assumed to be the special champion of the farmers; who stated that no person could tell him anything about farming; that what he did not know about farming was not worth knowing, first built up a case against the Government and then knocked it all to pieces. He declared that there were parties coming to this Parliament and that they were determined to get a change of the tariff, so far as flour was concerned; and then he went on to show how great a grievance this would be, and he made out quite a case against the Government for what they have never done. And he made a most astounding statement, which was, that the policy of the Government during the Mackenzie régime was to tax the luxuries and lighten the taxes upon the necessaries of life to as large an extent as possible, while, under the present Government, he said the policy was to tax the necessaries at the rate of about 50 per cent. and to let the luxuries go free. I never was more surprised at anything I have heard from hon. gentlemen opposite than I was at that. Let me call attention to the kind of treatment and the sort of protection the farmers enjoyed under the Mackenzie régime:

Canadian Tariff, 1878.	American.
Wheat, free.....	20 per cent.
Rye and barley, free.....	15 cents per bushel.
Indian corn and oats, free.....	10 cents per bushel.
Wheat flour, free.....	20 per cent.
Rye flour and cornmeal, free.....
Live animals, 10 per cent.....	20 per cent.

Then, as to the luxuries—champagne, wine, whiskey, spirits, tobacco, cigars and so on, were all spared heavy duties, high taxation for the necessaries of life being put upon tea, coffee, sugar, quinine, coal oil, books for the blind, bibles when printed seven years, scientific books, and all books printed seven years. That is the way the luxuries were taxed under hon. gentlemen opposite. The workingmen of this country, those who, as the last speaker stated, know how to appreciate a dollar when they earn it by toil, will duly appreciate the mode of taxing necessaries and luxuries respectively, by hon. gentlemen opposite, and when they pose as the special friends of the poor workingmen and the laboring classes, I can assure them that they are taking a position which is so manifestly inconsistent with their previous record, that they will make no political capital out of it, notwithstanding their loud utterances. Now, I want to give just a few more facts, if the House will bear with me, upon this question. I wish to make a comparison as to the purchasing power of money under this tariff, at the present time, and the purchasing power of money during the time those hon. gentlemen were in power; because, after all, it is only by comparisons of this nature that we can get at the correct state of the case; it is only by comparisons like those the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Wigle) made last Session, in this House, that the people understand the practical working of the National Policy. It is exactly like the coal argument. When a man knows what he pays and what he used to pay, and knows what they pay on the other side of the line; he cannot see where he pays the duty. And it is just so here. Now, Sir, as to the purchasing power of farming products in 1885, as compared with 1878. In the latter part of 1878 the average price of wheat in Ontario was 84½ cents. Wheat is now quoted at say, 78 cents. The farmer in 1878, sold 60 bushels of wheat at 84½ cents—receiving therefore $50.70, and he then proceeded to make an outlay of home necessaries, with the following result:—

5 lbs. of tea at 75cts.....	$ 3 75
25 lbs. of sugar at 9 cts.....	2 25
3 galls. syrup at $1.00.....	3 00
3 cwt. flour at $3.00.....	9 00
5 lbs. starch at 13 cts.....	0 65
1 doz. canned goods at 25 cts.....	3 00
20 yds. of factory cotton at 9 cts.....	1 80
20 yds. grey flannel at 45 cts.....	9 00
2 six-pound blankets at 60 cts. per pound.....	7 80
10 yds. shirting at 15 cts.....	1 50
Total.....	$41 75

After paying his bill he had $8.95 remaining. In 1885 the farmer requires a similar bill of goods, and what is the result? He derives from his 60 bushels of wheat, at 78 cents per bushel, $46.78, and proceeds to invest it as follows:—

5 lbs. tea at 50c.....	$2 50
25 lbs. sugar at 5c.....	1 25
3 galls. syrup at 60c.....	1 80
3 cwt. flour at $2.....	6 00
5 lbs. starch at 10c.....	0 50
1 doz. canned goods at 12½c.....	1 50
20 yds. factory cotton at 7c.....	1 40
20 yds. grey flannel at 35c.....	7 00
2 six lb. blankets at 45c.....	5 40
10 yds. shirting at 12½c.....	1 25
Total.....	$28 60

Leaving a remainder to the good of $18.20, or $9.25 more than during the partial free trade era of Sir Richard Cartwright's administration of financial affairs. Mr. Speaker, I imagine that when these hon. gentlemen attempt, to talk to the people of the country about what they will do for them—for they have never done anything for them yet—when they can come to the people and attempt, by specious promises to the workingmen, to enlist their sympathies with the party they represent, they will find that the workingmen will not be deluded; they will find that the Government which has done so much for the working classes in the past, which is doing so much for them to-day, not only by protecting our industries, so that they can get the same labor in the country they did before, but also by cheapening some of the commodities, which is the practical result of competition among our industries, and of the permanence of our manufacturing institutions—I say, Sir, that the workingmen will be able to appreciate their arguments at their true value. The cheapening of the commodities is the natural result of this National Policy, if it is tried long enough, because naturally in the first years of a protective tariff, when our industries are struggling for an existence, it is possible the purchaser may pay a little more than he will afterwards, but the benefit accruing to the people after a few years will be manifest. In this country, as in all countries, combinations and monopolies will cure themselves. Since the beginning of the world there have been very few monopolies that have not cured themselves; and no monopolies can live where the conditions are favorable to competition, such as they are in this country. Now I notice, also, that our Opposition friends are endeavoring to make a good deal of capital out of the subject of assisted immigration. That is something which was taken up by the Globe some time ago, and it has been alluded to by the ex-Minister of Finance, and by all the lights of the party opposite. It is here that their inconsistency comes in again, and it is just as manifest as in all the other arguments they have used against this policy. You would hardly believe that in the depression between 1873 and 1878, when our workmen found it almost impossible to live; that during all that time they brought thousands of mechanics into the country; that during all that time it never occurred to them that it was a shame to bring immigrants into a country, the labor market of which was already overcrowded. Yet they stand up to-day and tell this Government that they have been doing wrong. Sir, I believe that the policy announced by the Minister of Agriculture here, a few days ago, in reply to the hon. member for Ottawa, was strictly correct. I believe it is time that certain organisations in the old country, and certain charitable institutions, were given to understand, in some way, that Canada is now large enough to have a pauper population of its own. I believe it would be better if we were to discriminate, even more than we have done, against that class of immigrants coming to this country. The Government have shown every desire to do in this matter all that any Government can do. We have the assurance of the Minister of Agriculture that discrimination will be made against that class of immigrants coming to this country, and that the attention of the Government will be devoted to the introduction of agricultural and farm laborers. But we have something more substantial than that; we have the announcement of the Minister of Finance, in the interests of the mechanical classes, that prison labor will be prohibited altogether. I say, Sir, in concluding these few remarks, that in every respect the Government has done everything that it could do for the working classes, for all the industrial classes, in fact, for all the producing classes of this country. I say that no Government could have done more than it has done, and as all Governments are liable to err, possibly our own Government, in some respects, is not infallible. The First Minister always declared that public men were liable to make mistakes, and Governments were liable to make mistakes. But upon this question of the National Policy it will be to the everlasting credit of the First Minister, that from the day he announced that policy to the people of Canada he has remained faithful to the doctrine; and up to this moment he has shown no sign of departing from it; but, as he stated at the magnificent gathering in Toronto, a gathering of the young men, the old men, and the middle-aged men, who assembled to do him honor, he has nailed that principle to the mast-head of his party, and is willing to stand or fall by it, and in that statement he voiced the sentiments not only of his followers in this country, but, in my opinion, of the large majority of the people of Canada.

Mr. JACKSON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12:15 a.m., Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 20th March, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

LEVIS ELECTION.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the Orders of the Day are called I desire to say that I have made enquiry with respect to the issuing of a new writ in the case of Lévis, and I find that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, has not yet received the necessary instructions to enable him to issue a new writ in that case. When is it proposed to give those instructions?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. No notice had been given by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to the Department of the Secretary of State, but to-day the Government have given orders to have the writ issued without delay, at once.

Mr. BLAKE. I find it exceedingly difficult to understand the course of procedure in these cases. From the statement made by the Secretary of State to this House, it appears to be his duty to give notice to have the writ issued.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I said I had not received it.

Mr. BLAKE. Either there has or has not been delay. The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery was furnished with the necessary information by the Government as to what was to be done with respect to one of those two notices, that for the West Riding of Northumberland, in time to enable the writ to be issued yesterday. With respect to the case of Lévis, the hon. gentleman says the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery did not give him notice, and that is the reason, and the only reason, the hon. gentleman has given for not having acted in that case. My belief, however, is that there is another reason, because I cannot see that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery would have omitted to give notice as to Lévis and given notice as to West Northumberland. If he conceived it to be his duty to give notice at once in the one case, why should he have delayed with respect to the other? We all were informed of the fact that the warrant had been issued in that case, and the Government upon receiving that notice proceeded without delay to execute their part of the law and to give the necessary instructions. They pick and choose. In the one case, they give instructions; in the other case they delay. That is making a convenience for their own purposes of the law, which was not to be so used. The law is to be used in the general interest, and equal justice is to be meted out to all the constituencies; and, therefore, I conceive that the privileges of this House have been violated and the Government have neglected a duty imposed upon them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not believe the Government have been in any sense guilty of a breach of the privileges of Parliament. Notwithstanding the forcible language which has been addressed by the hon. gentleman opposite, the clerk says the uniform practice is for the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to wait for instructions after you, Mr. Speaker, have informed the House that your warrant has been issued. With respect to the writ for West Northumberland I can speak myself. The fact is simply this: Going out of the Chamber I saw the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and, as he knew that I came from Ontario, he said he had received a warrant for West Northumberland. I said, "Very well; you had better have the writ out. Who is the returning officer?" He told me. I said, "Appoint the same returning officer."

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I did not think blame should be attached to anyone in this matter. I received to-day information from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and we ordered that a new writ be issued in the case of Lévis. There has been no reason, although the hon. gentleman opposite insinuates there has, why I should have delayed the issue of the writ, if it had been within my power to do so.

Mr. BLAKE. I have a return here, showing that in the vast majority of cases writs were issued the day following; and in many cases on the same day, as that on which the warrants reached the clerk's hands. Here we have three days' delay in one case, and I say the spirit of the election law, has been violated as well as the privileges of this House.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY—RETURNS.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to ask the hon. First Minister if he has that little document at hand with respect to the Grand Trunk Railway, I think he has got it in his desk, and he might as well place it on the Table.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD. Yes, I have had it in my desk, I got it yesterday, as I told the hon. gentleman, that is a letter from Mr. Hickson to me, and a resolution of the board in England confirming his letter. They were sent with a large envelope covering certain information concerning other motions of the hon. gentleman which did not in any way concern these two letters. So I sent it back to get a correct envelope.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am anxious to get it soon, because the Grand Trunk stock is dropping so fast, I am afraid it will disappear altogether before I get the return in.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. McCALLUM. I hold in my hand the Globe of the 19th of March, in which the following language is used:—

"Following the lead of Mr. White of Hastings, Mr. McCallum to-night declared himself in favor of a legislative union and the abolition of the Provincial Legislatures. The Conservative members are becoming candid. Possibly they will throw off the mask altogether before next election and appeal to the country as legislative unionists."

There is not a man within hearing of my voice to-day who heard me make use of that language. In plain Saxon, I say the man who wrote that paragraph must have written it wilfully, knowing it to be false, and I brand him a liar, a moral coward, and one not fit to associate with gentlemen.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

On order to resume adjourned debate on motion of Sir Leonard Tilley to go again into Committee of Ways and Means.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With respect to this motion I should like to know if we can, in any way, come to a conclusion as to when the debate may be expected to close. Perhaps we might come to a vote as the discussion has lasted for a good many days.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman know how many on his own side wish to speak?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think we are all desirous of coming to a conclusion at a reasonable time, though of course one cannot answer altogether for gentlemen behind. I do not think, however, that there will be any unnecessary delay on this side, for I believe hon. gentlemen behind me are anxious to close too.

Mr. BLAKE. I have one practical suggestion to offer. If the debate closes to-night I presume it is not the intention of the hon. gentleman to take the resolution through the committee, because there will be a good deal of discussion on the details of the resolutions, and it would not do to take them very late at night. If we come to an understanding that the debate shall close, and if the hon. gentleman should go into committee and come out again, it would be a breach of the understanding to interpose at that time with any observations. I think it would be unfortunate, as the hon. gentleman furnishes us with a good deal of practical discussion in the committee, that it should be taken at an untimely hour.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We propose only to go through with one resolution—the one with reference to prison labor. We would like to take a vote on that.

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. BLAKE. In saying that, the hon. gentleman does not mean that he intends to abandon the others?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Oh no; we will certainly not abandon them. We simply want to take a vote on that particular one to-night.

Mr. JACKSON. The hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood), as you are aware, Mr. Speaker, favored the House last night with a very able speech, and I am sure every one who listened to it must have been charmed with its eloquence. For my own part I may say that I was pleased to listen to him, but I must acknowledge, at the same time, that I was a little astonished at some remarks the hon. gentleman made. He spoke with regard to the exodus of Canadians to the United States. He referred to some remarks made by my colleague the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) when that gentleman spoke about his own county. He referred to the duty on coal, to the immigration policy of the Government, to the increased population of the Province of Ontario—all of which I shall give some attention to in the course of my remarks. I am very much disinclined to refer to what has been said on this subject by previous speakers; and were it not that any remarks I may make, may be read by people outside of this House who have not had the privilege of listening to this debate I should have refrained from making charges which have been made and so ably proven by other speakers, but as what those hon. gentlemen have said cannot appear in my remarks I shall take occasion to allude to them myself. During the year 1877-78 the leaders of the Conservative party charged the Mackenzie Administration with being responsible for the depression which then existed throughout this country. They saw that, according to the natural results of trade throughout the world, prosperity would return again within the immediate future, they believed if they could persuade the people that the Government was responsible for the existing depression, that at the next election they would be returned to power, and when once in power, and by the return of prosperity to this country which would be sure to come, they could and would maintain themselves in power. Therefore, it was said from one end of the Dominion to the other that the previous Government were incompetent to run the affairs of the nation; they were charged with being flies on the wheel; they were charged with retarding the progress of the country. The people were told during the election campaign of 1878 that if they wanted high prices for their wheat, high prices for their labor, if they wanted general prosperity, they should support the National Policy and Sir John Macdonald. The hon. First Minister himself stated that a readjustment of the tariff would stimulate and build up the manufacturing industries of the country, that it would create a home market for the produce of the farmer, that it would build up a labor market with high prices, that it would bring back the young men who were emigrating to the United States by the thousands and build up and keep Canada for the Canadians. These and similar statements were sounded from one end of the Dominion to the other; the elections were brought on, the Conservative party were successful. They were elected to power and we have now had six years of the hon. gentleman's Administration. Well, Sir, have these promises to the people been fulfilled? The First Minister says they have. I have here a statement made by the right hon. gentleman to a reporter of the New York Herald, when the First Minister was departing for Europe in November last. The reporter asked him:

"Are you still satisfied with protection in Canada, Sir John?"

"Yes; it has worked well for us. We have had five years of it, and we are satisfied it has greatly promoted our prosperity. Our young men before we adopted a protective policy were leaving us to come to the United States. We had nothing to offer them but agriculture and the village blacksmith and kindred trades. If the young men had any enterprise, any mechanical talent, any disposition for manufactures, they went to the United States with those faculties and generally propered. Now our infant industries have been fostered and have grown to be an important factor in our national life. The manufacture of cotton goods has been a little overdone, but that is the only exception. England does not like it; they tell us there that we are very poor political economists. We admit it, but we say in answer that it suits us. We are only four and a half millions of people, but we are prosperous."

Well, Sir, the hon. Postmaster General also made some remarks. I read from the London Advertiser of 13th December, 1881. It says:

"Mr. Carling informed his audience at the city hall, on Tuesday night, that he knew no period in the history of this country when it was more prosperous than at the present moment. Many of his Tory listeners were astonished. This declaration from the Postmaster-General fairly took their breath. One man informed us that he had had two days' work in seven weeks. Several of Mr. Carling's listeners have been for days looking for employment, but without success."

The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) also says this country is prosperous, and to prove that statement he tells us there are 60,000 families in London, England, who live in one room each; that there are 40 per cent. of the children in certain school districts in London that go to school in the forenoon without their breakfast; that there are 28 per cent. of the children in certain districts that go to school in the afternoon without their dinners, and that there are 10 per cent. of the children in certain school districts that have no fathers at all. Now, Sir, I do not see what this has to do with the prosperity of this country, and I think if the hon. gentleman cannot make better comparisons than that to prove that the country is prosperous, he had better keep his seat in future, and allow others to discuss the question. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) says there is a temporary depression, but he takes comfort. He says there are symptoms of improvement and prosperity, and he quotes as authority King and Ward lumberman of Montreal to prove that prosperity. I can tell the hon. gentleman that I am a lumberman; I have been in that business since 1861; and at no time, during the last twelve years at least, the lumbermen have not paid as low wages to the workmen as they have during the last fall and winter. I do not think we need go outside of the city of Ottawa to prove that fact. I noticed in the papers last fall that the lumbermen of Ottawa were hiring their men at from $10 to $12 a month, and there were hundreds of applicants even at those figures who could get no employment. That shows, I think, that the statements made by Mr. Ward, of Montreal, will not apply to this part of the country. Now, Sir, let us see what is the case in other parts of the country; let us see what is the condition of affairs down by the sea. We have heard from a number of gentlemen on both sides of the House, some telling us that there is prosperity in the Maritime Provinces, and some telling us that there is not. I have here a paper, said to have been written by a Liberal Conservative to the Moncton, N.B., Transcript, in September last, in which he says:

"We admit our taxes are doubled, acknowledge some public works, such as the portions of the Intercolonial Railway to connect the line we had before with Quebec and Canada, a grain elevator at Halifax that has nothing to do, some branch lines of railway which reflect but little credit on the promoters, and of questionable value at the best, our trade gone, inundated with goods from Canada sent to us at a slaughter market, mercantile depression at Halifax and St. John existing, which it may almost be said has existed for many years, going from bad to worse, no immigration coming in, no sensible increase in the population, our young men of all classes leaving the country, not from choice but necessity; no markets for our farmers, and to sum up, the Maritime Provinces paralysed for want of a fostering care which should be directed to build up our trade and commerce, and place the country in a sound financial position. It has become a one man power—a Tupper for Nova Scotia resident at Ottawa or London; a Tilley for New Brunswick."

Now, Sir, this comes from the Maritime Provinces; this comes from down by the sea.

Mr. IVES. It smells salt.

Mr. JACKSON. Now, I have another statement which should be authoritative on the subject. His Excellency the Governor General is reported to have said in reply to an address presented to him in St. John, N.B.:

"I wish it had been my good fortune to have come here at a moment when, standing in the midst of a commercial community, I might have offered you my congratulations upon the state of trade in the Province of New Brunswick. It is, however, useless to conceal from ourselves the fact that business has lately been in a far from satisfactory state, and that notably in the case of the timber trade, which occupies so important a place in your commercial system, there has been a very serious contraction of business. These are facts which we have to look in the face, and no optimism is more senseless than that which shuts its eyes to them."

Now, here we have a plain contradiction between the First Minister and His Excellency the Governor General. One states in New York that the country is prosperous; the other states in St. John, New Brunswick, that there is a great depression. This is certainly a curious coincidence. There must be something wrong; as the proverb says, a kingdom fighting against itself cannot stand; therefore, according to that proverb, there must be a downfall pretty soon. Now, Sir, I claim that no man ever took charge of the affairs of any nation under such favorable circumstances as did the Conservative party in 1878. The star of prosperity was then to be seen in the horizon. A change for the better had already taken place in the United States. Factories which had been lying idle since 1873, were re-opened; iron factories which had been lying idle for three years at least, were beginning to open up again; furnaces were being relighted; the lumber trade which had been comparatively dead since 1873, felt the stimulus; prices were advancing; and the country in general was becoming prosperous. The years 1879, 1880, 1881 and 1882, were four of the most prosperous years that the United States ever experienced. These are facts which I know myself, for I was doing business in that country during that whole term of years. Well, Sir, Canada lying contiguous to the United States, and depending on the United States markets for the disposal of a large amount of its exports, necessarily felt the benefit of that revival in the United States; and that circumstance, together with the good crops and high prices that prevailed in this country—not brought about by the National Policy, but the result of bad harvests in Europe, England being the place where the market for wheat was established—produced in Canada during three or four years, from 1879 to 1882, a greater prosperity than almost the most sanguine could have expected. Now, I claim that this Government had it in their power to build up the industries of this country as no other Government ever had. Had they, when giving the contract to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, inserted a clause in that contract, compelling the company to purchase in this country their entire rolling stock, and a portion of their steel rails, which might have been manufactured here had the duty been taken off coal, instead of the country suffering depression as it is to-day, it would have been one of the most prosperous countries in the world. But what are the facts? Nearly the whole of the rolling stock for the Canadian Pacific Railway has been bought in the United States, and the steel rails have been bought in England or the United States; and I have been told, although I am not positive, that a portion of that material has been brought in free of duty. I intend to ask the question whether that is true or not.

Mr. BOWELL. What articles?

Mr. JACKSON. Rolling stock.

Mr. BOWELL. It is not correct.

Mr. JACKSON. Thank you. Well, Sir, what effect has the purchasing of that material in the United States had on this country. The industries of this country might have been built up enormously by its manufacture here.

Look at the city of Kingston, where the locomotive works, with a capital of $300,000 and employing 400 or 500 men, are lying idle for want of something to do, and where the car works, employing 300 or 400 men, are also lying idle with nothing to do. Look at London, where the Ontario Car Works are bankrupt with nothing to do. We also had a car works factory established in the county of Norfolk from which I come. In 1881 the proprietor told me that although he had not direct information that he would be supplied with the Government contract, still he had encouragement to that effect and he put almost his last dollar into building a factory in Port Dover which only ran a short time when it had to close up. This is the way the manufacturing industries have been built up in this country; instead of the money being spent here, it is spent in the United States. Is this building up Canada for the Canadians? I hold that it is taking the money of Canadians to build up American industries. At this point I will refer to some statements made by the commissioner, Mr. Blackeby, in which he refers to the manufacturing industries of Ontario. Referring to Kingston, he says: The manager of those works was, unfortunately, away from home during the time the Kingston works were being visited, and for that reason no reliable data was obtained with reference to the work. Subject to correction, however, it may be stated that even during the present dull year as much wages would be paid out and as much value produced as in 1878, because up till the end of March 400 hands were engaged in this establishment. The car works here were also closed down, but as this industry was not in existence in 1878, it makes no difference in the report. He refers also to Simcoe and to other points. He says the Simcoe Woollen Company was started in 1883 and that the Joseph Brook woollen goods manufactory was established in 1867. Well, I have looked over this report and cannot find any statements in which he refers to the Brook establishment any further than to say that it was erected in 1867. Let me state in regard to this factory, that Mr. Brooks, who erected this woollen factory in 1867, continued to do business up to 1881, and was doing a remunerative business; he was prospering so much that in 1882 he became infatuated with the National Policy. Formerly he was a Reformer, but in 1882 he voted with the Conservative party and opposed me in my election. He took up the National Policy so earnestly that he advocated the building of another factory in the town of Simcoe, and through his influence another factory was erected with a capital of $30,000, and a loan from the town of $20,000, making $50,000. The factory has been running now nearly two years but has not yet paid any dividend. It was intended at first to manufacture fine yarn, and the most improved machinery was got from England for that purpose, but they had to discontinue to manufacture fine yarn and have gone into the grosser qualities, shoddy work, for the fine yarn market was overstocked. I have some stock in that company myself which I offered for sale last year, but was only offered 75 per cent. which I would not accept. I find no statement in this report in regard to the canning factories in Norfolk. Norfolk had five canning factories, three of which are still in existence, two having closed their doors. The other three are still running moderately; canned goods are so reduced in price, being 30 to 60 per cent. less to-day than they were a year ago, that although the three factories are still running in Norfolk they are not making any money. The hon. member for Brookville (Mr. Wood) referred to the county of Norfolk last night. I was born in the county, I have always lived there, and have made my home there, and I have the honor to-day of representing a portion of that county in this House, an honor of which I feel very proud. The county of Norfolk, as a whole, is, I consider, as good a county as can be found. We have some poor lands there, and we have some very excellent land there, but, taking it as a whole, I think it would compare very favorably with any county in western Ontario. Now, Sir, as I represent a rural district, a farming community, I want to see how the farmers are affected by the National Policy. I find that the total exports from this country during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1884, amounted to $91,406,496; I find that our exports of animals and their products amounted to $24,152,184, and of agricultural products $18,156,060, a total of $42,308,284. Thus, 46 per cent. of the entire exports of this country are produced by the farmers. The products of the forest amounted to $27,203,083, or 29 per cent.; fisheries, $8,609,314, or 9½ per cent.; and manufactured articles, $4,177,146, or 4½ per cent. Now, here is the point. The manufactured articles is the industry which this National Policy was intended to build up. As hon. gentlemen opposite have drawn comparisons between 1878 and 1884, they will allow me the same privilege. I find that the manufactured articles exported from this country in 1878 amounted to $1,681,756, and in 1882, $4,264,454, or a reduction in three years during which the National Policy was in force of $417,302; and I find in 1884, after 5 years' experience of the National Policy, that there was $504,610 worth of manufactured articles less exported than there was in 1878. Now, here is a business that the National Policy was intended to foster and build up, and we find from this report that more than half a million dollars less was exported of these articles in 1884 than in 1878, which shows conclusively to my mind that the National Policy was a fraud and has proved a failure. The other exports of this country were: Products of the mine, $3,442,492; miscellaneous, $687,880; coin and bullion, $281,292. The exports in 1881-82 were $102,137,203; in 1882-83, $98,085,804; and in 1883-84, $91,406,496, or $10,730,707 less than in 1881-82, or nearly 10 per cent. less exports from 1882 to 1884. The only way that you can figure the prosperity or depression of a country is by the exports and imports, and the exports give the wealth of the country in my opinion. Individuals may become rich by trading with each other, but a nation's prosperity depends upon the development of its resources whereby it exports to foreign countries and sells in foreign markets, thereby getting their wealth and returning it to the country. The figures I have given show conclusively, I claim, that this country is in a depressed state. In 1883-84 we had imports $24,980,517 in excess, and, unless the Government can show where this discrepancy of nearly $25,000,000 is to be made up, I claim they are going behind. I want to show how protection affects the farmer. During the last fiscal year, the farmers of this country exported to the United States $6,367,702 of animals and their products, and of agricultural products, $7,508,111, making a total of $13,875,813. The American tariff of 20 per cent., which is a loss to the farmers of this country, because they sell in the American market, deducts from the farmers' pockets $3,775,162. They buy within 10 per cent. as much as they sell, as a rule, and 80 per cent. of what they purchase is foreign, which would be about $10,000,000 worth of foreign goods which they buy. On that $10,000,000, the duty amounts, on an average, to 35 per cent., which would be $3,500,000, which makes a total of $6,275,162 taken out of the pockets of the farmers during the last fiscal year on account of protection, of which $2,775,162 was paid into the American treasury, and $3,500,000 into the Dominion treasury. You may say that what they pay into the American treasury does not affect the farmers of this country. I have been doing business between the United States and Canada for the last twenty-five years, and I know that, on every animal that is taken from Canada and sold in the American market, the producer loses 20 per cent. on the cost. If a horse is valued at $100, the farmer loses $20 on it, because the duty had to be paid before he sold in the other market, and the same with cattle and sheep and anything that is produced by the farmer and exported to the United States. Here is an item which to some will seem of very little importance, the item of eggs. That has grown to be an enormous trade in this country. In 1882-83 there were $2,256,856 worth of eggs exported from this country. This last fiscal year the amount was only $1,960,197, or a falling off of about 2,000,000 dozen of eggs during the last fiscal year. The farmers on that article alone lost during the last year about $344,000 on duty. The hon. member for King's, Nova Scotia (Mr. Woodworth) stated the other night that the producer paid the duties on potatoes going into the Boston market. I quite agree with him that the producer pays the duty on potatoes and on everything sold in the American market. Where the market is established, when there is a duty between where it is produced and that market, he pays the duty on it. At the same moment he turned round and said that the producer paid the duty on coal in the same way. The hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) last night made nearly the same statement. The market for coal is established in the United States, and all expenses attached to that, after the market is established, are paid by the consumers in regard to coal. The Government received this last year $1,316,381.90 in duty on coal. Who paid that to the Government? Was it the producer or the consumer? I claim it is plain enough to be seen that it is the consumer who pays that duty on coal—there is no question about it. This is what the farmers have got to suffer. They have lost during the last year over $6,250,000 by protection. It is time they began to get their eyes open in this matter. I have an article here taken from the Jackson, Michigan, Patriot, which describes the views of the people in this country better than I can myself.

"Looking at the facts, setting all theories aside, we cannot discover wherein our farmers are benefited an iota in the price of their exportable commodities by protective taxation. The tariff has nothing whatever to do in fixing the price of articles of export. And of our total exports from 80 to 90 per cent. are the non-protected products of the soil.

"But, on the other hand, it is apparent that the net earnings of our farmers are very much reduced by the protective taxes they are compelled to pay on nearly everything they purchase for use and consumption.

"They sell their surplus in foreign markets where our tariff laws are inoperative in the matter of prices, and they buy what they require in the way of farm implements and household articles in the home market where the tariff is operative and is intended to keep prices far higher than they would be if there was no tariff.

"The price of their surplus wheat, provisions and cotton is determined every hour in Liverpool in competition with the producers of the world, while the price of much that they buy is determined by the cost in foreign markets, plus the percentage of protected taxation levied by our tariff laws.

"The claim that our farmers are enriched by protective taxation is the shammiest fraud in the whole category of frauds used to bolster up the fallacies and sophisms of protection.

"But, say the protectionists, build up home manufactures by the help of tariff taxes so as to have a home market for all the products of the soil. That is impossible. The farmers are producing 600 millions a year more products than the home market, after a hundred years of protection, can furnish a market for.

"In all leading industries our present capacity for producing manufactured goods exceeds our capacity for consumption. There is but one cry in all protected industries at present, and that is 'over-production.' The iron furnaces and mills, and woollen mills, the cotton mills, and the boot and shoe factories, the agricultural implement factories, the furniture factories, and other great industries are suffering for the lack of a market for their products.

"The trouble is not because we have too little, but because we have too much, and under the trade-restricting tariff system cannot sell to people of other countries, because we will not buy of them on equal terms such things as they have to dispose of.

"Trade is reciprocal, and protectionism is the enemy of reciprocal trade. People who desire to sell must be willing to buy, or else trade is impossible.

"Then, under our tariff system of placing taxes upon raw materials needed by our manufacturers, the cost of manufacturing is so increased that they cannot sell their products in competition with manufacturers who are not thus handicapped. The manufacturers of England, France and Germany are not burdened with tariff taxes levied by their respective Governments upon the raw materials they use.

"Placed at this great disadvantage our manufacturers cannot compete with them in the markets of the world. For this reason our leading industries cannot increase much beyond merely supplying the demands of the home market.

"The only way to increase the home market for farm products is to strike down the tariff restrictions, which are an embargo upon trade, remove the burdensome tariff taxes from all raw materials, permit fair and free competition, and let the best men and nations win.

"Our unprotected farmers successfully compete with the cheapest labor in the markets of the world; and our manufacturers, we firmly believe, could do with equal success if the burdens of tariff taxation were removed and the restrictions imposed upon trade by our tariff laws were abolished."

Now, Sir, that is from a farmer's standpoint in the State of Michigan, and it touches our case in this country precisely. But, at the same time, the farmers in this country must understand that it will be impossible to reduce the taxes raised from duties down to what they were before, because the expenses of the Government are so great that the taxes will have to remain high for a long period of years. Although the effects are pointed out here, they are hard to be remedied; no matter what Government may be in power they cannot be remedied for a long time to come. Now, I want to say a word in regard to the bounties on pig iron. I claim that the Government have no right to take the people's money to bolster up any individual industry at the expense of the masses of the people. Any municipality, any corporation, has a perfect right to grant bonuses where they expect to receive some return in the way of advanced value to property, as in the case of a railway, or anything of that kind, where they expect to receive either direct or indirect advantage from it. But, when the Government takes money from the pockets of the people to bolster up any manufacturing industry, and which money has to be paid by the mass of people, I say it is decidedly wrong. Now, what are the facts? After all the assistance given by the Government the product of the pig iron industry has only amounted to 28,000 tons last year. A bounty of $42,000 was given to the pig iron industry, and I claim it is a robbery of the people. Farmers, as a rule, have to pay for these things, and I claim it is entirely wrong. Now, Sir, I want to pay attention to the immigration policy. I find from the Auditor General's report for the year ended 30th June, 1884, that the total expenses for immigration purposes were $511,208.83, and for quarantine $64,117.89, making a total of $575,326.72 paid for immigration and quarantine. I also find that $142,138.82 were paid out for printing, advertising, &c. The first on the list in this line comes the Burland Lithographic Company, $25,917.30; the next comes the Montreal Gazette, $9,211.15; the London Free Press, $6,075.60; the Toronto Mail, $9,803.92. Now I might here mention that the Toronto Mail have denied that this amount of money was received by them for printing or publishing in any way; they claim that it was the Mail Printing Company that received the money. Well, this printing company and jobbing company, I understand, belongs to the Hamilton Spectator, and if it is taken from the Toronto Mail it must be given to the Hamilton Spectator. We find also the Hamilton Spectator credited for $6,593.26; the Montreal Minerve, $213; the Montreal Herald, $2,767.20; the Montreal Industrial World, $2,500; L. J. Demers et freres, $2,322.42; J. J. Foote, Quebec, $3,780.46; H. W. Bennett, Prescott, $6,141.95; G. H. Taylor, Ottawa, $1,600. I find MacLean, Roger & Co., of the city of Ottawa, Government Printers, received the enormous sum of $34. There are numerous other smaller items that I will not mention, varying from $3 to $1,000. Now I find there is a charge for photographs. I am sorry the hon. First Minister is not in his seat, because I wanted to ask whether this was a photograph taken of himself and his colleagues in the Cabinet to be sent into foreign countries as an advertisement to induce immigrants to come to this country by their good looks, or whether it was a photograph of himself taken in his new G. C. B. costume given by the Queen, to be sent into foreign countries for the same purpose. We find there were expended for paper for pamphlets, $27,660.79. I will not go into all the details of that list, but I find the sum for printing, advertisements, &c., and paper for pamphlets amounts to $109,327.85. Next we find that $34,697 was paid for travelling expenses, incidental expenses, and so forth. Heading the list is John Dyke, agent at Liverpool, who received 13 months' salary, $2,150.18; travelling expenses, $9,331.94; or $27.52 per day for the whole period of 13 months, excluding Sundays. Next comes Thomas Grahame, agent at Glasgow, 13 months' salary, $1,299.87; travelling expenses, $3,334.27; or $10 per day, excluding Sundays. Chas. Foy, Belfast, 13 months salary, $1,083.44, travelling expenses, $2,861.20; or $8.44 per day. Thomas Connolly, Dublin, 13 months' salary, $1,083.44; travelling expenses, $2,291.19 or $6.75 per day. J. W. Down, Bristol, 15 months' salary $608.33; travelling expenses, $2,048.74, or $6.04 per day. We find a number of lesser lights receiving smaller amounts, which I will not mention. I make these statements merely to show the people of the country how the public money is being squandered, and in order to give them some little insight into these matters. I find also in this connection that Sir Charles Tupper is credited with receiving $791 for travelling expenses in connection with the immigration policy. I also find a further sum of $718.40 was received by Mr. John Dyke for expenses at exhibitions, which makes a total of $12,242 paid to this one man. The sum of $101,178.14 was paid to the steamship companies for assisted passages. All the rest of this vast sum of money has been squandered and given to agents and others to assist in this great work. I claim that this is a gigantic swindle from beginning to end. Only $100,000, in round figures, out of the enormous sum voted was paid for assisting emigrants to this country, the rest being swallowed up by hungry wolves knocking at the door of the Government. This is an outrage on the people of this country; this is something which should not be tolerated and which will not be tolerated by the people, in my opinion. I want to show how the people are talking and acting with respect to it. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) claimed credit to the Government for having changed their policy on this point. It is true they have made some changes in their policy in regard to restricting certain classes coming to this country; but they deserve no credit for that change of policy because the trade and labor councils throughout the country compelled them to do so. The bold stand they took compelled the Government to yield, and therefore the Government deserve no credit. I desire to read an extract in answer to the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood), who stated that laboring men had no grievances. I want to show that hon. gentleman what the grievances of workmen are. Here are resolutions passed by the wage workers of the City of Hamilton, wherein they state:

"Whereas, the system of importing pauper and Chinese labor to this country by the Government of the Dominion of Canada does not in any way protect the industries of our country or increase the wealth of the producers, but the importation of pauper and coolie labor in an already glutted labor market brings and increases poverty and its attending evils. The enforcement of labor contracts made in foreign countries detrimental to the interests of wage-earners of Canada will result in a degrading competition that will break the noble spirit of labor and render our slavery unbearable. We denounce the actions of the Government as criminal in protecting the manufacturers and strangling competition by the many unfair advantages derived from such protection, while the producers are taxed in order to increase their number and cheapen the cost of production.

"Therefore, be it resolved, That the workmen of Hamilton condemn the policy of the Government in allowing the importation to our shores of pauper immigrants, and call upon them to take measures to return such foreign paupers as are now in our land and to legislate against the arrival of others.

"That we demand the recall of the emigrant agents and lecturers employed by the Government and the application of the money appropriated for their remuneration to some public work upon which some unemployed Canadians can earn their bread. That we especially protest against the introduction of Chinese labor in any part of the Dominion, and call upon the Government to send back all Chinese now in Canada, or enforce such a poll tax as will drive them hence.

Mr. JACKSON.

"That we demand the repeal of all laws that do not bear equally upon capital and labor, and the substitution thereof of such laws that will protect the laborer's rights from the encroachments of selfish capitalists.

"That the workmen of Hamilton refrain from giving support to either of the political parties in the future, until such time as they secure by legislation, not promises, their rights."

The hon. member for Brockville said that wage-workers had no grievances. I think that document destroys his theory entirely. Let us see what other action has been taken. The City Council of Toronto on the 16th instant passed a resolution to petition the Governor General in Council, the House of Commons and Local Legislature, praying that pauper immigration to Canada may cease, and that both Governments abandon the paying of immigrants' railroad fares from any of the ports of entry to the Province of Ontario. Such has been the course taken by Ontario, and it shows plainly that the people of Ontario, and those of the cities especially, are determined not to be overrun in future by pauper immigrants if they can possibly prevent it. I claim that the exodus is brought about almost entirely by this immigration question. I claim that the young men of our country are being crowded out by foreigners who are brought in and take the places which should be filled by our native young men, and as they cannot obtain remunerative wages for their services they are compelled to go to the United States. And this immigration difficulty is the very reason, to a great extent, that forces them out of this country. Hon. gentlemen say that there were more of our countrymen leaving in former years than there have been of late, but statistics prove the contrary. They prove that there have been almost three times as many who have left during the last four years as there were in the four previous years. This shows conclusively, to my mind, that this immigration policy is the real reason for forcing these young men out of the country. I can say, of my own knowledge, that five of my own relatives left my neighborhood within a few years, four of them for Dakota and one for Michigan—all of them able young men. Now, this is very serious, and, unless these immigrants are stopped from coming into the country, it is going to have a ruinous effect. We have the climate, the soil, the territory, to build up a great nation. What we want now is a Government policy which will induce foreigners to come to this country with their families and locate on those vast territories which we have in the west, and make homes for themselves, and we want a policy which will keep them here when they come. We do not want a policy which will drive them out; but, with a good policy and good laws, all the immigration expenses necessary is to devise means to advertise in the newspapers of foreign countries, showing that we have a country here fit for people to come to and make homes for themselves, and that being done, I claim that this country will be prosperous.

Mr. VAIL. Mr. Speaker, I can hardly hope, after so many able speeches have been made on the motion of the Finance Minister, to say much that will be interesting to the House, but as the debate is drawing to a close I feel it incumbent on me before the vote is taken to refer briefly to a few statements which have been made by some of the gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) said that the speech of the Finance Minister was a remarkable speech. I agree with him; and I venture to say that considering the depressed state of almost every industry in the Dominion of Canada at the present time it would be difficult to find another man in this House who could have made such a speech. For my part I only know one at the present time, and he is not now in Parliament. When that gentleman was obliged to draw on his imagination for his facts, he was always very demonstrative in manner, and very emphatic in his statements, and I am inclined to think that the Finance Minister has taken a leaf out of his book in the present instance, and has copied from his role. For my own part I was somewhat dissatisfied in the speech of the Finance Minister. I did hope, Sir, that with the evidence of the depression on the right hand and on the left, with the fact staring us in the face that the manufacturing industries of the country were in a depressed condition, and the further fact that almost every branch of business in the Dominion of Canada was in the same state—I did hope that the hon. the Finance Minister would have made a clean breast of it, and would have come to this House the present Session and stated boldly and squarely that the National Policy was a failure, acknowledge that he was incapable of lifting the country out of the confusion and depression which his unwise policy had brought it to, state frankly that he was convinced it was impossible to make the country prosperous and the people rich by Act of Parliament, and that, therefore, he had determined to retrace his steps. Had he done so, Mr. Speaker—I speak for myself, and I think I can speak for a good many on this side of the House—we would have had some sympathy for him; we would have said, As you have acknowledged you were wrong, as you have made up your mind in future to pursue the course we have been advocating for the last five years, we will assist you to the fullest extent and help you out of your difficulties. The Finance Minister, I am sorry to say, did not think proper to take that course. He has rather chosen to say to the people of this country, I know the business of the country is in a depressed state; I know I have taxed you beyond what you can well bear; I know I have taken $20,000,000 more out of your pockets than I required for the necessary expenditure of the country; I know all this and I know there is only one way out of this difficulty at the present time, and that is to make a change in the trade policy of the country, and go back as near as possible to a revenue tariff. Well, Sir, the Finance Minister after having in effect told the people that notwithstanding they have these hardships to bear; notwithstanding he had taken this $20,000,000 from the pockets of the people—he says to them in effect: Well, you ought not to complain, because you are not so badly off as the people of some other countries. And then my hon. friend starts on a false basis to show that the taxation of the Dominion is not quite equal to the taxation per capita of the United States and of the Australian colonies. Well, Sir, if that were true, is it any great consolation to the people down by the sea, who have paid their proportion of this $20,000,000, which has been expended in bridging canyons and tunnelling mountains on the Pacific slope—is it any satisfaction for them to know that they are no worse off than the people of some other countries. I say it is not; and I say the Finance Minister will not get any credit from the poorer classes, whose bread and fuel are taxed to find money to build a railway thousands of miles away from them, and from which they can never get a return of one dollar. Now, Mr. Speaker, what the country complains of at the present time, is the fact that the Government have been false to their pledges, that they have not carried out their promises. They promised, if they succeeded to power, in 1878, to make times good by Act of Parliament; they promised that there should be no depression; they promised that the people would soon be made rich if they would only put on all sail. Well, I ask where are those people now who took the advice of the Finance Minister and put on all sail in order that they might become rich in a short time? Hundreds of them have gone into bankruptcy in the last year, and I am afraid that hundreds more will follow in the next year. But, as I before said, what the country has to complain of at present is that the Government have not fulfilled their pledges. Now, I must, at the risk of repeating what has been said before, briefly refer to the means used in 1878 to defeat the Mackenzie Government, and I think I am privileged to do so in consequence of the statement made on the other side of the House that the answer to all that has been said by us was the fact that the country in 1878 had pronounced in favor of the National Policy, and had duplicated that verdict again in 1882. Now, Sir, when the elections were about to be held in 1878, we stated that if the party led by Sir John Macdonald came into power the country would have to submit to a protective policy and, consequently, increased taxation. That statement was denied most positively. But it was thought necessary by the friends of the Conservative party to telegraph to Sir John A. Macdonald, in order to ascertain whether he had made such a promise, and, if so, whether he intended to carry it out. I will read his message in reply, as it was printed in the Morning Herald of Halifax, in capital letters at the head of the editorial column, and transmitted through the country in every direction. It was as follows:

“What Sir John says: Neither at London nor elsewhere have I gone beyond my motion in Parliament—

Well, very few of the people knew what that motion was—

“and I have never proposed an increase, only a readjustment of the tariff.”

Well, that is very positive.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I suppose it is true.

Mr. VAIL. I say that telegram, coming from Sir John Macdonald, who was the leader of the Conservative party in this country, had a wonderful effect upon the people, because many of them believed it. No answer could have been sent at that time which would have had such an effect upon the elections as that telegram.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. VAIL. The hon. gentleman says “hear, hear.” It may have been something to be proud of to deceive the people, but it was nevertheless a piece of deception of the very worst kind.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. VAIL. No doubt it was a good political move; at the same time, I think if the hon. gentlemen had to do it over again, he would not send exactly such a reply.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, I would.

Mr. VAIL. Well, it had its effect on the elections of 1878, and therefore those elections were carried by deceiving the people. Now, another little piece of deception was practised in St. John, New Brunswick, by the Finance Minister. That hon. gentleman told the people of St. John that the Mackenzie Government had been spending too much money, that they were an extravagant Government, that this country could not afford to spend more than $22,000,000 a year, that had he been Finance Minister during the five years previous, he would not have spent more than $22,000,000 per annum, that that was all the country required, and any man who would spend more than that, sum was not fit for the office of Finance Minister. Now, let us see what this economical Finance Minister has expended since he came into power. In the very first year after he came in, in 1879, the expenditure was, in round numbers, $24,650,000; in 1881, it was $25,000,000; in 1882, $27,000,000; in 1883, $28,730,000; in 1884, $31,107,000; and the expenditure for the present year will be still more. What will the country think of this, after the assurances given the St. John people. Now, there is a certain expenditure which is under the control of the Government themselves, and which they can make large or small, just as they choose, that is the expenditure for the civil service of the country. This expenditure requires to be looked after more closely than perhaps any other. Now, I have a statement of the expenditure on this service from 1874 to 1885, but as I do not wish to weary the House, I will only give the amounts for the last years of each Government as a comparison. In the last year that my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie) was in power, our expenditure for civil service was $861,000, whereas the expenditure for 1885-86, according to the estimates of the present year, will be $1,200,000, an increase of no less than $339,000 per annum. Now, you would suppose, if there was an expenditure that the Government would feel a disposition to curtail as far as possible, it would be the expenditure on the civil service of the Dominion. I, however, find the number of persons employed in the civil service under the Mackenzie Government, 390, whereas, according to the estimates of 1885-86, the number has now reached the large figure of 679, an addition of over 70 per cent., or 289, since 1878. Now, that is a very large addition, and when the people see these figures, I think they will make up their minds that the Government of the present day is an extravagant Government. Now, to go back to the election of 1882, it will be remembered that the House was dissolved a year before the expiration of the term. The business of the country had been prosperous; a good many people had made money; the policy of the present Government had enabled a great many people who were interested in manufactures previous to 1879 to get a boom, and to unload their stocks upon other people at a large advance in price; and business generally speaking, was good. The Government, I suppose, took for granted that that was the time to go to the country, for they saw the little cloud in the distance that might overspread the whole canopy by-and-by, and they did not know in what condition they might find themselves at the expiration of the Parliamentary term. Well, what did they say to the people at that time? They told the people that in consequence of capitalists being anxious to invest large sums of money in the manufacturing industries of the country, and the fact that they declined to invest till they could be assured that the National Policy for at least another five years would be continued, the Government determined to dissolve the House and go to the people, in order to get an answer to this question so that the country might have the benefit of this promised capital. Well, the times then were good, and this statement coming from such a source and having been referred to in the Governor General's speech, led the people to suppose there would be large investments in manufactures. The people were busy, the elections were suddenly sprung upon them, very few took any interest in the contest, and the consequence was the Government came back with about the same majority they had before. I know that we have had several bye-elections since. I know what influences the Government have brought to bear in some cases upon constituencies in order to have their friends returned; I know they are all-powerful; I know what is said to the people when the bye elections are held. The people are told: The Government is strong, they are backed by a large majority, what is the use of your returning an opponent at the present time? And I suppose this sentiment prevails except in very intelligent constituencies where the people are guided by principle and are not looking for favors from the Government, and act independently. The Government have been fortunate in carrying these bye-elections, and I do not know that that is any very great disadvantage to the Opposition. I think that, as the matter stands at present, the Government had better have control of affairs a little while longer. A large majority in this House seem willing they should have it, and I do not think it would be very desirable for the Opposition to cross the floor at present, and shoulder the difficulties under which the Government are laboring. There is not a day that we do not see marked, in their countenances, the fact that they have almost insurmountable difficulties to overcome. We know they are interviewed by gentlemen from Ontario in the liquor interest, they have to meet gentlemen in the milling interest from Ontario and other parts of the Dominion, they have to confront deputations in the temperance interest from different places, they have to meet gentlemen in the corn interest from the Maritime Provinces; they are confronted by gentlemen in the Canadian Pacific Railway interest from Montreal. All these interests have to be faced, day after day, and where the money is to come from, when the Government grant all the requests that these people make, is what they do not know. They have just now more than their hands full, and, as far as I am concerned, I am willing that they shall carry on the business of the Government a little while longer, but it will not be very long. If the members of the Government had always been of the opinion that the protective policy was the right policy for a country like this, I would not feel they were so culpable, but the majority of them have changed their minds on this subject. There was a time when they were very much opposed to a protective policy, and stated plainly that such a policy would be detrimental to the best interests of the country. And I believe they think so to-day, but having put their hand to the plough they dare not look back. Now, I propose for a short time to turn my attention to my hon. friend, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. McLelan). That gentleman, when addressing the House the other night, I thought, might have spared us his reference to speeches previously made, because his statement was contrary to the facts. Gentlemen on this side look cheery and pleasant, and when they make speeches make them in a pleasant manner. I do not think, under the circumstances, that the Minister should have referred to them in the way he did. He said:

"They have assumed a tone of sadness and depression; the hon. gentlemen who sit opposite seem to be acting in a spirit of rivalry as to who shall present the condition of the country in the most sad and doleful colors possible. There seems to be a rivalry among them in the spirit of that which may be supposed to exist amongst undertakers."

And so he goes on. Well, I have heard a great many speeches delivered in this House, and I have heard a great many delivered elsewhere, and I must say, that a more doleful speech, a speech uttered in more dolorous tones, I never heard either in this House or out of it, than that which came from the mouth of the Minister for Marine and Fisheries that day. He looked at the Finance Minister as if he would like to bury him, because the latter had got him into the uncomfortable position of being obliged to make a speech and go back on the views he had so often and so strongly expressed in days gone by. When my mind carries me back to the old anti-confederate debates, I remember that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries—well I do not know whether it was he, but there was a Mr. McLelan in the Local House of Nova Scotia, and that Mr. McLelan took a leading part in opposition to Confederation. He made a great many strong statements then, as he always does, when he warms up to his subject. He generally prepares his speeches in such a way that his views are strongly expressed, and his language is very emphatic; but on all those occasions he almost excelled himself. I will read a few extracts from that hon. gentleman's speech, which, I think, will show that he has changed his mind somewhat in regard to what should be the proper trade policy for the Province of Nova Scotia at least. Mr. McLelan at that time objected to Confederation, because, in the first place, the Provinces were so disunited and their interests so different, that it would be impossible to form a Confederation in which the Maritime Provinces would be sufficiently protected; in the next place he objected to Confederation because Ontario being a very weak country and not able to defend itself, the militia of Nova Scotia would be brought up here to defend the people of Canada; he objected again to Confederation because the people of Canada were a very extravagant people, while the people of the Maritime Provinces were an economical people, and that, therefore, the latter would be placed in a very awkward position, and become corrupt when brought into contact with the extravagant people of the upper Province; further, he objected to Confederation, because Nova Scotia's interests would be sacrificed and her position in this House would be that of begging for what was her just due without being able to demand it. This Mr. McLelan—of course I will not say, for the moment, that it was my hon. friend opposite—said:

"The fact that the interests of the Provinces are so diversified that each has its own interests; and its centre of interests within itself precludes the possibility of a federal union being formed to work harmoniously."

If I understood the Minister of Marine and Fisheries the other night, he said, I think, that everything now was working harmoniously; Then he says again:

"Under Confederation we shall be placed under the same tariff, and the delegates had not looked to the effect of this increase of tariff. It must be evident to all that whilst we import $16.26"—

I want the Minister of Fisheries and the Minister of Customs to take a note of this—

"per head of dutiable goods, while Canada only imports $9.33 per head, we shall pay into the general revenue nearly double the amount paid by the population of Canada. We are larger importers, not only because of our pursuits, but because we have the means of paying for more goods."

You see he thought Nova Scotia was a very rich Province, while Canada was a very poor one. Then again—he grows a little more eloquent here—he says:

"I cannot conceive a more degraded or humiliating position than the representatives of a spirited people compelled to forego their political opinions—their conscientious convictions on all public questions—in order to obtain for their people a consideration in the distribution of the funds. But even supposing our nineteen representatives could so far forget themselves as to turn political hucksters and offer to sell themselves, body and soul, they will never obtain more than a few pickings from the public chest, which we shall do more than our share in filling. Under any circumstances, however humiliating, we shall be powerless to enforce a just consideration of our interests."

Has Mr. McLelan changed his mind, I wonder, before this? I am not, of course, alluding to the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Then, again, he goes on very pointedly, and puts down 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and so on:

"1st. We surrender the entire control of the constitution of this country.

"2nd. We endanger the harmony existing among us as fellow colonists by bringing our diverse interests into conflict.

"3rd. We reduce our local expenditure for roads and bridges to a large amount, or supply that deficiency by direct taxation.

"4th. We subject ourselves to the annoyance and tax of the Stamp Act.

"5th. We surrender to Canada the power to tax us to any extent their extravagance may render necessary, and which I have shown you in the outset, $782,560 (per annum, I suppose)."

A little further on he says:

"Confederation instead of extending the commerce of the country will rather cripple trade. I have already shown that Confederation must necessarily impose on us a very heavy tariff and exceedingly large burthens. The consequence of this will be to increase the cost of living and producing the articles of export. And when you increase the cost of living"—

Listen to this. This is very important just now—

"and of wages, you are unable to compete with other countries in the sale of your coal and fish and other articles of which Nova Scotia is especially calculated to produce."

Well, that is pretty strong language, and it was very pointed at that time. I shall only refer to one other paragraph, because it is not worth while to take up the time, though I have the volume here and might read on for half an hour. He says:

"The House has now before it its death warrant, and while we may not hope to see it die like a Christian, it should at least imitate the Indian savage who sings his death song with calmness and dignity, in the belief that he is about to enter the happy hunting grounds, and in like manner did I expect to see the advocates of this proposition sing the death song, inasmuch as it will give them the entrance to Canada, the 'happy hunting ground,' for office-seekers."

Does my hon. friend recognise this Mr. McLelan of 1865? in the person of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Well, that Mr. McLelan did find the happy hunting ground of office. No sooner was Confederation carried than he joined Mr. Howe in a delegation to Ottawa for better terms. That resulted in getting an advance annually for the Province of Nova Scotia, and gave my hon. friend the Minister of Marine a seat in the Senate and a commissionership on the Intercolonial Railway board. My hon. friend filled the position until after my friend the member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) came in, when the Board of Commissioners was done away with. My friend remained out of office for a certain time, but he was uneasy, and the time very soon came, in 1878, when he was enabled to do his part in inducing the people of Nova Scotia to accept a policy which he had told them, in the strongest language, and over and over again, would be ruinous to the best interests of the Province he is the sole representative of in the Cabinet. He has been in the Cabinet some time, and I have never heard him venture to make a speech touching upon this question until his speech the other day. I am sorry he has had to go back upon his former record. I am sorry he was not in a position at all events, if he had gone back on his record, to tell the House that he was mistaken in his views, that he was the representative of a Province which, although he had said it would be under great disadvantages in the Confederation, was now in a good position, that he had been mistaken in regard to the trade policy which was required for that Province, but had changed his mind, and now had good reasons to believe that the protective policy was an advantageous policy for the Province he represents. I hoped he would be in a position to go from one end of that Province to the other, and point out where this National Policy has been of advantage to the country. But he did not do it. He scarcely referred to Nova Scotia. You would hardly have supposed he ever saw Nova Scotia, that he had any interest in Nova Scotia, much less that he was the sole representative in the Cabinet of the Province of Nova Scotia. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries—I am sure he will allow me to call him that, may retort on me to some extent and say: You were an anti-confederate too. Well, there is some truth in that, but my position in regard to Confederation was exactly this—I am not ashamed that all the world should know it. When Confederation was first spoken of, and the delegates met to arrange it, I said that, I could not see any advantage in it from a Provincial standpoint, but if it was the wish of the British Government and would strengthen the British Empire, and if I could be shown a scheme under which all the Provinces could be protected, I thought we were in duty bound to accept it, but I must first know whether the smaller Provinces would be properly protected in the Confederation and would have sufficient funds to carry out their local expenditures. When the Quebec scheme was framed, as every man knows in this House, who studied the subject at all, the smaller Provinces were entirely sacrificed, they were placed entirely at the mercy of the Upper Provinces, and while their taxation would be largely increased they would not have more than half enough money to carry on their local works. When I saw that, I objected to Confederation, and I continued my objection until we got the better terms after we were confederated; and then I said, in my place in the House of Assembly: We have got better terms, we have got all we can for the present though we may get more by-and-bye, and I think we are bound to accept the better terms as an instalment and give Confederation a trial. Would anyone say that I took an improper course? Have not subsequent events shown that I was right in the course I took? I am glad to say that the Provinces were getting along very well up to 1879. There was no real cause of complaint. The tariff

we then had was a pretty fair tariff, though it was very easy at that time to show that the people of Nova Scotia and the other Maritime Provinces, were all paying more per capita than the people of the other Provinces. At the same time, we had no great reason to complain. There was a desire on the part of the people of Nova Scotia to make the best of Confederation; there was a desire on the part of the people of New Brunswick to make the best of it; and I believe Prince Edward Island intended to make the best of it when she came in; but, Mr Speaker, the National Policy made a very great change in the feeling of the people towards Confederation, and I am sorry for it. I am as much interested in the Dominion and desire its prosperity as strongly as any hon. gentleman in this House, or any man in this country, and my wish is to see this country prosper from one end to the other. I desire to see all the Provinces in a prosperous condition, consequently I feel in duty bound to tell the Government that their present trade policy is day by day drawing the very life blood from the Maritime Provinces. I do not want to array one Province against another, but I do not want the people of Nova Scotia to suppose that they are being ruined by Confederation; but I do want them to understand that the cause of their unsatisfactory condition at the present time is bad Government and the National Policy; it is because of a protective policy which is not suited to our Province, and which the Minister of Marine educated the people of Nova Scotia up to believe would be ruinous to us.

Mr. McLELAN. Not a protective policy, but a National Policy.

Mr. VAIL. Well, is not this National Policy a protective policy? That is just where the trouble is. If it was a proper National Policy instead of a protective policy the people would not be so opposed to it, but the trouble is, it is a highly protective policy; and the people have never been accustomed to such excessive taxation. The trade returns show that this policy takes more money out of the people of the lower Provinces, according to their population, than it does out of the people of the other Provinces, and thus it works unfairly and unjustly to them. Mr. Speaker, I have extracted from the trade returns some figures showing the amount of duty that we have paid in Nova Scotia since the National Policy came into full operation. We paid in 1880, $1,298,573, which was about the amount that we paid previous to that time. Now in the first year after that the difference between what was collected in 1880 and in 1881 was $200,658; in 1882 it was $459,000; in 1883, $535,000; in 1884, $608,600, making in the four years an increase under the National Policy of $1,803,570. Now, Mr. Speaker, had we imported a larger amount of goods we would have no reason to complain, because we must, as a matter of course, pay a larger amount upon a larger importation. But that is not the case. The value of the dutiable goods we imported in 1884 was only $6,468,000, and on that sum we paid over $1,900,000 whereas, in 1879, we only paid $1,183,000 on $6,829,000 of dutiable goods imported. I may now, perhaps, refer to the bread tax. This is a heavy tax on the Maritime Provinces, and bears very hardly upon the poorer classes of the people, who pay the largest portion of this tax. The amount collected on corn meal is very large, and we know that that is consumed mostly by the poorer classes, and by the lumbermen and fishermen. Now, the Finance Minister has collected from the poorer classes of the people in Nova Scotia, since the National Policy was introduced, up to the 1st of December, 1884, $232,000 on breadstuffs alone. That is a very heavy tax, and I did hope, Mr. Speaker, that after the Finance Minister acknowledged that he has taken $20,000,000 more out of the pockets of the people in the last four or five years than he required for the ordinary expenses of the country, that he would to have taken this duty off flour and meal—I may say, off the staff of life—which is such a heavy burthen on the people in the Maritime Provinces. I hope the hon. gentleman will yet see his way clear to do so. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have referred to the protective policy, and I have shown pretty clearly, I think, that it bears hardly upon the Maritime Provinces. I have looked at this report of the commissioner sent down to examine into the industries of Nova Scotia, but I have not been able to extract much information from it. It appears that the commissioner went to Halifax and after that visited only two or three of the central counties, so of course he could not make a very extensive or reliable report. But taking it on the whole, it is not, I suppose, as far as it goes, what I may call a very unfair report. The greatest unfairness about it, I think, is the rather important omission, that he has entirely neglected to tell us how many industries have been closed up since the National Policy was introduced. Now, Mr. Speaker, I pretend to know something about the Province of Nova Scotia, and I have taken some little pains to get information in regard to the position of that Province from one end to the other. I think I know more about it than the commissioner that was sent there, and I can tell the House pretty clearly what changes have been made, how many manufactories have been established and how many have been closed. In Yarmouth, since the protective policy was introduced, they have established a woollen mill, a duck factory, and a knitting factory. I do not know that there has been any industry closed up. In Digby County there has been nothing established since 1878. We had at that time three large tanneries, two within a stone's throw of each other, and a third not more than two miles away. They were all doing a fairly prosperous business up to the introduction of the Protective Policy; they are all closed up now, and there is not a man to be seen about them. In Annapolis County there has been nothing established, and two foundries and one organ factory have been closed. I am not sure, but I think the organ factory was removed to Truro, in the county represented by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. As regards King's County, I have not been able to get much information, but if there have been any changes made for the better, which I doubt, they have been very slight indeed, and are in no manner due to the Protective Policy. In Hants there was a cotton mill established, which is now running at the expense of the owners of the stock. They have not paid any dividend, I think—so far at all events. Whether they have or not, I am quite sure they have not made a dollar. This last year the factory was closed for some time. I do not know whether it is running now or not.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to read from the Windsor Courier a statement regarding that factory?

Mr. VAIL. I have no objection to the hon. gentleman interrupting me if I make a misstatement, but unless he can correct me, I think he asks too much, when he asks me to allow him to read the paper now.

Mr. ALLISON. I think that is the best refutation of the statement made by the hon. member.

Mr. VAIL. No doubt what the hon. gentleman says is correct in regard to the newspaper article, but we can't always rely on what appears in the newspapers. I acknowledge that a statement made of the gentleman's own knowledge would be entitled to some weight, and I shall be very glad to receive any explanations he has to make, he may know something in regard to the cotton factory that I do not know; but I know that it has not made any money, and that it was closed for a certain time this autumn, whether it is closed now or not, I am not prepared to say. The company, I was told, opened negotiations with the Upper Province manufacturers for the purpose of establishing fixed prices at which the product should be sold, and it was said that unless they were able to make this arrangement they would not be able to run the mill. That I know. In Halifax there have been three sugar refineries and one cotton mill established. The stock of the old sugar refinery is about $350,000 or $360,000. At the annual meeting held during this year, since Parliament opened, the annual statement was presented, and it showed as the result of the year's operations that the concern had lost $208,000. I think that is a pretty big loss considering that the capital is only about $360,000. The refinery in my opinion, has not been of much advantage to the stockholders, as it has only paid one small dividend since it commenced operations. The cotton mill has been running, but I do not think it has made any money or declared a dividend. One foundry has been closed. I am not quite sure whether it was closed after 1878 or about that time; but at all events it is closed now. A second one, which was a very important industry in the town of Dartmouth, where the junior member for Halifax resides, went into bankruptcy last fall. That is about all the National Policy has done for Halifax. In Shelburne, I understand, a small wollen mill has been established, which employs about half a dozen hands. There is also a trunk factory which employs four or five hands. In Queen's nothing whatever has been established; and one foundry, which was doing considerable business before the Protective Policy was introduced, has failed, and is now closed. In Lunenburg, a small woollen mill, which employs about half a dozen hands, has been established. I think that is all that the National Policy has done for that county. In Colchester, the county represented by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, a hat and cap factory, a knitting factory, and a canned milk industry, have been established. I do not think the protective policy has done very much for the last named, for I am not aware that any change was made in the duties which would help that industry very much. On the other hand, the large steel works, which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries told us the other day was one of the industries the National Policy was especially designed to build up and foster, failed last year, and the concern is in liquidation now, as my hon. friend near me says; it is in the hands of assignees. So, notwithstanding the fact that the country was called upon to pay a tax of $1.50 a ton on iron as a bounty to that company to keep it alive, it is dead now, although it was able to run before 1878, and had been running many years before that time. Besides, the Union woollen mills near Truro have failed. One would hardly suppose that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, being a member of the Government, would allow any industry in his county to fail under what he calls a National Policy. The Archibald tannery, also near Truro, which was a large concern, is now closed. There was a shoe factory which did a pretty large business there, and it is also closed. Now, after this exhibit, I should like hon. gentlemen, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries included, to tell me what the National Policy has done for the county he represents. There are more industries closed, and the most important industries in that county have been closed up since 1878. All the most important industries that were established prior to 1878 are closed. Yet I am told that the National Policy is the policy that should be carried out in the interests of the Maritime Provinces. I have inquired respecting Cumberland, and I cannot find that any new industries have been established in that county. We had woollen mills established there before the National Policy, and I recollect seeing the proprietor of one of them at the exhibition in Halifax, when he was exhibiting his cloths there after the National Policy was introduced. He told me, at that time, showing me his cloth, that he could manufacture at a profit previous to the introduction of the protective policy; that he wanted no National Policy. He said he was satisfied the inducements held out by the Government under the protective policy to invest money in different industries would result, before many years had passed, in such competition as would prove the ruin of those industries, and his words have often occurred to me in the last year or two. He was a prophet, and he exactly predicted what has taken place, for that is the injury which the National Policy has done to the industries of this country, and it is from the effects of over-competition that they are suffering at the present time. I go on to the county of Pictou. A glass factory and steel works have been established there. I believe they are doing a very fair business at the present time; at all events they are working. During the last year two of the largest tanneries in that county, which were the largest in Nova Scotia and as large as any in the Dominion, were closed; and either one of those tanneries, if I am correctly informed, employed more men than the two new industries, the glass factory and steel works put together. I ask, therefore, what has the National Policy done for Pictou county? I proceed to Antigonish, nothing established there; Guysboro, nothing there; Richmond, nothing there; Inverness, I am not quite sure about that county; but if any new industry has been established it is on a very, very small scale indeed. There has been nothing in Victoria; and I believe nothing of any consequence in Cape Breton. I ask this House why it is that hon. gentlemen, who ought to know better and who, I believe, do know better, will stand up and speak in favor of the National Policy when the result of it has been as I have stated. I will turn for one moment to the report of the commissioner who was sent out to investigate the industries of the Maritime Provinces, and read a few extracts from that report. It seems that in the county of Halifax he visited about 45 manufactories, large and small. Of this number, although his business was doubtless to get an expression of opinion in favor of the protective policy, 27 of them said nothing, 9 of them have spoken out against the National Policy, and 9 have spoken in favor of it. He says:

"The Acadia steam biscuit factory and confectionery proprietor says:— 'In 1878 this establishment only manufactured confectionery; in 1882 the biscuit business was added. We find openings for business in New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. The Upper Canadians are our most troublesome competitors. They 'slaughter' their goods in our territory, supplying customers at figures below their own prices, and selling also to retail dealers in a way that interferes with the wholesale dealer. We would have no difficulty in successfully competing, if the Western Provinces' men would only sell at western home prices. Time will, in all probability, cure this evil.'"

Here is another extensive concern of which he says:

"Macdonald & Co., extensive brass founders, steam and hot water engineers, plumbers, coppersmiths, gas fitters and hoopers, were indisposed to furnish information of any kind. This concern was started in 1865."

Now that does not look as if they were favorable to the National Policy, or that it was necessary to their existence because they had been running since 1865. Here is another person who speaks of the National Policy:

"The National Policy affects us beneficially in the candy line, but otherwise, in some respects at least, in other lines. For instance, the duty on coal is against us; only a day or two ago we paid $100 on a cargo of hard coal, of which, by the way, we use a considerable quantity. There are other articles also which occupy a place objectionable to us on the dutiable tariff list. But one can't expect everything in his own favor. Other industries than ours must share in the benefit derivable from the protective system which the National Policy supplies."

Longard Bros., steam and hot water heaters, machinists and stove fitters, remark:

"That they have plenty of work, and could do more if their facilities were extended. They make this reference to the tariff:—'The duties on articles used in our business, which we obtain from the United States, are too high. So far, we have not been able to obtain in the Dominion satisfactory articles for fittings, either in copper, brass or iron.'"

Here is another:

"R. Taylor, of the Halifax boot and shoe factory, carries on extensive works and manages with skill and prudence a very large business. His works are located on the continuation of Brunswick Street (formerly Barrack Street), and his warerooms, etc., are on Hollis Street. He has been in business fourteen years and has made considerable progress during that period, adding from time to time to his outfit machines of the latest and most improved designs. The proprietor, judging from the tenor of his remarks, is not an ardent Unionist nor yet an admirer of the National Policy. He says:—"Business is dull. Confederation is one cause of this dullness, and the National Policy is another. The duties on certain articles used in manufacturing boots and shoes, such as serge, elastic, and findings in general, is objectionable. These articles are not made in the Dominion, nor even in the United States, except, perhaps, in the case of a few articles. There is not sufficient encouragement to warrant any one engaging in their manufacture. We get our supplies from England. Serge was duty free before the National Policy came into force."

That does not say much in favor of the National Policy for that industry.

Mr. BOWELL. It shows the impartiality of the report.

Mr. VAIL. I am glad that it is impartial in one respect. He has made a pretty fair report, but he has left out, as I before said, what is a very important thing, and that is a statement of the number of factories closed in the Province of Nova Scotia since the National Policy was introduced.

"J. P. Mott & Co. carry on a large spice factory and lime and soap works in Dartmouth, but the leading proprietor was decidedly reticent, considering that neither the country nor any one or more individuals in it had any right to a knowledge of his business. That the works were started some 37 years ago is all the knowledge that could be gathered from a direct interview with Mr. Mott."

I may say knowing that gentleman I am pretty sure that is just about what he would say. Here is a statement from a firm who have always been Unionists, and who have, I believe, been friends of the present Government, and would like to be yet if they had not seen that the present policy was injuring many of the industries in the Province of Nova Scotia instead of benefiting them:—

"Gordon & Keith's furniture factory is the successor of a cabinet making business conducted prior to 1860, by Thompson & Esson, in the old-fashioned style. The new proprietors, in a little while, revolutionized the business. They secured spacious warerooms and established a factory, into which they introduced the latest machinery. Their enterprise and pluck received fitting reward in an enlarged and lucrative business, the principal market being Nova Scotia. Mr. Keith, of this firm, was pleased to remark as follows:—

I see the senior member for Halifax is present, and I am sure he will at least take what Mr. Keith says as very near the truth.—

"The National Policy operates badly in our business. It imposes duties on many things used in the manufacture of our goods, such as upholstery goods, hair-cloth, curled hair, covering materials of all kinds, British mirror plates, castors and furniture hardware generally. With respect to hair-cloth and curled hair, it is a well known fact that they are not, and as respects the latter, cannot be supplied in the Dominion. The same may be said of the mirror plates. Then, as to the castors, it is a fact that they can be purchased in the United States and laid down in Halifax, duty paid, at a lower figure than that at which Smart, of Brockville, who has undertaken their manufacture, can supply them. Then, as to the other articles of furniture hardware, so long as they are not made in the Dominion, they should at least come in free, or under a modified rate. In fact, if our tariff rates on the articles named were reduced, we could secure an entrance into the Newfoundland market. The Americans can now undersell us in our own market in the matter of hair mattresses."

Here is another:

"F. Mumford & Son, Dartmouth, engaged in the manufacture of ships' knees and in general forging. They complain that ships' knees are allowed to come into the Dominion duty free, and that the duty on coal has increased the cost of that article from $1.85 to $2.25 at the mines, and, per consequence, advanced the cost of knee manufacturing. Messrs. Mumford & Son have a commodious establishment, the heavy hammers and other appliances in which are driven by steam."

That is the only reference I shall make to these reports.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

Mr. VAIL.

Bill (No. 107) for the relief of George Louis Emil Hatzfeld (from the Senate).—(Mr. Kilvert.) On a division.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I would wish to divide the House on these Bills, but the House is so thin this evening that I do not think it would be fair to do so. Therefore, I make this statement with reference to these and any other Bills of the same character which may come up this evening.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 37) further to amend the Act to incorporate the South Saskatchewan Valley Railway Company.—(Mr. Robertson, Hamilton.)

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 97) for the relief of Fairy Emily Jane Terry (from the Senate).—(Mr. Taylor.) On a division.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. VAIL. When you left the Chair, Sir, I was referring to the different industries that had been reported upon by the commissioner appointed to make enquiry into their working in the Province of Nova Scotia. I stated that, so far as the Province was concerned, the National Policy had been of no advantage whatever, and that no industries of any consequence had been established in addition to what existed under the former policy. I did not refer to New Brunswick, because I know very little about the condition of the industries there, and because the hon. members for Queen's and Charlotte, N.B., went very fully into that subject a few days ago, and I hope their speeches will be read by every person in that Province. But I may state that the cotton manufactory in St. John, N.B., has, I understand, gone into liquidation; so that old concern, which was in active operation for several years prior to the introduction of the protective policy, and was doing a prosperous business, has had to go down under this policy, which was especially designed, the Government said, to build up and foster. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are very fond of asserting that this discussion is confined to the question of protection versus free trade. Their idea evidently is to lead the country to suppose that the policy of the Opposition is a free trade policy. Why, Mr. Speaker, to talk now about a free trade policy, when we are only about 4,500,000 people, with a debt of $250,000,000, on which we are obliged to pay interest besides raising a sufficient amount to cover our annual expenditure on public works and for carrying on the Government, would be simply nonsense. We must raise a considerable amount in this country, I am sorry so say, for a good many years to come, and a revenue tariff must necessarily, in the present state of things, be a protective tariff. Therefore I hope that hon. gentlemen who talk about protection versus free trade will in future discuss the question of protection versus a revenue tariff. Some hon. gentlemen opposite would lead the House to suppose that there was no discord at present among the different Provinces, that everything was working harmoniously, and that the people were contented, prosperous and happy. But one of the hon. gentlemen, the member for Queen's, P.E.I., who preceded me on this side, pointed out that in the city of St. John, N.B., at a meeting of the Board of Trade, very strong resolutions were passed in favor of joining the United States. In Halifax I know there is a great deal of dissatisfaction with the protective policy, and a great many people there, and I may say all over Nova Scotia, are beginning to lose hope in the future of that Province. In Prince Edward Island I find that discontent exists there also. I notice in a newspaper that the Premier of Prince Edward Island, Mr. Sullivan, announced to-day he would move an address to Queen Victoria "representing the failure of the Canadian Government to carry out that part of the terms of Confederation which requires maintenance of the steam service for mails and passengers between Prince Edward Island and the main land, and praying the Queen to compel Canada to fulfil the terms of the union and compensate Prince Edward Island for non-fulfilment in the past." That takes in the whole three Maritime Provinces, in which it is evident there is a great deal of discontent. If there is discontent in those Provinces, the present Government is to blame for it. There was no discontent of any consequence prior to the introduction of this protective policy in 1879. The people, generally speaking, were contented, they had made up their minds to make the best of Confederation, and it is lamentable that to-day these Provinces should be clamoring for some change which none of us would desire to see brought about. I intend to refer shortly to the charges made against us by hon. gentlemen opposite, of attempting to make it appear that the country is not in a prosperous state. The hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster) stated emphatically the other day that he defied any gentleman on this side to point out any statement coming from any responsible source, made by any responsible person, that the present Government had ever declared that they could make times good by Acts of Parliament. Well the hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies) read a portion of a speech made by Sir Charles Tupper in 1878, and the quotation is so apt, besides being short, that I think it will bear repetition. Sir Charles Tupper said:

"The hon. gentleman ought to know that if governments are good for anything they are good to increase the prosperity of the country by Acts of Parliament."

That is very positive and emphatic, and there can be no question as to its meaning, and ought to satisfy the member for King's, N.B., that he was not well informed on the subject. Gentlemen on the other side complain of us for saying that the people are leaving the country and that times are hard."

Well, I notice that in the debate on the Budget in 1878 the right hon. gentleman, now leader of the Government, used this language:

"It is not the tariff but the debt that makes the taxation."

Well, I think we have a debt now, and we must necessarily have taxation.

"If we incur a debt, the moment we incur it our obligations have to be carried out; and it matters not how this is done, we increase the debt pro tanto. It is the debt that makes the taxation, and the tariff only regulates the mode by which that debt can be defrayed. Hon. gentlemen opposite sneer at the statement that thousands of our people had left the country to seek employment in the United States."

Then again, in reply to Mr. Ross, who was then representing Middlesex, the right hon. gentleman said:

"He spoke also as if the depression could be denied. Who denies it? Is it denied in Ottawa; would any man who walks the streets in Ottawa deny the depression?"

Well, that is pretty strong. No doubt a good many men were at that time out of employ, but where are the men now who were engaged in the workshops then?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. At work.

Mr. VAIL. If they are, it is in the United States, or somewhere else out of this country. They have all left since 1878. Hon. gentlemen opposite ought at least to hesitate before charging us with making use of language calculated to injure the country when we say there is great depression in the country. They should have known that their high tariff could only benefit a few while the masses would be injured by it. I am now going to refer to a statement made by Sir A. T. Galt in 1876, in regard to the effect of protection upon a country, and as he is a well known authority, his remarks will, no doubt, receive attention:

"But if we are to succeed in getting immigrants to Canada we must not lose sight of the fact that it must be made attractive to them. It must be a cheap country. Immigrants must not find that it was dear as other countries which perhaps offer more advantages. That led to a consideration of the question of the high duties on imports. High rates had unquestionably made the United States a dear country, and Canada comparatively cheap, because of its moderate duties, which afford perhaps the most direct compensation for the natural advantages which the adjoining Republic possess over the Dominion. (Hear). He did not believe there was any advantage whatever in the doctrine of extreme protection. (Renewed applause). He did not believe it was possible to develop manufactures on any large scale by high duties. Our market is too limited, we have only four millions of people to supply, and it must be clear that the result of high duties would be to create an artificial industry which did not rest on its own intrinsic strength and merit. It was to be observed that protection (high duties) enhanced the cost of every other article as well as that in which a particular manufacturer might be interested. It rendered it more expensive for every manufacturer to manufacture his goods. If every thing the boot and shoe maker was protected by high duties, it was evident that his goods must be dearer. The result would be that exportation of our surplus goods to foreign countries would be impossible.

"We cannot have an export trade if the goods are artificially made dear in this country. We have in the United States a most complete example of that. There is a country which ought to be the cheapest country in the world, which has the largest amount of available land and every natural advantage, and yet by a wrong system of legislation and economic policy the people have succeeded for many years past in making it one of the dearest countries in the world instead of the cheapest."

That is the language of Sir Alexander Galt in 1876. I shall not refer to that matter further. I am now about to pass to some observations made by the junior member for Halifax, who, I am sorry to see, is not in his place. However, it is not my fault, as I gave him notice before you, Sir, left the chair at 6 o'clock, that I intended to refer to his statements. Before doing so I would just refer to one remark made by the member for Gloucester (Mr. Burns). He said:

"Gentlemen opposite did not object to the bounty for fishermen. The only thing they found fault with was that the grant was only for one year, and they insisted that the grant should be perpetual."

I am very glad that acknowledgment came from the member from Gloucester. It was doubtless the intention of the Government to give the fishermen a bounty for one year only, and that happened to be the year before, or about the time the elections were to come off. They intended to confine it to that year, but, to the credit of the Opposition, they suggested that it should be made perpetual and passed into an Act. The Government accepted the suggestion, and therefore the fishermen have the Opposition to thank for the bounty being made perpetual. I may state here that the bounty is smaller than it ought to be. The least the Government could have given the fishermen was the interest on the money received from the American Government. They have not given them that, and the fishermen have a right to complain that, up to the present time, they have not received the full sum that they were fairly entitled to. The member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) in referring to what my hon. friend from Queen's Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), said in regard to the shipping interest, stated that when comparing the shipping of Great Britain with the shipping of the Maritime Provinces, he had, in the case of Great Britain, added the steamers to the sailing ships, and in the case of the Maritime Provinces, had left the steamers out and only counted the sailing ships. My hon. friend from Queen's, P. E. I., states that that is not correct. The statement made and the calculation made by the hon. member for Queen's included both sailing ships and steamers in Great Britain, and the sailing ships and steamers in the Dominion.

Then the hon. gentleman referred to a statement made by my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson) in regard to sugar, and he undertook to make the House believe—I do not think they did believe it—that sugar was cheaper now in Canada than it could be purchased in the United States and laid down here under the Cartwright tariff. It does not require many figures to show exactly what the cost of sugar would be from the United States. In the one case, the cost of the sugar being $6.13, to deduct the drawback of $2.79 would leave $3.34, the duty on which would be $1.83½ under the Cartwright tariff. Under the present National Policy, the duty would be $3.14 consequently the difference between the price at which sugar could be purchased now and its price under the Mackenzie tariff would be just $1.30, which the consumer would get the benefit of. My hon. friend from Brant was quite right when he made the statement, and I am sure my hon. friend from Halifax did not understand the question when he undertook to show that his statement was not correct. Then, again, he referred to the banks in Nova Scotia, and he made a greater mistake there, I think. He said the increase in the capital paid up from 1869 to 1884 was 154 per cent. That may be right. I have not taken the trouble to go over that from 1869 to 1879, because I did not think it was necessary. What he desired to show was that the Maritime Provinces, or that Nova Scotia at all events, was prospering under this protective policy because the amount of paid up capital in the banks had largely increased since 1878, and because the bank deposits had increased. I have examined the paid up capital of the banks of Nova Scotia since that time, and I find by the bank statement that, in 1879, it was $4,295,872, and the amount of paid up capital at the present time is $4,098,207, which makes a difference of $197,665 less than it was in 1879. Now, that would show, according to the hon. gentleman's own argument, that the Province of Nova Scotia cannot be prospering very much if he takes this as indicating that the people have really more money now than they had at that time. But I do not think that shows it at all. I think it is the very reverse of that. Money, I think, is just like any other commodity; it is regulated by the supply and demand; and, when business is good and money is in demand, as everybody knows, money is dear, and it finds ready use in business transactions; but, when business is dull and there is nothing doing, of course people want to do the best they can with their money, and so they put it in the banks at 3½ or 4 per cent., preferring to keep it there while business is considered unsound. I think it is the best evidence we can have that business is dull and in a depressed state, and that there is no demand for money by business men, when capitalists put it in the banks. That is one reason why the amount in the Savings Bank has been increased. A great deal has been said about that, and I have said before in this House that the amount of money in the Savings Banks in Nova Scotia in no manner shows that the poorer classes of people are prospering. The bulk of the money in those banks in Nova Scotia is deposited by men of means, in order to get 4 per cent., and I know of many cases where two and three names of a family have been used in order that they might get $9,000 or $10,000 or even $12,000 into the Savings Bank and get 4 per cent., though the law prevents them from depositing more than $3,000 in their own name. That is the reason why the amount in the Savings Banks in Nova Scotia has increased so much of late years.

Mr. HESSON. They are not all poor down there then?

Mr. VAIL. I think that Nova Scotia has, perhaps, according to her population, as many wealthy men as any other Province of the Dominion; I have not the slightest doubt about that. But the wealthy men are the men who made their money before the protective policy was conceived, and these are the men who have been taking their capital out of business and depositing it in the banks, and are satisfied to get 3 and 4 per cent. rather than to run the risk of losing it in business. Why in the city of Halifax to-day, in the sugar and cotton industries, the stockholders are losing $40,000 annually for interest on their capital invested in the sugar and cotton industries. And that is the way the people of Halifax are benefitted by putting their money into industries that have been encouraged and fostered by the present Government. Then, again, the member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) said the present Government had done all they could to get reciprocity. Well, if all the Government could do was to pass an Order in Council, they were not able to do much. Now it seems to me that it is childish, it is ridiculous, for the Government to say that they have done all they could do in order to get reciprocity; they have passed an Order in Council informing the United States that when they are ready to allow certain Canadian products to go free into that country, we shall be ready to do the same thing in regard to certain of their products, but we don't as yet know whether they have transmitted this to the United States Government. Well, Sir, how long is this to last? Is it to be hands off on both sides, and that neither party will make the first move? Would it be derogatory to the character of this Government to inform the Government of the United States that we are willing to consider this question on its merits, that reciprocity would in the opinion of the Government be an advantage to both countries, and in that way show our willingness to enter upon negotiations. Do hon. gentlemen suppose that the Government of a country of 50,000,000 people are coming here to beg the Government of the Dominion to give them reciprocity? I do not want the Government of the Dominion to go down on their knees to the Government of the United States; all I want them to do is to notify the Government of the United States that they are ready to consider this question. It is an important question, and our Government should inform the Government of the United States, with as little delay as possible, that they are ready to consider it. That is the least they could do; they have not done that, and the country will hold them responsible until they go that far, or until they get an answer from the United States that they are opposed to reciprocity. The people of the Maritime Provinces are very much interested in this question. Every hon. member in this House from Nova Scotia knows that the United States is the natural market for the products of the Maritime Provinces, and if we are shut out from that market it will certainly be detrimental to the interests of the business community of Nova Scotia. In the history of that Province there never was a period of ten years when it enjoyed more prosperity than it did under the reciprocity treaty with the United States, and I believe it was equally advantageous to the people of that country. It had the effect of giving free interchange of commodities and the effect was good in many ways. When the people traded with each other a good feeling prevailed which was an advantage to both countries. In referring to banks the other night, the hon. member for Halifax neglected to state two or three things in connection with the banks which, I think, would go further to show that business is not in such a prosperous state in the city of Halifax as he would have us believe. For the first time in a good many years the principal bank in Halifax has had to take $130,000 from their reserve fund in order to pay their dividends and losses. Another bank has been obliged to reduce its dividend, during the last six months, from 3 to 2 per cent., paying 5 per cent. for the year instead of 6 or 7 per cent. it has formerly paid. Does that look as if business was in a very prosperous state? I noticed the other day in one of the Montreal papers that the Union Bank, which had a subscribed capital of $1,000,000 and only $500,000 paid up, at their general meeting last month decided that they would ask for an alteration in their Act to enable them to reduce their capital from $1,000,000 to $500,000. Does that look as if business was in a very prosperous state, and money in great demand? I think not, Sir. Then he stated that the merchants of Halifax were doing a much larger business than formerly. Well now I do not believe that the senior member for Halifax would make that statement. I know something about Halifax, I know something about Nova Scotia, and I do not hesitate to say from the best information I can obtain that business of all kinds has not been so depressed as it is at present for many years, many old business men say 40 years. I have known when times were considered hard, when business in some particular branches of industry was in a depressed condition. It has often happened that when the ship-building business was dull the fishing business was good; when the fishing business was bad the lumber business was good; and when the lumber business was bad the mining business was good, and so on. But I have never seen the time when the depression was so general as it is at the present time. I speak thus confidently because I know what I am speaking about. I have always had a very great objection to leading the House to suppose that we are very much worse off in Nova Scotia than other portions of the Dominion; but when hon. gentlemen state publicly in this House that business is in a flourishing state, that men are doing a larger business than they have been heretofore, I feel bound to state that that is not the case. The best evidence we have that business is not in a thriving state in Halifax is the fact that real estate of all kinds is not worth, upon an average, more than 60 per cent. of what it was fifteen years ago. Wharf property, which is the best index of the state of trade, is not worth more than half as much as formerly. I know that within the last two or three years wharf properties, that sold seven or eight years ago for from $30,000 to $40,000—$20,000 paid down, leaving a balance of about $15,000 on the property—have within the last two or three years been taken back by the mortgagee for the face of the mortgage, say $14,000 or $15,000. I know that in several other instances wharf property has depreciated to the same extent. I do not believe any business man in Halifax will say that business is in a satisfactory condition if I except the junior member for Halifax. Then the business men of Halifax depend largely upon the West India trade; but the policy of the Government with reference to sugar has, I may say, almost ruined the West India trade, on which Halifax so largely depends. The duty on sugar is so arranged that it is an advantage to import it from Germany, from China, and from Brazil, and this beet root sugar is used now by the manufacturers, instead of the lighter grades of sugar that have less saccharine matter than the lower grades, and the consequence has been that sugars from the West Indies have not been used for refining purposes, and manufacturers have imported nearly all the sugar they have used during the last few years from the ports I have named.

Mr. BOWELL. That is not on account of its strength.

Mr. VAIL. It is because the Government have so regulated the duty that a large proportion of the duty is paid on the ad valorem cost. The consequence is that manufacturers buy low grade sugar, and they can import such sugar at a much lower rate and manufacture it to more advantage than they can the higher grade sugars I have mentioned, or rather the brighter sugars, which were formerly imported from the West Indies. The Government have not only done this; they have done something worse. They granted last year $50,000 as a subsidy for a steamship line to run between Germany and Halifax to bring this very sugar, at 14 shillings a ton freight to Halifax, which sugar is killing out the West India trade, and they thus added to the trouble caused by their outrageous policy in regard to the sugar duties. If there is anything for which the Government is responsible it is for the prostration and almost complete ruin of the West India trade.

Mr. BOWELL. Does the hon. gentleman not know that the ad valorem duty on sugar is higher now than when he was in office.

Mr. VAIL. On certain grades it is.

Mr. BOWELL. On all grades.

Mr. VAIL. I do not think so. If the change was not in the interest of refiners, I should like to know how the refiners at Montreal are able to manufacture now, when they said they could not manufacture—I believed they could—under the old tariff.

Mr. BOWELL. I suppose the hon. gentleman knows that the duty is now higher on refined sugar?

Mr. VAIL. We can discuss that matter at some other time, when I shall be able to point out a further dereliction of duty on the part of the Government in regard to the sugar duties. Before closing my remarks I would ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if he thinks the National Policy, or the protective policy, has assisted the ship-building interests in Nova Scotia.

Mr. McLELAN. Yes.

Mr. VAIL. How then does it happen that the ship building business has fallen off this last year. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if the National Policy has helped the carrying trade.

Mr. McLELAN. The carrying trade has increased in the Dominion.

Mr. VAIL. It has been very dull this last year; very little money has been made out of it for several years, and the feeling of ship owners is that the time is not far distant when there will be not so much in the carrying trade by sailing ships as heretofore. I hope it may be otherwise. Does the hon. gentleman suppose for a moment that the National Policy has helped the fishermen. It has helped them in this way: It has taxed their food and the canvas for the sails of their vessels, and their cordage. It has injuriously affected their business, and that business in the Province of Nova Scotia has been not so good as in former years. There has been a fair catch, but the prices are much lower than formerly. Then I should like to know if the National Policy has helped the lumberman. There is nothing the lumberman uses that has not been increased in price by that policy. That industry was in a state of depression last year, as every lumberman knows, and is still. Another business of considerable importance is that connected with gypsum. I am quite sure the hon. Minister will not say that the National Policy has helped that business. I know it is said that it helps the coal miners to some extent. If it does, it is to a very limited extent, for everything they use has been made more expensive by the protective policy. I should like to know from the Government, which professes to be very sincere in regard to the coal policy, how much Nova Scotia coal they have purchased, or the Minister of Public Works has purchased, for the purpose of heating the public buildings at Ottawa during the last three or four years. If I am correctly informed, every ton of coal used is American coal. It appears to me, if those hon. gentlemen were sincere and desirous of fostering and protecting our coal trade, they would naturally obtain Nova Scotia coal and set the consumers of Ontario a good example. They have not done so, and I think they are not entitled to credit for encouraging that industry. Another important industry is the exportation of wood, an industry which cannot have been assisted in any way by the National Policy. Of course, in the western portion of Nova Scotia, as I have said, our natural market is the United States, for the reason that the Upper Provinces do not want, and cannot take, what we have to export. Our vessels running across to the United States with lumber and cordwood naturally want to bring back wheat, flour and breadstuffs of different kinds as cargo. The duty on breadstuffs is a very great tax upon them, and they are obliged to pay it or purchase flour that comes down by rail from the Upper Provinces at a great disadvantage. These are all disadvantages under which our people labor, and it is not to be wondered at that they should prefer a different policy to that which is carried out at the present time by the Government. I do not pretend to say it would be possible for this Government or any other Government to arrange a tariff that would bear evenly upon all the Provinces of the Dominion. I acknowledge it would be very difficult and almost impossible to do so; but I do not hesitate to say that if the Government had made up their mind to so readjust the tariff as to make it bear as heavily as possible on the Maritime Provinces, they could not have done it more effectually, or framed a tariff which would be more injurious to our people than the present protective, or what is called National Policy. It is, I am sorry to say, a policy which will, to a certain extent, have to be carried out in the future, in consequence of the heavy liabilities imposed on the Dominion, and the large amount of revenue which will have to be raised. We all know that, and I hope the time is not far distant when, if there is not a change of Government, this Government will, at all events, get the scales removed from their eyes, and see as we see on this side; when they will so arrange or adjust their tariff policy that in the future the people of the Maritime Provinces will only be taxed what is fair and reasonable. Mr. Speaker, I desire to thank the House for the patient hearing they have given me. I have spoken under great difficulties, for I am physically weak to-day, and I thank the House for the consideration they have shown me.

Mr. ALLISON. It was not my intention to make any remarks on the question before the House, but as the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail), in speaking this afternoon, referred to some industries in the county from which I come, I asked the privilege of reading from a newspaper which is published in that county by a gentleman belonging to the Reform party, who was a representative of that county in the last Parliament of the Local Legislature, but who has for the present retired from politics and entered the field of journalism. The hon. member very properly declined to allow himself to be interrupted when he was speaking, and I now wish to read a short extract from that paper, referring to the industries in the town of Windsor. I may say that the hon. member for Digby confined his remarks principally to the cotton factory established in that town, and if I am not mistaken, was incorrect in his statement that that factory was closed, even for any length of time. If it was closed at all, I am confident it was but for a few days, for the purpose of stock-taking, or repairs, or something of that kind. He has spoken of the distressed condition of that institution. I express my opinion that his leader, the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), had as much to do with the erection of that factory as any person in the county I represent. He spoke in the constituency in 1881, when the matter was under consideration, and succeeded in convincing the people that so much money was to be made by the manufacture of cotton that a good many of his own friends, with their usual keen eye to business and their enterprise in such matters, put their money in with others, and the factory was established. The predictions of the hon. leader of the Opposition have been as usual, unfulfilled; as the shareholders who were to be "bloated monopolists" have not yet received large dividends; and cotton has been unusually low in price to the consumer, who was the object of his sympathy. The president was my opponent at the election, and his platform, as laid down on nomination day, was that he "was a follower of Edward Blake." With regard to the other industries, I should like to read this article. It is headed "False Statements," and appears in the Windsor Courier of 3rd February, 1885:

"The Free Press, published at Ottawa, under date of January 20, contains the following:—

"Closed factories: Having met with heavy losses during the past two years, the large furniture factory at Windsor, N. S., has been closed. For the same reason the Windsor iron foundry has shut down, and hundreds of unemployed mechanics are now crying for bread. Oh, Sir Leonard, thou false prophet, why did we allow ourselves to be deceived by the predictions from thy oily tongue in 1882?"

That is from the Free Press, Ottawa, to which the Courier, published by a Reformer, replies:

"We are in a position to give the above a flat denial."

Then, after the next sentence or two, referring to the fact that both the furniture factory and the iron foundry had closed for a brief period, as is their custom, for the purpose of taking stock and making repairs, the Courier continues:

"It is a libel on Windsor to say that hundreds of unemployed mechanics are now crying for bread. If there is a town in Nova Scotia, in Canada—yes, in all America—where less poverty exists than in Windsor, we should like to know where it is situated. Beggars are never seen on our streets, and we doubt if there is a family in our town which is not making a comfortable living. If there is such a family it is on account of sickness or from some other reason than want of employment."

The article, after a reference to the mechanics of Windsor, proceeds:

"We know many of them who have quite large sums to their credit in the savings and other banks. Such untruth and trash may go quietly broadcast over Canada in the columns of what is called a respectable journal, and receive no contradiction. But in the interests of our town, and in the interests of truth, we will nail it as a falsehood when it comes to our knowledge. We wish every community in Canada was as comfortable as that of Windsor is at the present time."

The hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) this afternoon did me the kindness to say that he would pay some heed to any remarks or explanations I would make, and for that remark I sincerely thank him. I think he will not pay less heed to Mr. T. B. Smith, with whom he is well acquainted, a member of his own party, who voted against me at the last election, and who is the editor and proprietor of this paper. The hon. gentleman refers to the fact that three tanneries in the county of Digby have been closed since the National Policy came into operation. I may say that the only steam tannery we have ever had in our county has been established under the National Policy, and is in a prosperous condition. The hon. gentleman, speaking from a sectional point of view—as I am always sorry to hear any one speak in this House—continually referred to the depression which existed in Nova Scotia, and to the unfair treatment which that Province has received at the hands of this Dominion. I merely wish to reply to this remark by reminding him of the fact that his leader, who I am sorry is not in his place, invariably makes the statement, when he refers to this subject, and considers himself prepared to prove it, that Nova Scotia has received too much from the Dominion, and that it is Ontario, his native Province, that has to pay the piper. I would also remind him that his memory is slightly at fault with regard to the number of manufacturing industries in the Province of Nova Scotia. He made the statement that there were only two sugar refineries in Nova Scotia. He must have forgotten that the molasses refinery of his intimate friend, Mr. Jones, has been enlarged and increased into a sugar refinery.

Mr. VAIL. I said there were three sugar refineries.

Mr. ALLISON. He also referred to the fact that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in conjunction with Mr. Howe, acting as the confidential friend and financial adviser of that lamented gentleman, secured better terms for Nova Scotia. I would like to refer him to another fact in connection with that point. Mr. Power, for some years after the era of Confederation the Liberal member for Halifax, speaking at a public meeting in Nova Scotia, from experience with, and observation of, both parties—while I admit he still adhered to the Liberal party and deprecated the idea that Confederation had been brought about—made this statement: "Nor have I any hope from a change of Government at Ottawa"—this was when the Government of the right hon. leader of the present Government was in power before—"nor have I any hope, he said, from a change of Government at Ottawa," as the leaders of the Opposition—referring to the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), and other leading men of the party—"have opposed, step by step, and inch by inch every concession made to Nova Scotia." I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the House, for having allowed me this brief period of explanation, and I thank the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Tassé), who I believe has the floor, for giving way to me for this short time.

Mr. TASSÉ. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, when I heard the hon. members opposite bewailing, one after the other, in tones which were steadily becoming more and more doleful, on the woes of the country, indulging in the most gloomy predictions as to the future which lies in store for us, I have asked myself if we were not attending a celebrated meeting of the Constituent Assembly. On that occasion a great tribune was trying to impose on France a most excessively onerous tax, a tax which was to take from each individual one-fourth part of his income, and which, for that reason, has been called the "contribution of the fourth." And the great speaker beseeching France to meet the engagements which were then bearing down heavily on the country, concluded by these words: "Bankruptcy, hideous bankruptcy is at our door; it threatens to consume you, yourselves, your property and your honor, and during that time you are deliberating." Indeed, Mr. Speaker, my intention is not to compare the hon. members opposite to Mirabeau haranguing the Constituent Assembly on that occasion, but when I heard them bemoaning the country on its woes, I have asked myself if we were not really attending that celebrated meeting. Indeed, for the last few days, and even until a very late hour of the night, we hear of nothing but bankruptcy, we hear of nothing but misery, we hear of nothing but distress, laborers without work, wholesale expatriation and onerous burdens. Until now the hon. members who spoke had only evoked that spectre in the language of Shakespeare. It was to be the lot of the member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret)—and I regret that circumstances have precluded my answering him at once—to lament in our own beautiful French language. His speech deserves more than ordinary attention, for it appears to me to be the true expression of the sentiments of the small Pléade Rouge which, on this same question, has reflected all the colors of the rainbow. The speech of the hon. member may be reduced to three main propositions, although these are somewhat swamped by numerous incidental remarks. In the first place, according to him and according to every Liberal who has addressed this House, even according to the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail), who has just spoken, protection has been injurious to the country, and has been a cause of ruin to Canada, and a cause of industrial and agricultural distress. Secondly, he has stated that our expenditure and our debt are increasing at an alarming rate; and thirdly, the construction of the Pacific Railway is being pushed too rapidly, in his opinion. But, up to this time, such statements have been contradicted in a manner so clear, so conclusive, that it may seem useless, at this advanced stage of the discussion, to undertake a refutation.

Nevertheless, as this speech is the only one which has been pronounced in French on the great question which is now occupying the attention of the House, I believe it is our duty to prove to our friends opposite that whenever they feel inclined to fire on the Government troops, there will always be some one ready to fire back, and sometimes with very good effect. Mr. Speaker, I have asked myself the following questions: Is it very true, from actual results, from the experience of the last few years, is it very true that protection has been a cause of ruin to Canada, a source of misery and source of financial embarrassments of all kinds? Yes, answer the members opposite; yes, answer the opponents of the Government; yes, answer all those who have become blind through party spirit, or who prefer abstract theories to the teachings of history. But against that opinion, which is that of a small minority, we have the opinion of the great mass of the electors, not only of a Province in particular, but of all the Provinces in the Confederation. We have, I say, the opinion of the manufacturers, of the capitalists, of the workmen, of the agriculturists, who, on two different occasions, in 1878 and in 1882, have upheld, by a very large majority, the principle of agricultural and industrial protection. Hon. members opposite say that we are in the midst of a crisis. Well, let us compare for a moment the situation of Canada in 1877-78 with the situation which the establishment of the protective system has given to this country. In 1878—nobody has yet forgotten that dismal date, that fatal date—our manufactures were closing one after the other; in all parts of the country there was nothing to be seen except laborers without work, clamoring, not as the Romans of old, for panem et circenses, bread and shows, but for bread and work, what is wanted by the workmen of Canada. A mournful pall shrouded the country; discouragement had taken hold of the stoutest hearts; and I, for one, will never forget the desolation which overwhelmed the city of Ottawa—a very melancholy picture, if compared to that which is to be seen to-day. What was the main cause of such an economical disaster? It can be easily explained. At that time we had no protection, our markets were almost wholly in the hands of our mighty neighbors, into the hands of the United States. The late hon. Minister of Finance himself had to admit that our Canadian market had become a slaughter market for American produce, and the only proof I want of that fact is the speech which he delivered as a Finance Minister, in 1876:

"We know, Sir, that when the price of American staples are high ours will be high also. When labor is dear in the United States it will be dear in Canada; when cheap, it will tend powerfully to make it cheap in Canada also. And it is no source of wonder that when the cost of production becomes small in the United States, it should react more or less unfavorably on persons engaged in similar manufactures on this side. I do not purpose at this present moment to enter fully into the discussion raised as to Canada being a sacrifice or slaughter market. But I must admit candidly that I have no doubt that the distress of our manufacturers has been aggravated, though I will not say to what extent, by this cause."

So that we have, from the hon. member himself, who was then Minister of Finance, the admission that one of the causes of the industrial crisis was due to the fact that the Canadian market was almost wholly under the control of our mighty neighbors, the people of the United States. I know very well that the hon. member for East York, not later than two years ago, during his visit to Scotland, at Greenock, told the inhabitants of that place that his defeat at the elections of 1878 was due to the fact that there had been in the country a succession of bad crops from the day on which he had taken the reins of the Administration. He said:

"Referring to politics, he said he assumed office in 1873. For five years following they had very bad crops, and the lumber trade was very low, the trade being altogether in a wretched condition. This naturally led people to propose new theories for the formation of happiness and the bettering of trade."

I am very sorry for the hon. member for East York, but he has been trying to explain his downfall by a thoroughly imaginary cause. It is not true that there had been a series of bad crops from 1873 to 1878. And, for the moment, I want no other proof but the words which he, himself, then First Minister, was putting into the mouth of His Excellency at the opening of the Sessions of 1874, 1876 and 1878. In 1874, the Speech from the Throne contained the following:—

“Notwithstanding the commercial depression which, owing to exceptional causes, has prevailed to a certain extent during the year, we are glad to know that the general prosperity of the country has not been seriously affected thereby.”

In 1876 similar language was used:

“We have reason to congratulate ourselves on an abundant crop.”

And in 1878:

“I am happy to congratulate you on the abundant crop which has been gathered in all parts of Canada.”

Is not that sufficiently conclusive? So much for speeches from the Throne. In 1875 there was nothing said about crops in the speech from His Excellency, but the Minister of Finance (Sir Richard Cartwright), stated, in his Budget Speech, that the crops had been abundant. Let me quote the following:—

“The excellent crop with which we have been favored last year will have a very favorable effect on the population, both commercial and agricultural.”

In 1877 the then Minister of Finance (Sir Richard Cartwright) held opinions which were quite the reverse of what was said by his late chief, the hon. member for East York. He said:

“The five or six years which have elapsed since we last took the census, with the great exception of the last, were years of prosperity.”

In 1883, however, the hon. member for South Huron was very far from singing to the same tune. Really, such frequent contradictions can neither be explained or excused. What did he say?

“The Mackenzie Government were condemned because the country was not so prosperous as they would have desired it to be during the last years of their administration. That was the common fate of all politicians.”

On the one hand, we find the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) saying, in Scotland, that if he had lost power at the general elections of 1878 it was due to the bad crops which we had during the three or four years which immediately followed his Administration. And on the other hand, we see his Minister of Finance stating exactly the reverse. We find the speeches from the Throne in 1874, 1875, 1876 and 1878 stating quite the contrary. Therefore, when it is stated that, if the Mackenzie Administration had lost the power at the elections of 1878, it was because there has been in the country a succession of bad crops, we may say that such a statement is false, for these bad crops have never existed. Why seek difficulties where there are none? Mr. Mackenzie has lost power: First, because he has badly administered the country, and secondly, because he refused to establish protection, for which the electors were clamoring. If I remember well, it is a fact that at that time the industry of the country was in such distressful straits, that only two industries—if it is possible to give them such a name—were in a thriving condition. They were the soup-kitchen industry and the official assignees' industry. These two are about the only industries which have thrived under the Liberal Administration. Well, Mr. Speaker, what has happened since? The Conservative party, so ably presided over by the right hon. leader of the Government, made a promise to the country while they were occupying the Opposition benches, and they formulated a complete political programme. They promised if they came to power to adopt a policy of protection to the agricultural, manufacturing, mining and other interests. That is just what has been done. We went before the people in 1878 with that policy, and the people were so fully satisfied, so fully convinced that a radical change in the economical condition of the country was needed, that they elected the Conservative members by an immense majority; not only in one Province, not only in one particular section of the country, but in all the Provinces from east to west, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. In 1879 the protective tariff was established in its broadest form, and since then we have been ratifying it from Session to Session. A few changes have been effected, but every one of them was inspired by the protective idea. If it is important to give to our system all the stability and the permanency which is consistent with our fiscal system, on the other hand, we must know how to adapt it to new wants, to new circumstances, which may arise. In such a matter as this, expediency may, with advantage, play a great part. For the second time, in 1883, we have consulted the electorate. Have the electors told us that that policy did not suit them; that it was such as to cause prejudice to the country? Not at all. The electors have come to the same conclusion, and that was, that the protective policy was just what was wanted by Canada. Most of the old Conservative members who had occupied seats in this House from 1878 to 1882 were re-elected by large majorities. And since that time I am not aware that our opponents, the members opposite, have made much headway. To-morrow even, if a plebiscit was to be submitted to the people on that one question of the tariff, eight-tenths of the population would pronounce in favor of the maintenance of the protective system. What the Conservative party then proposed, that is to say, to throw off the yoke of the foreigner, of our American neighbors, that result has been obtained, and the statistics laid before the House point out that there has been a great revival in the industry of the country. Indeed, if we examine a few figures, and these statistics are far below the exact truth, we find that the number of manufactures during the first five years which have lapsed between 1878 and 1884 has been increased by 595; that the number of operatives which have been employed has increased by over 34,000; that the aggregate of wages paid yearly has increased by over $10,000,000; that the industrial production has increased by over $52,000,000; that the amount of capital invested in the various industries of the country has increased by over $29,000,000. And these statements, which have been prepared by commissioners duly authorised by the Government, let it be understood, only apply to about two-thirds of the manufactures in Canada. The hon. member for Lotbinière has mentioned a few cities, in order to prove that he is right in stating that the country is suffering from an industrial crisis, and he said to us: Why, look at Montreal, look at Hamilton, look at St. John, look at Halifax: you will find there traces of a great crisis, of a great depression. In the first place, neither Halifax nor St. John are industrial cities, properly speaking; they are rather maritime cities. However, Halifax has a good number of thriving industries, and the city of St. John is recovering as rapidly as could be expected from the terrific conflagration which came very near destroying it in 1877. Let my hon. friend consult the report which I have just mentioned, and he will find it to contain very reassuring statistics on that point. Carried away, as he was by party spirit, I am surprised, however, to see that my hon. friend has not included Toronto in that list, and I am convinced that our friends from Toronto will feel greatly slighted when they hear that they have not been put on an equal footing with the city of Montreal, for we all know that the capital of the Province of Ontario has the ambition to follow in the footsteps of the great city of Montreal, and strives to become its equal, if not its superior. But I understand why Toronto has not been mentioned; it is because not very long ago the hon. leader of the Opposition was making a speech in the capital of Ontario on the economic situation of the country, and he said to the electors: It is true there is depression in other parts of the country, but I am happy to make an exception as regards Toronto. Moreover, the Globe, which is the principal organ of the Reform party in that country, not later than the 28th of December, 1884, published the following:—

"The progress of this city must be a cause of deep gratification to all Torontonians. The assessment, which is the most trustworthy index of the value of property, has gone up by leaps and bounds. In 1873 the assessment was $44,764,882, and in the year just closing it is $85,212,318. What makes this progress satisfactory is that it is all substantial. There is not to be discerned one sign that the assessment is anywhere above the selling value or that values are inflated. Toronto's population has increased so rapidly that suburb after suburb has been built up to and absorbed. Places which a few years ago were 'commons' or large vacant lots are now covered with handsome houses, facing block-paved and well-lighted streets. One who knows the city well, returning after a few months' absence, finds important changes on every hand. The progress made is not the result of a temporary boom, but is caused by the steadily-growing importance of Toronto as an industrial and educational centre."

But if the hon. member has not spoken of Toronto, he has spoken of Montreal. My hon. friend is generally better informed on what takes place in the country, and more especially in the Province of Quebec, to which he belongs; for if it is true that the trade of the city of Montreal has not been so extensive in 1884 as in former years, it is no less true that progress, and considerable progress, has been achieved in that city. Indeed, if the giant who moves about at the foot of Mount Royal does not extend his arms as rapidly as he did in the past, he is far from feeling drowsy. I might quote the figures of the commission. It may be said that these figures have been cooked for official purposes; but I have others, which will prove that the progress, in the city of Montreal last year, has been rapid. And as a proof I shall quote the report of the building inspector. It states that during last year 318 new houses have been built, representing a capital of over $1,000,000, and among these 318 new buildings we find, 5 warehouses, 4 manufactures and 24 stores. In 1883, the preceeding year, only 260 buildings had been erected, of which there were 4 schools and churches, 7 warehouses, 9 manufactures, 2 shops and 23 stores; the rest were tenements and other lodgings, which makes a difference of 58 buildings in favor of the year 1884 as compared to 1883. The Montreal Board of Trade is far from viewing the situation from as gloomy a standpoint as my hon. friend. On the contrary, it does not hesitate to announce a revival in all branches of trade. Here is what is said in the last report of that institution:

"Over-production in some classes of manufactures, and a general fall in values, have produced their inevitable results. But your council are confident that Canada has not experienced the wave of depression in any great degree as the merchants and manufacturers of Great Britain and the United States. A policy of caution in imports has characterized the business of the year, and should, in the opinion of your council, be continued for some time longer. The prospects for the future are by no means discouraging. The over-production of cottons and woollens especially is almost exhausted, and mills are resuming work, while the fact that the grain crop of last year remains to an unusual extent unsold, justifies the hope that the coming season will witness a revival of trade in all departments."

Besides that, my hon. friend has evidently forgotten, or has never known, that last year the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) was making a speech before the Young Men's Reform Club of the city of Montreal, and he used the following words, which are far from justifying the statement that the city of Montreal is on the verge of ruin and bankruptcy:

"So, it would be unworthy of any statesman; it would be unworthy of any public man not to admit, as I admit most fully and thankfully, that within the last seventeen years there has been on the whole, in many respects, very considerable progress. In that time Canada has developed a magnificent system of internal communication. Very great improvements have been made in many parts of the country in our whole system of agriculture. There is no doubt whatever in my mind, and I am glad to believe it, that a very large class of our fellow countrymen are living in much greater wealth and comfort than they were a few years ago. More than that, I know that there are certain specially favored localities in which very great absolute progress has been made. Looking at the city of Montreal, for instance; remembering what Montreal was twenty-five years ago, and comparing it with what your city is to-day, I cannot help paying a tribute of unfeigned respect to the energy."

I regret that I have lost the rest of that speech, but I know that it is in keeping with the above. Now, we all know that while the grain trade—which enters so largely in the transactions of Montreal—has diminished last year, there is only a temporary depression. We all know that at the present time great elevators are being built in the eastern part of Montreal, that enormous quantities of grain, which is destined for them, have been stored at Port Arthur. We know that millions of bushels of grain are to be sent from Manitoba and the North-West to Montreal, and I am convinced that, with the Ottawa route, which must eventually be built, and which will be the route of the future, and with the route of the St. Lawrence, the city of Montreal will be enabled to pursue its destiny, which is to become the rival of New York, as far as the grain trade is concerned. Now, Hamilton has been spoken of. I know very well that there has been a certain depression in the cotton industry during last year. We all know, however, that this depression, which is due to the overstocking of the market, is drawing to an end. We all know that most of the mills, which had either been totally closed or were only working on half time, are about to resume or are now resuming operations. There was too much cotton goods of a certain class produced; the production is to be diversified hereafter. But while there has been a local depression in the cotton industry at Hamilton, on the other hand we find a considerable increase in the other industries of that city: the stove factories, iron bridge factories, manufactures of agricultural implements, and many others. That city, I am glad to state, has always been one of the most important of the manufacturing centres in this country. I think that city was the first in the country to hoist the flag of protection. That city was the birth place of the late lamented Mr. Buchanan, who was the first apostle of protection in Canada. And under the Mackenzie regime, when the Liberal party commanded a large majority in the country, such was the force of the protectionist sentiment in Hamilton, that both the reformist members of that city were the first to ask for a protection tariff; and even the Hamilton Times, which, up to this day, is one of the principal organs of the Liberal party, was also one of the first to hoist the flag of protection. But the Liberals having betrayed that patriotic cause, having burned what they had worshipped, the city of Hamilton has since considered that its best interests would be better promoted if they were defended by Conservative members. Besides, this is the opinion of all cities having a certain importance, if we except Kingston. The hon. member for Digby, if I understand him rightly, has told us that the city of Ottawa, which I have the honor to represent here, was also undergoing a period of depression. This is not the first time that I have heard slanders against this city. On many occasions, since the adoption of the protective tariff, I have heard hon. members opposite making the most gloomy pictures of the city of Ottawa. The truth is, that in 1878, when the Liberal party was in power, there was universal misery, distress and desolation here. The truth is, that at that time, there were hundreds, thousands of laborers without work. But, thanks to the change which has been wrought, the city of Ottawa, since that dismal date, has resumed its onward march towards progress. In 1882 we were only 26,228 inhabitants, but in 1883 we were 27,645; in 1884 we were 30,079, that is to say, only during last year we have added 3,146 to our population. The assessment which, in 1883, only reached $11,105,002 amounted last year to over $11,500,000, or an increase within one year of nearly one half million of dollars. The other day the hon. member for South Huron

(Sir Richard Cartwright) laid great stress particularly on the statements prepared by the school inspectors, in order to show that the population of Ontario had decreased. These incomplete and inaccurate statistics give a false idea of the situation. I want no other proof of that fact than the article published by the Globe on the development of the population in Ontario, which article was quoted the other night by the member for Brockville (Mr. Wood). Well, according to these same figures, the city of Ottawa had last year several hundred children attending school more than it had the preceding year. Another good way of finding out the situation of the city and the misery which may prevail within its limits. Each year, in our city—and I suppose the same thing is done elsewhere—a certain amount of taxes is remitted to the rate-payers, who are too poor to pay them. Last year the amount of taxes which were remitted to the poor rate-payers was $2,000 less than in previous years. And if another proof was wanted, I might appeal to—I will not say an authority, for I do not accept that newspaper as an authority—but I might appeal to the statement of a newspaper which is not disposed to show in bright colors whatever it can show in dark colors; I refer to the Free Press, the organ of the Liberal party in this city. Here is what it said on the 25th of December, 1884, with regard to the city of Ottawa:

“Ottawa is to-day the fastest growing city populously in the whole Dominion—it is growing twice as fast proportionately as is Toronto. That growth appears to have increased since the municipal census was taken a few months ago. Strangers who recall Ottawa as she was four or five years ago, and contrast the rush and bustle on our streets to-day are agreeably surprised. All her vacant houses are now filled up and new ones are being erected on every hand—the coming summer promises in house building to be the busiest the city ever witnessed.

The detractors of Ottawa had better hurry up, for their day will soon be gone. Ottawa's advantages are now no longer hidden. Ottawa is the best distributing point for manufacturers in the whole Dominion and offers most abundant and cheapest motive power. Ottawa is nearer by a hundred miles the whole Canadian sea board, Maritime Provinces and Quebec, than is Toronto; she communicates directly with the Inter-colonial and Grand Trunk systems to the New England States and the Canadian Maritime Provinces. The Canada Atlantic gives her a short road to Boston, the most important market for Eastern Canada; the St. Lawrence and Ottawa gives a short road to New York, and the projected Ottawa and Waddington Railway a shorter road still. The Ontario and Quebec and the Grand Trunk connect Ottawa with the Western States and Western Ontario, the former direct, the latter by a short line. The Canadian Pacific main line places Ottawa as near Winnipeg by rail as Toronto is, and much nearer that the whole peninsula of Western Ontario; besides, Ottawa is on the main line, whereas Toronto is on a siding. Under these circumstances, in a few years' time, Ottawa naturally expects emigration of the Western Ontario manufacturers to this city.”

There is what the opponents of the protective tariff are forced to admit; here is what is said by these newspapers which are systematically and almost daily underrating the great benefits which have been the result of the great fiscal revolution, of the great economical revolution, which has been created under the auspices of the Conservative party. Up to this moment I have only spoken about cities; let us now speak about the country places. The other day the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), in the speech which he delivered in this House, has told us that the condition of the agricultural class was all that could be desired, except that the prices had fallen—that the farmers were in a thriving condition. I believe that by making that admission the hon. member gave up the whole case of the Opposition, and that by so doing he has unwillingly paid a solemn homage to the policy of the Conservative party. However, this admission should not surprise us. I do not think that the economical situation of the Province of Quebec has ever been any better than what it has been for the last few years. All that we can complain of is that our granaries are crammed with grain that has not been sold. One would think that we were living at the time of King Pharaoh, when Joseph was filling up the granaries of Egypt. The situation leaves so little to be desired that it seems people have solved the problem of making agriculture a paying business, of having it recognised as the most free, the most lasting, and the most independent of callings. The Canadian farmer begins to understand the importance, or rather the necessity, of giving up the old hackneyed practices, diversifying his culture and of undertaking cattle raising on a larger scale. As a consequence, the exportation of cattle, as well as the exportation of butter and cheese, has increased of late years. Notwithstanding what was said by the member for West Elgin, it was the Conservative party which was the first to protect cheese, by putting a duty of 3 cents on it. Hardly five years ago usury was one of the great plagues in our country places. Well, since the last few years, that canker has almost completely disappeared. To-day the farmer who can offer fair security can obtain money at a comparatively low rate of interest—5, 6 or 7 per cent.—whereas formerly they were paying 8, 10 and 12 per cent. I have taken the trouble to examine the reports published by loan societies and building societies in the Province of Ontario, for the year which has just ended. And what do we find in these returns? Several of these societies have each loaned, on real estate in the Province of Ontario, amounts as high as two or three millions; the value of the soil is increasing; they have lost but very little on their investments; they have paid large dividends to their shareholders; there was but very little arrears in the reimbursements of the loans they have made. I may say as much about the Credit Foncier, which has already lent a million dollars and has only suffered a few insignificant losses. This is certainly the best criterion of the agricultural prosperity which exists in the country. Now, Mr. Speaker, a great deal has been said about bankruptcy; a great deal has been said about failures which have taken place in the country. No doubt there has been a great number, and I am sorry the number is so large; but we must not forget that the number of failures in the country is a great deal smaller than it was during any one year under the Mackenzie Administration. In 1884 failures in Canada only reached the amount of $18,000,000, while in 1875, under the Mackenzie Administration, it was as high as $28,843,000. Between 1875 and 1879, 9,000 persons have stopped payment, and their liabilities amounted to $13,500,000; while, from 1879 to 1884, 5,000 persons stopped payment and their liabilities amounted to $57,000,000, which makes, in favor of the present Administration, a difference of $76,000,000. I know very well that the hon. member for South Huron, in a speech which he delivered at Napanee, in December, 1883, has stated that that year was the year in which there was the greatest number of failures. Here are his own words:

“The list of bankruptcies began to swell to such proportions that the list for 1883 would prove greater than that of the worst year of the depression, when Mr. Mackenzie was in power.”

It is very evident that the hon. members opposite forgot to speak to us about a certain industry. I said a while ago that there were only two thriving industries under the Mackenzie Administration, and that these were the soup-kitchens and official assignees. I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker, but there was a third one: it was the coal oil industry. I do not know for what reason, but the Liberals have a great love for petroleum. I would not wish to insinuate that they are in alliance with those who were called pétroleux in Europe; I only notice that they have a particular affection for this inflammable matter. Was it because the oil wells were situated in the county of Lambton, which was represented by the then First Minister, who is still one of the leading members of the Liberal party?

An hon. MEMBER. Yes.

Mr. TASSÉ. My hon. friend says, yes. I am glad to hear that expression, because, while the Liberal party refused protection to other industries they extended it to coal oil.

As a matter of fact, only for the circumstances which I have just mentioned, this exceptional protection would seem rather strange. At the same time, I am glad to state that that industry which was fostered in such a special manner is even now more flourishing than it was then.

Mr. DE ST. GEORGES. That is the reason why the Conservative party imposes a tax on barrels which are used for coal oil.

Mr. TASSE. In spite of that tax, my hon. friend will be happy to learn that last year's exportation of petroleum, in which, like all Liberals, he takes such a tender interest, has been 594,268 barrels, while, in 1883 it amounted to 534,330, and in 1882 to 492,583. That is to say, the coal oil industry, like all other industries, has undergone, since the adoption of the protective tariff, a very great progressive movement. I know that our friends opposite are in favor of a cheap country to live in. They are in favor of cheap living. These gentlemen ought to be happy, ought not they? In fact, living has never been any cheaper than what it is at the present time. Never have the necessaries of life been as cheap. These gentlemen who have been repeating to us that the protective tariff would necessarily raise the price of all the necessaries of life should feel contented instead of lamenting the way they do. I am bound to state, however, that cheapness of living is not sufficient to ensure the happiness of a people. I am still of the opinion, which I have professed in the past, that cheap living does not always give the true measure of the prosperity of a country. In France, for a long time, those who were called the candidates of high bread were denounced; and yet what do we find to-day in that country which is governed by Mr. Jules Ferry, a free trader? We find a considerable increase of the duties on wheat, flour, oats and barley. In that country, which is governed by Ministers who are freetraders, the Customs Commission of the Chamber of Deputies has decided to propose the imposition of a duty of 2 francs 40 centimes on wheat, and it was adopted; a duty of 4 francs 80 centimes on flour; a duty of 1 franc 50 centimes on oats, and a duty of 2 francs on barley. And in Germany, Mr. Speaker, the same thing is done; duties have also been increased there on the articles which I have just mentioned. Therefore, the people of France, as the people of Germany and the people of the United States, have understood that the protective system only can do a great deal towards promoting the prosperity of a country. Our hon. friends opposite have said to us: Why, your system has been unable to put an end to the excess of the importations over the exportations of the country. That is true; we can only point out to the year 1880, in which the exportations have exceeded the importations by a million; but there is another fact which is just as true, and that is, the excess of importations over exportations during the five last years has been a great deal less than what it was under the Mackenzie Administration. From 1875 to 1879 the exportations have amounted to $82,059,000. From 1880 to 1884 they have exceeded $105,000,000, making a difference of $23,061,708 in favor of the last five years. And this excess of importations may be readily explained by the enormous quantities of raw material which we were obliged to import for our industries, and of articles which were entered for the construction of the Pacific Railway. Last year there has been a large discrepancy between the importations and the exportations, but it is explained by the fact that there has been a deficiency of nearly $20,000,000 in the production of wheat. It may be said that this is an enormous figure, but it is nevertheless an accurate figure. It is based on statements which have been published. The fall wheat, in 1882, has produced over $31,000,000, while in 1883 it has only produced $11,597,839. However that may be, the Opposition should be the last to upbraid us on account of the excess of our importations over our exportations. Do we not know that according to the English school, the Cobden school, the volume of imports is a very good sign of prosperity and of active trade. "Take care of the imports," they say, "and the exports shall take care of themselves." According to that, England must have made brilliant operations last year, for the surplus of her imports has exceeded £110,000,000 sterling. Unfortunately for the Cobden doctrine this same year has seen one of the most terrific crises in the history of Great Britain. The other day the hon. Minister of Finance was remarking that stocks had gone up considerably from 1879 to 1885. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) has asked the hon. Minister to give the quotations for 1878, as compared to 1885. The hon. Minister of Finance had not these quotations with him at the time, but I have taken the trouble to consult them, and they show a large increase as will be seen by the following figures: In 1878, Montreal Bank was quoted at 161, and in 1885 it was quoted at 193. Molson's Bank was 92 in 1878 and 114 in 1885. The Bank of Toronto was 136 in 1878 and 182 in 1885. The Merchants Bank, which was 63, in 1878, is to-day quoted at 111.

Mr. CATUDAL. Does the hon. member take into account the fact that the Merchants Bank has reduced its capital by one-third? You say that in 1878 the Merchants Bank was quoted at such a price, and that in 1885 it was quoted at such another price; do you keep account of the difference arising from the fact that since 1878 the Merchants Bank has reduced its capital by one-third?

Mr. TASSÉ. I do not know whether the quotations which I am now giving were made with reference to that reduction, but there would still be a rise, even with that reduction. The Merchants Bank, which was quoted at 116 in 1878, is now quoted at 121. Other securities, which I might mention, also show a decided rise. When I see the hon. members of the Opposition attacking, as they do, the fiscal policy of the Government, I ask myself if these gentlemen are not as many Saturns devouring their own children; for we have not forgotten, Mr. Speaker, that the Liberal party of Lower Canada was one of the first to demand that the agricultural and manufacturing interests should be protected. The member for Lotbinière was, the other day, denouncing agricultural protection. Well, I think that if his natural leader, Mr. Joly, could have heard him, he would, perhaps, have disowned him as one of his followers. Because, those who have read the Debates of this House know that in 1872 Mr. Joly was asking for protection on sugar and exemption from Excise duties on beet root sugar during ten years. It will also be remembered that in 1872 the Liberals wanted to bury their past in oblivion. They were ashamed of it, and they had a thousand reasons to be ashamed of it. Therefore, they wanted to reorganise it, by leaving aside such men as Messrs. Doure and Lafamme, for instance. These men have since been seen coming back to the surface—and by borrowing from both parties the best planks of their platforms, in the hope of producing an ensemble of principle which might unite all men of good will, irrespective of parties. An important meeting was held in Quebec, and it was presided over by the predecessor of the hon. member for Lotbinière, the hon. Mr. Joly. Well, on that occasion, there were loud demands for protection in favor of the agriculturer and trader, for protection in favor of the industries of the country. So much so, that in 1876 a committee was appointed to investigate the agricultural condition of the country, and, that in answer to certain questions put to hon. Mr. Joly, that gentlemen stated that if his friends had abandoned the cause of protection, as most of those who are now occupying the other side of the House have done, he, at least, had not given it up. And the following is the answer he addressed to the president of that committee, on the 24th of March, 1876 :

"I have only received to-day a series of printed questions from your commission, in whose work I take a very deep interest, and I hasten to send you my answers. I am afraid they will be found somewhat lengthy, but I must say that I feel a certain amount of satisfaction in being able to formulate my views on this subject, whatever may be the worth of such views. In fact, it is a kind of protest against charges brought against me during this Session, in the House of Commons and in the public press—that I have abandoned the principal article of the programme of our national party. What we claim above all is a national trade policy. My friends have been charged with having abandoned it, and as leader of the national party, my name has been mixed up with those reproaches; but I have not abandoned that policy."

Now, in answer to the following question which was put to him by the committee :

"Is it in the interest of Canada to continue to admit American products free from duty, while the products exported on the other side of the frontier are liable to a high duty?"

He said :

"No; it is against the interests of Canada. I humbly believe that only raw material used for manufactures should be admitted free from duty.

"It is not by lowering the price of everything that we will ever attain national wealth. The dearer we pay the better it is for us, provided our means of paying are at par with the increase of prices. Ask the laborer which he prefers—flour at $4.50 per barrel and no work, or flour at $6 and plenty of work. Agriculture and manufacturing may together insure great results; but let these two industries isolate their interests, and their divided forces will be far from accomplishing as much."

It may be said that the hon. Mr. Joly is no longer the leader of the Liberal party in the Province of Quebec. I know that; in fact, he has had the same fate in the Provincial House which was met by another leader of the Liberal party in this House. Perhaps the mode of procedure was less violent but that was all the difference. It is traditional in that party to behead the chiefs when they do not lead to victory. If I am told that Mr. Joly is no longer the leader of the Liberal party in the Province of Quebec, one thing will be admitted, and it is that the hon. member for East Quebec—who, I regret to say, is not in his seat—is at the present moment the leader in the Dominion Parliament of the Liberal party of the Province of Quebec. Well, that hon. member, and not very long ago at that, held the same opinions, the same sentiments, on protection. In 1871, when he held a seat in the Quebec House, he said :

"Quite a number of years ago the great patriot we have just lost, the Hon. L. J. Papineau, seeking a remedy to the evils from which we were suffering, summarised his policy on the subject by this simple precept; 'We must buy nothing from the metropolis.' I am of opinion that that policy is to-day forcing itself upon us with as much weight as it did even at the time when it was formulated. It is a duty for us, and especially for us Canadians of French origin, to create national industry."

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, our hon. friends will say: Why, this was a long time ago—it is many years since our leader expounded on the question of protection, those ideas which are those professed to-day by the Conservative party. I will quote, Mr. Speaker, utterances which are a little more fresh. They were uttered as far back as the 22nd of March, 1877. Mr. Laurier was not then, it is true, as strong a protectionist as he had been in 1871; but he was still fairly so, as may be judged by the following short extract from one of his speeches:—

"I am of opinion, however, that certain industries cannot be established without the aid of the Legislature; and I say it openly, in the presence of my political friends."

As will be seen, these words from Mr. Laurier have been uttered not many years ago, and they prove one thing: It is, that our friends opposite have completely given up the economical ideas which they formerly held. They have sacrificed everything to the domination of their allies, the Grits. At this same meeting of 1872 another leader of the Liberal party, who is not sitting in this House, it is true, but who has a seat in the highest House in the country, the hon. Mr. Pelletier, said:

Mr. Tassé.

"The manufactures in the different branches of industry which we might develop with such beneficial results, do not receive the necessary protection. You will probably tell me that, nevertheless, a strong impulse was given towards progress; that the spirit of enterprise seems to spring up. Yes, gentlemen, hunger and misery have often led to superhuman efforts. The terrible commercial crisis which prevails to-day, while alarming those who were most confident in a brighter future, induces them to make supreme efforts in order to avoid complete ruin. It is true that generous efforts have been made for some time back; a few enterprising capitalists are trying, it is true, to establish manufactures, but have they been able to inspire confidence in their success? Have they been able to do away with this great objection of the tariff, which makes it impossible to export our produce? What guarantee have they when they risk their capital in manufactures which are constantly exposed to a change in the tariff, which might paralyse everything? There is alongside of us a population of forty millions, with whom we are unable to trade. Our country offers immense advantages, and in spite of that it is still the most backward country in America, owing to the want of encouragement to manufactures."

If I wanted to make a review of most of the prominent members of the Opposition, I might do, what has already been done besides, I might show that these gentlemen have all, one after another, been in favor of a protective tariff. I heard the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) telling us a while ago that the Government had done nothing to encourage sugar industries in this country. That gentleman has forgotten the very important fact that under the Mackenzie Administration the sugar refineries closed their doors, which they have re-opened since the establishment of the protective tariff. He has forgotten that, in 1876, his colleague, the hon. Mr. Jones, who was then sitting on this side of the House, on the Ministerial benches—but that did not last very long, I am not sorry to say—was clamoring in vain for protection on sugar. I shall quote his own words, pronounced in this House on the 3rd of April, 1876 :

"He might be laboring under a misapprehension, but he understood the hon. member for South Waterloo, on a former occasion, when he introduced his motion relating to the West India trade, to allude to the sugar refining interests as likely to be greatly benefited thereby. If the hon. member was in earnest in his proposition to subsidise a line of steamers then, he could not understand his position now. The hon. gentleman had said that but 300 persons were interested in the sugar trade, but if the number of vessels engaged in this large commerce with the West Indies and the men indirectly connected with the business were taken into account, we would find that number swell into thousands. He thanked the hon. Postmaster General, for the stand he had taken on this question. If the refinery in Montreal could have worked under the present system no application would have been made, but it had been sufficiently demonstrated that it was impossible to keep open refineries in the face of the bounty allowed by the United States. It was no use tinkering with the tariff, but the Government should be prepared to deal with the American system, which was annihilating our trade. When $2.50 duty per 100 pounds was paid, and a drawback of $3.00 was allowed, which was equal to ½ a cent per pound, it was plain to be seen that no tariff would enable a refinery to exist in Canada. Unless a duty was imposed equal to the bounty, it would be no use trying to do anything."

In 1877, the hon. Mr. Jones returned to the charge and again reproved the Government. Here is what he said on the 9th of March :

"The sugar interest demanded some consideration, because, if some legislation did not speedily take place, he was afraid we were going to lose a large trade with the West Indies. That trade, in the Maritime Provinces, at the present moment, involved from three to four million dollars a year, but the inevitable result of the present policy would be to drive the whole trade to the United States. We sent our vessels with outward cargoes, which were sold in the West Indies, and they were obliged to take the sugar to the United States to have it refined. Cargoes of sugar passed through the Boston refineries, and in 24 or 36 hours were exported into Canada again under a bounty of 50 per cent. Such a system could not continue very long. In a short time, when the Americans found out that they had destroyed our trade, they would dictate their own terms, and then it would be seen how disastrous the present policy was."

We did precisely what was asked by the hon. Mr. Jones, when he had his seat among the Ministerial benches. He wanted to protect that industry, and since that time we have seen not only the great Redpath refinery opening its doors at Montreal, but we have seen others cropping up or taking large proportions. I was speaking a while ago of the Liberal leaders in this House and at Quebec. In 1881—it is not a very long time since—the hon. leader of the Opposition was visiting Montreal. We were on the eve of general elections. The hon. gentleman was visiting his faithful in Montreal, seeing, no doubt, with regret, that instead of increasing, their number was diminishing at every election. On that occasion the hon. leader of the Opposition expounded views which resembled a great deal those of the most extreme free traders; besides, it was not the first time in his life; but Mr. Mercier, who had a better knowledge of the popular sentiment in the Province, who knew that the views advocated by the hon. leader of the Opposition were quite unpopular; that they were repudiated not only by the Conservatives, but even by almost every Liberal, Mr. Mercier felt alarmed at the opinions expressed by the hon. leader of the Opposition, and he endeavored to limit their bearing to a certain extent. Here are the words which he used under those circumstances:

"When we left power the receipts of the country were not as high as they are to-day; but the Conservatives failed to keep themselves within reasonable limits and they have raised the tariff in an exaggerated manner. But we must be impartial; this increase, large as it was at the outset, did not produce a bad result; it has put an end to deficits, if we are to believe Sir Leonard Tilley, and it has induced capitalists to invest large sums in the manufactures."

M. TASSÉ. The hon. leader of the Opposition says that large sums have been invested in the manufacture of cotton. He is perfectly right. But it is equally true that millions have been invested in other industries. Under the Liberal régime there was no large amounts invested in cotton, and although people were then in favor of a cheap country to live in, cotton goods were not sold as cheap as they are to-day, neither were they manufactured in such large quantities as they are to-day. When the hon. leader of the Opposition was denouncing the policy of the Government with respect to duties imposed on cotton, he said: If you put a duty on cotton, cotton goods will be sold at an extravagant price; you will make the fortune of a few speculators, of a certain number of capitalists, to the detriment of consumers. He cannot deny that. To this pretension we have answered that we were not afraid of the profits which might be realised by the manufacturers; that it was not to be expected that they would invest their capital with the sole view of pleasing the public, and that even if the prices of their manufactured goods were to be higher for a certain time, domestic competition would not be long in bringing them down to a normal rate. Well, what are the facts to-day? Facts have so well given the lie to the predictions of our friends opposite that they are now reduced to deplore the losses which the cotton manufacturers have suffered of late years. Facts have so well belied the predictions of the hon. leader of the Opposition on this important question of cotton manufacturing, which has inspired him many an eloquent speech, that instead of blaming the Government to-day he should be one of the first to commend their conduct. The hon. leader of the Opposition, who did me the honor of interrupting me, will admit that there is at Montreal a newspaper, which is supposed to be the organ of the Liberal party in the Province of Quebec, and which is called La Patrie. That journal is to-day edited by Mr. Louis Honoré Fréchette, who for several years held a seat in this House as the representative of the beautiful county of Levis. At the last elections Mr. Fréchette was a candidate in the county of Levis; I think it was for the fourth or fifth time. His opponents, it seems, had circulated the rumor that if he was elected, he, Mr. Fréchette, one of the supporters of Mr. Blake, would make it his duty to wage war in this House against the National Policy, which was very natural, I admit, for the National Policy is the great line of demarcation between the Liberal and Conservative parties. Well, Mr. Fréchette, knowing that he could not be elected in the county of Levis if he hoisted the flag of free trade, declared, in a letter, that if he was elected, neither he nor his chief, the hon. Mr. Blake, would work against the National Policy. Perhaps the hon. leader of the Opposition has read that letter, which was published in the Chronicle of the 10th of June, 1882, for the purpose of removing the fears of the electors. The letter said:

"I hear that there is some uncertainty prevailing somewhere regarding my views, as a candidate for the county of Levis, regarding what is generally termed the National Policy.

"I wish to state here what I stated yesterday before the public of Levis, St. Joseph and St. Romuald, that my platform is exactly that of my leader, Mr. Blake, on that question as well as on the others.

"I never believed in the so-called National Policy; I think it has done more harm than good to the country; but I most positively declare that my intention, if elected, as well as the intention of the Liberal party, is not to interfere with that policy, which has been established by the popular will, as a change in the system would probably create a disturbance in our industries and trade, which must be avoided at all hazards. I consider the National Policy as necessary, now that it is inaugurated—and for this the Conservatives alone are responsible—a necessary evil, which could be cured only by a remedy worse than the disease."

This language is far different from that of the member for South Huron, who exclaimed in this House: This tariff cannot stand. Well, I do not think that the hon. member for Durham, who must have read that letter,—

Mr. BLAKE. I have not read it.

Mr. TASSÉ. I know the hon. leader of the Opposition to be a great reader of newspapers, of everything that bears the liberal stamp; I know he takes a great interest in the French and English literature of his party. Did he ever protest?

Mr. BLAKE. I have never read it.

Mr. TASSÉ. The hon. leader of the Opposition says that he has not read it. Well, now that I have read it to him, does he, or does he not, approve it.

Mr. BLAKE. I approve it in part, and I disapprove it in part.

Mr. TASSÉ. Very flattering for Mr. Fréchette, the editor of La Patrie, organ of the Liberal party in the Province of Quebec. This disavowal from his chief is one of the finest compliments that was ever paid to a Liberal journalist, to my knowledge, for a long time back. Until now we have noticed what protection had done for Canada, but we have never asked ourselves what we should be without it. I venture to state that, without this tariff, the Canadian market would still continue to be, what it has been under the Mackenzie régime, a slaughter market for American over-production. Without protection we would see to-day 60,000 workmen, and more, without work, without bread, and most of them emigrating in a body, as they did under the old Administration. And the fact that since the 1st of January last only 100,000 operatives have resumed work in the American manufactures, shows what would have become of our market had we not a tariff to protect us against the production of the United States. We would be at the mercy of the American manufacturers, as we were under the Mackenzie Administration. Without protection we would still be the vassals, the tributaries, of the great American Republic. The interprovincial trade, which has made such rapid progress for the last few years, would not have taken the proportions which it has taken, which it is still taking, and which it shall continue to take as long as we are protected. Without protection British Columbia, which last year imported over $624,000 worth of goods from the Eastern Provinces, would not certainly have imported such a large amount from its sister Provinces. Because, in 1874, when the Liberal party came into power, the total amount of the value of goods shipped from the Eastern Provinces to British Columbia was only $66,104. Without protection, coal mining and the consumption of coal, which has nearly doubled, owing to the industrial establishments in the country, would certainly not have reached such great proportions. Without protection the Canadian workmen would certainly not have recovered the easy circumstances in which they have lived for the last few years, and could never have succeeded in a very short time in depositing, together with the farmers, an amount of $13,000,000 in the post office savings bank. Without protection we could never have put an end to the deficits, which amounted to over $7,000,000 under the Mackenzie Administration, and which have been converted into a surplus of over $18,000,000 since the adoption of the protective tariff. Well, Sir Richard Cartwright, himself, admitted, when he was Minister of Finance, that deficits, especially if they became chronic—and unfortunately they were chronic under his administration—might become a source of very grave difficulties, and that it was necessary to adopt energetic means to put an end to them. The Conservative Government have adopted those means and our hon. friends opposite, instead of blaming them for having taken these energetic means of putting an end to deficits and of protecting the credit of the country, should, on the contrary, congratulate them on the important and patriotic work which they have accomplished. I know, without protection, the immense sacrifices which we have incurred to construct the Pacific Railway would, to a great extent, be useless. Instead of finding an outlet for our industrial produce in the immense agricultural region of the North-West, the people of these Territories would continue, as in the past, to import their goods from the neighboring States. Now I come to another point. The hon. member for Lotbinière has spoken to us about the debt of Canada. Indeed every member of the Opposition has lamented on the extent of our debt. But, Mr. Speaker, none of them have told this House that every cent of that debt is represented by a productive capital. None of them have said that every cent of the public debt of Canada is represented by improvements and works, without which Canada would not be to-day the rich and prosperous country which it has become. None of them have said that that debt is not the price of blood, as are the debts of England, France, Germany and the United States. I do not hesitate to say that the debt of Canada would find favor in the eyes of the most rigid of economists. And while I see the public debt of our country represented under such false colors by those who style themselves as the free trade party of Canada, I am glad to be enabled to give them the opinion of one of the chiefs of that school, Mr. de Molinari, one of the chief editors of the Journal des Débats, a man whose opinion has been quoted very recently by the great newspapers of Europe on the importance of maintaining free trade in the old world. Mr. de Molinari visited Canada some years ago, and especially the Province of Quebec, where he carefully studied our economical situation. On his return to France, here is what he said about the debt of Canada:

"The Dominion and provincial debt has been contracted wholly for the construction of an improved system of communication, canals and railways, which might, with due regard to proportion, bear comparison with that of the United States. Nevertheless, for a few years back, the finances of the Dominion had felt the influence of the crisis. There had been a decrease of the receipts, arising most exclusively from Customs, from licenses for the sale of liquors and the sale of public lands; fortunately the crisis is over and the deficits have already been superseded by surpluses in the receipts. Bear in mind that Canada is one of the countries in the world where there is the least taxation, and that the contributive faculties of the people have hardly been grazed."

There is the opinion of Mr. de Molinari, and yet the hon. late Minister of Finance, and those who hold his views, are constantly proclaiming in this House that Canada is one of the most overtaxed countries in the world. Mr. de Molinari, who has not the same reasons for representing, under false colors, the financial position of the country, does not hesitate to state that Canada is one of the countries in the world where there is the least taxation, and that the contributive faculties of the people have hardly been grazed. He goes on to say:

"It would be a blessed laud for speculators conversant in the art of picking the hen without causing her to cackle; but where there are no armies to be paid, no war loans to redeem, there is no need of a heavy budget, and there are many reasons for abstaining from picking the hen at all. The Canadian federation occupies a position similar to that of the United States before the Secession war; and, thanks to God, none of the questions which are agitated between the parties are of such a character as to provoke other contests than those of the press and the hustings."

I have said that every cent of our debt was represented by public improvements. Since 1867 it has been increased by $100,000,000. Well, what is this increase composed of? In the first place, we have a sum of $27,624,638 for provincial debts. So that this is not at all an increase of taxation. It is simply debts from the old Provinces which have been assumed by the Dominion Parliament. Thus we have public improvements: Pacific Railway, $47,291,564; Intercolonial Railway, $29,486,027; canals, $31,404,938; making a total of $135,807,209. To these five items I may add $29,374,000, which have been expended, irrespective of the debt, out of the ordinary receipts of Canada. And the Liberal party has its good share of responsibility for that increase of the public debt. From 1874 to 1878 the interest on the debt has increased by $980,882, while from 1878 to 1884 it has been increased only by $851,672. And let us bear in mind that the rate of interest is now lower than it was then. In 1867 the average of the rate of interest on our loans was 5.21 per 100; in 1873, 4.38; in 1878, 4.05, and in 1885, 3.98. This is a proof that our credit, instead of declining, is now gaining in the London market. But our hon. friends say: Why, public expenditure is increasing in alarming proportions? Certainly it is. It is impossible that it should be otherwise. But if it does increase we must not forget that our receipts are also increasing. This is just the reverse of what happened under the Liberal Administration. We must not forget that within a few years the public revenue has been increased by several millions, and it would be absurd to pretend that an additional revenue of nine millions could be levied with the same amount of expenditure. Within a few years we have created a whole Department—the Department of Interior—which, alone, during the last four years, has brought to the Treasury not less than $4,000,000, arising from the sale of lands in the North-West. It is also known that we have had to establish new post offices and Custom houses in a great part of the North-West, and in new places in other parts of the country. We have made a great many other expenses which represent, in a legitimate measure, the increase of the debt, as compared to what it was formerly. The other day, the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), who is an authority on such matters, compared the expenditure of 1875 and 1876 to that of 1883 and 1884, and showed that we had spent during those last years $6,619,334 more than in 1875 and 1876. But, as he rightly remarked, this increase is easily explained. Out of that sum, $2,079,488 were expended for the collection of revenue more than in 1875; the revenue itself has increased during that period by a sum of $9,250,000. Out of that sum, $1,901,045 was devoted to the sinking fund and to the cost of management of the public debt, and the balance, $2,264,540, represents the increase of the ordinary expenditure. That balance itself contains: For public works, $959,910; mail subsidies and grants to lines of steamers, $204,090; grants to Indians, $839,831; mounted police, $116,465. Now, all these amounts show an increase, and it was the Mackenzie Government themselves who started that expenditure, particularly the extra expenses for surveys in the North-West, and to maintain a strong supervision there. After all, they are not a heavy burden on the people, for they only represent an extra tax of 12 cents per head. Now, we come to another point. The hon. member for Lotbinière has lastly spoken to us about the Pacific Railway. He has told us that the construction of that railway was pushed too rapidly. I am not of that opinion. I think that the more railways we have in the country the better it will be for us. I believe that the locomotive is the best factor, the mightiest lever, of material progress in any country. It ought to precede and not to follow the march of colonisation. It is a great many years since the Conservative party, represented by Sir Allan McNab, said: "My policy is railways." The policy of the Conservative party is still to-day as it was then, a railway policy. We know what that policy has done to develop the resources of the country. Where should we be to-day if the 10,000 miles of railways which make up our admirable system of railways did not exist? Where should we be without the Grand Trunk, against which our friends opposite fought so violently, as they did against all great measures of public interest which were advocated by the Conservative party? Where would we be without the Intercolonial and the Pacific Railways, which will give us a through line of railway from ocean to ocean? Even in 1872 Sir George Etienne Cartier, while proposing in this House the great measure of the Canadian Pacific Railway, said: All aboard for the west! It is very well known that nobody attached more importance than he did to the construction of that great railway, for in the Bill which he succeeded in having passed in the old House, it is enacted that the construction of the Pacific Railway will be finished within ten years. I regret that the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain) is not in his seat, for I would take this opportunity to reproach him with having written a most unworthy page, a very regrettable page, a page which can never be forgiven. In a book which he has published lately, which was in itself a fault, for the book was written in order to justify one of the greatest outrages that was ever attempted against the responsible system in this country, to justify that which has been called the coup d'état, the hon. gentleman has taken occasion to throw mud at his opponents. He has chosen to enter into the private affairs of a man who is no more here to defend himself—a man whom he never would have dared to fight face to face—but who has left followers and admirers who will be equal to the task of defending him. The member for L'Islet has attacked the memory of Sir George E. Cartier; he has entered into the domain of his private life to vilify him. But I am happy to state that there are many Liberals to-day who, reviewing the political career of our late lamented chief, do not hesitate to admit that he was a great patriot and a friend to his country. And this House has echoed public gratefulness by erecting him a monument that all the scribblers in the world are unable to disfigure. The hon. member for Lotbinière complains that we are proceeding too rapidly with the construction of the Pacific Railway in British Columbia. I am sorry to find that my hon. friend has completely forgotten the history of his party; because, before he left power, Mr. Mackenzie declared, in this city of Ottawa, in a speech which he delivered against my candidature in 1878, that he had asked for tenders for the construction of the Pacific Railway in British Columbia. And yet we see the Liberal members upbraiding the present Government for pushing too rapidly the construction of that section. Not only do they blame the Government for building rapidly the British Columbia section of the Pacific Railway, but I have heard, with still greater surprise, the hon. member censuring the Government for building that section which is situated on the north shore of Lake Superior. On this point, as on the other, my hon. friend forgets the history of his own party. In 1880, his own leader, the hon. member for West Durham, said:

"I should not be surprised if some hon. member from Quebec had indicated to the Minister of Railways, in language as strong as was consistent with the politeness due to a powerful Minister, that it was essential that he should throw out, at any rate, some ray of hope, however faint, that at some early period the Quebec railway should be connected with the through line; that he should say to the members from Quebec: Gentlemen, at the present time we can only burn the candle in the middle, and at the western end, but the time will come sooner than you expect, when we will burn it in the middle and at both ends, when it will be alight in the east also. Quebec may expect the eastern end to be commenced when the western road is finished—that is, that it will be begun in 1890, and may be finished in 1897, and I hope they will all be alive to enjoy it."

Again, the leader of the Opposition has shown himself a bad prophet. It is not in 1897 that the section on the north shore of Lake Superior will be completed, but within a few months, after wonders of activity, which ought to deserve his approbation. Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but the newspaper which is the organ of the Liberal party (the Globe), whose authority my hon. friend will not gainsay, said, with regard to Lake Superior, in 1871:

"Our rulers will be traitors to their country and to British connection if they lose a single season in making it practicable and convenient for settlers to go to Fort Garry through their own territory, and in putting things in a fair way for the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is a question not merely of convenience but of national existence; it must be pushed through at whatever expense. We believe it can be so pushed through, not only without being a burden pecuniarily to Canada, but with an absolute profit in every point of view. Without such a line a great British North America would turn up an unsubstantial dream; with it, and with ordinary prudence and wisdom on the part of her statesmen, it will be a great, a glorious reality.

"Instead of the fact that the North Pacific is under construction being an argument for allowing the Canadian project to lay in the meantime in abeyance, it affords the strongest reason possible for its being pushed through without delay. Politically, it is a manifest and pressing necessity, while commercially it is as evidently of the highest importance for Canada. In this way alone can this country have any chance for her fair share in the lucrative trade with the North-West, which will assuredly spring up, and in the varied traffic with the Pacific world, which, to a great extent, will pass through Canada territory, if once what will be the shortest and easiest route from ocean to ocean is in working order."

It will be seen, by these few extracts, that the opinions expressed by our hon. friends opposite are exactly the reverse of the opinions expressed hardly a few years ago by their chiefs and by their principal organ in the country. We are told that the construction of the Pacific Railway is being carried on too rapidly. That is the opinion of the hon. members opposite, but that is not the opinion of the country. The settlers who are disseminated along the line of that immense route, which has 3,000 miles in length, the settlers who are lost in the immensity of the prairies and even along the shores of the Mackenzie River, who are without communication, either direct or indirect, with the civilized world, will not think that the construction of that railway is going on too rapidly. Neither will the traders of Manitoba, of the North-West, and of British Columbia, who have to import goods from the eastern Provinces, think that the construction is going on too rapidly. The manufacturers who have a surplus of production in the old eastern Provinces, and who reckon on being able to dispose of their surplus at profitable prices on the western markets, will not think that we are constructing this road too rapidly. The whole commercial world, who recognise in the Pacific Railway the most direct route between Europe and Asia, will approve of the rapid construction of that railway. No, Mr. Speaker; the construction of the Pacific Railway will not be completed a moment too soon. Thirty years ago, in the Revue des Deux Mondes, a prominent economist, Mr. Langel, published an essay on the proposed transcontinental lines of the American continent, and speaking of this enterprise he said: "The proposed undertaking in Canada is simply a dream, but if ever that road is constructed it will create a perturbation in the business of the world." And the London Times said that the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway would be one of the most brilliant achievements that any country in the world could ever boast of. The hon. member for Lotbinière concluded the other day by speaking to us about the programme of the Liberal party. I should be very happy to know exactly what that programme is. I have taken a great deal of trouble to find out what it was, but without success, up to the present time. The Opposition is against every thing which is proposed by the Government. That is about all the programme they have. It seems that the same ignorance prevails on the other side of the House among the members of that party. In a newspaper which is edited by one of the lieutenants of the hon. leader of the Opposition—I refer to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills)—the London Advertiser, the following words could be read concerning the programme of the Liberal party a few days before the opening of the Session:

“We trust that the leaders of the Reform party, in the House of Commons, will avail themselves of the present Session to enunciate their views on those public questions which are likely to present themselves for solution at the next general elections.”

But that is not all. Last year the Montreal Witness, which is also a Grit paper, published a correspondence from a person who occupies a prominent position in the Liberal party of Ontario. I think it was Mr. Robertson, of St. Catharines, a well known Liberal. This friend of the Liberal party complained in that correspondence that his party had no programme, and that his chiefs were deficient in energy and unanimity. Here are a few of the complaints he made:

“A general survey of the condition and prospects of the Liberal party in Canada leaves, on the observer, three distinct impressions. 1st. That the Liberal chief displays a great want of energy; 2nd. That his leading organ is conspicuous for its timidity and want of nerve; and 3rd. That unanimity is entirely wanting. Whether Mr. Blake and the Globe are influenced by public opinion, or public opinion is influenced by the attitude of the Liberal leader and his organ, may be open to dispute. It, however, is certain that Mr. Blake is making no serious effort to rally the forces of Liberalism, and that the Globe, while so bold and even dictatorial, is now a veritable slave to every class or organisation which may wield any political influence. There is scarcely any question of real interest to the people of Canada which the Globe has the courage to thoroughly and impartially discuss. We have ad nauseam editorial upon editorial, written in a strain of dull mediocrity, on the crimes, real or supposed, of the Dominion Government.

“A study of the political system gives no great encouragement to those who look for an active and aggressive Liberalism, and for any well-united and well-concerted attack on the present abuses of authority. A homogeneous Liberal party in Canada has no existence. There are Liberals in Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime Provinces, but there is no union between what should be sections of one great army. Local issues determine to a great extent the results of elections in some of the smaller Provinces, and are not without their effect on the smaller ones. No great principles, no common policy, unite the Liberals of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick with those of Quebec and Ontario. The battle of Dominion elections is fought by regiments recognising no common commander, and the result is anarchy and defeat.”

And this is not the only Liberal paper from which I might quote. Here is another extract from the Waterford Star, of the 26th of January, 1885. An article headed “Reform Platform” concludes as follows:—

“We repeat that what the Reform party needs at the present crisis is aggressive leaders and representatives in Parliament and fewer good-Lord good-devil men. We have endeavored to keep posted as to the politics of the day, yet if any one asked us to define the policy of our party, we would have to say, with the Mail, “We haven’t got any;” at least, we haven’t been able to discover it. We write the above in no captious spirit, for the mere purpose of fault-finding, but because a sense of duty compels it. We have suffered two ignominious defeats as a party at the polls, and will suffer a third unless we become more aggressive and take steps to define our policy and divide the House on it, to show the people we mean business and not mere clap-trap.”

Well, if the Liberal members, if the Liberal papers, if the Liberal electors, have that same opinion of their chiefs, and come to the conclusion that they have no programme which could be accepted even by the Liberal party, I ask them how the Conservatives who, for a thousand good reasons, have no confidence whatever in the opinions and policy of our hon. friends opposite, could be converted to their opinions. But that is not all. Some time ago the Liberal party gave a great dinner in the city of Montreal. On that occasion the member for East Quebec delivered a speech, in which he expounded certain views which will astonish those who have not yet read it:

“Gentlemen, remember one thing: if the whole population was composed of such men as the members of the Club National we would be independent already.”

So that the hon. member for East Quebec is in favor of immediate independence, even at the risk of throwing us into the arms of the United States.—

“But such men as you are a minority in the country.”

Mr. TASSÉ.

That has been known for a long time.

“If to-day we are not independent, if we are still a colony, the fault, if there is a fault, does not lie with the metropolis, but with the Canadian people who, let us admit the fact, do not deserve their independence.”

So that the member for East Quebec thinks that the Canadian people do not deserve their independence.—

“Gentlemen, before we get our independence, the people of our country must be taught to be patriotic, for I do not hesitate to say that they are deficient in patriotism.”

According to the leader of the French Liberals, the people of this country are deficient in patriotism. This is a high compliment, which will, no doubt, be appreciated at its full value.—

“I can say it unhesitatingly, because their answer is written in plain letters on the ballots of our representation. Look at what is taking place in Quebec. Out of sixty-five members, you will find fifteen in the ranks of the Liberal party. Am I to be told that we are a patriotic people? Am I to be told that the people who has not resented the abominations of which we have been the victims since the month of October, 1879, is a people of patriots? For my part—I regret it for the country’s sake—but I repeat it, our people are deficient in patriotism. What, gentlemen! when the party who has been guilty, on the 29th of October, of the darkest treason ever mentioned in the history of any country; when the party who has cut down the head of patriot-martyr, when that party has, under such circumstances, found grace before the people, and when the people, instead of nailing these traitors to the pillory, have absolved them, and what is more, have rewarded them, am I to be told that patriotism is to be found among such men? If we had our independence what would we do with it? I fear that we would rank with the nations where public interest is made subservient to private interest. I fear that we would come down to the rank of the people of Mexico, Guatemala, South America, and ever so many others.”

Well, I would like to know what the supporters of the hon. member for East Quebec think of such an astounding opinion. I should like to know from the hon. member who will address the House after me to-night, what he thinks of his chief, when the latter says that the people of the country are lacking in patriotism because they do not claim their independence? Not content with underrating their own country, the Liberal chiefs have become so enraged with disappointed ambition that they even insult the people. The member for East Quebec wound up his remarks by saying:

“Now you will, perhaps, ask me, before I am done, what the chances of the Liberal party are. To-day we are not very numerous”—

I believe our friends opposite hold a similar opinion on this point.—

An hon. MEMBER. We have the quality.

Mr. TASSÉ. I have no doubt that is the opinion of our hon. friends opposite. Only the people do not hold the same view. Let us hear more from the member for East Quebec:

“At Ottawa we are hardly more numerous than we are at Quebec. Here we are fifteen out of sixty-five; there we are sixty out of two hundred and ten. I have often thought that the Liberal party was like the saints, that is to say, our Kingdom is not in this world!”—

It takes a great stretch of imagination to find points of resemblance between the Liberal party and the saints, even on this point:

“But I begin to have ideas which are more bright and pleasant.”

I do not see why the French leader should begin to see things under a more pleasant aspect, for in spite of repeated contests his party has never exceeded the number of the small Rouge Pleiade, whose memory is far-famed. I do not think that the Province of Quebec have more confidence to-day in the policy of the Liberals than they had formerly. On the contrary, all the elections which have taken place, or nearly all, have about maintained the glorious position held by the Conservative party the day after the great contest of 1882. And while, on the one hand, Mr. Laurier complains that his country does not deserve independence, we see the hon. member for East York swearing by all that is good and great that he intends to die for the English flag.

It is true that the member for South Huron also appears to be leaning towards independence, while the leader of the Opposition has pronounced in favor of Imperial federation. This is a new proof that the Liberal party has no unanimity, has no acceptable programme. In that same speech which I have just quoted, the member for East Quebec said that since the coup d'état had been condemned, the Conservative party in his Province was a mere plaything in the hands of Sir John. Even yesterday I heard the hon. member for South Huron telling us that he was in favor of the maintenance of a truly national spirit. And yet this same hon. member said at Napanee, in 1883, that the people of Upper Canada ought to form a league, as they did twenty years ago, to put down what he called French domination. Thus, while we see, on the one hand, the member for East Quebec preaching that the Lower Canada Conservatives were only puppets in the hands of the First Minister, on the other hand we see the leader of the Opposition complaining that the Province of Quebec rules with absolute power over the whole country. Mr. Speaker, the people seeing that, on the one hand, the Liberal party has no well-defined programme, and that what programme they do have is unacceptable in many respects; seeing that, on the other hand, the Conservative party has a policy which is based on the protection of our great agricultural and industrial interests, a policy based on the development and construction of the great works which are indispensable to the prosperity of the country, the people of Canada, I do not hesitate to say, will continue their confidence in the Conservative party, who have done so much to deserve it.

Mr. HACKETT. I think the House and the country are to be congratulated on the very able and satisfactory statement made by the Finance Minister. It must be gratifying to the people of Canada to know that the financial affairs of the country are in a very satisfactory condition. For the last year or so hon. gentlemen opposite have been going about endeavoring by every means in their power to decry the credit of Canada. They have stated on almost every platform, and their press has repeated the statement, that the people were leaving the country in large numbers, that taxation was rolling up at a fearful rate, and that the debt of the country was something enormous. Now, we are glad to know from the statement of the hon. Minister of Finance that these assertions are quite unwarranted, but that the credit of Canada as a borrowing country stands high in the money market of the world—that in fact our securities occupy a front rank. We are also glad to know that notwithstanding that large amounts of money have been appropriated for public improvements, the debt per head of the population is less than that of a great many other countries, and not so great as that of other countries on this continent. What is the reason, Sir, that things are in so satisfactory a condition? In my opinion, we must attribute it to the beneficial working of the National Policy. Those of us who were in this House in 1879, when the policy was inaugurated, will remember the vicious opposition that that policy met with from hon. gentlemen opposite. We then saw these hon. gentlemen rise, one after another, and assert, in the most confident language, that this policy was going to ruin the country, that it would be the means of creating vast monopolies, and that the consumers of the country would be ground down under the iron heel of those monopolies. Again, in 1882, when the Government appealed to the people for a confirmation of this policy, we had to meet the same arguments. We were told that great cotton lords and great sugar lords existed in the country, and that these men, after making fortunes out of the poor people of the country, in a few years, were in London, Paris, Rome and other cities of the old world, spending their money lavishly. But two or three years later we have a different story told on the floor of this House. We are now told that these men are all ruined, and that the capital they have invested has all been lost. We know that depression does exist; but this fact we have to comfort us: that the consumers of the country are buying the articles required by them for the support of themselves and their families at a cheaper rate than has ever before been known in this country. This is the result of the National Policy, and this I consider is very satisfactory to the people. Now, Sir, without entering into the abstract question of the National Policy, I may say that my object in rising on this occasion is to correct some errors that the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) made on the occasion he addressed the House a few evenings ago. That hon. gentleman on that occasion made a very remarkable speech—remarkable for its inaccuracies, remarkable for the way in which he compared our country with the countries of the world, by distorting facts and figures to show that Canada occupied a very poor position as compared with other countries. I am glad to say, however, that the hon. gentleman directed his remarks principally to the Dominion of Canada as a whole. Some two or three years ago, when the hon. gentleman took his seat in this House for the first time, speaking of the financial condition of the country, he singled out Prince Edward Island as being especially ground down by the National Policy. He told us on that occasion how the people were being driven out of Prince Edward Island, how whole rows of houses were to let, how the wharves were deserted, how no business was doing, how everything was so depressed and demoralised that men having money were afraid to invest it, and how the greatest ruin prevailed in that Province. I admonished the hon. gentleman on that occasion that he was doing a great wrong in decrying his Province, and that his remarks would have a bad effect upon its credit. I am glad that since then he has learned wisdom, and that my admonition has had a good effect; because in addressing the House now he does not confine himself to Prince Edward Island, but speaks of the whole Dominion. The hon. gentleman, at the commencement of his remarks, treated us to a little dissertation on loyalty. It was called out by some remarks made by the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster), to the effect that there was no respectable gentleman at present in the Liberal-Conservative party, or no respectable newspaper in the country, advocating annexation to the United States. The hon. member for King's made that statement, and I believe it to be correct. He stated, further, that there was a paper, he believed the only one in the Maritime Provinces, advocating annexation, published in the city of St. John, and edited by a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for Queen's, in reply to that statement, singled out something that had been said long years ago, long before the Provinces were united in a Confederation. He singled out some remarks made by the hon. Minister of the Interior, I believe, and other gentlemen occupying high positions in the country; he also referred to some remarks made by Mr. Beaudry, of Montreal. With all this, I do not see what we in Canada, at the present time, have to do. We know that before Confederation the North American Provinces had separate tariffs and separate forms of Government, one not amenable in any way to another. We know the struggles that men had to undergo in those times to gain the privileges we now enjoy. We know that it was only after fearful struggles that responsible Government was obtained in this country. And it is an honor to the men who were then ruling this country that they stood up and declared: We will have our rights, or go for separation from Great Britain, and for the independence of the North American colonies. Amongst other gentlemen, he singled out the Minister of Finance. He wanted to prove that the Minister of Finance was an annexationist. He said he was the treasurer and secretary of an annexationist society; and, to prove his statement, read an extract from a proclamation issued by that society. I will read that extract from the proclamation, to show to what lengths the hon. gentleman would go to sustain an assertion :

"The time has come for this Province to address the Sovereign, with the explicit declaration that unless relief be obtained separation from the Empire and the independence of the North American colonies will be desirable."

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Not a word about annexation.

Mr. HACKETT. Yet the hon. gentleman said the Finance Minister was treasurer of an annexationist society. I consider it unworthy the hon. gentleman, holding a front position, as he does, in the ranks of his party, to so distort facts as to make black appear white and white black. As the hon. gentleman has entered into the question of loyalty, I hope he will pardon me if I read a portion of a remarkable speech which he delivered in 1880, not prior to but since Confederation. At that time the question of the ratification of the contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was before this House. The hon. gentleman called a meeting of the electors of Queen's county, P. E. I.; the meeting was held in the market hall at Charlottetown; and in the course of a very long and able speech he uttered the following sentiments:—

"We are now asked to consent to a contract which will seal up that great country and hand it over to a monopoly, a contract which will be an iron hand upon the neck of every young man who goes there as a tiller of the soil, a contract from which there is no escape, politically or commercially, excepting one, and that is annexation to the United States. It is an escape which no politician likes to talk about, but it will come one day, and when it comes we must take our chance and make the best bargain we can."

The hon. gentleman, as an American statesman would say, considered annexation to be the manifest destiny of Canada. He would make it appear that, rightly or wrongly, we should be annexed to the United States. The hon. gentleman, before he charges others with disloyalty, should consider his own utterances. I see behind him the descendants of some of the loyalists who left the United States after the close of the revolutionary war, leaving all their property behind them, going to the then sterile and inhospitable shores of Canada to gain a livelihood for themselves and their families. I would commend the hon. gentleman to their care; and if they do not prosecute him for his seditious language, I hope, at any rate, they will not associate with him. The hon. gentleman went on to take up the question of the exodus, which appears to be a live question at the present time. Referring to the remark of the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster) that he did not believe that there was any such exodus from the country as was pictured by the hon. gentlemen opposite, the hon. gentleman said :

"He says that proclaiming that there is such a thing as an exodus to the United States is calculated to injure the country, and that it should not be stated, though it is the truth. A truce to sentiment, let us have facts. What are the facts? It is a fact contained in the census report, a fact well known to the hon. gentleman, a fact which he could not shut his eyes to, a fact which he has heard repeated and has never heard challenged in this House, that in the United States there are 712,000 Canadians to-day, and yet he says there is no exodus."

That may be very correct, but I want to show you, Sir, why an exodus has taken place from this country. One of the chief causes is the utterances of hon. gentlemen opposite, the mournful wail they raise on all questions connected with Canada, the terrible pictures they draw of the dire distress of our people—all which have had the effect of driving out of the country very many people. They became discontented. They said: It is surely a good country to emigrate from; it would be dangerous to remain in it much longer, and those who had means to go were induced to go, by the terrible pictures of distress drawn by hon. gentlemen opposite. Amongst those who encouraged this exodus, to a large extent, figure the hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies)

Mr. HACKETT.

In that remarkable speech which he delivered at Charlottetown, he had also something to say with regard to the exodus, and the bad effects the contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would have on emigration to Canada. In very emphatic language he depicted the miseries of the people of Ireland, who, he said, were suffering under the iron hand of the landlord, and who were compelled to seek refuge in America. And he said :

"If they come here and the contract becomes law, they will simply jump from the frying pan into the fire"—

Is not that a noble sentiment? Is not that calculated to encourage immigration?

"As the great North-West will be entirely into the hands of the most powerful of landlords, are emigrants fools enough to go there? No, they will go to the American Republic, where they will have freedom."

These were the utterances of the hon. gentleman on that occasion, and I quite believe they are calculated to have a very great effect in dissuading immigrants from coming to the shores of Canada. Although we know hon. gentlemen opposite are very much in the habit of going on in this style, we sometimes find in their ranks people who will rise above party considerations and give utterance to patriotic sentiments. In Summerside, the shire town of the country I have the honor to represent, the Summerside Pioneer, a newspaper edited by a gentleman who supports the Opposition and who is a very respectable man, whom I am glad to know, rises on occasion above party feeling and gives utterance to live sentiments. In November, 1883, the Summerside Pioneer stated as follows, with regard to the exodus:—

"It may be well enough for young persons who have no means of making a living to try their fortune elsewhere; but we consider it a mistake for those who are moderately well off to rush after imaginary wealth."

He goes on to say—I would ask my hon. friend to give particular attention to what he says :

"There are always croakers in every community, who make a business of crying down the place in which they live, and this Province has its full share of such people. Persons of that stamp would turn the Garden of Eden into a frog pond, with a green scum on its surface. It is no wonder that our young people, growing up with the steady wail of discontent in their ears, should seek other fields on being able to leave the parental nest."

I think the editor of the Summerside Pioneer, supporter, as he is, of the hon. gentlemen opposite, very aptly described the effect of the speeches made by hon. gentlemen opposite, not only in this House but in the country. It would appear that when the hon. gentleman referred to the 712,000 Canadians at present in the United States, he would make out that they all went there since the inauguration of the National Policy; that all these people were driven out of Canada through the effects of that policy, and were obliged to seek a home in the United States. Let us look into that statement. In 1870, according to the United States census, 490,000 people, natives of Canada, were in the United States. That was before the introduction of the National Policy. In 1880, only one year after the National Policy became the law of the country, we find 712,000 native Canadians in the United States, the exact number cited by the hon. gentleman, so that if you take the decade from 1870 to 1880 and add the death rate, which, according to a very elaborate calculation of the leader of the Opposition, made last year, would amount to 21 per cent., we find that the total number of Canadians who went into the United States during that decade would be 345,000, or about 34,000 a year. Thus only 34,500 of the 712,000 left the country under the National Policy. Still the hon. gentleman would make it appear, and he sends his speeches broadcast through the country, that 712,000 people were driven out of Canada through the effects of the National Policy. The hon. gentleman went on to refer to the great progress that was made in the United States. He stated that at the close of the civil war the United States had a debt of $2,500,000,000, or $69 per head of population while now it was only $25.39 per head, and he said that the people of that country had made all this great progress since the close of the war. But, when the hon. gentleman from King's, to whom he was referring, stated that they had nothing to show for the debt at the close of the war, he said they had four or five millions of negroes to show. Everyone knew that. Everyone knew that the great struggle between the north and south was over the question of the negro slaves, and every humane and benevolent man in every civilised country in the world was glad to find that the result of the war was the freedom of those people, and that men should cease, in North America at least, to trade in the blood and flesh of each other. But that was a war of destruction. The hon. member for King's was perfectly correct. It was a war of destruction, and they had nothing to show but the negroes, and what to do with them was absorbing the attention of statesmen in the United States at that time. That war not only brought desolation and misery to thousands of firesides, but destroyed millions of property, and Sherman's march to the sea itself laid waste more property than would build two Canadian Pacific Railways. But if the great progress to which the hon. gentlemen referred did take place, what was the cause of it? Did the Americans, at the close of their war, adopt the policy of free trade? No; they adopted the opposite policy. They found they had five millions of negroes on their hands, and they found it necessary, in order that they might provide employment for these negroes, to adopt a policy which would create industries and give employment to these people; and the result of that policy has been that the United States has progressed so much that the debt is almost wiped out, and that the progress is going on day by day. And, though hon. gentlemen opposite may say that because the Democratic party has got into power they are going to adopt a different policy, we know from all sources of information that that is not the case, and that the American people are wedded to the system of protection to American industries, and will not give it up. The hon. gentleman was not satisfied with making an unfavorable comparison between Canada and the United States, but he also made a comparison between England and Canada. It is manifestly unfair to make a comparison between an old country like England and a young country like Canada. We are all proud of old England; we are proud of being a loyal dependency, if I may say so, of that great country; we are proud that our nation places us under the protection of its flag; we are proud of the great energy and enterprise of the British people, and of the way they have carried their commerce on every sea of the world; but while we are proud of England we must also be proud of Canada. Canada is our home, Canada is where we expect to live, and while we love the old country we should love Canada more. The hon. gentleman makes a comparison between the trade of England and Canada. I deprecate the action of an hon. gentleman who professes to be patriotic, and in making a comparison, distorts the figures, for the purpose of making his own country appear in a bad condition as compared with the country to which he is referring. He says:

"We find that the volume of our trade to-day is not as great as it was in 1873. In 1873 the volume of our trade was $217,000,000; to-day, instead of its having advanced by leaps and bounds, as we had a right to expect, and as I do not hesitate to say it would have had there been ordinary prudence exercised in the management of affairs in the North-West, had there not been reckless extravagance shown in the administration of our affairs, the volume of our trade is but $207,873,000."

Then he went on to say:

"I find that in 1867 the total trade of England was £501,000,000. In 1881, instead of remaining stationary, as ours had done, the total trade had gone up to £720,000,000."

Now do you not see the injustice of that comparison? He takes from 1873 to 1884, eleven years of Canada, and compares it with sixteen years in England, and because the sixteen years of English trade has shown a greater increase than the eleven years of Canadian trade, he says we are not making as great progress as they are. This is the way in which he distorts his figures. To show what the trade of Canada is, and to make a fair comparison, I will take it from 1873; and give ten years. The aggregate trade of Canada in 1873 was $217,801,203; in 1883 it was $230,339,826, or an increase of $12,538,623 in the ten years. That is quite different from the statement made by the hon. gentleman. He took one of our best years in the past and compared it with one of our worst years at present, and he took one of the worst years of England in the past and one of the best years at present, in order to make it look as bad as possible for Canada. But, if we look at the exports of the country, which are more important in this connection than the aggregate trade, we find that the exports of the products of Canada in 1873 amounted to $89,789,922, and in 1883 to $98,085,804, an increase in our exports of $9,295,882, or a yearly increase of nearly a million dollars. The imports of England in 1873 amounted to £371,287,372, and the exports to £255,164,603, the exports and imports together making a total of £626,451,975. In 1883 the imports were £426,891,571, and the exports £239,799,473, making a total of £666,691,044, showing an increase in 1883 over 1873 of £40,239,069. But, while the total trade had increased, the exports had decreased. In 1873 they amounted to £255,164,603, and in 1883 to £239,799,473, or a decrease in the ten years of £15,365,130, as compared with an increase in Canada during the same period of about $10,000,000. This is quite a different statement from that of the hon. gentleman, but it is a correct statement, and it is the only way in which you can apply a fair test to the trade of the two countries. But the gist of the hon. gentleman's argument was to prove that our trade had fallen off under the National Policy; that is what he was driving at all the time, and to show that he was quite incorrect in his statement and that the trade of Canada has advanced under the National Policy, I will take the five years of the Mackenzie Government and five years of this Government, and compare the two. The figures are these:

Mackenzie Government.
Aggregate trade, 1874	$117,565,510
do 1875	200,957,262
do 1876.....	174,176,681

This shows an increase of trade amounting to $97,404,574 under the National Policy, in four years, or an annual average increase of $19,480,905. This, I think, is a fair way to state the trade of Canada and to place its condition before the countries of the world, and not the way in which the hon. gentleman from Queen's has done it. But the hon. gentleman was not satisfied with comparing the trade of Canada with the trade of England and placing our trade in as unfavorable a position as possible, in comparison with the trade of the old country, but he made a comparison of the workmen of Canada with the workmen of England, and he endeavors to show us that the workingmen of England were better clothed, better fed, and better paid than the workingmen of Canada. I will read to you what he said with regard to that matter. He is referring now to a pamphlet on political economy by Mongredin, and he says :

"The poor people in England have better food and the purchasing power of their wages enables them to buy double the quantity of food they did ten years ago. I may be pardoned for reading the figures in regard to five articles. In 1871 they consumed per head of bacon 1 38 lb., and in 1877 8 lbs.; of wheat and flour they consumed 150 lbs. in 1871, and 203 lbs. in 1877; of raw sugar they consumed 41 lbs. in 1871, and 54 lbs. in 1877; of tea 3 92 lbs. in 1871, and 4½ lbs. in 1877; and of tobacco 1 36 lb. in 1871, and 1 49 lb. in 1877. Here we see that this coarse, good food—leaving out the article of tobacco—bacon, and wheat, and flour, and sugar, are consumed per head in double the quantities in England to-day that they were ten years ago. The wages of the English workingman enable him to buy better and more food for himself and his family than he could ten years ago. Can you say as much for Canada to-day? I say you cannot."

That was the statement of the hon. gentleman, and you will notice how unfair he is again. He takes the period from 1871 to 1877, in England, and he compares that with the Canada of to-day. If he wanted to make a fair and impartial statement of the condition of the workingmen of the two countries he ought to take the workingman of England of to-day and compare him with the workingman of Canada of to-day. But I do not think, looking at his list of articles, that the English workingman could suffer much from indigestion; at all events, I do not think that a pound and a-half of bacon in a year would overload his stomach to any great extent. I would be sorry to see the workingmen of Canada obliged to live on so small a quantity. But, to show the condition of the workingmen in England to-day, I will read you a cablegram, published in the press of this country, dated London, 17th January, 1885, which shows that there is not that great prosperity in England amongst the working classes that he would have us believe :

"A mass meeting of unemployed workingmen was held in front of the Royal Exchange this afternoon; 10,000 people were present. Henry George, Helen Taylor, William Saunders, and other well known Radicals were loudly cheered as they appeared."

You will note it was the hon. gentleman's friends who were the orators of the day on that occasion—Radicals. The hon. gentleman loves to be called a Radical, and his friends were to the front orating to the workingmen of London on that occasion :

"The speaking began at 3 o'clock. Radical pamphlets of the most advanced description met with immense sale. Some of these were headed in bold type with the words 'Blood, bullets and bayonets,' and presented an extraordinary appeal to the 'half starved, herring-gutted, poverty-stricken, parish-damned inhabitants of the Disunited Kingdom.' A resolution was passed declaring 'That the depression in trade and the chronic poverty and difficulty of finding work are intolerable evils which those who suffer them ought not to tamely endure.'"

There is the condition of the workingmen of England at the present time. The hon. member for Hants (Mr. Allison) read an extract from a newspaper this evening, showing that the industries in Windsor, in his county, were in a prosperous condition, and stating that there were few or no unemployed people there. I believe the same may be said with regard to the rest of the country. When you compare that with the statement I have just read from England, I think it is favorable to our country. But we know the workingmen of England are not employed to-day. We are sorry for it, but still we ought not to endeavor to make it appear that these workingmen cannot find anylum in Canada, or that if they come over here they will find it much worse than it is in their own country. We know that a large delegation of workingmen waited on Lord Granville, and stated that 30,000 men were out of employment in London alone, and asking how to find employment for them, that they might be able to support themselves and families. When we know this we should not conceal the facts; or, if we state them at all, we should state them in such a manner as to show that the workingmen of Canada are not in such a bad position as the workingmen of England. The hon. gentleman must know that the agricultural industry in England is very much depressed; he must know that free trade, that great nostrum which his friends would apply to this country, has not worked beneficially to the farmers of England. He stated that the farmers of this country were the bone and sinew of the Dominion. I agree with the hon. gentleman, and I believe that is the case with regard to every country. They are the producers of wealth, and on them, to a large extent, must depend the prosperity of the country. We know that the agricultural industry in England is very much depressed. I have here another cablegram, dated London, 12th December, 1884, which is published in the Toronto Globe :

"The Central Chamber of Commerce adopted a resolution asking for parliamentary enquiry into the cause of the agricultural depression, with a view to protection."

That is a singular resolution, in view of what we had the other evening, from the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor), who lauded the free trade policy adopted in England forty years ago. The Central Chamber of Commerce has a different idea of the matter :

"An amendment in favor of free trade was rejected by 28 to 9."

Then again, the hon. gentleman says that protection has reduced the value of real estate in Canada. Well, I find another telegram dated at London, 1st December, 1884 :

"An estate in Devonshire, one of the most beautiful and fertile counties in England, has been sold for £8,000, for which £18,000 was refused a few years ago."

This is the condition of commercial affairs in England, and if we were to have the same nostrum applied to our country which hon. gentlemen opposite say is working so well in England, I think it would be found by the farmers of Canada that real estate would depreciate in value, and that the country would be in a much worse condition than it is now. In fact, I am of opinion that were it not for protection at the present time the country would be in a very deplorable condition indeed. I believe it is the protection of Canadian industries that has tided Canada over the present crisis which has existed all over the world; and that the fact that our working people are able to deposit their earnings in savings banks, instead of sending them to the United States to buy foreign commodities, has been largely the means of keeping up the trade of the country and carrying Canada through the commercial crisis. Another statement has been made in this House, with regard to our shipping. The shipping interest is a very important one in this country. Those of us who come from the Maritime Provinces know the value of that great industry, and while we see it is declining we know that it is impossible to assist it in any way. The fact is, that iron vessels are superseding wooden vessels; steamships are superseding sailing vessels, and the carrying trade of the world will shortly be done by iron steamships. Now, England has the greatest mercantile marine in the world, and in the Statesman's Year Book for 1885, I find that the registered vessels belonging to the United Kingdom, in 1883, as compared with those in 1868, show, in the fifteen years, a decline of 7,382 in the number of sailing vessels, and of 1,364,285 tons; and in steam vessels an increase of 3,316 in number, and of 2,805,971 in tonnage. We must devise some means by which we can build iron steamers in this country, for wooden sailing vessels must go down before iron steamers. The hon. gentleman from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) also referred to the fact that the deposits in the savings banks in the country were no index of the state of the country; that, in fact, an accumulation of deposits in the savings banks would indicate a commercial depression in the country. He says, in regard to that :

"I tell hon. gentlemen, those of them that come from the Maritime Provinces, at any rate, that we know, every one of us knows, that it is a fact that these saving banks deposits are not the savings of the laboring classes at all, to any appreciable extent. They are the moneys belonging to trustees, to well-to-do farmers and others, to lawyers and those kinds of people. We know that the laboring classes do not, to any appreciable extent, deposit in them."

I do not think the hon. gentleman is correct—I am quite sure he is not correct. I saw a statement the other day made, that the largest proportion of the deposits in the post office saving banks of the country is made by the working classes, and that the merchants and capitalists are to no great extent depositors in those banks. I presume the hon. gentleman will not be satisfied with my version of the story, so I will give him the highest authority that, in the estimation of the hon. gentleman, can possibly be given. I will give the hon. gentleman himself. Last year that hon. member, in this House, was advocating the establishment of savings banks in Prince Edward Island, more especially at Summerside, which I represent. The hon. member was not aware, at that time, that a savings bank had been established there about a year before. I had no idea of informing him of the fact; I thought it better to leave him in blissful ignorance of it. That bank was established a year before the hon. gentleman spoke, and at that very moment there were in the vaults $100,000 of the savings of the people of Prince county, of the farmers, fishermen and mechanics, and not of money belonging to merchants, traders or manufacturers. But the hon. gentleman, in his zeal for savings banks, made an interesting statement on that occasion. He said:

"The object of these banks is to enable small farmers and laborers to deposit their savings in them."

The hon. gentleman made a very different statement here to-day. I am quite willing to take the statement last year and place it against the statement this year and leave the House and the country to judge between them. But the hon. gentleman also made a reference to the fact that shortly before the famine in Ireland very large accumulations were made in the savings banks. I think that was a very unfortunate reference to an unfortunate circumstance. There is no country in the world which he could have used to worse advantage in illustrating his case than that of Ireland. If any country affords an example of the curse of free trade it is Ireland. Free trade has killed Ireland. There was a time when the manufactures of Ireland were found in the markets of Europe and even of the United States. There was a time when Irish linen, poplin and frieze and woollen goods generally were to be found all over the world. But it is not so to-day, under the influence of free trade. When England's manufactures had been established under a system of protection the embargo was removed from Ireland; direct importations were not allowed to Ireland, but goods for Ireland had to be discharged at English ports; after having the capital drawn from Ireland to assist in the development of English industries, the protective tariff was removed and free trade was established, and the result is that the people of Ireland are not in a position to embark in industrial enterprise, but are dependent on the cultivation of the soil for their support. That is how we find that free trade has destroyed Ireland, so that the people have to depend principally on the potato for their living, having no industry outside of the farm to engage in; that the population are idle about nine months in the year, and that when the potato fails there is famine. Had Ireland the opportunity afforded under protection, manufacturing industries would be established. She possesses great water power and valuable mines, and under a fostering tariff manufactures would, in a short time, be established. We know that the people of Ireland were very much troubled when they found that free trade was adopted in England. I find the following queries sent by an English correspondent to the Nation newspaper, one of the most influential and ably-conducted journals published in Ireland:

"Q. Is there an entirely free trade between Ireland and England or between Ireland and all colonial ports?"

"A. Yes; quite too free. Your Legislature kept up commercial restrictions only till Irish trade and commerce were finally crushed and the capital which ought to have sustained them effectually secured to England. Then, when the current of trade was established—Irish raw produce to England, English manufactures to Ireland—you offered us free trade. It is not more free trade, but less free trade that Ireland wants now.

"Q. Are there any obstructions to Irish commerce, trade or manufactures, which do not exist with regard to the same in England.

"A. Not now; having stripped us bare and secured the markets of the world to yourselves, you can now afford to say to Ireland: What hinders you from rivalling us? Up, and be stirring. Behold your trade is free."

We know the position of Canada, lying as it does alongside the United States, is similar to that of Ireland to England. We know that they are more favorably situated in Ireland than we are in Canada, because while we allowed American manufactures to come in here at low rates of duty, they built up a wall and kept our manufactures and raw products from the markets of their country. The manufactures of Ireland have free access to the markets of England while we are deprived, as I have said, of the markets of the United States. As a means of self-defence and self-support it became the interest of the Canadian people that we should adopt in a large measure the same kind of policy as prevails in the United States. There is a small book which I see largely distributed through the House—the report of the commissioners appointed to inquire into the condition of our manufacturing interests. That report has received very severe criticism at the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite. I wondered why that book of all books had received such sharp criticism at their hands, but on opening it I at once saw the reason. It showed that there are manufactures in the country, and that although a certain amount of depression does exist, yet they are in a fairly prosperous condition; and for this reason hon. gentlemen opposite criticised it most adversely.—

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Is it correct?

Mr. HACKETT. In some respects. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) also criticised the book; but he dealt with it very gingerly, and at length threw it down with a sneer. He said it referred to the lobster industry; and he asked: What has the National Policy done for that industry? I am going to inform him. We know that since we have adopted the National Policy we have had sufficient revenue to meet expenditure and had a surplus. As I have had the honor of a seat in this House since 1879, I know that deputations waited on the Finance Minister for the purpose of taking 5 per cent. duty off tin plates, and thus relieve the lobster packers of a certain amount of taxation. For tin is not manufactured in this country, but is brought from England, and this duty of 5 per cent. was a direct tax on the lobster packers and the people of the country. Owing to the operation of the National Policy the hon. gentleman has been able to relieve the packers of that duty, and he has also been able to reduce for them the duty on other material; and, in addition to that, for the purpose of encouraging and promoting the fishing industry of the country, owing to the National Policy they are able to pay the fishermen—a most deserving class—a bounty of $150,000 a year. I do not know that I need follow the hon. gentleman to any greater extent, but I want to say a word with respect to reciprocity. Coming from Prince Edward Island, I know that reciprocity of trade with the United States would be of great advantage to the people of that island. We feel there that the markets of the United States are the only ones available for one of the main products of the island—potatoes. If we had reciprocity the farmers of the island might go to raising and exporting them largely, but at present they are debarred from that privilege. The imposition of a duty of 15 cents a bushel has been sufficient to shut them out of the American market. And while a great deal has been said with regard to who pays the duty, the people of Prince Edward Island, who export their potatoes to the United States, know very well that they are called on to pay the duty. The consumer there is not called upon to pay it; if he were, reciprocity would be of no advantage to the people of this country. They know, when they take their potatoes there, and enter the Custom house and pay 15 cents a bushel in gold, and go to the wharf and sell them, the American potatoes are there side by side with theirs, and the American producer receives the same price as they do, and consequently pockets the 15 cents. I trust, therefore, the Government will take every means in their power to obtain reciprocal trade with the United States. I know it is the desire of the Government, but while this standing invitation, of which we have heard so much, has been on the Statute Books of the country, I think that the Government should go further. It was impossible to get it while the Republicans were in power, because they rejected the overtures of hon. gentlemen opposite when they sent the Hon. George Brown to negotiate a treaty, and I think it is scarcely possible that, having rejected those proposals, they should accept the proposals of another Government. But now there is a change of Government in the United States; the Democrats are in power, and it is believed the Democrats are favorable to extending the trade relations of the United States, and it is therefore quite possible that reciprocity might be obtained from them. I have noticed lately that a number of reciprocity treaties negotiated or inaugurated by the Republican party have been allowed to drop out, and nothing more has been heard of them. I trust the Government will endeavor to secure reciprocal trade with the United States. But, Sir, while we should endeavor to obtain a reciprocity treaty with the United States, we should also remember the important interests which are involved in our trade relations with the West Indies. The Government should not allow this matter to rest. The people of Canada are interested in that trade; a large amount of trade is done with those islands, and I hope the Government will use their efforts in this direction also. The hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail), said, this evening, that the National Policy had utterly killed the trade between Canada and the West Indies. Surely he did not consider the expression he used, for he must be aware that the trade has increased materially between Canada and the West Indies, and that the aggregate trade with those islands is one million more than it was in 1878. I trust the hon. gentleman will see that he was misinformed, and that the National Policy has not destroyed that trade, but on the contrary has fostered it, and I hope that measures will be taken by the Government to extend our trade in that direction, and thus secure for us a market for many of our commodities in the West Indies. Another matter to which I would refer is the protection of our fisheries. We know that the Washington treaty expires on the 1st of July, and that, from information we have lately received as to the action taken by the American fishermen, in calling meetings and passing resolutions declaring that the treaty was injurious to them, there is no possibility of the treaty being renewed at present. I trust, therefore, that the Government will take energetic and active steps to protect our fishermen and keep the United States fishermen outside of the three-mile limit. I am also glad to see, by the resolutions before the House, that the Government propose to place a duty on American fish, similar to that which exists on our fish going into the United States. This will be to the benefit of the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces. A large quantity of fish is brought into Canada and sold in the western Provinces, but by the imposition of a duty the people of the Maritime Provinces will be able to supply the western Provinces—the markets of Ontario, as well as Manitoba and the North-West Territories—to some extent, I believe, without an increase of price to the consumer. I am glad to see that this system of the protection of the fishermen is receiving so much attention from the Government. The hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) says that the great cause of the discontent in the Maritime Provinces was that so large an amount of money was thrown away on the Canadian Pacific Railway. He said that millions and millions were thrown away on that work. Now I think that was a rash statement for the hon. gentleman to make. He was a member of the late Administration, in which he held an important position, and he knows it was the policy of his Government to build that railway. He knows that they entered into large expenses for building the line from Port Arthur to Selkirk. He knows they expended a large amount in making that famous historical work, the St. Francis locks. He knows they sent rails to British Columbia to build the railway west of the Rocky Mountains. He knows that they sent surveyors out to survey the line across the mountains; and while all this was being done, surely it was not done to deceive the people; surely there was some intention to honestly and faithfully carry out this work to which the Dominion was pledged. I am sorry indeed to find the hon. gentleman now find fault with the expenditure of money in the same way in which it was intended to be spent by the Government of which he was a member. But the hon. gentleman, to show that there is great discontent prevailing in the Maritime Provinces, stated that a resolution was before the Prince Edward Island Council and Assembly, looking to the placing of the claims of Prince Edward Island for steam communication with the mainland, winter and summer, at the foot of the Throne. That is a fact; the resolutions are there. The people of that island have suffered for want of this steam communication; they exhausted the constitutional means for the purpose of endeavoring to carry out that work, and they are now seeking constitutional redress by going to the foot of the Throne. But it is not because of any commercial depression in the island, or any discontent with the Confederation. The people are loyal and true to the Confederation. They accepted the terms with loyalty, and they remain loyal and true to their country. To show that there is no widespread discontent on the island, and that the people there are fairly prosperous, I will read an extract from the speech of his Honor the Lieutenant-Governor, at the opening of the Sessions, on the 11th of March instant:

"Although, in some respects, the harvest was not so abundant as in other years, yet no cry of distress has been heard; while the steady advance which our people are making in material prosperity, the undisturbed public health and general contentment that prevails, are blessings for which we cannot be too heartily thankful and which it is our duty to acknowledge with feelings of the most sincere gratitude."

This shows that there is no discontent on Prince Edward Island, but, on the contrary, that there is general prosperity and that the people are content and happy. He goes on to say:

"It is indeed pleasing to notice, year after year, the advancement which is being made by our farmers in the science of agriculture as well as by other classes of the community in various manufactures and industries."

Thus showing that the people of Prince Edward Island are progressing in agricultural science, and that other industries are springing up over the island. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that I need trouble the House at any greater length. I felt it my duty to make these few remarks, and I thank the House for the patient and considerate manner in which they have listened to me.

Mr. COCKBURN moved the adjournment of the debate. Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12:15 a.m., Saturday.

PRAYERS.

CONSTRUCTION OF DRY DOCKS.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 108) to amend the Act to encourage the construction of dry docks by granting assistance on certain conditions to companies constructing them. He said: An Act was passed in 1882 to encourage the construction of dry docks by granting assistance under certain conditions. The intention of the amendment is to provide for the case of the city of Halifax, by adding after the words "such work," in the original Bill, the words "or in the case of a dock constructed at the port of Halifax by the city of Halifax." The law at present provides only for the case of incorporated companies, and this amendment is made to enable the city of Halifax to enter into an agreement for the construction of a dock.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

TROUBLES AT PRINCE ALBERT.

Mr. BLAKE. I desire to make enquiry respecting some information I have received. I have been informed that the half-breeds and Indians of Prince Albert, under the leadership of Louis Riel, have combined against the lawful authorities, have taken possession of the settlement and imprisoned a number of officials and others refusing to join in the movement. It is also stated that the Government has been informed of what is going on, that assistance has been asked for by the settlers, and that the demand of these half-breeds is that some recognition or action shall be taken by the Government upon a Bill of Rights which was submitted, as we were informed by the newspapers, last season. I have also been informed that the Winnipeg Field Battery has been ordered to proceed to Prince Albert.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is true that a number of half-breeds, led I believe by Louis Riel, have cut the wires and stopped communication between Qu'Appelle and the crossing of the south branch of the Saskatchewan. It is alleged that they made prisoners of several of the telegraph operators, that the wires have been cut, but one of them has been repaired. The immediate cause is not known. A telegram says it is believed that the proximate cause of the rising, was a letter stating that Riel was not a British subject. I made enquiry, and I cannot find that any such letter has proceeded from any quarter within my cognisance or the cognisance of the Government. Whether such a letter has existed or has been alleged as the cause of complaint, I do not know. There are certain questions connected with the half-breed claims which have been in process of settlement. Some of the claims are exceedingly unreasonable; others are in process of adjustment. The Bill of Rights has never been officially, or indeed in any way, promulgated so far as we know, and transmitted to the Government. The field battery has not been sent. I may say, however, that it was thought prudent last summer to have some additional force in the vicinity of Prince Albert, and we asked the Hudson's Bay Company to give us Carlton, which is a station and post of that company, the buildings of which are comfortable, and in the vicinity of the settlement of the half-breeds at Duck Lake. Captain Crozier has been there and has now 100 men at Carlton; and there is a force of ninety men within striking distance, to use a military phrase, of Carlton, and we believe they will join Captain Crozier at Carleton to-morrow night or Wednesday morning.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. LISTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called I desire to offer a personal explanation. When the Minister of Marine was speaking the other day with respect to the road between Emerson and Winnipeg, I used these words:

"I just wish to say, in answer to the hon. Minister of Marine, that I went to Winnipeg in July, 1878, and the road was then open."

I desire to say that when I made that statement I believed it strictly correct; but I have since made enquiries and have satisfied myself that as to the time I was in Winnipeg I was in error. It was 1879, not 1878. I owe this explanation to the Minister, the House and myself.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 48) respecting the Annuity and Guarantee Fund Society of the Bank of Montreal.—(Mr. White, Cardwell).

Bill (No. 49) to incorporate the Pension Fund Society of the Bank of Montreal.—(Mr. White, Cardwell).

Bill (No. 53) respecting "La Banque du Peuple."—(Mr. Girouard.)

Bill (No. 81) respecting the Canada Co-operative Supply Association, Limited.—(Mr. Curran.)

Bill (No. 84) for the relief of Amanda Esther Davis—(from the Senate).—(Mr. White, Cardwell.) On division.

EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH OF CANADA.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 60) to incorporate the Synod of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Canada.—(Mr. White, Cardwell, for Mr. McCarthy.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MACKENZIE. I desire to call attention to the third section of this Bill. In my opinion it is beyond the power of this House to pass the section as it stands. I would like to hear the mover of the Bill give some explanation of this clause. I think it undertakes to confer powers that we have no right to confer.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). What clause is that?

Mr. MACKENZIE. The clause giving power to enforce discipline in churches.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Did we not pass a similar clause in all the church Bills before? Was it not in the Methodist Church Bill?

Mr. MACKENZIE. I do not think so.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). In the Methodist Church Bill we confirmed certain regulations which had to do with the question of discipline.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Well, if we undertake to give powers to a church to enforce discipline amongst its members, we may do anything. I do not think we have any right whatever to do that. I would ask the attention of the hon. leader of the House to this point.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would suggest that the Bill be allowed to go through Committee, and that concurrence should not be moved until Mr. McCarthy is here to defend his own Bill.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. member in charge of the Bill stated in the Private Bills Committee that that was the usual clause which was inserted in church Bills before.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Under these circumstances we had better let it go through.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The mere fact that other Bills contained an improper provision is no reason why we should perpetuate it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, no; only it leaves an inference that the House has not passed illegal Bills before.

Committee rose and reported.

DIVORCE BILLS.

Mr. EDGAR moved the second reading of Bill (No. 106) for the relief of Alice Elvira Evans—(from the Senate).

House divided.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Bill (No. 107) for the relief of Georg Louis Emil Hatzfeld—(from the Senate).—(Mr. Kilvert.)

Read the second time on same division.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—GRADES, TANGENTS AND CURVES.

Mr. BLAKE asked, What is the number and what the aggregate length,—1, of the level parts of the Canadian Pacific Railway; 2, of the grades with the average grade; 3, of the tangents; 4, of the curves with the average curvature?

Mr. POPE. I have not got all the information desired, but will give all the information I have. Level parts, Mr. EDGAR, length 641; 2,737 in number; changes of grade, 5,832; length, 1,909 miles, 20 feet per mile.

Mr. BLAKE. You have got to a tangent; I suppose you will give me the rest another day?

Mr. POPE. I will try.

FISHERIES INSPECTOR, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria) asked, What is the name of the Inspector of Fisheries for the Province of British Columbia; when was he appointed; upon whose recommendation and what is his present salary?

Mr. McLELAN. The name of the Inspector is Geo. Pittendreigh. He was appointed 10th August, 1884; he was promoted from fishery overseer to the inspectorship on the death of Mr. Anderson, on the concurrent recommendation of the hon. members for New Westminster (Mr. Homer) and Vancouver (Mr. Gordon). salary, $800.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—BRANCH LINES.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Which are the branch lines of the Canadian Pacific Railway whereof 269 miles were stated in the papers laid before Parliament last Session to have been constructed, and what was the constructed mileage of each such line?

Mr. POPE. Algoma Branch 93 miles, Selkirk 23, Pembina Mountain Branch 103, Stonewall 22, Emerson 15, Greta 14.

CAPE TRAVERSE BRANCH RAILWAY.

Mr. YEO asked, Has the Government paid the contractors for the construction of the Cape Traverse Branch Railway the balance due on their contract? If not, what amount yet remains in the hands of the Government? Is it the intention of the Government to insist on the payment of the workmen engaged upon the road before paying the balance (if any) due contractors?

Mr. POPE. The Government have paid the contractors. Nothing remains in the hands of the Government. The contractors say they have paid all the men, but if any should turn out not to be paid, they are ready to pay them; they are quite able to do so.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—GRADES AND CURVES.

Mr. BLAKE asked, What are the maximum grades and minimum curves which are within the conditions imposed by the Canadian Pacific Railway Act as understood by the Government, and referred to in the various documents approving of the location of sections of the line?

Mr. POPE. Maximum grades 16 feet; minimum curves 11 degrees.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—AVALANCHES.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether the attention of the Government has been called to the published reports of avalanches in the Selkirk range close to the Canadian Pacific Railway works, and whether any reports of engineers or experts or witnesses have been ordered or have been received by the Government bearing on the question involved?

Mr. POPE. The attention of the Government has not been called to published reports. The inspecting engineer has been ordered to take careful notes as regards avalanches in the Selkirk range and to report upon the same. The instructions were given last fall.

DUTY ON RICE.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE asked, Is it the intention of the Government to increase the duty on rice this Session ?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is not the intention of the Government to ask Parliament to increase the duty on rice this Session.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—CHANGE IN ARRANGEMENTS.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether the Government, or any Minister, has as yet received any written communication from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company proposing any change in the existing arrangements? If so, when? Will the paper be laid on the Table ere long?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government on Thursday received an application from the Canadian Pacific Railway proposing a change in the existing arrangements, which was taken into consideration on Saturday; it has not been accepted.

Mr. BLAKE. Will the papers be laid on the Table ere long?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They will, but perhaps we may receive another application.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE NORTH SASKATCHEWAN.

Mr. McCALLUM, in continuing his remarks on the motion for copies of reports, etc., as to the improvement of the North Saskatchewan River for the purpose of navigation (page 615), said: When you declared it six o'clock on Wednesday last, I had not concluded my remarks in making this motion. I brought it up with a view to the improvement of the North Saskatchewan, and in order to urge upon the Government the desirability of putting a sufficient sum in the estimates to get a thorough survey to lay before Parliament at its next Session. I have every confidence in the North-West, I have every confidence in the Pacific Railway, I know the North-West is destined to be a great country, and I am satisfied that this country cannot expend any money for any purpose that would be more beneficial to the interests of the country than the improvement of this river. It runs for 1,000 miles parallel to the railway, at a distance of from 100 to 200 miles from it. That will give another route which is a water route from Edmonton, at the head waters of navigation, to Winnipeg, and all the branches to be built from the Canadian Pacific Railway into the Peace River country will cross this river, and in summer time this river will become a feeder to those branches. In other words, they can go on by water and transship at Winnipeg. I was up there last summer and I ask you to look at this country. Some people appear to have no confidence in that country at all, and think we are going to ruin this country by building the Pacific Railway. I would like to say a word on the future of that country. Let anyone look at the vast extent and resources of that country, and let him look back at the United States and what it formerly was. Let him look back at Chicago, and I expect that at no distant day we shall have another Chicago at Thunder Bay. I venture to make the prediction that, if the Government and the people of this country have confidence in themselves and do all they possibly can to settle that country, to encourage immigration and settlement, in less than five years a single track railway will not be able to do the business between Port Arthur and Winnipeg, and in less than ten years you will want four tracks. I do not look for more than one track to do the business north of Lake Superior which will do the service in the winter time, but you will want in ten years time three or four tracks from Port Arthur to Winnipeg. Then, when we have our elevators built, Port Arthur will become an important point, giving employment to Canadian shipping, and will be the means of reimbursing us for the large expenditure on the Welland Canal. I would urge the Government to give us at least $25,000 or $30,000 to get a survey of this river. I hold in my hand all that I can find in the way of information concerning that river. I hold the report of the Minister of Public Works, and I may read an extract from it. It says:

"The navigation between the mouth of Red River and Fort Edmonton is performed by three steamers of the Hudson Bay Company, one of which plys between Red River and Grand Falls, near Lake Winnipeg. These falls are impassable for vessels. Here the company has built a tramway, about four miles in length, to overcome the falls, which involves the transshipment of passengers and freight. A second steamer runs from the head of the falls to Carlton House, say 400 miles. A third steamer completes the journey, thence to Fort Edmonton, 410 miles. The entire journey of 1,073 miles is said to occupy about a fortnight. The depth available during low water is said to be from three to four feet or less."

"Three to four feet or less." Now, if it said three or four feet or more, I would be perfectly satisfied, and I would not have brought this notice before the House, but it says, "or less," all I ask the Government to do for the interest of that country is to give them four feet of water, and my information leads me to believe that the expenditure of a million of money would give a continuous navigation for over 1,000 miles and make another outlet for the products of the North-West to come this way. I believe $20,000 has been expended in removing boulders and so on in that river since Confederation. The Government placed that in the hands of the Hudson Bay Company. I do not say it has not been expended all right, but I would prefer to see it expended under the Department of Railways or under the Department of Public Works. I do not want any of our moneys to be handed over to the Hudson's Bay Company to be expended as they think proper. The report also says:

"At the Session of 1883 the further sum of $10,000 was voted to continue the improvements to this river, which are being carried out by the Hudson's Bay Company under an arrangement with this Department, which sum, added to $4,178.77 carried forward from 1882-83, made $14,178.77 available for this purpose. During the fiscal year the work of removing obstructions between Edmonton and the mouth of the river were carried on under the direction of Mr. O. J. Brydges, and will be continued during the current year, an appropriation having been made for that purpose. Expenditure during the fiscal year, $14,900. Total expenditure on the river, $20,537.71."

Well, whatever expenditure is made in the future I want it to be made under the supervision of the Government. I believe if the Government of this country would do their duty by the North-West, they would encourage immigration into that country. I see the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) is looking at me now, and we all had pleasure in reading his account of that country after he had come back from it. He deserves a great deal of credit for making that trip, and I wish that every hon. member on the other side of the House would also visit that region and they would cease belittling their country. I believe the Government of this country, and the members of this House will do their duty by encouraging immigration and by pushing forward to completion the great Canadian Pacific Railway, and I venture to say if they do so, at no distant day the country along that great river would be the happy home of millions of people.

Mr. ROYAL. It is a matter of great gratification to the members from Manitoba to hear the expressions used by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, about the prospects of the North-West and the duty of the Government to encourage immigration into those parts of the country. It is equally gratifying to us to know that every hon. member who goes to Manitoba and visits the North-West comes back next Session fully impressed with the importance of that country; and we are sure that every hon. member who comes up to the North-West and visits us will make a speech in the House the next Session dilating upon the importance of the agricultural resources of that wonderful country. With regard to the motion just made by my hon. friend, I believe that no one can deny the importance of opening up the navigation of the Saskatchewan River. But, Sir, apart from that I believe that it is very important that the North-West should be opened up by railways. We know that railway facilities are much more prompt and much cheaper than navigation facilities, and as soon as the railways at present under construction are completed they will certainly meet all the requirements of the country for a few years, at least. However, this would not prevent the Government, if there is sufficient money in the public coffers, from improving the navigation of the Saskatchewan. I believe, also, that if the Government would spend a sum of money in opening up the navigation of Lake Manitoba, I believe it would be equally as well spent, because opening up certain districts of the Carrot River, for instance, which empties into Lake Manitoba, would develop the timber resources of the Porcupine Hills. A petition to that effect has lately been placed before the Minister of Public Works, who takes such a deep interest in the development of Manitoba and the North-West, a petition signed by all the merchants and traders who have anything to do with the navigation of that river, or with the development of the timber interest in that part of the country. The petition called the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works to the importance of opening up the navigation of Lake Manitoba and Lake Winnipegosis, with that of some of the rivers which empty into those lakes. Without wishing in the least to detract from the importance of improving the navigation of the Saskatchewan, a navigation, which, so far, is rather spasmodic and uncertain during portions of the year, I believe if the Government could afford to cut a canal between these two lakes it would open up a very large, growing, and most valuable section of the country; it would open up the valley of the Carrot River, and tend to develop the timber resources of that part of the country. I repeat in conclusion that it is very gratifying to the members from Manitoba to know that whenever an hon. member has an opportunity to come up west and visit us, he comes back with his mind fully impressed, and at the same time totally unprejudiced, with regard to the importance of paying more attention to the development of that country.

Mr. WATSON. I desire to endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) who has brought this matter to the attention of the Government. We can hardly realise the importance of improving the navigable streams for the development of that country. I also endorse the sentiments of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal) as to the desirability, not only of improving the navigation of the Saskatchewan, but of Lake Manitoba, and the opening up of the timber limits on the Porcupine Hills, and Lake Winnipegosis north of Lake Manitoba. Last year there was an appropriation made for the improvement of the Waterhen River. I am aware that none of that sum was expended in improving the Waterhen River, but the money was spent in preparing for dredging, and it is to be hoped that the dredging plant will be of some service. I think the Government was wise in coming to the conclusion that it would not be right to spend any money on the improvement of the Waterhen River. I made a trip up that river last year, and I think that any money spent upon it would be thrown away.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What you want is a canal.

Mr. WATSON. We want a canal across Meadow Portage, which is only one and three quarters of a mile wide, with no engineering difficulties in the way, and having a fall of only 19 feet, which would require two locks to overcome the difference in levels. If this canal was built, and the Saskatchewan improved in the way mentioned by my hon. friend, we would have a water stretch from White Mud River on the Manitoba and North-Western Railway, to Edmonton with the exception of Mossy portage. It will open up a large trade. I believe there is a company formed with the idea of building a tramway from the headwaters of Lake Winnipegosis to the waters of the Saskatchewan, and such an enterprise would open up a considerable traffic in that direction. Some improvements have been made on the White Mud River connecting Lake Manitoba with the Manitoba and North-Western Railway. I hope that the hon. Minister of Public Works will see his way clear to put a sufficient sum in the estimates to start this work this year, if not complete it. There are large tracts of timber limits granted, but they are not being operated, and the leases of some of them have actually expired. These people claim that the reason for not operating the limits is that they cannot handle their lumber with any convenience or profit. I hope that before this Session closes the Minister will bring down an amount for the purpose of cutting a canal across Meadow portage.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am glad the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) has brought this matter before the House. I have not myself had an opportunity of visiting the Saskatchewan region, but in the various trips I have made to the North-West, I have made a great many enquiries about it, and I believe he is perfectly correct in saying that a moderate expenditure of money would be likely to open up several hundred miles of navigation whether to the extreme length mentioned or not, I do not know. At present, if open, it is only for a very brief season at all events. I was informed that in addition to the boulders, which are comparatively easy to remove, a good many shifting sand bars and deposits of mud occur from time to time, which are not so easily dealt with. In any case I think I may fairly say to the hon. member for Monck that although on this side of the House we have entered very strongly our dissent as to the wisdom of the steps which the Government have taken in the development of the North-West, we feel as deeply impressed as he can wish us to be with the enormous importance of developing that country, and to any measure which we believe reasonable and likely to promote the real welfare of the North-West we are as desirous of lending our aid as are hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. BLAKE. We always thought well of the magnificent water stretches.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Of course the Government will bring down any papers in their possession; but I am sorry that we have not many bearing on the subject. The fact is we have not had a survey of the river, which surely, according to the member from Monck, would involve work on 1,000 miles. No doubt the hon. member would scarcely expect the Government to make the whole survey at one time, but he would be willing that they should do the work by degrees. This, as well as the other question of the canal between the two lakes, will no doubt come before the Government when we take up the supplementary estimates. The question in regard to the canal is one more within the Department of Railways and Canals than in my Department, though I must say the matter was brought very specially before me the other day by a deputation, the members of which thought that as I had visited the North-West I would take special interest in the development of that country. As the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal) has stated, the more we go into that country the more we become convinced that it is a country with a great future before it. There can be no doubt that millions of people will find happy homes there, and with a proper administration, as I hope we are giving and will give that country, this Government with the help of Parliament will be enabled to throw a large immigration into the North-West which is required to open it up and develop its resources. The question of the Waterhen River was brought before us several times, but the amount of expenditure supposed to be required for that work was rather too large for the present. We thought it might be postponed for that reason. The other question as regards the canal may be in a different position, but we have not given it that attention which it must receive when we consider the public works that may be undertaken either next year or the year following. As regards the survey of the North Saskatchewan, if we were to undertake the whole survey of the 1,000 miles, it would be beyond our means this year; perhaps we may give some help in that direction, though I am not in a position to pledge the Government to even that just now. At all events the matter will not be lost sight of, and I will take care that when we take up these matters, the North Saskatchewan survey, which has been brought forward by the hon. member for Monck, will not be forgotten.

Mr. MACKENZIE. There are already surveys in the Public Works Department of the region around Lake Winnipegosis.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I did not say otherwise. We have those surveys; they were specially prepared in order to show the difference of levels and so on. I do not think the work is a very difficult one. I understood the hon. gentleman spoke of Lakes Manitoba and Winnipegosis.

Mr. MACKENZIE. A lock might be built between Lake Winnipegosis and the Saskatchewan River.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I was looking at the surveys the other day. It will be more a financial than an engineering difficulty.

Mr. MACKENZIE. One lock might do. 18 $\frac{7}{8}$ feet was the difference in the levels. There is no difference between the Saskatchewan and Lake Winnipegosis. So if two small cuttings were made navigation would be open from the south end of Lake Manitoba all the way to the Rocky Mountain House during the season of navigation, even without any material improvement in the Saskatchewan River itself.

Mr. McCALLUM. I do not ask the Government to expend a large sum this year, but I urge the Government to place a sum for this survey in the estimates and lay the matter before Parliament next Session. I ask $30,000 or $35,000, and I am credibly informed that that sum will be all that is necessary to make the entire survey from Lake Winnipeg to Edmonton. The hon. gentleman has spoken about difficulties occurring in the river that may involve a large expenditure. We do not know about that matter; but owing to the interest involved, the Government and the House will be justified in expending $25,000 or $30,000 to secure a survey of a river which, in a state of nature, is now navigated for 1,000 miles. The Government should not hesitate to expend that money if we even have to borrow it and pay large interest on it. We should have the survey made and the report laid before this House at its next Session.

Mr. IVES. I did not quite understand whether the hon. member for Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) concurred with the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) in the opinion that it would soon be necessary to provide for a four-track road from Winnipeg to Port Arthur. I should like to understand whether the ex-Finance Minister agrees with that part of the hon. member's speech?

Motion agreed to.

SUMS PAID TO JUDGE G. M. K. CLARK.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved for:

Return of all sums (apart from his salary as County Judge) which have been paid to G. M. K. Clark, in each of the years 1879, 1880, 1881, 1882, 1883 and 1884, respectively, and for what services in each year; also what sums, if any, have been paid to him from the 1st January, 1884, to this date.

He said: In moving this resolution I desire to call the attention of the House to an entry which hon. members will find in the Auditor-General's Report, which reads as follows:—

G. M. K. Clark, County Judge, salary.....	$2,000
do fee as arbitrator, Canadian Pacific Railway.....	1,200
do Intercolonial Railway Commissioner, 9 months, at $450.....	4,050
	$7,250

I do not know that there is any grave objection to be raised to the Government, in a special emergency, availing themselves of the services of a gentleman like Judge Clark for a particular purpose. But this is not the case here. Judge Clark appears to have been employed for a period of five years, if not for six years, practically as a Government official. I am not sure whether during that time Judge Clarke paid out of his own pocket for the discharge of the duties of his position as County Court Judge. I rather believe he did, but in such a case it would be as well that the facts should be known and stated, because I should be very sorry to prejudice that gentleman in any way. I dare say Judge Clark may have discharged the duties which were assigned to him very well, but it appears to me that this system is entirely wrong in principle. It appears to me that to take a county judge away from his own county, practically for the greater part of five years, or it may be six, is a disturbance of, or it may be an interference with, the course of justice, and the better that judge may be why of course the more the county suffers. This thing appears to have been growing up into a practical abuse. There are other gentlemen who appear to have been discharging two or three offices at the same time, though I see none in which a sum has been paid so largely in excess of their original salary as was paid in the case of Judge Clark. We have always laid down the principle that the Government should interfere as little as possible with the judiciary, and although the County Court Judges have not the same duties to discharge as those of the higher bench, everybody who knows anything of the administration of judicial duties in the Province of Ontario, knows that they have important duties, and that it is not desirable that the Government should take any member of a county bench and assign him duties which bring in a salary three or four times as large as he would ordinarily expect to receive in the discharge of the duties of his office. I do not want to enlarge on the matter, but I think a very injudicious act has been committed in this case, and I think it is desirable that the attention of Parliament should be called to the matter, and therefore I move for a return which I have given notice.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. On the whole the hon. gentleman is right in stating that we should not interfere with the judges in the performance of their judicial duties—at all events, there should be no sacrifice of the public interest in the employment of a judge, in taking him away from his judicial duties, or if those duties are neglected and the county or locality suffers by the absence of the judge. But in this case no such difficulty arises. The counties of Northumberland and Durham are fortunate in having a junior judge of as great industry as the senior judge—Mr. Benson, who performs all the duties to the satisfaction of the locality.

Mr. MACKENZIE. One judge is enough then.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Judge Clark is not absent continuously; he has been sitting while these matters have been going on from time to time. Judge Clark was appointed to one of these Commissions in the first place, and he was found to have performed his duties admirably—because besides being a good lawyer, as he is well known to be—he is a man who understands business in a commercial sense, a thorough business man—that he has been a great protection to the public revenue against the continual demands of the contractors and sub-contractors who had to do with the public—the continual assaults which the hon. gentleman opposite me (Mr. Mackenzie) knows are made by all contractors for public works in the way of claims on the public Treasury. Judge Clark has been invaluable in that regard, and while I believe he has done full justice to those parties who have had claims against the Crown, he has, from his happy combination of a commercial ability and legal knowledge, protected the Crown to a large extent. It has not escaped the Government that it would be well if we could find another man to fill his place, but we have seen and known his abilities, and so for the purpose of protecting the public interests he has been employed. But one reason why the Government have brought down a Bill to establish a Court of Claims was to cure this anomaly. We hope to have a judge at the head of that court, with assessors similar to the official arbitrators under the Board of Works and the Railway Act, who will deal with all such subjects in a very satisfactory manner, and prevent what we consider almost a necessity of having a proved man at the head of these Commissions, to look into these very large claims brought against the Crown.

Mr. MACKENZIE. You have taken cases out of the Exchequer Court and placed them before Judge Clarke.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, these cases were in the Railways Department; they were claims of all kinds, and the Commission was framed for the purpose of examining them.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The late Government provided that all claims should go before the Exchequer Court, but the succeeding Government deliberately took cases out of that court and sent them to arbitration, causing a loss in one case to the country of several hundred thousands of dollars. This was an utterly indefensible proposition; and now the hon. gentleman is coming back to our ground, but instead of the Exchequer Court, he is establishing a court for the purpose—one which will only take the place of the Exchequer Court. I cannot understand the hon. gentleman's persistency in the matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course one does not like to say anything about the Exchequer Court, but the result has been that the country has lost exceedingly by the judgments given by that court.

Mr. MACKENZIE. On what judgments?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not like to bring that up; it is rather a delicate matter to impugn the judgment of the court. The hon. gentleman will understand that the Judges of the Exchequer Court have written evidence before them, and not seeing the witnesses but reading the evidence and giving the same credence to all statements made by all witnesses, whether defendants or not—

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman is mistaken; they see the witnesses.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—but with one judge sitting who is a business man, with assessors, they will be able to have the case examined carefully, and I think there will be a great saving to the public by the new Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course we are not discussing a new Bill, but I may say that the course which the hon. gentleman adopted was to place before a set of arbitrators or commissioners, of whom Judge Clark in his capacity of arbitrator was one, a very large number of claims which had already been disallowed by the Exchequer Court. I think it will be found that something between three and four million dollars—perhaps I am understating the mark—have been disallowed. What the hon. gentleman did was to submit them to a second adjudication, and several hundreds of thousands of dollars were ordered to be paid by these second arbitrators. The only case that I have heard complained of, with reference to a decision of the Exchequer Court, or a judge of the Exchequer Court, was the case of the Prince Edward Railway accident, in which we heard Sir Charles Tupper very vehemently denounce the principle of action upon which the learned judge who tried that case proceeded. In the cases which have gone before the Exchequer Court in its original jurisdiction, as well the railway cases as others, the judge did hear the witnesses.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A single judge.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes, certainly. The single judge did hear the witnesses, and it was only by way of appeal that the question could come before the other court; and the hon. gentleman's present proposal is in accordance with that practice. Now, my hon. friend has brought up a question which is really of very grave consequence. I esteem it to be of very, very grave consequence that the Government of the country should withdraw from his proper judicial functions for a period of years one of the judicial functionaries of the country. With regard to the County Court Judges, I cannot speak for the other Provinces, but I will say that, in the Province of Ontario, I believe that more of those matters of litigation which affect the mass of the people—having regard to the great number of matters which come up, and the standing and means of those in litigation—come before the County Court Judges than before those of the Superior Courts. I esteem it to be quite as important—nay, more important—that the County Court Judgeships should be as well officered as the Superior Court Judgeships for the practical administration of justice in the Division Courts and the County Courts. Of course, we know that a considerable portion of the County Court administration has changed hands, but there is a large amount of Division Court administration to be attended to. But it is important that the Judge should be left to the discharge of his judicial functions. It is further important that he should not be a pensioner or servant of the Government, to perform duties assigned to him by the Government at a much higher reward than he receives for his whole services as a County Court Judge. The public accounts of last year show that Judge Clark has been for nine months at $450 a month a servant of the Government, as arbitrator; and he has been paid $300 a month in former years. That is not a position in which a judge should stand. He ought to stand in an independent position; and it is impossible to regard a judge as independent of the Government when the Government is at liberty to employ him at a salary or an extra remuneration between twice and three times as great as that belonging to his judgeship, his judicial salary going on all the time. I am very glad to be able to confirm what the hon. gentleman has said with reference to the character and industry in the discharge of his duties of the present junior Judge of the united Counties of Northumberland and Durham. I think that appointment made by the hon. gentleman's Government did it very great credit, and I am sure it must have been eminently satisfactory to the people. But either a junior Judge is wanted in these counties or he is not. If he is, it is quite clear that the senior Judge is wanted too. If the junior Judge is not wanted, no junior Judge ought to have been appointed, as was done not long ago, when Judge Clark was appointed senior Judge in place of Judge Boswell, who resigned, and Judge Benson was appointed junior Judge. If two judges are wanted, there is a lack of judicial power in these counties, because Judge Benson, however great his assiduity, cannot do two men's work, nor ought he to be called on to do it. These two counties, I suppose, number 80,000 souls; therefore the district is a large one, and requires proper attention. I judge the Government by their own act. I say their act in appointing a little while ago a junior Judge to these counties is conclusive proof that one man was not sufficient to perform the judicial duties there, and that being so, they acted wrongly in withdrawing one of the two men who they said were necessary. This system is a bad one; and it is growing. I see that in one of the Provincial Legislatures there is a Bill to authorise the appointment as a commissioner, with a salary I believe of $3,000 a year, a Judge appointed by this Government and having certain duties to discharge. You cannot object to that, if you establish the precedent in this Parliament of withdrawing the Judges from their judicial functions, and making them paid functionaries of your own; you are not in a position to object to the Provinces becoming masters of their paid officers, the Judges. That is a most undesirable thing. It is a thing that was protested against in the early days, when the hon. gentleman disallowed an Act of the Ontario Legislature which was designed to give the Judges an addition to their salaries. He disallowed it on general principles—which I believe to be sound, whatever may be the defects in our present system of appointing under that system—that a Judge appointed by the Federal Government ought to be paid by it. We know that there is a law on the Statute Book, which was invoked by this Parliament two years ago, when the Government proposed to appoint Judge Johnston, I think it was, to an office in Manitoba, and it was pointed out to be against the law which existed there before Confederation, to give the Judge two paid employments, and the Government was obliged to cancel Judge Johnston's Commission. Then, in the Statute Book, we have recorded a rule, because we have forbidden the Judges of the Supreme Court to accept any other paid employment. That is the rule we lay down with reference to the very highest Judges of the land; and if we say that they ought not to be exposed to temptations and placed in compromising positions a fortiori we ought to observe the same rule as to the lowest.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With the permission of the House, I would say one thing. It is true, the independence of the Judges ought to be respected, but as a matter of fact, we know that the matters that come before the County Judges are matters in which the Crown cannot in any way be interested, and the independence of the Judges cannot arise in the same way as it might with respect to the Superior Court Judges. However, I believe the country has gained a great deal by the appointment of Judge Clark, and if the policy of the Government is carried out, there will be no necessity for this question to arise.

Mr. BLAKE. As the hon. gentleman has made that observation I may make this further one—that in the very case of the learned Judge whose name has given rise to this discussion, he was actually called upon to decide whether one or another man was to sit in this House.

Motion agreed to.

EMPLOYMENT OF J. E. COLLINS.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for:

Return showing, if any, and if so, what sum or sums of money have been paid to J. E. Collins for services rendered to the Government, also showing travelling and other expenses paid him, if any, and showing in what position or capacity he is employed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not often speak on motions of my hon. friends for papers, but in this case I will venture to depart from the general rule. I quite recognise my hon. friend's excellent intentions in moving for this return, but although I fully admit he is entitled to all information, I fear this motion may be a little hostile to Mr. Collins. There are circumstances which, I think, I will be able to show to my hon. friend, which may make him inclined to agree with me that an exception to ordinary rules should be made in this case. Mr. Collins, I have reason to know, is a person of great literary ability, of rare insight into character, and of no small political sagacity. The name of Mr. Collins is, perhaps, more familiar to me than to my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). Mr. Collins understands thoroughly this great truth, that the world knows very little of its greatest men, and he has taken, as part of his mission in life, to instruct the world as to the greatest men it possesses. I am not at present referring to the right hon. gentleman opposite (Sir John A. Macdonald). The particular greatest man whom he has at present undertaken to enlighten us about is no less a person than my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Sir Hector Langevin). Now, persons of a censorious turn of mind may think that the fact that Mr. Collins is in my hon. friend's Department and enjoys, I understand, the benefit of frequent intercourse with him, may, to some small extent, prejudice Mr. Collins unduly. I do not take that view of the case; I think that Mr. Collins is probably better able to estimate the great value and the great merits of the Minister of Public Works than any of the rest of us; and in proof of this, I would like to call attention to an article which has been very recently put in my hands, and of which I am credibly informed Mr. Collins is the author. It reads, with your permission, Sir, as follows:—

"Upon Sir Hector's right, in the Commons, sits Sir John A. Macdonald, and upon his left Mr. Caron, the Minister of Militia. He is somewhat below the middle height, but is well built and exceedingly graceful and courtly in his walk and movements. His head is markedly intellectual looking and distinguished in its pose and shape. His face is clean shaven save for a small goatee; and his skin is clear, fresh and beautiful, the forehead is high and broad, and the eye, which is a dark violet, is rather steadfast and contemplative than wandering or flashing."

Mr. Collins, you will observe, goes in for something like pre-Raphaelite details, but that does not in the slightest degree detract from the merits of his work.—

"He is the one Minister who never gets idle at his desk. When he is not listening to debate in which himself or his Department is concerned, he is engaged writing letters or attending to official communications. It is really a pleasure to hear him answer formal questions."

Now, I quite concur in that.—

"His replies are nearly always full and almost invariably satisfactory; but he never says more than is necessary and pertinent; never opens doors through which eagle-eyed opponents may enter and give worry to the Minister and to his Government. Two Ministers there are who are always opening their mouths too wide Mr. Caron and Mr. Pope. Mr. Blake, or Mr. Mill, or Mr. Casey or some other oppositionist will first worry them off their guard, get them to make statements that they didn't intend to make, and so put the Government "in for it," on these occasions you can notice Sir John fidgeting in his chair annoyed at the blundering and indiscretion."

So far Mr. Collins has me with him, but I must draw the line here. As for my hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Mr. Caron), he is a man of war and therefore quite able to take care of himself and Mr. Collins too, but I really object to this slighting mention of my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Pope). It may be, as Mr. Collins seems to insinuate, that he is rather a rough diamond and does not shine with the gemlike lustre of that polished jewel, the Minister of Public Works, but the Minister of Agriculture is not to be lightly spoken of either. In some important respects, and notably in that, the most important thing, perhaps, which distinguishes the practical politician as he is wont to call himself, the ability to take care of number one, the Minister of Agriculture is not far below even his colleague, the Minister of Public Works, and might possibly, perhaps, give him points. Mr. Collins is a man of considerable foresight; it has not escaped his attention that there is a little uneasiness in political circles. This is a delicate question I know, but Mr. Collins handles it so well that I think I cannot do better than give the case in Mr. Collins' own words :

"I have already characterised Sir Hector as the successor apparent to Sir John. He is the only man in the Ministry or in the ranks who could with success conduct the fortunes of the party if Sir John were off the scenes. His ability and diplomacy are very great, and it is said he is hardly second to the Premier himself in his ability to smooth rough water and manage wranglesome followers."

And so on. Well I submit to my hon. friend for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that a man like Mr. Collins must not be rudely or rashly dealt with. He has appreciated the uneasiness of the public mind, he has apparently understood that there are some people who think, and I agree with him, that it would be very difficult to replace the First Minister, but he thinks there are as good fish in the sea as ever were caught and he wants to reassure us. Hon. gentlemen may recollect that it was my pleasant duty last Session to call the attention of the House to the terms in which a gentleman named Thibeault had dealt with the predecessor of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works; and I hail it as a happy omen that as it took a gentleman of French origin to do justice to Sir Charles Tupper, it required a gentleman of English origin to do justice to the surpassing merits of the Minister of Public Works. My hon. friend from Wellington may think there are objections to a gentleman in the Minister's Department taking all these pains to make the Minister's merits known, but that is a narrow and conventional view. If my hon. friend would only put himself in the place of the Minister of Public Works, and just consider the question from his point of view, he would appreciate the position in its proper light. The Minister of Public Works has a logical mind, and probably the way in which the question presents itself to him is somewhat like this: The very best use to which you can put the public money is to advance the public interest; to advance the public interest in the best way possible, you must have the best man at the helm; and in order to attain this end you must instruct the public as to who is the best man. Therefore I say the Minister of Public Works is logically justified, being convinced, as he undoubtedly is, that he is the best man in the emergency, in retaining Mr. Collins to instruct the people as to his merits. The case is clear, and I have no doubt my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) will see it. Had we not already a poet laureate in the person of Mr. Nicholas Flood Davin, regardless of expense, I would be disposed to recommend Mr. Collins for the place, in return for this specimen of his literary excellence, but I do not wish to interfere with Mr. Davin. In any case, however, I would just say to my hon. friend, the Minister of Public Works, that I hope he will not allow any scruples or delicacy to cause him to incommode Mr. Collins in the slightest degree; I hope he will keep Mr. Collins.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. John Collins.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hon. gentlemen will recollect that I ventured to make a proposal last year, with regard to Mr. Thibeault, that if Mr. Thibeault would produce another life of another distinguished gentleman on the Treasury Benches I would supplement the Parliamentary grant myself. I will make a somewhat similar offer now to my hon. friend opposite (Sir Hector Langevin) in Mr. Collins' case; if he will keep Mr. Collins, and if Mr. Collins will produce similar articles, say one every fortnight, and let me see them, I will use all my influence to prevent any question on this side about Mr. Collins, even if he gets 75 cents extra per hour for all the time he is employed in compiling these essays and keeps his own time, as I understand is the custom of the Department. Then there is another argument which the First Minister very nearly anticipated me in, and I may say that I have kept my strongest argument to the last. I understand that Mr. Collins is the Collins who has already immortalised himself by producing a life of the right hon. gentleman opposite.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, he has immortalised me.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It was couched in equally chaste and elegant language, and no doubt it will be very satisfactory to the hon. gentleman's friends, because I observe from it that, in all the acts of the hon. gentleman's career which evil-minded persons have misinterpreted, he has been actuated by the purest and most patriotic motives, and has even sometimes allowed his reputation to be tarnished for the general welfare of the country. It is a happy association of ideas, and what a lamented friend of mine called "the eternal fitness of things," that a gentleman who in his life has done justice to so many John Collines should at last in his declining years find a John Collins capable of doing justice to him.

Mr. McMULLEN. I did not anticipate the discussion which has taken place when I made my motion. I simply wanted to get the information, and, since the gentleman who has just sat down gives such a strong recommendation to Mr. Collins and says he has rendered such services to the Government, I have no objection to withdraw the motion.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have no objection to the motion as made by the hon. gentleman, and the return will be brought down. So far as the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) has thought proper to amuse himself, and try to amuse the House by reading an article which he says has been written by Mr. Collins, I have not a word to say. It is his business, and, should he amuse himself at my expense, I will not complain; but, so far as I am concerned, I was not aware of this article, I was not aware before the hon. gentleman said so—I do not know what information he has—that the article was written by Mr. Collins who is mentioned in this motion. As to this gentleman's connection with my Department, I may say that Mr. Collins was appointed in the Department as an extra clerk on the 12th February, 1885, has been 16 days at work, and has been paid $28, and is not employed by the Department any more. That is the whole he has received as a clerk of the Department or in any capacity, and he has not received travelling expenses of any kind. He has received $28 all told.

Motion agreed to.

PROTECTION OF FISHERIES IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. HESSON moved for:

Copies of all correspondence and reports of fisheries inspectors, overseers of fisheries, or other persons, in Manitoba and the North-West, in relation to the destruction of fish and the necessity of enforcing the clauses of the Fisheries Act in said Provinces and Territories.

He said: Early in the Session I asked the Government whether it was intended to extend the operations of the Fisheries Act to the new Provinces west of Manitoba, and the reply was that an inspector, Alexander McQueen, had been stationed at Winnipeg, and an overseer, P. C. Gilchrist, at Fort Qu'Appelle. I desire to draw the attention of the House for a few moments to the fact that I have not been able to ascertain that either of the gentlemen appointed to these important duties in the North-West has so far made any report to the Government as to this important question of the protection and preservation of the fishing interests of those Provinces. I am in possession of letters addressed to myself from that Province which have led me to consider that, unless some steps are taken at a very early date indeed, this important interest, the preservation of fish in the waters of the North-West, those streams will soon become as they have unfortunately become in the Province of Ontario, not only fishless streams, but polluted streams. We have good reason to know how important that interest can become in a country where proper facilities are given and proper attention is paid to it. I find that the total catch of fish in the Dominion for five years has been no less than $77,628,679, an advance of $15,525,736 worth of fish. The export of fish during the past five years has been no less than $36,867,439, an average export of $7,373,487. Now, an industry that is so valuable to the country as that is certainly worthy of the attention of this House, and the protection of the waters in the great North-West is certainly of very vital importance to that country. We know that those mountain streams abound with very valuable fish. We know that it is considered a very great luxury in that country as it is in this country. We know that the Indians, as well as the white population of that country, will be largely dependent upon that for some years to come, and it ought to be the duty of the Government to look carefully that there is no violation of the Fisheries Act. I have reason to fear that no attention whatever is paid to the Provinces west of Manitoba, and, whilst the inspector may be confining his attention to some extent to the streams immediately in that Province, that very irregular, in fact very loose, arrangements, if any, exist in the North-West, and that the destruction of the fish in those Provinces west is going on very rapidly indeed. I have received a letter from a gentleman who resides in Regina, who states that he caught, or employed parties who caught, no less than 25 tons of fish in Long Lake from the month of November to some period in February when he wrote. I placed that letter in the hands of the Minister. It was also pointed out by the same gentleman that other parties had caught about 15 tons of fish in the same lake, and in almost every case the fish were being caught at the wrong season of the year, as they were all full of spawn. If that is the case, and if the waters of the North West freeze up very much earlier than the waters here, as is more than probable, if that system of fishing is permitted to go on in the early part of November, the whole fishing interests of that country may be destroyed in a very short period indeed. You can imagine what would be the effect of putting 40 tons of fish from one small lake into the market. The price was $75 per ton. A large portion, I believe, was sold to the Government, for the Indians, and the price, which I estimate at 3½ cents, is certainly very low. I fear the time will come at no distant day, if some effort is not made by the Government to protect those streams and small lakes in the North-West, when they will not be able to obtain fish at all, and those steps should be taken very quickly, because mills are being erected on those streams, and we know how sinuous they are, and the shoals and eddies that form in them, and the probability, therefore, of offal from the mills being deposited which the current may not carry away. Everybody here knows what the effect of that is upon our beautiful streams in Ontario, and for an instance, we have only to step to the Ottawa River, within a few yards of this building. We know that fish are not caught now as they were in the early days. I know that the same thing is going on in all the newer parts of Canada, and if mills are not prohibited from being erected upon these streams and throwing their offal into them, the effect before long must be disastrous to the fishing interests of this country. I heard a gentleman who had travelled in the North-West say that he was personally cognisant of the fact that nets are being used, or meshes with the holes only one inch in diameter, and he had travelled along the shore of one of those beautiful lakes and found them actually littered with small fish, so that he walked through them for some hours. Now, if this is permitted to go on it will terminate, in a few years, in the total destruction of the fisheries of the North-West. I had the pleasure of spending a few days among these mountain streams in the neighborhood of Calgary, and I know there is no water so pure and so clear as that of these streams, which is probably the best on this continent. We know for a fact that mills are being erected upon them which are having a very disastrous effect upon the fish. This is particularly the case in the hilly sections where the course of the stream is swifter and where it is easier to get water power. But mills are being erected even in the prairie section of the country, on the flat lands, in the proximity of streams, and the offal is being deposited in the streams to some extent. I hope the hon. Minister will see that the officers whom he appoints will do their duty and that they will investigate these charges and see if it is possible to prevent this destruction of fish in the future.

Mr. KAULBACH. I am sorry to learn from the hon. member who has just taken his seat, that the fisheries in the North-West are being injured to so great an extent. We, of the Maritime Provinces, have experienced the same inconvenience, and I hope that the Government will offer the same protection to the fisheries of the tidal waters as to those of the inland waters of this Dominion.

Mr. MULOCK. Can the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) say with what appliances those 40 tons of fish were caught.

Mr. HESSON. I believe, though I am not positively informed, that it was by spearing them through the ice. I think that has been the usual custom, and I think that is the danger to be apprehended.

Mr. WATSON. They catch white fish during the winter by cutting holes in the ice some distance apart and by dragging a net by a rope between the two holes and so drawing the fish out. It has been reported to me that fish are caught to some considerable extent in the North-West out of season. Quite a large business is being carried on this year on Lakes Manitoba and Winnipeg in catching fish for the Chicago market. Of course the industry is principally confined to the jack fish, or what is known in the east as pike. With regard to the season for catching the white fish, I am not very well posted in the matter, but I believe a certain quantity of white fish is caught out of season on these lakes, and it would be well for the Government to see that they are protected.

Mr. MULOCK. I think we are all agreed that it is wise to protect the fishery interests both in tidal and in inland waters, but I do not think it would be wise on the part of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to construe the Fisheries Act, in its application to the North-West, as he has done in its application to the inland waters in the Province of Ontario. A couple of weeks ago I had occasion from my place in this House to call the attention of the hon. Minister to the regulations enforced for the protection of the fisheries in certain of our inland waters in Ontario. I was in hopes, from my remarks then, that long before this he would have seen his way to removing the grievances complained of, but as yet I am not aware that the first step has been taken towards correcting what I think is a misapprehension of the powers conferred upon the Governor in Council by the Fisheries Act—I refer to the regulations enforced since last fall in regard to the fisheries in Lake Simcoe. I do not understand that the Governor in Council is obliged either to prohibit absolutely all fishing or to allow unlimited fishing; but I think that a reasonable construction of the Act leads to but one conclusion, and that is that the Governor in Council can pass such regulations as to him may seem fit for the proper preservation of the fisheries. Now this does not involve total prohibition. What ought to be prevented is unwise fishing, such as wholesale slaughter by netting and otherwise. But to deprive settlers along the waters of the right to take, in a comparatively harmless way, sufficient for their own use is to interfere with an almost natural right. I hope the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has, since this matter was up a couple of weeks ago, seen his way to grant relief to the section of country to which I refer. Whilst we are interested in the proper preservation of fish it seems to me that these regulations might be so modified as to permit comparatively harmless modes of fishing.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman who has moved for the correspondence has not overstated the value of the fisheries in the North-West. The view that we took of this matter was that it was unwise strictly to apply the rules and regulations in the case of the settlers in the North-West, the same as they are applied in the older Provinces. I considered that the settlers going into that new country would, perhaps, have to depend largely upon the catch of fish for their subsistence for some considerable time, and therefore I thought it best to go slowly and cautiously in the enforcement of the Act. But the time has now arrived when some measure of protection should be given to the fish in the waters of the North-West, and I have selected a general officer for the Province of Manitoba and such portions of the North-West as may be allotted to him, and another officer for the Qu'Appelle district; I propose gradually to enforce the regulations in those districts where we may judge it desirable. The hon. gentleman will understand that throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion the close season for fishing varies very much; and that what would be a proper course with respect to Ontario would be improper with regard to the North-West. The Government will obtain information and endeavor to adopt the proper time in each case as the close season. In regard to Lake Simcoe, I may say that last season very large petitions were presented to the Department asking that that lake be set apart for the propagation of fish, on the ground that it had been over-fished and the supply considerably depleted. Acting on the prayer of those petitions an Order in Council was passed, and the lake was set apart for a certain period for fish-breeding purposes. Applications have been made since that time to allow certain parties to fish in the lake merely for domestic purposes. I do not know how far that can be done without leaving the permission liable to be abused. I am making enquiries into the matter, and if it can be possible to allow residents on the lake shore to fish simply for their own use, I see no objections to that being allowed, because I do not suppose that would be done to any extent to greatly interfere with the purpose for which the lake is set apart.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. Minister will remember that, since the Order in Council has been in force, permits have been granted to fish during the summer. It seems impossible to understand how, if it was legal to grant permits to fish during the summer, it is illegal to grant permits to fish during the winter.

Mr. McLELAN. I am not prepared to say for what purpose permits have been granted. I do not know what the local officer may have granted, contrary to orders, or because he was not informed in time that the lake had been set apart for fish-breeding purposes, I will make enquiries.

Mr. HESSON. It was not my wish in any way to prevent a settler from obtaining such quantity of fish as he might require for family use. But I pointed out that quantities to the extent of twenty-five tons in one case had been contracted for between November and December.

Mr. WATSON. I hope the remarks made by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) will receive the attention of the Minister.

tion of the Minister and that settlers will not be prevented from taking a reasonable amount of fish for their own use. I am not very well posted as regards the spawning season; but I was informed that with respect to the white fish in Lake Manitoba, fishing could be allowed one month later than at present. The Minister, no doubt, will know the proper season, and will look into the matter. I hope that the privilege of the settler to catch fish for his own use will not be overruled.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). I think there are some neighborhoods in Ontario which will be very glad to know that the Department of Marine and Fisheries is exercising some control over fishing in those sections. I know of one place, where the fishing is supposed to be of some magnitude, which only knows of the existence of fishery inspectors when the departmental reports show that they have drawn their salaries. There have been frequent complaints, I am given to understand, made to those fishery inspectors in regard to dams in that particular locality, but no attention has been paid to those complaints by the inspectors. Whether the representations have reached the Department or not, I am not prepared to say. I am glad to have this opportunity of drawing the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the fact that in one or two sections of western Ontario very serious complaints have been made, and persistently made, in reference to the obstructions of rivers by dams and other obstacles, thus preventing free fishing in those waters that would otherwise be afforded to the people of those localities.

Mr. ALLEN. A great many complaints have been made by the fishermen on Georgian Bay and Lake Huron. In regard to the use of pound-nets I would recommend the Minister to make enquiry among the fishermen who work on these lakes and others connected with the fishing business. It appears pound-nets are the great cause of complaint. The legal size of gill-nets is five inches, through which small fish pass and only the large ones are taken, while those pound-nets, I understand, are in some cases only 2 or 2½ inches. The fishermen of course complain of the advantage given to those using pound-nets, who catch all sizes of fish and destroy more young fish in a single pound-net than ten miles of gill-nets. I ask the Department to make enquiries into this matter from the parties interested, those who are thoroughly acquainted with the importance of the fishing business in those waters, and I believe the Department will obtain information of very general interest and advantage to the fisheries of the Province.

Mr. EDGAR. As the discussion has taken a somewhat wide range, I want to put in a word for a class of fish not alluded to here—the speckled trout, the beautiful salmo fontinalis. I am sure there is scarcely a county in Ontario where there are not streams which were once stocked with this beautiful and useful fish. If the inspectors, under the Minister's direction, would pay some attention to prevent people taking those fish off their spawning beds, a great boon would be done to the country. I also think that sportsmen and proprietors of farms all through the country would deem it to be of great advantage if the Government would take care to have some of the best streams restocked with spawn or the young of speckled trout. That fish is a great source of pleasure and delightful sport to great numbers of people, and if it was thoroughly protected it would increase the food supply of the country. This is a matter which does not appeal to the House so prominently as the great fishing interests of the tidal waters or the great lakes and rivers, but it is a matter which appeals to hundreds and thousands of people in the different Provinces.

Mr. HILLIARD. I cannot altogether agree with the remarks of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) that the restrictions in regard to fishing should be withdrawn. I object to spearing fish even for a person's own use during the close season. I consider the protection of fish in the close season is of great advantage in our section of the country, and since the regulations have been in force, the quantity of fish has been largely increased.

Mr. FISHER. I agree with the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, and I can speak from experience in my own county. I am aware that in consequence of the action of the Minister of Marine in protecting fish, there has been a great increase in the number of fish there, to the great material advantage of the people of that community.

Mr. McLELAN. The meaning I intended to convey was not that these waters should be closed entirely to spear fishing, but that no one should be permitted to spear fish during the close season.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC RESERVES OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria) moved for:

Return of all correspondence, papers and documents which have passed between the Imperial Government and the Dominion Government, or the Dominion Government and the Government of British Columbia, relative to the public reserves of British Columbia and to the claim of the Crown to the land between high and low water mark, and generally all information as to "Fore Shore" rights of the Dominion.

He said: It is not my intention to detain the House more than two or three minutes upon this subject. The reason I call for this correspondence is partly upon the solicitation of many influential people in the Province of British Columbia; partly on a telegram recently addressed to my colleague and myself by the hon. the Premier of British Columbia, and partly from a thirst for knowledge relating to that element which I ploughed for so many years, and consequently obtained a reasonable nautical knowledge of, and which I am desirous of having backed up by possessing the necessary legal knowledge. This subject may be divided into two divisions, and each division into three sub-divisions. As to the two divisions, the first refers to lands generally, and the second to tidal waters. As to the first sub-division of the land I desire to obtain information, particularly in regard to what lands belong to the Imperial Government or lands that at one time belonged to the Imperial Government before Confederation; next, those lands which belong to the Dominion Government, and information regarding them; and lastly those lands which belong to the Province, or are known as provincial lands. As to the second division—waters—the sub-divisions are, first, those having reference to persons who have been utilizing certain portions of certain harbors, by erecting piers and docks upon them, and thereby arrogating to themselves that they have some prescriptive right to the bed the sea in those localities. The second sub-division is the foreshore, or such lands as have at different times been submerged, or are lying between high and low water mark; and lastly the riparian rights, or those rights which individuals may possess with reference to the banks of rivers and pertain to them. Now these are matters that it would be difficult possibly for a nautical man to elicit information upon without engaging legal assistance; but I hope if the Government bring these papers down—which will no doubt be ere long, though I hope not too long—I shall then be in a position to state my views and cite instances where difficulty has arisen owing to the absence of knowledge on these subjects.

RECORD IN THE MATTER OF EUGÈNE GOSSELIN.

Mr. AMYOT (Translation) moved for:

Copy of the record in the matter of Eugène Gosselin, of St. Charles de Bellechase vs. The Queen, as it stands in the office of the Supreme Court of Canada, including the proceedings before the Exchequer Court and before Dominion arbitrators.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I do not see why, the other day, when motions to be adopted without discussion were presented, this motion was not allowed to be presented as well. I do not see what objection there can be to this motion. At all events, since its presentation was objected to, it must be that somebody had something to say on the subject. I am bound to say that my object is to show to this House that the Board of Dominion Arbitrators does not at all carry out the object for which it has been created, at least in the Province of Quebec. It appears from the records asked for that these commissioners have no idea whatever of what is legal evidence. They know neither the French language by themselves nor the English language by their secretary. It is absolutely impossible for any party to obtain justice before that court. For some time past several of the cases heard before that tribunal have been brought before the Exchequer Court, and not one of their decisions has been maintained; in each case the decision has been against the Government. It is well known that these commissioners always decide in favor of the Government; and so true is this, that in each appeal the amount awarded by them has been considerably increased. In the present case, in the case of Mr. Eugène Gosselin, the proceedings are perfectly absurd on the very face of them, and their absurdity is only excelled by the decision of the arbitrators. It is a fact that this tribunal has become a constant danger in our part of the country. I have obtained recently the papers respecting the loss of horses belonging to a man named Plante, and I will give you an idea of the conduct of these arbitrators. The investigation was regularly held before them; the counsels for the Government and for the prosecution were present. The judgment of the arbitrator in charge of the case was favorable to the prosecutor, and the records were transmitted to the Minister of Justice, I believe. Subsequently it was ordered that a new witness should be heard, but this witness was examined ex parte, without notice being given to the prosecutor or to his lawyer; and it was only several months afterwards that it was learned that a judgment, contrary to the first one, had been rendered. I ask that the papers mentioned in my motion be brought down, in order to show that the Bill which is now before the House, and which provides for the establishment of another court, is a justifiable change, and a change in the interest of the public. I will now listen to what there is to be said on this motion, and I shall answer if necessary.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman does not seem to have been able to guess why anybody should have objected to this motion. The objection to which he alludes, I suppose, was the fact that several of us called "stand" the other day when it was proposed to pass this as a motion without debate. It is evident from the explanation which the hon. gentleman made that there was room for explanation with regard to the motion; and so far as I can understand the explanations he has made, they are to the effect that he wishes to show by a copy of this record for which he asks that the procedure before the Dominion Arbitrators, and before the Supreme Court was not of a character to do justice to those who have suits against the Crown. The reason why I thought this motion required explanation, and the reason why I still think it requires further explanation, and is open to objection is this: This is a case in which I believe the hon. gentleman is interested for the parties concerned—at least I have been so informed by some parties who appear to know. The record asked for is one which can be obtained from the proper officer of the court on paying the usual fees. The record asked for is one which is required, I believe, to carry the case further. At all events, it would be useful for the further conduct of this particular case, and I object to this House being made the means of obtaining records from any court to be used in the conduct of a case before that court. I think it is unfair to the court, it is unfair to other lawyers concerned in these cases, who may not have the privilege of being members of this House, and it is unfair to this House, whose officials are already, it is said, overburdened in the preparation of returns concerning matters of purely public interest. When a case is one of private interest only, in which private litigants are suing the Crown, and where the record will be useful for carrying on the case, it should be obtained in the usual way from the officers of the court. I hope the hon. Premier will give attention to the case, and, after looking into it, will decide, calmly and judicially, whether this is such a return as needs to be brought down in the public interest, or whether it is merely a return required for the conduct of the case itself. In the latter case I think it is one that should not be granted.

After Recess.

Mr. AMYOT. Before six o'clock I had the honor to move for certain records, and I stated in the French language what was my object in doing so. It was to prove that the court of the Dominion Arbitrators does not give justice, and that the law proposed by the Government to replace that court is expected by the whole Province to which I belong. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) opposes my motion, stating that my object was not what I had said, but was to obtain gratuitously a copy of a certain record, and he strongly objected, stating that I was personally interested as attorney in the case, and that the expense was large. I am very thankful to him for giving me the occasion to say a few words about an order given by the Supreme Court concerning the records to which he refers. But I must state first that the person who gave him the information concerning this affair gave him false information. I wish to state, as a matter of fact, that I am not interested in that record, and am no party to the case. It is true, Mr. Gosselin is one of my clients; it is true, I know all about the affair; but I would not mix up in it as attorney, because he belongs to my county, and I do not practise in my county; and besides, it is likely to give rise to difficulty with the public if a member of Parliament interests himself in a case for or against the Government. So that my hon. friend from West Elgin has been misinformed, and has falsely and wrongly informed this hon. House. I am sorry he is not in his seat, or I suppose he would apologise at once. Suppose for a moment that my object was to obtain a copy of that record against the rule laid down by the Supreme court. What is the object of that rule? I think the party who gave that wrong and false information must be the party who obtained the passage of that rule, which says that no record shall leave for one minute the custody of the clerk of that court. There is no court in the Province of Quebec where such a rule prevails. The officers and judges of the courts in the Province of Quebec have generally confidence enough in the attorneys practising there to give them access to the records on mutual consent; and if the Registrar of the Supreme Court thinks that the lawyers who practise there are not honest enough to be entrusted with the records, I think his opinion must give a very poor idea of those with whom he has been dealing up to the present time. Such an order, I know, exists in the Supreme Court, but it is an absurd order. Suppose I were interested in a voluminous record, I would have to go to the court to take communication of the record every time I wanted it. I would not be allowed to take it to my office or have it removed in any way. Well, I have been interested in lawsuits involving millions of dollars, and never has such a thing occurred in my practice. Such a rule adopted by the Supreme Court is an insult to the bar; it is an injustice; and I am sure, as soon as the attention of the learned judges who preside over that court is drawn to that order, they will cancel it. The fact is that the one who must have given that false information to the hon. member for West Elgin is the same one, I suppose, who does the best he can to make that Supreme Court disagreeable to a great portion of this Dominion. He forces lawyers to choose agents here at a great expense, and when the bill of costs is taxed he gives one-tenth of what should be allowed, and of what we have to pay to the agent imposed upon us. That great magnate will not allow us to do anything without having an agent. I think this officer, who has so many good friends here, might do something better than send delegates here to prevent what he thinks is not in the public interest. Now, it might be asked, what would be the cost of that copy? Well, it will cost from $4 to $5; and the amount of time we have lost in this House in discussing it, perhaps half an hour, will cost let us say, $500 to the country. So, the hon. member for West Elgin may go back to his constituents and tell them, "through a blunder and a mistake I wanted to save $5 to the country, and in order to do that I got the country to incur an expense of $500!" For the future, he had better mix up in things he knows better, and take his information from more reliable sources. I am sorry to have to go into these details; but I wanted the opportunity to say what we think in the Province of Quebec of this by-law, for which I do not hold the Judges responsible. En résumé, I may say that my object is, first, to establish that in the interest of the Dominion we want the new law which is proposed by the Ministry. In the second place, it was given the occasion to my hon. friend to learn that when he receives information from anybody he had better see that the information he receives is reliable; and in the third place, in the future, before bringing on these discussions and making small economies at great expense, giving an ox to have an egg, he will, perhaps, deem it more prudent not to try to prevent other gentlemen from obtaining justice in this House. We have not been so exacting when voluminous records have been asked for by him often for useless purposes.

Mr. BLAKE. A sound rule laid down by the House is that proceedings before a court of justice are not obtained in the House, except for public purposes.

Mr. AMYOT. This is for a public purpose.

Mr. BLAKE. I know. That is the general rule; still more is it the rule when a case is pending and the ultimate decision not reached. The hon. gentleman says he wishes to have this record in order to prove that injustice has been done his friend, Mr. Gosselin, by the Dominion Arbitrators. But the effort to establish whether justice or injustice has been done is now being made before the Supreme Court or the Exchequer Court, which, I understand the hon. gentleman to say, is the court before which this case is pending, and that tribunal will dispose of the question whether there was error in the decision of the arbitrators or not. If the gentleman will reflect he will see that though he may be able to prove that the officers this Government appointed as Dominion Arbitrators are incompetent, and that through their incompetency a miscarriage has ensued, that will not dispose of the principle of the case. The hon. gentleman spoke as if it were admittedly a proper thing that the records of a court should not be merely investigated by members of the bar at the office of the court, but should be also delivered over into their custody. That may be the course adopted in Quebec, but it is not the course adopted in Ontario, and it is not deemed an insult in that Province that the records of the court are not entrusted in the hands of the profession. I know it does sometimes happen that records disappear.

Mr. AMYOT. My object is not to decide the principle of the case at all, but to prove by the record itself the incompetency of the Dominion Arbitrators. As to the handing over of the records, that is done in the Province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman says it is not done in Ontario. Well, we object to the customs of Ontario binding us; we want our own customs to prevail with us.

Motion agreed to.

BOUNDARY LINE—ALASKA AND BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. GORDON moved for :

Copies of all correspondence having reference to the appointment of a Joint Commission with the United States Government for surveying the boundary line between the Province of British Columbia and the United States territory of Alaska.

He said: It is very important that the territorial limits of Canada should be clearly defined at the earliest practicable date. You are aware, Sir, that the boundary line between British Columbia and the United States territory of Alaska is practically undefined. Questions of jurisdiction may arise at any moment, which may cause trouble between the two Governments. For my own part, I do not anticipate any trouble as likely to arise, so long as the people who go in to the undefined territory are from the law-abiding classes of the two countries; but other persons may go in, of a different character, who may cause trouble, out of which questions of civil and criminal jurisdiction may arise. Other considerations to which I need not refer, point to the desirability of having the boundary line clearly defined by actual survey. The truth of the old adage, that you must travel from home to get the news, has, strange to say, been brought to my notice to-day. Some trouble seems to have occurred between the United States and Mexico, with regard to the boundary, through military parties of the one or other nation crossing in to each other's territory in pursuit of horse thieves and marauders, and with your permission I will read the article, taken from the New York World, dated the 15th inst. :

"I don't clearly see what sense there is in making such a fuss about Mexicans and Texans crossing an imaginary boundary line after horse-thieves and murderers. We have established precedents enough for it in British Columbia. A military expedition was sent from Washington Territory to Alaska, across lots, as late as 1883, by order of the Department Commander and in defiance of British law and rule. The same year Lieut Schwatka crossed for nearly 1,000 miles on British soil, with an armed body of United States troops, by order of Gen. Miles. Schwatka might have had the flimsy excuse that he didn't know where the boundary was, because it had not then been surveyed; but expeditions have since been ordered over the same route and there is at this moment an expedition in Alaska under Lieut. Allen, with orders to cross over to the Youkon and follow it for three or four hundred miles into British territory. This is a wanton invasion of neutrality, but our Canada neighbors have got used to it and seem to like it."

That is news to British Columbia. We have been under the impression that no trouble whatever has arisen between the two Governments on that coast since the settlement of the San Juan difficulty. For my part, I have never heard that any permission was asked, granted or taken, to cross with a military expedition through British territory to Alaska, and I must say that, if there had been, it would have been very hard upon the military, as far as my knowledge of the country goes it is a most difficult country for military transportation. The Montreal Herald, commenting upon the above, states that :

"Such statements can scarcely fail to attract the attention of the Canadian Government and elicit explanations in Parliament. If a foreign power has been making such free use of Canadian territory, without permission asked or received, it is well we should have the information from some official source, and learn the why and wherefore. When Canada was sending troops from the east to put down the Red River rebellion our Government asked permission of the United States Government to be allowed to pass the force through the Sault St. Marie canal, and the favor was refused. As a consequence, the troops had to follow the Dawson route, at a great cost to the Dominion Treasury. Under these circumstances it would have been only proper in the United States authorities to have acted somewhat differently from what the World represents them as having done. It is possible that the World is mistaken and that the United States Government is innocent of the gross discourtesy of which the World appears to boast."

So far as my observation has led me, the Government of the United States and Canada on the Pacific coast have been working in the greatest harmony, and I am sure the friendship existing between the two peoples is of the most cordial character. We had an instance of the courtesy between the two Governments in the case of the naval force of each Government, on different occasions, rendering aid to the citizens and subjects of the other. In one case, one of Her Majesty's ships was sent to Sitka, when the United States citizens were afraid of an Indian war, and prevented any trouble amongst the Indians as against the citizens of the United States; on another occasion, when there was a report got up in the papers of British Columbia that dangers of an Indian war at Metlakatla was imminent, the United States sent their revenue cutter Oliver Walcott to the scene promptly, and, so far as I have been able to ascertain, the feeling which was exhibited on those occasions by the two Governments found hearty sympathy amongst all classes of the people on both sides of the line, and I am sure that the article in the New York World cannot possibly have any foundation in fact. The Government will be able to explain whether there is any foundation for such statements, and I am sure, if there is any correspondence upon the subject of the boundary, they will bring it before the House. I also believe they will deem it their duty, in the interests of Canada, to have a practical survey of that boundary established as early as possible, in order to avoid any complications arising in future.

Mr. HOMER. As seconder of this motion, I will say that we, in British Columbia, consider it very important that the boundary line between the United States Territory of Alaska and British Columbia should be surveyed and marked out as early as possible. That country is supposed to be rich in mineral wealth on both sides of the line, and in the case of rich discoveries being made, a large influx of miners and other people would take place, over whom it would be necessary for this Government to extend its jurisdiction; but, in the absence of a boundary line being established, it would be quite impossible for these miners and other people to know whether they were occupying United States territory or the territory of the Dominion. Complications might therefore possibly arise, of a very serious nature. We all know, and I believe our hon. friends from the Province of New Brunswick particularly, the disastrous results occasioned by the delay in the case of the northeast boundary, which was finally settled under the Ashburton Treaty; and to prevent a similar result in the north-west part of the Dominion. I hope the Dominion Government, in connection with the Government of the United States, will, at the earliest possible moment, take steps for the purpose of surveying and marking out the boundary line between the United States territory of Alaska and British Columbia.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have listened with attention to the remarks made by the hon. the mover of this resolution, and especially to the extract he read from an article or a correspondence in a United States paper. That article had already received the attention of some of the Ministers. I had seen it myself and had enquired about the truthfulness of the statements made in it. We found no trace of any such statement being correct. This matter never came to our cognisance, and therefore we must consider it as not being founded in fact until the contrary is proved. On the other hand, I will say that, so far as the relations between the United States Government and Canada are concerned, the most amicable relations have existed and exist now. Whenever the United States Government have wished to cause some of their troops to pass over our territory for survey, or for some other reason, special permission has been asked and has been granted, in the same way as the request has been made, and I have no doubt that, if a similar request were made on the part of our Government, the same permission would be given. Of course, there was an allusion made to the time when we had troops to send to Manitoba, and to the fact that these troops were not allowed to go through the Sault Ste. Marie canal. That may be, but things at all events have changed since that period, and I must say that the relations between the two Governments are of the most friendly nature possible. The hon. gentleman says that a survey ought to be made, and another hon. member from British Columbia, who has spoken, has dwelt upon the necessity of having a survey of the boundary line between British Columbia and the United States territory of Alaska. Well, this matter has been brought to the attention of the Government several times, and I have no doubt that one day a survey will have to be made. But the absolute necessity of such a survey has not yet appeared; and as the Government had to make a great many other expeditions of a more pressing nature, we have thought this matter might be delayed. However, the Government will not lose sight of it. There is no objection to the address.

Mr. MILLS. This matter was under the attention of the Government some years ago. After some correspondence with the American Government on the subject, it was found that the survey of this boundary would cost between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000, and on account of the very serious expense it would entail, neither Government was disposed to carry on the delimitation of the boundary between the American possessions and British Columbia. I think in 1877 a Mr. Hunter was appointed by the Canadian Government to mark the boundary, according to the treaty of 1825, at certain important points. That was done, and the American Government agreed to accept that, for the time being, for all practical purposes, as the limitary line between their possessions and our own. There is no doubt that if the country is occupied by miners on both sides, in so far as the territory is occupied, it will be necessary to ascertain where the true boundary is; but considering the very large expense that will be required for the purpose of laying down the boundary, I do not suppose that either Government are disposed at the present time to undertake that survey.

Motion agreed to.

RETURN TICKETS ON GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS.

Mr. WELDON moved for:

Return of any orders or instructions of the Railway Department as to the sale of return tickets, limiting the periods in which such tickets can be used; also, of any claims made by persons holding such tickets for damages for being ejected from the cars, and what amounts, if any, have been paid for such claims.

He said: I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Railways to what has caused a great deal of annoyance in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, with regard to return tickets on railways. At one time, a regulation was passed, by which parties could get a return ticket and use it at any time; but, some time ago, regulations were made, by which the time of using tickets was limited from three to seven days, if I remember aright, and after that time had expired the tickets could no longer be used. This has been a cause of a great deal of trouble. Some time ago, a gentleman holding a position under the Provincial Government, came from Newcastle to Moncton, and happened to stay over two days. Going back he offered a return ticket, and the conductor said he must pay his fare. He declined to pay it, and was ejected from the cars; he was not even allowed to return for his valise, and it was lost. Whether he has made a claim on the Government for damage I do not know, but I understood he is about to commence an action. Another case was one, an account of which I will read from a local paper:

"A young lady from some part of Cumberland county went to Truro to make arrangements for attending the Normal School during the present winter. After making the necessary arrangements in town, she deposited her money in the savings' bank, bought a return ticket, and went home to remove her effects to town. While at home her mother unfortunately was taken ill, which detained the girl at home some days beyond the time marked on her ticket (she did not seem to be aware of the limitation). Finally she came to Wentworth station, on her return to Truro, got her trunk checked and took her seat in the car. Soon after the train started the conductor came along."

Then, after some remarks concerning the conductor:

"On looking at the young girl's ticket, he pompously told her it was no good; that the time had expired. She explained to him the circumstances, told him her money was in the savings bank in Truro, and that her bank book was in her checked trunk. The great man with the rotund figure, blue coat and brass buttons was inexorable; he would not listen to any explanation; and savagely told the girl that unless she paid the fare into Truro he would put her off the train at the next station. The girl offered him her waterproof as security, but he refused to accept that, and finally demanded the check of her trunk, which she gave him, he telling her that she could redeem it at the station in Truro. On getting to Truro he handed the check to an official, with instructions as to its disposal. Next morning the young girl came to the station to redeem her trunk, and explained the circumstances to the officer to whom the conductor had given the check. The officer in question, feeling annoyed at the conductor's attempt to make him a party to so ungentlemanly and boorish a trick, promptly handed the girl her check, and when the pompous conductor subsequently returned and demanded the fare which he supposed would be collected from the girl, he was properly snubbed and informed that Truro station would not be made a pawn shop for him. As might be expected, he went off mad and crestfallen."

Several other instances of a similar nature have come to my notice. It seems to me that when a person takes a return ticket he ought to be able to use it at any time; it makes very little difference to the railway, and it is a great accommodation to the public, because persons are frequently detained. If I am correctly informed, persons going from Newcastle to Moncton can only get a ticket for only two days. It may be alleged that there may be frauds by persons disposing of return tickets. That, of course, may happen even with limited tickets, but in these cases the conductors of the train, knowing the parties who travel, can easily check any fraud of that kind. The circumstances to which I refer took place in November or December last; but I find that even so late as the 10th of March another instance took place, as follows:—

"It is said that a bailable writ has been served on a conductor on the Intercolonial Railway, who runs on the northern accommodation train between Moncton and Campbellton, for putting off a passenger who tendered a return ticket, the date of which had run out, and who had refused to pay the extra fare. Probably no regulation on the road has caused so much trouble and annoyance to the travelling public and to the passenger department of the Intercolonial Railway as the enforcement of the rules respecting the time of use of return tickets. Since it has been put in force the general ticket agent at Moncton has been repeatedly threatened with legal action for the recovery of extra fares exacted from passengers, and it is said settlements have been made, in order to prevent the matter going into court. Conductors have several times been instructed to give one, two and three days grace to passengers travelling on return tickets, with the view of arriving at an amicable settlement of the difficulty, but there seems to be as much difficulty experienced as before. The public will watch with interest the result of the case in which proceedings have been taken."

I trust that some regulations will be made which will give more accommodation to the public and prevent this annoyance and inconvenience. Not only so, but the Department may be involved in considerable expense in defending suits for damages, as this extract shows a case will probably be brought against one of the conductors, in order to test the legality of such action. It seems to me that in order to avoid any litigation and to prevent annoyance to the public, the Government should alter this regulation and allow return tickets to be used at any time, thereby giving more accommodation and facility to the travelling public without causing any detriment or loss to the railway.

Mr. FOSTER. I rise merely to endorse, so far as I can, the remarks which have fallen from the member for St.

John (Mr. Weldon). I have heard a great many complaints with respect to the annoyance caused by these return tickets. I do think that the Intercolonial could, by some means or other, look after what cases of fraud might be liable to occur, without making and maintaining a regulation which causes so much annoyance to a great many people who live alongside the railway and travel on the road. It would not be so bad if the regulation were carried out. I remember, when passing over a part of the line last year, after the regulation had been made, asking the conductor if he rigidly adhered to that rule. He said he did not. The rule either should not be made, or it should be regularly maintained. I think there is no necessity for the rule being made. It has the effect, I know, in the country through which the railway passes, of making farmers who go to St. John, and are in the habit of buying return tickets, fearful as to buying them. They do not know at what date they will be able to return. They want to take advantage of the return tickets, yet they dare not, for fear of trouble arising. This drives many of them to take passage in second-class cars when they would otherwise ride first-class. I sincerely hope this regulation, if it has been made by the Minister, may be reconsidered, and if it has been made simply by the officials, it may receive the careful consideration of the Department and, if possible, be changed.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I desire to add my testimony to that of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. The system in question is giving rise to a great deal of dissatisfaction, and giving rise to a great many complaints in the section from which I come. For my own part, unless the present rule can be changed somewhat, with respect to return tickets, I think it would be well to abolish them altogether. I can hardly see, in the case of the Intercolonial, why the system of return tickets should be adopted. The object of return tickets with ordinary railway companies is to give the traveller an advantage and secure his return by the same road, and not by some competing road. In the case of the Intercolonial there is no competing road; the travel both ways has to go over the same road. If the rates charged for single tickets can be reduced, a reduction should be made and return tickets abolished. But if return tickets are to be issued at all, they should allow the purchaser to return at any time he chooses.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no objection to the adoption of the motion, and I am sorry the Acting Minister of Railways is not present in his seat, at the moment, to speak on this subject. Of course, it is the duty of the Government to see that, while all reasonable accommodation should be given to the public, the Intercolonial should be made as profitable as possible. I presume that, in the regulations for return tickets and the limiting of the time, the Intercolonial is doing as other railways are doing. I find the practice obtains on other railways of the country which are run on commercial principles, and they have, from experience, found out how best that advantage can be secured by a limitation of time. We will bring down the returns asked for by the hon. member who made the motion and those who spoke in favor of it.

Mr. BLAKE. I cannot agree with the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) in his idea that there is no necessity for return tickets on the Intercolonial, as it is a local road. As I understand, the commercial principle on which return tickets are issued is, that more people can be induced to travel if you give them the inducement of cheap rates. You say to a man, you can go to St. John and back for so much. But there is not the same inducement if you say he can return at any time. In such a case all the tickets bought would be return tickets and no single rate tickets would be purchased. We must establish some general principle as applying to the railway. We must give inducements to the people to travel over the road as much as possible, but with a reasonable limitation, as regards return tickets, which will give travellers the benefit they expect to obtain, namely a cheap rate. Hon. gentlemen are aware that we do not make a great deal of money out of the Intercolonial.

Mr. POPE. I am sorry I was not in the House when the hon. gentleman made his motion. The time for which return tickets were given has been almost doubled. But finding abuses arose from the issue of return tickets, the Department determined that the time for which tickets should be issued would depend on the length of journey—a short time for a short distance. We have nearly doubled the time for which those tickets were formerly available, but we have determined that the time shall not be exceeded.

Mr. WELDON. Up to a short time ago there was in practice no limitation as to the time for which return tickets were available. Since a change was made the annoyance has been very great. The time allowed from St. John to Sackville is four days, and that only gives a traveller two days in St. John. From Newcastle to St. John the same time is allowed. Where four or six days only are allowed, circumstances may arise by which a person is detained, and he may lose his ticket. Such a regulation renders it much more likely for return tickets to be sold. That would be avoided by the Government giving the public the benefit of a longer time.

Mr. POPE. The hon. gentleman seems to suppose that we have restricted the time, compared with what it was formerly. He is very much mistaken. We have nearly doubled the time for which the tickets were formerly available.

Mr. BLAKE. The time allowed on return tickets from St. John to Sackville, four days, is a very short time, compared with what we obtain on commercial railways in the west, where it is six days, exclusive of Sunday.

Mr. POPE. I am not saying anything as to that; I say the hon. gentleman has no reason to complain, in comparison with what previously existed. I do not remember now what the previous time was, but I do know that it is now nearly double.

Mr. BLAKE. It does not seem to be long enough.

Mr. POPE. It never would be.

Mr. BLAKE. I mean, compared with the experience of other roads, which I think very reasonable. Take, for instance, the Great Western division of the Grand Trunk. On short distances on that line you get six days, exclusive of Sundays, as the ordinary time.

Mr. POPE. What distances?

Mr. BLAKE. I have travelled 50, 60, or 100 miles.

Mr. POPE. We have nearly doubled the time, but if experience shows that the time is not long enough, we will give longer time; but we must insist on that time, whatever it is, being observed.

Mr. VAIL. I think my hon. friend the Acting Minister of Railways is mistaken as to the time. I know that a short time ago I expected to go to Montreal. I enquired of the ticket agent at Halifax the time I would have for a return ticket, and he told me the number of days, and I think it was less than half the time formerly given.

Mr. POPE. That is just where the hon. gentleman is wrong. The fact is, it is double the time formerly given. We found that abuses were creeping in under the old arrangement, and we extended the time, nearly doubling it.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the principle of giving return tickets is a very good one, but I imagine it would be in the interests of the travelling public if the same system were adopted in this country as prevails on some American roads: that is to sell a book of tickets, paying so much per mile and travelling when you like, or in whatever direction. I cannot understand why there should be any distinction between a person travelling one day and a person travelling on another. If a person pays for 100 miles of travel he should be able to take out the value of that ticket and there would be no trouble or expense to the company; there is no difference to the company whether he travel on the 1st of the month, the 15th or the 30th. There might be some difficulty in making up the books, but I think that might be done away with by selling, as is done on the St. Paul and Minneapolis, and other American lines, ticket books, containing a number of tickets, each one representing a mile of travel. Under such a system there would be no difficulty about passengers coming back within the time they expected, or not. I must say I think that the Bill passed last year or the year before, destroying the right of a passenger to be carried over a road when he paid for the whole trip, unless he kept within the stipulations and limitations of the company, was a great mistake; and I think the day will come, at no distant time, when railway companies will be compelled to carry passengers over their roads for the distance they paid for their ticket, no matter whether it is within the number of days specified on the ticket or not.

Motion agreed to.

CHARLINCH POST OFFICE.

Mr. BLAKE moved for:

All papers, reports, correspondence, Orders in Council and departmental orders with reference to the appointment or removal of the postmaster at Charlinch post office, or as to a change in the office.

He said: My hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), objected to this motion passing the other day, so I suppose I must give some explanation with regard to it. My explanation is, that I have been informed by a person residing in the locality that this removal of the office, or change of the postmaster, has taken place under unjustifiable circumstances. It is said that the ground upon which the change is made is that the office is now in a more convenient situation. Some years ago the Post Office Department stated that they would move the post office on this account, but since that time the road by which access was had, and which was said to be a bad road, has been improved, under the arrangements made by the Ontario Government for attending to the colonisation roads in these remote districts; and there no longer exists any ground of complaint, and the inspector stated that in consequence the post office should not be removed. Last fall, it is said, notice was received on the subject again, and following on that, a petition was prepared and sent down, with no less than forty-four signatures—a very large number from a sparse rural community, such as that in which the post office is situated—but the petition does not seem to have had the effect of averting the decision of the Government to remove the post office for some distance. It is stated that unfortunately the old postmaster has not the same political proclivities as the hon. the Postmaster General, and that he has been taking his part as a Canadian in some of the violent contests which have taken place in the district of Muskoka; and though I do not say that the Postmaster General himself has been influenced by that consideration—I know he is above that—some of his ardent supporters, who look at these things on a lower level, have, it is said, been moved, on that ground, to make representations to bring about the change. I know that the postmaster has very great claims for consideration; for it seems, from the papers which have been put in my hands, that he was so poor that he was not able to pay his taxes, and the council agreed to grant a postponement of the payment, by reason of his circumstances.

Mr. CARLING. I have no objection to bringing down the papers. I was not aware of the political proclivities of the gentleman in question, but I know that application was made to have the post office removed to a more central situation, for the convenience of the public, and that with the concurrence of the inspector, and on his written report the post office was removed, I believe, to the satisfaction of the neighborhood.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I suppose that on the principle that no one of Her Majesty's subjects should be deprived of the right to have his wrongs brought before the tribunal of the House of Commons, the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) may consider himself justified in bringing this very small matter to the attention of the House. I may briefly state the circumstances of the case, in my own justification, because I would, no doubt, be held responsible in connection with the matter—to some extent, at all events. This post office, as first established, was midway between two settlements, one on the east and the other on the west. The one on the east grew larger and more important than the other, and it became entitled to have a post office, and one was established there. In consequence of this, the post office now called Charlinch became of less value to the settlement generally, and it was inconvenient in all respects. In the first place, it was entirely on one side of the remaining portion of the settlement, and it was also a considerable distance off the road by which the mails were carried, and the mail carrier had to go very considerably out of his way to serve this post office. On these grounds, therefore, the post office was inconveniently situated. But for my own part, I was very unwilling to disturb the postmaster, more especially, if the hon. gentleman will give me credit for the sentiment, because he was a political opponent, and I give my word that in no single instance have I opposed the appointment of a postmaster on political grounds. On the contrary, I have recommended an opponent, when he has been able more conveniently to serve the public than one of my own friends would be. However, the matter came to be discussed in the settlement, and the postmaster of Charlinch agreed to remove the post office to the main road. He gave me that pledge himself. He was allowed more than a year to carry out that pledge. He failed to carry it out, and after that, in consequence of the remonstrances made by the settlers, the Postmaster General had the post office removed. The postmaster therefore has no one to blame but himself; and the change was made entirely in the public interest. The man who has the post office now is perfectly qualified. As to his not paying his taxes, that I know nothing about. On the recommendation of many of the neighbors I think the Postmaster General will find that he was perfectly justified in making the change. So far as I am concerned, I am prepared to take all the responsibility that rests upon me in the matter.

Motion agreed to.

THE LAW OF COPYRIGHT.

Mr. EDGAR moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the following resolutions:—

1. That the present position of the copyright law in Canada is anomalous and unfair to the public, to the printing and publishing trades and to the authors of this country.
2. That without further legislation in the Imperial Parliament the Parliament of Canada is powerless to make laws to deal with the whole question of copyright in Canada, because it has been authoritatively decided that any person who obtains a British copyright possesses the sole and exclusive right of reprinting the work in Canada, and that no legislation of the Dominion can effect such right.
3. That in order to place Canadian publishers upon the same footing as American publishers, in regard to the reprinting of British copyright works, a Bill was unanimously passed by the Dominion Parliament, in the Session of 1872, and reserved for the signification of Her Majesty's pleasure thereon.

4. That Her Majesty's assent was not given to the said Bill, and by the correspondence on the subject which was laid before the House, the reason for the refusal was alleged to be that the provisions of the Canadian Bill were in conflict with Imperial legislation.

5. That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty may be graciously pleased to invite Her Imperial Parliament to except Canada from the operation of the statute of the United Kingdom, respecting copyright, so far as is necessary to give the Parliament of Canada a clear authority to legislate upon all matters respecting copyright in Canada.

He said: In connection with this notice I think there are two questions that will arise, one of a constitutional and the other of a commercial character. If there were no other ground than the broad question of the right of Canada to make laws for itself upon this subject, I do not think that I should have felt at all called upon to bring the matter before the House, but there are practical grievances connected with the present position of the copyright law. There are important trade interests suffering every day. The reading public of this country do not possess the same facilities for a cheap and plentiful supply of literature which I think they ought to have, and the position of Canadian authors is a very unsatisfactory one. Now, I do not at all seek to cast blame upon the Government in this matter. I am perfectly well aware that the hands of the Government are tied behind their backs, just as the legislative powers of this Parliament are fettered by the present condition of the law; and it is in order to relieve the Government and this Parliament from that condition of affairs that I have brought forward this motion. In 1872, when the present leader of the House occupied the same position, it will be recollected that a Bill was passed to remove some of the same grievances which we have to consider to-night. That law was passed under the leadership of the right. hon. gentleman, and was reserved for the signification of Her Majesty's assent. Afterwards, in 1874, when the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) was leading this House, the assent of Her Majesty had not been given, and an Address was unanimously passed by both branches of this Parliament, urging Her Majesty to do so. So that both sides of the House and everybody concerned in Canada seem to be only too anxious to arrive at a solution of this difficult question. I know that no audience has yet been discovered who ever could conscientiously say that copyright was a cheerful subject for a speech. In fact, it is a rather abstruse and difficult question. A story is told of a distinguished British statesman, who was waited upon by a deputation who wished to present their views upon the subject of copyright to him. After listening attentively to them for an hour, and hearing all they had to say, he is reported to have said: "Gentlemen, when you began I did think I knew a little about copyright, but now I am perfectly sure I do not know anything about it, and what is more, I never shall." Now, I dare say I should produce the same result on this House if I went into the whole question of copyright; but I do not intend to do so, and it is not at all necessary that I should. All we require to do is to consider a few points in connection with the application of the law to Canada. They are rather interesting, and not at all abstruse, and I will try to make the discussion as brief as possible. Since this notice has been put upon the paper, several hon. members have asked me: Why is it necessary? Surely this Parliament has the right to make laws upon the subject of copyright? Well, at first sight it would certainly seem that this Parliament had the right to do so, because, by the 91st section of the British North America Act, among other subjects which are placed under the exclusive jurisdiction of this Parliament, there is the subject of copyright; and it was at first undoubtedly supposed that copyright was entirely within the legislative jurisdiction of this Parliament. But it was discovered afterwards that since 1814 the English law upon the subject related not only to British dominions in Europe, as it did before that date, but also extended to all the dominions of the Crown, the colonies and dependencies, wherever they existed. That law was reenacted substantially in 1812. Now, it was claimed that the British North America Act, being more recent, did in effect, repeal that law; it was claimed that the 91st clause of that Act had the effect of overriding previous legislation in England. But that point has been positively decided in the negative. The law officers of the Crown, when they advised Lord Carnarvon as to the question of giving the Royal assent—because the proposed Canadian legislation would interfere with the Imperial Act—to the Act of 1872, which was sent over for that purpose, and was not assented to, advised him to refuse assent, and the same question came up in the Court of Appeal for Ontario, where it was positively and clearly settled that the English copyright law is in force in Canada. What is the result of that? The result is, that the English Act, being a very broad and liberal one, allows foreigners, allows anyone, to take the benefit of it, and it gives anyone the right to copyright in Canada, without reference to any copyright laws which we may choose to put on the Statute Book. It gives them the absolute right to copyright in Canada. We have a Copyright Act, that of 1875, but it is subject to the Imperial Acts, and applies only to those persons who choose to take out a copyright in Canada. Under our Act, any person domiciled in any British possession or in any country that has an international copyright law with England, can take out a copyright in Canada, but on the important condition that the author shall publish his work in Canada. But the English author will not take out a Canadian copyright and will not publish in Canada so long as he has the right to copyright in Canada, without doing so, under the Imperial Act. It is certainly a great hardship to our publishers, that an author should have the right to copyright in this country without being compelled to publish in it. No other country in the world would tolerate such a condition of affairs. There is another provision, with reference to English copyright in Canada, relating to the importing of foreign reprints into Canada. Under the Imperial Act, passed in 1817, and the Order in Council which was passed under it, foreign reprints could be introduced into any colonies which made provision for compensating British authors, whose works were copyrighted in Great Britain; and under that, Canada, in 1850, passed an Act for compensating British authors. They did so by fixing 12½ per cent. ad valorem as an authors' tax, to be paid at the frontier, in addition to the Customs duty on books, and to be collected by the Government for the benefit of the English authors. That was a very good thing for the Canadian public, as far as it went; and it was under it that we have been able to get cheap American reprints of British copyrighted works; but it was very hard on the Canadian publisher, that he could, under no circumstances, reprint the British copyrighted book, while the American publisher could do so, and sell it in Canada under the nose of the Canadian publisher whose hands were tied. It would surely be a good thing for the Canadian publisher if he could also reprint a British copyrighted book on paying the British author the 12½ per cent. authors' tax. That would be good all round. It would be still better if the Canadian publisher could reprint the book that is copyrighted in London and not pay any tax at all, because the publisher in London can reprint a Canadian copyrighted book and pay no authors' tax to the Canadian. In order to try and put the Canadian publisher on something like a level with the American publisher as to these reprints, the Act of 1872 was passed. It certainly seemed very reasonable that while the English copyrighted books could be reprinted in the States and brought into Canada on payment of 12½ per cent. authors' tax, it should be lawful for the Canadian publisher to reprint the work here on the same condition. That was the object of the Act of 1872, which was reserved, and in reference to which this Parliament passed an Address in 1874, unanimously requesting Her Majesty's assent to it. The Address was as follows:—

“Resolved, — That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying His Excellency to be pleased to convey to Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Colonies, the respectful expression of the anxiety of this House, that a Bill intituled ‘An Act to amend the Act respecting Copyrights,’ passed in the Session of 1872, and reserved on the 14th June in that year, for the signification of Her Majesty's pleasure thereon, should not be allowed to elapse by the expiry of the two years limitation specified in the 57th section of ‘The British North American Act, 1867,’ and further to assure His Excellency that important interests in this Dominion are prejudiced by the absence of legislation such as this Bill contemplates.”

Now, Lord Carnarvon replied to that Address, and in his reply he gave the reasons why he could not advise Her Majesty to assent to that Bill. He substantially stated them to be that he had been advised that the Imperial Act of 1842 overrides the Canadian Act and will not allow this Parliament to legislate in the direction of a copyright Act which may in any way affect the British author; and he said that upon this question he was supported not only by the opinion of the then law officers of the Crown, but by the opinions of those eminent lawyers, Lord Selborne and Mr. Herschell, Q.C. So it is perfectly clear how we stand in that matter. There is a provision that the American publisher can reprint and send into Canada, when the British author registers his copyright here, paying the authors' tax; but when he does not register, the American can reprint the work and it will come in here without paying the 12½ per cent. authors' tax. The effect of that seems to be this. The English author makes arrangements with the American publishers and sells him advance sheets, and then he agrees not to register or copyright in Canada. The result is, that the American publisher, who has the advanced sheets, has a great start over all other publishers in the United States, and gets besides, the whole Canadian market, and no Canadian publisher can publish the book. That is not a fancy picture, but it is a case of every day occurrence. The operation and effect of that has been very well described in the judgment of that learned and lamented judge, the late Chief Justice Moss, in a case, the case of Smiles and Belford, which came before the Ontario Court of Appeal. The Belfords were a firm of Canadian publishers who had undertaken to publish a work called “Thrift,” of which Mr. Smiles was the author and owner of the English copyright, and they supposed that the British North America Act gave them ample authority to do so. However, the Court of Chancery granted an injunction, deciding that the Imperial Act of 1842 enables the British author to prevent the Canadian reprint of his work. The Court of Appeal unanimously affirmed that decision, and Chief Justice Moss said:

“I confess that it is not without reluctance that I have arrived at the same conclusion. I fear that the state of the law which we find inflicts a hardship on the Canadian publisher, while it confers no very valuable benefit on the British author. Its effects, if I rightly understand the matter, is to enable the British author to give an American publisher a Canadian copyright. It is no very violent assumption that every American publisher, who treats with a British author for advance sheets of his work, will stipulate for the use of the author's name to restrain a Canadian reprint. By this arrangement he will be enabled to secure the practical monopoly of the Canadian market, for which he may be induced to pay the author some consideration; but however small this consideration may be, I apprehend it will be found sufficient to induce the author to concede the privilege rather than receive Canadian copyright by treating with the Canadian publisher. But I need scarcely remark that the possible or probable effect upon a branch of industry, however valuable or important, cannot affect the interpretation which the court is bound to place upon the statutes by which the subject is governed.”

Now, this extract shows more clearly than I could express it, the unfortunate condition of the law in that point also. Then there is another feature of the case, which presses very hardly upon Canadian publishers. I mentioned before that the English law is very broad and liberal. Under that,
Mr. EDGAR,

American authors secure both English and American copyrights, while an English author cannot possibly secure an American copyright, because their law is much more stringent. It only allows citizens or permanent residents in the United States to obtain copyright. On the other hand, the American author can obtain his own copyright in America and also in England, and thereby he gets Canada thrown in. Without taking out a copyright here, without publishing here, and without paying the slightest attention to the Canadian people, he holds us in the hollow of his hand. He can then sell at the highest possible price. He has an absolute monopoly, which there is no possible way of getting over or breaking, and he can sell his work here, without any possible competition from any quarter, at the highest price that can be obtained for it. For instance, we all know that Mr. Marion Crawford, who is a rather popular recent American author, has published some novels, which have had an extensive sale, such as “Mr. Isaacs” and “Doctor Claudius.” Well, he is in that happy condition as to Canada. He is an American, he gets his American copyright, he gets his English copyright, and he covers Canada, and nobody can introduce reprints here under the provisions I referred to awhile ago, as his American copyright prevents that. He sells his books at a dollar. You cannot get one of those books for less than a dollar, which, I suppose, he thought the maximum price at which it was possible to sell them. The Canadian authors have no opportunity of getting American copyright; but, if we could legislate on the matter ourselves, I think we could very soon make some reciprocal arrangement with our neighbors, by which Canadians would have the benefit of their copyright; and, if we could not do that, we could at any rate, if we had the control of our own Canadian market, reprint their American copyrighted books, even if they did go to England and take out a copyright there. The result of the position is that we are taxed for the English author and our Acts are disallowed for his exclusive benefit, and we have neither the privilege of taxing ourselves nor of legislating for ourselves. It would surely be no hardship upon an English author to have to take out a Canadian copyright before he secured control of our country. He could find Canadian publishers just as well as he can find American publishers to publish his works. I do not think there is any other remedy in this matter than for us to obtain the right to legislate upon this subject. Ever since the Act of 1872 was disallowed, the publishers in this country have been almost in despair. They felt that nothing could be done, and they have come to the conclusion—a great many of them, who have spoken to me on the subject—that the only possible remedy is for us to get the power into our own hands, and make our own copyright laws, just as we do our own laws about patents and everything else. During this Session a petition has been presented to this House from the Toronto Board of Trade, on the subject, by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Beaty), which seems to me to cover the ground very well indeed, and to voice the general opinion of the large publishing and printing interests of this country. The memorial is as follows:—

“That the Imperial copyright law, which has jurisdiction in Canada, presents many anomalies in its operation in the colonies; is prejudicial to the interests of British authors and publishers, whom it is designed to benefit; limits the operations and retards the development of the Canadian book trade, and has an injurious effect on all the industries connected with native publishing.

“That the proximity of Canada to the neighboring Republic, where there is unrestrained license in reprinting English copyrights, and every freedom in sending them into this country, makes the position of Canada an exceptional one in calling for relief from these anomalies, and in asking the Home Government to concede to Canada the privilege of legislating on copyright in accordance with our special needs, and for the protection of such interests as it is desirable to make provision for, and with the same freedom we now possess in legislating on patents.

“That while the present copyright law prohibits the Canadian publisher from reprinting English copyrights in Canada, and places him under penalties for violating the Act, it suffers American reprints (which, in the main, pay no royalty to the author or copyright owner) to enter the country, and practically gives the supplying of the entire book market of Canada to a foreign people.

"That common sense as well as policy dictates that the privileges we give to the foreign manufacturer should be given to the native publisher, while the effect of this would speedily be seen in the development of our own publishing industries, and would enable the English author to derive some benefit from the sale of his works in Canada.

"That were the Canadian publishing trade free to reprint English copyrights, with due recognition of the author's rights, he would not only be in a position to supply the wants of our own people (now supplied by the foreigner), but it would be within his power to extend the area of his operations into the United States, and there endeavor to compete with the piratical American reprint.

"That the effect of this might sensibly aid the efforts now being made in Congress to do justice to the British author, by passing of an International Copyright Treaty.

"That so long as the United States makes no reciprocal concessions in the matter of literature to Britain or to British colonies, Canada should be exempt from respecting the copyright privilege granted by the mother country to American writers, who may produce their works first in England.

"That for all these reasons assigned, your memorialists pray your Honorable House to press upon Government the wisdom and policy of securing from the Home Government the right to legislate upon the whole subject of copyright, domestic and foreign, as may be deemed best for all interests concerned, and with due regard to Canadian publishing industries, and the intellectual and social benefit of the Canadian public."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think that sets forth the case, from a Canadian point of view, in a very clear and unanswerable manner, and I do not see that there is any remedy possible for us, other than the one suggested by these resolutions, namely, that we should ask the Imperial authority to except Canada from the operation of the Copyright Act, so as to enable us to legislate for ourselves. I have read a story told of Mr. John Lovell, the well-known Montreal publisher, who went over to London, in 1873, to try to make arrangements with the firm of Longman's, for publishing some of their copyright works in Canada. His overtures were not at all favorably received. The member of the firm to whom he addressed himself is reported to have told him that he would not allow his books to be published in the colonies, and he added: "Thank God, he had got the power now, and he intended to keep it." Now, Mr. Speaker, if that language was used it was only the utterance of an individual and of a snob, and did not in any sense express the feelings of the English people towards Canada; and much less did it indicate the enlightened views with which British statesmen regard us to-day. All that is necessary is for us to point out to the Home Government that in order to remedy the grievances that are every day pressing injuriously upon the reading public, upon our large printing and publishing institutions, and upon Canadian authors, we absolutely require the right to legislate upon this subject of copyright ourselves. I would go a little further, Mr. Speaker, and I would represent to the Imperial Parliament that the people of Canada have understood, and understand now, that all matters relating to the peace, order, and good government of Canada should be legislated upon exclusively by this Parliament, and that this is one case in which we have not that power, and for practical business reasons we require to have that power now. I think we ought to unite in sending this message to our kin across the sea, and I am perfectly satisfied that the Parliament of England, sitting at Westminster, will give a prompt and speedy consideration to the fair and reasonable request that may be made by this Parliament of Canada sitting at Ottawa.

Mr. DESJARDINS: I have accepted with much pleasure the invitation to second the resolution moved by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar). I consider that if this resolution was carried by this House, and the Government were to act upon it, a further step would be taken in the extension of the National Policy of this country. I thank my hon. friend for having contributed, in this manner, his share towards fortifying the policy that we have been trying to consolidate since 1878.

It was easy for the hon. member to lend us his aid on this question, because it has always united both sides of the House, whenever the matter has been brought before us. In 1872 a Bill passed unanimously both Houses of Parliament, and was reserved for the sanction of Her Majesty. In 1874 a resolution was passed unanimously by both Houses, asking Her Majesty to confirm the Bill, and allow it to become the law of this country. So this cannot be considered a party question, and it is in that sense that I have seconded the resolution of my hon. friend, and in that sense, I am sure, he has proposed it. The reason given for reserving the Bill of 1872 was that it was ultra vires. It had been thought until then that copyright having been one of the matters mentioned in the 91st section of the British North America Act, as coming within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal Parliament, no more difficulty would arise if this Parliament legislated in respect to that matter than with respect to any of the other matters mentioned in that clause. Patent rights, for instance, were placed in the same category with copyrights, and the power of the Federal Parliament to legislate with regard to patent rights has never been questioned. Now, what is the effect of the interpretation given by the Imperial authorities as to the power of this Parliament to legislate in those matters? It has been this: that while our editors have been prevented from reprinting, under any condition, the works of English authors, we have been flooded with American editions, and American publishers have reaped all the benefits in our own country from the exercise of a privilege of which we have been denied. Under such circumstances it is not to be wondered at that all those who have had to deal with this question have come to the same conclusion, that since, according to Imperial interpretation, the British North America Act had not, in reality, conferred upon us the power to legislate on this question, as on others mentioned in the clauses to which I have alluded, the only remedy was to make another move: have a declaration made by this Parliament expressing our desire to that effect, and ask the Government to request the Imperial authorities to pass such legislation as would amend the British North America Act, so as to grant us the power that we understood we had obtained by that Act. In fact, what do we claim by the resolutions now being submitted to the House? We claim only to be put in the same position as the Americans now occupy in our markets. We claim to be subject to the same conditions for printing English or foreign works under international copyright in England as the Americans have been admitted in our markets; and this would have the effect of giving to parties interested in our publishing establishments the means of extending their business, and put them in a position strong enough to enable them to give that encouragement to our native literature which is so much needed, and so incidentally to grant such protection to the productions of native talent which would ensure success. Since Confederation we have obtained much from the Imperial Parliament. In fact, the British North America Act itself was a great step towards giving us independent power of legislation in this country in all matters of our own concern; every occasion that was offered since has been taken advantage of to develop that independence of legislation. In 1875-76 we obtained for our Government the right to advise the Governor General on and take the responsibility of exercising the prerogative of mercy, which was always before acknowledged to be a strictly Imperial power. From time to time our independent legislative power has been conceded, so that now, when we come to this simple question, we naturally ask why, when our right and power to legislate on matters that were certainly more important to English industries than the question of copyright, was acknowledged; when we have been conceded the power even to tax the products of England; when we have been conceded the right to legislate on patents and inventions, we should be prevented from giving to our own population the benefit of a law that would increase our power of disseminating literature and science among our population, and should be obliged to borrow from our neighbors the power we want for the publication of works which we ought to be entitled to publish here as well as our American neighbors to sell. Under these circumstances, as I mentioned at the opening of my remarks, I have much pleasure in seconding the resolution, and I hope no objection will be found to prevent its adoption by this House.

Mr. CARON. The hon. gentleman, the mover of this resolution, stated in his opening remarks, and it certainly did not apply—that the subject he was treating was not one that appealed to most audiences. I can tell the hon. gentleman and the hon. member who has just taken his seat, that they have succeeded in making what I consider most interesting speeches upon a most important question. I claim that in the matter of copyright we, as Canadians, are as interested as any other people in protecting, to the very utmost limit, the property in copyright which exists in this country. But I cannot agree with my hon. friends in the conclusion at which they have arrived, that the law, as it exists, is anomalous or unfair to anybody or any interest in the country. It is well known that the Act of 1875 was passed when the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) was at the head of the Government, after much consultation, correspondence and discussion, with the representatives of the book-printing and book-publishing interests of this Dominion. By the operation of this Act many English authors have, from time to time, taken copyrights in Canada, on editions printed in Canada by our printing and publishing establishments. And I cannot see how the hon. gentleman can state that the public here are not protected, in so far as getting reprints of books into Canada. As I understand it, when British authors do not care to take out Canadian copyrights, or when it does not suit our printers or publishers to take them here, the public get their works in the cheap editions as reprints. Our Canadian authors are protected to the very extreme limit. They have absolute sway and control of the Canadian market, and as I understand it, it is now contemplated in England to accept Canadian copyrights in the same way as copyrights are made to apply to the British Empire by International Copyright Treaties. The British copyrights extend to all British possessions, and as I have already stated, it is contemplated to give the same sway to Canadian and colonial copyrights in England. The British Copyright Act at present is limited in its extent in favor of the Canadian public, in so far as by the Imperial Act, 10 and 11 Vic., supplemented by our legislation, cheap foreign reprints may be imported into Canada, so that the English copyright owner, if he does not choose to reprint the copyright in Canada, must suffer the competition which is created by cheap reprints that are brought into the country. It will be remembered that the Bill of 1872 was refused the Royal assent. One reason why the Royal assent was refused was, that it was an attempt at the piracy of British authors' works in British territory. The Copyright Act of 1875 was accepted as the result of negotiations, and it solved the difficulties which up to that period had existed. It was considered at that time that the Act of 1875 was not trespassing on the rights of property, and in consequence was not refused the Royal assent, which had been refused to the Act of 1872. The Copyright Act of 1875, it will be remembered, was also the subject of a good deal of discussion at the time. It was also in conflict with Imperial legislation affecting this important subject, but it was considered a fair measure, respecting all rights, and it was accepted and assented to. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be understood as saying that there is not a great deal in what has been stated by the hon. gentlemen who have respectively moved and seconded this resolution, but I believe at present the Act of 1875 is working satisfactorily, and I do not believe that the reopening of the question at present would lead to any better results than were obtained by the Act of 1875. If the resolution which is now moved were accepted, I believe that Canadian authors and Canadian copyright owners would lose the benefit contemplated, of having their rights co-extensive with the British copyrights—that is, of being made operative in all British possessions and eventually in all countries having a copyright treaty with the United Kingdom. Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I think that the resolution, which affects most important interests, might be considered for the present to be premature. The hon. gentleman, in the remarks which he made, stated, if I correctly understood him, that the foreign reprints came into Canada without any duty being paid upon them.

Mr. EDGAR. I did not say that; foreign reprints pay 15 per cent. duty.

Mr. CARON. Then I misunderstood the hon. gentleman. I understood him to say that these reprints came into Canada without paying any duty, and the hon. gentleman who seconded the resolution stated that one of his objects was to apply to the copyright question the National Policy, which had been introduced as the policy of the country. Well, I think the Tariff shows, in so far as the interests of these copyrights purchased by Canadians are concerned, that these rights are protected to the very utmost. Upon that question I may say that I was informed that when Dawson Bros., of Montreal, purchased the copyright of "Endymion," in Canada, and the "Seaside" edition of "Endymion" came into Canada, this "Seaside" edition was confiscated, because the copyright had been purchased by a Canadian, and the full protection created by the National Policy was applied in that case, as it is in every other case. Under the circumstances, I believe that the resolution which the hon. gentleman has moved, and which has led to the interesting discussion which we have heard, is not one which, at present, should be passed by the House.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not see, from anything the Minister of Militia has said, what remedy he proposes for the two main difficulties that the publishers and the Canadian public have to face in this matter. We know that there is nothing in the Act of 1875 that meets these difficulties. It is true that the Canadian public can get cheap American reprints of American copyright books. That is all very well, so far as it goes. But why should not the Canadian public get the benefit of Canadian reprints of British copyright books as well as the benefit of American reprints? I can see no reason why they should not.

Mr. BOWELL. He can, if he obtains the right from the English holder of copyrights.

Mr. EDGAR. Yes; a Canadian copyright can be taken out, but I say that Canadian copyright is not taken out.

Mr. BOWELL. What I say is this: that if the owner of an English copyright sells it to a Canadian, he has the right to publish and to control the sale of the book in this country, to the full extent of prohibiting its importation into Canada at all.

Mr. EDGAR. Of course he would, and that is what I would like to make him do. I want to make him come here and publish, either by taking out a copyright directly, or selling to a publisher who would take out the copyright directly. But he is not compelled to do that. He can prevent a single copy of his book being published in Canada, without taking out a copyright here at all, merely by getting an English copyright; and I do not see that we should go back on what we decided in 1872, that Canadian publishers should stand on the same footing as American publishers, in respect of American reprints of British copyright works. The Canadian publishers are to-day, every one of them, ready to pay the 12½ per cent. authors' tax, as the American publishers have to do, if they are only allowed to reprint British books. But they are not allowed to do it, in the present condition of the law; and there is nothing in the Act of 1875 that affects that difficulty in the slightest degree. Then there is the other case: where an American author takes out an English copyright of a book, we cannot have a Canadian reprint at all. The Canadian publisher cannot touch that book at all, except at the will of the author. The trouble has been so great that Canadian publishers have tried to get over it in several ways. They have established printing houses on the other side of the line, so that the printers who might have been employed in Canada, and the paper that might have been bought here, have been employed or obtained there. Toronto publishers have sent the books over to Buffalo or somewhere else, in order to publish there, and then run them back to Canada as foreign reprints. It is a pity we have to do in a clandestine way what the Canadian law ought to permit us to do. The hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) and the hon. Minister of Militia, referred to the National Policy, and I admit that it would be something like a National Policy to pass these resolutions. Let the Canadian publishers get the benefit of the 15 per cent. duty on books. If they were permitted to reprint here a British copyright book, on paying the 12½ per cent. authors' tax, they would have 15 per cent. advantage over the American publishers, who have to pay not only the 12½ per cent. authors' tax, but the 15 per cent. duty, too; I admit that. Now, the suggestion which the hon. Minister of Militia has given to the House is, of course, entirely new to me, namely, that there is some prospect of having a modification in the copyright law in England, to meet some of the grievances we suffer from in Canada, and he leads us to hope that there is a prospect of having an early reciprocity with England in the matter of copyright. I certainly suppose the hon. gentleman would not have made that statement without being satisfied that something of the kind would be done. If that is done, it is certainly something in the right direction; but I am very strongly of opinion that if this House passes these resolutions, and in the most respectful way requests the Imperial Government to place us on a free and independent footing with respect to copyright, Her Majesty's Government will be readier to make whatever concessions ought to be made to Canada in this matter than if we leave it as it stood when the Royal assent was reserved from the Act of 1872. The publishers are feeling the grievances practically. Hundreds of printers would be employed in Canada that are not employed, and we should have competition in Canada with American reprints, if we could legislate in the direction even of the Act of 1872. Therefore, I still strongly press upon the Government the propriety of allowing these resolutions to carry.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The object of this motion I heard the hon. gentleman state in the speech with which he introduced it. I have lost the greater part of the discussion, as I was called away on business; but I have spoken with my hon. friend who has addressed the House, and, with his consent, I would ask that the matter be allowed to stand over. I move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

THE EASTER RECESS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BLAKE. I asked the hon. gentleman, at an early period of the day with reference to a rumor about events in the North-West that he did not know much about.

There is another rumor in the corridors, of practical consequence to us, and that is, as to the proposal of the Government with reference to Easter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government proposes, with the consent of the House, to move, that when the House adjourns on Thursday before Good Friday, it stands adjourned until the Tuesday following, at three o'clock.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10:30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 24th March, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PORTAGE LA PRAIRIE AND LAKE OF THE WOODS RAILWAY AND NAVIGATION COMPANY.

Mr. WATSON moved:

That that part of the report of the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, relating to the report to incorporate the Portage la Prairie and Lake of the Woods Railway and Navigation Company, and declaring that the preamble of said Bill is not proven to the satisfaction of said committee, be not adopted, but that said Bill be referred back to the said committee for further consideration.

Mr. BLAKE. It is quite clear that the report must go back to the committee. The 65th rule of the House states:

"When the committee on any private Bill report to the House that the preamble of such Bill has not been proven to their satisfaction, they must also state the grounds upon which they have arrived at such decision."

No ground was given in this report.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I understand from the Clerk of the House, to whom I spoke on the matter, that the report must go back—that the clerk of the committee did not give the reasons in the report which was presented. Of course, therefore, the hon. gentleman is perfectly in order in making this motion, which I think should carry.

Mr. BLAKE. It is the committee who have to arrive at the conclusion.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. JAMIESON. I should like to ask the Government whether it is possible to fix a day for the second reading of Bill (No. 92) to amend the Canada Temperance Act.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no objection that a day should be fixed. I would fix to-morrow.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The House does not sit to-morrow.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, we will have it to-morrow week.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the best plan would be, as there is a Bill already named first on the Orders, that is, the Bill of the hon. member for Cornwall and Stormont (Mr. Bergin), the Factory Bill, to make this Bill the second. We have no right to interfere with the preference we gave to that hon. gentleman's Bill, and these are the two most important Bills in the hands of private members, I fancy.

Mr. SPEAKER. There must be a motion.

Mr. IVES. There are several other Bills on the same subject, in which I think the House has as much interest as the Bill which the hon. gentleman refers to. If a special day is fixed for this Bill, I think it should be understood that all other Bills on the same subject should be taken on the same day.

Mr. McCARTHY. I would adopt the suggestion of my hon. friend. There are other Bills here with reference to the Canada Temperance Act—

Mr. BLAKE. Have a sort of temperance's feast.

Mr. McCARTHY—and I think all these Bills had better be fixed for the same occasion.

Mr. IVES. I think it requires the pretty unanimous consent of the House that the Order paper should be interfered with in any way.

Mr. JAMIESON. I move that the second reading of Bill No. 92 be the second Order of Public Bills and Orders.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). I object unless the hon. gentleman will consent that all these Bills on the same subject should come up at the same time. It is a question for the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. BLAKE. Let them be moved one at a time as the third, fourth, fifth or sixth Order. They cannot come up all at a time; that would be contradictory.

Mr. ORTON. As there are several Bills, I think preference should not be given to one Bill over another. We know that the Canada Temperance Act, which this Bill is intended to make more emphatic, is regarded by a large number of our people as an unjust and tyrannical Act. There are several amendments to that Act before the House, and there are many who think that this whole question requires revision. Therefore I object to any preference being given to this Bill over others on the same subject.

Mr. BLAKE. I think it would be extremely reasonable that the measures which take the other view of the subject should receive a preferential place on the Order paper as well as this Bill. My hon. friend's motion may be adopted, and then any other member who desires to have a Bill placed in a high position on the Order paper may move to that effect, and I think the House will agree to it.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). If the practice be adopted that any member who has a Bill that he thinks of special public importance, may rise and move that it be given precedence, the result will be to destroy the regularity and upset the order of the proceedings of this House. As I understand, my hon. friend's motion is irregular without notice, and I object to it on that account.

Mr. FISHER. This Bill does occupy an exceptional position. As a matter of fact, we know that it is the Bill embodying the opinions and desires of the Dominion Alliance, a body representing one of the most important classes of people in the country. The Bill is one which has been placed before the Government for their approval, and it is only in consequence of the fact that the Government delayed giving their answer upon that question for no less than a fortnight, that the Bill is so late in coming before the House. Had it not been for that, the Bill would have been before the House and ready for discussion before now. There is another reason why I say this Bill occupies an exceptional position. The hon. gentleman opposite has said that this Bill makes more emphatic the Scott Act. That is not the case, so far as any matter of principle is concerned. This Bill is simply intended to carry out the original intention of the Scott Act, and it is only introduced by the temperance people of this country because in some minor particulars the Scott Act has been proved a little defective, and the temperance people simply wish to make that Act as workable and efficient as possible, not to introduce any new principle. This being the case, I conceive that this Bill occupies an entirely different position from the other Bills alluded to. Still, I have no objection, and I am sure the temperance members of this House would have no objection, to those Bills all coming up together and being all discussed at one time.

Mr. SPEAKER. The order of our proceedings is regulated by our rules, and rule 24 says that all items standing on the Orders shall be taken up according to the precedence assigned to each on the Order paper; and I do not think the order can now be changed without notice. It will be in order on Wednesday of next week for the hon. member to move that the Bill first on the Order paper be not now proceeded with, but that this Bill be taken up instead. The House can then order that that should be done.

Mr. McCARTHY. Notice must be given then.

Mr. SPEAKER. No, a majority of the House will decide that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. On the motion for considering any Order, a member can move that that Order be taken up this day six months.

Mr. BLAKE. For instance, we have the Bill of the hon. member for Cornwall and Stormont (Mr. Bergin) as the first Order; that is disposed of, and we may put that aside; but when the second Order is reached it will be for the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) to move that instead of that, his Bill be taken up, and the majority of the House will determine that question?

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. JAMIESON. I ask leave to withdraw the motion. Motion withdrawn.

ANNUNCIATION DAY—ADJOURNMENT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That when the House adjourns this day, it do stand adjourned until Thursday next at three o'clock.

Motion agreed to.

TARIFF CHANGES.

Mr. BLAKE. I observe that the hon. Minister of Finance has given notice of some very important changes in the proposed tariff resolutions. I presume it is his intention to make some explanation before the House goes into committee, as to the effect of these alterations, so that the House may understand their bearing.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is my intention to do so.

DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. BLAKE. I would further ask the hon. gentleman if he has additional intelligence or communication with reference to the state of affairs in Prince Albert.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government have no further communication.

ENQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. VAIL. I would ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries when we may expect that return with reference to the Hudson's Bay steamers' supplies?

Mr. McLELAN. Some of the staff are at work copying the account, which is very voluminous.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether the return I moved for with respect to the number of depositors holding certain amounts in the savings banks is ready or when it will be ready.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I cannot say when it will be ready, but will make enquiries, and let the hon. gentleman know on Thursday.

Mr. BLAKE. I moved, a long time ago, for papers and correspondence connected with various subsidies, either land or money, to railway companies in the North-West. I observe the hon. gentleman has a notice on the paper to grant subsidies to several railway companies in the North-West.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will have the papers laid on the Table to-night.

Mr. MILLS. When will the papers with reference to the Manitoba boundary and Indian title be brought down?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will make particular enquiry into that.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed adjourned debate on motion of Sir Leonard Tilley to go again into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. COCKBURN. I apprehend that a short contribution to the debate at this juncture will be more in accord with the sentiment of the House than any elaborate statement of the question now before us, and I therefore claim the indulgence of the House while I briefly give my views on public matters according to my light. Sir, the people of Canada are having rare opportunities of studying the political ethics of the country. We have had this question discussed for the past seven or eight years; but notwithstanding all the discussions, I daresay it will be difficult for people to arrive at a definite conclusion amid all the contradictory statements made. However, experience, which is the best educator of all, has cleared up several points in this controversy, and to some of these points I propose to address myself. Ever since the change of Government, in 1878, we find hon. gentlemen opposite attributing lack of patriotism to hon. gentlemen on this side when we say that matters are not so prosperous and are not satisfactory, not only in respect to the National Policy but also in respect to several other matters, which come within the domain of Dominion administration. These gentlemen are troubled with rather short memories, because if they would consider the attitude they assumed in 1878 and contrast it with our attitude to-day they would find that while in our case there is magnanimity, there is in the other the opposite quality. Our attitude is much more lenient than that of our hon. friends opposite. It is within the lively recollection of hon. gentlemen in this House that the line taken by hon. gentlemen opposite during the régime of my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie), was to state that ruin was broadcast and the Government of the day were responsible for the depression of trade then existing. In fact every business trouble was made known and heralded abroad, and whenever a manufacturing establishment had to close, either for repairs or other reasons, its closing was heralded from the house-tops in and just prior to 1878. Hon. gentlemen opposite also made special promises then which I need not recapitulate; they almost promised everything. The people in some sections of the country owing to the hopes held out as to the effect of a high protective tariff, and by misleading statements in other sections of the country, were led to accept the promises of hon. gentlemen opposite and placed them in the position they now occupy. At that time hon. gentlemen opposite were pointing out all the derelictions of the Mackenzie Administration, charged that Administration with being the cause of widespread ruin—a ruin which did not exist. They failed to point out that we had many industries, and they failed also to state that depression existed in a more intense degree in the country to the south of us, which was largely protected; they only told half the truth, and half the truth is said to be at times the most dangerous sort of falsehood. It did not suit their purpose then to tell the truth but to hold the Mackenzie Government responsible for all the ills which overspread the country. We find on the contrary, instead of matters being depressed as represented, even by this report of the commissioner on the industries of the country—only a partial report because all the manufacturing centres were not visited—but even this report shows that instead of all manufacturing establishments going out of work prior to 1878, and during the régime of Mr. Mackenzie, no less than one hundred and six were started during his term of office. It may be said that this is not a very large number, but it is the number shown by this one-sided report. Hon. gentlemen opposite acceded to power in 1878, and no sooner did the change take place than old establishments, which were in operation for a number of years, were claimed as new industries. It is quite true, however, that the sugar refinery resumed operation after the change in Government. Shortly after the present Government came in, their organs and their speakers said: Behold the National Policy; but some of us kept a record of the actual experience from that time forward. The Government passed a measure known as the National Policy in 1879, but it was two years from that date before the times got better, before there was any change. For the first two years of the present Administration, in 1879 and 1880, they had a deficit. They were confronted with this, and told: Your policy is not doing anything for us; what about those promises? The Administration had promised to bring about a change directly they got into power, they had promised that as if by a magic wand they would bring prosperity in every possible way as the result of their accession to power, but it was two long years before matters got better. During that time, when they were reminded that things had not got better, they said it was owing to the footprints of the Mackenzie Administration still existing, and that things had not had time to get better. I recollect perfectly well when the first lifting of the cloud took place. It was in the fall of 1880, when a demand sprung up for our lumber and other exports. The American demand for lumber sprung up in the fall of 1880. We have a large domestic market for lumber in Canada, but the domestic market did not improve until the foreign demand created an export, and then the domestic market followed. The brief period of prosperity we have had since has been due entirely to our exports. In 1878, the gentlemen told us that we could do all our business within ourselves. They seemed to borrow the Celestial idea, "What need we care for foreign commerce?" We were to have home markets. Wherever there was water-power, we were to have manufacturing industries built up. But this has not been the case. On the contrary, the effect of the tariff has been to centralise those establishments. The commissioner very conveniently omitted to visit some of those places which have lost their factories by their being removed to Toronto, such as Newcastle, Woodbridge, and some other places, though they are counted in Toronto all right for the National Policy. The home markets were not created. We were promised that the price of our farm products would be very much increased. It has already been stated that our manufacturing had, in 1878, assumed considerable proportions. The member for Brant has already informed the House that our importation for home manufacture in raw cotton alone had increased from three and a half millions in 1874, to seven and a quarter millions in 1878. That did not show that the factories were languishing to any great extent. As to the markets for farm produce, I have a carefully compiled report of the prices of grain in Toronto during the two periods. The average price of fall wheat under the Mackenzie Administration was $1.16, and under the present Administration $1.12, 4 cents a bushel less than formerly, though it was to be increased by 15 cents according to the promise. The prices of spring wheat were about the same, though in 1883 the price did run up during the time of scarcity. It is only during a time of scarcity that the tariff can possibly help the price of wheat. We had a time of scarcity in 1883, and the price did run up, but that is not to be depended upon. It is very seldom that we have times of scarcity. The crops in this country do not fail very often, and we ought to be thankful for that. There is a clause in the National Policy Act by which the Government can remove the tariff on wheat without any legislation, so that there is no guarantee for the farmers. I heard my friend from North Bruce ask the member for Norfolk a question as to the price of oats in Toronto. The average price under the Mackenzie Administration was a shade higher than it is now. Peas were 75 cents a bushel under the Mackenzie Administration and 73 cents under the National Policy. The barley cry got more votes for the National Policy perhaps than any other. Well, the price of barley averaged 80½ cents under the Mackenzie Administration and 70 cents under the National Policy. Wool is about half the price it was under the Mackenzie Administration.

Mr. IVES. You are trying to pull the wool over our eyes.

Mr. COCKBURN. No, I will simply give the facts. We are told now that we argued in 1878 that the effect of the policy would be to make goods dear. We did argue that, but we argued more. The effect of the policy was to run goods up a little at first, though of course they came down very much afterwards, but in the future we may yet find that the policy may be the means of raising the price of goods, if they are able to bring about any combination. But we stated that there were different phases or stages through which such a policy passed. We also stated that goods would be made ridiculously cheap at other times, so that some factories would have to close up and not employ their men. We must all admit that the effect of the tariff was to stimulate manufacturing—there is no doubt whatever about that. It had the effect of over-stimulating it, and caused a large amount of capital to be locked up and considerable capital to be lost. I can speak on behalf of myself and on behalf of my colleagues here, that the Liberal party are not opposed to manufacturing, that we recognise its utility, and that it is a great factor in making up the sum of the prosperity of the country. But the manufacturers are safer under a revenue tariff than under a high protective tariff, as times change. Oats do not grow tough or sturdy when raised in hot-houses. One great claim for the proposed tariff at that time was that it would retain our people in our own country. That has not been the case, I am sorry to say. The figures quoted against the previous Administration were taken from the American Trade and Commerce Returns. I take the last year of the Mackenzie Administration, and I find the number of people reported by the American Trade and Commerce Returns as leaving in 1878 was 26,100. In 1884, the last year, we have returns of those who left amounting to 60,580, more than twice as many. Therefore the tariff is a complete failure in that respect. It may be said that these people have gone to a highly protected country. We have nothing to do with that. I do not think that they have improved their prospects by going there. We have a splendid country ourselves. We have plenty of territory, and a country in which the crops can be relied upon more than in almost any other country I know of. We have fewer failures of crops, and epidemics among domestic animals are very rare indeed. Therefore I contend that these people have not bettered their condition by going to another country, but the fact remains that the National Policy was powerless and did not perform what they claimed it would do to keep our own people in our own country. It was also stated that our trade with

Mr. COCKBURN.

Great Britain would be promoted, that the tariff was so framed that it would bear more heavily on American manufacturers than on British manufacturers. Now by the last Trade and Navigation Returns of my hon. friend, the Minister of Customs, we find that we imported from Great Britain $43,000,000 worth of goods on which we collected a duty of $8,000,000; while we imported from the United States $50,000,000 and only collected $7,000,000 of revenue. This showing does not take into account the smuggling that is carried on from the United States by these National Policy men, who are protectionists in the day time and free traders after sundown. In saying this I mean to cast no reflection upon the Customs Department, because I believe the hon. Minister of Customs is a very faithful public servant, and his Department is very well administered so far as I know, but it is impossible for him to keep watch over a frontier of 3,000 miles.

Mr. IVES. How is it in Muskoka?

Mr. COCKBURN. I daresay the hon. gentleman knows more about the smuggling business than the people of Muskoka. It is claimed that taxation has not increased, but I find by the Customs returns that the amount collected from Customs duties is 71 cents per head more under the present Administration than it was under the former Administration. That does not seem to be a very large amount, but it is considerable for a whole family. I am not able to gauge exactly how the people are taxed in other ways, but I know they pay higher prices for many of the articles they consume. We know that rubber goods and stoves, for instance, have increased in price. Stove manufacturers are more fortunate than cotton manufacturers, for they have been able to keep up their prices. The Gurney wood cooking stove has increased in price $3 or $4. The old-fashioned stoves have gone out of use and can be bought cheaply, but the modern saleable stove is about $4 higher than it was before the National Policy was introduced. The only respect in which the Gurney wood cooking stove is claimed to be worth more now than it was then, is in the addition of a little nickel ornament worth about 30 or 40 cents. Rubber goods have also increased in price and have deteriorated a good deal in quality. Now, our hon. friends on the Government side laughed at us when we spoke about the necessity of having a cheap country to live in. We find that they are adopting these tactics themselves of dodging the principal issue by calling our attention to present prices. Some hon. members have quoted the prices of certain staple articles to prove that the National Policy has lowered prices. The tariff has nothing whatever to do with respect to the prices of sugar and cotton. Although those articles are extremely cheap in this country, they can be laid down after paying duty just as cheap from other countries. Goods that are higher are higher in consequence of the tariff, and goods that are lower are not lower in consequence of the tariff. It is said to be a poor rule that will not work both ways, but in this case the rule works against the public every time. We are told by the right hon. gentleman that times are better in Canada than they are in the United States or England. That may be, but if that is the case now it was also the case in 1878, and why was not the right hon. gentleman honest enough to have stated so then. Now, we find the hon. gentleman for Cardwell (Mr. White), and some of the leading Conservative papers, gloating over the depression that exists in England. I do not myself think the depression so bad there as they represent it to be, but it would not be any great wonder if it were when we consider the dense population of England, and the circumstances under which they live. It is said that there are large monsters of the deep, iron steamships, lying idle at the docks. But that is in consequence of the dull times in other countries. Those ships are built to do the business of other countries, or to be sold to residents of other countries to carry their commerce, and when times are dull in other countries there are fewer English steamships employed. Then we are told how bad matters are in England under a free trade policy. I am not advocating free trade; we cannot have free trade here. I advocate a revenue tariff. Would those hon. gentlemen be kind enough to tell us of the depression that existed throughout England before that country adopted free trade? I will ask the members to listen to me while I read from some reports of the state of things that existed prior to the abolition of protection in England:

“EXTRACT from a report upon the condition of the manufacturing industries in England in 1841, under protection.

“BOLTON, December, 1841.—50 cotton mills, formerly employing 8,000 hands, 30 of these mills either standing idle or working 4 days in the week. The Poor Protection Society had 6,995 applicants for relief, whose net earnings were only thirteen pence per head per week. 53 families had no beds at all, and there were an average of 10½ persons to each blanket; 511 families had resorted to pledging or pawning; 609 families had no change of underclothing. There were 1,500 houses uninhabited and a large number not yielding any rents.

“MANCHESTER.—116 mills standing idle. 681 shops and offices untenanted; 549 dwellings unoccupied. In one district of Manchester, as reported by Rev. Father Hearne, there were 2,000 families without a bed and 8,666 persons whose weekly income was 14½ pence per head. Patients in hospitals had increased 15 per cent. The number in prison had nearly doubled. Cotton mills that were deemed to be worth £211,000 had been sold for £66,000.

“BURY.—Only about one-third of the hands employed which were receiving but three and a-half pence per day.

“STOCKPORT.—37 master spinners in a state of insolvency; 3,000 dwellings shut up. Mr. Nelstrop, Mayor of Stockport, stated that 73,314 individuals had received relief, whose average weekly income was only 9½ pence. Thomas Carlyle tells that a cynic had in droll earnest chalked upon a cottage shutter, ‘Stockport to let.’

“GLASGOW.—12,000 persons on relief funds.

“ACCRINGTON.—With a population of 9,000 only 100 employed.

“MASLAND.—2,000 have become paupers.

“LEEDS.—10,000 supplied by relief.

“The above are samples of scores of other cases that can be cited. The clergy stated that thousands of the people did not have half decent clothing and had to absent themselves from church in consequence. Some were so much reduced physically as to be past receiving religious consolation. Others remained in bed as the pangs of hunger were not so keenly felt while reclining. The Duke of Norfolk, a protectionist who from feelings of compassion, recommended that the operative classes who were suffering from hunger should take an occasional pinch of curry powder in a little water to allay their craving for food. Speaking of the corn laws, Carlyle said: ‘God declares against them audibly to all just hearts.’”

Now there is a picture of England under protection in 1841. It was not only manufacturers, but the tenant farmers who were in the condition described, and the depression lasted until there was a change in 1844 or 1846.

Mr. RYKERT. Give us something later than that.

Mr. COCKBURN. I suppose it does not serve the purpose of the hon. gentleman from Lincoln to hear these statements, but if hon. gentlemen opposite had not said so much to us about the present depression in England, I would not have quoted these facts. Now, speaking of England, it does not become us very well to gloat over the depression that exists there; England is one of the most wonderful countries in the world. I do not wonder at the greatness of the United States; there is nothing to hinder it. They possess immense natural resources, and the country could not help becoming great. I am almost reminded of the down-easter, who looked at everything from a commercial standpoint rather than the sublime, said he was not astonished to see water pouring over Niagara Falls for there was nothing to hinder it. There was nothing to hinder the United States progressing. These little gems of the sea, the British Isles, are far greater wonders than any other country under the sun. The United Kingdom contains only 120,222 square miles, and sustains a population of 35,000,000, and furnishes capital to build railways and other improvements all over the globe. That country sustains a population of 290 to the square mile. The United States contain 3,094,000 square miles, and sustain a population of 50,000,000 people or only 16 to the square mile. In other words, in the United States there are only 16 people to each square mile as compared to the United Kingdom, which has to support 290 people to the square mile. We ought to have good times in Canada. We have had very abundant crops, a large amount of public money has been expended on public works and we have a great country to settle. I have faith in this country. I think matters are sound, thanks to the thrift of the people, although trade is very dull and people can hardly understand why there is so little trade doing. There is, however, an abundance of food in the country. We have had a large number of failures, which would not have been the case under a revenue tariff. We find a great many of the employés in manufacturing establishments have been idle or working short time. A great many no doubt returned to work after a time—no doubt the majority of them will return to work; nevertheless the fact remains that a great many at present are unemployed. In Toronto, which is one of the most prosperous cities in the Dominion, and which always thrives, there are many hundreds of people out of employment or working short time. We find our expenditure has been increased very much. It may be that owing to public works it has been necessary to increase the capital account; but there has been a very large increase in the controllable expenditure, some $4,000,000, which might have been obviated. For this unnecessary increase we hold the Government directly responsible. There is a very strong presumption that the resources of this country have been frittered away, that in some instances the inheritance of the people has been squandered in order to help friends of the Government or reward political supporters. For instance, with respect to timber lands so called, we find a very pernicious system has obtained in that regard. We hear of a party obtaining $600,000 for that for which he paid a few thousands of dollars. That immense profit belonged to the people, but it is gone now. There is also a strong presumption that contractors have been receiving large extras, thereby enabling them to make large contributions to election funds. I do not state that it is so; but there is a strong presumption in that direction. I have often wondered where the large amounts of money in circulation at election times came from. From what source did the $25,000 or more which went to Muskoka and carried the local election come? I did not know there was so many patriotic men who were prepared to subscribe private money. I also wonder where the funds came from which were offered for the purpose of bribing members of the Ontario Legislature a year afterwards. Such practices are very wrong. We have had men in our own party, I believe, who have spent large sums of money at elections. That was very wrong. I am very glad I was not among the number. But it is a fact that considerable money has been spent in that way. Who is to blame? Hon. gentlemen opposite, who refused to give us an election law whereby controverted elections would be tried by the judges. Accordingly, that bad habit prevailed, to some extent, at that time. Some hon. gentlemen on both sides spent large amounts of their own money, and they were very much to blame for having done so. But that was not half so bad as to take the people's money indirectly from the public treasury and use it for election purposes.

Mr. BOWELL I suppose you mean colonisation roads?

Mr. COCKBURN. Colonisation roads accounts in Ontario are all right; you cannot make anything out of them. We find the trade policy not a success. We find the railway policy not a success. We find that constant applications are made for large amounts of money; that final arrangements are supposed to be made but the company come back another year and another final arrangement is entered into. The Government have not carried out their pledges, and have changed their railway policy at different times. At one time they were going to build the road for $79,000,000; at another time the leader of the Government said he was going to make sufficient money out of the lands to build the road without any expense to this country. He also stated that some $58,000,000 were to be received from the sales of land up to 1891. They have not yet received $1,000,000, clear of expenses, and they will have to hurry up in order to obtain the other $57,000,000. Hon. gentlemen opposite boast of being the party of progress with respect to this railway. I will not concede that claim, but I think they might appropriately call themselves the reckless party. They should make haste slowly. We all appreciate the advantages of a trans-continental railway, but it should be built as the resources of the country will permit and in a prudent, economical manner. The Government railway policy is very unsatisfactory. Their land policy has also been most unsatisfactory, and the population expected is not now to be found in Manitoba and the North-West. What do we find they now have on their hands? They have a second rebellion in this short history of the country. All this might be obviated by a little care in explaining matters to the people who are not so well versed as we in Ontario are with the usages of land holding. I am sure the first rebellion might have been avoided; and I daresay if the people of that country had proper representation, if they had anyone to see to their wants, or listen to the complaints and alleged grievances, the present trouble might have been averted. It is also to be noticed that the tone of political morality in this country is not in a very satisfactory state. There are too many of our people who have no faith that public affairs can be administered in a straightforward and honest manner, though I do not subscribe to that doctrine myself. We are told that you might as well preach in the wilderness as try to inculcate the doctrines of sound political morality in the country at the present time. I believe this feeling prevails to an alarming extent, though for my part I do not despair of a better time coming, when public matters will be in a more satisfactory state. I am sorry the right hon. gentleman is not in his place, though whether he were present or absent, I should be sorry to say anything disrespectful of him. I hold, however, that there has been and is a great deal of political corruption in the country, and for the last thirty or forty years that hon. gentleman has been the central figure in all political matters. I therefore hold him, to a large extent, responsible for the demoralisation of the rising politicians of the country; the tendency of his tactics has been to develop a very bad school of politicians. However, as the debate is wearing on and hon. gentlemen are very patient, I shall close very soon, though I have a great many more notes.

An hon. MEMBER. Go on.

Mr. COCKBURN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman thinks I cannot go on, and that is the reason he is so liberal on this occasion, but I am not exhausted by any means. I have endeavored to give a fair exposé of public matters according to my light. I think the figures I have given will bear investigation, and I challenge hon. members to investigate them, for I am not at all afraid to stand by my utterances. I am also sure that my deductions and general impressions will commend themselves to all intelligent and well informed people who are not biassed by party considerations. I have endeavored to do the tariff as much justice as possible. As I have already stated I believe it has already stimulated some industries of this country and we have had good specimens of manufacture produced in Canada, which is a gratifying circumstance; but I say that, taking the matter all in all, the tariff has been inimical to the general interests of the country. With regard to the policy we should pursue, I think it would be well for the Finance Minister to return as soon as possible to a revenue tariff. In 1873 we, on this side of the House, stated that the effect of the tariff would be to cripple the milling industries and the carrying trade of the country, and we know that the milling industry is now in a depressed state, and that the carrying trade has been injured. We also stated that the effect of the tariff would be very injurious to the Maritime Provinces. And such undoubtedly has been the case. The effect of the tariff has been to develop some inter-provincial trade, but this has been done by a forcing process, and it has forced out of the Maritime Provinces some of the best men of the country, by injuring various lines of business. We were bidding fair to take the position of being perhaps the greatest maritime people in the world, in proportion to our population, but the attempt to develop this inter-provincial trade has had the effect of injuring the trade of small carriers—men who, with small ships, did the carrying trade for local ports of the Maritime Provinces, and carrying products to the eastern ports of the United States, and bringing back cornmeal and other provisions. I cannot conceive of any tax that could be more unjust than the tax on cornmeal, for it is an article which does not come in competition with us, as we are not producers of cornmeal. I hold, therefore, that the Maritime Provinces have been injured, notwithstanding the remarks of some hon. gentlemen who are more interested in, and should be better acquainted with, those Provinces than I am. There may be some coal producing counties which have been benefitted, but I do not think that even they have realised the benefits to the extent which has been claimed for them. Hon. gentlemen may point to the fact that they carried the country; they may point to the general elections and the bye-elections at the polls, but they do not count for anything. We did not get a fair election. We had not a fair election in 1882, on account of the gerrymander and the sops which were thrown to the Maritime Provinces and to many sections. As to the bye-elections hon. gentlemen opposite act in a very different way from what my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie) acted when he was in power. They are very careful about opening constituencies, and when they do open them they put on all possible power to carry them, instead of relying alone on the integrity and intelligence of the people as the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) did. Of course the fates were against us at that time, but the one thing needful for the people in the Maritime Provinces is—

Mr. IVES. Money.

Mr. COCKBURN. Yes, I know, that making money is the politics of some hon. gentlemen. The one thing most needful for the people of the Maritime Provinces is a fairly considered reciprocity treaty in the natural products of the country, as this would help the coasting business and other lines of trade in those Provinces. In Ontario they do not care so much about it, though it would be an advantage to the farmers who have horses, barley, &c., to sell and other produce for the American markets; and it would also be a benefit to the lumbermen. There has been discussion in this debate as to who pays the duty. I believe that in some cases the consumer pays the duty, and in others the producer, but it is generally conceded by those who have studied the matter that in barley and in some other articles it is divided, each paying one-half, which would leave a margin for our farmers and lumbermen. I see that my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) is present, who has been agitating for the removal of the duty on cornmeal, a movement in which he will have my hearty support.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should be happy to know that we could be successful, but I am afraid not.

Mr. COCKBURN. I am something like the Minister of the Exterior—I am not in the secrets of the Government. I must, however, close my remarks, and though I have taken more time than I should have taken, I felt it my duty to give my views; and though they have not been presented very glibly I felt that I should present my impressions whether they were appreciated or not. And, Mr. Speaker, you will be glad to know that I have not prepared a highfaluting peroration, and so I shall without further remark resume my seat.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). I feel that I should apologise to the House for prolonging this debate, but, as is well known, I am not one of those who have, during this Session, taken up much of the time of the House. And I do not know, Sir, that I would be induced even now to say anything on the quest on before you, if it were not for what has fallen from some hon. gentlemen opposite. I have had the satisfaction of listening to and reading a great number of speeches delivered by Finance Ministers on the opening of the Budget, and I must say that I have never listened to or read one with greater satisfaction than the able dissertation which was given to us by the hon. Finance Minister on the opening of his Budget. He had an opportunity then of referring to the progress of trade and commerce in this country for the last five years, and he could do so with great satisfaction, not only to himself and to this House, but to the country generally. Sir, all that the Finance Minister said is capable of being verified, notwithstanding what has been alleged on the other side. I do not purpose, as I stated a moment ago, to enter into a general discussion of all that has been presented in that address; but I mean to offer a few remarks in reference to what has fallen from some hon. gentlemen opposite. Sir, we have learned that if those hon. gentlemen have no other policy to present to this country, they have certainly a policy of detraction. That has been their policy, not only since the time they were consigned to the cold shades of Opposition in 1878, but those of us who are old enough to remember how they conducted themselves in Opposition for 17 or 18 years before they got into power in 1874, will remember that that was the policy they indulged in during that time. It was a policy of detraction, a policy designed to make the people believe that this country was not governed in an economical or proper spirit, but against the best interests of the people; and so long had they harped on that string that the people at last were induced to think they were really sincere, and that the country was not governed so well as it would be if it was governed by those hon. gentlemen. Well, the people gave them a chance to show what they were made of; they had five years of power, and what was the result? They came into power under most favorable circumstances. They assumed the government when the exchequer was full and overflowing; they came into power when this country was in a high state of progress; they came into power shortly after the American war had ceased, a war which had all but exhausted the best energies of that great people, and one which had materially crippled their manufacturing industries, which gave a great advantage to the manufacturing interests of this country. But notwithstanding all that, Sir, before these hon. gentlemen were in power three short years, their policy had such an effect upon the country that it began to go back; and until they were driven out the country suffered. Well, Sir, the people having given these hon. gentlemen a chance to try their hand at governing this country, so soon as they got an opportunity to reconsider what they had unfortunately done in 1874, rejected them and ignominiously turned them out of power, and they are now in the cold shades of Opposition, having had in the meantime another opportunity of getting back into power, but the people thought them unworthy of their confidence. I predict that so long as the generation is in existence which was in existence while these hon. gentlemen occupied the treasury benches, so long will these hon. gentlemen be kept in the cold shades of Opposition. Until the people can be educated to forget all that took place from 1873 to 1878, so long will these hon. gentlemen remain exactly where they are. Now, Sir, I propose to examine some statements which have been made by some hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this subject. I would not condescend to do so, if some of these statements had not come from one who aspires to be a bright particular star in the Liberal firmament. Hon. gentlemen opposite have not merely considered the question from a national or Dominion point of view; they have not only dealt with the question of trade and commerce as it affects the whole Dominion generally; but the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who I regret is not in his place—because I always like to say to a man's face what I would say behind his back—in fact, I would say more to his face than I would behind his back—the hon. member for Bothwell, I say, descended from Dominion politics down to what might be called the local affairs of the city of Hamilton. Sir, I have the honor to represent that city, and proud I am of the honor; and I have to say that the only new thing that has been said on the other side in this debate was the astounding statement put forward by the hon. member for Bothwell with reference to the city of Hamilton. The hon. gentleman said—and I read from the report of his speech in Hansard:

"The Hamilton Speciator is the organ of the Tory party. It is a paper friendly to the Administration; it advocates the doctrine of protection, and it describes the condition of the manufactures in Hamilton at that time. It says: 'The Empire foundry of Copp & Co. had been enormously increased in capacity, and its business has increased.' It mentions the fact that the Wanzer Sewing Machine Co. had greatly extended their business, and were employing a much larger number of hands than before. It mentions that the Gurney Co. had also greatly increased the capacity of their factory, and were giving employment to a greater number of men than before. It also describes the manufacturing establishments of Sawyer & Co. and of Burrows, Stewart & Milne. It describes several other establishments in Hamilton that had enlarged their capacity, and employed an increased number of hands. And, Sir, it is well known that the progress of manufactures in Hamilton was greater between 1873 and 1878, notwithstanding there was a depression existing, than it has been between 1879 and the present hour."

It is that astounding statement, Sir, that has been the cause of calling me to my feet; and it is on account of that that I have to ask the indulgence of the House in order that I may give it a flat and blunt contradiction. I say the facts do not warrant the assertion, and I submit that it is an extraordinary thing for any member of the House, occupying the position that the hon. gentleman presumes to occupy, to make such a statement in the broad face of day. Sir, it is true, that Hamilton was a flourishing city in 1873 and 1874. There is no doubt of it. Hamilton has always been, comparatively speaking, a flourishing city. Its people are energetic, enterprising and enlightened, and desirous of making their city what it should be, a great manufacturing centre. They are engaged chiefly in manufacturing industries, and have that spirit of enterprise which all good citizens should have, and which I am happy and proud to say, abounds in the city of Hamilton. No doubt, for some years, up to 1873, 1874 and 1875, Hamilton wonderfully increased its manufacturing establishments. This House understands that Hamilton has long been looked upon as the seat of the National Policy. The people have long been in favor of a policy which would foster and protect the native industries of the country; the people had but one opinion on that point, and the hon. gentlemen who represented Hamilton before my colleague and myself had the honor of seats in this House, were elected on the express promise and pledge that they would give their utmost support to a protective policy. Had they not given that pledge, they could not have been returned, and they said to the people: "You had better by far return us, who are supporters of the Government, than to return our opponents, who would be in Opposition, and could do nothing." Well, the people believed them. These gentlemen were returned in 1874 by a majority of something over 500, and the electors believed firmly that a policy of protection would be introduced by the Mackenzie Government. Their representatives told them that such a policy would be introduced, that although the Mackenzie Government were free traders, yet they could see what was for the interest of the country, and that they, as representatives of Hamilton, would have sufficient influence with the Government to induce it to concede the point. More than that, up to 1878, at every bye-election, the Government were being defeated, and the people of Hamilton thought that, as a matter of course, the Ministers would have sense and prescience enough, and were of sufficient ability as statesmen, to see what the demands and requirements of the country were, and that when the Session of 1878 came round the Finance Minister would, as a matter of course, come down with such a scheme for the readjustment of the tariff as would give the people what they so much required. They waited in vain; but, in the hope that their wishes and expectations would be gratified, they did, in some cases, enlarge their premises, and this was noted at the time in the public press. The Session of 1878 came and went. When the members of the Conservative party would meet members of the Liberal party and draw their attention to the fact that the country was going to the dogs for want of that policy which Hamilton had been so instrumental in propounding to the country, they were always met with the assertion: "Have faith in the Minister of Finance; he is the greatest Finance Minister that ever graced the treasury benches; he is no ordinary man." In fact, in comparing him with other financiers, they spoke of him as a "mountain" compared to "a mole hill." They considered him the great "mountain of finance," as a man whose ability was so great that he could only be compared for a moment with any of his predecessors! Well, the time came; the "mountain" was in labor and it was expected to bring forth something more than a mouse, but it did not bring forth even "a mouse;" it was a "fly on the wheel." Of course there was great depression then. The people saw that nothing could induce the Government of the day to grant that great panacea which they all desired so much. Shops and manufacturing establishments were either shut up entirely, or were working on half time, or at half their capacity; mechanics who should have been earning $2 or $2.50 a day, were turned out into the streets, and those who could not afford to leave the country and go to the United States or elsewhere, for the purpose of earning a livelihood, were obliged to remain in Canada and work for the corporation at 75 cents per day. Are there any such scenes witnessed to-day in Canada? Or anything approaching them? Yet the hon. gentleman has the hardihood to say that "the progress of manufacturing industry was greater from 1873 to 1878 than from 1878 to the present." Hamilton is, as I have said, almost entirely a manufacturing city, and, except so far as manufacturing industries are concerned, her commercial importance is not so great. If, therefore, what the hon. gentleman has said were true, the population of the city would have decreased, and the value of property would also have decreased. But what do we find? I have it from the best authority, and although I would be very loath to quote any paper from the opposite side of politics in corroboration, yet one can go sometimes with profit into the enemy's camp for the purpose of obtaining evidence in support of his statement. In 1874, the population of Hamilton was 31,957; in 1879 it was 34,268, or an increase in five years of 2,311, making an increase of 462 per year. In 1883 the population had increased to 38,196, an increase of 3,928 in five years or 786 per year. In 1884, the population had increased to 39,216, an increase in one year of 1,020. Since 1881 the increase has been more than double as rapid as from 1874 to 1879. In support of the progress of the city, as regards population, I refer hon. members to the Hamilton Times of the 18th March instant. A question of representation in the Local Legislature of Ontario is up before that House. I will not trespass on the good nature of the House by alluding to that in any other way than merely to mention that the hon. member (Mr. Gibson) who represents Hamilton in the Local House, is desirous that there should be two members to represent Hamilton, as he claims that city is entitled to two members instead of one; so Mr. Gibson has given notice of his intention to move that Hamilton shall be given an additional member. The Times newspaper goes on to say:

"His argument is that the population of Hamilton is now about 40,000 and that the population of the city increases more rapidly than the population of the Province at large, so that in ten years hence there will be 50,000 or 60,000 within the limits, and that is quite true."

I think I have proved that part of my statement, at all events, by the facts as I have given them to you, as they have been taken each year by the assessors as they go from door to door, and subsequently by the assertion of the organ of the party, which the hon. gentleman opposite certainly will not say a word against, that "it is all true." Now, let us look at the assessed value of property within those periods. I think those things go to show whether a country or a city is progressing or is going to decay. In 1874, the assessed value was $13,850,040; in 1879, it had increased to $15,163,210, being an increase in the five years of $1,313,170, or a little more than $260,000 per annum; in 1883, it had reached $17,713,150, an increase of $2,544,940 in five years, or rather more than $500,000 per annum; in 1884, the year just expired, it has increased to $18,818,330, showing an increase in one year of $1,105,180, or more than four times the rate of increase between 1874 and 1879. Yet the hon. gentleman says that "it is well known that the manufacturing industries of Hamilton have not prospered so well between 1878 and the present hour as between 1873 and 1878." Now, there is no doubt that, as between 1882 and 1884, there is a difference in favor of 1882. We all know that 1881 and 1882 were years of wonderful activity in trade and business. That every manufacturing interest was then driven to its utmost capacity. We know that there was not an establishment—and I am speaking now from a local point of view—in the city of Hamilton but was working over hours and could not even then fill the orders fast enough. The time did come when there was a slacking up. The great excitement that extended to the North-West began to die away, and the manufacturing interest began to flag, and therefore, of course, business is not so brisk in 1884 as it was in 1882. But, nevertheless, there are more men now employed in the aggregate and higher wages are paid than at any former period in the city's history. Why, at this day, although you hear people complain about the want of work, and the impossibility of getting work for the laborers to do, you cannot employ a man in the city of Hamilton for less than $1.25 a day, and many of them ask $1.50. But then we must take into account that this is the winter season, and hundreds of laborers can only find employment when the snow is off the ground, and the weather is more seasonable. There is never so much work going on in a city or in a country, if I might so speak, in the winter season, as there is in the other parts of the year. But we have no mechanics, unless brick-layers and stone-masons, out of employment. We have no man who is able to earn $2.50 a day coming to the offices of the city hall and begging the mayor to give him work at 75 cents a day as a digger, or scraper on the streets. We have no such characters as these. They are all employed one way or another, or, if they are not employed, they have the money lying by in the savings bank which they can draw on for the purpose of keeping the wolf from the door, a thing they could not do in 1878. Now, a good deal has been said about the report of the manufacturing interests which has been laid before this House by the Finance Minister, and it has been derided and spoken about in a way anything but complimentary. I am free to say that that report does not give a full and particular account of all the industries of the Dominion. It never was intended that it should. It would be quite impossible for any one man or any half dozen men to go from one end of this Dominion to the other and give a full and particular account of its industries and make comparative statements between 1878 and 1884. It does not pretend to do that, and with reference to the city of Hamilton alone it leaves out a great number of most important institutions. My colleague and myself, of our own knowledge, here in the House, have been able to go over that statement and show that at least 50, if not more, important establishments have been left out. I suppose the report meets the purpose for which it was intended. It gives a certain number of institutions that were in vogue in 1878, and a certain number that have been established since that time, and they draw a comparison and show that of these 62—we take the city of Hamilton—40 of them were erected before 1878, and 22 since, showing the comparison, the increase of capital invested, the amount of wages paid out weekly, and the amount of products that have been turned out. I might mention that in that report so important a concern as George E. Tuckett & Sons' tobacco factory, one known all over the world, is omitted. R. M. Wanzer & Co.'s great sewing machine establishment is left out; R. M. Wanzer & Co.'s great screw factory is left out. Now these are very important establishments, and the hon. gentleman had the audacity to say that "Wanzer & Co.'s establishment was not employing one-third the number of men this year that it was in 1878." Well, all I can say to the hon. gentlemen is this, Mr. Speaker, that R. M. Wanzer & Co. have added to their capacity for turning out work within the last year, buildings and machinery which have cost them $100,000; so I think that is something which goes to prove a state of affairs contrary to that asserted as existing by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). Then, Sir, we have another establishment in Hamilton, which was built immediately after the National Policy was introduced—an extensive coffin factory erected, as was jocularly said at the time, for the purpose of burying the clear Grit party. We have also got a very large baby carriage factory, which is evidence of a great increase in population. So you see that putting one against the other the rising generation being protectionists, those who are being buried are free traders—the result is inevitable! I will not take up time by enumerating the other establishments erected since 1879, because it is unnecessary to do so; but they are large, numerous and extensive, all of which goes to show that the city of Hamilton, which the hon. gentleman endeavored to belittle and detract from, is one of the most flourishing in the Dominion of Canada. So much for the city of Hamilton. I must now, with leave of the House, notice some of the figures the hon. gentleman gave us by way of proving that the duty does not keep articles out of the market. The hon. gentleman said in his speech:

"High taxes have been imposed, and for what? Why, hon. gentlemen opposite say, for the purpose of keeping away the foreign products, and making Canada a close preserve for the manufacturers of Canada. We want to have Canada for the Canadians. But has that been the result of the policy? Take the case of the importations. The following table shows the importations in 1879 and 1883 of a number of leading articles."

Then he enumerates carriages, boots and shoes, blankets, furniture, and that sort of thing, and gives the importations, some of them very insignificant—stoves, for instance, $34,212; whips, a good article—some gentlemen ought to have them applied to them—$3,383. He goes down into these small articles for the purpose of proving that the duty does not keep the articles out of the country. I did not understand that it was ever supposed that the tariff would create a close market, that it would prevent other countries from exporting into Canada, or prevent the inhabitants of this country from importing from other countries. It was intended to secure the markets of this country for such articles as we could produce, while such articles as this country could not manufacture, or could not manufacture a sufficiency of—of course the people must have them, and they would get them from abroad. But I submit that the hon. gentleman, like other hon. gentlemen who have followed him on that side, has not given us a fair, candid and upright statement with reference to the very articles he has mentioned. If he wanted to show to the House and to the country the real state of affairs that exist to-day with reference to the National Policy, and to compare it with the state of affairs which existed before that policy was introduced, he should have taken the year 1878 and compared it with the year 1884. And so I propose to do with not a few of the articles the hon. gentleman has mentioned. I do not intend going over the whole of them, because there would be no profit in that, and we have already lost time enough over this subject. The hon. gentleman mentions blankets, for instance, and he says that there were $201,070 worth imported in 1879, and in 1883, $265,956 worth. But according to the returns the importation in 1878, before the National Policy was introduced, show a very different figure. In that year there were $226,946 worth, and in 1884 they come down to $122,178, being less than one half of what they were in 1883. Then take furniture. The hon. gentleman shows that in 1879 there were $247,970 imported, and in 1883 $264,360. Now, what was it in 1878? In 1878 there were imported into this country $399,330; in 1884, only $206,436 worth; showing a very great decrease. The hon. gentleman did not want to show these figures; he did not draw the attention of the House to them. He evidently must have compared the Trade Returns of 1883 and 1884, and he chose to take those of 1883 and 1879 and compare them and leave out those which would give the real and true test of what this country is doing at the present time as compared with 1878, when a different tariff was in force. The hon. gentleman also refers to pianos. He says that the importation of pianos in 1879 amounted to $289,631, and they increased in 1883 $328,774. Well, what do we find? In 1878 the importations were $353,466 worth; in 1884 they were only $288,855, showing a very great decrease. And we have to take into consideration this fact, that the most expensive pianos are not made in this country; they are chiefly made in the United States, and the importation of this class of pianos mount up in value very much more speedily than the ordinary article manufactured in this country. I do not mean to say, Mr. Speaker, when I allude to pianos in that way, that there are not splendid instruments manufactured in this country, some very excellent ones, indeed; but we do know this, that musicians have their fancies and their pets in pianos; they will have a particular make and no other, and that fact militates a good deal against the Canadian piano, although in many cases Canadian pianos are quite as good as the very best that are imported into this country. But I notice that the hon. gentleman cunningly left out of his list one of the most important musical instruments, the one that tells the story best as to what the National Policy is doing for this country—certainly with reference to musical instruments. We all know that the manufacture of organs is a very important industry in this country; we all know that the great mass of the people have them; nearly every well-to-do farmer possesses an organ, or a melodeon, or a piano. But this item of organs shows what the country requires and is able to pay for in the way of musical instruments. We find that in 1878 we imported organs to the tune of $121,525 worth; in 1879, after the National Policy came into force, that sum was reduced down to $95,786; in 1883, down to $71,842; and in 1884 down to $51,317. Why did the hon. gentleman leave out that item unless it was for the purpose of detracting from the condition of prosperity which this country is enjoying? Well, now, I find he has mentioned another insignificant item in respect to importation, and that is the item of stoves. In 1878 the importations amounted to $59,319 worth, in 1879 to $34,212, and in 1879 the importations had fallen to $47,428, but stoves always had a fair protection and have not been so much influenced by the National Policy as other great industries. Is it supposed for a moment that the National Policy was intended to keep out every article that could possibly be manufactured in this country? You cannot secure such a result. It was never contended that it would have such an effect. The people will have their fancy about one article and another article; and although they may generally like and be pleased with what we manufacture here, yet they go over to the other side and they find something which pleases their taste and they import it and use it instead of the Canadian product. The article of sewing machines has been referred to also. No doubt there is a very large importation of these goods into this country, notwithstanding the duty placed upon them. But the fact is the sewing machine industry of the United States has attained such enormous dimensions, and the surplus stock on hand for the last two or three years has been so wonderfully great, that manufacturers, in spite of the duty, are able to send their goods in here to the injury of the manufacturing interests of the Dominion. That, instead of being an argument against the National Policy, is an argument in favor of it; and if the duty on sewing machines is not sufficiently high, it should be increased. But, I submit, even in this respect the hon. gentleman has not given a fair and candid statement, because although in 1883 we imported sewing machines to the value of $323,197, the value imported in 1884 was only $226,232. Another very important item which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) referred to, was agricultural implements. He told the House nothing, however, as to how many of them had been imported in 1884. What do we find? In 1879, we imported to the value of $240,566, and in 1883 the amount was $583,065. That is true. But the hon. member does not take into account the great rush of settlement that was going on in the North-West at that time, and that American agricultural implement makers were rushing every machine they could possibly turn out into the North-West. The proof of that is, that we find by referring to the tables with respect to Manitoba alone that the value imported there, in 1879, was only $74,174; in 1883 it had increased to the enormous value of $363,769, only $200,000 less than the whole value of agricultural implements imported into Canada. The hon. gentleman, moreover, did not take into account that notice was given at the time the amended tariff was introduced that it would not come into force until the 10th of May. Thus three weeks were allowed Americans to send in agricultural implements, and the value was run up to the large sum of $363,769. The duty was increased from 25 to 35 per cent. We find there is now no complaints in the North-West of implements being too dear. We know from the reports which come to us that there are thousands of machines lying there waiting to be sold. They are brought down to the lowest price. What is the consequence? In 1884 the total amount imported was of the value of only $189,966, showing conclusively quite the contrary, I submit, to the hon. gentleman's statement "that the duty does not prevent articles coming into this country." I do not propose to occupy any more time, but I want to refer to one or two items in a general way in order to show how the farming community has benefited in one item of their production since the National Policy has come into force. I refer to cheese. Canada has now attained in England a pre-eminent position for her cheese, and she is outbidding the world not only for quality but for quantity. In 1879 the Canadian cheese product was of the value of $3,790,300; in 1884, five years afterwards, it had increased to $7,251,989. I find that the value of cheese in 1878 was nearly half as much as the value of our barley, beans, oats peas and rye, exported from the country. But in 1884 while those coarse grains increased in value to $8,273,994, yet cheese came up and reached their united value within $207,131. I will conclude my remarks. I felt it was my duty to take upon myself to contradict the hon. member for Bothwell, who, I regret again, although he knew I was going to answer him, has not thought proper to make his appearance in the House. I will close my remarks by giving hon. gentlemen opposite a piece of advice, which I am quite sure they will act upon, and that is to go on disparaging the country as long as they please, because hon. members in this House understand them and understand what they are driving at, and they may rest assured that the people of the country, outside this House, also understand them. There are very few men who are so unpatriotic as not to know when you set to work to create grievances, or to make small troubles appear great and not give the country credit for that progress it has indisputably made since 1878, and is still making, that those who pursue such a course have a sinister motive, and you may rest assured that when the time comes round and this House is dissolved, and we are all sent back to our constituents to give an account of our stewardship, then hon. gentlemen will meet with the same reward they did in 1878 and 1882 and be returned here again only to enjoy the cold shades of a sunless opposition.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have listened with considerable interest to the address which has just been delivered by the hon. gentleman from Hamilton (Mr. Robertson). He attempted in his introductory remarks to show that the policy of my esteemed and hon. friend in front of me (Mr. Mackenzie) had the effect of ruining the country. He went on to say that the Finance Minister of that day was a fly on the wheel; that he could not accomplish anything in the country's interest, and that it was only when a change of Government took place that the country began to prosper. Now, I would like to know what is the matter just now. We have not the same prosperity in this country that we had in 1882. We have places now that are complaining seriously of the stringency of money, and people who are complaining seriously of the scarcity of work. We know that there are general complaints of these matters throughout the country. How is this? How is it that hon. gentlemen have not, in accordance with their declared policy, looked after the interests of the country and seen that matters of this kind do not exist? I would like to enquire with regard to the engine works at Kingston. Why is it that under the operation of the benign influence of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite these works are not in full blast, and that people have not got employment in them? Why have they had to leave our soil and go across to the other side to earn money to support their families, which they left behind them in Canada? Why has the National Policy permitted things of this kind to take place? I think the hon. gentleman should have explained why hon. gentlemen opposite have been so far neglectful of their duties, so far recreant to their duty as great financiers and promoters of prosperity, as to allow matters of this kind to exist at the present moment. The hon. gentleman admits that Hamilton did increase in population under the Government of my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie). He does not deny that, but he claims there is a larger increase under the Government which now exists. Why, Sir, Hamilton did a very respectable manufacturing business before there was a National Policy. Indeed, I believe, and have good reason to believe, that there are men there to-day who were better off, and made more money, and were in more comfortable circumstances financially, under the operation of the tariff of the Mackenzie Administration than they are to-day under the tariff of the hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury Benches. I am satisfied they had greater prosperity. You may have a few more factories, but what is the fact? If the National Policy tends to do anything at all it tends to build up and then break down—to encourage more factories than are necessary. The Finance Minister extends his liberty and kindness in the direction of protecting those who are disposed to enter into manufacturing business, and the result is that more factories are erected than can find consumers for their produce and the end is that there comes disaster. Well, Sir, it does not matter what particular state of things exists hon. gentlemen opposite are disposed to clap their hands. When the manufacturers are now in deep water they say, "Did not we tell you what would come; did not we tell you that when new factories were erected competition would arise and the people would get their goods far cheaper. To-day there are hundreds of factories in financial difficulties. I know of factories which were in existence and did a creditable and lucrative business before the introduction of the National Policy, and to-day, I am sorry to say, they are closed—they are not able to turn out a single implement, simply because the production in the particular line in which they were engaged has been far more than the country required. The great evil has been that they did not get consumers for the goods they produced. The Government has cast around us a protective policy and we have not the people to take the article manufactured under that policy, and the result is that in many cases they have a larger production than is necessary, and the consequence is stagnation and ruin. The hon. gentleman also said that the price does not keep the goods out of the country; that notwithstanding the National Policy we have still a large influx of goods. That is true; and I ask the House to notice that we are paying an increased price on all those articles we are bringing into the country, in order to satisfy and encourage the owners of those factories in their erection and operation. People have imported goods and paid the increased duties imposed on them in order to encourage the erection of factories to manufacture these goods. Notwithstanding that fact they have not reduced the price, because in some cases they have not produced a sufficient quantity, and the people are driven to foreign markets to supply themselves, and the result is that they are paying an extra price for their goods. Now, Sir, I was surprised at the remarks which dropped from the hon. gentleman with regard to cheese. He said before he sat down he wished to draw the attention of the House to one particular thing, and that thing was cheese, and if there was anything in the world to show the benefits and the advantages of the National Policy it was the article of cheese. Well, Sir, I cannot understand how he draws the conclusion that the National Policy has been the means of establishing so many cheese factories in this country. Does he pretend to say that this country would be flooded with cheese from the United States if we had not a protective policy? Does he mean to say that our people would not have gone into the manufacture of cheese, or that cheese would not have been manufactured in this country, if we had not had the National Policy? Why, Sir, the National Policy has no more to do with the increase in the manufacture of cheese, or with fixing the price of cheese, than it has with arranging the hour when the sun rises or sets each day.

An hon. MEMBER. The duty is just the same as it was.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes, the duty now is just what it was, so that the National Policy has nothing to do with it. But the hon. gentleman appears to be convinced that the National Policy really has done wonders for cheese. Well, Sir, I do not know, but my impression is that if he went to the country and addressed a rural audience, and told them they should thank with all their heart and soul the goodness and kindness of the present Government in so encouraging the manufacture of cheese by the introduction of the National Policy, I should think if there was any snow around he would be snowballed, for the people would not stand such nonsense; they know better. We are face to face with two policies. In the first place the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite is a policy of protection. Their policy is to protect our factories first, and never mind whether the tariff levied on the people is sufficient to raise a sum necessary to meet the demands of the treasury or not; that is a secondary consideration. We claim that our policy is this: Tax the people to the extent necessary to meet the demands on the Dominion Treasury, and no more. If those who want to manufacture goods within the Dominion are able to manufacture within those limits, we say to them with all our hearts, God speed. But we say on the other hand, if we have in the first place to sacrifice the rights of every consumer in this country, if we have to impose on him a duty which he should not be asked to pay, if we have to extract from his pocket annually a certain sum in order to encourage a certain individual to manufacture a certain thing—we say then, in justice to the country, in justice to the individual, it is wrong. It is wrong that any country should base its annual levy for the purpose of meeting the demands on the Treasury, from any such point of view. I say that a revenue tariff, properly and honestly administered, is amply sufficient for the purpose of encouraging the manufacture of any goods within this Dominion that can be successfully manufactured here. Now, Sir, the difference between a revenue tariff and a protective tariff I think I have fully explained; and I hold that if those who are disposed to manufacture were permitted to import the raw material free, and were granted the privilege and the protection our tariff would necessarily give them, it is all the protection they should ask, and all they should receive. Now, I made a special note of the remark of the Finance Minister on the cotton trade. He took the opportunity of comparing the prices of cotton on the American side with those now manufactured in Canada. He mentioned certain brands manufactured in the United States and certain brands manufactured in Canada, and he said the prices are about the same. Now, Sir, he should have told us something along with that. He should have told us that in the United States at this moment not a single bale of cotton leaves a factory that is not sold under a combination. There is not a single mill in the United States at this moment that has not entered into an arrangement whereby every bale it turns out is placed under the control of and sold by one man. I know that. Now, in the face of that fact, what is our position to-day when the Finance Minister tells us that we are now paying a price for cotton equal to the price paid under a combination in the United States? What is going to be the price here when we have a combination? What does the hon. gentleman say? He says to us: I have no hesitation in saying that there is not a member in this House, there is not at least a supporter of the National Policy, who is not prepared to say that he would be glad to see such an arrangement made as would secure to the investors in this country a fair return for the money they have invested, as well as a fair return for the article produced. That is his statement. Well, what will be the result of that? The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that we have more cotton mills in the country at present than can find consumers, and yet he is telling them: Gentlemen put your heads together, and tell us what you want; put on your prices; we will be glad to see you get a good return for the money you have invested, and for the cotton you have produced. The result will be that these cotton mills will combine, and on every dollar in their stock they will pay an annual dividend; money will be forthcoming to pay the interest on their investments, for the cotton the mills will produce will be offered to the public at a price that will pay a dividend on the entire investments in mills as well as the cost of material and working expenses. That will be the result when that arrangement is perfected, as I have no doubt it will. We know that protection leads to combination, combination leads to trade union, and trade union leads to monopolies; one thing follows another just as day follows night. There is one point in this connection to which I wish to call the attention of the House. We think to-day that we are manufacturing cotton in Canada very cheaply. We think we have accomplished a great deal in producing the articles we now produce. Now, I have noticed in the report for 1882 of the Chamber of Commerce of Manchester, the centre of the cotton district of England, that the price realised for the entire out-put of cotton of all kinds and grades, was threepence a yard; that is, from the best and most expensive goods manufactured out of cotton down to the lowest, from the most expensive produced down to the cheapest produced. What was the price realised in 1870, twelve years before? The price realised then was sevenpence a yard. I should like to know how the Canadian manufacturer, with a limited population of four and a half millions, with no other country to look to to provide an outlet for the surplus products, is going to compete with the outside manufacturer, and put on all the new and expensive improvements in machinery necessary to keep pace with the times—how he is going to produce an article at a sufficiently low price, if in the cotton district of England there has been an actual reduction in twelve years of 133½ per cent. in the cost of the article he is turning out. I wish to know how our manufacturers are going to compete under these circumstances. I was sorry to hear the hon. gentleman announce his intention to put a duty on winceys, and I am glad that he has decided to take part of that duty off. I am sorry, for the great struggling masses of this country, that it became necessary to put a duty on that article that so largely enters into the clothing of the poorer classes, though I congratulate him on the reduction he proposes to make. He says he put on the duty to encourage the manufacture of that article in this country. It seems curious that he is not aware that winceys have been made in this country for several years. I can give the names of several places where factories have been established.

Mr. BOWELL. Where?

Mr. McMULLEN. I will endeavor to give the hon. gentleman the information. I am sorry that it is necessary for him to ask the question, because he ought to be posted. Now, the hon. gentleman proposes to fix the duty on winceys at 22½ per cent. I would like to know under what calculation, or under what amount of information, he has come to the conclusion that it is necessary to give the manufacturers of this country a protection of 22½ per cent. on winceys in order to induce them to manufacture. Why, Sir, in order for the Finance Minister of this country to be able to judge intelligently between the consumers and the manufacturers, he would need to be a mechanic, thoroughly posted with regard to the cost of these articles, the cost of raw material, and the cost of manufacturing; and we have the evidence that simply because he is not posted he has made very serious blunders. We know that at the commencement he gave the cotton manufacturers too much protection. The result was that we have a large number of mills; we have now more than we need. We have good reason to know that had the cotton mills been left alone and the additional number not built they would have been able to pay 40 per cent. dividend; but now there is over competition, there is financial disaster, and they are producing more cotton than is wanted. Under a protective tariff it is utterly impossible for any Finance Minister to so balance matters between the producer and the consumers as to do justice to the producer and at the same time to place an article in the hands of the consumer at a price at which he is fairly entitled to have it. He cannot be possessed of that information, and in order to conduct a National Policy such as the Government have inaugurated and are now trying to run—and they are trying their best not to run it into the ditch—but I am afraid they will, in order to run it intelligently, require to have the assistance of a number of men thoroughly posted as to the different manufactures, so that they would place their products in the hands of consumers at the lowest possible price. The Finance Minister is not in a position to do that. What does he know with regard to the manufacture of cotton, or of winceys, or of a sulkey rake, or of a gang plough? He is entirely at the mercy of those men who come to press for an increased duty. They come and put on a poor mouth, and say: Mr. Finance Minister, we want you to give us a little further protection; if you do, we will establish certain things in this country. And he gives them what they want, and as the result of all that, the people of this country are suffering, and are paying more than it is absolutely necessary for them to pay, simply because he does not know how to fix the duty in order to do justice to the consumer as well as the producer. Now, Sir, I was amused with the comparisons the Finance Minister made between agricultural implements in our North-West and those on the other side of the line; and I was glad to find the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) let out the secret when he said a very large amount of manufactured implements had been sent to the North-West which were now lying scattered about the country, and were selling as cheap as possibly could be expected. That is true. When the Minister of Finance quoted the different prices at Winnipeg, Brandon and other places along the line with the prices on the American side of the line, he omitted to mention the fact that our North-West is over-stocked with Canadian implements. I know of a manufacturing concern in Ontario that has thousands of dollars worth of implements in Manitoba which they cannot sell, and for which they would take 50 cents on the dollar if they could get it to-morrow. Other institutions tell a similar story; it appears there are as many agricultural implements in that country as can be used for two years to come, and thus the manufacturers are at a severe loss. A leading partner in a large manufactory told me that in this Dominion his firm had $125,000 worth of agricultural implements scattered up and down, between the east and west, and their entire capital stock is $100,000. They cannot sell their goods. That is the case in a great many instances. I say that the wealthy manufacturing institutions are wiping out the smaller ones; the manufacture of these things is being centralised; institutions throughout this country, which rendered very admirable service to the people are, one by one, being wiped out of existence, those who work in them are suffering, and the manufacturers themselves are losing the little means they possessed. It is only a question of financial strength as to how long the smaller institutions can stand against their wealthy rivals. I was also amused with a remark that fell from the hon. member from Pictou (Mr. Tupper). He said that the volume of farm produce, that the volume of our exports of farm produce, had largely increased, and that this was one of the cases in which the National Policy was doing a great deal of good. How he can possibly reason that the National Policy has been the means of making the crops grow or of inducing the farmers to sow more grain or produce more largely, is beyond my comprehension. It may be the means in this way, that the farmers, finding their resources decreasing, and in order to provide themselves with the necessaries of life, are bound to work harder and produce more; but unless he can show me that the National Policy manures the ground, he cannot prove to me that it is the means of producing more grain. Judging from such wild assertions as these from hon. gentlemen opposite, I have no doubt there are some gentlemen so blind to the operation of the National Policy, as regards the farming interest, that they would actually declare and insist upon it that the National Policy did manure the ground, for they are prepared to insist upon anything; they support the National Policy and will swear by it, you would think they are prepared even to die by it, and I hope they will, politically. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) then admitted that we could not control the market; he admitted that the foreign markets were beyond our control. This is altogether a departure from the statements made at the inauguration of the National Policy, when its advocates claimed we could control the market; they then claimed that the National Policy would bring in a large number of manufactories into operation and bring in a large number of operatives into the country who would consume everything we could produce, and that consequently our farmers and gardeners would have a market at their own doors where they could have remunerative prices for everything they had to sell; that they would, in fact, be independent of the foreign market altogether. The hon. member for Pictou now admits that the National Policy cannot do that. He admits that the predictions of its advocates at the inception of the National Policy some years ago, when they declared Canada would be independent in the matter of markets, that we would be able to adjust this question among ourselves, that our farmers would get glorious prices for what they had to sell, no matter what went on outside, no matter whether there was war or peace or whether things went up or down, these promises have not been realised. We were to have Canada for the Canadians, but all this beautiful prospect has now passed away. I was rather amused to hear the hon. member for Montreal advocate the National Policy very strongly, and then admit that after all there was depression in Montreal, that things were not just as nice as they had been in the past. It was rather singular he should have gone so far as to admit that; and with regard to the deputation of which he spoke that was supposed to wait upon Sir John Macdonald in Montreal when a grand banquet was to be given him, denied that there was any such deputation. However, I notice, he could not give any very credible witnesses; and in order to back his statement that there was an abortive effort made by political friends of ours to thwart the glorious entertainment they were going to give the First Minister, he brought a man from the dead to testify that what he said was true. I have a few words to say with regard to the milling interest. I know that there is a strong feeling among Canadian millers that they should have protection, and as far as I am concerned I must say that if the millers amongst others are going to benefit by anything of that kind they are as well entitled to it as other manufactures. If in the interest of the coal producers of the Maritime Provinces, the millers are asked to pay a large amount on the coal they use in their steam mills, they have a right to get back that money in the shape of protection to their flour. I am satisfied it is impossible to do anything in the interest of millers unless a very decided increase of duty is put on flour coming from the United States. The milling interest has suffered in the past and is suffering seriously to-day, and the great difficulty—a difficulty I do not attribute so much to the National Policy—under which they suffer is this. The manufacture of flour in the Western States is very extensive and the rates of freight from St. Paul and Minneapolis to Liverpool are about as cheap as they are from the city of Toronto, so that it is impossible while this state of things exists for the millers of this country to successfully compete with the American producers of flour. I know a very extensive miller in Ontario who has himself told me that if it were not for the substantial character of his plant he would, in his own interests financially, be compelled to pull up stakes and go to a point in the west where he could get his wheat cheaper and the rate of freight to the selling point as cheap as from any point in this Dominion. The only remedy to this would be, in my opinion, if once we became rich enough, to turn our canals into ship canals so that sailing vessels could load at any point on Lake Huron or Lake Superior or any of the lakes and go right through to the Liverpool market. By that means alone we might be able to reduce the rates of freight to our millers that they would be able to compete with the American millers, and until that is done I cannot see how our milling interest can be promoted further than simply to give them a command of our local markets with which they must content themselves since they cannot compete outside.

Mr. McMULLEN.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. CURRAN. I rise to a question of privilege. The hon. gentleman who has the floor made the following statement in his speech to-day:—

"I was rather amused to hear the hon. member for Montreal advocate the National Policy very strongly and then admit that after all there was depression in Montreal, that things were not just as nice as they had been in the past. It was rather singular he should have gone so far as to admit that; and with regard to the deputation of which he spoke that was supposed to wait on Sir John A. Macdonald in Montreal, when a grand banquet was to be given him, he denied there was any such deputation. However, I notice he could not give any very credible witnesses, and in order to back his statement that there was any abortive effort made by political friends of ours to thwart the glorious dinner they were going to give the First Minister, he brought a man from the dead to testify that what he said was true."

I consider that this was an attack upon my veracity and honor as a gentleman and a member of this House, and it is only on that account that I take the liberty of reading an extract from a private letter which I received yesterday from one of the oldest citizens of Montreal, a friend of the late Mr. Cramp, who is alluded to here, and a friend of his family. It is dated Montreal, 20th March, 1885, and contains the following statement:—

"Mrs. Cramp requests me to offer you her very sincere thanks for the very handsome manner you alluded in your address in the House of Commons to her departed husband, and to add that the expressions quoted by you and ascribed to him she had heard him repeat in his own house."

I regret having had to read this statement, but, as my veracity was impugned, I have been obliged to do so. I also regret having had in this way to refer to Mr. Cramp, who, though not a political friend of mine, was a personal friend all his life time.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have no objection whatever to the hon. gentleman making the allusion he has just done to the remarks I dropped in regard to what he said as to the operations of the National Policy in Montreal. He has not gone so far as to deny that the manufacturing institutions of Montreal are not in a flourishing condition and that the stringency which he stated in his former speech existed does exist. I will now proceed to make some remarks with regard to what fell from the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster)—I am sorry he is not in his place. In the introductory portion of his address he referred to some statements that had been made by the hon. the ex-Finance Minister with regard to the dissatisfaction, the absence of that contentment and cordial feeling that existed in this country some twelve years ago, and he characterised the statement of the ex-Finance Minister as untrue and unwise. I have to say that I believe the feeling to-day in this Dominion is not by any means so cordial as it was twelve years ago. I believe, from the manner in which hon. gentlemen opposite have from time to time and from Parliament to Parliament attempted to interfere with and thwart and annoy the Provinces of this Dominion by interfering with matters that they had a right to legislate on themselves, that they are responsible for a very great portion of the discontent that now exists; but the hon. member for King's was a party to that action. On every single measure that was brought forward to interfere with the rights and the privileges of the Provinces he was prepared to cast his vote with hon. gentlemen on that side in favor of that interference. Last year, when a question came up with respect to matters of the most vital importance to the Province of Ontario, he recorded his vote in favor of the rights of the Province of Quebec, but on the other hand he recorded his vote against the rights and privileges of the people of the Province of Ontario. Action of that kind from year to year on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite has caused a great deal of the feeling and a great deal of the dissatisfaction that now exists in the breasts of the people of this Dominion. The hon. gentleman from King's went into a very elaborate and extensive argument to show, if he possibly could, that the debt of Canada was not equal to that of the United States. He took to task the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) as well as the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), and went into an extensive shower bath of figures to show us that the debt of the United States was in excess of the indebtedness of this country, and the taxes collected there were in excess of the taxes collected here. I have taken the opportunity of looking over and comparing the figures he submitted to the House, and I am prepared to say that the entire debt of the United States, according to the last returns which we have in our possession, is $1,832,500,000. Taking their population at 56,000,000, that is $32.68 per head. The net national debt of Canada, taken at $200,000,000—and I am sure that it is a great deal more than that, I am satisfied there is no gentleman even on that side of the House who will dare to question a statement putting the net national debt of this Dominion at that figure at this moment—with a population of 4,500,000, gives a net debt of $44.44 per head. I know that the hon. gentleman, in presenting the figures to the House which he did on that occasion, deducted from the gross debt of the Dominion the amount that stood charged against the several Provinces at the time that Confederation was inaugurated, he said: These are provincial debts, we have no right to take these into account in counting up the debt of this Dominion, we have a right to place those where they were before Confederation. I look upon that as a fallacious way of going to work to calculate the present indebtedness of the Dominion. The erection of these buildings which we occupy was part of the then debt of the Provinces. Will the hon. gentleman from King's dare to say that the amount of money spent in the construction of these buildings should not be counted as part of the Dominion debt? But still, when he proceeded with the calculation and found that, unless he made a deduction of that kind, he could not bring out the figures to suit his idea, he fell back into that as a means of doing it, that being the only way he possibly could bring out the calculation in anything like a favorable light to this country. The net debt of this country, then, is $11.76 greater than that of the United States. The entire debt of the United States at present, national, state and municipal, is $2,887,113,069.57, or per capita for 56,000,000, $51.52. The entire debt of Canada, Dominion, provincial and municipal, is $257,600,000, or $52.79 per head, or $1.27 a head more than the entire debt of the United States. I contend that that is a very serious state of affairs in the interests of this country. I contend that, when we have got to compare our present financial position with the country that unfortunately had an internal war that doubled and trebled its debt, and that we never had, and consider that to-day, with a limited population and an extensive territory and many developments to make in the interests of our country, we stand $1.27 a head in debt more than the United States, it is a very serious consideration. But there is a more important consideration which we have not touched upon. There is a point which every member of this House and every man in the country should seriously consider, and that is that the United States, since 1878, the period at which hon. gentlemen opposite took office in this Dominion, have reduced their indebtedness $425,676,968.96, while the Government opposite has increased the debt of this country to $80,384,030.14, while the debt of the United States is going down from year to year the debt of Canada is yearly increasing. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will refer to the question of cities. The hon. member for King's, New Brunswick (Mr. Foster) labored very hard to show his friends in St. John that it was no use in their going to the United States for the purpose of getting rid of municipal indebtedness and heavy taxation. He told them that if they went from St. John to Bangor they would leave a city that only had $36 of municipal debt per head and go to one that had $157 and some odd cents per head of municipal indebtedness. Well, Sir, I took occasion to look over the statistics of the United States, and I find that in the year 1880 there were in the United States 268 cities with a total population of 11,327,648, and a gross debt of $580,516,140, or a per capita debt of $51.54. Now I believe the per capita debt of Toronto is something like $64 per head. We have not very accurate data upon which to base a calculation as to the exact municipal indebtedness of our towns and cities; I am sorry to say our census does not give us the data upon which to make a correct calculation. But as I said before, the hon. member, when his friend left St. John, wanted to send him to Bangor. Why send him to Bangor? Because, Bangor was heavily taxed. He had evidently searched the statistics of the United States to find a heavily taxed city, and so the hon. member sends his friend to Bangor instead of to any other city with a less indebtedness. I find, Sir, that there are 63 cities in the United States with a per capita debt under $10; there are 108 cities with a per capita debt under $20; there are 47 cities with a per capita over $60, and 22 with a per capita debt of over $40. But the hon. gentleman does not send his friend from St. John to any of those places. Oh no, he sends him to Bangor, and Bangor is one of the heaviest taxed cities in the United States. There is only one other city the municipal debt of which per head exceeds that of Bangor. Well, I suppose he thought he would send him to the worst place. He did like the evil spirit in the "Pilgrim's Progress;" he made up his mind that he would keep his friend as long as he could in the city of St. John, and when his friend was determined to go he sent him the wrong road, in the very opposite direction that he wanted to go. Now, Sir, I will give you the municipal indebtedness of some of the cities of the United States:

	Population.	Rate per capita.
Amsterdam, N.Y.	$ 95
Akron, Ohio	1 07
Bloomington, Ill.	17,000	12 89
Burlington, Iowa	20,000	6 58
Baltimore, Ind.	332,000	2 57
Bradford, Penn.	10,000	0 00
Cedar Rapids, Iowa	10,000	4 04
Newport, R.I.	15,000	7 42
Quincy, Mass.	10,500	6 24

	Population.	Rate.
San Francisco	233,959	13 08
Lockport, N.Y.	15,000	8 09
Kansas City, Mo.	55,785	24 00

Now, Sir, I want to give you some of the more heavily taxed cities, and we will commence with the favored city of my hon. friend, Bangor. And let me remark in this connection that the hon. gentleman said in his speech: Now, I want you to understand that I want to be fair; I want you to understand that I have tried to be fair in these comparisons. Now, Sir, we will see how fair he was. He takes Bangor with 16,856 of a population, and a municipal indebtedness of $157.87 per capita. Then Elizabeth, New Jersey, has a population of 28,229, and a debt of $195.28 per capita. Jersey City, N.Y., has a population of 120,722, and a per capita debt of $127.49. Memphis has a population of 33,000, and a per capita municipal indebtedness of $135.59. Middletown has a municipal indebtedness of $119.97 per capita. I may say that there are eight cities of the United States with a per capita municipal indebtedness of over $100, and one of these is Bangor; Bangor stands at the head of the list except one. Now this is the fair comparison the hon. member for King's would lead us to understand he was disposed to make in dealing with the debt of the cities of the United States. I was rather amused when he came to deal with the municipal taxes of the Dominion, that he should have gone to Ontario. He appeared to be glad to take the figures as set down in the Province of Ontario, notwithstanding the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite have lost no opportunity in criticising in very severe terms the manner in which the affairs of the Province of Ontario have been managed. They have tried to show that its money has been squandered, that its business has been badly managed by the very able and efficient gentlemen who have been at the head of that Government for so many years. But after all, when they want to make a comparison in this Dominion they have to go to Ontario, of all the Provinces, to find the most favorable standard. This is a confession on their part that its affairs are very well handled. I cannot find out, for the life of me, how he came to make out the entire municipal taxation of the Dominion to be $4 per head. He appears to have borrowed that opinion from some quarter—I do not know where. I cannot tell on what data he proceeded, because I say, Mr. Speaker, that if there is anything at all surrounded with difficulty it is the endeavour to ascertain exactly the municipal taxation of this Dominion, that is, the amount collected in each municipality for municipal and school purposes. However, he gives it to the House at $4. He says with a flourish of eloquence: I present these figures to the House and to the country. I think, he says, they will stand investigation. Well, Sir, that reminds me of a story I once heard of an Irishman who came to this country. He landed at New York, and engaged to an American. After the American had had him some time in his employ he thought he would have a little fun out of him, so he said to him one fine evening: "Pat, go out doors and count the stars for me." Pat went out, and after a while he came in and said there were 9,876,000 or some big figure of that kind. "Oh," says the American, "you must be mistaken; how can you be so sure of the number?" "Well, sir," said Pat, "I am quite certain that I am right, and if you do not believe me you can go outside and count them yourself." Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman has presented these figures; wherever he got them I do not know. But he says: I present them to the House, I present them to the country, and I am prepared to say that I believe that I am correct. Well, Sir, I do not believe that he is at all near correct. I believe when he took that amount as the municipal taxation of the Province, he made up his mind that he would take an amount that would come within the limit so as to show that we have a less municipal taxation than that the United States in.

I do not think we can get such evidence as will enable us to come to a correct conclusion on a question of this kind. I believe the only possible way to make a comparison is to take the entire debt of the United States, the state, federal and municipal debts, and putting them together compare the gross amount with the Dominion debt, the provincial debt and the municipal debt combined. We have done that, and I am sorry to have to admit that our debt exceeds that of the United States by $1.27 per head. I took considerable trouble to read over the hon. gentleman's speech. Last year in addressing the House he said he had read over the speech of the leader of the Opposition three times. He said he found nothing in that speech worthy of notice unless it was the "may be," "may be," "may be," which occurred several times. I read over the hon. gentleman's speech recently delivered once, then I read it again, and part of it a third time, and the only thing that attracted my attention was the word metropoli. I do not know where the hon. gentleman got the word; but all great men, Mr. Speaker, in this world are known either by having invented something or being the author of a book or the author of a word. The late Lord Brougham was known to the after generations of his day as the inventor of a carriage, and one of the Dukes of Wellington is remembered as the inventor of a pair of boots. The hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster) will no doubt be known by future generations as the author of a word, metropoli. I was quite amused with the very determined manner in which the hon. gentleman assailed three of the prominent members of this side of the House, the ex-Finance Minister, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson). He made an effort to overthrow the whole of them. I began to think that possibly the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) would feel that his position was in some danger when the hon. member for King's made such a very elaborate statement and went so largely into figures and, as he thought, into facts, but I am sorry to say were largely fiction; I began to think I say that the hon. member for Cardwell would begin to think that he should try and secure a position on the Treasury Benches immediately, because when the hon. member for King's took his seat he was quite satisfied that he had performed the duties that devolved upon him with the greatest amount of ability. I do not know how long that hon. gentleman may be asked to remain on the back benches, but in his own estimation he should be advanced to a front seat before very long. There is one question I wish to bring before the House, and it is this: It is not very often we get admissions from hon. gentlemen opposite that are of use to us as going to show the fallacy and injustice of the policy which they advocate and uphold. The Finance Minister in delivering his Budget Speech made some admissions that struck me forcibly when he made them, and I then thought that if I had the privilege or pleasure of offering some remarks during the debate I would undoubtedly allude to them. He stated that the ex-Government, during the time they had been in power from 1st July, 1874, to 1st July, 1879, five years, had under the then tariff extracted from the people's pockets $98,295,770.34; while from July 1st, 1879, to July 1st, 1884, it appears that under the operation of their policy they have extracted from the people $124,723,689.84, or $26,426,899.50 more than the previous Government took from the people. It is not often we get such an admission. We have often met hon. gentlemen opposite on the political stump, and they have always declared—and I will not be surprised if some of them still persist in declaring it—that under the National Policy the people pay no more taxes. Then where has the money come from? Where did the Finance Minister get his extra $26,000,000, which he declares he got? The hon. gentleman has extracted $5.88 per head during five years more than was extracted under the administration of

of the late Government during the same time. I hope, therefore, we shall not hear any more as regards the National Policy not making the people pay more money into the Treasury. It is quite plain from the admission of the Finance Minister himself that they do pay more taxes. He will not surely rise and attempt to show that the money was got in some secret way. He tells how the money was got. He says it was by excise duties and stamps, and that the late Government got the money from the same sources; and we have, under the operation of our tariff of increased duties imposed in connection with our protective policy, succeeded in making the people pay $26,427,899.50 more than they would have paid under the operation of the policy of the preceding Government. That is the hon. gentleman's admission. There is another question to which I desire to call the attention of the House. From the inception of the scheme of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway down to the present time we have heard public declarations made by hon. gentlemen opposite that the people of this country would never be asked to pay one dollar to the construction of that railway. Now what is the fact? Over $12,000,000 of the people's money, out of the surplus collected under the operations of his tariff, has gone directly into the construction of the road within the last five years. I believe I am stating the amount at something less than what I should state it; I believe over that amount I have named has gone into that railway. I should like to ask the Finance Minister, or any hon. gentleman whether one dollar will ever go back to the pockets of the people from whom it was extracted. I answer, no. No portion of that money will ever be refunded. You may say that the country will get a certain amount of money out of the sale of lands. Will it go back into the pockets of the people? Not one dollar. Yet we find hon. gentlemen prepared to assert that the tax payers of the Dominion will never be asked to pay one cent towards that work. I hold that the most important question in connection with handling the affairs of this Dominion is the increase of our population. I believe that the immigration policy of hon. gentlemen opposite has been a mistake. A very large amount of money has been positively squandered and lost, and in many cases the people who have been brought out to this country have proved utterly useless. If there is any particular class of settlers that would prove beneficial to the Dominion it is the class of men possessed of some means and able to take up homes and work out their own course of life. During the last year this country has not obtained the proper stamp of immigrants; many of the men brought here were literally useless. They were worthless to us. I therefore hold that a very large amount of money has been lost owing to the manner in which the immigration policy has been treated. I hold that the next thing we should do, Mr. Speaker, is to cut off all monopolies. I believe myself that the policy adopted in the North-West in regard to the creation of these monopolies in land, with regard to the restricted manner in which lands were offered to those who went in there in search of homes, with regard to the manner in which railway land corporations and other lands were surrounded by restrictions imposed by those who held these lands, has been a drawback to the settlement of this country. The proper course would have been to leave all the lands absolutely for those who are prepared to take up homes and live upon them, and if that policy had been adopted I believe, Sir, we would have had more settlers there to-day than we have; and I believe, owing to the course of hon. gentlemen opposite, there have gone from that country many letters of disappointment from settlers to friends in the old country, telling them that the representations made to them and the offers by which they were induced to cast their lot in with the future of that country, were highly overdrawn, and that they did not realise in full the promises made to them. I believe they found that in place of getting land wherever they liked to settle, in many cases they had to take it in out of the way places or else it was subject to restrictions which they could not carry out. And if there is anything at all which the people of the old country detest it is a system of landlordism, such as they have been struggling with in the old country, and they do not want to be subjected to that kind of thing here. If all the land had been given to them at a fixed rate, so that they would have been induced to make their homes there, it would have been the true policy of settling that country and getting that influx of population into it that we would all be so glad to see. Now, Sir, in connection with the immigration policy of the Government I may say that I had the privilege a short time ago of examining a book known as "The National Policy"—a book of which I believe some 5,000 have been issued at a cost of $5,000 by hon. gentlemen opposite and circulated in the old country. That book I am prepared to admit is the most ingenious invention in the interest of immigration. I must say that it possesses peculiar and attractive qualities as a production, such as could not possibly emanate from any men except the most ingenious thinking lot of men you could come across. I notice that the first page of the book has a photograph of the First Minister in it, the second page has a photograph of five of his colleagues, and the third page has a photograph of five more of them. I think that is an admirable way of presenting to the people of the old country the attractions of this country. Any man looking at the pleasant kindly countenances of those eight or nine men, who would not come to the conclusion that this is a paradise, if there is one on earth, must be a fool or an idiot. I would caution hon. gentlemen opposite to be careful how they use that book. Why, Sir, if too many of the people of the old world should get the privilege of seeing that particular book, we might find ourselves face to face with a famine, for we might not be able to feed the people that would rush to this country, or give them the necessary accommodation. I notice that this year the Government have asked a smaller appropriation than last year for immigration, and I do not wonder, because I do not believe if that book is judiciously handled they will require any money at all, for it will take the place of any expenditure in that way. While I am on the point of expenditure I would refer to some matters which I think are worth looking into. There is a certain amount of expenditure in this Dominion which is quite under the control of hon. gentlemen opposite in this House. I admit that there is a certain amount of expenditure which is perhaps not fully under their control. At the same time, Sir, I hold that where we find that even under statutory regulations we are spending more money than is necessary should be spent it is our duty to retrench and curtail and cut down the amount, and amend our laws so that the expenditure shall not be in excess of the ability of the people to pay. While we were talking about the United States I was looking over what was paid there to their State Governors. I find, Sir, that in the United States they have 47 State Governors. I find that they pay these 47 men $168,900 on the whole, or an average of $3,600 apiece. The House will remember that those Governors have to seek their election at the hands of the people; they have to go to the polls and pass the ordeal of seeking votes, and incur all the necessary expenses connected with the election, and they hold their offices for four years. I find that we have in Canada 9 Provincial Governors and Governors of Territories, and that we pay the whole of them $68,000, or an average of $7,550 apiece. Therefore we pay our Lieutenant Governors in this country virtually twice as much as they pay in the United States for their State Governors. Now I hold that the State of New York, which pays its Governor $10,000 a year, is perhaps in point of actual value worth about as much as the entire Dominion. I have no doubt they could afford as well to pay as large a salary for their Governor as the Dominion could to ours. They pay him $10,000 a year, while Ontario pays our Lieutenant Governor, appointed by the Crown—for he is not required to seek the popular vote, he is not required to cultivate popularity—he gets the appointment from the Crown and draws $10,000, along with perquisites and other expenses connected with his position. I find that in the Province of Quebec the same amount is paid to their Lieutenant-Governor. Now, Sir, I believe it is only by the reduction of those amounts that we can possibly hope to bring the amount of taxation levied on the people of this Dominion within proper limits. I say that it is time that we should commence seriously to consider several items of expenditure, from the largest to the smallest, cut them down in every single instance and bring them within the means of the people of this Dominion. We have been going on in an extravagant way year after year, and every year the amount is increasing. The incidental expenses are annually increasing. I find that in the several Departments in this city, for the convenience of hon. gentlemen and their attendants and clerks in these Departments, there is no less a sum paid, according to the Auditor General's Report of last year, $9,660.25 for newspapers and periodicals, not for advertising, or for any work done, but actually for periodicals and newspapers supplied to the Departments. I find in looking over the items of incidental expenses connected with the several Departments presided over by hon. gentlemen opposite, that they have spent in the matter of incidental expenses, $177,945.56. Out of this there has been paid $22,346.79 for expenses connected with His Excellency the Governor General and members of the Government—travelling expenses of the Governor General and suite, and members of the Government. Included in that amount I find that members of the Government, for their own personal expenses and cab hire in the city of Ottawa, have actually drawn from the Treasury $6,280.18, that they have actually drawn from the treasury $6,280.18, over and above their salaries of $7,000 or $9,000 a year, their annual sessional allowance of $1,000 a year, and also their allowance for mileage, if they come from a distance to attend to their duties here. I think, when the people of this country come to understand these expenditures, they will not endorse them. I think, when they come to understand that money is thrown away in this kind of style, that they will rise in their might, and will pledge every man who comes to Parliament not to support any Government, Reform or Conservative, that spends the public money in this way. I say it is time we had an end to this sort of thing; it has gone too far; and I hope the day is not far distant when men will be sent here to watch the public accounts and criticise every item, in the interests of their constituents, and see that the public money, is not squandered and frittered away in this kind of style. Now, I have no doubt that any hon. gentleman who follows me will rise up and say that we are still decrying our country. Well, all I have got to say is this: Hon. gentlemen opposite place us in the position that we must tell the truth; and if they like to take the alternative of telling the opposite, and not decrying the country, we are willing that they should assume that responsibility. It is our duty to criticise the policy of the Government, every item of expenditure, and every matter of interest to our country, and in doing that, if we should expose some matters which are not perhaps too creditable to us, it is only because we feel it to be our duty, in the interest of our country, in the interest of the people who have sent us here, to tell the truth and the whole truth, and to expose those things that should be exposed. There was another matter that I should have referred to, in connection with the items of expenditure. A few evenings ago we had a considerable discussion with regard to extra fees paid to clerks engaged in the several Departments here. On looking over the accounts, I find that there is one continuous systematic effort to fleece the public chest by every man engaged in the Departments here. Every man engaged in any of the Departments, if he does an extra hour's, or half hour's work, makes a demand for extra pay, and the members of the Government are apparently only too willing to allow it. In connection with the Savings Bank Branch of the Post Office Department I find that $1,927.67 was allowed for counting interest on deposits—paid extra to men who receive a salary, year by year, for doing work of this kind; men who receive full and ample allowance for the work they perform; men who only put in a few hours a day, and have the balance for themselves; simply because it becomes necessary for them to make these little calculations, they make a demand and are paid this amount in excess of the sums they receive for their ordinary employment. Now, I say it is wrong that these things should be permitted, and it is the duty of every man in this House to expose them; and if his remonstrances are not listened to by the Government, it is his duty to carry these things to the constituencies and press upon the people the necessity of pledging those who are sent here to see that the annual expenditure is cut down to the limit of the people's means, and to the point that will enable the people to live easily. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite have been always willing and anxious to criticise us as free traders. Well, I have only to say that however anxious any man on this side of the House might be to see a system of free trade introduced, hon. gentlemen opposite have placed it out of the power of the most ardent free trader in this country to realise free trade in the present generation. The way our annual debt is rolling up places an insuperable barrier in the way of free trade. It is quite evident that we must have either a revenue or a protective tariff. Hon. gentlemen opposite are disposed, for the time being, to insist on a protective tariff—first, in the interests of the manufacturing institutions, and secondly, in order to meet the demands on the Treasury. We on this side claim that a revenue tariff is the true basis of taxation. We claim that people should not be called on to contribute more than the necessities of the public expenditure require. We say that any more is unfair, and unjust, and unwise. Now, I have endeavored to put my remarks in as concise a form as possible. I thank this House for listening to me in my rambling remarks, and I hope that by these discussions and criticisms of the public affairs of this country, we shall be guided in coming to conclusions that will be for the best interests of the people of this country, and will tend to build it up and make it what we should be glad to see it become a great and prosperous nation.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, in rising for the first time to address this hon. House, and at so late a stage of this important debate, the main subjects of which have already been so fully and ably discussed by hon. members, I am impressed, Sir, with the necessity of soliciting at the hands of hon. members, all the consideration usually accorded to new members. And, Mr. Speaker, at the outset, I have the proud satisfaction of being justified in congratulating the right hon. leader of the Government, his colleagues and the House, on the very satisfactory exhibit, concerning the great general interests of our country, that the eminent Finance Minister has placed before the House and the country, in his masterly and exhaustive Budget Speech, and upon his general conclusions in respect to the present actual position, and the well-grounded future prospects of this great Dominion of ours; all of which, Sir, are fully justified by the facts of the case. In reference to expression of opinion that I shall take the liberty to make, in regard to the fiscal policy of our country, I may say that they have not been acquired yesterday or the day before, but far anterior to the year 1878, 1876, or even 1875, at a time when the matter was taken up so ably, and when the celebrated resolution upon which the National Policy was founded was brought down to this House by the right hon. Premier, then sitting at your left, apparently in a hopeless position of Opposition, having merely the corporal's guard at his back, and taking a step that, so far as I have been able to read or understand the history of constitutional government, has not had a parallel—when the head of a great political party, though, at the moment, in opposition and in small numbers, propounded on the opposition benches a policy which, though strongly opposed by the Ministry of the day, was subsequently heartily endorsed, and later on reendorsed, by the great majority of the people of this Dominion. My own conclusions on such subjects are not arrived at by the perusal of theories. It has been my lot to be compelled, as it were, to study far more the pages of my own personal experience, in reference to the effect of our present fiscal policy on this country; and in arriving at conclusions, when I found the generally accepted trade theories, however scientifically laid out, either in books or in speeches of public men, were contradicted by the facts, I decided that it was so much the worse for the theories. The leader of the Opposition, however, and those who support him, appear to act on entirely the opposite principle, that where facts contradict theories, they concluded apparently so the worse for the facts. I shall not, at this late stage of the debate, trespass upon the time of the House any longer than will be absolutely necessary to elucidate some of the points in reference to the working of our fiscal policy, and to refute, as I think I will be able to do, some of the futile attempts of hon. gentlemen opposite to establish that our policy is not in the best interests of the country. I think it is not difficult for any unprejudiced, impartial mind, to establish that the policy of the present Government is eminently in the best interests of our country. With the permission of the House, I will take the liberty of making some quotations from the Finance Minister's Budget Speech, to show why I consider and why I believe the people consider, the country is to be congratulated on the results of his policy. The first point in which the general ratepayers of our country are particularly interested is, that the taxation under the Administration from 1874 to 1879, under the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite, was $4.88 per head, while from 1879 to 1884, under the present Government, it was 10 cents less per head, notwithstanding an increased expenditure in the active development of the country, of $750,000 per year. For 1883-84 our tax per head of the population was actually $1.35 less than that of the United States, although the ex-Finance Minister (Sir Richard Cartwright) has asserted that ours is nearly double that of the United States. This is the gist of the result of the Administration of last year, and in which the people are especially interested. I shall next take the liberty of referring to the statement made by the member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) who, I regret, is not in his place at the moment, for in it is explained the extraordinary fallacious position which that hon gentleman has attempted to maintain before this House and the country for years past. The statement to which I refer is this:

"We find that our debt in six years apparently has increased about 60 per cent.; we find that our taxes are increased at the rate of 150 per cent., the average amount to-day of taxes being 150 per cent. greater than they were six years ago.

"He then goes on to explain why he comes to that conclusion; from about 17½ per cent. the hon. gentleman has made them very considerably over 35 per cent., taking them all round."

Now, according to his own position, according to the basis he lays down himself, upon which he makes his calculation and estimate the actual taxation paid by the people, he exaggerates only 50 per cent., but this may be considered very moderate for that hon. gentleman. By this exaggeration he exposes the falsity of the basis upon which he founds his estimate of the taxation per head paid by the people of this country. Now, the practical fact is that all rates named under the tariff are not necessarily taxation, except on such articles as are necessities and cannot be produced in the country, or unless such as are produced under the paternal influence of the National Policy are thereby rendered more expensive to general consumers than formerly, whereas the contrary are the facts, as has been most conclusively shown during this debate by several hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. If the contention of the hon. member for South Huron in this connection be correct, an article stated in the tariff at 100 per cent. would cost the consumer of the country where that tariff is imposed double what it would otherwise, a contention so ridiculous and absurd that it is hardly worth referring to further. Now I take the liberty of asserting that a basis such as the hon. gentleman has laid down for statements of any kind being false, insecure and a fallacy, the structure of argument which he raises on such a basis must be equally fallacious. Again, that hon. gentleman says:

"For the last six years this unhappy country has had a protective tariff, administered by a Government of practical politicians, presided over by a philanthropic Minister of Finance, who desires to increase the greatest happiness of the greatest number."

I am able to congratulate the hon. gentleman for having expressed the precise words that would be used by the great majority in this country in reference to the present Government, although ironical on his part. He goes on further to say:

"By giving to a few hundred persons, influential political partisans, who had access to him, unlimited right to tax the millions of consumers who were not equally fortunate."

The hon. gentleman has for once, as I said, expressed the facts of the case, but he states in one breath that the manufacturers, from the effects of the tariff, had been highly benefitted at the expense of the consumer, while, in the next breath, he attributes what he terms their present ruinous condition to the effects of the National Policy, overlooking the fact that, if that is true, and it is not true, the great mass of our community must be getting the benefit from lowness of prices arising from over-production. The hon. member for South Huron says further:

"A very sharp check will be needed. In these six years our position has altered very materially for the worse, and not only materially but morally."

Because, forsooth, the great majority of the people of this country have emphatically affirmed and re-affirmed that the hon. gentleman is not the heaven-born financier that he imagines himself, and will have none of him. He has been tried and found wanting, as also have the political party with which he is allied. Hence that hon. gentleman hesitates not from his place in this House to cast this insult in the face of one and all who differ from him, and to charge the great majority of the people of this country with having deteriorated, not only materially but morally. Again we have his gratuitously implied insult to the great body of the agriculturists of our country, who are a mainstay of this Dominion more important than any other interest—that exists in this Dominion. I refer to his recent statements made in his efforts to attack the correctness of the census or to attack the hon. the Minister of Agriculture. On that occasion he did not hesitate to make a variety of statements, of which, with the permission of the House, I will give a few specimen bricks. He said:

"Now, Sir, in order that the House may know that I am warranted in saying that the census, as at present taken, abounds with a great many details which can by no possibility be accurate, I will just call the attention to certain items in the census of 1881. I find there that nearly twenty pages, and something like fifteen distinct entries required to be made up all over the Dominion, are devoted to items like these: Total number of pounds of home-made butter, pounds of home-made cheese, pounds of grapes, bushels of other fruits, pounds of maple sugar, pounds of hops, and a variety of items of the same kind. Now, if accurate information on these points could have been obtained, the hon. Minister might have been justified in asking for it, and in loading down the census tables with all these details; but I put it to the common sense of every hon. gentleman in this House whether one farmer in a hundred, or in five hundred, is able to give the census enumerators the number of pounds of home-made butter or cheese he has produced, much less the number of pounds of grapes or of maple sugar. Any one who has paid any attention to the way in which such information is obtained knows that farmers scarcely ever dream of keeping accurate accounts of these various matters. The fact is, that all these details are simply guesses, and nothing more; not one of them can be depended on. They are approximations, more or less accurate, generally less accurate than more. I dare say the information would be valuable if it could be relied on; but the hon. Minister, who is a man of practical experience, knows that very few farmers keep accurate accounts, even of the quantity of grain they raise, much less of these details with which the census is encumbered."

In contrast with this implied depreciation of the intelligence of the farmers of our country, the hon. the Minister of Agriculture responded in this wise:

"He says these people are guessing. It is he who is guessing. He says the quantity cannot be obtained. Why, there is not a man who makes sugar who does not know almost to the very pound how much he makes. Is there a man who raises hops who cannot tell how many pounds he sells? Is it not ridiculous for the hon. gentleman to say that this information cannot be got directly? It is the very information you can get directly."

And further:

"It shows what an impracticable man the hon. gentleman is. Let the hon. gentleman condescend once in a while to dine with a farmer, or go to a farmer's house and look at him, and the farmer will tell him at once that what the hon. gentleman has said is perfectly ridiculous."

I am informed that that hon. gentleman's constituents are in a very large degree farmers. I simply ask the question—I will not answer it—whether, according to his estimate of the intelligence of that portion of his constituents, that does not account for the presence of the hon. gentleman here in Parliament. I am reminded that his predecessor was a farmer, but arrangements were made by which the farmers of his county should not be represented here. Now, Mr. Speaker, with the further indulgence of the House, I will refer to some of the statements made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), whom I am sorry to see is not in his place. That hon. gentleman, during this debate, said:

"Sir, the hon. gentleman has reduced the price of every bushel of wheat the Canadian farmer has to sell, of every bushel of farm produce he has to sell—he has reduced it by the operation of this policy, which has placed us at variance with our natural customers, and driven from the markets of Canada the people who are the consumers of our surplus food products."

Now, is it reasonable, or is it in accordance with common sense, to make those remarks about a country whose exports of agricultural products in 1884 were $619,269,449, and of manufactures, $111,330,242. The hon. gentleman went on further to say:

"This has been the operation of the National Policy, a policy which has not only imposed direct taxes on the people of this country in the shape of Customs"—

It is something new, probably, to this House, to hear that Customs duties are direct taxation—

"but has imposed indirect duties, in the shape of an enhanced cost of the ordinary articles of consumption of the people of this country, and impose this additional taxation in the shape of a reduction in the price of farm produce. Not for one hundred years has wheat been lower in England than it is to-day, because she has reached countries where that article can be produced cheaply. Not for many years has the price of wheat been lower than it is in Canada to-day, notwithstanding the vaunts and boasts of hon. gentlemen, that they would afford agricultural protection to the farmers of Canada. They offered them benefits and blessings. They have conferred on them curses instead."

I will now point out the contradictions, and these are very evident. Here is another palpable self-contradiction, but that is not unusual with the hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House. He says, first, that the National Policy has lowered the prices for the farmer. Second—and that is (heir stock argument—he says it is well known that England regulate the prices. Next, he says that for 100 years wheat has not been lower in England than it is to-day. Therefore, his argument is contradictory, for it opposes his own contention that prices are reduced by the effect of the National Policy, whereas by his own showing low prices are produced by a fall in the English market. Then that hon. gentleman went on to say:

"Sir, we cannot conceal our position from the United States or from any other intelligent men. It is not necessary to tell them; they know it. But we can inform ourselves, and it is necessary that the people of Canada should know the truth. It is necessary that the people of Canada should know the affairs of this country, and it is nothing short of criminal to conceal from the people of Canada the actual condition of the public affairs of this Dominion. I do not intend to conceal them. And gentlemen may prate about unpatriotic conduct and injuring the country if they choose. We have heard enough of that stuff."

An hon. gentleman who, with the responsibility resting upon him as a representative of the people and a member of this House, stigmatises any pretension to patriotic conduct that he does not agree with, as "stuff," I think, Mr. Speaker, will hardly be appreciated by this House or the country. Has that hon. gentleman come to his conclusion on the same principle that a certain nameless personage who has a perpetual contempt for and sneers at the existence of virtue of any kind? Next, we have a choice specimen of his asserted truth-telling, where he refers to the present position of the sawed lumber interest in this Ottawa section. Now, Mr. Speaker, I must solicit the indulgence of the House whilst I refer to the following statements of the hon. gentleman, and I cannot imagine where or from what source he obtained the information that he gave to the House and to the country, when he stated in his place:

"I may remind the people of the country that they are growing poorer every year through the reduction in value of the various properties. Farms can be bought in any part of Ontario cheaper than they could be purchased six years ago."

Now, whatever the experience in this respect may be of the members from the western part of Ontario, the contrary, I can assure this House and the country, is the experience of the representatives from the Ottawa valley and central Canada. There is a difference of opinion even among the hon. gentlemen opposite on that point. I will read an extract from a speech of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), who said:

"The hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), who spoke the other day, quoted the statistics of the Ontario Bureau of Industries to show that the price of farm land had gone up in Ontario. I believe he quoted them correctly, and I believe, from my knowledge of the gentleman who collects those statistics, that they are as correct as they can be made. I believe that the value of farm property in Ontario has gone up."

But the most astounding and incorrect statement made by the hon. member for North Norfolk is in respect to the present condition of the sawed lumber interest in this section particularly:

"What is the state of the lumber interest? Are the lumbermen of Ottawa and of the West, and of the East working double time, making sales far ahead? There is a vast accumulation of lumber in the yards at Ottawa, and none of it is sold. Gloom and despondency prevail in the lumber markets; the shipping interest is low, not a single prediction made by the hon. gentleman in regard to any industry in the country has been realised."

Now, I deny that the sawed lumber interest of the Ottawa valley is in a deplorable condition, but to the contrary, is in a most satisfactory state. Allow me to state, Mr. Speaker, that a very carefully compiled statistical account appeared in the Citizen last November, of the season's cut on the Ottawa, and it gives an approximate estimate of the amount of lumber cut in the different mills during the season of 1884. The gross amount is 495,500,000 feet. That amount, taken with what is cut up the river, makes the gross cut for the Ottawa Valley 625,000,000 feet, or about an average season's cut. This represents a cash value of $7,500,000 to this section of Canada. The report continues :

"Now that the Presidential contest is over in the States, we can look to a good trade for next season, and with cheap labor, flour and pork, next year bids fair to be a most profitable one for our lumber kings."

That statement is corroborated by a lengthy article in the organ of hon. gentlemen opposite in this city. It is dated 20th March. I will read merely the heading: "Work in the Woods. A Hopeful Lumbering Outlook for Next Season's Trade." I have here a statement of the position of the lumber that is now piled here, the remains of last year's cut. The source of my information is such that I take the responsibility of saying that I am prepared to challenge any satisfactory contradiction from any quarter in any important particular. The statement is this :

"Of the 495,000,000 feet cut last season between Ottawa and Grenville all is sold and shipped except about 190,000,000 feet remaining in mill yards and docks, of which about 150,000,000 has been sold since close of navigation and is now held in second hand. The balance, about 40,000,000 principally coarse box, suited only for local purposes and Montreal market; and within the past week most, if not all, mill culls about Ottawa mills have been sold to Montreal buyers at about same price as last year, and the buyers proceeded to mills below this, as far as Grenville, with the view of securing from them any amount of this quality they can obtain. As to next year's cut a much larger percentage is sold in advance than is usual at this season of the year, and at higher prices, (from $2 to $5 per thousand feet) over last year's prices, particularly in the upper grades. The advance on these will much more than compensate for any reduction, if any there be, on the coarse box. As to pine deals for Quebec, every deal now on hand in this section, and at all other points heard from, and the entire cut during season of 1873, are now sold in advance, at prices varying from $2 to $10, 1st, 2nd and 3rds per hundred standard, over prices obtained last season, which were considerably more than those obtained in 1883.

"Estimate of deal to be cut on the Ottawa during 1885, is as follows : Booth, Ottawa, 15,000,000 to 20,000,000 feet; Eddy, Hull, 25,000,000 to 30,000,000 feet; Gilmour & Co., Chelsea, 18,000,000 to 20,000,000 feet; Edwards & Co., Rockland, 8,000,000 to 10,000,000 feet; Jas. McLaren, Buckingham, 5,000,000 to 6,000,000 feet; Pattee & Perley, Ottawa, 15,000,000 to 16,000,000 feet; Hamilton Bros., Hawkesbury, 15,000,000 to 18,000,000—say 115,000,000 feet board measure."

An important sale of timber limits, which affords an index to the condition of the lumber trade, occurred on Saturday at the Russell House, in this city, the Hall limits on the Gatineau river realising $247,000, one-third cash, balance at eight and twelve months. The hon. gentleman to whom I have referred has been egregiously mistaken, and I think, as a public man, he should be more careful in making statements that may seriously affect an important industry. With the further indulgence of the House, I desire to bring under its attention the position of the two political parties in regard to the tariff, so far as actual taxes on the food supplies of the people are concerned. Hon. gentlemen opposite on all occasions, inside this House and outside of it, pose as the friends of the working men, and as the party who are in sympathy with the masses. Let us see whether their actions correspond with their professions in this respect :

"The Customs duties on tea and coffee for the undermentioned years were as follows:—

	From '74 to 20th Feb., '77.	From 20th Feb., '77, to 15th March, '79.	From 15th March, '79, to 24th Feb., '82.	From 24th Feb., '82.
Coffee, green.....	2c. per lb.	2s. per lb.	2c. per lb.	Free.
" roasted or ground.....	3c. "	3c. "	3c. "	3s. per lb.
Tea, green.....	4c. "	6c. "	{ 3c. " & 10 p. c. ad val.	Free.
" black.....	3c. "	5c. "	{ 2c. per lb. & 10 p. c. ad val.

An additional duty, which is still in force of 10 per cent. ad valorem, was imposed on all tea and coffee from the United States."

Thereby encouraging especially to the shipping of our ports. I will now proceed, with the permission of the House, to show the aggregate reduction which has taken place—the reduction of the real taxes, because it was a reduction upon the necessities of life principally, or at least what had become the necessities of life, so far as tea and coffee are concerned. The amount of Customs duties collected on tea, under the old tariff, in excess of the duties which would have been collected had the previous Conservative tariff remained in operation, was $304,639. The amount of duties which would have been collected on tea and coffee under the tariff of 1879, since those articles were made free, has been reduced by an aggregate, for the years 1882, 1883 and 1884, of $1,869,996. The aggregate further loss to the revenue, by reductions in the tariff on promiscuous items, from 1880 to 1884 inclusive, would be $2,736,931. The abolition of bill stamps since the 4th of March, 1882, has decreased the revenue by about a yearly average of $100,000, or say, to date, $400,000; and the loss to revenue from the abolition of postage on newspapers since the 1st of June, 1882, say about four years, an annual average of $60,000, or a total of $240,000, making a grand total of $5,551,566 saved to the people of our country by the operation of the National Policy in respect to the above items alone. The result of all changes under this paternal policy, as conclusively shown by the Finance Minister, is an average decrease of taxation of at least 9½ cents per head of our population, from 1879 to 1884 inclusive, as compared with Grit rule from 1874 to 1879, notwithstanding the enormous expenditures during the former years by the present Government on the Canadian Pacific Railway, now on the eve of completion, and general railroad extensions. There have also been spent millions upon improvements of our rivers and canals, and various public buildings throughout the Dominion, all of which will, directly or indirectly, become revenue-producing, including a large extension of postal service throughout the entire Dominion. In dealing with the general results of the policy adopted by this Government and the manner in which it dealt with the necessities of life—lifting the burden of taxation from the poorer and equalising it in such a manner as to make the rich pay for their luxuries in proportion to their wealth and habits—the fact should not be lost sight of, that the Dominion is to-day paying interest on millions of dollars, the result of reckless extravagance during times of gloom and depression upon the part of the preceding administration. For all time to come the millions wasted in an absurd purchase of steel rails, in useless North-West telegraph failures, in Fort Francis lock construction, in the Welland canal enlargement—where the Government commenced at the wrong end, and left capital lying there for years. These must be paid by the people, in consequence of their having believed in and trusted Reform leaders and Reform professions. I think it will not be unprofitable to this House and to the country to have their attention drawn to the difference of results in regard to our general position, as affecting the credit of our country, with respect to deficits as compared with surpluses. Under the rule of the hon. ex-Minister of Finance, the deficits were as follows:—

1875-76.....	$1,900,785
1876-77.....	1,480,026
1877-78.....	1,128,147
1878-79.....	1,937,999
	<hr/>
1879-80, disputed.....	$6,426,957
	1,543,228
Total.....	$7,970,185

So that, leaving entirely out of account the amount as to which there is a dispute, the total deficits for that period amount to $6,426,957, although I have no doubt that the fact could be established that the larger amount is nearer the actual deficit. The surpluses under the present Government are as follows:—

1880-81.....	$4,132,743
From Dominion lands.....		$ 131,124
1881-82	6,313,357
Dominion lands		1,744,456
1882-83	7,064,491
Dominion lands		1,009,019
1883-84	754,255
Dominion lands		951,636
	$18,264,846	$3,836,235

Or, a grand total, including Dominion lands, of $22,101,081, as compared with the total deficits of hon. gentlemen opposite of $7,970,188; while at the same time the Government have relieved the people of this country, by an actual reduction of taxation, during the same term, amounting to $5,551,566. In addition, the credit of the country has so improved that the Finance Minister has been able to place a loan at an excess of price over that obtained by the member for South Huron. The difference in interest charge would, in fifty years, wipe out the loan altogether. Hon. gentlemen opposite claim before the country that the people of Canada would be very much improved were they to again grant them their support. Now, I desire to bring under the notice of the House and the country the qualifications that they possess, so far as we can judge from their past administration and sayings, for governing this country in the future. I will trouble the House with a short extract from the Budget Speech of the hon. ex-Finance Minister (Sir Richard Cartwright) in 1878. After referring to the financial position of the country, he said:

"Now, under the circumstances, it may not naturally be asked by some members of this House, whether it would not be advisable, in view of the fact that we have now had, for two years, considerable deficits, to adopt such precautions as would render the existence of another deficit impossible. Well, Sir, I would say at once that if we possessed in Canada any tax equivalent to the income tax now in use in England, probably I would not hesitate to advise the House to have recourse to that means of increasing the revenue."

Take this statement in connection with the utterance made in 1876 by the same hon. gentleman, that no legislation could directly benefit the interest of the country. With these two statements before them, I hardly think that the majority of the people of this country will be in a very great hurry to again repose their confidence in the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite. In reference to the general argument brought forward invariably in this House by hon. gentlemen opposite, in regard to the merits and demerits of the National Policy, we find these hon. gentlemen having their annual wrestling match, as it were, not only with the Government of the day, but with the great majority of the people of this country. I make this statement, Sir, and I think I am justified, because it has been shown that the great majority of the people of this country are enthusiastic supporters of the National Policy. Then, Sir, there is a natural result of the National Policy which I do not recollect ever having heard referred to, and that is its effect on the national spirit of our inhabitants, the cultivation of which is as necessary to the growth and prosperity of a country as its financial policy. Again, what position do hon. gentlemen opposite occupy on the question of the application of the true principles and intention of responsible government? We find them, year after year, arguing with the same determination against the avowed will of the people as when the National Policy was first adopted, ignoring, according to my humble judgment, the characteristics of responsible government, which is acknowledged to be a great boon, and is often boasted of as such by hon. gentlemen opposite. In fact, I think they claim a large share of the credit of having that great boon conferred on this country. As I understand the principles of responsible government, it is the duty of the Administration of the day to carry out the well-understood and defined wishes of the people. On minor subjects the opinion of the majority of the people is not always clear; but in reference to this National Policy there has been no uncertain sound on the part of the great majority of the people of this country. It was adopted in 1878 and re-affirmed and endorsed in 1882, and there is no evidence in the country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and no constitutional indication, that in any degree have the wishes and desires of the great majority of the people of this country changed. Thanking you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. gentlemen, for the kind indulgence you have extended to me, I would simply close by asserting, as my individual opinion, warranted by the present position of the National Policy, that it is the sheet anchor of the future prosperity of this Dominion. And, Sir, notwithstanding what hon. gentlemen opposite may continue to reiterate, as a matter of fact and a matter of judgment I am satisfied that it is now so embedded in the very soil of this country that no political party, coming boldly before the country and asserting that any material change will be made, so long as the Dominion remains in its existing circumstances in relation to other nations, will ever be supported by the majority of the people of this country. And it should be and is a source of congratulation, that the great project which is to complete Confederation, the Canadian Pacific Railway, is so near its completion; and as the National Policy is the sheet anchor of the development and progress and prosperity of this Dominion, so the completion of that grand work is the key stone, as it were, of the arch of Confederation.

Mr. SPROULE. In continuing this debate, I shall endeavor to confine myself as closely as possible to the subject, so as to make my remarks as short as is consistent with a fair presentation of the case to the House and the country. But before entering on the general discussion of the Budget, which was so ably presented to this House several days ago, I may be permitted to draw the attention of the House to some remarks that fell from the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). The Government had told the country, he said, that although they were building that great national highway, the Canadian Pacific Railway, not one dollar would be added to the expense of the people, and that the work would be accomplished without increasing the burdens of the country. He then went on to state that there had been $12,000,000 expended in that work, and he asked when he might expect to see a dollar of it returned to the people. I can only say that if there has been $12,000,000 expended by the Government in that work, they have a very creditable showing to make to the people, in the construction of from 12,000 to 15,000 miles of railway; and when a comparison is made between that expense and the expense of $13,000,000 made by the late Government, the comparison is strongly in favor of the present Administration. What was the condition of the road under the late Government? It was that, although $13,000,000 had been expended on it, only 113 miles had been built at one end into the wilderness and 117 miles at the other end, and between them there was left a link, that could not be used for a great many years, so that the money was virtually expended without any special benefit arising to the country from that vast expense for years, had not the present Government pushed it to completion the way they did. In referring to the Finance Minister's Budget Speech, the hon. gentleman was pleased to say that the Finance Minister had treated this House to a shower-bath of words, for the purpose of convincing the people that their taxes had not been raised and that they were in a better condition than formerly; and the hon. gentleman said that in his opinion the Finance Minister had failed to make good his assertion. All I can say in reply is, that the hon. gentleman himself has been treating this House to a diarrhoea of words and sentences, resulting in a lamentable failure to establish the arguments he advanced. The hon.

gentleman travelled over the whole continent of America, from end to end, for the purpose of picking up arguments to prove to the people of this country that they are worse off to-day than they were five years ago; but with all his industry he lamentably failed in the endeavor. Referring to the speech of the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Foster)—a speech which, to my mind, was a very eloquent effort, containing close reasoning and strong arguments—he said he had perused that long speech twice over and a part of it for the third time, and could find nothing in the whole speech to attract his attention, but the word metropoli. In that he reminded me of the story of the boy who was presented with a very fine book, but although that book contained some of the finest essays of Bacon, and some of the most admirable selections from the works of Socrates, and some of the finest efforts of the most eminent men of the day, a book which was one of the best contributions to the literature of the country, but who, on being asked what he thought of it, answered that he could not see anything in it but the picture of a kite on one of the fly leaves. The explanation of this was that the boy had been attending to his boyish amusement of flying his kite and could see nothing else. So the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) saw nothing in that speech but the word metropoli, because he was flying his kite all over the cities of this continent, to see if he could catch any arguments to be urged against the National Policy. He was dealing with millions, travelling from Bangor to Boston, from Boston to Illinois, and back, flying his kite from one great metropolis to the other, and therefore he could think of nothing else. With reference to the reduction in the price of cotton in England, the hon. gentleman said that during a period of twelve years in the history of England, where there was no National Policy, the price of cotton had not increased but had been reduced some 7 pence per yard; but he omitted to tell the House that the period was one beginning with the close of the American war, when cotton was perhaps at its highest point. I may tell the hon. gentleman that the price has been reduced in the United States, even more in proportion in the same interval; and that it has been reduced to a still greater extent during the short time that the National Policy has been in operation in this country. At the outset of his speech the hon. gentleman said that the country was not so prosperous as in 1882. Well, I admit that in some respects it is not; but can that falling off be attributed to the National Policy, or to the administration of this Government? I believe not; I believe it is mainly explained by the fact, as shown by the Ontario Bureau of Statistics, that there was a falling of $26,000,000 in the crop of Ontario, for the year 1883, as compared with 1882. That is the reason why we experienced a temporary lull and an apparent want of prosperity in the country. True, we have had, the past year, a better crop, but a great deal of that has had to be used to pay the indebtedness of the previous two years; and, therefore, it is reasonable to suppose we cannot enjoy the prosperity we otherwise would have had. What is the line of arguments advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite? Each one seems to take his own view of the question, and to present to the House and the country his view from his own standpoint; and, strange to say, their views are as diametrically opposed to each other as day is to night. One endeavors to prove one thing, the other to prove the reverse. They remind me of the defence adopted by a celebrated barrister in the case of a client who was charged with stealing a kettle. In the first place, said he, we did not steal the kettle; in the next place, if we did steal it, it was our own; and in the third place, there was no kettle to steal. So, in the first place, hon. gentlemen opposite say the country is no better off than it was in 1878, on account of the present policy of the present Government; second, if the country is better off, and we admit it is better off, it is due neither to the National Policy nor to the railway policy of the Government; and third, they say that the present Government has no policy at all; that it is only proceeding by haphazard to suit the exigencies of any special class who may happen to wait on the Ministry from time to time, in order to advance their own individual or collective interest. I think we may reasonably ask, Is the country better off to-day than it was five years ago? Some hon. gentlemen opposite have used a large share of their time in the endeavor to prove that the country is no better off. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said expressly that the country is worse off to-day; that there is a reduction in the value of the lands; that the people are undergoing greater hardships to-day than they were previous to 1878. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) in the early part of his speech, introduced and endeavored to support the same grounds; but he went on after a while to say: We admit the country is better off, that there is a showing that the people are better employed and are receiving perhaps larger wages, but what is it attributable to? It is not attributable to the policy of the Government at all, but to causes over which the Government or the policy could have no control. And he cited to the House the fact that it was due to the increased export of the agriculturists, that it was due to the increased amount of money taken out of the woods and forests of the country, that it was due to the increased amount of money taken out of the seas and lakes of our country in the fisheries, and he gave this as an evidence that, although, as he admitted, the country was better off, it was better off by virtue of the large production in these various lines, and not by virtue of any improvement brought about by the National Policy. We may ask for a few minutes: Is the country any better off to-day? If it is, we may expect to find the people individually better off. What does represent prosperity in a country? Is it not wealth? Is it not employment for the people? Is it not the earning of sufficient wages to supply themselves with the necessaries and comforts of life? If these things are not an evidence of prosperity, then I do not know what is. If we look at the condition of the country, and we are asked: Is it any better off to-day; is there any increased value in the land of the country? I need only take up the return made to the Bureau of Statistics in Ontario, and deal with that part of the country with which I am best acquainted; and I may say, in passing, that I was surprised to find that most of the hon. gentlemen from Ontario travelled all the way down to the Maritime Provinces for the purpose of using arguments to prove to the people of Ontario that the people in the Maritime Provinces were worse off, but they left untouched the very arguments that were patent and apparent to every member in his own constituency at home, and left members from the Maritime Provinces to deal with them. That was, to my mind, a very unfair way of dealing with the subject. In reference to these statistics, an hon. gentleman has endeavored to discredit them, and goes on to show that they are not reliable. I can give him the opinion of the farmers of this country, as expressed through their Grange, a short time ago, and it will enable him to understand what value they attach to those statistics, and what they were believed to have proved. At the Provincial Grange meeting, held in Toronto a short time ago, the president, in addressing the association, said this:

"He rapidly referred to the centennial anniversary of the settlement of Ontario, and consequently the centenary of the birth of agriculture in the same; to the recent abundant harvest, and the low price of produce; to the increase in the number of live stock kept on farms and the improvement in the class of animals; to the improvement in farms and buildings noticeable throughout the Province; to the increase in value of farm property of over $50,000,000 in a year; and to the efficiency of the Ontario Bureau of Industries, whose statements are so valuable."

They found that these statistics were valuable because they contained data and information that gave them an insight into the growing prosperity of the country, and yet hon. gentlemen in this House, although these statistics are carefully culled and collected by their own friends in Ontario, are inclined to discredit them and say they are not reliable. What do these statistics tell us as to the increased value of the property in the country? The hon. member for North Norfolk said he defied any man to show that the value of property, especially in Ontario, had increased during the last few years. I have these statistics before me, and I find in them, where there has been a careful investigation of the subject, that during the year 1883 there was an increase over 1882 in the value of farm property amounting to $22,450,525, in the Province of Ontario. I find that there was an increase in the value of buildings to the extent of $31,319,100. I find that there was an increase in the value of implements that farmers used to carry on their operations amounting to $6,492,715, and I find there was an increase in the value of the live stock of $18,341,645—or, in these lines, buildings, implements and live stock, a total increase in the Province of Ontario, for 1883 over 1882, of 78,603,985—and that, too, notwithstanding the fact that there was a falling off in the value of crops that year of over $26,000,000. What better evidence can hon. gentlemen in this House want to satisfy them that the country is prospering, and that the people are growing in wealth and becoming more comfortable? I can only say, in referring to the statement of the hon. member for North Norfolk, that in looking over these statistics very carefully, I find there are only two or three counties in the Province of Ontario that show any decrease in the value of lands or the prosperity of the people; and, strange to say, those very counties are the counties represented by hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House. There is the county of Norfolk, represented by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and by the hon. member who endeavored the other night to prove that the man who sent goods out of the country paid the duty, and the man who brought goods into the country paid the duty—that the farmers paid the duties both ways (Mr. Jackson). These are the men who represent that county, and I do not wonder that there is some decrease in the wealth or some shrinkage in the value of land in counties where they are subjected to the speeches of these hon. gentlemen from year to year and from month to month. I come nearer home, and deal with this question in reference to my own county. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who spoke to-night, travelled all over the continent of America to press into his service arguments suitable to the occasion, but he forgot the facts patent to his eyes in his own county, which give the strongest evidence of prosperity. In the constituency he represents I find there is an increase in every line. In the value of the lands there is an increase of $2,120,820 during the last year; there is an increase in the value of the stock amounting to $1,154,000, and in the value of the implements of $238,460, or a total increase in the wealth of his own county, during the last year, amounting to $4,146,890; and yet he says the country is worse off to-day. What I would like to ask the House and country is, what importance they can attach to the statements and arguments of hon. gentlemen in this House, when they endeavor to prove such allegations as they are endeavoring to prove here, when the people see these facts before them every day in the year. In my own county we had three men who went through the county to value it for the purpose of equalising the assessment five years ago, and while they did their duty admirably and were men of very good judgment, and devoted themselves assiduously to the task, the return was that the value of the county was a little over $12,000,000. A little more than a year ago three more men went through the county, and in the past five years the value of the same county, the value of the land in that county, the improvements the people had made in the land, and the wealth of the people as represented by their assessment, taken by men of equal ability and taken with the same care that the others had shown, before them, had about doubled. It was at the last valuation $25,000,000. And yet we are told that this country is going to the dogs, that the National Policy established by the present Government is tending to make the people poorer instead of richer. Now, I can only say that if the hon. gentlemen who are using these arguments, collected from Maritime Provinces, would only come to the farmers of their own counties and examine the improvements that are taking place there, they would endeavor to present the case in a fairer light to their constituents, or else they would show no disposition to do what is fair in this question. Now, in reference to the wealth of the country, as represented by the accumulation of money in the country, what do we find? I have before me a statement showing the increase in the amounts that have been from year to year deposited in the savings banks of our country during the last ten years, and in the chartered banks. I find that during the years 1876-77-78 the amounts deposited in the post office savings banks, in round figures, were about $2,000,000 each year; and in the chartered banks they averaged $58,000,000. But after the present Government came into power do we find them increasing or decreasing? If there was any correctness in the allegations of the hon. gentlemen who attempt to prove that the country is retrograding, we would expect to find a decrease; but, instead, there is an increase in every line, as appears from the following figures:—

Year	Post Office Banks.
1875.....	$2,926,000
1876.....	2,741,000
1877.....	2,640,000
1878.....	2,754,000
1879.....	3,105,000
1880.....	3,948,000
1881.....	6,208,000
1882.....	9,474,000
1883.....	11,976,000
1884.....	13,245,000

I claim that these figures show that there has been a constant accumulation of wealth among the poorer classes of the people since the present Government has had control of the affairs of this country. In the chartered banks the deposits increased from $58,946,000, in 1878, to $87,341,000, in 1884. Now I think this is the very plainest evidence we can have that the country is growing wealthier. If the land is increasing in value; if the buildings of the people are becoming more valuable; if they are becoming possessed of better facilities for carrying on their agricultural operations; and if, in addition to that, the people are accumulating capital, then I cannot understand how it is that the country is going backward. The hon. gentleman from Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies) said that this showing was no argument at all; that it did not prove that the wealth of the country was increasing; that it only showed, to his mind, that there were not avenues or openings in which the money could be invested and give a reasonable return, and consequently those who had capital locked it up in the savings banks. Now, I think that hon. gentleman either did not examine this subject carefully, or else he was most unfair in presenting this view of the question to the House. I have ascertained the amount of deposits in the savings banks for a number of years. Mr. Stewart, who has charge of the post office savings bank, has furnished the following figures, classifying the deposits. There were 141,000 depositors amongst the farmers of the country, and they deposited $1,724,000. And how much was the average that each man deposited? Only $337.28. There were 7,850 mechanics, who deposited $1,422,000. How much was the average that these mechanics put in? The average was $181.14 each. I take the trust accounts—young children—and I find there were 5,500 depositors, whose deposits amounted to $170,000, or an average of $30.50 to each depositor. These deposits were made by men who could not find avenues of trade in which to invest their money that would ensure a reasonable return, and therefore they were obliged to lock it up. I take the laborers of the country. There were 4,270 depositors, depositing $724,000, or an average of $169.49 per man. I find that, taking the total of these depositors, there were 66,682, and their deposits amounted to over $13,000,000. What clearer evidence can be asked than this to prove that this sum represents the savings of the industrial class of the country? It indicates, also, that these people are able to supply themselves with the necessaries and comforts of life, and over and above that, from the products of their labor, they are able to put these amounts in the savings banks. Although they appear to be small individually, in the aggregate they represent a large sum, and they show also that the industrial classes of the country are improving their condition, and that they have been growing in wealth from 1878 up to the present time. I take again the returns as represented by the number of miles of railway in the country. In 1878 we had 6,143 miles of railway in operation, and in 1884 we have very close on 10,000 miles, an increase of almost 4,000 miles of railway within the five years. Now, does that represent wealth or does it represent poverty? If our country, in order to carry on its increasing trade, is compelled to build these railways, and if we have been enabled, through the successful operation of the policy of the present Government, to build this 4,000 miles of railway, then it shows that the result of the policy of the present Administration, which they inaugurated five years ago, has been beneficial to the country, and I say it is the very strongest evidence that the country is growing wealthier all the time. I might ask hon. gentlemen what further evidence they need that the country is getting better off? I will take the loaning companies of the country, and what do they tell us? Now, the hon. gentleman from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who had, I may say, the audacity to stand up in the House and say that the value of the property in this country was decreasing, evidently could not have consulted either the speeches of the presidents of these companies or their financial statements. I have before me a return of the Canada Permanent Loan and Savings Company. It tells us that in the year 1884, in the Province of Ontario, there is a less amount of land held in default, a less amount held for sale, than has been held for many years. The president says: "The obligations of the mortgagees for interest accruing and due were generally met with punctuality." I have before me the returns of the British Canadian Loan and Savings Company. They tell us that out of all their loans the amount received from borrowers during the year, principal and interest, was $218,945. The amount overdue and in default was only $13,770 on the whole operations. The number of mortgages upon which compulsory proceedings had to be taken during the year were only six, and the amount represented by these mortgages was only $5,950. And yet hon. gentlemen will tell us that the people of the country are growing poorer. If they were growing poorer how could they pay their way, as they have done, and how could these companies make so splendid a showing, when out of a business representing $114,902,000 only $5,150 were in default on the year's operations? I can only say, in regard to my own experience in the county I represent, a few years ago, before the present Government came into power, we had private individuals lending money to loaning companies in large amounts. This was a profitable business and yielded large returns. What has been the change that has occurred during the last few years? The change has been such that they have been compelled to give up the business, because they could not loan any considerable amounts of money, and therefore the business was not a profitable one. Farmers are paying off their mortgages rapidly to-day, they are improving their buildings, increasing their stock and the value of their implements, and in every part of the country we have the very strongest evidences of prosperity. Can any hon. gentleman who has walked through Toronto or looked over Montreal or Hamilton, London, Oshawa, and other of our Canadian cities and towns, have failed to see that in every direction they are rapidly growing. In Toronto land, which was only fields a few years ago, has been taken into the city and is being covered with some of the finest structures to be found in the country. In Montreal wealth and extensive building operations are apparent in every direction. In London the same condition prevails, and in Hamilton the showing presented to-night by one of its members is the best guarantee that that city is prospering. I think I need say little in connection with this subject, beyond directing the attention of the House for a short time to the condition of the people. If the country is better off we naturally expect to find the people better off. How can they become rich? Only by being steadily employed and earning sufficient wages for their labor to enable them to supply themselves with the comforts of life and save something each year. Do we find, on looking over the newspapers, that any considerable number of the people are out of employment? Do we find there is any great demand on the charitable institutions in the large cities and towns, by persons unable to supply themselves with the necessaries of life? Do we find the laborers are not employed? I take up the statements of the same Bureau of Statistics I used a few minutes ago, and what does the report say? I find in it returns given by 590 laborers in the cities of Toronto, Hamilton, London and Oshawa, and they are said to be correct returns, because the parties themselves made them. We find that out of 590 employed in those cities only twenty-eight were earning less than what was necessary to support themselves and families. The average earnings of each man was $414.85 for the year. Out of that number the average amount over and above that required to procure the necessaries of life was $41.63 during the year. Is this evidence that the people are worse off? There is another tale to be told. Those people said they were not employed the whole year; that they lost fifty-one days in the year, and yet they were enabled to support themselves and their families and put away, as savings, $43.63 each year. Is that evidence that the laboring classes are worse off than formerly? Need we wonder, however, at this result, when we look at the statistics of the manufacturing industries of the country? Do we wonder, when we find such a large increase in the number employed and the capital invested, that in every line there has been a gradual increase in the wages of the people during the last year and the previous year. The year before last I went to Toronto to engage some mechanics and a plasterer. After trying a number of contractors I found I could not get one of them to send me a plasterer for less than $2.75 a day, I paying the railway journey both ways and boarding the man. If men can earn that sum in wages can they be in a state of poverty? It is impossible. Look for a moment over the wage-earning class of the community. If you take the farm laborers, their wages have been increased from 1878 to the present time. While they received in 1878 from $10 to $15 per month with board, they now obtain from $20 to $25. That is the very best evidence that they are doing better, and that the country is better off. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) went on to say that although there had been an increase in the manufactured products, that fact was no evidence that the people were better off. He said :

"Where are those millions of money that were to be invested in the country if the National Policy was passed. I want to know where the millions are. Will the member for Cardwell tell me? We have paid some hundreds of dollars—I do not know whether it will not run into thousands—for commissioners to go through the country to find evidences of prosperity. They have not found these men; they have not found these millions."

That hon. gentleman was most unfair, because if he had wished to be fair, he would not have overlooked the fact that the report of the commissioners who went through the country examining the condition of our manufacturing industries stated, in language as plain as language could be made, that there had been brought into this country a capital of $79,560,000, or, at all events, that that much additional capital had been invested in addition to what was invested in these industries in 1878. Yet the hon. member asks where are those millions, for he has been unable to find them. It has been said before, and I think it will apply with equal force now, that no one is so blind as a man who will not see. The hon. gentleman asked where are the thousand of men who were to be employed; where are the large quantity of products which was to be turned out if this policy was adopted? He overlooks the fact that products to the value of $59,966,000 was produced as the result of that policy in 1884 over 1878, and there were employed 51,528 men. I should like to ask this House and the country whether it is reasonable to suppose that employers could employ that large number of men and expend that large sum of money and turn out that large amount of product without, at the same time, producing an improvement in the condition of the people. It is most unreasonable, and it cannot be successfully established by any hon. gentleman, either here or elsewhere. Then he went on to speak about the woollen manufacture. He says that although we have three millions of woollen goods manufactured in 1884 over 1878, yet, because there is no evidence of any importation of the raw material, it is impossible that that was the result. The hon. gentleman did not look at the figures showing the large amount of wool we have in the country; showing that we have been for years accumulating wool in the country; showing that it had been raised in large quantities, and that the National Policy was accomplishing what was claimed by the Finance Minister when the tariff was introduced, namely: That it would give us at least the privilege of using up what we raised at home, and manufacturing it for the people, and thereby converting it into a source of wealth. Now, I may ask again, in reference to the railway policy of the Government, is it reasonable that we should build 4,000 miles of railway inside of five years, expending, as has been expended, $92,000,000, largely brought in from other countries, without it doing any good to the country? Is it reasonable to suppose that we could expend, not only on railways, but on canals and post offices and Custom houses throughout the country, large sums of money, and that the people should be no better off? Is it reasonable that we could employ the 51,828 people who are shown to have been employed in 1884 over 1878, in the factories of the Dominion, and yet to say that the country is no better off? Is it reasonable to suppose that we could employ the 20,000 who have been employed in building the Canadian Pacific Railway in the last few years, and yet that it is no good to the country? I think that logic which would satisfy any man that that is the case is the strangest I ever heard of. Hon. gentlemen from the western part of Ontario, in dealing with this question, have always steered clear of the evidence which was plainly before their eyes, and they have gone to the Maritime Provinces to hunt up arguments. Take for a moment the additional market that is given to our farmers and producers generally, by the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

I have before me a small cutting from a paper, showing the amount of stuff that was shipped from the port of Owen Sound, to supply some of these hands on the Canadian Pacific Railway during the last year. This is only one port, and in addition to Owen Sound we have Meaford, Collingwood, Southampton, Kincardine, Midland and Penetanguishene, and if you take these and collect the aggregate returns from these different ports, showing the total amount of the local produce of our country that finds a good market there—a better market than in the East—it will enable us to understand what the improvement has been in that part of the country, from the policy of the present Government. We shipped from Owen Sound last year no less than 8,460 head of cattle, and these were largely taken from the counties of Grey and Wellington—from the county represented by my hon. friend, which I have shown has increased so largely in wealth during the last few years, and from my own county. Still, hon. gentlemen say that the policy has done no good to our country, and has given us no increased market. We had in the port of Owen Sound during the last year—

Mr. COCKBURN. How much will you ship next year?

Mr. SPROULE. I do not know, but it will be a great deal more. We had in Owen Sound 1,064 steamers, representing a tonnage of 463,366 tons. And I say that every one of these steamers was kept busily employed carrying on the trade between that port and the upper lakes, supplying the men employed on the Canadian Pacific Railway, thereby giving us an increased market, and an increase in the wealth of the people of that country from that source. These steamers employed no less a number than 15,881 men. Is that no benefit to the country? That is evidence from only one port; and when you remember there are a number of ports on Lake Huron and Georgian Bay that are sending stuff in the same direction and in equally large proportions, it is an evidence that we are receiving a great benefit from the building of that railway. With reference to the second proposition of hon. gentlemen, that I spoke of at the outset, they state, in the first place, that the country is no better off since the introduction of the National Policy, and in the next place that, if the country is better off, as some of them admitted it was, it is not due to the National Policy or the railway policy. What is it due to? What is this large expenditure of $91,000,000 on the Canadian Pacific Railway by the company, in addition to what the Government spent, due to? Is it not due to the Government's policy of building the railway? Is it not due to the system of building the railway, and that is only a policy? Can hon. gentlemen safely say that the Government had no policy at all, and that no benefit is accruing from that policy? What is the large showing given to us of the increased number of factories in this country due to? Is it not due to the National Policy? We found these factories waning and dying out, and the number of hands employed previous to 1878 decreasing, but since that time they have been growing rapidly year by year. I would call their attention for a short time to the sugar refineries that have been started, to the cotton mills that have been built up in the country, and to the various manufacturing establishments which have grown up in every part of the country since the present Government came into power. And I would ask, do the people of the country appreciate the great benefits they receive? We have the strongest reasons for believing that they do, for although from 1878 to 1882 the Opposition were endeavoring to prove that they were being injured by the policy of the Government, that it was their duty to turn the Government out of power and put others in their places, strange to say they failed to convince the people of the country of that fact, and the result was that the Government came back as strong in 1882 as they were in 1878. We have reason to believe that there has been no material change in the opinion of the people of the country since; and the results of bye-elections which have taken place from 1882 to the present hour are, I think, strong proof of it. I can only tell hon. gentlemen that if they desire to remain for a long time in the cold shades of opposition, they have only to take the same line of argument that they have been adopting in this House during the last five years, and they will be successful in keeping themselves there. If they endeavor to stultify the intelligence of the people, by showing that the country was deluded, that the people of the country were deluded, I say it is an insult to the intelligence of the people of the country. I can tell hon. gentlemen that the people understand what is to their advantage just as well as hon. gentlemen do, and they view it from an unbiased standpoint, because they have no object but their own welfare. These gentlemen have in view the coveted seats of office which they are craving for, and it is a strong inducement, it compels them to lay before the country those garbled statements that are from day to day produced in this House, and those disingenuous arguments which they endeavored to use for the purposes of convincing the country that they are not fairly dealt with. Now, I think I need say very little more in reference to this question. I may only for a moment refer to a statement made by an hon. member—I think for one of the Ontarios—who I understand is a lumberman. He states that the people of this country did not sell any more of their coarse grains, on account of the National Policy; that the farmers did not want the National Policy for that purpose. He did not say the farmers; He said, "We (speaking as a lumberman) do not want it." We were aware of the fact in 1878, that the lumbermen did not want it, because they got their supplies of oats and pork and other articles from the western States, and they left the products of the farm at home to be sent to other markets, deducting from the products of those farmers the amount it cost to take them to foreign markets and sell them there. They say that we do not want to keep corn and corn meal out of the country, but I can only tell hon. gentlemen that the farmers want the National Policy as much to-day as they did in 1878, and they appreciate the good done to them by the Government as much to-day and as strongly as they did in 1878. It is said by the same hon. gentleman that this policy has done the farmers no good. Now, I can only say, in reply to that, that if there is any one class in the country more than another that it has benefited, it is the farmers. It has given them an increased market for their products, at least to the extent of the consumption of 71,000 people, employed in the factories and on the railways of the country; and it has reduced the cost of agricultural implements by the competition brought about by the additional number of people engaged in their manufacture. What is the story told to-day by men selling machinery? They say that it has been reduced, during the last four or five years, in value, from 20 to 25 per cent.; and the hon. gentleman to-night said that he knew manufacturers who had a million dollars in machinery that they would sell for 50 cents in the dollar. If this is so, the farmer must be able to buy cheaper. This policy has also reduced the cost of living to the farmer. Hon. gentlemen opposite have endeavored to prove that if the cost of living to the people has been reduced by the National Policy, it cannot have done the farmer any good; but it has reduced the cost to the farmer of those lines which he cannot supply himself. It has reduced the cost of the necessaries of life. It has made tea and coffee free of duty, so that they can be got at the lowest possible price. What are the prices of the necessaries of life to-day, compared with their prices in 1878? I am giving the figures that were collected by the hon. Postmaster-General last fall, because I have verified them by the prices given me by commercial men in my own part of the country, and I find them to be strictly correct:

This reduction in the price of blankets is due to the competition, and yet, though securing the home markets to these manufacturers, they have been enabled to reduce the price and still have as good a profit to-day as they had in 1878:

In cotton goods there is an equal reduction. In fact, in every line representing the necessaries of life there has been a large reduction in the price, compared with the price in 1878. Now, if these figures do not show that the National Policy has benefited the farmer and the laboring man, then I do not know what is a benefit. I think we may safely assume that the farmers have been benefited by the enlarged market they have obtained, by the reduction of the price of agricultural implements, by the increased amount of money expended during the last five years, by the increased value of their products and the decreased value of the necessaries of life that they have been compelled to buy, and by the rapid settlement of the North-West country and the consequently increasing demand for the products of the agriculturists, especially of the Province of Ontario. I think I have shown clearly that it has reduced the cost of living, and consequently it must have benefited the laboring man as well as the farmer. I think, too, the mercantile class of the country are better off than they were in 1878, because if you take the last five years, and compare them with the previous five years, you will find that the number of people in mercantile business who failed in this country was only 5,040, compared with 9,185, during the five years previous. Why are fewer people failing to-day? Because they are in better circumstances and are better able to pay their way. The amount of money represented by the failures in the last five years was $57,467,724, against $133,128,724 in the five years previous. Now, I claim that this improved condition of affairs is plainly attributable to the improved condition of the people and their greater ability to pay their way to-day than was the case five years ago—to their increased purchasing power, and to the improved condition of the country in every particular. Now, although this question has been debated at great length in this House, I think the time has not been badly spent, for we have two parties laying their views before the country—one party, in my opinion, endeavoring strangely to mislead the country, and the other endeavoring to place facts and figures plainly before the people, to enable them intelligently to judge of their condition to-day compared with what it was a few years ago. I say, while we have a class of people in this House who are endeavoring to mislead the country, and to prove that the people are worse off, that a great injustice has been done to them by the policy of the present Government, and that it would be to the interest of the country to make a change in the Government, I think it is our duty to defend the position we occupy and to endeavor to lay facts and figures fairly before the people, to show them that they are receiving great benefit by the legislation introduced by the present Government. I can only say that if the facts and figures before us to-day, and the observations we can make from time to time, are any evidence of what the people want and intend to continue, they prove to my mind conclusively that the people believe that they are much better off than they were in 1878, that the present Government are legislating in the interest of the people of the country, and that it is the desire and intention of the people to continue in power the same class of men who have accomplished these great results in the past. I can only say, in reference to the Opposition in this House that if they continue the same line of argument and attack which they have taken during the last five years, I predict that they will remain a long time in the cold shades of Opposition, and that their hair will have grown very grey before they will be called on to enjoy the pleasure of holding office in the Government of this country.

Mr. BECHARD. I do not lose sight of the fact that the House is getting tired of this protracted debate, and is desirous of seeing it brought to an end, but I assure hon. members that I do not intend to solicit their attention for any considerable length of time. I will endeavor to make my remarks in the English language, though I speak it with great difficulty, but I will do so out of a sense of courtesy to the vast majority of this House. Before the National Policy was instituted our ears rang with the flattering promises of its advocates and promoters, and since it has been inaugurated we have heard the same gentlemen at every Session speaking in boastful language of its success. According to them, all the prosperity that this country has been enjoying for the few years past has been due to the influence of that policy. My hon. friend, the member for Ottawa (Mr. Tassé), whom I do not see in its place, in the eloquent speech which he pronounced on Friday last, spoke in glowing terms of the National Policy; and as an evidence of how it is appreciated by the people, said that after being adopted in 1878, it has since been re-affirmed in 1882. It is true that the people, after having adopted the National Policy, re-affirmed it, but my hon. friend should not forget that the people sometimes change their minds respecting questions of public policy, and surely he has not remained blind to what has taken place in England, for instance, during the last twenty years, where both political parties, Liberals and Conservatives, have held power alternately and for comparatively short terms. Did we not see, last fall, in the neighboring Republic, the Republican party defeated, after having held power for a period of twenty-four years. That which has occurred in other countries has already occurred and will occur in Canada, and it is my sincere belief that the day is not very far distant when the Canadian people will modify their opinion respecting the National Policy. Some hon. gentlemen, in the course of this debate, with a view of showing the prosperous condition of the country, pointed to the increase in our exports of some classes of products, such as fish, lumber and farm produce. No doubt the exports of a nation can be considered as an element of prosperity; the more we export, the more we have produced; but the question here is, whether those exports are the results of the National Policy. If our fishermen had an abundant catch, if our lumbermen exported largely the products of our forests, if our farmers were blest with abundant crops, which they sold at fair prices in foreign markets, I would like to know what the National Policy had to do with this. Surely no man believes that we can regulate here, by legislation, the prices which we may receive in foreign markets for our exports; surely no man in the full possession of his senses will believe such a position to be a sound one. But, Sir, those hon. gentlemen who spoke in such laudable terms of the increase in our exports had not much to say about the increase in our imports. It is not to be forgotten, however, that not very long ago the excess of our imports over our exports was regarded by hon. gentlemen opposite as a public misfortune and evil. At least, it was so regarded when my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie) was at the head of affairs. Those hon. gentlemen pretended that the balance of trade was constantly against us; that as the difference had to be paid in gold, our gold was drawn off from the country, and that the system was ruinous, because it placed us in the condition of a man who consumed more than he produced; but the National Policy, they said, was going to cure that evil. Has it cured it? The official returns tell us that since the National Policy has been instituted, with the exception of one year, our imports have continued to exceed our exports; and mind you, that excess has been in an ascending proportion within the last two or three years. Being in this position, if the theory of the balance of trade, such as interpreted by hon. gentlemen opposite, be correct, this country instead of being prosperous ought to be on its way to ruin; but if, on the contrary, this country is prosperous, the consequence is that the theory of hon. gentlemen opposite is erroneous and unsound. Is not this one of those public questions about which men sometimes change their opinion? And if the hon. gentlemen opposite have modified their opinion on this question, why should we not, on this side, be entitled to believe that the people of Canada will also change their mind in respect to the National Policy? The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Tassé), during a portion of his speech, referred to the good results of the National Policy, with respect to the interests of our manufacturers, and as an evidence of those good results, he pointed to the fact that some classes of goods which he mentioned are cheaper to-day than they were before. On this last point I do not differ with my hon. friend. There are goods indeed which are very cheap to-day, and that cheapness is the result of the National Policy; but the question is, whether that cheapness is in accordance with the interest of the manufacturer. The National Policy was established, in so far as the manufacturer was concerned, to promote his interest by protecting him against foreign competition. I have no doubt that our manufacturers received a certain amount of protection from this tariff during the first few years that it was in operation, but we are now beginning to see the other side of the question. Capitalists have invested too much capital in some branches of industry, and the result has been an over-production. Hence the suspension of operations in a large number of our manufactories, and the fact that a certain number of men are to-day without work; and there is the danger that threatens too rapid a development of manufacturing industries stimulated by artificial means. My hon. friend has also alluded to the good results of the policy with regard to the interest of agriculture. Our agriculture, no doubt, has been very prosperous for the past few years, although it is not so prosperous to-day as it has been; but I deny that this prosperity is due to the influence of the National Policy. We had the National Policy in March, 1879, and it is remembered by all that during that whole year the depression continued with more intensity than ever. Never before had more banks failed, more bankruptcies occurred; never had farm produce been sold cheaper in any one year than it was during the year 1879, and the first part of 1880. But, in the second part of 1880, a revival of business having taken place in some other countries with which we have extensive commercial relations, that revival of business was also felt here. In the succeeding year we were blessed with abundant crops, whilst crops failed in some European states. The consequence was, that there was an increase in the demand for farm products in those foreign countries, and we had the good fortune to sell them the surplus of our abundance. Our farmers made a great deal of money; those of them who were indebted paid their debts, and a considerable number of them remained with money in hand to loan. This is one of the reasons for the diminution in the rate of interest which took place then, and which was alluded to by the hon. member for Ottawa. It was said by the promoters of the National Policy that it would secure the home market for our farmers. I hold that the home market was secured to our farmers before the National Policy was in existence. It is secured to our farmers by the large surpluses of farm produce which we are bound to export every year to foreign markets, in order to make it profitable to us. When our home market is overcrowded with our natural products, it ought to be obvious to everyone that it cannot be advantageous for the sale of similar products imported from foreign countries. But there is one protection that this Government could, perhaps, give to our farmers—the opening up of new markets by commercial treaties with foreign nations. Depend upon it, this is the best and the only efficient protection that could be given to the farmers of Canada. While I am on this subject I am just reminded that some gentleman in the course of this debate referred to the possibility of negotiating a commercial treaty with the United States. It has been always considered or admitted by all parties in Canada that the treaty of 1854 was beneficial to both countries, and we know that the Canadian Government could never succeed in negotiating a treaty with the United States so long as the Republican party was in power. But that party have just been driven from power and been replaced by a Democratic Administration. It is permitted to hope that, with a Democratic Administration at Washington, the Canadian Government, whether it be composed of Conservatives or Liberals, might be more successful in the negotiation of such a treaty; for it is well known that it is in the traditions of the Democratic party in the United States to extend, as much as possible, their commerce, and to restrain the restrictions upon their foreign trade as much as is compatible with the necessities of the revenue. We must not forget that the treaty of 1854 was negotiated on the part of the United States by a Democratic Administration—the Administration of General Pierce—and that the same treaty was denounced by the Republican party as soon as they assumed the reins of power. My hon. friend from Ottawa, who spoke on several subjects in his able speech, to some of which I have already alluded and to some of which I shall have to allude briefly, forgot to say anything of the results of the National Policy regarding emigration. We remember that, according to the promoters of the National Policy, one of its results would be not only to check the emigration of our countrymen to the United States, but even to bring back to our country those of them who had previously emigrated. I am sure that it would be interesting for every member of this House to see in this respect the statistics of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, and to compare the number of those who have returned with the number of those who have gone to the United States since the National Policy was inaugurated. Those who returned are farmers who, after having rented their farms, go to the United States for a few years to earn money. Those generally return to our country; but those who are not land owners as a general rule do not return, but stay on the other side of the line, and if some of them, from time to time, make their appearance in Canada, it is not for a long time. I represent a constituency which is essentially agricultural. It has no large city where is generally to be found a floating population that is disposed to emigrate. Yet I find, referring to the late census, that within the last decade the population of my constituency has diminished, and that reduction has taken place notwithstanding the permanent fact of reproduction; and in this respect, Mr. Speaker, I hold that we are as well endowed as any other people. But, notwithstanding our natural advantages, I find the population of my district has decreased by about 1,000 souls. This is a deplorable state of things, and I am sure that everybody in the country and in this House is sorry for it. It is possible that the flood of emigration has not been so large from other counties as it is from mine; but, Sir, it is well known that all over the Province people are constantly leaving and going to the United States. We were told that the National Policy would check that emigration, but to-day we are compelled to say that it has failed to fulfil the promises and expectations of those who inaugurated it. The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Tassé), in describing the state of the country under the Administration of my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie), has referred to the deficits which occurred for a few years and blamed him for not having resorted to what he termed a vigorous policy. But I think the hon. member would have been more fair towards my hon. friend from East York if he had stated that these deficits were not occasioned by an extravagant expenditure, but that they were caused by a diminution of the revenue. The public accounts show that the revenue which amounted in 1874-5 to $24,648,715, had fallen in 1876-7 to $22,059,274—a decrease of $2,589,441 which would have been more than sufficient to cover the deficit of each year. Now, Sir, it would have been very easy for my hon. friend from East York to resort to that vigorous policy referred to by the member for Ottawa, and which we know meant nothing else but an increase of taxation; but he thought it would be more humane on his part, in the difficult circumstances in which the country was placed, to allow a few deficits to accumulate, knowing well that they would disappear, and be followed by surpluses as soon as a revival of business took place, than to increase the burden of taxation which would weigh more heavily upon the shoulders of a suffering people. But this patriotic conduct of my hon. friend was not appreciated as it ought to have been. His opponents began a terrible campaign against him. They charged him with being responsible for the depression that then prevailed in the country. It was in vain that he and his friends answered that the depression was beyond the control of the Government, and that as a commercial crisis was prevailing in other countries with which we had extensive commercial relations, it was only natural that the same crisis should be felt here. But this reasoning was of no avail; it served the purpose of hon. gentlemen opposite to hold him responsible. If bankruptcies occurred, if trade was in a state of stagnation, if manufactures were closed, if farmers suffered a succession of bad crops, or had to sell at low prices, all these evils were attributed to the Administration of my hon. friend. Sir, unfortunately, the people were convinced by the hon. gentlemen opposite, and in the fall of 1878 my hon. friend left power. He came down from the exalted position to which he, a self-made man, not having had the advantage of a classical education, had attained solely by his great talents, his industry and his indomitable energy. He fell from the proud position which he occupied, but he fell like an honest man and a man of honor, preserving his principles and an unstained reputation. My hon. friend from Ottawa referred, Sir, to the fact that some distinguished members of the Liberal party had committed themselves in years past, either by speeches or by writing, to the policy of protection; and he seemed to find fault with the Liberal party in Quebec for not having adopted the same policy. I am quite sure, Sir, that the hon. gentlemen to whom he referred are well able to defend their position. However, I may tell the hon. gentleman that whenever a man, however distinguished he may be, expresses his own individual opinions on any public question, that opinion remains his alone, so long as the party has not adopted it—at least, so long as the leaders of the party have not adopted the doctrine as that of the party. But the hon. gentleman says that the Liberals of Quebec have repudiated their principles and their leaders. Sir, I am at a loss to know when such repudiation took place. It is well known that their leaders, during a great many years, were the hon. Mr. Dorion, who is now Chief Justice of the Province of Quebec, and the lamented and deeply regretted Mr. Holton; and, Sir, I do not know when those two great leaders ever were repudiated by their friends, who never had any reason to be ashamed of them. Political parties sometimes find it opportune to modify their opinions regarding some public questions, in order to render them more adapted to actual circumstances; and suppose the Liberals had in some regards adopted such a course, they would not occupy a worse position than the Conservatives occupy to-day, who, after having upheld during forty years the principle of a revenue tariff, repudiated it and adopted the principle of protection. When the hon. gentleman feels the want of speaking of repudiation of principles he need not lose his time in searching out of the ranks of his own party, the subject matter, proper to satisfy his wishes. The hon. member showed some curiosity in the course of his remarks. He said he would like to know what is the programme of the Liberals. I do not feel authorised to tell the hon. gentleman what is or ought to be any special programme of the Liberal party. But I will tell him this: When in Opposition the Liberals find it to be their programme to watch the conduct of the Conservatives, to criticise their actions when they deserve to be criticised, and to warn the people of their faults; and when in power the Liberals find it to be their programme to administer public affairs with honesty and in accordance with the best interests of the country. I dare say my hon. friend, if he was in his seat, would find this a fair and patriotic programme. The hon. gentleman alluded, in one of the most eloquent parts of his speech, to a disturbed period of the history of France, and quoted a few sentences from a great speech pronounced on the occasion referred to, by the powerful and overwhelming Mirabeau, who made the best of his oratorical genius, to carry a certain measure proposing a heavy taxation. The hon. gentleman thought there was a great similarity between the position of those who opposed that measure and that of the Liberals in this House, as well as in the position of those who favoured the measure, and that of the Conservatives of to-day; but we did not want that comparison made by the hon. member, to know that the party of increased taxation in the country is represented in this House by hon. gentlemen opposite. I was sorry that the hon. member attempted to slur the Liberals of Quebec. In speaking of the duty on petroleum, he found it pleasant to say that the Liberals of Quebec, he did not know why, had a love of petroleum, although he would not say that they had any affinity with the Liberals of France, who had exhibited such a love for petroleum, that they had been called pétroleux. He would not say that they had any affinity with the Liberals of France, but he insinuated as much. Sir, there is a charge here, and although it is disguised under the veil of insinuation, that circumstance only gives it a character more bitter and perfidious. I know the class of men whom the hon. gentleman called the Liberals of France, and I understand how he meant to characterise them in saying they were called pétroleux. But the insinuation that there can be any analogy between the Liberals of the Province of Quebec and those contemptible demagogues, the dregs of the French population, who, at the termination of the Franco-Prussian war, attempted to burn the city of Paris, and succeeded in burning down some of its finest monuments, I say the insinuation that there can be any possible community of opinion and feeling between those lawless men and the honest, respectable citizens, the law-abiding men who compose the Liberal party of Quebec, is an outrageous slander whichever may be the mouth that utters it, and whenever such a charge is made within my hearing, I feel in duty bound to repel it with scorn and indignation. But it is not the first time that charges of this character have been made against the Liberals of Quebec. For a long series of years they have been repeated over and over again by the Conservative press and by a portion of the Conservative party of the Province; I do not say by all the Conservatives, because I know there are numerous and notable exceptions. Those charges have been made continuously against the Liberal party, not only by insinuation but in plain and emphatic language. We have been represented before the people as a body of men in sympathy with the Radicals and revolutionnaires of France, as having community of feeling with them, as being imbued with their principles and, like them, hostile to the clergy and the church. And although the highest authorities of the church years ago pronounced upon this matter, and declared that there was no reason why the Liberals of Quebec should not be considered as being orthodox as the Conservatives, yet we find to-day a portion of the Conservative press and a portion of the Conservative party continuing this same system of misrepresentations against the Liberals, and affecting to be standing in defence of the church against the supposed perversity of Liberal principles. It is fashionable to-day, for a certain press, as it has been formerly, to couple the Liberals of Quebec with the revolutionists of France; it is fashionable to-day, in speaking of the Liberals of Quebec, to associate them in feelings and opinions with the Republicans of France. This is done to-day by a certain portion of the press in Quebec and by a portion of the Conservative party. It is fashionable for that press and a portion of the Conservative party to deprecate, on all occasions, the Republicans of France, and even the French Government. I hold that whatever may be the form of Government that France chooses to adopt, it is none of our business in Quebec; and it is idle for us to comment in public newspapers on that Government, which has nothing to do with the interests of our population. But there is good reason to believe that while a portion of the Conservative press and the Conservative party denounce the Republican Government of France on all occasions, there are others in that party who do not seem to be so horrified as are some of their political associates. We know, Sir, that some of them who stand amongst the most distinguished in that party are proud to carry on their breasts decorations which they received at the hands of that Government, as we know also that some of them did not hesitate to be counted amongst the guests at a banquet which was given at the city of Montreal, in the summer of 1883, in honor of a distinguished Frenchman, a member of the Chamber of Deputies of France, M. Vermond, who was reported at the time by a certain press to be one of the disciples and followers of M. Gambetta. Would you conclude from this last remark that the conduct of these Conservatives I have referred to is liable to blame, for having been present at that banquet, or for having received decorations from the Republican Government of France? On the contrary, in my humble opinion in acting as they have done on those occasions they have shown themselves as being men of good sense and who, whatever might be their political associations, would not let their actions be controlled by the stupid fancies and fanatical notions of a part of their political friends. But let me tell the hon. member for Ottawa that "those who live in glass houses should not throw stones at others."

Bill (No. 110) to incorporate the Rock Lake, Souris and Brandon Railway Company.—(Mr. McDougald.)

CONSOLIDATED RAILWAY ACT, 1879.

Mr. MULOCK moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 111) to amend the Consolidated Railway Act, 1879. He said: The general object of the Bill is to provide certain safeguards in the matter of railway rates, safeguards which I think will be found to be reasonable and necessary in the public interest, and at the same time will not operate unjustly against any railway corporation. There are several minor features in the Bill which I will not trouble the House with referring to now, but will take the principal ones. The first provision is one dealing with the question of obtaining the sanction of the Governor in Council to a proposed schedule of rates. As the House is aware, the general Railway Act provides that railway companies shall not collect tolls until their schedule of rates has been approved of by the Governor in Council. Well, I am informed it has now become so much a matter of course to approve of whatever schedule of rates is sent down by a railway company, the views of the company alone being represented to the Ministers, that practically the rates are fixed by the railway company without due consideration of the public interest. It is therefore proposed in this Bill that in future, before any rates are sanctioned by the Governor in Council, due public notice shall be given of the application of the railway company for approval of its rates, and that the public shall be enabled to procure copies of the proposed rates, and, if they feel it in their interest to make recommendations in regard to them, they shall be at liberty to present their case to the Governor in Council. Another section provides for certain penalties to be imposed on railway companies in case they should make rates not sanctioned by law. With regard to this section, I may say that some railways which have been carrying on business for many years have never submitted their tariff; one, at least, of which I have official information, has never submitted its tariff of rates to the Governor in Council for approval, yet it has been carrying on business and collecting whatever rates it chooses to impose, and the public have to submit to these or do without the advantage of the railway altogether. Another provision is to the effect that a railway company shall not charge more for hauling for a short distance than for a long distance where the long distance embraces the shorter distance. By way of illustrating these two sections and showing that some necessity exists for legislating in this direction, I may refer to a case of which I have received notice. Take the case of the Northern Railway system, a system composed of the Northern Railway, the main line from Toronto to Collingwood, connecting the two great waters, Lake Ontario on the south and the Georgian Bay on the north. That railway has effected a certain arrangement with the Hamilton and North-Western Railway, and has also acquired certain leased lines. Now, the Hamilton and North-Western Railway has never yet submitted its tariff to the Governor in Council for approval. Nevertheless, it has collected rates that are, I am reliably informed, unjust, unfair, oppressive. It does that because the public cannot resist. The public must either not use the railway, or must submit to this imposition. In illustration of the fact that there is a grievance, I may mention some cases. Take the town of Cookstown, on the line of the Hamilton and North-Western, a railway which is collecting rates not sanctioned by law. That point is distant from the city of Toronto, by the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway, 62 miles, but by going northerly to Allandale to strike the main line of the Northern, it is distant 79 miles. The Northern Railway system, including the Hamilton and North-Western, charges 11 cents per 100 pounds for grain by the carload from Cookstown to Toronto. It charges for drawing the grain to Allandale till it strikes the Northern Railway, and then for drawing it down the Northern Railway to Toronto. I cannot conceive that it is any advantage to the shipper to have his grain hauled round-about, and be charged extra for it. Take the town of Collingwood, the northern terminus, a most important point, that with proper railway management could be built up to be a large town on our lakes, one of the termini to receive the trade from the North-West. The local grain from that point is hauled over this Northern Railway a distance of 98 miles, if you are fortunate enough to be able to get a rate for it, at less than 6 cents per 100 lbs., and yet, if one is unfortunate enough to live 50 miles nearer to Toronto than Collingwood, instead of getting a rate at all events equal to his neighbor at a point further away, one has to pay—as for instance from Bradford, which is 42 miles from Toronto—8 cents per 100 lbs. The Bill proposes that, in such a case as that, no more shall be charged for hauling the short distance than the long distance under the same conditions. The necessity for that must be clear. At present, the railway companies are enabled by this system to destroy property, to destroy towns, to build up other towns. That is a power that I think the Legislature should not allow to be exercised by any corporations. Another clause in the Bill provides for a mode of enquiring into charges of unjust discrimination. We frequently hear it stated that railway companies discriminate, contrary to the provisions of the law, and yet there is no mode of enquiry. Persons feel they are aggrieved. They think their more fortunate neighbors are getting better rates. Perhaps they are; perhaps they are not. If it were necessary for me to prove that there is a grievance in this respect and that legislation in this direction is necessary, I should be able to prove it, I am well informed by shippers, by referring to the practice in force at the present time over the very railway system from which I have been taking other illustrations. Another clause in the Bill is to the effect that money owing to employes, clerks, servants and others in the service of a railway, also money owing for supplies and stores and consumable articles necessary for the running of a railway, shall together form a first charge upon the earnings of the railway. At present the mortgage bondholders have the first charge and lien on all the assets, real and personal, of the railway. Under our law a mortgage bondholder cannot foreclose a railway. He cannot sell it as an ordinary mortgagee would sell a piece of property mortgaged to him. It is only useful to him as a going concern. It is necessary that it should be kept going in order that it may be of any value to him, and therefore it appears to me that the labor and the materials that are absolutely necessary to keep the concern going in order that it should earn anything at all should be a first charge upon the earnings of the concern. There are some other minor provisions in the Bill. I think these are the principal ones.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Of course, I will not discuss the Bill now, but I wish to know from the hon. gentleman if the last clause he speaks of is to have a retroactive effect; whether this clause would apply to the railways that have now a bonded debt.

Mr. MULOCK. The clause is not limited in its effect.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. GIGAULT moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 112) further to amend the Canada Temperance Act, 1878. He said: My object in moving this Bill, is to amend the Scott Act, so that electors may vote for or against prohibition or for partial prohibition. Partial prohibition shall mean the prohibition of all alcoholic liquors other than cider, beer and wine. For the sale of wine, it shall be necessary to obtain a license and to pay the duty imposed by the Provincial Legislatures. The number of licenses shall be limited according to population. There will be one hotel license for every 500 souls. The council shall have the right to reduce the number of licenses to a less number. The form of the ballot paper shall be changed so that the first space shall be marked for the petition, the second against the petition, and the third for partial prohibition. What is considered now as the third part of the Scott Act shall become the fourth part, and whenever partial prohibition shall be adopted, the Governor General in Council shall publish an order declaring that the third part of the Scott Act shall be in force in the electoral district where the election has been held. The Scott Act was enacted in order to consult the public with respect to the traffic in intoxicating liquors. Some electors believe that total prohibition promotes the cause of temperance, others are in favor of the license system, while many electors believe that it is unwise and unjust to prohibit the sale of beer and wine. By means of the amendment which I propose, every elector will have an opportunity of supporting by his vote a measure in accordance with his views.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SCHOOL OF NAVIGATION AT QUEBEC.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to ask Parliament to vote a sum of $1,000 for the maintenance of a school of navigation at Quebec, and, if not, what sum do they purpose asking for in that behalf?

Mr. McLELAN. It is not the intention of the Government to ask Parliament to vote a sum for a school of navigation, there being other arrangements at present by which all requiring instruction receive it from the examiner appointed there.

ESQUIMALT GRAVING DOCK.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to increase the length of the Esquimalt Graving Dock; if so, to what extent, and will it necessitate a cessation of work by present contractors?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Arrangements have been made to lengthen the dock a distance of fifty feet, and doing so will not necessitate any cessation of the work. The dock will be lengthened from 380 to 430 feet. I may take this opportunity of saying that in view of the future extension of the dock it was at first intended to have an entrance at the end, and that would take about 50 feet. We thought, however, that as such extension might not be necessary for 50 or 60 years it would be better at once to add that distance to the dock itself and leave the question of new docks for a future generation.

ESQUIMALT GRAVING DOCK—CONSTRUCTION.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to substitute granite for sandstone, in the Esquimalt Graving Dock; and if so, by how much will the cost be increased?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No change has been made in substituting granite for sandstone.

TELEGRAPH AND SIGNAL SERVICE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria) asked, What was the total revenue from all sources of telegraph and signal service in British Columbia, for the year ending 31st December, 1884, as also total expenditure on said service for same period?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There will be due from the 1st of January to the 30th June, 1884, $40,372.12; and from 1st July, to 31st December, 1884, $18,707.05, making a total revenue of $33,139.17. The expenditure from 1st January to 30th June, 1884, was $21,093.64; and from 1st July to 31st December, $18,469.84, making a total expenditure of $39,543.48, or an excess of $5,500 of expenditure over revenue.

GOVERNMENT LOANS IN CANADA.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, Whether the Government have borrowed any further sums of money from any banks or persons, in Canada or elsewhere, in addition to sums borrowed prior to 1st of March?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The Government have. That answers the hon. gentleman's question, and perhaps he has no objection to have a little more information. The Government have, since the last return, borrowed $250,000 from the City and District Savings Bank, making the total amount of debt from those sources of $12,462,855 at the time.

LOUIS RIEL.

Mr. CASEY asked, Has Louis Riel been in the employ of the Government in any capacity at any time during the past year, or is he now in their employ? If so, in what capacity has he been or is he employed, and what amount has been or is to be paid to him?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Louis Riel has not been in the employ of the Government in any capacity at any rate during the past year, nor is he now in the employ of the Government.

H. R. PRINGLE.

Mr. CASEY asked, Has H. R. Pringle, of Cobourg, been at any time since the general election of 1882, or is he now in the employ of the Government in any capacity? If so, what capacity, for what period and what pay or allowance has he received or is he to receive?

Mr. POPE. Mr. Pringle has been employed by the Government as agent for collecting exhibits for the Antwerp Exhibition, for a very short time past, and for a very limited time. When he is at work his pay is $5 a day, with $3 for expenses.

Mr. CASEY. For how long?

Mr. POPE. I cannot say, but for a very short time, and not continually.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Does he collect electoral exhibits?

Mr. POPE. Of course, I am bound to answer the hon. gentleman's question. If he does, they will be consulted.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—CONSTRUCTION TO INDIAN TOWN.

Mr. WELDON asked, What amount has been paid on account of construction of the Intercolonial Railway to Indian Town? What was the cost of survey, and does such cost include costs of surveys prior to 1884?

Mr. POPE. The hon. gentleman will have to make a motion for the papers.

IMPORTATION OF BEET-ROOT SUGAR.

Mr. VAIL asked, Has an Order in Council been passed recently permitting the importation of beet-root sugar from Europe on payment of duty on cost less the drawback, and how much is the drawback per hundred pounds?

Mr. BOWELL. Such an order as that referred to has been passed so far as it affects raw sugar. The hon. gentleman has not asked from what country the drawback is paid, and, of course, it is impossible for me to tell him.

Mr. VAIL. From Europe?

Mr. BOWELL. Europe is a very large area, and the question is too indefinite; if the hon. gentleman means Germany, the drawback is a fraction over 2 cents per pound.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—TANGENTS AND CURVES.

Mr. BLAKE asked, What is the number and what the aggregate length,—(1) Of the tangents of the Canadian Pacific Railway? (2) Of the curves with the average curvature?

Mr. POPE. The number of tangents is 4,739, with an aggregate length of 1,620 miles. The number of curves is 4,945, with an aggregate length of 900 miles. The hon. gentleman will see that they do not agree with each other, and the difference is owing to the fact that there are two separate compound curves.

Mr. BLAKE. What is the average curvature?

Mr. POPE. Four degrees. I may say to the hon. gentleman that I will bring him down the rest of the information to-morrow.

Mr. BLAKE. Let the question stand.

THE DUTY ON FLOUR.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, Is it the intention of the Government to increase the duty on flour this Session?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It has been the custom of the Government not to make known their policy with reference to changes in the tariff until they submit them by resolution to Parliament, and they see no reason to change their course on this occasion.

Mr. CASEY.

MR. J. W. TRUTCH.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Is Mr. J. W. Trutch the Government's confidential agent in British Columbia? If so, how long has he acted in that capacity and what is his yearly allowance as such? Is he employed as inspector of the Canadian Pacific Railway on behalf of the Government? If so, how long and what is his yearly salary for such service? Does he receive a yearly amount from having once formed part of the Government of British Columbia? If so, what amount? What amount does he receive from Government for travelling expenses for himself and also for the parties who accompany him in his travels?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am afraid I must ask the hon. gentleman to give notice of this matter. It is such a long question that I think it would require a long return.

Mr. LANDERKIN. This is the second notice I have given of it.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This is a question. I think the hon. gentleman will have to give a notice of motion.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—EARNINGS AND WORKING EXPENSES.

Mr. BLAKE asked, What were the earnings and working expenses of the Intercolonial Railway for February last?

Mr. POPE. The earnings of the road were $147,294; the working expenses $159,000. The accounts were not fully and finally adjusted at the time these figures were prepared; but I have given the amount as nearly as I could obtain them.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—POSTAL DELAYS.

Mr. WELDON. I desire to call the attention of the Acting Minister of Railways to the great delay that has occurred on the Intercolonial Railway. We had no mail for some days until last evening, when we received four mails. The mail due to-day has not however arrived.

Mr. POPE. I am informed that a mail came in this morning.

Mr. WELDON. That mail brought the mails for Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Monday; but to-day's mail is not on hand.

Mr. POPE. We have had very severe storms indeed on the road. Every possible exertion has been made to have the mails carried through promptly, and no time has been lost.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—LAND GRANT.

Mr. BLAKE. I desire to renew the following question: How many acres of their land grant have been finally accepted and taken over by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company within the Canadian Pacific Railway belt,—1. Between the first and second principal meridians; 2. Between the second and third; 3. Between the third and fourth; 4. Between the fourth and fifth; and also 5. In southern Manitoba outside the railway belt; and 6. Elsewhere outside the railway belt?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I asked that a return be prepared. I have been told that I will receive it to-day; and if so I will lay it on the Table.

THE DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the Government Notices of Motion are called, I wish to ask the Government to give the House some further information with respect to the state of affairs at Prince Albert and the North-West generally, and with respect to the action of the Government. I feel that full information is due to the House with respect to the causes of this affair, and as to what the Government have done.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The situation stands very nearly as it did before. There is no information as yet, and there cannot be very well until to-morrow, of a junction between the body commanded by Commissioner Colonel Irvine, and the body at Carlton under Superintendent Crozier. When those bodies are united they will have a force of 250 men. There are 100 men of the 90th Regiment now at Qu'Appelle ready, if necessary, to proceed from there in the direction of the South Saskatchewan. They will be followed by the remainder of the regiment, 200 men, and half a battery of artillery. Lieutenant-Governor Dewdney telegraphs me to-day that he has seen the principal men of the Indians on the reserve near Broad View. Some reports have been circulated about those Indians being excited. They were exceedingly indignant at such charges being brought against them, and demanded that they be brought face to face with their accusers. We have received messages both from Battleford and Edmonton, and everything is quiet there. I had a telegram from the Rev. Father Lacombe to-day, and he vouches for the loyalty of all the Blackfoot Indians at Carlton and the west. We are quite unaware of the approximate cause of the half-breed rising under Riel. Riel came into the country, invited by them, some time ago. I believe he came in for the purpose of attempting to extract money from the public purse, and during this last summer occasionally there were hints—and more than hints, intimations—that if we gave him a sum of money—and a particular sum of five thousand dollars was mentioned—he would depart in peace. Of course that could not be entertained for a moment, and he has remained there, inciting the half-breeds, and attempting to arouse the Indians by stating to them that the country all belonged to them, and that the whites had no rights whatever. As I stated when I last was asked the question about the state of affairs there, it has been alleged that Riel is exceedingly indignant at being told that he was an outlaw—that he was not a British subject—and had no rights there; but such an intimation, so far as I can discover, was never made to him in any way by anybody. He has a great influence over the half-breeds and some over the Indians. From former occurrences in the North-West he is considered a sort of martyr in the cause—a sort of half-breed Mahdi—and they look up to him with a sort of superstitious regard, and from that feeling he is able to act upon these poor people. I do not believe there is the slightest danger from the half-breeds unless they should be joined by the Indians. If the Indians were brought once into the field no one could foresee what the consequence might be, but I am exceedingly glad to state to the House that our information goes to show that the Indians are quite quiet, and there is no danger their joining with the half-breeds. There are one or two Indians, whom we know pretty well by name, who are troublesome men; I had better not mention names, because all these things go over the wires—but there is one who has always been troublesome for years. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) would know his name if I mentioned it. I asked about him and the answer was, "It is all bluster and tobacco." The most influential Indian in the North-West is Chief Crowfoot, head of the Blackfoot tribe, a remarkable and very able man, and for his fidelity and loyalty I believe there is every guarantee. I am quite sure that to a great extent if he were permitted—which of course we could not permit—he would show by action on his own part how loyal he is.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman has spoken with reference to the proximate causes; will he say what are the remote causes of this rising?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The causes of the rising are what I have expressed. The half-breeds have had a great many claims, some of them, as I have stated, reasonable enough, but some of them are not reasonable. The House knows that at the time the arrangement was made for the settlement of land titles in Manitoba, on the creation of that Province, a large number of Indians settled on the Assiniboine and Red River who had got places, localities, little properties, in possession under the direct sanction, though perhaps not by any other title, of the Hudson Bay Company. Those claims were recognised and a certain quantity of land was appropriated for their satisfaction. Land scrip was issued to those Indians to the value of their holdings. The half-breeds scattered over the plains had no such rights from the Hudson Bay Company or any one, but as they heard that the half-breeds had received certain moneys, or money's worth, within the Red River settlement, they claimed that they all had the same rights. Among those half-breeds that are at Prince Albert and along both banks of the Saskatchewan, there are a number who received their land scrip for their land on the Red River, who have left Manitoba and are on the plains beyond the bounds of Manitoba. They made their claims and they pressed them, thinking they would not be recognised again. They pressed their claims again; they said they were half-breeds, and they tried to enforce a double claim on their behalf. A great many of these have been identified and have been refused. As a whole the half-breeds have been told that if they desire to be considered as Indians there are most liberal reserves that they could go with the others; but that if they desired to be considered white men they would get 160 acres of land as homesteads. But they are not satisfied with that; they want to get land scrip of equal quantity—I think upwards of 200 acres—and then get as a matter of course their homesteads as well. Then there was some difficulty about the plots on which these half-breeds had settled along the Saskatchewan. No man has been disturbed in his settlement, and he has been told that he would not be disturbed. Sometimes the half-breeds quarrel amongst themselves, because in the bends of the rivers one man's claim overlaps another. These claims have been very difficult to settle. There have been several reports from different officials for several years, and a great many of these have been settled, but some remain unsettled. Finally there is a commission which we hope will proceed in the spring, or as soon as possible, to settle the few claims that remain unadjusted.

Mr. BLAKE. When was the commission appointed?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The commissioners were selected some time ago, but one of the commissioners was unable to go and resigned, and we have appointed another only the other day.

Mr. BLAKE. Will the hon. gentleman state what proportion of the volunteer forces, and how many of the mounted police are there, or on their way to the scene of action? I could not well make out from what the hon. gentleman stated.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There are 100 men at Carlton.

Mr. BLAKE. Mounted police?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes. From the last information we have received there are also 40 volunteers from Prince Albert. There are also upwards of 90 of Irvine's men, who are supposed to have effected a junction yesterday morning with Crozier at Carlton. They have two or three guns with them. There are besides at Qu'Appelle 50 mounted police under Superintendent Herchmer, who will go by the Touchwood Hills on the route which is towards the north, keeping communications open if any attempt is made to obstruct them. There were this morning or last night 100 men of the 90th, and they will be joined by 200 men and a half battery of artillery.

Mr. BLAKE. I just wish to say that I think this subject calls for further explanation and fuller information, more particularly as it has been going on for some time past, than the hon. gentleman has given us, and I think Parliament ought to be informed of the intentions of the Government with reference to calling out the volunteers. I shall take an opportunity in the course of the day of communicating my views to the House on that subject in a more formal manner.

TRANSLATION OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. MASSUE. (Translation.) Before the Order of the Day is called, I desire to call the attention of the Government and of the Debates Committee to the fact that the French translation of the Debates is not distributed with all possible promptness. Nevertheless, if I am well informed, there are over 200 pages of copy which have been delivered to the printers but which have not yet been published.

Mr. BÉCHARD. (Translation.) As a member of the Committee on the Debates, I may tell the hon. member that if the distribution of the French copy is not made to his satisfaction, the delay must not be ascribed to the French Translators, for I have been informed within a few days that the translation keeps about on a par with the publication of the Debates of the House, and from the information I have received, it appears that the translation remains for a long time in the hands of the printer, which is the cause of the delay complained of by the hon. member.

Mr. MASSUE. (Translation.) The hon. member is only corroborating my statement, but I should like to have further particulars on the subject.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). What the hon. gentleman has said is quite true, that the cause of the delay in the French copy of the Hansard is in no way due to the translators. I believe Parliament has no officers more efficient, or more active and zealous in the performance of their work, than the staff of French translators as at present constituted, and especially the chief of that body, who seems to devote himself zealously to the work he has in hand. As evidence of that, I may say that the report of last Monday's debate is already translated. But unfortunately the printers have been terribly behind this Session. There are 240 pages of matter in connection with the Hansard at present in the hands of the printers untouched; and besides the Hansard, I believe I am right in saying that a Bill, which was in the hands of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron), was translated and sent to the printers on the 6th of February, and was not touched by them for nearly a month afterwards, the opportunity of proceeding with the Bill was thus delayed. Under the contract, the printers are liable to a penalty for delays of this kind, and I suppose that when the Committee meet they will take up the matter in the light of that contract, and perhaps make a recommendation to the House to enforce the penalty.

THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY PROPOSALS.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the Orders are called, I would invite the attention of the Government to the condition of things with reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's proposals. I had a question on the paper, which was answered last Monday by the hon. leader of the Government to the effect that on the Thursday preceding the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had made certain proposals to the Government, and that they had been on Saturday considered and not accepted by the Government. I had asked in my enquiry whether the papers could be laid on the Table. The hon. gentleman said they would, but that there might be another application. Now, I do not know whether there will be another application or not; we do know that this matter has been in the air since before the beginning of the Session, that the company has made application to the Government, Parliament being in full Session, for assistance, and that the Government has not acceded. My idea is that Parliament ought to have that proposal, with the answer of the Government to it; there is no reason for delay; if there is another, we can get it when it comes; but we should have this one without delay. We know that there are various rumors in connection with it; the Ministerial organs give different accounts of what it is; but, in some way, either through the Government, the company, or the officials, I cannot tell how, vague, inaccurate accounts get out as to what the proposal of the company is. It is of deep interest for Parliament and the country to know what this is, and therefore the hon. gentleman should at once lay on the Table the proposal of the company with the answer of the Administration.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I differ altogether from the hon. gentleman. The Government are charged with the administration of affairs in the confidence of Parliament and select their own time and their own way of submitting matters to Parliament. The other day when the hon. gentleman asked if there had been applications made, I said there had been on Thursday, and that they had been considered on Saturday, and had not been accepted. The hon. gentleman asked if papers would be brought down; I said yes, but there might be other applications. When I stated that the application had not been accepted, I did not say it had been rejected. I may say here that some portions of the application were worthy of consideration and are now under consideration, and until the full consideration of the matter is given, I think it is highly expedient in the public interest to bring down an imperfect correspondence.

ENQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. BLAKE. Amongst some returns which have been ordered by resolution of the House in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway are the profiles of the line; and they were to be ready, I think, on the 15th day after the commencement of the Session. The only profiles brought down are the profiles of a small section in British Columbia. The other profiles have not been brought down this year as yet. It is of great consequence that we should have them, and I trust they will not be further delayed. I am sorry to say that when they do come down they come in a very imperfect condition. They are copied on tracing paper or linen, and the scale or the ruled lines to enable one to judge of the work done in the intervening period are not given, so that one can only approximate. There appear to be other defects in the profiles brought down; but, defective as they are, we ought to have them, and I hope they will be brought down at once. I may also say that several motions have been made for tables of the grades and curves of the railway. We have not received any of these tables yet. The hon. gentleman will find that, as far back as 1878, in the report of Mr. Marcus Smith of the proposed route of the Canadian Pacific Railway through British Columbia, there were tables of gradients which gave the gradients of different characters and the ruling gradients and the average grades of each description, so that we could get an intelligible understanding of what the road really was. I moved for those for years; they have been ordered for years, but not one as yet has come down. I have been this Session under great difficulties endeavoring to extract from the profiles, which are imperfect, that information which ought to have been given to us, and which, during my hon. friend's (Mr. Mackenzie) Administration, was submitted to Parliament even in advance of construction. The line I am now speaking of is a line actually located and which has been almost entirely constructed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will see the Minister of Railways about it at once and endeavor to obtain the papers.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed adjourned debate on motion of Sir Leonard Tilley to go again into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. HESSON. If hon. gentlemen on this side have to crave the indulgence of the House while they take into consideration the question now before us and the debate on the tariff is thus prolonged, the responsibility rests with hon. gentlemen opposite; because, so far as the case of the Government is concerned, it might fairly have been allowed to rest on the excellent speech of the Finance Minister. That his statements should have been attacked continuously, as they have been, is not only a surprise to this House, but a surprise to the intelligence of every elector. I would not crave the indulgence of the House for a few moments did I not feel it necessary, were not the duty forced on me, as it is on other hon. members on this side, to answer the unfair statements in many cases, and the unfair manner in which the question before us is discussed by hon. gentlemen opposite. I have had the pleasure of listening to several Budget speeches from the Finance Minister, and I must honestly say, considering all the circumstances of the country, considering the state of affairs that exist the world over, in Europe, in the United States, and in this country, every Canadian ought to feel satisfied that the hon. gentleman was able to present to this House a case so strong and so satisfactory as the one he presented. Hon. gentlemen opposite are not disposed to accept the verdict of the people on the question; they have to be convinced over and over again; and it falls to the lot of hon. gentlemen on this side to reassert, to re-affirm, to re-hash, if I may use the term, what has been said over and over again on every hustings, in every newspaper in Canada, since the introduction of the National Policy down to the present time. That we are still obliged to repeat what has been said so often does not show great intelligence on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. They are unwilling to accept the verdict of the people; there is not an elector in Canada who has not expressed his opinion on the policy of the Government, and if the majority is to rule in this country what have hon. gentlemen opposite to say? What has been the answer of the electors to hon. gentlemen opposite? Not only did the electors give a decided answer in 1878 against the policy of the late Government, but even during the period when the late Government was in power, the people took every opportunity of showing their want of confidence in the policy of that Administration. Not a constituency was opened but was wrested from them. Every constituency, I might almost say, was taken from them, year by year, as they were opened and the people had an opportunity of expressing their opinion. What was the fate of the late Government from the day they took office to the day they fell, 17th September, 1878? It was one continuous series of disasters, as constituency after constituency was thrown open. From the day my hon. friend, the Premier, and the little party then in Opposition propounded the policy which has since received the unanimous endorse-tion of the people—a policy which hon. gentlemen opposite did not dare to propound—the people have shown on every occasion their approval of my hon. friend's course. What was his policy? He was prepared to nail his colors to the mast and to stand or fall by the policy of protection to Canadian industries. His policy was Canada for the Canadians, and when we went to the country in 1878 the response which the people gave was a glorious victory for my right hon. friend, and a most crushing defeat to hon. gentlemen opposite. Since then, day by day, and year by year, the answer of the people has been continuous and strong in favor of the National Policy, an answer so unmistakable that it requires no effort on our part to show what is the real sentiment of the people on this great question. To-day the Government are as strong in the hearts of the people as they were when returned to office in 1878. This is shown by the fact that, as each opportunity has arisen, the people have shown their continued support of the present Government. Hon. gentlemen opposite claimed that the Government had obtained a snap verdict, and contended that if opportunity were given the people they would reverse their verdict of 1878. Well, in 1882, that opportunity was given, and this Government was returned with a stronger majority than it previously enjoyed, showing conclusively that their policy had not lost any ground in the minds of the people, but on the contrary had gained in strength since its inauguration. Since then we have had several bye elections, and on each occasion the same approval of the people was manifested, and yet hon. gentlemen opposite will rise here and denounce the policy of the Government, charge the Government with all sorts of extravagance, I might almost say with corruption in high places. The people, however had a bitter lesson and will no longer trust hon. gentlemen opposite. They tried them once but found them wanting and are determined that we shall not see a revival of that brief period when the late Administration was in office, a period which was the saddest which the people of Canada witnessed since Confederation. In vain hon. gentlemen on this side endeavor to make this question clear to hon. gentlemen opposite. They will not learn: they have eyes and will not see and ears and will not hear. The electors have spoken to them; the verdict of the people is that the National Policy is as strong in their hearts to-day as ever it was, yet hon. gentlemen opposite refuse to accept that verdict. I would ask hon. gentlemen to take into consideration this fact. If the policy of the Government which has been in operation the last six years were injurious to the people would we not see this Table loaded down with petitions from the electors of Canada asking the Government to change its policy? Has a single petition been presented to this House, asking hon. members to reconsider the policy of the Government or to change it in one iota? No, on the contrary, what do we witness? We witness this fact that, if we have been called upon to change anything of that policy, it has been to lengthen our cords and strengthen our stakes, and here and there we may be called upon to increase the protection, if it is found to be necessary in the interests of the struggling industries of Canada. That is the kind of application that has been made to the Government, not to relax in one single iota, but to pursue that policy and, if they have not gone sufficiently far, to go somewhat further still. Now, I propose for a few moments to direct my attention to the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). He chose the other evening to make certain statements, which I should have preferred answering there and then. My hon. friend very properly refused to be interrupted. I will not complain of that. Very often it is very unpleasant indeed, but it frequently occurs to me that it would be much more proper to the subject to answer there and then to a question that might be suggested by any member of the House who is looking for information or asking for an opinion.

My hon. friend on that occasion referred to the industry of cheese. He wanted to know what the Government had done for the cheese industry of Canada, what protection they had given to it. The hon. gentleman dared not deny that it was a great success in Canada. He did not undertake to deny that, but he asked what had the Government done to protect the cheese industry of Canada. I can tell the hon. gentleman that this very same party that is now responsible for the legislation of this country, when in power before they fell in 1873, introduced that policy of protection and protected the cheese industry of Canada 3 cents a pound. I will ask the hon. gentleman if he dare go into his constituency or put his foot on a platform in my constituency and ask the electors of that county or of his own county to withdraw that protection to the cheese of Canada. I will ask, if that single industry has prospered with a duty of 3 cents a pound, whether it is not possible that other industries might prosper with a similar protection. If my hon. friend cannot see it, I am perfectly certain the farmers of Canada can see it to-day. Is my hon. friend afraid of a monopoly in the cheese industry? Well, I should say that there is not a single farmer in Canada but would like to see those monopolies very much increased. My hon. friend grew very warm, too, over the proposed resolutions of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, when he proposed to put a further tax upon wineceys. Why, he said, it enters into the use and consumption of every poor family in the country, and the Minister dares to tax the poor man's fabric, to charge upon it a heavier duty. My hon. friend is in trade. He knows the value of wineceys to-day, he knows that the duty was increased upon them long ago, and he knows that the prices have been very much reduced. I have been half a life in trade myself—over 30 years—and I never handled goods so cheap in all classes that my hon. friend has been dealing in, and that I myself deal in, and amongst them all I never handled any that show the reduction so much as cottons and wineceys. If my hon. friend is giving us a better quality at a lower price, if he does not impose higher charges upon these goods which enter into the consumption of every household in the country, then why should the Government be charged with taxing the poor man's family for what they wear? I give that answer to the hon. gentleman, and he knows that he dares not rise in his place and say that he does not get as good and even a better value than ever before in these lines of goods. My hon. friend, and a great many others on that side of the House as well as himself, referred in former Sessions of this House to the duty that was imposed on the farmer's implements of the North-West. The sympathy of those gentlemen was so great that one would have supposed that they, and not the gentlemen who lead the Government, should have been trusted with the destinies of that great country. We know how sympathetic they became, how they appealed to the Government in reference to the heavy rate of taxation they were imposing upon the agricultural implements of that Province. What are the facts? The hon. gentleman's whole course is changed to-day, and it turns out that it was not with the poor struggling settlers of that country that he was in sympathy, but with the manufacturers, who were to be the bloated aristocrats under the National Policy. Yes, the hon. gentleman dared to stand up and changed the whole of his past record in the House, and other gentlemen opposite spoke in the same direction and changed all their references to the high taxation imposed upon the people of that country, and turned round and sympathised with the unfortunate manufacturers. Did not my hon. friend say that the price of farming implements sent into that country was 50 per cent. lower than the manufacturers could afford to sell them for, that they were selling them for 50 cents on the dollar, that he knew manufacturers who had hundreds and thousands of implements they would be glad to sell at 50 cents on the dollar? Where is his sympathy now for the poor struggling settler of the North-West? Has the price of implements increased? Did not the Government and other hon. gentlemen on this side of the House reiterate again and again to the gentlemen that, if you encouraged home production, you would create competition so keen and close that the prices would be reduced, and that the articles would not necessarily cost more to the farmers? Experience has verified the statements made on this side of the House at that time, but my hon. friend's visions of those days will lack verification, and he will find it by-and-bye necessary to change his tune once more, and to say that neither the manufacturers nor the farmers of that country are to be sympathised with or commiserated. The hon. gentleman referred to some photographic pamphlets, some literature for immigration purposes that he pointed out had been adorned with the photographs of the hon. Ministers. Possibly the hon. member had in mind a little pamphlet that was once circulated by an hon. gentleman on that side of the House, having in view, I presume, the settlement of a Province different from that of Manitoba and the North-West—the Province of Kansas. The hon. gentleman will recognize the leader of his own party in that pamphlet.

Mr. MILLS. Printed at the Mail office.

Mr. HESSON. It was printed as a business speculation, because gentlemen on that side of the House left themselves open then as they do now to be quoted by the American press and by the American speculators of railway and other land corporations, it was because they were always so unwise to leave themselves open in that direction that they had that sort of documents held up to them. The hon. gentleman waxed warm on that point, and said the photographs of Ministers adorned the pamphlets for circulation in the old county, and the result would probably be to induce such enormous immigration into this country that there would be nothing but starvation for the people of Canada. I think I can discover a remedy for that. Let the hon. gentlemen opposite issue a pamphlet and adorn it with the photograph of my hon. friend from North Wellington, and you will not have the people of the old country, if they attach any value to the utterances in the pamphlet, coming to this country, and so there will be no danger of starvation in consequence of over-immigration. My hon. friend referred to the enormous reduction in the United States debt. Now it is undoubtedly satisfactory, not only to this House but to the country and to the world, to know that the national debt of the United States has very largely decreased; and I trust the time may come in our country when we shall have reached a position, not only in prosperity and in general development, but in the settlement of the country as well, when we may also be enabled to point to a large reduction in our national debt. My hon. friend has referred to the fact that the reduction of the national debt of the United States since 1878 has been over $425,000,000. Well, Sir, that is perfectly true. But when he was making the statement did the hon. gentleman forget that this state of things in the United States was only brought about by paying great attention to the industries of that country? Did my hon. friend forget altogether that he was talking about a country that was not blessed with free trade doctrines, or with philosophers such as my hon. friend and those associated with him on that side of the House? Did he forget that they had a policy of protection which, as compared with our own, I may safely say, is intensified three-fold? Had the hon. gentleman forgotten that in the history of that country, and until a very recent period, not even a bottle of patent medicine could be put up, nor a box of matches laid upon the shelf of a householder, without the Government stamp upon it? Did my hon. friend forget that they imposed a very much higher rate of duty on every article that was permitted to come into that country than we do. Now if it is owing to a policy of this kind that the national debt of the United States has been so greatly diminished, may we not fairly infer that it is possible for us also, in pursuing the policy this Government has been pursuing since it came into power, to arrive at such a state of things as that we may also be enabled to reduce our national indebtedness to a large extent? So much for the remarks of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). Now I desire to pay some attention to the speech that was made by the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Cockburn). My hon. friend became very eloquent the other day upon the injustice we were doing to Great Britain by imposing such a high rate of duty upon the imports from that country. He did not take the trouble, however, to go into the figures. That would have been a dangerous operation for him; but he drew my attention to the fact that on another occasion when this question was under discussion in this House, I had taken the trouble to investigate it somewhat. Now if there is a party in this country specially desirous of remaining attached to Great Britain I think the Conservative party may fairly claim to stand pre-eminently in that position, and any policy that would operate in favor of the United States as against Great Britain would not receive, and could not receive, the endorsement of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. Now, Sir, I took the trouble to look into the Trade and Navigation Returns for a few years past, and I find that in 1873 the imports from Great Britain amounted to $68,522,776. Mr. Speaker, that was the year the Conservative party went out of power, and that was the last year that the imports from Great Britain reached such enormous figure. Our hon. friends opposite came into power, and whilst the total imports of the country did not decline, I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to show that there was not a decline in the import from Great Britain. Why, Sir, they went down by leaps and bounds until the year they left power in 1878, when the imports from Great Britain had decreased until they amounted to only $37,091,596, as against $68,522,776 in the year when the Conservative party went out of power. Now, what was the state of our trade with the United States during the term those hon. gentlemen were in power? Did it also decline, or did it decline in the same proportion? If they will investigate those returns carefully, as I have done, they will find that it did not decline, but on the contrary, it increased to a very considerable extent. Now, Mr. Speaker, a question occurs to me here—what length of time would it have required, if that party had remained in power, for our imports from Great Britain to have disappeared altogether, if they had kept on declining in the same ratio? It is very easy matter to make the calculation. It would have required but about six short years, if the decline had kept on in the same ratio, for every dollar's worth of imports from that country to have ceased to appear in Trade and Navigation Returns. Now, Mr. Speaker, as to the imposition of a heavier duty upon imports from Great Britain, allow me to say this: I have taken up the Trade and Navigation Returns, and they exhibit this fact, that the imports from the United States from 1874 to 1878 amounted to $251,107,385; and the Reform party who were in power at that time collected duties on that sum to the amount of $20,894,657. Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the comparison between that state of things and the state of things existing under the Administration of my right hon. friend, the leader of the present Government? I will take the years from 1880 to 1884. I leave out 1879 for the reason that the policy of the Government had not really began to take effect during that year and it would not be fair to take that year into account in the comparison. But I find that during this Administration from 1880 to 1884, the total imports from the United States amounted to $217,865,271, and upon this amount the Conservative Government collected a duty of no less than $32,839,809, as against the $20,894,657 collected by the Reform Government on a very much larger amount of imports. Now, Sir, I think that answers pretty well the statements of the hon. gentleman from North Ontario. If my hon. friend is as clever as I give him credit for being, I think he will be able to see that what he stated here does not bear upon it the stamp of truth. It is clear, Sir, in this statement I have made, that upon $33,000,000 less imports from the United States we have collected about $12,000,000 more duty. That is the answer. I might, in order to do justice to that state of things, also point to this fact: that during the Administration of the Reform party the total amount of raw cotton imported into this country, from 1874 to 1878, was only 25,641,459 lbs.—that of course was free—whilst during this Administration for a like period, from 1878 to 1882, there were imported 94,038,219 lbs., or a difference in favor of this Administration of 68,397,760 lbs. When that fact is taken into consideration as being a part of the total imports of production under the Conservative Administration, and as the policy of this and of the last Administration was that that being a raw product and not coming into competition with any product in Canada, and it being required in order to carry on the manufacturing industries of this country, it had to be admitted free under the policy of both Governments—you find on the goods imported from Great Britain nothing like so high a proportionate duty has been imposed as on goods imported from the United States under the régime of this Government. While on the question of imports I might as well deal with the question talked of on both sides of the House and referred to particularly by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), that of the balance of trade. The balance of trade has been a dangerous question for hon. gentlemen opposite; and let me point out this, that is policy of the Reform party is—and I have heard it stated on every platform where I have had the pleasure of being present,—that the prosperity of a country is best advanced by importing larger quantities of goods than the country exports, and that such a state of things is an evidence of the growth and prosperity of the people. It is all very well if the exports keep pace with imports; it is far better if the exports exceed them; and it should be the policy of a Government to endeavor to equalise and balance those trades. We have evidence on the other side of the border that, by the trade policy the United States has pursued, they have been enabled during a number of years past to annually pile up the balance in favor of exports and against imports, and it is surely the best evidence and the clearest indication of a country becoming wealthy, where a country is a producing and exporting country, that the balance of trade is in favor of their exports. Do hon. gentlemen recognise the fact that the imports being in excess of the exports and the balance being against the country, it is in a dangerous condition? Does it not occur to hon. gentlemen that it is much better for the balance to be on the side of exports rather than on the side of imports? Let us see what the state of things was under hon. gentlemen opposite. From 1873 to 1878 the total imports was of the value of $529,256,154; exports for the same period, $403,403,402, a difference against Canada of $125,752,782. It would occur to any sensible person, I think, that the difference had to be paid for in some way, either that we owed it or it was settled by failures; and it appears to me that that was a very dangerous state of affairs. A great difference exists between a country like Great Britain, which has imports of gold and interest accruing from her loans, and great wealth and prosperity, and a country like our own, which is a borrower and an exporter of gold, and is continually required to pay interest on our loans and our liabilities for foreign purchases. It would not be a fair or reasonable argument for hon. gentlemen to use in favor of an excess of imports, that in the case of Great Britain her imports were greater than her exports, because they are large consumers and not producers in the sense of producers of a food supply and of raw material. To compare that state of things with the position in a new country like Canada is not only unfair but unjust. Dividing that difference of $125,752,782 by the five years, we obtain a sum of $25,150,556 as the excess of imports over exports annually during those five years. Hon. gentlemen say we had failures in crops during that period. Grant for the sake of argument that we had one or two short harvests, although I will not admit it and am prepared to prove that it is not correct. Were they shorter than the harvest of 1883, or were they as bad? Let hon. gentlemen refer to the Trade and Navigation Returns, and they will find I am within the mark when I say we did not export one million dollars worth of wheat from the country in that year. Let us take the period from 1879 to 1884 when this party came into power and the present leader took the responsibilities of Government on his shoulders. During those five years we imported goods to the value of $587,702,151, and the value of our exports was $548,323,039, the difference being $39,379,112, and dividing it by six leaves an average of $6,563,171 per annum. Compare that with the operations of that extraordinary policy pursued by the party now in Opposition and let the people of Canada judge; and if they can believe that, under the policy pursued by hon. gentleman opposite, they can become wealthy, then I wonder the people have not placed them in power before this. I now come to a very important part of the imports from 1874 to 1878. Hon. gentleman opposite may be charged with this folly, that they permitted goods to the value of no less than $182,307,627 to come in duty free. They may say that this was a wise policy, and one which the people supported. I deny it. The public verdict was given on that policy in 1878. The farmers and manufacturers of Canada demanded a different policy, and I regret that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have not yet learned to accept the verdict of the people but will follow their own theories and fallacies. Let us investigate that amount of $182,000,000 of free imports and see of what it is composed. During those five years, I repeat, goods to the value of $182,207,657 were admitted free, and those were for home consumption (I have been careful about that) and were largely composed of items that were being produced in this country by the hardest working part of our population. Let me give the House some idea of what those articles were. Will the House believe that the party in Opposition to-day were so fully committed to their foolish policy as to permit wheat to the value of $33,995,349 to come in duty free. Did that mean nothing to the farmers of Canada? Was that of no importance to the people? Did we require that wheat? Not at all; and I am talking only of that which was imported for home consumption. That, Sir, was the amount which they have allowed to come in free in five years. We will take the item of flour, not only a product of the farm, but a product of the manufactory, a product of the mill, and what do we find that their folly led them to do? It led them to allow $12,388,485 worth of that product to come in free; of corn and meal there was $15,285,929 came in free; of all other grains there were $3,429,064—making a total of $65,098,827 of products of the farm which came into this country in those five years, and which must to that extent have driven out the products of our own farmers. Is that giving the people of Canada their home market? Is that the policy which hon. gentlemen opposite would follow to-morrow if they came into power—to give up their home market to their near neighbors and allow our own people to be driven out of their own market to a foreign market, and take their chances there at whatever prices they might get? I was always led to believe that the home market was the best market, and the people of Canada, the farmers and laborers of Canada, believe to-day it is the best market. They believe that it is better that they should find employment at home and a market at home for the products of their labor. Now, Sir, it is only fair to hon. gentlemen opposite to compare this showing of the actions of their Government with the condition of things under the present Government. I take the years 1880 to 1884, leaving out 1879 for the reason I have already stated, that the National Policy had not begun in that year to have its proper effect. In those five years, of the goods I have enumerated, there were only $14,856,685 worth imported, against their sixty-five millions. Take also into consideration the fact that those fourteen million dollars worth of goods were not admitted free, but that we imposed on them a duty of $1,884,958. Under these circumstances I think I have given an answer to the hon. gentlemen on the question of why the industries of Canada were in an unfortunate and unprosperous condition when they were in power, and why the people cried out with a loud voice, and with almost one accord, "Give us a change of policy." It is only necessary to show that we excluded $50,212,142 worth of those very products which came in competition with the honest farmers of Canada, or an average of over $10,000,000 a year to show why the farmers of Canada are in favor of the present policy. It was only taking a leaf from the chapter of hon. gentlemen opposite, or at all events a chapter from the history of the Opposition party, when they advised the Lower Provinces that they should trade with their American neighbors because they were nearer to them. Is that what we expected from the Confederation when we entered in 1867? Is that the policy which we supposed the Federal Parliament of Canada would adopt? I am glad to say that even from the Eastern Provinces comes the cry for more of that inter-provincial trade. What was the object of the investigation of that committee which was appointed in this House but a year ago, headed, I believe, by an hon. gentleman from the Lower Provinces, Mr. Paint? Was not the object of that committee, if possible, to encourage and foster that inter-provincial trade to a greater extent? The policy of the Reform party would be to do away with all that and to trade with our neighbors. I say, first give us control of our own markets; put us on an equal footing with our neighbors, and then we are free to say to them on equal terms that we will open our markets to them when they open their markets to us. The policy of the Reform party never would have given us access to the American markets and never will; we cannot ask them to open their doors to us unless we have something to give them in return for what we ask. I must ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments while I speak on this question, and put some facts on record, so that it may be known to the people of Canada what the imports of these farm products were from the United States for home use during the past year. They were as follows:—

1884.		Duty.
Barley.....	$ 13,168	$ 4,214
Beans.....	29,820	2,317
Corn.....	1,277,131	171,772
Oats.....	27,751	4,458
Wheat.....	292,033	44,799
Flour.....	2,439,999	265,594
Mill feed.....	292,033	51,455
All other grain.....	168,750	16,511
Totals.....	$4,529,685	$541,120

I ask the hon. gentlemen opposite if the farmers of Canada are any worse by that duty being imposed and collected? I ask them if the price of grain has been so enhanced by it that poor men have not been able to buy the wherewithal to live? I ask them if they should come into power to-morrow would they dare to take off that duty? I ask them if they would not find it necessary to carry out the wishes of the people by imposing that duty and carry out this policy? Then I say it would be much more honorable to these gentlemen to have ceased this discussion long ago, and accept the position that they would not and dare not remove that duty if they were on this side of the House. I see the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) is now in his place. In the course of the eloquent and able address which he made the other day he told us that this policy had destroyed the West Indian trade. I made a note of this statement at the time because I thought it somewhat a strange statement to be made by an hon. gentleman living down by the sea, one who happens to be in a position to know that his statement was not absolutely correct, if he had only taken the trouble to enquire. I had the Trade and Navigation Returns before me and I ventured to attempt to point out at the time that the hon. gentleman was wrong, but I was called to order by the Speaker, though I think then was the proper time to point out that the hon. gentleman was making a mistake. I have taken the trouble to look into the question, and I find that from 1874 to 1878 the total imports from the West Indies were $8,394,908. I looked at the items which compose this total and I found that when the Conservative party went out of power the imports from those islands were something more than $2,000,000 a year, and I found that the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite was such that it gradually declined year after year, until the last year they were in power it was but a fraction over $1,000,000. Again the Conservative party came into power, and what is the result of their policy? I will show you exactly what change took place. I find that the imports from the West Indies from 1880 to 1884, were no less than $18,759,862, or an increase over their period of $10,354,854; an increase in the five years under the present Government over the five years under their predecessors of $10,354,854 in our imports from that country. Now, Sir, amongst all the countries the hon. gentleman referred to, he could not have made a more unfortunate selection than the West Indies to show that our foreign trade has been destroyed by the policy of this Government. On that very question, we may go further and consider the condition of our trade with other countries. We believe that the country knows that the policy of this Government has increased our trade with other countries, and has prevented the Americans from being the middlemen to supply us with the products of foreign countries, as was formerly the case. I find that in the five years from 1874 to 1878, our total imports from Belgium were $1,440,330; we increased them to $1,939,687 from 1880 to 1884, or an increase of $499,356. The same increase will be found in our trade with South America. During the five years preceding the departure of hon. gentlemen opposite from power, there was $1,060,297 imported direct from South America; we have improved that to the extent of $5,283,377, or an increase in our five years of $4,177,080. From France we imported during the five years of hon. gentlemen opposite $8,480,410, and during our five years, $8,830,850, or an increase of $350,450. From Germany we imported during their five years, $2,957,847, which we improved during our five years to the extent of $6,648,986, an increase of $3,691,139. Now, Sir, what do we find with regard to our trade with China? During the five years term of hon. gentlemen opposite, our direct imports from China were $3,633,453; during this Government's five years, from 1880 to 1884, they were $7,588,742, an increase of $3,956,289. Then, Sir, come to little Switzerland, and we find that our imports from that country have increased from $440,214 in their five years to $1,082,527 in the five years under the Conservative régime. And with regard to the little country Italy, what do we find? That the imports were $213,015 during their term of five years, and that we improved them to the extent of $821,109 during our five years, an increase of $608,094. Taking our imports from all of these countries and other countries, including those from the West Indies, we find that we have increased our foreign trade during the five years of Conservative Government over the five years of the Government of hon. gentlemen opposite to the extent of no less than $26,286,269. Now, I give that as an answer to my hon. friend opposite and those who sit behind him, and I think it ought to satisfy them that on that ground at least they have no reason to find fault with the policy of the Government. Now, Sir, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), and I may almost say every gentleman on that side of the House who spoke, declared that the agriculturists of Canada had not obtained the slightest advantage from the policy of the Government. Both the hon. member for North Norfolk and the hon. member for West Elgin dwelt very strongly on this point, and endeavored to show by columns of figures, which are placed on record in the Hansard, that the farmers of Canada had suffered rather than improved their condition in consequence of this policy. Let me read what the hon. member for North Norfolk said on that subject:

"As to agricultural productions, it will be found, upon comparison, that never yet, since 1879 has the imposition of grain duties conferred upon the farmers of this country any advantage whatever."

He goes on further to say:

"We have had a tariff which was to afford the farmers of this country protection, and the very utmost claim the hon. gentleman has ever made with regard to the benefit the farmers derived from that tariff was made two Sessions ago, that possibly the farmers were receiving 3 cents per bushel more for wheat than they would if there had been no duties. That is the very utmost advantage that they ever claimed from the operations of the grain duties."

Now, Sir, I am prepared to take up that challenge. I am prepared to prove that hon. gentlemen opposite were wrong years ago when they declared that the National Policy would not have a beneficial effect on the products of the farmers, and that they are wrong to day. They learn nothing, and so gentlemen on this side are compelled to get up again and again and reaffirm what has been or ought to have been established long as a well founded fact. Sir, I have undertaken to go through the reports of the markets of the country for years back—not the Conservative reports, but those in the Globe, the author, I might almost claim, if not the finisher, of that party—and what has been the course of prices during those years? If hon. gentlemen dispute any single figure I will simply refer them to that paper, which I believe reports the market prices from day to day as faithfully as any other; although if there was a single point it could make against the policy of the Conservative party, it would no doubt make it in the interest of its own party. The hon. member for West Elgin made a similar comparison of quotations the other day in order to show what the effect of the National Policy ought to be on the price of wheat. I take the market prices at Toronto and Oswego in December of each year, and compare them for two periods of years, and what do we find? In 1874 the price of wheat in Toronto was 94 cts., and in Oswego $1.36, or 43 cts. in favor of Oswego; in 1875 the price in Toronto was 96 cts., and the price in Oswego $1.55, or 59 cts. in favor of Oswego; in 1876 the price in Toronto was $1.28, and in Oswego $1.50, or 32 cents in favor of Oswego; in 1877 the price in Toronto was $1.25, and in Oswego $1.45, or 20 cents in favor of Oswego; in 1878, the last year of that period, the price in Toronto was 85 cents, and in Oswego $1.09, or 24 cents in favor of Oswego. Now, if we strike an average for that period, we have as the average price in Toronto $1.05½, and in Oswego $1.39, or 33½ cents in favor of Oswego market during the period the party of hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, as against the Toronto market. Now, I come to the period during which the Conservative policy was in operation. On the adoption of that policy we expected that there would be a change, but not to the extent of the duty of 15 cents a bushel imposed on wheat. It was never claimed by the leaders of the Conservative party that the people of Canada were going to get the full benefit of all that protection, but it was claimed that it would give them the home market; and if it was sufficient to shut out the foreign products that came into competition with the products of the farmers of this country, it was sufficient for our purpose. Then, if we did not get the whole 15 cents duty imposed by that policy, I want to show exactly what benefit we did get; and I think I can find that in the commercial columns of the Globe. In 1879, the price in Toronto for the best quality of wheat was $1.31, and in Oswego $1.35, or 4 cents in favor of Oswego; in 1880, the highest price in Toronto was $1.16, and $1.15 in Oswego, being 1 cent in favor of Toronto. Hon. gentlemen opposite are wonderfully surprised at this, but they will find it all in the Globe. Every single figure I quote I have taken from the Globe, and I challenge hon. gentlemen to deny the accuracy of my figures; nor have I taken them from particular days, but, as I stated before, on a particular week throughout the whole ten years' period. In 1881, the price in Toronto was $1.29, and in Oswego $1.39; in 1882, in Toronto it was 92 cents, and in Oswego 97 cents, 5 cents in favor of Oswego; in 1883, Toronto, $1.16; Oswego, $1.12, or 4 cents in favor of Toronto; in 1884, Toronto, 74 cents; Oswego, 82 cents, or 8 cents in favor of Oswego. Averaging the price for five years, I find that at Toronto the average was $1.09½, and in Oswego $1.16¾, or 7¾ cents in favor of Oswego, under the operation of the National Policy, while, as I have shown you, the price was 33 cents against the farmers of Canada during the period hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. I do not pretend to say that the National Policy did this. It may be we have had better communication with the seaboard, or improved railway accommodation, or there may be other causes, but nevertheless the facts exist and let hon. gentlemen answer them if they can. I will take the price of wheat in Chicago and in Toronto. In 1879, on the 30th December, it was $1.35 in Chicago and $1.32 in Toronto. That was the year the National Policy came into operation and before it had time to have its full effect. Compare prices in 1885 between Chicago and Toronto. On the 19th March, 1885, the price in Chicago was 73½ cents and in Toronto 82 cents, or 8½ cents in favor of Toronto; or, adding the 3 cents that stood against Toronto in 1879, the difference in favor of Toronto now compared with the difference then is 11½ cent. I will take another illustration also from the Globe. I will compare Montreal with New York. On the 30th December, 1879, the price of wheat in New York was $1.49 and in Montreal $1.45, 4 cents in favor of New York; on the 19th March, 1885, the price in New York was 90 cents and in Montreal 93 cents, 3 cents in favor of Montreal; or adding the difference of 4 cents that stood against Montreal when hon. gentleman opposite were in power, the comparison shows 7 cents in favor of Montreal compared with that period. We thus find that in Montreal which is, I might almost say, the capital of Canada, we have the best market to-day that there is on the continent; and beyond doubt, a large portion of this improvement is due to the beneficial effect of the National Policy on the farming interests of the country. The hon. member for Queen's, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) in discussing this question the other day, referred to the Government savings banks; and it will be in the recollection of hon. gentlemen that he stated those banks were upheld, not by the working people of Canada, but by its wealthy men, by its business and professional men. He said it was the business men and the professional men who took advantage of the Government savings banks and the post office savings banks. I would like to see if that is correct.

Mr. DAVIES. I did not refer to the post office savings banks because we have not got them in the Maritime Provinces. I referred to the Government savings banks.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It was the Government savings banks that you asked for and argued on.

Mr. DAVIES. But not the post office savings banks.

Mr. HESSON. I find that in 1874 the total deposits in the Government savings banks were $3,466,136; in 1878 they were $5,526,955, or an average increase of $500,000 a year. Now, since the introduction of the National Policy, since the country has rid itself of the Grit incubus of ruin and decay, what do we find? We find that the average increase during the period this Government has been in power has been at the rate of over $2,000,000 per year. But a few days ago we had a report published which, I presume, is in the hands of hon. members, showing the deposits on the 31st January, 1885, in the Government savings banks. They are as follows:—

Toronto	$ 789,050
Manitoba	671,461
British Columbia.....	2,199,319
Nova Scotia.....	7,027,222
New Brunswick.....	4,556,644
Prince Edward Island	1,626,896
	$16,867,532

Deduct the amount of $5,526,955 at the credit of that fund when hon. gentlemen opposite went out of power in 1878, and you have an increase under this Administration of $11,340,577. I would say further, that there are in Nova Scotia some twenty-nine of these banks where deposits of that character are made, and in every one of them, with the exception of four, there has been an increase, showing that prosperity is pretty widespread and not confined to the cities, where the business and professional men have to reside. The deposits being so widespread, it is evident they must have come from the great bulk of the people and not from any particular section of the people. I think I shall be able to prove, before I leave this subject, not only that the hon. gentlemen are incorrect in their views on that matter, but that they are grossly incorrect. I will take the period when the post office savings bank was established, 1869, with a total deposit of $356,814. In 1874 that had increased to $3,207,051. That was the period when the Conservative party left power and the Reform party became responsible for conducting the affairs of the country. From 1874 to 1878, under the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, do we find a large increase? Do we find any increase? No, I am sorry to say—because a reference to that period must bring rather unpleasant recollections with it, must bring to some people who discuss these questions, recollections which are altogether unpleasant—instead of there being an increase during the five years of the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, there was a decline of no less than $453,570 in the deposits. What was the effect upon the depositors? The number of depositors in 1874 was 45,329, pretty well distributed over the people, and in 1878 that number had declined to 40,097, or a decline of 5,232 who had ceased to deposit in the post office savings banks of Canada. Now let me come to the period from 1878 to 1885. The total deposits now are $14,411,857. Deduct the sum at the credit of the savings bank account when the Reform party went out of power, $2,751,481, and we have an increase during the period of the administration of this Government of $11,657,376. The number of depositors in 1878 was 40,097; in 1884 it had risen to 100,489, an increase of 60,392. Now, to meet the statement of my hon. friend from Queen's, P. E. I., (Mr. Davies), who said it was wealthy men who were depositors in these banks, I will give you a statement showing the classes of depositors, the amount deposited by each class, and the average amount of each deposit:

Class.	No. of Depositors.	Amt.	Average.
Farmers.....	14,000	$4,722,000	$337
Mechanics.....	7,850	1,422,000	182
Trust account and young children.....	5,500	170,000	31
Laborers.....	4,270	724,000	169
Clerks.....	3,000	522,000	174
Tradesmen.....	1,600	468,000	292
Farm servants.....	1,470	277,000	188
Professional.....	1,572	392,000	249
Married women.....	12,000	2,350,000	195
Single women.....	19,500	1,275,000	121
Widows.....	3,240	708,000	218
Miscellaneous.....	1,680	215,000

I think that ought to be a sufficient answer to my hon. friend, who says it is the wealthy men of Canada who take advantage of that bank; it ought to be sufficient proof that he has been boring in the wrong place. I am satisfied, from the enormous increase in the number of depositors, and taking the average of these figures, which are furnished by Mr. Cunningham Stewart, who has charge of this Department, that my hon. friend will find it is not correct that deposits are made to the extent of thousands of dollars, one individual making deposits in the names of a number of his family in order to get round the intentions of the Government in this matter.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. HESSON. When the House rose for recess I had been dealing with the Government and post office savings banks; I had completed my remarks on that phase of the subject, and now, with the permission of the House, I will draw the attention of hon. members for a few moments to another evidence of the prosperity of Canada. I may say that the object of my remarks with reference to the Government savings banks and the post office savings banks was to present, not only my own impression of the light in which these facts should be regarded, but to present it as the general opinion, I believe, of the country. If my memory serves me correctly the ex-Finance Minister when he had the honor of sitting on this side of the House, and his former colleagues in the Reform Government, assumed the position that the accumulation of wealth in the various institutions in the country might be legitimately viewed as an evidence of prosperity. I do not suppose that hon. gentlemen, because they have changed places, can have changed their views. If they were consistent then we would expect them to be so now, and as they then gave utterances to expressions for which they must have felt themselves responsible before the country as Ministers of the Crown, I suppose that any humble individual of this House may assume the same position as one that is defensible. Now, Sir, in dealing with this question of the large accumulation of wealth in the country, as exhibited by the various institutions in which that wealth may be stored, I may be permitted to refer to the chartered banks of the country during the period the Reform Government were in power. The total amount of deposits in the chartered banks of Canada in 1875 were $55,984,000; in 1876 they had increased to $59,516,000; in 1877 they were $58,444,000; in 1878, $58,946,000; in 1879, $58,659,000. We see that the deposits were almost stationary during that period, which gives no evidence of an accumulation of wealth during the whole period that that Government were in power. Whether that may be fairly attributable to the policy of that Government is not for me to say, but it is my strong conviction that those hon. gentlemen, having failed to adopt a proper policy for the interest of Canada, were really responsible for that state of affairs. Now, Sir, the total increase during the whole five years that those hon. gentlemen were in power was but $2,741,000, an average of $548,200 per annum. That was certainly a very small evidence of prosperity during the days these hon. gentlemen were in power. They will probably say again, as they have said before, that it was all due to bad harvests. Sir, I cannot credit that; the country will not accept that statement, because if we take the exports of farm products in those years we will find a sufficient refutation of that argument. Now, Sir, I come to the second period, during the existence of the National Policy, under the administration of the present Government. In 1880 the deposits in the chartered banks rose to $69,742,000. It will be observed that this was only one year after the National Policy had come into effect, which was early in 1879; and yet so marked was that increase of prosperity that the deposits rose to over $69,000,000. In 1881 they had increased to $78,078,000; in 1882, $77,078,000; in 1883, $89,553,000; in 1884, $87,341,000; in 1885, bringing the deposits up to the present month, they are $93,309,870. Now, Sir, that ought to be taken as some evidence of the increased wealth of this country. How hon. gentlemen will get rid of that, I cannot see. I believe a few who have spoken have taken the line that the trade of the country had been so dormant that the people could not, or dare not, invest their money in business, and so they withdrew their money from the trade and commerce of the country and deposited it in the banks as a better and safer way of investing it. Now, Sir, I deny that contentional together; and I appeal to the facts, that business has very largely developed in this country, that manufacturing industries have largely developed, and that trade, although, perhaps in some lines, overdone, is still in a most satisfactory condition, as compared with its condition under the do-nothing policy, as I may fairly call it, of the hon. gentlemen opposite. During the six years, from 1880 to 1885 inclusive, we find that the total increase of the deposits amounted to $34,650,870, or an average increase of the deposits in the chartered banks of $5,775,145 per annum, as against the half a million in the period the hon. gentlemen were in power. Now, it does seem to me that, even granting that this fact is not an evidence of prosperity—which, I think, no hon. gentleman of common sense would assume, as an honest man—but assuming for a moment that it was not a correct evidence of prosperity, I think we could find plenty of other evidence elsewhere of the prosperity of the country. I will take three institutions, omitting the operations of the loaning associations, the deposits in these companies and in the private banks; I will take just three of the more important institutions in the country over which this policy must exercise a great influence, and summarise them in this way: In the chartered banks we find that the increase of deposits under the policy of this Government, from 1879 to 1885, is $34,650,870; in the Government savings banks the increase has been $11,340,577; in the post office savings banks the increase has been $11,657,376, or a total of $57,648,823. Now, Sir, if that is not accepted by hon. gentlemen opposite as an evidence of the increased prosperity of Canada, I believe it will be accepted as most substantial evidence by the electors and the common sense people of Canada. We have been asked by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, What has the Government done for the people of Canada? Hon. gentlemen rise and assert that the Government have not bettered the condition of the farmer, that they have not improved the position of the poor man, or afforded any relief to the laboring man. We have answered them from this side of the House over and over again, refuting their arguments, beating them at every turn, proving that the position of the farmer is improved, and that the labor of his hands is better protected than it was under the Reform Government, and that the farmers get better prices now as compared with the prices in former days, when they had the American farmer to compete with. Still, hon. gentlemen will be found to rise—and to-night, probably, some one will follow me, and repeat that fallacy; which has been exposed over and over again. Sir, in reply to the question, What has this Government done for the people of Canada? I say they have given back to the people a duty on tea of $1,184,016; a duty on coffee of $76,313; a duty on tin of $91,719; a stamp tax, a most objectionable tax, as every hon. member will agree, has been taken off, affording the people a relief of $200,000. They have been relieved from the postage on newspapers and periodicals to the extent of $64,250; there has been a reduction of the wire, turpentine and scrap iron duty, $31,000; and of the Excise tax on tobaccos, $700,000. Will hon. gentlemen say that that is not doing something for the people of Canada? On these items alone that I have enumerated—and I might go on and extend the list—the Government have remitted to the people of Canada $2,027,298 in duties on these goods that enter into the consumption of the people of Canada in their daily life. But some gentlemen may say: You have taxed the farmers' coal. This has been frequently repeated, not only during this debate, but in the debates of former years. I was led to enquire as to whether that was really a fact, and could be substantiated by the circumstances of the years gone by. I had the patience to refer to the quotations in the Globe, that very excellent newspaper which hon. gentlemen opposite will not discredit, and which I will not discredit when questions of prevailing prices are at issue. I say I considered it advisable, when hon. gentlemen opposite made that statement, to enquire into the facts; and what did I find? I take a period of the year when the coal is laid in by the poor man, and when it is consumed, namely, in December. According to the Globe the price of coal on 30th December, 1874—and I will take the last week of each year—was: hard, $8; soft, $7. 1875, hard, $8.50; soft, $7. 1876, hard, $6.50; soft, $7. 1877, hard, $6.50; soft, $6.50. 1878, hard, $5.50; soft, $5.50. The average is $7 for hard coal and $6.50 for soft coal during the term of the Reform Administration. I now come to the time during which the National Policy was in force, and a tax was imposed on coal. I am not going to debate again, as it has been debated here and throughout the country, as to who pays the duty in that case; but after I have submitted the figures and compared the two periods, I think every intelligent citizen, if not hon. gentlemen opposite, will arrive at the conclusion that the tax on coal has not been actually charged to the consumer. I find, according to the Globe: in 1879, hard coal, $4.75; soft, $6.50. 1880, hard, $7; soft, $6.50. 1881, hard, $7; soft, $7. 1882, hard, $6.50; soft, $6.50. 1883, hard, $7; soft, $6.50. The average price of hard coal during the time of the National Policy and when a tax was imposed on coal, was $6.45 per ton, against $7 under the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite; and for soft coal the average price was $6.60 against $6.50 during the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite. The figures actually show a difference of 10 cents for soft coal in favor of the time when the Reform party was in power; and, singular to say, that difference is the exact amount of the difference in the duty between hard and soft coal, the duty on the former being 50 cents per ton and on the latter 60 cents. Those are facts gleaned with a great deal of care from the organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I warrant them to be correct, as having come from that source. I now come to another part of the subject, which has been discussed until hon. gentlemen have been able to get as near the facts as they will be ever likely to do. We have heard a great deal about the exodus, and if the House will pardon me for a few moments, I will deal with that matter as it is reported on by the secretary of the Department.

Mr. HESSON.

ment, Mr. Lowe. In his report presented to this House, dated 20th February, 1885, we have the following remarks:

"Sir—I have the honor to report that, in obedience to your instructions, I have again made an examination into the figures published by the Washington Bureau of Statistics, as representing the alleged emigration from Canada to the United States during the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1884.

"The figures given are 60,584, including 124 from Newfoundland, against 70,241 the previous year, showing a decrease of 9,657, or 13.07 per cent., under the heading of 'Dominion of Canada.'"

Those figures are taken from the United States Bureau of Statistics. They are not of our furnishing; they have not been obtained by this Government; and hon. gentlemen opposite have been in the habit of quoting American figures as being more correct than our statistics, and they should be willing to accept that part of the statement, coming from that source. The report continues:

"The way in which the figures are alleged to have fallen off at Port Huron is, at least, a curious circumstance. They stand as follow since 1880:—

Years.	Total alleged immigration.	Huron Port.
1880	99,706	94,375
1881	125,391	111,170
1882	98,808	71,422
1883	70,241	45,393
1884	60,460	22,801

I think this is worthy of some little consideration. When it is observed that an enormous number had crossed at Port Huron, and that after this Government had made enquiries for themselves, and sent the secretary of the Department to spend a long time enquiring into the fact and examining as to the manner in which the Americans obtained those statistics, it is most remarkable that ever since that work was undertaken by this Government the number of persons passing at that particular point, where nearly all the immigrants crossed, according to American statement, only 22,000 crossed in 1884, as against 99,000 in 1882. The explanation seems quite clear. It is simply this, that our Government have found a way of verifying the figures as regards this matter. And that leads me to another point, which I think of considerable importance—the best method of ascertaining the exact state of affairs, as regards the alleged exodus. I come to the intimation on the part of our Government to ascertain for the themselves the exact state of affairs. The secretary reports in this way:

"Before coming to the examination of the question as it actually exists at Port Huron, I think it is better to point out the leading fact, which is established by the figures representing the total movement of passengers from Canada and to Canada by the whole of the Grand Trunk system in the east and in the west.

"The figures are as follows:—

Total outs from Canada to the United States....	210,941
Less—European passengers.....	9,010
Total net outs	201,931
Totals ins to Canada from the States.....	206,616
Less—European passengers.....	1,778
Total net ins.....	204,838
Net gain to Canada of difference between ins and outs.....	2,907

I hope I have made that clear, as it was intended to be by the secretary in his report. I think, if we take the whole of the passenger traffic on the Grand Trunk and Great Western, east, west and south—I think, if you take the entire travel out and in, and strike the difference between the two, you must arrive as close to the facts as ever you will be able to do, unless you have men placed there taking an actual count of them. These facts are taken from the Grand Trunk Company, and the exhibits are in the Minister's report, marked from "A" to "G," showing the official report by Mr. T. B. Hawson, the Traffic Auditor of the Grand Trunk. As they have to account, not only for all tickets issued—not only for the output, but for the collection of them, I think this is probably as fair a way as we will ever be able to devise, in order to reach a determination of this vexed question. He says further:

“If we test the figures at the two points of Sarnia and Detroit by the figures of the Grand Trunk system referred to, we have the following results:—

Net outs at Sarnia (Port Huron).....	38,657
do Windsor (Detroit).....	36,312
Total.....	74,969
Net ins at Sarnia.....	31,411
do Windsor.....	39,338
Total.....	70,749
Difference, showing net loss by Canada at the two ports named.....	4,220

In dealing further with this question, I have only to say that in the Lower Provinces it is not possible to arrive at the facts in connection with these figures; but if we allow a very large margin, in order to reach what the Americans claim as being over 60,000, I think it would be easy for hon. gentlemen to show what the Dominion has lost as against the number which the Americans claim have gone into their country. I say that if the Lower Provinces have suffered a depletion of nearly 40,000 people, they will have little difficulty in proving to the entire satisfaction of members on this side that an exodus did exist. Now, Sir, permit me, for a few moments, to deal with another matter which has been brought before this House. My attention has been particularly directed to it, from the fact that the hon. member from West Elgin (Mr. Casey) dwelt upon it the other day to a very great extent, and I fancied at the time that he was taking his facts from his own imagination. I had not at that time looked at the report of Mr. Blue, of the Bureau of Industries, but my attention has been drawn to it, and what do we find is the position of Ontario to-day? It was said that the agricultural interests have not been benefited, that the price of grain has not been improved, that the value of our farms was diminishing, that the position of the farmer was altogether worse now than it was under the Administration of the Reform party, and that, in short, our policy had proved to be a humbug. Now let us see what the authority of the Reform Government of the Province of Ontario says on that subject. He says that the increases in the value of farm property, in 1883 over 1882, are as follows:—

	Increase.
Farm Lands.....	$22,450,525
Buildings.....	30,319,100
Implements.....	6,492,715
Live stock.....	19,341,645
Total for Province.....	$78,604,985

Or an increase of over $78,000,000 in one year, and we take the authority from the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Good authority.

Mr. HESSON. Yes, good authority; because I believe they would have put the worst side forward if there had been a worst side. I think these figures are an answer to my hon. friend, as to the position the farmers are in to-day, and the position they found themselves in when the Reform party unfortunately were in power. The hon. gentleman was kind enough to take the failures in 1879, the year of the inauguration of the National Policy, and its indorsement by the people of Canada, and he said that the failures in that year were the largest they ever had. Now, Sir, I have taken the trouble to investigate that question somewhat further than my hon. friend thought it advisable to do—I have gone a little further back, and have not simply taken the first year, when the shrieks of the dying industries of the country—the shrieks of manufacturers and workmen of the country were still in our ears, on the winding up of the policy of the late Government. The hon. gentleman, in taking that year, gave us an illustration of his opinion of fair play, and he threw out the figures as an index of what the National Policy has produced in the country. If he had gone a little further back he might have given more information to the House and country, which would have been equally valuable. I will begin with the year 1875. I will not go back to 1874; I will do them the justice of saying that they may not have held themselves responsible for the results of that year any more than we did for the results of 1879, as it was not at all likely that the policy of the Reform Government could have fairly taken effect in 1874. I therefore take 1875, not because I think it would do my argument any harm to throw out the previous year, but because I think it is fair to begin with 1875. The failures, in number and amount, for the years 1875 to 1879 were as follows:

Year.	No.	Amount.
1875	1,968	$28,843,997
1876	1,728	25,517,991
1877	1,892	25,523,903
1878	1,697	23,523,803
1879	1,902	26,347,937
Totals	9,187	$133,142,505

Sir, the average during all that time was $26,500,000 a year. Now, Sir, we come to the succeeding five years, and we find the number of failures, and the amount in each year, to be as follows:—

Year.	No.	Amount.
1880	907	$7,988,077
1881	635	5,761,207
1882	787	8,587,657
1883	1,284	15,872,000
1884	1,308	18,939,770
Totals	5,021	$47,138,711

against 9,187 failures, and a total amount of $133,142,505 during their period. I give that statement in answer to the hon. gentleman, and if he doubts it, let him go and look at Dun, Wiman & Co.'s report in the Monetary Times, and he will find it to be strictly correct. These figures have been correctly copied by myself, and I know whereof I speak. If hon. gentlemen claim that we are responsible for the failures of 1874, what do they amount to? I have the figures here, and I am not afraid to put them before the people. In 1874 the total failures, if they are chargeable to the Conservative Administration which held office up to 1873, were 991, and the amount was $12,324,191. I give that, Sir, as the condition of affairs in our worst period, against their $26,500,000 yearly average during the period that they were in power. Now, Sir, I heard the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) the other evening ask, What has this Government done for Canada? Well, Sir, I have been endeavoring to-day to tell the hon. gentlemen what they have been doing. I feel that they have first protected our farming industries. They have levelled up, as I have shown by figures this afternoon, the prices of the products of our farmers, by giving us our own markets, which are always the best. But my hon. friend says: O, what of that? Look at Bangor; see how they are taxed in Bangor! I say they have protected the industries of this country; they have increased manufactures for our own industries. Then he says: Look at Amsterdam; they have many industries there. Then, I say, the Government have given us cheaper and better goods than we have ever had before, and our own products at that. But the hon. gentleman says: Look at Akron, Ohio; and see how little they are taxed there. I say again, we have given employment to more laborers and mechanics than ever had employment in this country before. But the hon. gentleman says: Go to Baltimore; they have low taxes

there. Well, Sir, I try to answer the question, and I say we have given employment to capital as well as labor; we have more capital employed in the country than has ever been employed before. Ah, but, says he, go to Kansas city. Well, we do not choose to travel so far; but I say we have increased the deposits in the savings banks of the country. Then he says: Go to Cedar Rapids, Iowa. Well, I say, we have lowered the rate of interest to the poor man who has to borrow. Then the hon. gentleman says: Reduce still further the rate of interest paid in the post office savings banks to the workingmen. That is the kind of reply the hon. gentlemen give, and it is about as far as the get. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will say a few words in closing, for I do not wish to weary the House. I think it is but fair to revert to the statement made by the Finance Minister when he introduced his Budget Speech. I think it but fair that hon. gentlemen opposite, as well as hon. gentlemen on this side, should accept that utterance, feeling that the country will hold the Government responsible for it, and will hold them responsible also. The hon. Minister of Finance, the other day, pointed out what had been accomplished by the Government in their expenditures, not only on the Welland canal, but in completing that great iron band which is necessary to cement our Confederation, in giving increased employment to labor and capital, bringing about accumulations of wealth in the savings banks, and after all that, the hon. Minister could tell us that it was all done at an increase of taxation of only about 12 cents per capita on the people of Canada. And when the hon. Minister of Finance told this House, in his able and eloquent way, that after all this was accomplished the taxation for the year 1885-86 would not be more than $5 a head, hon. gentlemen opposite might have accepted that statement, and the debate might have been ended there and then. But the House has been wearied with the length of this debate, as I probably have wearied it myself. But I think the House and the country have been wearied with a debate that might have been terminated three weeks ago; and so far as this Government is concerned, we are prepared to leave it in the hands of the people.

THE DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. BLAKE. I agree with the hon. member for North Perth in the substance of his closing remarks. I think it is about a week since this debate was dead, and it is pretty near time it was buried. Before it died I was minded myself to trouble the House, in order to answer some representations made by some hon. members of my own public utterances. But I do not intend on this occasion to inflict on the House any suggestions with reference to those utterances. I shall simply say, having regard to the fact that we are celebrating the obsequies of the defunct debate, that I do not accept the statements which hon. gentlemen opposite have made of my public utterances on various occasions, and I do not wish them to understand that they go undenied because I do not enter into an investigation of them. I was also minded, before this debate closed, to say something of the hon. gentleman's tariff resolutions. But that is a difficult operation, because we do not know from day to day what the tariff resolutions are to be. The hon. gentleman this afternoon, in answer to an hon. member, who asked if the Government would alter the duty on wheat, said that the Government announced their tariff policy when they brought down their Budget; but it does not seem that they always do it, because the tariff resolutions the hon. gentleman announced on that occasion are very different from those he expects to submit to our attention in the Committee of Ways and Means; and if the hon. gentleman will only take a thought, as another great person was asked to do, and alter his proposals with reference to the duties on inland freight charges, we shall have a very different Budget in the committee from that which he proposed in his speech. But, as I said, it is not my intention to trespass on the attention of the House, with reference to the financial position of the country or the policy of the Administration in this regard, but to avail myself of the constitutional opportunity afforded by this debate, as I announced my intention to do this afternoon, to call the attention of the House to a subject of considerable pressing importance, in respect to which I do not conceive that this House or this country has been treated in the manner in which the Government ought to treat it. I refer to the events which are transpiring at this moment in a portion of the Dominion, and to the action which the Government has taken in reference to those events. The House will recollect that on Monday last I called the attention of the Government to the subject, and invited them to give the House such information as they could upon it. On that occasion the First Minister answered me, giving me as the reason which he understood was assigned for the present condition of things, that some letter or the other was said to have been written, to the effect that Louis Riel was not a British subject. He further stated that certain questions connected with the half-breed claims were in process of settlement, that some of their demands were admitted to be reasonable and that others were very unreasonable; but he informed us that nothing in the nature of a bill of rights had come to the cognisance of the Government. The Winnipeg Field Battery had not been dispatched to the scene of action; but, he said last summer it was deemed prudent to have some additional force near Prince Albert, and Fort Carlton had been occupied with the consent of the Hudson Bay Company, by a considerable force of Mounted Police. I resumed enquiry on the following day. I asked whether the Government had any additional intelligence to communicate to the House, and the hon. gentleman said they had nothing further: To-day we have elicited from him some further information, but not such as, I believe, the occasion justified, or rather demanded. The hon. gentleman has informed us to-day, it having become public in the newspapers, that a portion of the militia force of the country have been enrolled and are in active movement towards the scene of action, and he gave us something of the proximate and something of the remote causes to which he said the disturbance was due. But the hon. gentleman even now did not give us that information which I think it was his duty to have given us, as to what the Government are doing. The newspapers tell us that the general commanding the forces is on his way to, if he has not reached, Winnipeg, in order to take command of the forces which are to be engaged in this movement. I think upon that subject we should have been informed, and I think we ought to have much more and fuller information with reference to the whole causes and circumstances which have preceded this outbreak. I find in the Ministerial organs statements made upon this subject, to which it is worth while to refer. I find in the Mail newspaper, its issue of the 25th inst., a special despatch from the correspondent of that paper at Winnipeg, from which I will read some extracts:

"The half-breeds have, undoubtedly, good grounds for complaining; but they do not intend to resort to physical force, regarding that as utterly out of the question."

Then I find:

"The following orders were issued last night—Military District No. 10.—District orders, 23rd March. Orders having been this day received from headquarters, to hold the Winnipeg Field Battery and 90th Battalion Rifles in readiness for immediate active service, these corps are hereby notified to govern themselves accordingly. The officers commanding the above corps are requested to make the necessary arrangements to have the men under their command ready for embarkation for the North-West Territory at any time that may be arranged on or after the above mentioned day. Military District No. 10, Headquarters of 90th Battalion. The regiment will parade Tuesday evening, 24th inst., etc. Major Jarvis, commanding the Winnipeg Field Battery, issued the following orders at a late hour:—The Winnipeg Field Battery having received orders to prepare for active service, are recruiting up to full strength. They will parade at the drill shed, and so forth."

Now, this is a statement in a telegram from Winnipeg, dated 24th March, and speaking of the orders which had been received from Ottawa, 23rd March; yet the hon. gentleman, when he was invited to give us explanations on the 23rd, vouchsafed to tell us that the Winnipeg Field Battery had not been ordered to proceed to the scene of disturbance, but he told us that the year before the Government thought prudent to occupy Fort Carlton with a force of Mounted Police. Not a word did he say about orders having been issued to the Winnipeg Field Battery to hold themselves in readiness to depart at a moment's notice, or about the 90th Rifles having been called out, and he let the House adjourn on that occasion without giving them any information that such a step had been taken by the Government. The correspondent goes on to say:

"Governor Dewdney, Hudson Bay Company's Commissioner Wrigley, and Lieut.-Col. Houghton held a conference here this afternoon. Mr. Wrigley on being interviewed, said he did not consider there was anything at all alarming in the situation. There had not been one drop of blood shed or a single shot fired. It was true there was what might be called an uprising in Carlton and Battleford, but it appeared to be of periodical occurrence. This time the misguided half-breeds, commanded by the outlaw, Louis Riel, have seized and made prisoners about forty whites, and confined them in a church at St. Laurent. Among the prisoners are (then he quotes the names) * * * * Further reinforcements of police are proceeding to the scene of trouble."

Then the Mail newspaper of the same day, in its editorial article, says:

"That dissatisfaction has existed among the half-breeds in the Saskatchewan country for years past is undeniable. They complain, as we have before explained, that while the Métis of Manitoba were given grants of 240 acres under the Act of 1870, their claims have been ignored; and they say, with equal truth, that the Government should at least give them free patents for the farms which they have been cultivating, and compensation for disturbances in cases where the Dominion surveyors may find it necessary to re-arrange the shape of their holdings, the old French form of delimitation being at variance with the modern system. These claims the Interior Department is trying to adjust, but it takes time to deal with questions affecting the rights of property."

Then the Montreal Gazette, another organ of the Government, on the 26th inst. published a dispatch from Winnipeg in these terms:

"There is little doubt but that the French half-breeds are mustering to bring pressure on the Dominion authorities to redeem grievances that they think have existed in regard to land claims for years, and raids are believed to have been made on stores of both the Hudson's Bay posts and Indian agents and the officials arrested, to be held as hostages for the immediate action of the Federal authorities."

"Not more than 500 of the rebels are armed, but they possess Remington and Winchester rifles, and, from long experience on the plains, are skilled in their use. The Indians have not yet been induced to join the rebels. Pi-a-pot is the only chief of whom the authorities are afraid, as Riel and his agents have been operating with the Indians north of Regina and Qu'Appelle with some success. Poundmaker and Big Bear are 200 miles north-west of the scene of the troubles, and not likely to be induced to rebel. A large number of white settlers are said to be in sympathy with the cause of the trouble, but are not disposed to take up arms, feeling sure that the Dominion Government will at once treat with the settlers and adjust the grievances. Parties who have been on lands for years have been unable, it is claimed, to procure their patents, and speculators and others, who have given fees to persons having influence, have obtained deeds and, in many instances, taken lands over the heads of the first settlers, who improved them for fifteen to eighteen years. This is the real cause of the troubles. The militia authorities are moving with alacrity. The Rifle regiment, 300 strong, under arms for two days, paraded to-night in full force, with the Field Battery and brass band. Five thousand people must have thronged the main street during the parade to the depot, where 125 men of the Rifles, under command of Major Boswell and Captains Ruttan and Clark, embarked for Qu'Appelle, taking ammunition and supplies. They will there await the arrival of the remainder of the battalion, as well as the artillery, who expect to leave on Friday with General Middleton, now en route to Winnipeg."

Then another statement:

"A prominent Catholic clergyman telegraphed last night from Edmonton that the announcement that the Dominion Government had appointed a commission to consider the claims of the half-breeds and investigate the cause of the present troubles was having a very beneficial and pacific effect on the half-breeds. He expressed the opinion that the appointment of the commission would result in an amicable settlement of the difficulty."

And then there is a note:

"No official notice of the appointment of the commission alluded to has been made, so far, at Ottawa."

Then there is this from the Ottawa correspondent of the paper:

"As a precautionary measure, 100 men of the 90th Battalion, Winnipeg, have left that city for Qu'Appelle, when, in case of necessity, they will proceed to the scene of operation."

Then, in to-day's edition of the Government organ in this city, the Citizen, I find a special despatch from Winnipeg, giving in substance the same information as that I have just now read from the Mail newspaper. I observe that the Government newspapers, while they give this account which I have just read of what is occurring, and these statements as to the causes of what is occurring, in their editorial columns complain most grievously of the Opposition newspapers and the course they are taking in reference to this matter, and so I have preferred, in view of the vials of wrath which are being poured down upon these unfortunate newspapers, to draw my information solely from the unimpeachable organs which sustain hon. gentlemen opposite, and which, of course, would be guided by the highest dictates of patriotism, of prudence, of accuracy, and of scrupulous regard to veracity in the statements they make in reference to the conjuncture which has occurred. You will observe that it is stated in these papers that the French half-breeds have had grievances for years; that their patents have not issued, and that influential persons have influenced officials and obtained lands belonging to settlers; that the half-breeds have good grounds of complaint, and that a Government commission has at this convenient season been issued upon the subject. And it is very plain, from what the hon. gentleman told us this afternoon, that, in so far as action is concerned, serious action was decided upon by the Administration, in the way of putting the military forces of the country in motion, on the 23rd, the period at which the hon. gentleman did not think fit to inform this House, which was then in session, and which had invited him to give it information, upon the subject at all. Now, it seems to me that the Government has not done that which it ought to have done in this regard. I say it is a very serious thing that the militia forces of this country should have been obliged to be called out. I am not in the slightest degree condemning the Administration for calling them out, but I say it is a serious and grave occurrence. For, I suppose, nearly two centuries, the law of England has been that, when the militia forces of that country are called out, the Parliament of that country is to be summoned within fourteen days from that date, and that law has been altered in late years, I think in the year 1875, upon the consolidation of the laws regulating the militia, by shortening the period within which Parliament is to be summoned to ten days, which is the present law there. It is obvious that it is regarded as a reasonably serious thing that the militia should be called out, not as we sometimes arrange that the municipal authorities shall call out the militia for purposes of avoiding local riots, but by the authority of the Executive Government, and that the Parliament, the great council of the nation, should be called in such an emergency. Well, Parliament was sitting at this time. The great council of our country was sitting. The Government decided to call out the troops in order to quell this disturbance, and did not think fit to inform us of the fact. On the contrary, being invited to give us information, the hon. gentleman told us they had thought it prudent last year, forsooth, to put 100 men of the Mounted Police in Fort Carlton, but what they had decided upon doing that very day, calling out a battalion and a company of artillery, he did not think fit to tell us anything about. The action of last year was news to us, not very fresh, but still it was news, but what they had done now he did not state. The difficulties are stated by Commissioner Wrigley, in the interview I have read from the columns of the Mail. It is true, he says, there is a disturbance at Carlton and Battleford, but it is one of the periodical disturbances which are always going on there. According to him, that country is in a condition of chronic disturbance, and we know there was some trouble, not with the half-breeds, upon the occasion to which I am about to refer, but with the Indians, during the last summer. The Saskatchewan Herald, of the 26th June, 1884, gives an account of the trouble that then arose with the Indians, which appears to have been for a short time a critical state of affairs. We had, of course, some information from the ordinary sources of public information of trouble brewing in the North-West in this quarter. We were aware from the newspapers of the visit of Louis Riel to those quarters. The newspapers informed us, in the month of July last, that, at the request of some of the inhabitants of those quarters, Riel had gone into the North-West, and then spoke thus:

"Considering, then, that my interests are identical with yours, I accept your very kind invitation, and will go and spend some months amongst you, in the hope that, by petitioning the Government, we will obtain the redress of all our grievances."

The committee say:

"Mr. Riel comes to help us without any pretensions. He hopes that before long the North-West will be quite united, and that the Government will see its way to do what is right towards every class of our people."

At a meeting afterwards held at Prince Albert, at which Riel was the chief speaker, he said:

"He knew that his hearers were laboring under Government difficulties, and urged that they should seek the proper remedy, suggested that instead of petitioning for each of their rights, severally, and struggling for each in turn, they should apply for them all at once. The three districts of Assiniboia, Alberta and Saskatchewan should apply for admission to the Confederation as Provinces, ask for Legislatures of their own, and responsible government, and take all the steps within constitutional limits to secure their rights. If the people were denied some of their rights, they should take all they can gain, without yielding the rest, and they would thus keep in their hands the key needed to open future difficulties."

Then the newspaper from which I have made these quotations, the Globe newspaper, adds:

"There can be no doubt that this invitation of Riel by the half-breeds to return to Canada, resume the leadership of them, and guide their efforts for the redress of the grievances of which they complain, is a serious matter. They declare that their purposes are peaceful, and Riel talks peace. We are willing to believe that they mean what they say. But they must have regarded the grievances of which they complain as very grave indeed, and must almost have despaired of obtaining justice from the Dominion Government by ordinary means, when they resolved to invite the man who led them in rebellion to return to Canada and place himself at their head."

That was the state of things with reference to Riel last summer, and the hon. gentleman has informed us, within a day or two, that the Government thought it so serious that they thought it necessary to obtain the permission of the Hudson's Bay Company to occupy Fort Carlton, which is a defensible post, with 100 men of the Mounted Police, in view of what was then going on. I observe an interview reported in the Globe newspaper, of the 3rd of January last, with Mr. S. E. Chapleau, sheriff of the North-West, a Government official:

"Mr. Chapleau states that Riel has been, to all appearances, very quiet during the summer, but it is well known that he is secretly advising the half-breeds to make a demand upon the Government for compensation for the whole North-West. Riel's argument is, that the whole country belonged to the half-breeds and Indians before the Canadian Government took possession, and that, to extinguish the half-breed claim, a sum equal to 25 cents for every acre of land sold by the Government should be paid to them."

There is the condition of affairs, as far as we are informed. You find it stated in various Government organs that there have been complaints and dissatisfaction amongst the half-breeds for several years. You find it stated by the Mail newspaper, the principal organ of the Government, that these complaints, or some of these complaints and grievances, are well founded and ought to be redressed. You find it apparent that they called upon Louis Riel to come and help them and lead them last summer. You find it apparent that he came. You find it clear that, although he was talking peace, as the newspaper I have quoted says, the situation was somewhat critical. You find the Government recognising that fact in one sense, by taking precautionary steps with reference to the occupation of Fort Carlton, but you find no active step taken, that we can see, to prevent this long-continued condition of dissatisfaction from coming to that head to which it appeared to have been coming. I have looked at the reports of the Minister of the Interior for the last few years, with a view to seeing what their views were. It is almost worth while perhaps to advert to some of these reports, first of all with reference to the claim of those who are actually settled along the river banks in that quarter of the country, and who had taken up their lands according to the French fashion—a long, narrow frontage lot. That claim appears to have been recognised as a reasonable one a long time ago, because I have before me a map of the surveys that have been made under the new system, and in those parts I find cut out of the regular rectangular system of survey, those lots which fronted upon the river. One would almost suppose from some portion of these complaints that that policy had been departed from since. But I am loath to believe it; I do not say it; I should be very glad to have a distinct assurance upon this point; but I can hardly conceive that anything so unreasonable should have been done.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As what?

Mr. BLAKE. As to depart from the policy which was arranged in 1878, of leaving the lands which were actually occupied by these people in long and irregular lots, to be occupied by them, and their titles to be settled according to their occupation practically, instead of insisting upon the rectangular system of survey to the disturbance of their homesteads. I do not charge the Government with having come to this conclusion, because we have no information, but it is one of the things upon which we ought to have information, and if in that there is nothing, then one of the alleged causes of grievances could not have had any effect at all. Now, then, in the year 1881, I find His Excellency informed, in the report of the Department of the Interior, as follows:—

"Your Excellency will be pleased to learn that the white and half-breed population of the Territories have, throughout the past season, enjoyed complete immunity from contagious and epidemic disease, that their crops have been good, that commerce has been brisk, and that altogether they have experienced during the year the inestimable advantages of peace, confidence and prosperity."

Then I come to the report of the next year, and I find it stated:

"The condition of the half-breed population of the Territories, and the claims which have been preferred in their behalf, to be dealt with somewhat similarly to those of the half-breeds of the Red River, have been receiving careful consideration, with a view to meeting them reasonably."

Then, in the year 1883, I find it stated:

"In the Edmonton district, surveys of lands settled on have been completed; and when the report of the surveyors, to whom the duty was entrusted, has been examined and approved in the usual way, the claims of actual settlers at that point will be considered and disposed of."

I find also the report of the Chief Inspector of Surveys, who says:

"A survey has been made of the old settlement at Edmonton. The adjustment suggested of the claims between the settlers seems to have been made to the general satisfaction of the parties concerned."

Then I turn to the report for the year 1884, and I find only one statement, so far as I can see, which bears upon the case, and that is the report of the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West Territory, who says:

"In conclusion, I may state that there is a general contentment throughout the Territories and great confidence in the future. My experience of five years in the Territories has convinced me that there can be no better country for settlers, with even a slight knowledge of farming and a small capital, or where a comfortable home can be secured at so small a cost and in so short a time."

Then we come to the year 1885. The report for the year 1884 is presented for this year of 1885, in which the same reference is made to the claims of the old settlers:

"At the time the offices of Deputy Head and Surveyor-General were separated, and Mr. Lindsay Russell was charged with the duties appertaining to the latter position, it was provided that he should also investigate and settle the claims to land by virtue of long occupations advanced by the old settlers along the North Saskatchewan. When it was found that Mr. Russell's health did not admit of his visiting the settlements, an Order in Council was passed remitting this portion of his work to the Land Board. Accordingly, early in the year, Mr. Pearce went to Prince Albert, and from thence to Battleford, Edmonton and St. Albert, and made a careful personal enquiry into all the claims of this class at those places, with the result that all, with one or two exceptions, at Battleford and Edmonton, have been finally and satisfactorily disposed of. The only claims of old settlers remaining unsettled are at Lac la Biche, Victoria and Battle River. The necessary investigation at the two latter places will be made early next spring, but the claims at Lac la Biche cannot be properly adjusted until the surveys reach that point."

Then, turning to the report from the Dominion Land Commissioner of the Saskatchewan claims I find:

"The question of the claims of old settlers on the Saskatchewan is one of long standing; but, with the exception of the claims in the immediate vicinity of Prince Albert, nothing could be done in the matter until the surveys were completed. These surveys were not finished until this summer, and could not have been completed at an earlier date; for, had these been prosecuted in any other way than the one adopted, it would have been at a great sacrifice of both accuracy and economy."

"Very full reports accompanied the evidence forwarded to the Minister so soon as the investigations were completed. The claims at Prince Albert have been finally disposed of. Those at the other points may reasonably be expected to be settled within a few weeks."

"The most liberal construction possible under the circumstances was put upon all the claims; and, judging by the result at Prince Albert, it is confidently anticipated that the percentage of claimants who will be dissatisfied therewith will be very small—probably not 5 per cent.—and of these more than one-half will be only on the grounds that their claims have not had as liberal treatment as the claims of others. It may be said of these claimants—upwards of seven hundred in number—that, as a class, the 'land shark' formed a very small number."

"The difficulty in obtaining explicit evidence has been referred to in the special reports; and in this it need only be mentioned that this difficulty did not arise from unwillingness, but from inability."

"It is somewhat remarkable that, out of the large number of cases investigated, but few were advanced through a residence on and peaceable possession of the land on the 15th July, 1870; the only points at which such were preferred being Prince Albert and St. Albert—some half dozen at the former, and about forty at the latter. This would go to demonstrate that it has been only within the past few years that any idea of making a livelihood by husbandry has occurred to the inhabitants of the district; and, when this fact is considered, the progress they have made is really wonderful."

Now, these are all the statements which I have been able to find bearing on this subject, with the exception of one, and that is an allusion, in a report two or three years ago, in reference to the claims to be treated in a manner analagous to that which was accorded to the half-breeds of Manitoba—one slight allusion to that subject; and it is the only allusion that you find in these reports. But you find a statement that a process of adjustment, slow indeed, procrastinating, has been going on with reference to those in actual occupation; and as to the other part, it is going to be considered with a view to reasonable treatment being administered. Now, Sir, it does appear to me that it was the duty of the Government long ago to have disposed of these questions. It seems to me that they have been complicated, and the difficulties have been enhanced by a systematic delay or neglect of their treatment; and that only after the statements which I have read, after the statements from the Government organs; which admitted a chronic state of dissatisfaction to have existed in that country for years, which also admitted territorial grounds for that state of dissatisfaction—the one circumstance was added that Louis Riel had been asked to go into the country. But when the Government felt that the situation was so serious that it was necessary to act in some way or other in order to preserve the peace by the occupation of Fort Carleton, whatever impressed it on their minds as a thing still more essential—and I admit that it was essential; I admit that their prime duty was to see that the forces at their disposal were so placed as to be enabled to the utmost to preserve the peace—I say it was their prime duty to have addressed themselves to the removal of these causes of discontent, to have addressed themselves to such measures as would prevent this festering sore from festering still further, and this outbreak from taking place. Force is no remedy there any more than elsewhere. But what they did was to appeal to force, to put 100 men of the mounted police into Fort Carleton, and we hear that they did nothing more. We did not hear of the situation being grave, of any difficulty existing. The report speaks of nothing but peace, prosperity and contentment, and they tell us in those reports, this year, in respect to the only claims which they admit at all, which they think worth mentioning in the reports, that they are almost all settled, and settled in a manner eminently satisfactory. From outside, I hear a report that a very considerable number of persons, insignificant indeed, compared with the armed forces which are advancing to meet them, but a considerable number of persons, with their families, settled within a recent period on lands which belong to some colonisation company, or which had been assigned to some colonisation company, which had not been surveyed and which the colonisation company would not take possession of because they had not been surveyed. And there has been a difficulty going on for some time past, the colonisation company calling on the Government to give them their lands after being surveyed, because since then they have been surveyed, and the Government declining to exercise their powers of ejection, whatever they may be, over settlers on those lands—I say a difficulty existed. I have no doubt whatever that there is correspondence upon this subject, that there are reports on this subject; and I cannot conceive, with the hoards and hosts of officials, from the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West down, with the inspector of colonisation companies, with the commissioners and assistant commissioners in the North-West, that the Government has not demanded or, even without demand, has not received reports from time to time, informing them as to what the condition of the country was, as to what the nature of the feeling was, of what the difficulty was which grew up and culminated in this disturbance. Now, Mr. Speaker, that the Government should have allowed this matter to get to this head, having had a warning when Riel came into that country last summer, having accepted the warning by putting in a force within striking distance, as the hon. gentleman says, of the scene of action—that the Government did not take intelligent and well-concerted measures to remove the causes of grievance, whatever they may be, is, in my opinion, an act worthy of very general condemnation. It certainly demands explanation at the hands of the Government to this House, because they could not have inflicted a more serious blow upon our prospects in the North-West than they have done by permitting this outbreak to get to this head. I do not care what its proportions are; I trust they are as insignificant as some of the newspapers tell us they are. I have not ventured myself to estimate them. I have given the account which the Ministerial organs give of them, and that alone. That they are considered important is shown by the fact that you have a force of some 580 armed men, of whom 190 are mounted, and half a battery of artillery in full array marching toward the scene of action, with General Middleton, commanding the forces of Canada, as we are informed by the newspapers, on his way to join those forces and see that everything is well and rightly done. I say that the circumstance that the Government should have thought this of sufficient importance to demand such a demonstration in force and such action as this, is, of itself, though I do not, in the least degree, blame the Government for calling out the troops, although they may have acted in the wisest manner, is, of itself, an unfortunate event. It is an unfortunate circumstance, because it will be made to appear that this affair, slight though it may be, is yet serious enough to call out this action and this display of force, and the opinions of people outside, in which their good opinion as to the peace, the order, the contentment, the prosperity, the good administration, the safety, the security and the harmony in which we dwell, which is important to us at this junction, and particularly with respect to this locality, will be rudely shaken by the occurrence of the last few days. I say that hon. gentlemen opposite, having found it necessary to take this action, ought to have informed us; and they ought to have informed us fully of the action they deemed it necessary to take. When the hon. gentleman was asked, and even without his being asked, what was being done on the 23rd, we should have known then that the Government had decided that the field battery and battalion should be called out; we should have known that they had taken this step. Although hon. gentlemen were asked, we were not told it. It is hardly possible that the decision should have been reached after the session of the House, and at a late hour; but if the information given at an earlier hour became incorrect by change of events at a subsequent time, before the House adjourned, the information should have been given us and an opportunity afforded of deciding as to the exact condition of affairs, so far as the Government knew it. But the Government seems to have treated this question with apathy and neglect. What force there is in the accusation, launched at them by their most devoted partisans through the columns of the public press, that the lands of the settlers have been patented for favorites and supporters, through bribes given to officials, I cannot say; I do not know. It is not their enemies who have said this but their own familiar friends, their influential, their patriotic, their subsidised organs. However that may be, we know they have been very active in the North-West; so active, that with other things they have not had time to attend to this one. The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson), the other day, caused a large bundle of documents to be laid on the Table of the House; and it was not the only package which the hon. gentleman can cause to be laid on the Table, because there is another and a still larger bundle of similar documents on a similar subject. He can find thousands of applications for timber limits and grants of land in the North-West. He can find influential members of Parliament, influential partisans of the Government outside of Parliament, influential members from all quarters of the Dominion who have made application; he can find that there was the carcass at which the eagles that follow in the wake of the Government were gathered together; and I suppose the effort to organise those various applications to suit and please everybody, that everybody and his son-in-law or daughter-in-law, or his friend, or his ally, should have a suitable timber limit, or mine, or location of some kind, was perhaps enough to exhaust the energies of hon. gentlemen opposite, and leave them little time to deal, in the course of the seven or eight years during which the claims have been pending with them, until they have reached this head. I say it is most unfortunate that this question was not dealt with. What is done now? The hon. gentleman says, forsooth, that he has issued a commission. I asked, When? The hon. gentleman said that one of the commissioners selected was selected some time ago, but he resigned. Perhaps he did not want to go into that quarter just then, so he said another has been selected. I asked, When? He replied, the other day. I suppose that means the day before yesterday. It means as soon as the row broke out, when the militia was called out, when the trouble had come. The hon. gentleman then thought it worth while to issue a commission to investigate the new and fresh grievances of the half-breeds of the North-West, which he had not been able to glance at for a long time; and he hopes, with the assistance of the cavalry, of the foot guards, of the artillery, of the militia-men, and of General Middleton on the one hand, and the olive branch, to be borne by his commissioners on the other, he may get himself out of the scrape. I am sure I hope he will; but without serious damage having resulted to the country, by having allowed this matter to go so long and so far, and reach this point, without taking the proper steps, that, I regret to say, is absolutely impossible. Now, we have a peculiar anxiety to know what the hon. gentleman is going to do on this occasion, having regard to the personnel involved in this transaction. What will he do with Louis Riel?

An hon. MEMBER. Catch him.

Mr. BLAKE. Some years ago the hon. gentleman announced in the town of Peterborough that "he wished to God he could catch Louis Riel." Riel was at that time out of the country; and the hon. gentleman inveighed against me as being the cause of his being unable to gratify that fervent prayer to his Maker, that patriotic aspiration for his country, because, forsooth, with the almost unanimous assent of the Legislature of Ontario, I had caused to be issued a proclamation, offering a reward for the arrest and trial of the same Louis Riel. He said by issuing that proclamation I had forced him across the line, where, in safety and comfort and security, he could plot against the peace of Canada; and the patriotic cheers of his Tory friends greeted the hon. gentleman's fervent prayer that he wished to God he might catch him, and those patriotic cheers were redoubled when they found that it was due to the malign influence of the humble individual who now addresses you, by offering a reward for Louis Riel, that he had crossed the border, and that the hon. gentleman's fervent prayer could not be realised. A little while afterwards, in the course of some investigations which went on here, a right reverend prelate informed us—and he brought the letters to prove it—that the hon. gentleman had appointed him a special commissioner to arrange with Louis Riel to leave the country; that he had handed him out of the secret service money $1,000, to pay his expenses when he was out of the country; and that it was at the hon. gentleman's own instance, at the hon. gentleman's own request, with the public moneys of this country, supplied by the hon. gentleman for the purpose, that Riel was induced to leave Canada and remain in the foreign country to which, he said, Louis Riel had been driven by me, and where, he said, wrongly driven by me, he was plotting in peace, and safety, and security, against the country. Under these circumstances, it is extremely desirable that we should know, what will he do with him? What is the hon. gentleman going to do with Louis Riel on this occasion? He told us with—I was going to say naïveté—but that word would hardly be applicable to the hon. gentleman—this afternoon, that he had received a sort of intimation, that Riel had actually expressed a sort of an idea that if he got a sum of money out of the public treasury he would not disturb them any more. Of course, the hon. gentleman said that was impossible—for the second time such a thing was impossible. Why should he think so? Where did Riel learn the lesson? Who taught him it paid to kick up a row here, that he might get an Archbishop to negotiate for the public money of Canada to console him? It was from the hon. gentleman he learned the lesson which he was endeavoring to repeat this year, but which, the hon. gentleman forcibly says, could not be thought of on this occasion—I suppose from the fact that no secret service money was available. There is yet another policy which may be adopted. The hon. gentleman may catch him, or he might bribe him to go away, or he might do what one of his most influential organs suggests he—no, not he, might do, for we know that these things are never done by persons in authority, but a little bird suggests them, and they get done some how or other. Here is the suggestion :

“ But one thing is clear, namely, that when Riel is captured he ought to be strung up on the first convenient tree, without ceremony.”

Now, that is a sort of sanguinary mode of dealing with the question—a summary method of punishment. Where do I find it? Why, I find it in the Montreal Gazette—in the special correspondence from Ottawa, of the Montreal Gazette, of the 23rd of March. Now, is that the policy of the Government? Is it to be understood—indicated as this is by the Montreal Gazette, by its special correspondent at Ottawa, where the Government is, and where the correspondent is, and where the principal proprietor is, and where are the sources from which it draws its wealth and means—I say is it to be understood that the policy of the Government is to establish lynch law, and string up Louis Riel to a tree, in short order? We have a variety of policies. We have the two policies of the hon. gentleman to which I referred, and now we have the Montreal Gazette policy; and really under the circumstances we are pardonably anxious to know what he will do about it. I say it is our duty to vindicate the national authority which has been outraged, to restore the peace which has been disturbed—decidedly, but if it be at all possible, without the shedding of one drop of blood. I say that that done, the course of law should be pursued, the course of law and justice should be pursued in the regular course of law and order; and I regret extremely that in the columns of an influential Canadian newspaper a suggestion so disgraceful as that this act should be committed should have appeared. But there is more to do than that. There is more to do than vindicate the national authority and vindicate the course of justice and law. There is the redress of whatever grievances may exist—those grievances which are said by the Government organs to be substantial—those grievances which existed for a long time, and which the issuance of this commission indicates must have existed. There is another thing which is to be done; for us more is to be done. We ought to receive full information; we ought to have that information which will enable us to know where the responsibility has to be fixed for the delays, for the apathy, for the procrastination, for the neglect, for the want of proper regard and apprehension of the situation, the want of proper decision and fair dealing in the administration of power which have resulted in the present state of things. We want full information upon it. There must be information in the records of the Government. They must have in their offices reports on this subject. If they do not know, if their officers in that country have not reported, we want to know it. We want to know what they are doing with a Lieutenant-Governor there, and other officials, who have not been able to find out that this case has not been serious. But there must be some information; because the hon. gentleman told us, the other day, that he thought it prudent to fortify Fort Carlton and throw a force of men into it, so that there must have been news justifying such a course as long ago as last summer. Why was not a commission issued then, since it had been found that this disturber of the peace was in the country and remained there? Why were not the steps which are now regarded as fit to be taken for a peaceable solution of the difficulty not then taken? We want full and immediate information of every description, which may enable us to ascertain what these grievances are, and of how long standing they are; what steps have been taken towards redressing them; what information the Government has asked from its officers, from time to time, to appreciate the situation; what information has from time to time been received, with a view of dealing with the situation; what the hon. gentleman has learned last summer; what he did last summer, besides throwing the police into Fort Carlton; and, in a word, we want to know how it comes that a long-standing condition of grievances and dissatisfaction, notorious, at any rate, for a very considerable time, has resulted in the questionable step of last year, of calling on this man to come to the country, with a view to advise—has resulted in the prudential action of the Government last year—how it is that no effectual step was taken to do that which ought to have been done—to convince those people, by all methods of appealing to their reason, their justice, and their consideration, that they were to be dealt with promptly, by removing the causes of dissatisfaction, and thus avoiding the painful condition we are now in, and the difficulty under which we must inevitably labor, no matter how this occasion may end; and I am sure there is a unanimous feeling and hope on the part of every man in this House that it may end very well indeed, and that the precautions the Government have taken may be in excess of the occasion. But I maintain that Parliament would be wanting in its duty if it did not insist on having that information early and immediately, and I maintain that the Government has been wanting in its duty in not granting that information early and immediately, and enabling us to judge. I do not censure; I point out where I conceive the conduct of the Government to require explanation; but the grounds of judgment, either of acquittal or condemnation, ought to be laid before Parliament, and ought to be laid before Parliament at once; and to that end I move, in amendment thereto, to leave out all the words after “that,” and insert the following instead thereof:

“ In the opinion of this House, it is the duty of the Government forthwith to lay before this House the fullest information on the subject of the claims and alleged grievances of the inhabitants of Prince Albert, North-West Territories, and the neighborhood, and of the action of the Government and its officers thereon; and of their action in reference to the movement of last summer, and in reference to the present disturbances.”

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman concluded his speech by saying that he hoped this thing would end well—that it was the wish of every man in this House and every man in the country that it should end well. All I can say, Sir, is that if it does not end well, some of the responsibility will rest upon the hon. gentleman himself. I deeply regret that a man holding the responsible position of the hon. gentleman, once having been a member of a Government, and once having been responsible for the government of that country, should take this opportunity—when men are in armed insurrection, so far as we know, against the authorities of the land; when we do not know whether they may be assisted or not by the savages of the plains—to make a speech for the purpose of attacking the Government, reckless of the consequences, reckless of the knowledge that every word he uses will not only be truly repeated, but will be falsely exaggerated all over the world. It will be read by the Métis from the Rocky Mountains to Winnipeg, that the hon. gentleman has assumed that the Government has been wrong—that he has assumed that there has been delay, neglect, and all the rest of it—that they are oppressed and wronged, and driven to desperation, by the wrong-doing of the Government, by the wilful apathy, the wilful delay, and the corrupt delay of the Government, in preferring to help speculators and friends and influential members of Parliament to settling the wrongs of the Métis. This is the statement that will go abroad, coming from the hon. gentleman; and if they have any encouragement to renew there an exhibition of that spirit, which I believe at this moment is depressed, it will be owing to the statements made at this time by the hon. gentleman, not thinking of his responsibility—careless, rather, of his responsibility—and for the sake of making what he considers a clever speech;—risking the continuance of the peace of this country, risking the chance of an immediate suppression of this insurrection—if it can be dignified by that name—all for the miserable and unstatesmanlike desire of having a little attack on the Government. I have heard that hon. gentleman make many lugubrious speeches; but I have never heard him make a speech in which such an utter want of patriotism, such a mere factious spirit, was displayed as in this. The hon. gentleman says we ought to have given information on the 23rd that the militia were called out. I tell the hon. gentleman that the militia were not called out then, and I could not have given that information without stating what was untrue. The fact of the matter was this: Taking time by the forelock, after having shown, not apathy or neglect, but as a military man told me to-day, having shown extraordinary quickness in making all precautionary arrangements, my hon. friend, the Minister of Militia, sent a telegram on that day to ask if there was any want of militia, how many men the militia force could supply. That was the message he sent on that day, and therefore we could not communicate to this House what was not in existence. But if we had called out the militia, I say it was not our duty to inform this House. It was not our duty to spread wide, as the hon. gentleman has done to-day, the fact that there were men wild and foolish and desperate enough to take arms, or to pretend to take arms, against the Crown, or against the authorities of the country. It was our duty to localise and minimise the occasion there. It was our duty to put down this riot—for it is little more—without alarming the country, without alarming the timid people in that country, without alarming the expectant immigrants who are coming to this country. It was our duty to put it down as quietly and peaceably as possible, to neglect no precaution or care, to be fully armed in any case, so that if, contrary to our expectation, it, contrary to our belief, if, contrary to our hope, it should turn out to be a serious thing, if instead of being a riot, it should rise to the dignity of an insurrection, we were not to be found wanting. But it was arranged to keep this matter quiet. We had quietly collected our forces and made the arrangements, and we know and believe that if the trouble be merely confined to the Métis, it will be localised. Mr. Speaker, instead of the Government being justly subject to the attack for the manner in which that country has been governed, I say, if there is one thing which Canada ought to be more proud of than another, it is the peace, the quiet, and the order that have existed in the North-West ever since the successful result of the Red River expedition under General Wolseley. Sir, since that time there has been rising after rising in the United States, although they had their whole frontier lined with soldiery, 25,000 men, or nearly so, watching the western frontier and the northern frontier. There they had continued trouble; we heard of Indians being shot down like dogs; we heard of cruelties and outrages committed upon the aborigines. Sir, there has not been one single blow struck in anger in our North-West, until this thing happened the other day; with a small force of 300, and latterly 500 men—and I say that force is insufficient for the enormous duty it has to perform—peace has been preserved from one end of the country to the other. The Ontario and Quebec farmer has gone up and settled there with just as full a feeling of security and safety as if he were settling in Muskoka, or away up on the River Desert. We had no right to expect, at the time we assumed the responsibility of governing that country, that we would have been so uniformly successful in governing it in peace and quiet as we have been. You must recollect that country is occupied by savages, or semi-savages, by men who are now driven to desperation through the disappearance of their only means of procuring food; and hungry men are desperate, starving men are ready to grasp at anything, ready to charge those in power with being the cause of their starvation. Look back at the Hansard for the last three or four years, and you will find that when I came forward here, in my capacity as Minister of the Interior, and asked for votes to support these poor people, we were taunted across the floor with our extravagance. I stated then we were obliged to ask for these votes; I stated that as christian men we could not afford to let these poor people starve; I stated that the buffalo had disappeared, that the game they depended on for support had disappeared; they were surrounded by whites; all their old opportunities of support were taken away; they were crowded out of their country—and yet we were told, again and again, and I appeal to hon. members if they did not hear the taunts of hon. gentlemen opposite, about the increased, lavish expenditure of this extravagant Government in the North-West; that we were wasting the means of the white people of the five or six Provinces in that insatiable gulf, the North-West. We have succeeded; we have kept that country quiet; and when Louis Riel was sent for last summer, he was sent for by these poor people, suffering from hunger; because, while we went to a large expenditure in keeping them, we did not give them such a quantity of food as would make them hang around the different stations and become habitual beggars. We kept them on short rations, on short allowances, and we tried to force them—I am speaking now of the Indians—and we have forced them upon their reserves; by slow degrees we are introducing among them habits of cultivation. Well, the Métis are, as you know, half Indian; they have many of the characteristics of the Indians, especially the Métis of the plain. Those who are in Manitoba and in some of the settlements have become, to a certain degree, like the Indians in the older Provinces; they have become agriculturists; they have taken to agricultural pursuits; but the nomads are just as wild in their habits, as irregular in their conduct, and as impulsive in their actions as their full-blooded red brethren. The hon. gentleman says there has been procrastination and delay. If there is one thing more than another on which I think the Department of Indian Affairs can plume itself, it is upon its treatment of the aborigines and its treatment of the half-breeds, in settling all their claims peacefully and quietly. The hon. gentleman will not deny that the Métis in Manitoba proper have been carefully attended to; he will not deny that the Indians there and that the half-breeds there are satisfied. Although I say it is an improper thing; although I say it was an unjust thing, it was an inopportune thing for the hon. gentleman to foist a discussion on the land policy of the Government at this time, yet I will say this, that the course taken towards the Métis has been kind, paternal, and in every way for the purpose of forwarding their best interests. The hon. gentleman asked the question, whether the new system of surveying had not been introduced with respect to the old settlement along the North and South Saskatchewan. In accordance with the principle of the surveyors, the surveyors had commenced and had decided to carry out that principle of laying out all the lines under the normal practice of surveying that has been laid down in the Dominion Land Act; but while that was being done, it was not for the purpose of depriving any man, woman or child of land they had a title to, by possession or otherwise; it was not that they had the remotest idea of taking possession of it. Only, the regular piece of land would be so much in one quarter, so much in another, and so much in another. That was the original arrangement made by the Surveyor-General, and it naturally raised the suspicion, as you can quite understand, among the half-breeds, that they were going to be forced out of their irregular tracts of which they were in possession, and would be compelled to take square blocks. The moment that was brought to the notice of the Department it was altered; and the half-breeds were informed they would keep and get their lands according to their custom. They have got their lands; many of the lots are settled; and of those that are not settled, the majority are fraudulent claims, made by Métis who got their 240 acres as Manitoba half-breeds, and then went out to the plains, having squandered the value of the scrip of the land they got in Manitoba, saying: One Métis looks like another; the Government will never know it; and they claimed the land again. The cause of the delay was that the Government tried to prevent these frauds being practised, that they tried to prevent the man who got his 240 acres in Manitoba from getting 240 more on the plains, and after that, asking for 160 more as a settler under the homestead right. That has been the cause of all the delay; and many of the claims have been settled. When the hon. gentleman speaks about a commission having been issued the other day, I may tell him that we have had official after official examining and settling those claims, and it is only the residuum of those claims that have not been settled. Mr. Pearce, for instance, who was Inspector of Dominion Lands, and is a very efficient officer, was appointed to examine into these claims, but the Métis thought that he did not adopt towards them a sufficiently conciliatory manner, and this to a certain extent interfered with the success of his mission. He, however, settled many of those claims in a most benevolent manner, if I may use the expression, towards these people. Mr. Duck also settled a large number of claims in the immediate vicinity of Duck Lake, where these people have taken the law into their own hands; and it was only to wind up the matter that some months ago it was decided to send a commission up there in the spring—we could not well send it in the middle of winter—for the purpose of settling up and winding up the final claims. In the meantime not one of those half-breeds has been disturbed; more than that, they have been personally assured that their possession was just as good as if they had the deeds in their pockets; but, mind you, these men are quarreling among themselves, just as white speculators do, when they try to jump each other's claims; and it is to settle the residuum of these claims this commission has been appointed. We asked some time ago, but we could not get, the gentleman we wanted to go. We wanted to press him; he accepted at first, but found his health would not allow him to go; and I will mention the names of the chief commissioners who are appointed to wind up the troublesome claims, the litigated claims, in which these people are disagreeing amongst themselves. Mr. Street, a lawyer at London, whom everybody knows, a man of the highest position as a man of honor and a professional man; Mr. Goulin, who is on the spot, a half-breed himself; and Mr. Forget, a very able man, a French Canadian, who has been there for many years, and is the clerk of the Council of the North-West. These three men have been appointed to go up on the spot and sit judicially, and settle the quarrels, not only the claims against the Government, but the quarrels and the contradictory and conflicting claims of the Métis themselves. That is the course taken by the Government, and I ask the House if there could be any other course, if there could be any more proper course adopted, than has been taken by the Government—first, to assure the people, from door to door, that their rights would be respected, that not an acre would be taken from them, that their possession was as good as a deed. But, oh, says the hon. gentleman, there has been apathy in this matter; these people have been driven to desperation; these people would not have sent for Riel if the sense of injustice, if the denial of justice, had not forced them to take this extraordinary step. If the hon. gentleman waits until the Indian or the half-breed ceases to grumble, he will have to wait till the day of doom. They always grumble. If you give an Indian four pounds of pork, and it is two pounds more than he is entitled to, he will grumble because he does not get six; and the half-breed has all the acquisitiveness of the Indian, and the strong desire to press his claims of the white man. But the hon. gentleman rests his attacks upon what he calls the organs of the Government, and it is in this Parliament and at this time, with men in arms against us, that he sees fit to quote the organs of the Government, the Montreal Gazette and the Mail, and the Ottawa Citizen, as speaking for the Government. Mr. Speaker, the Government speaks for itself. I have heard the hon. gentleman, when he sat on this side of the House, indignantly deny that he would be responsible for the Globe, or for any of the papers that usually supported his party. Fancy Sir Stafford Northcote getting up just now and reading the Standard or the Morning Post as a charge to be brought against Mr. Gladstone or Mr. Gladstone's Government. In the first place, he would not be allowed to read the newspaper; and, in the next, he would neither have the want of patriotism nor the want of taste to do it. But, Mr. Speaker, lo, and behold, according to the old law of England, whenever the militia is called out Parliament must be summoned. That has disappeared to a great extent, and the reason for the original rule has altogether gone. We all remember that, in those days, when the kings of England not only reigned but governed, there was a permanent standing fight between the House of Commons and the Crown, as to who should command the militia. There was always a jealousy against the standing army, because the Crown had the clear right and the only right to command the standing armies, but the militia force was a citizen soldiery, they were under the command and control of Parliament, and the Government could not call them out. They were under the complete check of the House of Commons. Read the contests that were fought with the Crown from the time of Charles I. upwards, as to who should have the control of the trained bands, the Crown or the people. The people gained it, and, with their usual conservatism, they held to that principle that the militia should not be summoned in any way except with the command, with the sanction, with the immediate knowledge of the representatives of the people. But that was because there was a danger that the citizen soldiery might be used as the army of a despot to crush the, at that time, infant liberties of England. Here we have no such fear; our militiamen are the same as ourselves. We are all militiamen. I am not very sure, but I suppose that, at my age, I am in the reserved rank, and that I cannot be called out, even to put down Louis Riel. The hon. gentleman is, fortunately for himself, not over the age, and he may be drawn. I wonder, if he is called out to put down Louis Riel, if he will say: It is unconstitutional; Parliament must be called and Parliament must meet; I won't go; when Parliament is consulted, and after three or four votes of censure and want of confidence, perhaps Parliament may say that the riot has become a rebellion, and then constitutionally we will go and kill a great many thousand half-breeds and lose a great many people of our own; but we will, at all events, back up the constitution. So strange is the utter want of fear of the militia in this country, or rather, to use the hon. gentleman's phrase, the apathy of the people when such an attempt, such an atrocious attempt against their liberties is made by this Government as calling out the militia, that Parliament has actually handed over the right to call out the militiamen to any two justices of the peace; the mayor of a town and a couple of magistrates—I forget exactly the provisions of the Act—can call them out and crush an incipient rebellion, and I think that, if the warden of a county or the mayor of a town or incorporated village, or two councillors can exercise that power, in order to keep the peace, Her Majesty's Government can do it. But we are to be considered guilty of a great breach of the liberties of the subject because we did not consult Parliament, because we did not make a low bow and explain the whole thing. We did not want to explain the thing. We do not want to explain it until it is over. First let it be put down, let the law be vindicated, let the insurrection be suppressed, and then let the gentleman bring as many votes as he likes, as many charges as he likes, but let him not appeal to the organs of the press. And, by the same token, he reads a number of sensational despatches going to these different newspapers, as if they were true, as if the Government were responsible for them. I suppose, if the Government is responsible for the newspaper, then it is responsible for every sensational piece of information that comes to it from any source over the wires. That is the hon. gentleman's style. What do you think, Mr. Speaker? I take it that all these rumors come from Winnipeg. Winnipeg, for all practical purposes, is not so far from the scene of action as we are. We get the news as quickly as they do; but, of course, from the fact that the Métis and the Indians are nearer to them, they are more interested than we are; and, like all persons specially interested, they are timid, they are nervous; one man frightens another; the story goes that there are fifteen policemen killed, that the stores have been sacked, that Fort Carlton has fallen; and all these come from Winnipeg. We all know how it is with correspondents, especially the man that handles the wires; when he has a sensational story on one hand and the truth on the other, I rather think that he will neglect the true and prefer to send the sensational story. And this is the foundation, the sole foundation, on which the leader of Her Majesty's Opposition gets up a story here for the purpose of its going home—not for the purpose—God forbid I should say so—but it will have the effect of going to England, and of enabling the enemies of Canada, of enabling those who try to stop emigration to Canada, those who try to discredit us, who try to prevent our great railways from getting credit in England, to accomplish their purpose, if that were possible. It will go, Mr. Speaker. I got a cablegram from Sir Charles Tupper, wanting to know about it—he had heard of it himself—and he wanted to know if it was the case. Of course it came from St. Paul and Minneapolis, from some of the American railways, and from New York. He said he had heard that three Indian chiefs had joined Riel, and that he had a thousand men under his command. That was the telegram published in England. But the hon. gentleman spoke and cited these sensational paragraphs. His speech will go to England, and it will get an importance, Mr. Speaker, which it would not otherwise have obtained. But the hon. gentleman says: Oh! we must have been frightened ourselves, because we took possession of Fort Carlton, and sent 100 men up there during last year. Well, Sir, we did not take Fort Carlton in the first place; and, in the second place, we did not send 100 men. We have our police force moving from one part to the other. I suppose that the most active army of Uhlans, during the French and German war, or of Cossacks, never have moved so continuously and so speedily and successfully as that small body of men over that immense country. Well, Sir, before Riel came in these settlers had never sent in a Bill of Rights to us, never sent any complaints to the Government. We saw in the papers, in the same way, I suppose, that he has seen these sensational despatches—we saw that Riel had arrived there, and was asking for everything. The grievances that have been spoken about in reference to their lands were never scarcely noticed by them in comparison to other things. Riel came in there. As the hon. gentleman says, he made his profit out of it before, and he came in there again, perhaps driven to poverty and starvation by bad habits and ill-luck. He had too readily listened to the invitation of the poor, starving people, the Métis, in the vicinity of Duck Lake. He came there for his own purpose. He had excited them, and made them believe he was a sort of El Mahdi. He had led them in the great war—unfortunately, but the unfortunate chief has always had the sentiment of the people with him, like the unfortunate Bourbon, La Roche Jaquelein, or Charles the Pretender; it is the unfortunate man that has the popular sentiment with him. He came in there and appealed to the sympathies of the half-educated or uneducated men. Mr. Speaker, the policemen were moved to the barracks at Prince Albert, which were held by a very few men, and in order to have additional reinforcements. The fort then stationed at Carlton was empty; the Hudson Bay people were not using it, and we asked them if we could send men there. They told us at once that we might have it as long as we liked, and we sent fifty men. We had 100 men at Regina, and fifty at Fort MacLeod, from whom they were drawn. There was no great force there; we were just quietly keeping the men there, without anybody knowing anything about it, or exciting observation, in order to be ready should there be an unfortunate outcome from this man's want of loyalty, and the other men's want of common sense in listening to him. Now, Mr. Speaker, I say that the complaint of these people, as published and as alluded to by the hon. gentleman, has very little reference to this land question. This land question is a bagatelle compared with their other complaints. There are a very few things unsettled, and they will be easily settled. There are points which are not yet settled, but these men will not be dispossessed. When the boundaries are settled and all their quarrels with their neighbors are arranged, they will get their patents fully, that they have a right to. But the hon. gentleman went over their "grievances"; he rolled that word under his tongue as a sweet morsel—the "grievances" of these people; their "just claims" denied. But I say there have been no just claims denied. Every just claim has been acknowledged. The most of those just claims have been settled, and those that are not settled will be settled as soon as it can be ascertained beyond doubt that fraud is not being practised upon the people. What interest can this Government, or any Government—the hon. gentleman's Government, if it were in power—have in keeping up a grievance? It can do no Government any good. It would be much easier for us to give everything to anybody that asks it. There would be no grievances if we gave away everything. But we are guardians of the public property; we are bound by oath to see that, in the performance of our duties, the Crown, that is to say the people, shall not be defrauded of an acre of land by unjust claims; they are bound to protect the public Treasury, to protect the money of the public, and their money's worth, whether in land or goods. That is what we are doing, that is what we will do, what we will continue to do, notwithstanding the inopportune, the unpatriotic attempt of the Opposition to assail us. But the hon. gentleman must lug in something about colonisation companies; that he heard the colonisation companies were not using the people right. What had that to do with this question of Riel's rights? What had that to do with the claims of the Métis? But the hon. gentleman's organised claqueurs behind him clap him on in everything. Any stick is good enough to hit the Government with, and so he lugs in the colonisation companies, some claims made against the Métis. What in the world had that to do with the Métis? It was brought in, and it shows the spirit with which the hon. gentleman is actuated and guided in the whole of this business. But the hon. gentleman wants to know what we will do with Riel. Why, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman offered $5,000 to try and catch him, and he did it with the same object with which he makes this speech to-day. The man who was shot, Thomas Scott, was of Irish origin. The French Canadians from Lower Canada stood like a wall behind Sir George E. Cartier and myself. He could not gain them, and so he tried to gain the Irish. Who, then, was so strong a patriot as he? How loud-mouthed was he in regard to this Irishman, one of his own countrymen, and one of his own faith: $5,000 was offered for this traitor and murderer, and it never was paid. Riel came down to Ottawa and took the oath as a good and loyal subject of Her Majesty; and he had a right to come and take his seat. But I do not think the present Government countenanced Riel. I think it was not this Government that brought him here. But I had made a speech, it appears, at Peterboro', saying that I wished to God we could catch Riel. There never was a prayer more sincerely offered than that which I uttered at that time. If we had got Riel then, he would have been brought and tried in the Province of Ontario or in Quebec. We have got a special statute, under which such criminals can be tried, and he would have been tried and found guilty. But he could not be tried were the jury was particeps criminis, his fellow soldiers who had fought under him; if he had been brought down here we would have got a conviction against him, and the consequence of conviction would have followed. I was, therefore, very anxious to catch him. But the hon. gentleman made unwittingly a misstatement of the facts, when he said that we asked Archbishop Taché to bribe him to leave the country. That was not the case. We tried to arrest him, and the hon. gentleman sought to help us by offering the reward. But it was offered so loudly, it was trumpeted abroad so strongly, that the man ran away.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hon. members may laugh. The man was in the United States; he was living under the security which he obtained under the American flag. It was of primary importance—it was of the utmost importance—that he should no longer be a disturbing quantity. We could not catch him; the American Government would not surrender him, though he had committed murder, because it was a political offence. His sympathisers crossed the lines to him and kept hatching fresh troubles. Then, in the interests of peace and of this country—and if the same thing should happen now, I would do it again—I asked Archbishop Taché to see that man with whom he had some influence, and induce him to go away to a distant part—to California or any where, some distance from the frontier—and cease to agitate the country, and allow us to settle the North-West and make it what it has since become, a scene of peace and order. We asked Archbishop Taché to get Riel to go away, and we said we would pay his expenses for one year. I ask the House whether that was not good policy; I ask if that was not practical statesmanship? He went away, and the country has grown to its present position, which it would have never done if Riel had remained on the frontier still agitating, still arousing and still inciting those misguided people who had faith in him. I say I was justified, in the interests of the country, in the interests of peace, in the interests of the great future of the North-West. What I did in that respect was for the purpose of promoting the interests of that country; whatever the hon. gentleman did in that respect was for the purpose of setting race against race, religion against religion. I leave it to this House, and I leave it to the sober judgment of this country, when this subject is carefully looked into, whether it will not be said that what I did was done to promote peace and prosperity; whereas, every action of the hon. gentleman, from the time he offered the $5,000 and made those incendiary speeches in the House of Assembly, at Toronto, up to this moment, and the equally incendiary motion he has made, and supported by an incendiary speech, I am willing that our actions should be compared. With respect to this motion, I will say that in the interests of the country, I will bring down just such information as I think will best conduce to the settlement of the question as it now stands, and I will not, unless I am compelled by a vote of this House, which, of course, I must obey with all humility, be forced prematurely to make one single statement that will have a tendency, in my opinion, to postpone, for one single day, the settlement of that country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, those of us who have had the pleasure of sitting in this House for any length of time with the First Minister, are tolerably well aware that the justice of his cause is always in inverse ratio to the violence of his declamation. When the First Minister has a good, straightforward case, he is, as a lawyer of his position should be, always able to place it before the House in a quiet, intelligent and reasonable manner. When, on the other hand, the First Minister knows that his conduct has been utterly indefensible, then we have an exhibition such as that which we have lately witnessed. We have every unworthy taunt, every unjust insinuation, every calumny and sneer that his imagination can think of.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If hon. gentlemen did not hear me, I will repeat it. We have all these things hurled against men who dare to bring him to account, and invariably we are told that criticism of the conduct of the Government of the day means want of patriotism to our country. That is the invariable refrain which rings from those benches. They may do what they please; they may drive the people to revolt; they may plunder the people in every imaginable way; but if one word of condemnation comes from these benches, we are unpatriotic, because it does not suit their high mightinesses that their conduct should be criticised. I regret exceedingly that this thing should have occurred. I believe, as the leader of the Opposition and the First Minister says, this occurrence is going to do a very considerable amount of mischief to the future of this country, and I regret that, for every possible reason. But I put it to the common sense of the House and of the people of this country, is there to-day one newspaper, from one end of Canada to the other, which is not filled with accounts of the disturbance in the North-West? Are not these things already known from one end of North America to the other? Have we not had the statement of the First Minister himself, that before he knew it, and let the House mark the words, these things were made public in England and in the English press; and, Sir, these things being known, these things being of common record, these things being in the highest sense public property, is the only place in all North America where this matter is not to be discussed the Parliament of Canada? That, Sir, is the position which the hon. the First Minister has taken. Sir, I say there is no sense, no expediency in that position. I say it is infinitely better that it should go forth that the members of this House are unanimously in favor of upholding law, that we are disposed to assist the Government in putting down armed revolt or riot, or whatever you may choose to call it, but that at the same time they should declare they are willing to redress all just grievances; and that they, the great inquest of the nation, are prepared to make examination into the causes which are alleged to have brought about this unfortunate occurrence. Now, I call the attention of the House to this: That the leader of the Opposition has shown clearly and distinctly that, year by year, through a whole series of years, it has been known that these people were discontented, that the Government have had ample warning, ample opportunity to remedy these wrongs. Why, Sir, I recollect myself—and I think the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) can bear testimony, too—that in 1878, about the time we went out of office, these men were making complaints, and my hon. friend then found it necessary to take special precautions and measures to allay their apprehensions. Now, that is seven years ago. Ample time has elapsed for issuing the commission. More than ample time has elapsed for the redress of grievances and the settlement of claims. The hon. gentleman admitted that they knew a year ago that this dangerous agitator, a man who has been an outlaw, guilty of rising in armed insurrection against the Government of this country—that this man had come into that country. They had every kind of warning that men could have, that there was danger brewing; and my hon. friend simply declares—he does not censure the Government—he asks how it is, with these patent facts before them, with this information, with a knowledge of the character of Riel, and of the character of these Métis—whom the First Minister described, if I heard him aright, as little better than semi-savages—that with all these elements of danger before them, the Government omitted to take the most ordinary precautions. That is the complaint; and can complaint be juster or more reasonable. I was very sorry, indeed, to find that the First Minister on this occasion should have repeated the assertion, which, I think, he must have regretted, which, I think, he must have wished buried in the oblivion, that when, in June, 1872, he brought, what I must call, a most slanderous charge against the leader of the Opposition, that he had deliberately deprived him, the present First Minister, of the opportunity of bringing Riel to justice. He knew, and we have here the evidence of Archbishop Taché, to show that he knew that when he made this charge in July, 1872, in December, 1871, he had himself supplied Riel with the means of leaving the country, and of maintaining himself in a foreign country, for the purpose, as the First Minister stated, of hatching plots against this country. Here is an extract from Archbishop Taché's testimony in our journals:

"I came to Canada, 5th October, 1871. I saw Sir George Cartier in Montreal and Quebec, and he spoke to me about Riel's leaving the country, and he strongly advised me to use my influence to get Riel to leave the country for a while. This was in October or November, 1871."

That charge, to which I alluded being made in June or July, 1872.—

"I told Sir George that I agreed in his opinion, but that it was extremely difficult for me to interfere, as I had been so badly treated, being deceived about the amnesty. He urged me, saying I was the pastor of the people, and he insisted so much that I at last said I would try, but I said: 'You must remember that man is poor; his mother is a widow, with four young girls and three young boys, and she has no means of support, especially when her eldest son is away. He himself has only his labor for his support'—"

The hon. gentleman will observe that Riel was here in October or November, 1871.—

"and I do not think it is fair to ask him to leave his home without some compensation or some means of travelling.' 'That is true,' said Sir George; 'we will see about that.' He then asked me if I would go to Ottawa. 'Yes,' said I, 'I intend to be there the beginning of December.' 'Then,' said he, 'we will settle the matter there.' I came to Ottawa the beginning of December. Sir George also came, and then I saw him and Sir John. I had several conversations with both of them, but one especially I remember with Sir John. It was on the 7th of December, about noon, in his office. I do not remember who began, but he insisted that I should advise Riel to leave the country for a while, and added these words, so far as I can recollect them: 'If you can succeed in keeping him out of the way for a while, I will make his case mine, and I will carry the point.'

"The question of amnesty has caused me so much pain already that I thought I would be justified in using all honest means to secure Sir John's assistance in the granting of the amnesty, and it was on that ground, and on that ground only, that I promised, as I did then, promise Sir John, that I would endeavor to persuade Riel to leave Red River for a while. I made to Sir John the same observations which I had already made to Sir George about the necessity of giving some money to Riel if he were asked to leave the country. It was agreed by Sir John that they would do something about that matter—that he would consult with Sir George Cartier and give me an answer afterwards. I got an answer, dated 27th December, 1871, from Sir John, which I produce under direction of the committee, as follows:—

"[Private and strictly confidential.]

"OTTAWA, 27th December, 1871.

"MY DEAR LORD ARCHBISHOP—I have been able to make the arrangement for the individual that we have talked about. I now send you a Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

sight draft on the Bank of Montreal for $1,000; I need not press upon Your Grace the importance of the money being paid to him periodically—say monthly or quarterly, and not in a lump, otherwise the money would be wasted, and our embarrassment begin again. The payment should spread over a year. Believe me, Your Grace's

"Very obedient servant,

"(Signed) JOHN A. MACDONALD.

"His Grace, the Archbishop of St. Boniface, Montreal."

Now, I ask what possible justification could there be in July, 1872, for charging my hon. friend with having driven Louis Riel out of the country, to hatch plots and mischief against the State, as the First Minister declared my hon. friend had done? I might just add one word. Archbishop Taché goes on to say:

"In my conversations with Sir John and Sir George there was no allusion to the Ontario proclamation which, indeed, was not ordered till a later period."

Sir, it strikes me that the First Minister would do well to refresh his memory before he again, in this House, declares that in July, 1872, it was his sincere prayer that he might catch Louis Riel. Now, he and Archbishop Taché can settle the matter between them. I have never heard the Archbishop's veracity impugned. Sir, if we are to go to the root of this trouble I believe it will be found to a great extent to be this. I do not in the slightest degree dispute the ability of the First Minister, but I only say to him here what I have said in many other places, that he and his successor in office have been guilty of a great and grievous error in their dealing with the North-West. Sir, I speak with knowledge when I say that it is utterly impossible for any man to administer the affairs of that country properly unless he has been frequently in it or is a native of it. The First Minister, when he entered office, took upon himself the charge of that huge Department. No man knew better than he that it was utterly impossible—and I use the words advisedly—for him to discharge the arduous duties of First Minister and leader of his party, and at the same time to administer that great Department. Unless my memory altogether fails, over and over again the First Minister had declared that it was a grievous error on the part of his predecessor, my friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie) to attempt to discharge, at one and the same time, the functions of First Minister and Minister of Public Works. There is no doubt that my hon. friend has ruined his health in the public service by attempting to discharge duties which were too much for the strength of any single man to discharge. But, Sir, what does the First Minister do? It was of the greatest possible importance that the man who took charge of the Department of the Interior should give his whole soul and mind and strength to it, and the whole soul and mind and strength of any man in Canada would have been barely adequate (even had he taken the precautions, which the hon. gentleman neglected, to visit the country every year of his administration) to the proper discharge of the duties of the office. Now, I believe it is true that, during all the years the First Minister held office, neither he nor his successor set foot in that country. We have here the spectacle, which has always led to great evils and troubles, of attempting to govern a country requiring close and accurate knowledge at a distance of 2,000 or 3,000 miles. Consequently, these men are ignorant of facts which would have been apparent to them had they taken up their residence in the country or visited it, or had they used those means which any man having the smallest stake in the country would have used to acquaint himself with its wants and necessities. As a consequence, the present and the late Minister of the Interior have been perfectly ignorant of all these things; they have been in the hands of their subordinates. No doubt their intentions were good enough; but they have no knowledge, and they have neglected the plain and easy means of knowledge. What has been the result? One result the First Minister alluded to, and one result is plain enough to us all. Never has there been a more wanton waste of public money than in connection with the Department specially under the control of the First Minister and his successor. On the mounted police we expended last year $489,000; on surveys and Dominion lands, $895,000; and on Indians $1,166,000; or we spent, in all, in the year 1883-84, $2,547,560 on these three services; and we have had to spend a great deal more for Mr. Dewdney and all the other officials, who have taken our money and left us in utter ignorance of everything it behoved us to know. Then, as my hon. friend truly said, there has been a far more serious error committed. Practically, to all intentions and purposes, the North-West has been looked on for many years as one great field for plunder. Was there a man who you dared not put in office down here? You sent him up to the North-West. Was there a man whose character was too bad—and it must be pretty bad—to provide an office for under the immediate inspection of the hon. gentleman, he was sent up to the North-West. Was there a man you could not supply with printing or other contracts; he must get a timber limit, a coal area, a colonisation company, or this, that or the other, out of the North-West. This has been within the knowledge of every one who has gone there. No wonder that the people are discontented and leave the country. Their rights, as we all know, have been interfered with. Had these hon. gentlemen simply sat still and allowed the people to go in and develop that country there would have been none of these risings or disturbances; we should have had a strong and prosperous Province there, and the hon. gentleman's position would have been tenfold stronger to-day, and the condition of Canada infinitely better. The hon. gentleman charged my hon. friend with unpatriotic conduct and quoted English precedents to him. The hon. gentleman is very fond of quoting English precedents. Has he looked at the precedents set us from day to day by the Conservative leaders in England, in their criticisms of the conduct of the Government in Egypt and the Soudan; in their criticisms—which I do not approve of—on the conduct of officers who have just been engaged with the enemy at the front. Let him consult the English newspaper files, let him consult the organ of the party whom he says he is affiliated with, and he will find that my hon. friend's motion and language are mildness itself compared with English precedents, to which the hon. gentleman might have appealed. Sir, my hon. friend stated—and I believe every man behind him, and I hope every man in this House agreed with him—although, recollecting certain things which happened before, I fancy he is more likely to get support for that sentiment from this side than his own—that he was willing to assist the Government to the best of his power to re-establish law and order in that country. He said that he was not going to censure them for neglecting to take the steps they should have taken; but he said: We are ready to help you to put down this revolt, but we say you ought to explain to us and give us information; it is idle for you to attempt to conceal it; it is being discussed from one end of the country to the other, and it is the merest child's play to say it should not be discussed in this House. This House is the proper place to discuss it; the people's representatives have a right to be informed of the doings of the Government, and to consider whether it is blameable or not.

Mr. McNEILL. If the hon. gentleman consults the English newspapers he will find that Mr. Gladstone refused to give information.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, Sir, Mr. Gladstone may have refused to give information about matters of negotiation with foreign potentates, but my hon. friend will find that the Conservative party did not accept that as a sufficient reason for not pressing for information.

Mr. McNEILL. I think they have.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And as my hon. friends opposite are always citing the actions of that party as being just what is good and right, we may be pardoned for citing them now and then, although we do not go one-fourth or one-tenth as far as they do. My hon. friend's motion, I repeat, is exceedingly mild, compared with the comments and resolutions offered day by day and hour by hour by the Conservative party in England, with respect to the serious matters in which the country is engaged at this moment. The plain matter of fact is this: The hon. gentleman knew that he ought to have taken this matter up, and ought long ago to have appointed a commission. He has been, according to his custom, according to the title he has earned among the Indian tribes, putting it off until to-morrow—until it is too late, I fear, to expect to settle it by a commission. Now, he is responsible for the mistakes which resulted from that neglect; and it is too late to ask us, who recollect the events of 1871, who recollect his blundering and the blundering of his Government in 1871, who recollect the mischievous consequences which flowed from his mistakes and errors, to sit still while he repeats those errors, with even more mischievous consequences, to-day. Now, just let us come back to the plain facts. Is anything clearer than this: that at least a year, practically a year and a half, ago, as the facts read by my friend show, the Government were aware that there was danger; they were aware that there were complaints; they were aware that these men had serious grounds for complaint; and they were, above all, aware that the man whom the hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) admits has great and undue influence with the half-breeds was in the midst of them, stirring them up to strife; and, if I understand what the hon. gentleman said this afternoon, deliberately offered to the Government to withdraw from the country on payment of a certain sum of money. Was there no warning in that? Certainly, remembering what had already occurred, the hon. gentleman should have immediately taken precautions; he should have sent his commissioners, not now, but then, about a year ago, and then, in all probability, we would have cut the ground from under Monsieur Riel's feet, and we would not have had, at this most inconvenient period—and it is a most inconvenient period, in many ways, for the hon. gentleman—to deal with this trouble which, as the hon. gentleman has truly said—and I am sorry I cannot contradict him—may ultimately inflict very considerable injury upon us. We are quite willing to cooperate with him in every reasonable movement he requires to make, for the purpose of restoring good order in that country; but we require an open statement of his intentions. Everybody will admit that such a statement will not in the slightest degree prejudice or interfere with our warlike operations; everybody will admit that it is not possible for Mr. Riel to derive any considerable assistance from the knowledge that the hon. gentleman has ordered half a battery or a regiment to proceed to the scene of action. I approve of the hon. gentleman taking all reasonable precautions that the expedition, when it goes forward, should go forward in such strength that it will over-awe these people and bring them to their senses, without injury to any single man, without any blood being shed in that territory; but I say we ought to face the situation. There is no use in hiding from ourselves what the plain facts are. If we conceal our knowledge of the situation it will not, in the slightest degree, benefit us; because it is already a matter of public discussion and notoriety from one end of the English speaking world to the other. We have no wish to urge the Government to hasty action, but what we desire is that they should give us, in Parliament assembled, such information as my hon. friend desires, information which will enable us to form an intelligent idea of the ground upon which the Government now propose to act.

Mr. CASEY. I do not think it has been made quite sufficiently clear yet, by quotations made on the present occasion, what the object was for which the hon. gentleman who now leads the Government induced Riel to leave the country in 1871. It has been shown by my hon. friend who has just sat down (Sir Richard Cartwright) that the First Minister induced him to leave in the autumn of 1871, and stipulated that he should remain away for a year at least, and that several months before that year expired the First Minister said he "would to God he could catch him." He says now, "never was there a prayer more fervently uttered than that which he uttered on that occasion." He has so far forgotten the transaction—we must charitably hope he has forgotten the facts—as to tell us he did not pay Riel to leave the country, but to get him further from the frontier into the United States after he had already entered that country. Sufficient has been quoted from the evidence of Mgr. Taché to show that the hon. gentleman is utterly mistaken on that point. It appears there were two other questions which troubled him, with regard to Riel, at that time, and made it advisable to get Riel away. Mgr. Taché said, in his evidence, on 22nd April, 1874:—

"I saw Sir George Cartier in Quebec, Montreal, and different other places, in November and December. When I spoke to Sir John A. Macdonald on the subject he never denied that the amnesty had been promised, but he said 'No Government could stand on that question.' I told him there had been promises of amnesty frequently, and he did not deny the statements. He repeated that no Government could stand that endeavored to procure the amnesty."

This was the amnesty which had been promised to Riel by the Government, and which Archbishop Taché reproached the right hon. gentleman with not giving. Ultimately the hon. gentleman went out of office, leaving this question unsettled, which he declared he could not settle, which he declared no Government could settle and live. He went out, having deceived those to whom he had promised that amnesty, having deceived the reverend prelate himself, who had taken the trouble to negotiate that amnesty, and he left that question to be settled by his successor, and his successor did settle it, in a manner satisfactory to all sections of the Dominion. The right hon. gentleman has accused the leader of the Opposition with having tried to set race against race and class against class; but was it not under the Government of which my hon. friend who leads the Opposition was a member that this burning question, which had separated race from race, which had made bad blood between our French and English speaking people, which had excited feud between the Orangemen and Roman Catholics, was settled? But now, under the management of the right hon. gentleman, for which he claims so many virtues, that burning question which we hoped we had settled forever has been re-opened. I wish to give you the real reason why it was thought best by the right hon. gentleman not to have Riel in the country; I wish to state the reason why it was considered by the right hon. gentleman worth a $1,000 then to have Riel out of the country, and the same reason partly exists to-day. There were then general elections coming on in Canada; there are now at least two elections coming on, and it may be desirable now, as it was then, to get Riel out of the country. Mark you, the right hon. gentleman told us that there had been danger of Fenian plots being hatched on the other side of the line with Riel's assistance, and that was the reason he wanted to get him out of the country; but Archbishop Taché says:

"Nothing whatever was at any time said by Sir John or Sir George, to the effect that there was any danger that Riel, or those who had been acting with him, might join the Fenians. The only reason given for having Riel leave, was to prevent any increase in the excitement at the coming general elections. This reason was given both by Sir John and Sir George. The reason was, that the presence of Riel in Manitoba during the election would be taken up by the press, and would cause excitement in the Province of Ontario during the elections there."

SIR RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

It was not, therefore, in order to secure the safety of Manitoba, as the right hon. gentleman has told us; it was not in order to "give security to that country and enable it to grow up as it has since," but it was in order to "prevent excitement in Ontario during the elections."

"There was nothing that I remember said as to any excitement in Manitoba itself created by Riel's presence in Manitoba."

It was not for the sake of Manitoba at all that Riel was obliged to leave that Province, but for the sake of avoiding embarrassment to the Government.

"Sir George told me, as one of the reasons to induce me to exercise myself to procure Riel's departure, that by this act they would likely obtain a larger support in the elections, and would thus be better able to procure the amnesty. In the conversation, both with Sir George and Sir John, they said that the absence should last over the time of the elections."

Over the very time when the right hon. gentleman was saying in Ontario: "would to God I could catch him."

"I understood the words in Sir John's letter, and 'our embarrassment begin again,' to refer to the possibility of Riel's coming back before the Ontario elections and the embarrassment caused thereby to the Government."

The Archbishop goes on to record his negotiations and to say that he had further instructions from Sir George Cartier in regard to the matter, and that he thought it proper to pay the money in a lump instead of instalments, as the hon. gentleman first proposed, and he negotiated on this basis with Riel and Lepine together, and they said:

"We have had enough of the trouble and the risk for ourselves, and I wish it to be understood that all the expenses are to be paid by the Canadian Government, because I consider we are going away on their behalf, and we would consider ourselves as under pay in their service; otherwise we would not accept one cent from them."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentlemen opposite cheer that statement, that they considered themselves in the pay of the Government which they support; and, as we know the money was paid, and that they would not accept it under any other conditions, that must have been the understanding, that they went away in the pay of hon. gentlemen opposite. Enough on that subject. I wish to protest again, in the name of the House and in the name of the country, against the unconstitutional statement, that it is no time to find fault with the Government when there happens to be what the right hon. gentleman chooses to call a mere riot, an insignificant riot, in some part of the North-West Territory. No matter how large or how insignificant it may be, it is not only the privilege, but the duty of this House to criticise any action on his part which may have brought about that riot. He has tried to turn away the attention of the House from the issue by making it appear that the leader of the Opposition found fault with him for calling out the troops. He quoted a lot of his phrases and argued the question as if my hon. friend had been urging that the militia could not be called out here without the consent of Parliament or previous notification of Parliament. He never said anything of the kind. He took particular pains to say he did not mean that; that probably it was necessary to call out the militia, and he was not criticising the action of the Government in calling them out. But he did say, what is quite true, and the only constitutional view of the question, the only view a House respecting itself can take of the question, that this House has a right to be told when the militia have been ordered out, if it is in session at the time. Even if they were ordered out in a city, to quell a riot at a workshop, the House would have a right to be told; how much more when they are ordered out by the authority of the Government, on a special despatch from the Minister of War himself. Have we not the right to be told when we are at war? Those are the hon. gentleman's words. He spoke of our being "at war," and of armed men standing up against us. Have we not a right to be told? I think we have, and we have a right to get information in an authentic and satisfactory form. We have had plenty of information on this subject. The papers all over America and Europe have been full of it for days, and there have been these sensational despatches which the right hon. gentleman referred to, and which my hon. friend and leader did not quote from. He quoted from special despatches sent to Government organs and from editorials in Government organs, which are generally understood to be inspired.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh! hear, hear!

Mr. CASEY. They are not inspired? Well, it will be a sad announcement to the thousands, or perhaps millions who hang upon the words of those organs, as representing the policy of the Government which they admire and of the leader whom they adore, when they are told that what they took for inspired gospel is only the irresponsible utterance of an editor! These editorials are supposed to be inspired, and I believe rightly, as a general thing, and it was from editorials of that kind that my hon. friend quoted. We have had sensational despatches and editorials, and the Government which the right hon. gentleman says speaks for itself, did not speak for itself. That is what we complain of, that it would not speak and give us the correct information to do away with all the sensational trash which has been agitating us so much.

Mr. DAWSON. I cannot allow this debate to close without expressing my opinion of the present position of matters in the North-West and the action of the Government in dealing with that country. I think the House and the country have great reason to be satisfied with the manner in which the North-West Territory has been dealt with, that is, as regards the half-breeds and the native races. It is a well-known fact that these native races, the different tribes of Indians, have been for many years, for centuries, I may say, fighting among themselves. Since they came under the care of this country, since the Government undertook the care and the charge of these Indians, we have had peace among them, all over the country, until now. I think a great deal too much importance is attached to this rising in the North-West. I know these people who are now threatening, who are now probably in arms. I know them thoroughly and well. I have lived among them, and I know their disposition and tendencies. The people are naturally a good people; they are a brave and, I may say, a generous people; descended, on one side, from the native hunters of the plains, and on the other from the French voyageurs who first settled in that country, and among them are names which are historical in France; the restlessness of disposition of these people has been brought about by the nature of the life they lead. Before Canada became at all connected with the country, while it was yet under the Hudson's Bay Company, they were not a quiet or a sedentary people. They lived by hunting, and they were often at strife. If I chose to go very far back, I could show that they were frequently at war with their neighbors. In 1816, during the time of the troubles in the North-West, it is well known that there were fights, and that Governor Semple and his followers were killed at the Frog plains, quite near where Winnipeg now stands. It is known that on two occasions the Imperial Government had to send troops out. It is nearly half a century since the first troops were sent out by the way of Hudson's Bay, and they had to remain to keep order among the ancestors of these very people who are now in arms on the Saskatchewan. When the troops were withdrawn there were pensioners established in the Red River settlement, and when the Riel rebellion broke out, we saw what sort of people they were. Supposing the same thing, that is a rebellion, had broken out among a tribe of savage Indians, or among any other wild people usually looked upon as savages, would they have behaved themselves with the general moderation these people did? Certainly not. The half-breeds did not then proceed to extreme violence, but acted with general moderation, and they had, as they thought, grievances to complain of. The people who are on the Saskatchewan now, who are settled at Duck Lake, are the same people that joined Riel before—the old French half-breeds; and my opinion is that they will not be a difficult people to deal with. My opinion also is that the Government have taken the very best manner of dealing with them, having quietly sent out the troops to overawe them with a superior force. They are not naturally disposed to resort to violence, and I think with good management the disturbance will subside and peace be restored in a very short time. I think the Government have taken the very best means they could to bring about that very desirable end. Now, it is well known, as the First Minister said, that the food on which they relied, that is, the buffalo, have disappeared from the plains, and they have not yet taken to agriculture, as they, no doubt, will, in a little time. But, sweep away the means of subsistence, to which they have been accustomed, from any people, and you cannot expect them at once to settle down into a different kind of life. The fact is, the half-breeds were born hunters and soldiers. They used formerly to be frequently at war with the Black-foot or the Crees. Now, Sir, we have got into a great discussion here to-night about this matter. It will look as if we wished it to go abroad that we had a great war on hand, such as that now in progress in the Soudan or threatening in India. A few discontented people in the North-West Territories take up arms, and the police are sent to control and subdue them. We immediately magnify that into a great war, and our discussion upon it will be looked upon abroad as if Canadians were giving themselves unnecessary trouble about a very small matter. My impression is, Sir, that the whole thing will collapse; that these people will return to a quiet life; that if prudently managed, as I am sure it will be, there will soon be an end of the disturbance.

Mr. WATSON. I can sympathise with the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, and it is to be hoped that there will be no bloodshed, and that the trouble will pass over quietly. I fear, however, that it will injure the country to a considerable extent, by preventing people from Europe emigrating to that country, who have hitherto been led to believe that the North-West is in a very peaceable condition. But I rise to explain a point stated by the First Minister, that the Government ought to be thankful for the peace of that country. Well, as a resident of that country, in which I have lived for about nine years, I say we ought to be thankful for the peace of the country, because I do not believe there is a people on the face of the earth who have had more patience with the Government than the people in that country to-day. I do not believe it would be possible for a body of men to come together and misgovern a country more than the present Administration have misgoverned Manitoba and the North-West for the last six or seven years. I do not state this with the simple object of opposition, but as a warning to gentlemen opposite. The First Minister knows very well that the people of that country have had grievances, which have been presented to him in memorials from the Local Government of Manitoba, through its Premier. As the hon. gentleman is noted for smoothing down all the delegations that come to Ottawa, he has succeeded, apparently, in smoothing down the Premier of that Province, who now seems to be one of his servile followers. He knows that previous to that gentleman coming down here a Bill of Rights was passed by the Local Legislature. He knows that that gentleman has been down here since without any additional instructions, and has agreed to a certain settlement of all claims made by the Local Legislature. Now, I could give my opinion as to the probable results of the settlement of those claims. The people claim they have certain rights which the other Provinces enjoy, but of which they have been deprived. Among those rights they claim the right to build railways in any part of that Province, without interference, and that right has been denied them. They have presented this bill of rights, and I understand by the First Minister, he assured the Local Government through the Premier, that those rights would be accorded; and the Premier apparently has been, if I may say so, soft soldered by the First Minister, and has gone back satisfied. It is not known whether the Local Legislature will accept the terms as arranged by the Premier or not; in fact, it is not known that the Premier of the Province of Manitoba will press the proposed settlement of those rights. I think myself he will not, as he will be afraid of being defeated.

An hon. MEMBER. Who was elected in Winnipeg?

Mr. WATSON. Well, he was a supporter of the hon. gentlemen opposite; but I think that hon. gentlemen opposite realise that the election in the city of Winnipeg was actually a defeat for themselves. That gentleman was elected only after being taken into the Government and after being elected mayor of the city of Winnipeg; thus he had the patronage of the city of Winnipeg and the patronage of the Local Government, and the people up there have not the ballot, as you have here, but they vote openly, and that is the reason he was elected. He was supported by a horde of officials from the Dominion Government and a horde of officials from the Local Government. The people of that country are practically opposed to this Government. I can state that the Local Government does not represent the actual feeling of the people in that Province. The gentleman who seconded the Address in the Local Legislature is a gentleman who represents a constituency in that Province, but, Sir, he only represents thirty-five electors. In fact the Premier in the Province of Manitoba exercises the same power over the constituencies as the First Minister does here, by virtue of the Gerrymander Bill, which he passed in the session of 1881-82. I may also inform the First Minister that there are two members belonging to the Opposition in the Legislature of Manitoba, who represent one-quarter of the whole Province. That will give him an idea as to whether the Premier of Manitoba enjoys popular support. I can warn the right hon. gentleman and this House that he ought to be thankful that this is the only trouble he had in the North-West. The people of that country are as loyal to the Crown as the people of any other Province of the Dominion; but, as I said before, they claim that they are deprived of certain rights and that they have been deceived, and now they demand those rights to be recognised. They claim the right to build railways and the right to administer the lands of the Province.

Mr. ORTON. What are their grievances?

Mr. WATSON. The hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) knows the grievances of that country as well as I do, but he is so wedded to his party that he says it is all right, and that the people are contented and happy. I see by the Winnipeg papers that the Conservatives are banding themselves into what they call an Equal Rights Association.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds and Grenville). Farmers' unions.

Mr. WATSON. No; many of the gentlemen who have been holding those meetings are Conservatives and have elected a Conservative president, and they are strong supporters of the hon. gentlemen opposite. The people of the

Mr. WATSON.

Province, I repeat, have been deceived by this Government, in reference to the construction of railways. The people who are settled in north-western Manitoba were promised railway communication years ago. The Canadian Pacific Railway was located in that direction, and an Order in Council was passed that the Canadian Pacific Railway should follow the 4th base line until it came between range 21 and range 22, and that it should then run in a north-westerly direction to where the Shell River enters the Assiniboine. Settlers located along this proposed line, which has not been built, six or seven years ago, and have been working their land and spending their money ever since. These settlers have thousands of bushels of grain in their granaries which they cannot sell for want of railway communication. I might also state that the people of south-western Manitoba are to-day very much annoyed and very much agitated, from the fact that they have squandered their wealth in that country in cultivating large tracts of land on the promise of railway communication being afforded them. Maps showing routes were issued and afterwards withdrawn, I believe at the instigation of the Canadian Pacific Railway, with the assistance of the present Government. The Manitoba and South-Western Colonisation Railway was wiped out of existence, and the people of that district have not the advantages of railway communication which they would have had years ago, except for the joint action of the Canadian Pacific Railway monopoly and this Government. On the question that has been principally discussed in this House during the last two or three weeks—the tariff—I desire to say one or two words. There are no hon. gentlemen present and there are no residents of the North-West who are not satisfied that the tariff has been very injurious to the North-West interests.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, oh.

Mr. WATSON. The hon. gentleman is so wedded to his party he cannot see it. I think the truth of my statement was proved by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) the other night, when he stated the quantities of machinery imported into that country, in 1883 and 1884, when he stated that something over $370,000 worth of machinery was imported when the duty was only 25 per cent., and when the Government saw fit to raise it to 35 per cent. the amount only reached the value of $170,000. The people had either to buy inferior machinery or buy less, or they had to pay more for it. The policy of the Government, with respect to keeping immigrants in that country has also proved a failure. I am sorry to say that is the case. So far as regards the natural resources of the country, they cannot be beaten by any other country in the world; there is no better field for immigrants; and none offering better natural advantages. But the country must have railways and cheap implements.

Mr. CASGRAIN. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I have a few remarks to make and I will not take up much time.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, Oh.

Mr. CASGRAIN. (Translation.) I will not detain the House long, and even if I am interrupted that will not hinder me from going on. The reason why I rise is because I have been provoked to do so; only for that I would not have risen; I would not have taken part in the discussion; but as the hon. French member who represents the city of Ottawa (Mr. Tassé) has been pleased to do me the honor of mentioning my humble self the other day, when he stated I had thrown mud on the memory of the late Sir George Etienne Cartier, I rise to state that what I said about Sir George Etienne Cartier is true. I have written it because I thought it was true, and let anyone dare to deny it. That is the reason why I have written it. Now, if I have thrown mud in the face of Sir George Etienne Cartier, it was he himself who kneaded this mud with his own hands; and I repeat it loudly in this House. If what I said is untrue let it be pointed out to me. If it is not true, I will be the first to admit it. I do not at all conceal from myself the bearing of what I have written; but what I have written, I have seen, I have heard it; and I will say more, I have been attacked because I have said—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; question.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope the hon. gentleman will confine himself to the amendment. When the amendment has been disposed of, then he can speak on the main motion. The hon. member will see the inconvenience of raising that question, which may bring answers from other members on the other side of the House.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I claim the attention of the House for only a few minutes. My hon. friend, the member for Ottawa, has accused me of throwing aspersions on the memory of the late Sir George Cartier in a book I have lately written. Of course, this discussion may be out of place. My hon. friend has chosen the arena of this House instead of the arena of the journalist; but I ask the indulgence of the House for two or three moments, in order that I may put myself right on this matter. In my few remarks, it is said I appeared to cast aspersions on the private character of Sir George Cartier. I maintain that what I wrote then was true; that is the reason why I wrote it; if it was not true, I would not have written it. If the hon. gentleman wants the proof, I have got it here. Some fifteen years ago, the words I used have been repeated by Maurice Sand; so there is nothing new as regards the language attributed to Sir George. Let anyone read what is in this book of Maurice Sand—that is my justification. As to another point let him read the will of the late Sir George Cartier in the book I have published.

House divided on amendment of Mr. Blake:

That in the opinion of this House, it is the duty of the Government forthwith to lay before this House the fullest information on the subject of the claims and alleged grievances of the inhabitants of Prince Albert, North-West Territories, and the neighborhood, and of the action of the Government and its officers thereon; and of their action in reference to the movement of last summer, and in reference to the present disturbances.

Amendment negatived.

Motion (Sir Leonard Tilley) agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Before we proceed with the resolutions with respect to prison labor, it is intended that I should make some statement, and I will make it here. The leader of the Opposition intimated, in the remarks he offered, that a great many changes had been proposed since we submitted the resolutions to the House. Practically, there are not a great many changes proposed. The first was with respect to the duty on carpets. The attention of the Minister of Customs was called to the fact, that under the wording of the original resolutions a question would arise as to druggets, printed felts, squares of carpets and carpet mats; and therefore it is proposed to name and specify them, so that no question may arise with respect to them. Next, with regard to the next item:

Towels of every description, 25 per cent., and damask of cotton, linen of cotton, and linen, bleached, unbleached or colored, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

That proposition was submitted by the Minister of Customs and myself for the consideration of the Government some time since, and it was favorably entertained; but the matter was afterwards overlooked, and was not submitted when the original resolutions were submitted to Council; and therefore these amendments are introduced now. Then it was found that a duty of 30 per cent. on umbrellas and parasols operated unfavorably against a portion of those articles—iron or brass ribs, runners, caps, notches, tin caps and ferrules, required for the manufacture of umbrellas; because, by a provision on the Customs laws it is declared that parts of articles shall pay the same duty as entire articles. Under that provision a duty of 30 per cent. would give no benefit to the manufacturers, as was intended by the original resolution. We, therefore, propose to provide that the parts I have named shall be admitted at 20 per cent. ad valorem. With respect to striking out items Nos. 1 and 2 in part 4, and substituting the following in lieu thereof:—

Checked, striped or fancy cotton winceys, over 25 inches wide, a specific duty of 2 cents per square yard and 15 per cent. ad valorem.

I call the attention of the Committee to the fact that the words struck out, "not more than one-fourth wool," form the only change made in the proposition. Difficulty has been found in deciding whether articles were one-fourth or one-sixth wool, or, indeed, whether they had any quantity of wool in them. Therefore, that is struck out. Then another difficulty arose, under the proposition as to the classification of these goods, by which it would be difficult to decide between 20 and 25 per cent., and after consultation and conference with persons connected with the trade, as to the harmonious and smooth working of the matter, it was decided to make winceys of all kinds, not otherwise provided for, 22½ instead of 25. Then there are several items, under the heading of oysters, according to the size of the packages, and giving different rates of duties. They are as follows:—

Add the words 'including Oysters' after the word 'preserved' and before the words 'not specially,' etc., in the item respecting 'salmon and all other fish prepared,' &c.

And also adding the following items:—

Oysters, shelled, in bulk, a specific duty of 10 cents per gallon.

Oysters, canned, in cans not over one pint, a specific duty of three cents per can, including the cans.

In cans over one pint and not over one quart, a specific duty of five cents per can, including the cans.

In cans exceeding one quart an additional specific duty of five cents for each quart or fraction of a quart of greater capacity than a quart, including the cans.

Oysters in the shell, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Packages containing oysters or other fish, not otherwise provided for, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

The next item has reference to foreign-caught fish. The attention of the Government was called to the fact that by naming ½ a cent on fresh fish, when the fish were smoked they weighed double or thereabout the fresh or boned fish, so it is proposed to make them 1 cent per pound. These are the alterations proposed by the amendment laid on the Table of the House.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course I do not propose to discuss the matter, but simply to ask for information. I observe a proposed change, by which the hon. gentleman reduces the duties from 25 per cent., on certain classes of articles, and makes a duty of 22½ per cent. on a much larger range of imports. Will that involve a considerable additional tax, so far as the returns to the revenue are concerned?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I will be able to state, when we come to that, what the estimate is.

Mr. BLAKE. When does the hon. gentleman mean?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I cannot state with reference to that item at this moment. The whole proposition, so far as the memorandum is given—I have not got it before me—the whole changes, including carpets, will give about $75,000 additional revenue. I will give the hon. gentleman the details afterwards, but I have not got them at hand.

Mr. BLAKE. Is that addition proposed by virtue of these new changes?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No; the whole of the changes proposed will give about $75,000, making allowance for increased manufactures as the result.

Mr. BLAKE. Does that include tobacco and cigars?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Oh, no; that is much larger. It is because, as I stated at the outset, the probability is that $300,000 would be lost the next fiscal year on Excise duty, and this is for the purpose of obtaining a return.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman said the whole of the change made that amount.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I did not mean, of course, the whole result.

Mr. BLAKE. It is only the dry goods changes?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The changes on dry goods; the others give very little indeed. I will be able afterwards to give the estimates in detail.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. All you propose now to take is the prison labor resolution.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

Resolved, that it is expedient to prohibit the importation to Canada of all goods manufactured or produced by prison labor, or which have been made within or in connection with any prison, gaol or penitentiary and to attach a penalty to any such importation.

Mr. BLAKE. Will the hon. gentleman have the kindness to state what descriptions of goods manufactured by prison labor are customarily imported, and in what quantities?

Mr. BOWELL. The principal articles imported into the country bearing duty are scythes, hoes, shovels, forks, rakes and articles of that kind.

Mr. BLAKE. Any others?

Mr. BOWELL. I do not remember any just now. I think there may possibly be articles of carriage hardware, such as hames, axles, and some other articles under that general head. I think there are some very limited quantities of boots and shoes.

Mr. BLAKE. Could the hon. gentleman state where these goods are manufactured in the United States in prisons—at what points?

Mr. BOWELL. A large proportion are manufactured in Jackson, Michigan. It is one of the prisons from which I know a very large quantity of goods are imported. There are also some, I think, from Auburn, N.Y.; in fact, nearly every State's prison in the United States has utilised labor, which, as the hon. gentleman knows, is very cheap, in manufacturing these articles, and they come in at a low price, and come in direct competition with our manufactures.

Mr. BLAKE. Is the hon. gentleman able to make any statement of the value of the articles imported?

Mr. BOWELL. Not at present.

Mr. BLAKE. Nor of the quantities?

Mr. BOWELL. No.

Mr. BLAKE. Has no information been obtained by the Government on that subject?

Mr. BOWELL. The only information we have as to the value is the different invoices which are brought in constantly; and by comparing them with the product of free labor, both in the United States and this country, we have learned this important fact, that no free labor establishment can possibly exist while this is carried on. As to the total quantity, I have not taken the trouble to ascertain; it would be somewhat difficult to do it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Has the hon. gentleman been in the habit of adding to the value of invoices, so as to bring them up to the fair market value of that class of goods manufactured by free labor? Or does the Department allow the invoices to come in without raising them?

Mr. BOWELL. There is no law to justify the Customs Department in taking the steps indicated by the hon. gentleman. If American prison labor is sold for home consumption, then the manufacturers of free labor—

Mr. PATERSON. Is it so sold?

Mr. BOWELL. I fancy it is.

Mr. PATERSON. I would like to know that definitely?

Mr. BOWELL. From our information, it is in many cases; and wherever it can be ascertained that it has been shipped to this country—and I may say that it has been a constant source of trouble to the Department—wherever it can by any possibility be ascertained that these invoices cover goods at a lower rate than the rate at which they are sold at home, we have insisted upon the prices being raised.

Mr. BLAKE. I understood the Customs law to be, that the rule is, for duty purposes, to fix the price at which the article is usually sold in the country of production, and that rule is carried out.

Mr. BOWELL. So far as we can carry it out.

Mr. BLAKE. Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell us that there are large quantities of these goods produced by free labor in the United States which are sold at a higher rate than similar goods produced by prison labor?

Mr. BOWELL. I tell the hon. gentleman that in many cases, even the goods which are manufactured by free labor are imported at a much more lower rate than they are sold to the consumer in the United States; and from this fact, that upon many articles manufactured, particularly if they be from imported goods, as, for instance, the article of scythes—they receive on that article $1 or $2 drawback on each dozen, according to quality. In many cases of that kind we have insisted upon the $2 per dozen being added; but the largest proportion of the importations of these articles, so far as they have gone under my observation, have been the product of prison labor.

Mr. BLAKE. I have failed to express clearly my meaning. I asked the hon. gentleman if he had any information to enable him to tell the House whether these goods, competing with goods of the same quality, the product of free labor, are sold at a lower price in the United States market than the goods with which they compete.

Mr. BOWELL. On some occasions they are. Sometimes, when there is a large surplus, they will sell them off at any price. But in order to secure the foreign market, as they call that of Canada, they will sell the goods at a lower price at home than they will at other times; and after they fix the fact that they sell in the home market at a particular price, we, under our law, have to collect the duty on the prices at which they are sold in their own country.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Are not goods sold at a slaughter price in the United States, on which the Customs Department here charge the full value, which is higher?

Mr. BOWELL. Certainly not. If the hon. gentleman will read the regulation he will find that it matters not at what price the articles may be sold in the United States, that is the price fixed by law to be the value for duty when they come into this country.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am certainly under the impression that the Minister would not be straining his powers if he insisted that the duty should be levied on the price at which the articles were sold in the United States, not at an exceptional period, but on the regular selling price. If I understand the Minister, at certain odd times there may be a large output of these goods, and they are thrown on the market; and I understand, so far as the working out of our law is concerned, that in valuing them for duty, the exceptional price he refers to would not be accepted by the Customs Department of Canada to guide them. When it is only at certain times when they are sold below the price at which the product of free labor is sold, I understand that the Customs Department is not bound to accept that low price, but that it is within their power to add to the value to bring them up to the price at which they are ordinarily sold; and that being the case, if the hon. gentleman had been as strict and efficient in watching that matter as he is in many other matters pertaining to his Department, it seems to me he could have obviated the difficulty almost wholly if not entirely without the necessity of this clause. I suppose, if the value of the goods is uniform, it makes little difference, so far as the valuation is concerned, if whether they are the product of free labor or of prison labor; the injustice is in admitting the product of prison labor at a lower valuation. With the exercise of due caution, therefore, it seems to me that the Minister had the power in his own hands for excluding the product of prison labor which was sent into Canada at a lower price than the same goods, the product of free labor, were sold for in the United States; and an injustice has been done both to the artisans and to the manufacturers. Although he has had a remedy in his own hands, he has apparently allowed the evil to go on.

Mr. BOWELL. It would be well if the hon. gentleman would justify his remarks by reading the law.

Mr. PATERSON. I am judging you according to your action.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman has not stated the law as it is. It matters not at what price the article is sold for consumption in the foreign market; that must be the price at which it is admitted here. The hon. gentleman says that if an article is sent into Canada at an exceptionally low price the law gives the power to the Department to add to the invoice for duty. That is not the case, unless the exceptional price be fixed specially for the foreign market. If it is sold at the same price in the home market, that must be the price accepted for duty. While the price of the product of free labor and that of the product of prison labor were the same, we had very little difficulty in this country; but as soon as the combination was broken, the articles manufactured in the prisons have been thrown on the market at a much lower price than they were previously sold for.

Mr. PATERSON. May I ask this question? Has it been the case that the Customs officers have, at certain times, added to these invoices, and at other times they have not? According to what the Minister says, sometimes the articles are sold at the price of the product of free labor in the United States, and at other times at a sacrificed price. Do the officers of his Department add to the price, instead of following a uniform rule in valuing?

Mr. BOWELL. Not at all. Invoices have been repeatedly added to, but that was only when the article was sent to this country to be sold at a lower rate than in the home market.

Mr. BLAKE. I think the law has been interpreted in practice to limit the power of the Customs authorities to add to the values, just because there was an exceptional drop by a particular manufacturer in the United States for a short time; but from my little experience, from the complaints made to me at different times by importers, I do not understand that the hon. gentleman holds that the price for duty should be kept down at that abnormally low point, although it was the price in the United States. But it is the general price at which the article is sold for home consumption on which the duty is charged, and a lower valuation cannot be justified by simply proving that there was a drop in one particular case. I pass to another point. The hon. gentleman has said that there was not much trouble with reference to this particular article in the way of exports, because there was until recently a combination between the various manufacturers, as well as those who employed free as those who employed prison labor, and so there was a uniform price, a comparatively high price. That combination, however, has been broken, and there is now competition and the price, of course, is reduced. If am incorrect I would like the hon. gentleman to make it clear. Will the hon. gentleman also state the method in which he proposes to ascertain practically whether goods are the product of prison or of free labor; because, of course, the moment this law is passed, means will be taken to evade it.

Mr. BOWELL. The latter question the hon. gentleman has put has been already considered, and all the difficulties he has mentioned presented themselves to my mind the moment the proposition was made to place this resolution on the Statute Book. Not only will the manufacturers change the name in the future, but they have done so in the past. A very superior article is manufactured in the workshops, and it has a particular name in the United States; but when the Americans sell it to Canada, they give it another name, so as to put difficulties in the way of the Customs appraisers actually arriving at the exact value of the goods. The question as to how we are to ascertain whether goods come from the prison or not has been fully considered by myself and the officers of the Department, but I have not the slightest doubt the law will be evaded in many cases. The only way in which we can try to put a stop to its evasion is, when we can detect it to seize and confiscate the goods. With reference to the complaints made to the hon. gentleman, no doubt they have been very numerous; and if he will give me one of the cases presented to him, I will, in all probability, be able to show him that the matter has not been represented to him in its exact light. We have had many difficulties of the kind. Articles in the United States have a certain value in the American market, and undergo a certain discount when sent to Canada. The Americans have what are termed export lists and home consumption lists. The Canadian importers purchase the articles at export prices, as in the cases no doubt represented to the hon. gentleman, and we never accuse our merchants of fraud; but all we say is: If you have purchased at the export price, you must add to the value of the invoice for duty, the difference, as far as we can ascertain it, in value, of the prices at which the goods are sold at home and the export prices.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). In discussing the prison labor question, one important factor appears to have been overlooked. We have been discussing it from the standpoint of the extra cost entailed by the duty; but, as a matter of fact, Canadian importers can buy the products of prison labor in the United States at prices much cheaper than those at which the goods are sold for home consumption; and although the importers may be compelled to enter the goods at the full market price for duty, we cannot interfere in the slightest degree with the prices at which they purchased them; and in that respect the product of foreign prison labor, at 30 cents a day, has a great advantage over the product of our free labor, at $2.50 or $3 a day.

Mr. BLAKE. That observation has its application to all imports.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). No.

Mr. BLAKE. Not in precise terms, but in a certain degree. The case mentioned by the hon. Minister of Customs is another application of the difficulty. You buy your goods—I do not care whether they are the product of free or prison labor—at a reduced price, say 10 per cent. The Customs duty is 30 per cent; but the importer still gets the benefit of the 10 per cent. reduced invoice rate. The difficulty is, of course, exaggerated in the question of prison labor, if it would be the fact that the product of prison labor can be sold in the home market cheaper than the goods manufactured by free labor.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The illustration given by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), aptly covers the case. The hon. member who addressed himself to the House a few moments ago said it was competent for the Department, by the imposition of a duty upon the market value at home to remedy the difficulty. But the difficulty cannot be remedied. Take, as an illustration, a dozen of scythes, the market value of which is $8; but the manufacturer, who has prison labor, will sell them to the Canadian importer at $7 a dozen, because he has the labor at 30 to 35 cents a day. Substantially, the market value is $8 a dozen, for that is the value for which they are sold in the American market. However, they are sent in here at $7 and the Customs authorities make the importer pay 25 per cent. duty on the $8 full value; that is $2 added to the $7, or a cost of $9, where, if they were not sold for $7 on account of prison labor the full cost would be $10. It is therefore impossible, by the application of the law, to impose a duty that will cover the whole case, and the Government were compelled to prohibit altogether the importation of the products of prison labor. True, the consumer may have to pay more, but the question is, shall the honest labor of the country be driven out of it by the prison labor of any country?

Mr. BOWELL.

Mr. PATERSON. No doubt there is force in the way in which the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) and the Finance Minister have put the question, but what they say applies to the importation of all goods, and really, to believe the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite, with reference to the practice followed by American houses, we have only to tell them the goods are for Canada to get them at reduced rates.

Mr. BOWELL. That is not confined to American houses.

Mr. PATERSON. Perhaps not, but I shall base my remarks upon the statement of the Minister of Customs, that they reduce prices on the other side for the Canadian market, and that the only means we have of knowing that goods are prison labor goods is the fact that they are entered at a less value than that at which they are sold at home.

Mr. BOWELL. I did not say so.

Mr. PATERSON. I understood you to say that was the way you knew them to be prison-made goods.

Mr. BOWELL. Not at all. Those prison-made goods in the past, whatever may be the case in the future, bore the mark of the prison and the place where they were manufactured.

Mr. FAIRBANK. Is it proposed to insist upon the importer making a sworn statement that the goods are not made by prison labor.

Mr. BOWELL. That was the course which suggested itself at first, but I have grave doubts as to the propriety of doing it. You would place the importer in this position. He might go to a wholesale establishment for his goods and they might be falsely labelled, and he could not take that affidavit, except to the best of his knowledge and belief. I confess that, from what I have seen in four or five years' experience, great care must be taken in the wording of any affidavit or oath which may be drafted for the purpose of being taken by any importer.

Mr. BLAKE. That, of course, occurred to one in connection with the first suggestion I made. The affidavit of an importer to the best of his knowledge and belief would be based upon the fact that he did not buy from the prison man or his agent, and the goods did not bear the prison mark. He could not tell. He did not know they were made by prison labor. Suppose that were so, and the hon. gentleman required that, which is the more stringent affidavit any conscientious man could be asked to take under the circumstances, unless he were required to trace the goods from the factory, and it afterwards turned out that the man was deceived, would the goods be confiscated?

Mr. BOWELL. Under the law I suppose they would, just as the law gives power to the Customs Department in other cases. If an entry is made, and the goods are taken from the charge of the Customs authorities, and the duties are paid upon them, if you afterwards ascertain that they have been entered at a lower rate than the value for which they are sold in the home market, you ask them to amend their entries. In many cases that is done where the merchant has honestly purchased, and in other cases where it has been ascertained that it was fraudulent. I suppose we shall have to adopt the same principle to ascertain these facts that is adopted now to ascertain the facts connected with the sale of goods by the different houses in the different markets in the United States—that is, for officers occasionally to visit those places, who are not known, and who report that a certain house is selling at a lower price for export than for home consumption. We follow that up, either by seizing or by compelling amendments to the entries which have been made. The same policy will have to be adopted in ascertaining where the goods have been made, and tracing them to the different houses from which they have been sent to Canada.

Mr. PATERSON. The Minister said I had misunderstood him. When I said I understood that the way in which they detected that the goods were coming in was by the invoice being lower in price, he corrected me, and said it was because the goods all bore the mark of the prison. Is that the fact in all cases?

Mr. BOWELL. When the hon. gentleman becomes my successor, a position which evidently he is working very hard to obtain, I can assure him that he will find hundreds of modes adopted by different people to evade the law. Very often the goods coming from the manufacturers do bear the mark. When they find they are caught in some attempt to defraud the revenue, they will adopt some other mode, either by changing the name of the article which it bears in the United States, when sold for home consumption, or, in other cases, by sending it to Canada without any mark at all.

Mr. PATERSON. Then you should not have said they always bore the mark.

Mr. BOWELL. I think I said, nearly always. If not, I correct the statement now. But, when they are invoiced in that way to Canada, we at once ascertain, upon the information we have and upon the information we obtain from the different wholesale markets in the United States, what the ruling price of that particular article is. Then a difficulty often presents itself as to the quality and value of the article, and we have to come to the best conclusion we can, from the circumstances and the facts that our officers can obtain. I will be a little more particular in saying "all" in future.

Mr. PATERSON. It struck me, when the Minister made that statement, that there might be some State regulation requiring that these goods should be so branded. Can the hon. Minister inform me on that?

Mr. BOWELL. There is nothing of that kind, that I am aware of.

Mr. PATERSON. I thought at once there would be no difficulty in tracing anything that came to Canada if it bore the prison mark and if it were compulsory to place a certain mark upon it before it went into competition. I thought it was likely that they were compelled by law to do so, as the goods were going into competition with free labor.

Mr. BOWELL. By the prison mark, I mean the name of the manufacturer. I can give the hon. gentleman an illustration, showing the difficulties which surround the carrying out of the law. In Michigan, in Jackson prison, I think it is, they have a workshop outside of the prison and one inside the prison, and they manufacture the goods outside ostensibly by free labor, when we have every reason to know that much of the prison labor is utilised in the workshops and in the manufacture of goods which come ostensibly from the free labor shops outside.

Mr. PATERSON. Will the Minister of Customs tell us when he first noticed that these goods were being imported into Canada?

Mr. BOWELL. These difficulties are so constantly arising that I have never charged my mind with the date of the first offence.

Mr. PATERSON. How many years ago?

Mr. BOWELL. Not more than ten, I think.

Mr. PATERSON. Ever since you came into office, and this is the first time you have taken any step to remedy it.

Mr. BLAKE. I thought the Minister said there had been no difficulty until recently, and it had arisen because a combination was broken up.

Mr. BOWELL. I said we had no difficulty to the same extent until the combination broke.

Mr. BLAKE. When was that?

Mr. BOWELL. About a year ago, as far as I can remember.

Mr. BLAKE. And, if I rightly understood the hon. gentleman, since that time there has been competition between the manufacturers by free and by prison labor, but there is a different level of prices in the home market for the same goods of the same quality. Is that so?

Mr. BOWELL. The moment a combination is broken the party who breaks it throws the goods into the market at a lower price, and very often he brings the other manufacturers down to his level, to a certain extent; but the hon. gentleman will see that, in the matter of prison labor, the illustration given by the Minister of Finance places it outside of the general breaking of a combination, as far as a foreign market is concerned.

Mr. BLAKE. That is where we differ.

Mr. BOWELL. Then, there is very little use arguing it.

Mr. BLAKE. I would fain hope there was some use in endeavoring to persuade the hon. gentleman to reach the true conclusion. The hon. gentleman has stated that there was a combination, and that the combination is broken; that since then there has been a competition, and that the result, of course, has been that some of the parties have lowered their prices, because it is absurd to suppose that there can be, for any length of time, two different prices for the same article, of the same quality, in the same country. The cheapest will get the trade. Well, the hon. gentleman says there is a specialty with reference to prison labor for exports. But close up free competition and you get the price of prison labor down to the ordinary level of prices in manufacturing, and you have the price at home so low that the prison laborer has a practical advantage. The manufacturer is reduced to the point at which he cannot manufacture profitably; the article being so low in the home market there is not really that opportunity for making a slaughter sale in the foreign market to which the hon. gentleman alluded. Now, I have no objection at all to the protection of free labor against prison labor. On the contrary, I think it is a very good thing that free labor should not come in competition with prison labor. But I have been anxious to ascertain what the facts were on which the hon. gentleman based his motion, that he would practically protect free against prison labor, either by the proposal that he makes or by the machinery he is making to carry out that proposal. So far as I can judge from his statement, he is not going to do much. It will be much cry and little wool.

Mr. DUNDAS. May I ask the hon. Minister of Customs if it is usual to charge a duty upon bags holding flour imported into this country ?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes ; it is now.

Mr. DUNDAS. How long has it been so ?

Mr. BOWELL. Not all the time, because bags were permitted to be imported in bond. When they were exported filled with grain or with flour they were allowed to make an ex-warehouse entry and send them out of the country without paying duty ; but at present they have to pay a duty upon all the bags that are imported.

Mr. DUNDAS. How long has that arrangement been in force ?

Mr. BOWELL. I think, since the 1st of August last.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12:40 a.m., Friday.
