penalties, shall belong to the municipality within the limits of which the Canadian terminus of such ferry is situated. There is a provision that it shall not affect the vessels plying between ports in Canada. It also has a provision that any company established in Canada for ferry purposes may amalgamate with companies in the United States; and it makes provision for the company taking possession of needed property for ferry purposes. It restores the Act which was in force prior to Confederation. If the First Minister will consent, I prefer that the Bill be referred to a special committee, consisting of members who are locally interested in ferries of this kind, and I have given notice of the following as the committee: Messrs. Gillmor, Hickey, Benson, Wood (Brockville), Gunn, Wigle, Smyth, Lister, Rykert and Ferguson (Welland), and the mover. These are gentlemen interested in international ferries, and they understand the working of the law and the necessity of making some changes in it, with a view to dealing effectively with this subject. If the First Minister declines to accept my suggestion, the Bill can be referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Mr. CASEY. It strikes me, from the cursory glance which I have been able to take of this Bill, and from what I have been able to hear of the hon. gentleman's remarks, that it is a Bill that should be introduced by the Government after carefully considering all the interests that can possibly be affected by it. It is a Bill respecting international ferries, and it therefore requires at least as much and as careful consideration, and should be dealt with by responsible Ministers as much as any Bill regarding a general Act or respecting the building of bridges or the connections of Canadian railways with American railways, or subjects of that class. The Bill proposes to entrust very large powers to municipalities in Canada in which one of the termini of the ferry may be located. As these ferries are, to a great extent, not for the convenience of the locality at all, but for the convenience of the general public—I refer to the large car ferries making connections with railways—the measure is one which should be introduced by the Government.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). The Bill does not include the railway ferry boats.

Mr. CASEY. I did not notice that limitation, and if it is contained in the Bill, it disposes of the objection to a certain extent. But all these ferries are for the convenience of the general travelling public, and I doubt whether we have such complete control as to determine the description of vessels to be used; or, indeed, whether it is quite constitutional for us to deal with municipalities in this way—whether, in fact, we have power to entrust them with authority of this kind or not. I am not quite clear on that point, but it is one which should have been considered by the Government before the Bill was introduced. I have not been able to find any exemption of car ferries in the Bill, and one or two of my friends have likewise been unable to find it. What clause covers it?

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). It is at the end of clause 7.

Mr. CASEY. There is a clause at the end of the Bill which gives to ferry proprietors the same powers as are conferred on railway companies in regard to the expropriation of land. Considering that ferry proprietors may be very large corporations or very insignificant individuals, I do not think it is wise to give them general powers to expropriate land. I suppose a person running a flat boat, only able to carry two or three persons at a time across a river, will be a ferry proprietor under the meaning of the Bill.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). Not unless he is licensed.

Mr. CASEY. Of course; if licensed, he will be a ferry proprietor under the meaning of the Bill. He will have the right to establish a ferry at such point as he chooses along the river front; he can take possession of so much land as is necessary for ferry purposes where he likes, to the great injury and inconvenience of the proprietors, who would not be compensated by money or by the convenience given to the public by the ferry. That clause, I think, needs reconsideration; and it should be considered whether such a clause should be inserted in the Bill or not. For these reasons I regret that the Government did not see fit, if they deemed it necessary that a measure should be introduced, to introduce such a Bill themselves, and give it their fullest consideration. As it seems impossible to enter into these different points at the second reading, they will have to be dealt with when the Bill is in committee.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). I cannot see the object of proposing legislation of this kind at this particular time. Unless there is some international arrangement arrived at, the Government have no right to license a ferry, for neither the Government nor the municipalities can act without the consent of the Government on the other side or of the municipality adjoining. This matter has been determined in regard to the ferry between Fort Erie and Buffalo. The Government licensed a company, and the company had to buy out the rights of the company which had the ferry on the other side, and had to obtain the consent of the municipality of Buffalo before they could run a ferry. I brought up this question about six or eight months ago, and I understand that some international arrangements are now being entered into by which the whole question will be settled as between the two countries. I cannot see any good in legislating at this particular time. If this Bill were to proceed, however, I would object to any company owning wharves, because such ownership would virtually give a monopoly for all time to come to that particular ferry. The wharves should be owned by the Government, and when the Government grant a license to a new company they should give them the use of the wharves; but if an individual who formerly owned the ferry owned the wharves, he could practically exclude anybody running a ferry there under a license. I think legislation of this kind, unless some international arrangement is made, can be of no avail and can possess no value, either to this House or the country. As I have stated, the municipality on the opposite side of the river now controls the matter. The city of Buffalo controls it, as regards the crossing from Fort Erie, and an ordinance of that municipality has to be obtained before the ferry can get leave to land on the American side of the river. Five years is entirely too short a time. In any legislation the Government should own the wharves, and the time should be sufficiently extended, so that compensation may be obtained by parties who put on large boats, involving a large expenditure; but the proprietors should not get any right to expropriate land for wharves because they would then be owned by individuals, and a Government license to run a ferry would, under such circumstances, possess no value.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I concur in the remarks made by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson), and I have had some experience of the difficulties connected with the licensing of international ferries. It is true that this Parliament has no power to make a law bearing on the other side of the St. Lawrence in foreign territory. Under the Act of 1870 we can grant a license to a company for a ferry, so far as our side of the river is concerned. It is true it gives no rights to a company on the other side of the river, and difficulty thereby occurs. It is, perhaps, not correct, however, to state that the municipality of Buffalo controls the Fort Erie ferry; the people of Buffalo are just in the same position as we are, and neither of us control the ferry.

The authorities on the American side could make any laws within their powers; they could throw obstacles in the way of any company licensed by the Dominion Government, just as the people on this side could throw obstacles in the way of any company licensed by the American authorities. The hon. gentleman is also quite right in stating that having experienced these difficulties, which were of a very serious character, we had communication with the authorities of the United States, with a view of coming to some arrangement by which a more satisfactory system of letting these ferries could be arrived at. Unfortunately, however, the correspondence we had did not make sufficient progress to enable the Government to introduce, during this Session, such an amendment to the present Act as would remove those difficulties, but I trust that the communications we are having on this subject will result in such a settlement as will relieve the licensing of the international ferries of the difficulties now complained of.

Mr. BLAKE. I think there is another subject of a cognate character which should attract the attention of the Government. My own opinion has been, with reference to these international communications—whether ferries or bridges—that it was the business of this Government to communicate with the United States, or with the state authorities in the immediate neighborhood—for I fancy both of these sovereignties have to be consulted—with reference to the general plan of operations, the working of railway bridges, the corporations which should control them, the rates of fares, and so on. All these matters—the authority, the jurisdiction by which litigation should be settled by the various corporations who may have the right to share in the use of the bridge—are in a great state of confusion, owing to the sort of exclusive jurisdiction which now prevails. I hope the hon. gentleman, while promoting communication with the authorities on the other side, on this subject of ferries, will not leave this other subject out of consideration.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With respect to the railway bridge communication between the United States and Canada I think the practice has been pretty regular and well understood. For instance, in the case of any bridge crossing the St. Lawrence, the consent of the United States is always to be obtained. I do not know whether that is sufficient, but we assume it to be, though perhaps an Act of Congress would be required if that point were raised in the United States. But we get the assent of the Federal Government, and that assent once being had, then all the arrangements must be made between Canada and the particular state south of the water to be crossed, as, for instance, the state of New York. I do not know that we can do much more with respect to bridges in that regard. With respect to ferries, that question has, of course, to be settled.

Mr. BLAKE. I have failed, I find, to make myself understood by the hon. gentleman. It is not so much with reference to the initiating authority as to making, by convention between the two countries, some arrangement by which, in suing or being sued, and in establishing rights by those entitled to go over the bridge—for these purposes I say some tribunal should be established. The law now is, I think, that you may sue in this country with reference to that right on this side, but the decision would be operative only as to about one-half the bridge, and it would not affect the rights, which may be different, on the other side. There are questions of different conclusions being arrived at on both sides, and that condition of things is, I think, very unfortunate with respect to those large bridges.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman propose to send this Bill to the Banking and Commerce Committee?

Mr. COSTIGAN.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has the hon. gentleman considered whether or not that is desirable? There is no use in sending it to that committee unless the House is disposed to affirm the principle. The Railways and Canals Committee would be better, for it seems a little out of the purview of the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is a question of commerce.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps it is, but it is more closely a question of railways. But there is another point of importance, and that is, are the Government prepared to sustain the view that this business should be relegated to the municipalities. Are they satisfied that it is better for us to affirm that principle? I have not been able, more than the hon. gentleman, to look at the Bill very carefully, but it appears to me that it is somewhat a questionable principle to hand over international ferries, even for a short time, to the municipalities and the Governor in Council. I think, as there are only a few, and as they are of great importance, we might deal with each separately.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would like to get the opinion of the Banking and Commerce Committee on some of these points. There will be, I suppose, negotiations with the American Government on them, and I would like to know what the committee think should be the stipulations, so that, having their opinion, it would strengthen our hands in the negotiations.

Mr. MILLS. If it is proper to send the Bill to the Banking and Commerce Committee, it should be introduced by resolution.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

BETTER OBSERVANCE OF THE LORD'S DAY.

Mr. CHARLTON moved the second reading of Bill (No. 19) to provide for the better observance of the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday, by prohibiting Sunday excursions in certain cases. He said: In rising to-night to advocate the passage of this Bill, I will acknowledge that the propriety of my course would be open to doubt, were there no other law to warrant it than mere human law. But, Sir, there is such a thing as a higher law, a law recognised by this nation, which is avowedly a Christian nation, and recognised by all Christian nations; and it is under the warrant and the provisions of that law that it is proper to urge the passage of a Bill of the character of that now before the House. If we had nothing but mere human law to actuate us, it would not be proper to urge the Bill; but as human law is overshadowed by this higher law, the human law-giver has no right to pass an enactment that supersedes the decalogue. The human legislature has no right to pass an enactment that defies or sets at naught the spirit of justice and truth. The human law-giver may not pass a law that casts discredit upon morality. The higher law is, in fact, the law of the world. We have it expressly declared by the Almighty that "By Me kings reign and princes decree justice." All human laws should be tried by this higher law; all the world is under it to-day, whether that law is recognised by the world or not; and by the provisions of this higher law, governors, princes, kings, and the people of this earth shall ultimately be judged. Now, Sir, the requirement of the observance of the Sabbath forms a part of that higher law. It is one of the provisions of the Decalogue which is binding upon man. And if we turn to ecclesiastical utterances, we shall find that, so far as the authorities of the Protestant Church are concerned, their utterances upon this point are a unit. There exists no diversity of opinion among them as to whether the fourth commandment is binding upon the human race and upon governments. If we turn to the utterances of the prelates of the Catholic Church, we shall also find their recognition of that law, clear and unmistakable. I find, Sir, that at the address of His Grace Archbishop Gibbons, of Baltimore, His Holiness, Pope Leo XIII delivered an earnest request to the Roman Catholic Church which opposes Sunday and festival profanation. From the address, which was published in the Catholic Mirror, of April 23, 1881, I take the following extract:—

"The observance of the Sacred Day which was willed expressly by God from the first origin of man, is imperatively demanded by the absolute and essential dependence of the creature upon the Creator. And this law, mark it well, my beloved, which at one and the same time so admirably provides for the honor of God, the spiritual needs and dignity of man, and the temporal well-being of human life. This law, we say, touches not only individuals, but also people and nations, which owe to Divine Providence the enjoyment of every benefit and advantage which is derived from civil society. And it is precisely to this fatal tendency, which to-day prevails, to desire to lead mankind far away from God, and to order the affairs of kingdoms and nations as if God did not exist, that to-day is to be attributed this contempt and neglect of the Day of the Lord. They say, it is true, that they intend in this way to promote industry more actively, and to procure for the people an increase of prosperity and riches. Foolish and lying words! They mean, on the contrary, to take away from the people the comforts, the consolations and the benefits of religion; they wish to weaken in them the sentiment of faith and love for heavenly blessings; and they invoke upon the nations the most tremendous scourges of God, the just avenger of His outraged honor."

This, Sir, is the language held by the head of the Roman Catholic Church. With regard to the utterances of the church dignitaries, I find that a pastoral was issued by His Grace Archbishop Taschereau, dated April 26, 1880, which is clear and emphatic in regard to this matter. The Archbishop, in referring to "a disorder which seeks the public gaze, and which causes deplorable scandal," says:

"We mean, O dearly beloved brethren, those pleasure excursions made on Sundays and feasts of obligation, on steamers, on the railway, and sometimes in a long train of vehicles. Experience proves that they give rise to such disorders of intemperance and immorality that we feel obliged to prohibit absolutely, and under pain of mortal sin, pleasure excursions on Sundays and feasts of obligation. * * * Wherefore, having invoked the holy name of God, we rule and ordain as follows:— 1st. We forbid, under pain of grievous sin, the faithful of this diocese, to take part on Sunday or feasts, in pleasure excursions, on railways, on steamers, or in vehicles, even when the profit of those excursions is intended for a good work. It is not our intention, however, to condemn the pilgrimages made on those days, provided recollection, piety, and good order be observed."

I will also refer, Sir, to a few other Roman Catholic authorities on this matter. Several bishops have issued able and timely addresses on the subject. The Bishop of Buffalo, in calling renewed attention to this subject, after forbidding pic-nics, excursions, fairs, etc., on Sundays and holy days, said:

"Remember thou keep holy the Sabbath Day, is God's own command. * * * We must not only rest from all unnecessary, servile work, but we must hear mass and spend the day—or, at least, a good part of it—in the service of God and religious duties. * * * Ours is not, as we have said, a Jewish or a Puritanical Sabbath, nor do we measure its obligatory observance by a sectarian standard or any American or national idea; yet we would be sorry to see the respect in which our separated brethren hold the Lord's Day weakened or discredited. God grant that we may never see the Sunday profaned here in our own country as we have seen it in other lands."

Bishop Keane, of Richmond, Va., at a meeting called by his authority, after a powerful address against the selling of liquor on Sunday, submitted a series of resolutions for adoption and a pledge for signature, setting forth the sacred obligation of keeping holy the Lord's Day, recognising the selling and drinking of liquor on that day as violations of the commandment of God and the precept of the Church, etc. Cardinal McCloskey, in 1882, said:

"We wholly denounce and absolutely forbid excursions or pic-nics on Sundays, or after dark, all moonlight excursions and all Sunday pic-nics, and we exhort our good people who love their church to abstain from any participation in such scandalous, unhallowed and disgraceful practices, and to use all their influence to suppress them."

The following are extracts from New York papers, when Strakosch attempted Sunday operas there:—

"Cardinal McCloskey was reported in the Herald to have said: 'You may say that I am opposed to what is generally regarded as Sunday evening concerts, and that, while not very Puritanical or domineering, I oppose the sensational amusement, which advertises itself under the name of sacred concerts, but which is nothing else than the ordinary week day show,' etc.

Dr. McGlynn, a prominent Roman Catholic clergyman, is reported to have said:

"In France, Sunday is more of a tiresome holiday than a rest. This disregard for the Sabbath acts unfavorably on religion. The Sabbath I have always regarded as a great social conservator in this country. The regard in which Sunday has been held by the English-speaking nations, has had much to do with their keen sense of decorum and efficient organisation. * * * The Sunday rest should be a set-off to the weekly work, and Sunday night quiet, to the boisterousness and enjoyment of the week nights."

I add to these expressions of opinion, some utterances from eminent Protestant divines, selecting four or five extracts. The first is from the celebrated divine, Taylor-Lewis, LL.D., of New York, who says:

"What a hell-upon-earth would our great cities become, and in time our land become, with one day in seven given up to idleness, to the theatre, to dissipative shows, to unchecked intemperance, or to the driving on of that flood of worldliness, which, in spite of all religious restraint, is even now threatening destruction to all that is noblest and purest in our social life."

Rev. Dr. Kogel, a Court preacher in Germany, has delivered an address, in which is presented a sad view of the immorality of the Berlin people:

"The necessity of work, and the tyranny of work rob men of their Sunday rest. And the afternoon of Sunday, which a part of the working men have for themselves, is spent in dissipating pleasure, in drinking saloons and theatres, where all that is sacred is mocked and adultery glorified."

Dr. Arthur Pierson, of Philadelphia, in an address upon Sabbath observance, says:

"A community that consents to the wanton destruction of the Christian Sabbath is committing virtual suicide; it is like a man who cuts off his left arm with his right. And if you want to see the natural and providential retribution that follows such a course, go and study the history of the French Revolution, when a nation went down into the gulf of anarchy."

And again:

"Voltaire was no fool; he saw that an habitual observance of the Sabbath, with its stated seasons of religious meditation and public worship, must both preserve and extend Christianity in any community; and he acknowledged that he despaired of being able to expel from the world superstition, by which he meant religion, so long as persons assemble regularly and in large numbers for the worship of God. And you will find that wherever the Lord's Day is regarded as set apart by Divine authority, and is observed as a day of rest from ordinary work, and of occupation in spiritual things, the hold of both Christian precepts and moral principles is correspondingly firm and strong. The Sabbath is the very bulwark of social order."

But why multiply quotations from pastors and divines. I proceed to enquire whether Sabbath laws are inconsistent, firstly, with the higher law; secondly, whether they are inconsistent with the laws and institutions of this Empire; thirdly, whether they are inconsistent with the laws and institutions of the English-speaking nations and commonwealths; and, lastly, whether they are inconsistent with the principles of human liberty. This higher law with regard to the Sabbath of which I speak first, was not a law which governed the Jews in their observances under the Mosaic dispensation only, but it was a law coeval with creation itself. Two great institutions mark the first laws given to man. These two institutions are the rest of Sabbath and marriage. The Sabbath is instituted, the command is given in the same chapter, the second chapter of Genesis, as that in which the ordinance or sacrament of marriage is instituted. It is known that the Sabbath was observed long before the giving of the law upon Mount Sinai; Moses, himself, refers to breaches of this command. This command, that out of the seven days, one should be observed as a day of rest, was observed from the earliest days of creation; the language of the commandment proves this. The language of the fourth commandment is to remember to keep holy the Sabbath day. "Remember" a law already in existence; remember a law now and hitherto binding upon you. "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy; and the reason is given: For in six days God made the heaven and the earth, and the sea and all that in them is, and rested on the seventh;" wherefore He blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it. The Decalogue which contains this command is a moral enactment not limited in its application to any race, area, or time. It is a law which prohibits not only Sabbath desecration but idolatry, blasphemy, disobedience to parents, falsehood, theft, and murder. All these crimes, as well as the crime of desecrating the Sabbath, are mentioned in this law. This seventh day, it is evident from the language of the Bible, was ordained by the Creator of the world. We are told in the New Testament that all things were made by Christ. We are told that for Him and by Him all things were created, and we are told that He is the Lord of the Sabbath, and that man was not made for the Sabbath but the Sabbath was made for man. Proceeding on this authority, we find that the laws of the nation of which we form part have recognised the binding character of Sabbath observance from the earliest ages. We find a statute passed in the year 876 by King Alfred, which distinctly recognised the binding character of the fourth commandment, which incorporated the entire Decalogue as part of the English law. We find that law reaffirmed and its provisions extended by various monarchs. The list of statutes in England referring to the command of Sabbath observance is a very long list. The law was amended in 925; it was again amended in 958; again in 1009; again in 1017; amended again in 1304 under Edward III; again in 1388 under Richard II; again 1428 under Henry VI; in 1464 under Edward IV; in 1552 under Edward VI; in 1558 under Elizabeth; in 1617 the colony of Virginia adopted the Sabbath law; in 1625 the law was again amended under Charles I; in 1643 the first Sabbath law in the colony of New Haven was adopted; in 1644 it was adopted in Scotland; in 1648 in Massachusetts; in 1648 in New York; in 1661 it was again amended and perfected in its operation in the reign of Charles II. In 1837 liquor selling was prohibited for the first time in Massachusetts, and in 1833 in Great Britain; in 1854 liquor shops were closed upon the Sabbath day in Scotland; and in the same year a proposition to open museums in London was defeated by a vote in the House of Commons by 237 to 48; in 1856 a similar proposition was defeated in the Commons by 376 to 48; and in 1878 it was defeated in the House of Lords by 76 to 39. The present English law with regard to the observance of the Sabbath is in many respects a stringent law. It is unnecessary to enter into details in regard to its provisions, but the fact that such a law exists upon the Statute Book of England is a proof that the power rests with the Government of England and with the Government of the colonies to make provisions with regard to the observance of the Sabbath. If we go to the country across the border we find that Sunday laws exist in every one of the thirty-seven States of the Union, except California. One general feature of these laws is the prohibition of any work on the Sabbath, except works of necessity and mercy. In the details of these provisions, various features exist, various differences exist in the different States. In some States only one local train and milk trains are permitted to run. In Massachusetts no train can run except by consent of the railroad commissioners. In all these States provisions are made for the purpose of securing the observance of the Lord's Day. My next enquiry will be: Are Sabbath laws, which we find exist upon the Statute Book of Great Britain, and which have been a part of the English code for a thousand years, which exist in every one of the American States but one, which exist in this country and exist in all the English colonies, are these laws inconsistent with the principles of human liberty, are they an infringement on human right, or is there a sufficient reason for the enactment of these laws, consistently with the principles of human liberty? Law in the abstract expresses what just men will not do, and what other men must not do. Law restrains human liberty, it restrains the liberty of human action, it says that human action shall be free in certain directions and certain channels only, and, when human action transcends these bounds, then human law steps in and prohibits and punishes the transgression of the bounds laid down. The object of human law is to provide for the public good. That should be the object of it. The underlying principle should be the greatest good to the greatest number. It is upon this principle that the dignitaries of the Roman Catholic Church have acted in the pastorals I have read. It is upon this principle that human law should be enacted. Now, Sabbath laws are not inconsistent with human liberty, in this respect, that they are calculated to promote public health. I find that, at the time the World's Exposition was held in London, 641 medical men of London, in a petition to Parliament against the opening of the Crystal Palace on the Sabbath for profit, said:

"Your petitioners, from their acquaintance with the laboring classes and the laws which regulate the human economy, are convinced that the seventh day of rest, instituted by God and coeval with the existence of man, is essential to the bodily health and mental vigor of men of every station of life."

This law also prohibits cruelty to animals. It may restrict human liberty in that respect, but it is consistent with it, because it is a humane and just law. This law promotes public morals. You have only to look at Sabbath lands and contrast the condition of those lands with that of lands where the Sabbath is not observed, and you will find proof enough of the assertion that it does promote public morals. It is again consistent with liberty, inasmuch as it is an educational law. The church and the Sabbath school are the mightiest educational agencies existing in the world to-day, and they have always been the mightiest educational agencies. The Christian church is the great educational agency, and we owe to it all that marks the difference between our condition and the condition of pagan lands. If we stop to consider, we will find that the Sabbath gives two-thirds as much time for study as the time devoted to study in the schools, if we deduct from the latter the time given for vacations. It is consistent again, with the principles of human liberty, because it conserves and protects the home. We find, as I stated a while ago, that marriage, the institution upon which the home and the family rest, was instituted at the same time as the Sabbath was instituted—both are Edenic institutions. And we will find, with reference to the influence of violations of the Sabbath upon homes, that the condition of homes where the Sabbath is not kept always presents an unfavorable contrast to the condition of Christian homes. Dr. Lowe, of Berlin, a physician in very extensive practice, states that in the course of his practice he had visited 9,000 Sabbathless homes, homes where the Sabbath was not kept, and he found in every case slovenliness, discord, slipshod family relations, no family life in fact, but wine shop, and vice, and dissipation usurping the life which should exist in the family. Sabbath rest is essential to the head of the family, because it is of the utmost importance that he should be enabled to spend one day in seven with his family; and, if good homes are the bulwark of the nation, as they unquestionably are, then any institution which is calculated to promote, to create, to multiply good homes, is an institution which is not inconsistent with human liberty, but one that should meet with the approval of every just and good man. Again, laws of this kind are not inconsistent with human liberty because they prevent crime. The great Daniel Webster said, in relation to this matter: "It is the bulwark of liberty because it is the bulwark of morality." Where no such laws exist, the Sabbath is the most prolific of crimes of any day in the week. In December, 1882, the police of New York City commenced a stringent execution of the Sabbath laws in that city. All drinking places were closed, all infractions of the law were vigorously suppressed, and the consequence was that the streets of New York were as quiet as the streets of a country village, and the Monday calendar of crime was very much lighter than upon days when the Sabbath law had not been enforced in that city. Professor Rosher, the famous political economist of Leipzig, Germany, says: "It is a characteristic of society where the Sabbath is not observed that the Sabbath is the prolific day for suicides among women and Monday for suicides among men." The woman, sad and neglected at home, commits suicide on the Sabbath; and the husband, coming home from a Sunday's saturnalia, and spending a blue Monday, is likely, if he commits suicide at all, to commit it on that day. The special Sabbath Committee of the English Parliament in 1882, said: "It appears in evidence that in each trade, in proportion to the desecration of the Lord's Day, is the immorality of those engaged in it." S. Cutter, of the New York Prison Association, says: "Sabbath desecration is almost always connected with crime and is the forerunner of it." He also says that, out of every hundred men incarcerated in the Massachusetts state prison, at least ninety of them are Sabbath-breakers. Chaplain Barnes, of that prison, says: "When a church-goer comes to prison, it invariably makes a sensation among the prisoners." The celebrated judge, Matthew Hale, says that those convicted of capital crimes, when he was on the bench in the great majority of cases, confessed that the commencement of their career of crime lay in the neglect of the Sabbath; and Justice Strong, of the United States Supreme Court, gives utterance to the same sentiments. We will find that, wherever the cry is raised that the Sabbath must go, it is a hoodlum cry, that it is loudest among the vile, that it comes from the class opposed to all law, human and Divine, that it is the cry of the nihilist, of the socialist, and of that enemy of civilisation the dynamiter. The basest of all classes are the classes who are opposed to the restraints of the Sabbath. I urge, in the next place, that Sabbath enforcement is not inconsistent with the principles of human liberty, because it promotes the prosperity of the individual and the prosperity of the State. We have, in fact, the Divine promise that "in the keeping of my commandments there is great reward." That promise is always fulfilled. In keeping these commandments there is great reward—great reward to the individual, great reward to the nation. It ensures prosperity in the one case and in the other; and it will be found, Sir, that the best moral condition and the greatest industrial prosperity are always inseparable. It will be found, moreover, that every non-Sabbath-keeping country in the world is comparatively poor. If we compare the condition of England, the condition of the British Colonies, the condition of the United States, where the British and American Sabbath is kept, with the condition of such countries as China, India, Japan, Turkey, Russia, Germany, Italy and Spain, and the Spanish American States, we will find sufficient proof of this assertion. I notice, next, that the enforcement of Sabbath observance is not inconsistent with the principles of human liberty, because it promotes the best interests of the laborer and of the masses; it promotes, in short, the greatest good to the greatest number. The Sabbath is the day of rest; it is the law which gives the laboring man one day in seven as a day of rest; it is the law which shields him from the merciless exaction of capital, from the merciless exactions of those for whom he labors. We will find, Sir, that this one day in seven is a natural arrangement. Seven was the sacred number; the week of the ancients was a week of seven days. Other periods of rest have been tried. Under the French Government, in the days of the Revolution, the Sabbath was abolished, and a rest of one day in ten was established, and experience proved that that was unnatural. One day in six has been tried, one day in eight, and one day in nine. One day in six has been found to result in the rest coming too often. Wherever the day of rest has been more seldom than one day in seven, experience proves that it does not come often enough, and that one day in seven is the natural period of rest. And, Sir, it is a law of nature that rest is required for animals—rest even is required for machinery. In fact, physicians will tell you that a cessation of medical treatment for one day in seven in almost all cases produces beneficial results. Now, Mr. Speaker, the laboring man is deeply interested in this matter. If Sabbath restrictions are observed the laboring man will receive six days' pay for six days' labor; but if the barrier of the Sabbath is broken down, the result proves that the laboring man receives six days' pay for seven days' labor; that the day of rest is gone, but the aggregate of the man's earnings is not increased. This, Sir, is always the case. It is well known that the tendency now-a-days is to over-production. The increased facility for production, by means of the discovery and improvement of machinery, renders it difficult to keep production within the bounds of the demand; and to increase the laboring days from six in a week to seven, is still farther to aggravate the evil of over-production that already exists. A fisherman of New Romney, in England, when on examination with regard to this matter of labor on the Sabbath, said he had discovered that Sunday fishing kept down the price of fish. There was a great deal of philosophy in that remark. Sunday fishing would keep down the price of fish. Sunday labor of this kind is detrimental to the interests of the laborer, of whatever calling the laborer may be. The celebrated Louis Blanc says:

"The English working man produces as much in 56 hours as the French working man does in 72, because his forces are better husbanded, in consequence of resting one day in the seven."

The celebrated John Stuart Mill says:

"The operatives are perfectly right in thinking that if there was no Sunday rest, seven days' work would have to be given for six days' pay."

And Paley, long ago, put the same truth more strongly, when he said:

"An addition of the seventh day's labor to that of the other six would have no other effect than to reduce the price."

An attack, Sir, upon Sunday rest is an attack upon the interest of the laborer, because Sunday's rest is the poor man's blessing and the poor man's day. To-day, Sir, in English-speaking lands, there are 2,500,000 people, to say nothing of those engaged in domestic service and in works of necessity, who are deprived of their Sunday rest—2,500,000 persons who are deprived, through the laxity of the laws with regard to this matter, of that great blessing which is their right. Now, Sir, there is a marked contrast between the mode of the observance of the Sabbath in Anglo-Saxon countries and upon the continent of Europe; and those who wish to introduce here the continental Sabbath in place of the Sabbath that we now enjoy, wish to confer upon this country a curse rather than a blessing. What is the character of the continental Sabbath? At most an hour in the morning is given to mass, and the rest of the day is dedicated to the world, the flesh and the devil. Horse-racing, parades, reviews, pic-nics, excursions, drinking, dissipation—a holiday for the rich, and a day of toil for the poor—these are the characteristics of the continental Sabbath. Another characteristic is, that the nations living under that Sabbath are yearly sinking into immorality and into crime. A very satisfactory proof of this will be shown by a comparison of the morals of the countries in which the British and the American Sabbath prevails, and the morals of countries living under the continental Sabbath. Take, as a criterion, the record of illegitimate births. They amount to 4 per cent. in London, to 34 per cent. in Paris, to 34 per cent. in Brussels, to 54 per cent. in Vienna, and to 72 per cent. of the whole number in Rome, against 4 per cent. in England. In some cities of the United States the continental Sabbath has been introduced. It has been introduced in Chicago, in St. Louis, in Cincinnati and in San Francisco; and in every one of those cities deaths by violence are more numerous in proportion to the population than in the worst governed countries in Europe, except Italy and Spain. The result of the introduction of the continental Sabbath into those cities is perfectly apparent. Look at Cincinnati, blood-stained and murder-cursed, with the worst classes of the population in possession of the city government, lawlessness and crime rampant and governing that city. Who are the champions of the continental Sabbath? Wherever you find the liquor dealer you will find one there. If you find a gambler, there is a champion of the continental Sabbath, and every prostitute is also a champion of it. Legislators of the type of Tweed and that villainous lot of New York aldermen who controlled the city under his regime—these are the advocates of the continental Sabbath. And what, Sir, are the characteristics of what they term a free Sunday? It is a Sunday free from rest, it is a Sunday free from religion, it is a Sunday free from mental culture, it is a Sunday free from moral improvement, it is a Sunday free for the employer to compel the employee to labor for him. These are the characteristics of the free Sunday, of the continental Sabbath. It is a sign of the march of improvement that there is a growing discontent with the continental Sabbath in Europe. The masses are beginning to realise that that mode of keeping the Sabbath is not one conducive to their welfare. They are beginning to chafe and grow restive under it, and agitation for its improvement is rife in that country. Sabbath societies have already been formed in Milan, in Rome and in Naples. In Germany the Catholics and Lutherans are petitioning the Government for a better observance of the Sabbath; and the Emperor William of Germany, and the Grand Duke of Baden, and the King of Wurttemberg, expressed sympathy with the object of these societies. Now, surely, I have given evidence enough to show that the continental Sabbath has proved to be a curse rather than a blessing on the continent. I might, Mr. Speaker, spend this whole night in giving evidence from great men, which point to the desirability of enforcing Sabbath observance. I will give a few of them. Blackstone says: "A corruption of morals usually follow a profanation of the Sabbath." De Tocqueville: "Despotism may govern without faith, but liberty cannot." Mirabeau: "God is as necessary as liberty to the French people." La Place: "I have lived long enough to know what at one time I did not believe, that no society can be upheld in happiness and honor without the sentiments of religion." George Bancroft: "Certainly our great united commonwealth is the child of Christianity, and it may, with truth, be asserted that modern civilisation springs into life with our religion, and faith in its principles is the life-boat on which humanity has, at divers times, escaped the most threatening perils." Franklin: "What are laws without morals, and whence shall we get morals except from religion?" Washington: "Reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle." Daniel Webster: "The longer I live the more highly do I esteem the importance of the proper observance of the Christian Sabbath, and the more grateful do I feel towards those who impress its importance on the community. Mr. H. Stewart, in an address at the Sabbath Convention at Rochester, in 1842, said: "Every day's observation and experience confirm the opinion that the ordinances which require the observance of one day in seven, and the Christian faith which hallows it, are our chief security for all civil and religious liberty, for temporal blessings and spiritual hopes." When Sir John Sinclair wrote an essay against what he considered a Puritanical observance of the Sabbath in Scotland, his friend, Adam Smith, though an apologist for Hume, said: "Your book, Sir John, is very ably composed, but the Sabbath, as a political institution, is of inestimable value, independently of its claims to Divine authority." Sabbath observance has been advocated by such men as Gladstone, Disraeli, Shaftesbury, Argyle, Bright, Lincoln, Garfield and thousands of others. The action of the British Government in late years has been such as to show unmistakably the desire of the ruling classes in England to honor and observe the Sabbath. Three times, as I mentioned a short time since, has the British Parliament refused to consent to the opening of the British Museum on Sunday. The proposal has been defeated in each instance by an overwhelming majority. In the House of Commons it was defeated with only forty-eight votes in the affirmative, and in the House of Lords with but thirty-nine in the affirmative. When the Electrical Exhibition was held in Paris in 1881, the English and American Governments united in closing their exhibits on that day, and Mr. W. W. Aterbury, secretary of the New York Sabbath Association, in a letter to Secretary Blaine, called attention to the fact that the English and the United States Governments, at the time of the World's Exposition in London, honored the day by closing their exhibits, and he requested Mr. Blaine to instruct the American Minister at Paris that the same step might be taken with respect to the Electrical Exhibition. This is Mr. Blaine's reply:

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

"WASHINGTON, July 18, 1881.

"Sir—Your letter of the 14th instant, calling the attention of this Government to the propriety of respecting the Sabbath in the American section of the International Exhibition of Electricity, which is soon to be held at Paris, has been received.

"I have to inform you, in reply, that your timely suggestion meets with my cordial approval, and I have accordingly instructed Mr. Morton, the American Commissioner-General, and Mr. Walker, the Honorary Executive Commissioner, to adopt measures to secure the proper observance of the Sabbath in the American section of the Electrical Exhibition.

"I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

"JAMES G. BLAINE."

When application was made to Senator Hawley, then president of the Centennial Exposition, to open the exhibition on the Lord's Day, his noble answer was: "Before God, gentlemen, I would not dare to open the Centennial gates on the Sabbath." So much for the utterances of great men upon this question. With respect to the observance of the Sabbath and the rules for its observance, and the tendency to set those rules at defiance, a new element has been introduced within late years. That new element is the supposed necessity for railway work. There are 900,000 railway employees in Great Britain, the United States and the British colonies, and in consequence of the action of the railway authorities with respect to work upon the Sabbath, at least one-half of those 900,000 are constantly employed on the Sabbath day. Their employment is a matter of great hardship. They are subjected to loss of their weekly rest. The consequence is a deadening of moral influences, and, to a great extent, loss of self-respect. This is a condition of things which does not meet with the approval of the railway employees. Nine out of ten feel it is a great hardship, and express their opinion against being compelled to work on the Sabbath. I have here a petition adopted by 450 locomotive engineers of the New York Central Railway, to Mr. Vanderbilt, for the cessation of Sunday labor. It is a document which covers the whole ground, and I will ask permission from the House to read it. In this document these railway engineers set forth to this railway magnate their reasons for asking for a cessation of Sabbath work. They point out the evils of the system under which they are required to perform Sabbath labor. After pointing out how the running of trains on Sunday had become a great hardship, they continue:

"We have borne this grievance patiently, hoping every succeeding year that it would decrease. We are willing to submit to any reasonable privation, mental or physical, to assist the officers of your company to achieve a financial triumph; but after a long and weary service, we do not see any signs of relief and we are forced to come to you with our trouble, and most respectfully ask you to relieve us from Sunday labor, as far as it is in your power to do so. Our objections to Sunday labor are: First—this never-ending labor ruins our health and prematurely makes us feel worn out like old men, and we are sensible of our inability to perform our duty as well when we work to an excess. Second—that the customs of all civilized countries, as well as all laws, human and Divine, recognise Sunday as a day of rest and recuperation; and notwithstanding intervals of rest might be arranged for us on other days than Sunday, we feel that by so doing we would be forced to exclude ourselves from all church, family, and social privileges that other citizens enjoy. Third—nearly all of the undersigned have children that they desire to have educated in everything that will tend to make them good men and women, and we cannot help but see that our example in ignoring the Sabbath day has a very demoralizing effect upon them. Fourth—because we believe the best interests of the company we serve as well as ourselves, will be promoted thereby, and because we believe locomotive engineers should occupy as high, social, and religious positions as men in any other callings. We know the question will be considered: How can this Sunday work be avoided, with the immense and constantly increasing traffic? We have watched this matter for the past twenty years. We have seen it grow from its infancy until it has arrived at its now gigantic proportions, from one train on the Sabbath until we now have about thirty each way; and we do not hesitate in saying that we can do as much work in six days, with the seventh for rest, as is now done. It is a fact observable by all connected with the immediate running of freight trains that on Monday freight is comparatively light; Tuesday it strengthens a little, and keeps increasing until Saturday; and Sundays are the heaviest of the week.

"The objection may be offered, that if your lines stop the receiving points from other roads will be blocked up. In reply, we would most respectfully suggest, that when the main lines do not run, tributaries would only be too glad to follow the good example. The question might also arise, if traffic is suspended twenty-four hours, will not the company lose one-seventh of its profits? In answer, we will pledge our experience, health and strength, that at the end of the year our employers will not lose one cent, but, on the contrary, will be the gainers financially. Our reasons are these: At present, the duties of your locomotive engineers are incessant, day after day, night succeeding night, Sunday and all, rain or shine, with all the fearful inclemencies of a rigorous winter to contend with. The great strain of both mental and physical faculties constantly employed has a tendency, in time, to impair the requisites so necessary to make a good engineer. Troubled in mind, jaded and worn out in body, the engineer cannot give his duties the attention they should have in order to best advance his employer's interests. We venture to say, not on this broad continent, in any branch of business or traffic, can be found any class in the same position as railway men. They are severed from associations that all hold most dear, debarred from the opportunity of worship, that tribute man owes to his God, witnessing all those pleasures accorded to others, which are the only oasis in the deserts of this life, and with no prospect of relief. We ask you to aid us. Give us the Sabbath for rest after our week of laborious duties, and we pledge you that, with a system invigorated by a season of repose, by a brain eased and cleared by hours of relaxation, we can go to work with more energy, more mental and physical force, and can and will accomplish more work and do it better, if possible, in six days, that we can now do in seven. We can give you ten days in six if you require it, if we can only look forward to a certain period of rest. In conclusion, we hope and trust that, in conjunction with other gentlemen of the trunk lines leading to the seaboard, you will be able to accomplish something that will ameliorate our condition."

This memorial from the locomotive engineers to W. H. Vanderbilt covers the entire ground. It was a reasonable petition, an unanswerable petition, but a petition which was not granted by that magnate, though perhaps the time will come when he will answer for that failure to do his duty to his men in a court where the great railway prince will stand on the same level with the poor engineer-driver. There are some hopeful features, with regard to railway work on the Sabbath, and that is the evidence that almost all the railway managers are ill at ease with regard to this infraction of Sabbath laws. The editor of the Chicago Railway Age, Mr. E. H. Talbot, in 1883, opened a correspondence with various railway managers throughout the United States, with reference to the question of Sunday railway labor, asking their opinions as to whether the evil should not be lessened, and as to whether Sunday traffic could not be abandoned. Many of these replies are of very great interest—of sufficient interest to warrant me, I think, in troubling the House with a few of them. I have one here from Mr. L. J. Sargeant, traffic manager of the Grand Trunk road. He says:

"GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY OF CANADA,
"TRAFFIC MANAGER'S OFFICE,
"MONTREAL, 26th May, 1883.

"To the Editors of the Railway Age:"

"I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter dated 21st instant, addressed to Mr. Hickson, and to inform you in reply, that it is not the practice of this company to run passenger trains on Sunday, excepting for the purpose of completing continuous journeys. Such trains, started on Saturday night, are permitted to go through to destination.

"As regards freight trains, we find it impracticable to suspend that service wholly on Sundays, and should only be able to do so by common agreement between all railway companies.

"On the whole, it is conceivable that the public may find the total suspension of trains on Sunday not to their benefit, as, for instance, in the case of a through train, which, if stopped on its journey, might cause serious inconvenience. At the same time it would be proper, both in the interest of railway employees and for the general benefit, that Sunday labor should be kept within the smallest practicable limits.

"Yours truly,
"L. J. SERGEANT,
"Traffic Manager."

Here is another communication from the manager of the Northern Pacific, dated St. Paul, 16th May, 1883:

"The next question is: Has your company taken any action towards diminution of Sunday labor?"

"I answer: Not officially, but it is understood, as the wish of the management, that the heads of departments shall reduce the amount of Sunday labor in their respective departments as far as practicable. My opinion is most decidedly that the Sabbath rest is an absolute necessity for the maintenance of mental and physical vigor, and that the rule of Sabbath rest cannot long be violated with impunity. Men who conscientiously favor Sabbath observance are likely to be more faithful in the performance of duty than those who are not troubled with conscientious scruples.

"Yours truly,
"H. HAUPT,
"General Manager."

"Editor Railway Age."

The next communication was from Mr. Ledyard, president of the Michigan Central and the Canada Southern roads:

"MICHIGAN CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY,
"DETROIT, MICH., May 14, 1883.

"To the Editors of the Railway Age:"

"I have your letter of May 11, relative to the action recently taken by the president of the Louisville, New Albany and Chicago Railway Company, in ordering the suspension of all trains upon the Sabbath day, and note your request that I shall reply to certain questions, as stated in your letter.

"1. If all railroad companies competing for the same class of traffic from and to common points were in accord, it would be practicable, to a very large extent, to abandon the running of railway trains on the Sabbath day. The chief difficulty is, that in these days of sharp competition time has become such an important element that if one railroad company would voluntarily cease its traffic for one day during the week, while others continued, it would lose largely thereby. Yet, for example, were each of the trunk lines to absolutely refuse to exchange traffic of any kind with their connections, from 6 p. m. Saturday until Monday morning, it would be a simple matter for these trunk lines, as well as for their western connections, to so arrange the movement of traffic as to practically do away with the running of Sunday trains.

"2. There is no question as to the desirability of prohibiting Sunday work on railways. The law of nature, to say nothing of the higher law, requires that man should have rest one day in seven. Is there any reason why a railway engineer or conductor is not entitled to his rest as much as a merchant or manufacturer?"

"3. This company has endeavored to so arrange the runs of its trainmen and engineers as to bring them home on Sunday, but little can be done in that direction without the concerted action on the part of all companies interested in the same traffic.

"4. I do not believe at the end of the year the loss in traffic would be appreciable, were all Sunday work stopped, and in the better morale of the men the railway companies would be abundantly paid for doing away with work on this day.

"Looking at the question from either a moral or economical standpoint, no candid person can uphold the running of trains on Sunday. What is there in the essence of a railroad company different from any other business, which will require an exception to be made of it and its employees to work when others are allowed and expect rest?"

"The effect of this constant and never-ending work is not only injurious to the men themselves, but most deplorable to their families. If it is true, as Lord Bacon says, that a man who has a family has given a hostage to fortune, it is equally true that he should be allowed to live, at least, part of his time with those for whom he has to care, and certainly should have, at least, one day in seven, which, under our system of railway labor, he cannot have, to devote to his own and private matters.

"I am glad you have taken the matter up, for I believe if it is presented to our managers in the best light, whether from a moral or economical standpoint, a few moments reflection will show to each of them that we are all committing a fearful mistake in allowing the continuance and rapid growth of this Sunday work.

"Yours truly,
"H. B. LEDYARD,
"President."

Following is a short communication from Mr. Rutter, president of the New York Central. He says:

"It would be a great relief to managers and employees if all traffic on our railroads could cease during Sunday. I believe that every man is entitled to one day's rest in a week. It was for this that the Sabbath day was created, and it is very much to my regret that I feel compelled to say that the stopping of Sunday traffic is impracticable.

"It is hardly necessary for me to raise all the questions that occur to me in connection with this, and I can only say, that if any plan can be devised for the stoppage of Sunday work on railroads, I will gladly cooperate in it."

Next follows a letter from Mr. Bennett H. Young, president of the Louisville, New Albany and Chicago Railway Company, who had the courage to totally suspend the Sunday traffic on his road, with the exception of one local mail train. It is a letter addressed to the editor of the Railway Age, as follows:—

"Some weeks since I felt impelled, by various reasons, to order the discontinuance upon the Louisville, New Albany and Chicago Railway, as far as possible, of all labor on the Sabbath day. This order was not the result of an impulse, nor was it issued without the expectation of sharp criticism and even unkind misconstruction; it was made because I considered it right, viewed either from a religious, political or practical standpoint. It has provoked more discussion than I anticipated, but the expression of a necessity for a day of rest on the part of other railway managers has been to me exceedingly gratifying.

"While admitting that this is an age of intense practicality, and that in the hurry and drive of the present of our country, many are disposed to forget all other considerations than those of gain, this discussion has demonstrated that upon one ground or other there is deep-seated in the minds of the business men of this country a desire to observe a day of rest. For one, I do not hesitate to say that I consider the Sabbath a Divine institution, and that a disregard of the day is a violation of God's command, and that the mere fact of operating a railway for public necessity is no excuse for the dishonor done to the precept of our Maker.

"As religious bias must more or less affect particular views on this subject, many would be disposed to put aside those considerations and demand some more practical argument on the question. In the discussion of so broad a subject points can only be stated.

"1. Then, I suggest that without a day of rest man can neither enjoy health nor freedom. The Sabbath is essential to religion, and religion is essential to freedom, good government and prosperity. History contains no example of a free, progressive and successful people who did not recognise God. No thoughtful man can controvert the statement that religion is dependent upon the observance of a day of rest. Blot out the Sabbath in this country, and with it the influences of religion for a period of fifty years, and the face of our social, moral and political condition would be entirely changed. The testimony of all railroad men in this discussion has shown that a day of relaxation or rest is essential to the proper and faithful discharge of the duties which devolve upon railway employees; and if this were not so, human experience fully establishes this principle.

"2. Whatever may be the religious views of men, it has been universally conceded that religion makes a man better qualified for the discharge of every duty, and that in every sphere in which he acts the impulse of a Christian life is for good.

"If railways teach their employees to violate the Sabbath, and also with it to violate the laws of the State, and thus dull the obligation they feel both to God and to the State, they must necessarily have less respect for the laws of the railway itself, and less sense of obligation to their employers. No man who has any intimate connection with railways can fail to observe the lack of interest on the part of the employees in the corporate welfare, and this is in a large degree attributable to the indifference of the corporate managers themselves to the rights, privileges and consciences of their employees. With the eradication of religion goes all idea of future punishment, and this renders men less controllable and less amenable to reason. Religion is a safe-guard for property as well as liberty. One church is worth a dozen policemen; and the social and moral power of religion in the discharge of the duties devolving upon men is simply immeasurable.

"I see that in one of your late issues it is rumored this order of mine will be rescinded. I have only to say that, so far as tried, the results are more than satisfactory; no injury or loss has been sustained; the employees have in many ways expressed their gratitude and thanks for this privilege which has been extended to them in the way of cessation of work on Sunday; and that so long as I remain in the management of the road no change will be made.

"Truly yours,
"BENNET H. YOUNG,
"President."

Two months after, the Railway Age contained an editorial giving the results of this action of the manager of this road—an editorial entitled, "Two Months of Sunday Observance:"

"The two months which have passed since President Young issued an order forbidding the running of Sunday trains, except those carrying mail, on the Louisville, New Albany and Chicago Railway, have been the most prosperous of any in the history of the road. President Young recently telegraphed: 'Our June business has been larger than ever before, and the aggregate earnings the largest on record.' While the experience of one railway for two months is by no means conclusive of the question at issue, yet it certainly tends to refute the position taken by so many managers, that a single railway or a portion of the railways of the country cannot afford to cease Sunday work, and that Sunday observance is not practicable unless all railways unite in it. The Louisville, New Albany and Chicago road has discontinued Sunday traffic and has increased its business, and there is no indication that its earnings for May or June are one dollar less than they would have been if its employees had been worked seven days in each week. The results of the reform inaugurated by the management of this important line will be watched with great interest. While the religious element in the problem should not be ignored or undervalued, the decisive point will doubtless be the economical results of the experiment. Meanwhile it is very gratifying to know that the best of employees of one railway in this country have been permitted, during bright May and delicious June, to enjoy the sweets of Sunday quietness and rest without doing financial injury to any one."

The last quotation I shall give with reference to Sunday work is an article from President Samuel Sloan, of the Delaware, Lackawana and Western road. This is a road which occupies a very enviable position in regard to Sunday labor. It is a road in which the late William E. Dodge was largely interested, and which has, since it first commenced running trains, scrupulously abstained from Sunday work. It is a road now reaching from New York to Buffalo, with western connections, and is one of the most prosperous in the United States. Mr. Sloan says:

"It seems to me that all railroad managers must sympathise with efforts to diminish 'Sunday labor,' now, I regret to see, on the increase. In my judgment the necessity, so much urged, does not exist, nor do the public demand from railroad management more work than ordinary labor. Railroad men have a right to rest one day in seven and to observe the Sabbath as much as any other fellow-citizens. It must be, and is conceded by all interested, that health and good discipline are promoted by this rest. Without repeating the excellent suggestions made by prominent railroad officials in the foregoing communications, I think that it would be an easy matter for the Trunk Line Commission to take up the subject, and refer it to a committee to report some regulations or agree upon certain trains that may be deemed necessary to meet any reasonable demands of competing interests or the public wants in regard to perishable property.

"SAMUEL SLOAN,
"President."

So much for the positions and opinions of railway managers. The quotations I have made from a great mass of communications from railway managers show most conclusively that these men, as a rule, feel that the position occupied by the corporations in the United States is not a desirable one. They evidently feel that in depriving their employees of Sunday rest, and in transacting the great mass of business transacted on the Sabbath, they are guilty of wrong-doing, and many of them feel the desire, and have taken steps in the direction of carrying out the desire they feel, to lessen the evil. No doubt it would be desirable to introduce a Bill upon this subject, of wider scope than the one presented tonight to this House, but this is probably impracticable. All the railways in Canada have absolute control over their local business, and the forbidding of excursion trains on the Sabbath will not imperil the interest of any trunk line in the Dominion, but if we went further we might seriously interfere with railway corporations whose operations are, to a great extent, through business, and being thus intimately united with the traffic in the United States, the co-operation of the United States railways would be required. But we can deal with the question so far as the Bill now presented to the House deals with it, and it is to prevent this form of Sunday desecration, these excursions by railway or steamer, that this Bill is introduced. Many arguments are adduced in favor of Sunday excursions. They are said to be conducive to health and rest, and that it would be a hardship to deprive the people at large of the privilege of going upon Sunday excursions. I propose, for a few moments, to examine into that assertion and see whether it rests upon adequate grounds. Rest and health, I think, we will find when we examine into this question, are not promoted by Sunday excursions, but that as a rule they have a directly opposite effect. So far from promoting health and rest, they are often drunken saturnalias, resulting, more often than not, in riot and even in robbery and murder. Let me give a specimen of Sunday excursions. It is rather an aggravated specimen, but it will answer as a specimen of the whole class :

"FREE LIQUOR, SABBATH-BREAKING AND MURDER.—On the Sabbath, August 31st 1884, in the afternoon, a barge towed by a steam tug made fast to a pier at the foot of West Eleventh street, in New York. She had returned prematurely from an excursion on which she had set out in the morning. Scarcely were her lines made fast when a crowd of drunken men poured hurriedly ashore and rapidly dispersed. Many of the men were without hats or coats, and the faces of many were bruised and bleeding. The dresses of the women were disordered, and their hair fell tangled about their shoulders. On board, the evidences of a fierce fight were everywhere apparent. The deck was strewn with broken glass, with sandwiches and boiled hams, and was slippery with ice cream and beer. In the cabin the dead body of a middle-aged man lay on the floor, his three sons sobbing beside him."

Then it goes on to describe the excursion of the employees of the Empire steam laundry, New York. They were going down to Linden Grove, on Staten Island, for rest and health; they went well primed with whiskey and beer, and were not long out when the men became infuriated by liquor and engaged in a free fight, in which the women also took part. A poor and inoffensive German, who had charge of the lunch counter, being unable to fill twenty orders at once, was attacked by these people with beer bottles and clubs, mangled dreadfully and beaten into an almost unrecognisable mass of flesh. This was a fair specimen of Sunday excursions, such as sail every Sabbath day from New York to Coney Island and Staten Island. The Rev. Mr. Crafts, of New York, who has taken great interest in the Sabbath question, has addressed enquiries to a great number of employers in various parts of the Union. He has addressed enquiries to about 150 large employers of labor, the object of these enquiries being to ascertain whether the employees who spend the Sabbath in this way or the church-going employees are the most valuable laborers, and the answers are almost uniformly to the effect that the church-going people are the most valuable. One employer, who employs 200 men, says, "Church going men are 25 per cent. more effective as laborers than those who spend their Sundays in Sunday excursions." A German pastor, who has charge of a large church in New York, says: "Those who spend Sundays in pic-nics require all day Monday to get over the effects of their recreation." The general testimony on the subject is that Sabbath observers and church-goers, whether laborers, mechanics, merchants or professional men, are in far better condition to enter on work when they spend the Sunday in church-going, than those who spend the Sunday, even in comparatively innocent pleasure. Pic-nics, no doubt, are tiresome, while, on the contrary, short practical sermons are restful. Colonel Fairbanks, of the standard scales business, says :

"Those who attend church and Sunday school on Sunday are the most valuable in our business. I can tell the difference between them and others in the work in the shop."

Church-goers can be recognised in a crowd, for they are clean, healthy and prosperous. Mr. Clem Studenbarker, the manager of a very extensive wagon factory in Ohio, says :

"My observation is that clerks and mechanics who spend their Sabbath in church and Sabbath school work are the best fitted for the work in the office, or in the shop, on Monday morning."

The celebrated Hugh Miller, the great geologist in Scotland, gives the following very interesting description of the appearance of a train of Sunday excursionists returning to Edinburgh after a day in the country :—

"There did not seem to be much enjoyment about the wearied and somewhat draggled groups; they wore, on the contrary, rather an unhappy physiognomy, as if they had missed spending the day quite to their minds, and were now returning sad and disappointed to the round of toil from what ought to have proved a sweet relaxation and relief. A congregation just dismissed from hearing a vigorous evening discourse would have borne to a certainty a more cheerful air."

But it may be asked what reasons may be given for suppressing Sunday excursions? I would answer that they are open to several objections. They are open to this objection: They rob one class of employees of their Sunday rest in order that they may minister to the pleasure of others. I refer to the men employed upon railway trains and steamers. These men are prevented taking Sunday rest in order that the passengers by train or steamboat may enjoy Sunday pic-nics. The next reason is, such excursions are fruitful of disorder, vice and crime; the next is, because such excursions invade the Sabbath quiet and morality of places to which they go, and the next reason is, because they secularise the Sabbath, and, by breaking down its sacredness, they prepare for the abolition of the rest to all classes that the Sabbath is designed to give. It may be said: It is unnecessary to deal with this question by law; it is a moral matter; let public sentiment settle it. In relation to that, I may answer that the Sabbath cannot be preserved without law. It has been found necessary to put laws upon the Statute Book with regard to Sabbath observance in England since 826; in the fourth century, Constantine passed a law in regard to Sabbath observance; and it will be found that, where there are no Sabbath laws, there is practically no Sabbath. The Christian sentiment of Canada, I believe the universal Christian sentiment of Canada, is in favor of this measure. I believe I am warranted in this assertion by the pastoral letter of Archbishop Taschereau, by the utterances of His Holiness the Pope, of Cardinal McCloskey, of Archbishop Gibbon, of the Bishop of Buffalo, all these high church dignitaries expressly prohibiting Sunday excursions and declaring them to be mortal sins. I am warranted by the concurrent testimony of the Protestant divines in this country, and by the demand of the great mass of the Christian people of this country. I am warranted in saying that the Christian sentiment of Canada, of all sects and classes of believers, asks for this Bill from this House. We fortunately, as a people, enjoy a very high character with respect to Sabbath observance. It is said that the city of Toronto enjoys the proud position of being the city of all the cities upon the face of the globe where the Sabbath is observed most strictly; and this characteristic applies to such cities as Hamilton, London, in a great degree to such cities as Ottawa and Montreal, to the cities of the Maritime Provinces, and even to Quebec.

An hon. MEMBER. Even?

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes; the mode of spending the Sabbath in Quebec is perhaps not quite as strict as in Montreal or in Ottawa, but, as compared with other cities in other countries, there is not a city in the Dominion of Canada that does not occupy a favorable position in regard to the Sabbath. Now, we have a right to ask, with all the concurrence of testimony from the various prelates and divines in this country and the evident pressure of public sentiment in this respect, that this Government shall do all it can possibly do to preserve this noble record which this country has, and I have the honor to present this Bill to the House of Commons for its second reading to-night. The Bill provides simply that Sunday excursions by steamboats plying for hire, or by railway, or in part by railway and in part by steamboat, starting and returning the same day, shall be prohibited; and it provides a penalty of $500 for an infraction of this law, to be collected upon complaint of any individual in the county, city or town from which the excursion starts, one-half of the penalty to go to the informer or prosecutor and the other half to the municipality of the county, city or town in which the action is brought. The Bill does not apply to ferries or to steamboats employed thereon, but simply and exclusively to excursions by steamboat or railway, or in part by steamboat and in part by railway. Mr. Speaker, I move the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It is not my intention to detain this House at any length and to discuss the different points, to analyse or to criticise the different quotations that the hon. gentleman, in his learned essay on the Lord's Day and the day of rest, has been giving to the House for the last few minutes. I, as all in this House must have like myself, admired the earnestness of the hon. member, his researches, his deep conviction on the subject that he has so cleverly treated. The Lord's Day and the day of rest are the consequences of the law of labor which was imposed upon humanity and which, drawing man towards the earth that he was obliged to till, made his eyes not to look towards heaven but to look to the ground where he had to work; and, as a relief from that first servitude, the Lord said that at least one day out of the seven days of the week, or at certain hours, man should have not only the privilege, but that the order should be given to him, to raise his forehead, to raise his eyes to heaven and to think of Him who had punished him and who might also save him and his posterity. Nobody can deny the good of the institution. It is of Divine institution. No one can deny the good, in a humanitarian sense, which proceeds from that law of having man to rest one day. The law of nature would require it. Constant labor would not be good for the good workingman. I have admired, and I have agreed with the hon. gentleman, and all those whom he has quoted, in saying that the best workingman is the man who has taken his good rest during the Sunday, who has attended to his religious duties, and who, on Monday, goes back to his work with his heart light, with his mind not taken up with any bad ideas, but ready to begin again the execution, the fulfilment of that law of labor which is part of the law of the salvation of man. I have been not astonished but pleased to see the numerous quotations made by the hon. gentleman. I must say that the authority of many of them might be perhaps contradictory if, on the application of the principle which is involved, we were to come to the orders and prescriptions given by those whose authority he has quoted. We have had from the Genesis to Mirabeau. The authorities are not very similar in their moral tone, perhaps, but it appears they came to the same point. We have had from Mr. Louis Blanc as from the Pope. They are not exactly nearly related. We have had a good many of them; but to what does all that tend? It tends to say a thing that nobody contests—that there should be a day of rest, that there should be a day of prayer in the week. The hon. gentleman has said that law is necessary to make Sunday observance one of the institutions of this world. I regret it. I regret that the policeman should be required to force a man to understand the Divine commands of his Master. I would be sorry to see that the policeman is necessary to make people understand that the man is not a brute, and that even for the brute rest is necessary. Then these two principles are not at all contested, of the day of prayer and the day of rest. Shall we, by a law, prescribe what is a day of rest? My hon. friend cannot, more than I could or anybody in this House, say what a day of rest must be. One would like to rest in one manner; another prefers another manner. One would like to rest sitting in his own house; another promenading outside. One may think that reading a book, be it the Holy Book or be it only any other book, in one's house, closeted in one's room, is not perhaps as right a way of having a good day's rest as taking outside the fresh air, either on the river, or in a promenade, or even a drive. The manner in which this rest should be taken is prescribed, and the direction for it are given by those who have the morality of the people in charge; that task does not belong to us. In the next place, Mr. Speaker, what rule ought we to follow in the religious observance of Sunday? Here again we cannot agree in this House, and fortunately we are not called upon to discuss, still less to decide, that question. I am one of those members of the House who cherish most deeply, in a mixed community like ours, the liberty of conscience, of creed and religion. On every proper occasion I have stated that whatever was the creed or the religious opinion of my fellow-countrymen, I would respect it. But if we were to frame a law for the compulsory observance of the Sunday we would be infringing upon liberty of conscience, and if we were to adopt the principle involved in the proposition of my hon. friend, we should also infringe civil liberty. I cannot consent that he shall dictate to me what is the true and proper way of observing the Sunday. The hon. gentleman said the best workman is the man who attends the Sunday school and reads his Bible on Sunday. If he does that on Sunday he certainly does a good thing. But, Mr. Speaker, I know very good workingmen, fathers of families, who have brought up their children in the fear of God, and in the spirit of obedience to the laws of the country; and these men, after attending mass for an hour and listening to a sermon—not always so long, perhaps, as the lecture we have heard to-night, but as good and as sound—did not think they were offending their Maker, because they afterwards enjoyed a few hours recreation and passed the day as they did in the good old times whose praises have been sung by men who were the friends of morality, when we read of the parson who, on coming out of church, would stop to listen to the fiddle and to watch the boys and girls dancing on the green. These people were just as good tillers of the land, just as industrious and just as good fathers of families as those who pass the day reading the Bible in their houses. Far from my mind is it to find fault with those who believe that the latter mode is the best, but it is largely a question of taste. The hon. gentleman has given a description of a Sunday whiskey excursion in New York, from which, however, I do not think our country is threatened at the present time. Surely, Mr. Speaker, we ought not to judge a question of this kind by an example which is exceptional even in the country from which it is taken. I have read in books trustworthy statements that at certain so-called religious meetings, an excitement prevailed at certain moments which was anything but religious in its nature. I do not believe all that is said about revivals, but I do believe that at some of these meetings things take place which are certainly not edifying to those who witness them. But we have no right to judge of the opinions and convictions of the people who are attending these meetings. Revivals may not always be quite free from harm, but still I would not ask for legislation to regulate them. Then, Mr. Speaker, if we are not able to decide upon the true and precise interpretation of the Lord's command with reference to the observance of Sunday, I think we are hardly able to decide that point by legislation in this House. I may be told, perhaps, that we are not asked to make such a definition. Mr. Speaker, if we accept this Bill I do not see why we should not go farther. If we say in this House that steamboat and railway excursions shall be prevented on Sunday, why may we not say that no one shall go outside his own house on Sunday? We might as well say to the citizens that the observance of the Divine command forbids him to walk outside his house, or to play music on Sunday, or to do many other things which people think they have a right to do. It would be a violation of their liberty to do this. Now, Sir, our federal constitution has settled this matter for us, and we are fortunately precluded by that instrument from legislating in reference to it. In order to ensure that harmony which should prevail in a community like ours, composed of various creeds and nationalities, a community that has grown to be so strong and so prosperous, those who framed our constitution have provided that matters like this should be left to the Provincial Legislatures, and that the Federal Parliament has no right to interfere in any way with those rights which belong first to the family, second to the municipality and thirdly to the Province. I say that this proposition infringes the religious rights, it infringes the municipal rights and the municipal liberties of the citizens; and I know that I am not speaking alone when I say that it infringes on provincial liberty. If the people of Ontario or of any other Province desire to observe Sunday in a particular way, let them enjoy that right; certainly I have no desire to interfere with them. But I cannot see what right a majority in this House have to say to the people of Quebec, for instance, that they have no right to run a railway, on Sunday, from one part of the Province to another, or to run a steamboat from the city of Montreal to St. Lamberts or Longueuil, or from the city of Quebec to the Island of Orleans, or the Falls of Montmorency, or Lévis or St. Romuald. Let each city, each corporation, each Province, make its own regulations. The hon. gentleman said that preventing a man from having his rest on Sunday is to take away the liberty of the laborer, who has a right to one day's rest in seven; that it is an attack upon the law of labor to deprive the laborer of his day of rest. He has gone further; he has said that Sunday was the great school of the people, and that the question of the observance of Sunday was one of the greatest educational questions that could be brought before this Parliament. Certainly, I believe that the people ought to be educated in the observance of Sunday, and perhaps I would go further than my fellow-countrymen generally go in that sense. The hon. gentleman says that the city of Toronto was known all over this Dominion as the queen city for the observance of Sunday, and he could not help saying also that Ottawa was remarkable for this, and so was Montreal and Quebec. I am sorry he did not mention the city of Three Rivers, represented in this House by my colleague the hon. Minister of Public Works. I am sure if he omitted to mention Three Rivers, it was through a slip of the tongue or forgetfulness on the part of the hon. member. We do not want a law when, as the hon. gentleman has stated, the highest religious authorities are already endeavoring to prevent—what?—not to say that such a thing is a crime; not to say that amusement on Sunday is a sin, but to say that excursions where whiskey and its immoral accessories prevail, are excursions which should not only be discountenanced but should be forbidden, and forbidden under the most heavy penalties of the Church. The law has nothing to do with that matter, except as regards the keeping of the public peace. If the people are educated in this matter, there is no need of law; we can safely trust to the religious authorities for the good work of teaching their people the due observance of Sunday. I understand the motive of the mover of this resolution, and far from blaming the hon. gentleman, I think that, from this discussion, a great deal of good will come. I think it is well that it should be known throughout the land that here the legislators are thinking of this desirable result, the observance of the Lord's Day, a day of rest after the week's labors. It is desirable that the people should know that the representatives whom they have sent here to make the laws of the country have not been forgetting this matter; and it is pleasant, I must say, to see a layman rising in his place, as the hon. gentleman has done, to come and assist in the crusade which archbishops, bishops, priests and clergymen have entered upon, not of prohibiting outdoor exercise on Sunday, but of seeking to suppress abuses. I invite those who are generally exceedingly particular on the question of the rights of the different Provinces to support me in saying that this legislation is not such as comes within the power of this Parliament, and that each Province should attend to it for itself. I cannot resume my seat, Mr. Speaker, without referring to something that has been said by the hon. member. He has allowed himself to be carried a little too far. For instance, in his comparison of the different countries of the world where Sunday observance was the rule, and those countries where there was no Sunday observance, some remarks have been made which the hon. gentleman could have omitted. The hon. gentleman referred generally to Sunday observance in England. I have not travelled much, but I have been in London a few Sundays, and I have never seen so many trains, in any other city in Europe where I have travelled, as left the English metropolis on that day. I am perfectly sure that there was no increase of crime engendered by those excursions, which had for their purpose and object to give fresh air to those who had worked hard all the week long in the unhealthy districts of the great city. The hon. gentleman has endeavored to show by statistics the increase of crime in countries where Sunday was not observed after the manner of the hon. gentleman. I must say that statistics of the kind he submitted to the House are very fallacious. The amount of crime in certain countries on the continent of Europe is not due and cannot be ascribed to outdoor excursions on Sunday. I desire, in conclusion, again to draw the attention of hon. members of this House to the fact that such legislation as is proposed does not belong to this Parliament, but to the Legislatures of the different Provinces. If it is intended to regulate the religious observance of the Sabbath, it belongs to the church authorities or to the family, and we should not interfere. If it is to prevent accidental misbehavior and preserve peace, it becomes a police and municipal regulation that belongs to municipal corporations. If it is to regulate the relations of master and servant, or to protect the laboring classes, it affects civil rights; and the subject is one that belongs to Provincial Legislatures. I think the measure is ultra vires, and we would not act in accordance with constitutional principles in legislating on the matter.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I think if the hon. gentleman who brought in this Bill can fairly be charged with taking up the time of the House unnecessarily, in proving what we are all ready to admit, the wisdom of Sunday observance, on economical, to say nothing of religious grounds, I think the Secretary of State has transgressed in another direction. The gist of his argument is this: You must not infringe the liberty of the subject by any such legislation as is proposed. I contend that this legislation in no sense tends to impair the liberty of the subject. All it does is to say that one particular thing shall not be done, not because it might not be desirable in many cases, and attended sometimes with advantage, but because it will necessarily bring with it certain specified evils, which the country has a perfect right to legislate against. If the argument of the Secretary of State is worth anything, and can fairly be pushed to anything like its logical conclusion, we might just as well say that Parliament should not legislate against selling liquor on Sunday, and in other directions for the observance of Sunday. The hon. gentleman entirely failed to catch the point of the Bill, and his argument will fail to convince hon. members that this measure should be rejected on the special ground adduced by him. There is one point which may be fairly considered. We all, naturally, when we argue a question of this kind, look for an example to Great Britain, where there has been legislation for many years; where there is a very large population, and where there are conditions in many respects similar to ours, and in many other respects entirely dissimilar. All these measures are matters of compromise, and the arguments in regard to them cannot be pushed to their legitimate conclusions; otherwise, it is impossible to avoid coming to an absurdity whichever way you push the argument. But, in regard to England, and London particularly, we easily see the difference in the position of the people there and the people in this country. In London the population is as large as the whole population of this country; it is crammed together within a very small compass, and Sunday trains may be necessary in order to allow people to get out into the country. There are, moreover, a large number of inhabitants who otherwise would find it impossible to obtain that advantage. It may be proper, in such a case, to make a compromise in that direction. You may say the advantages are greater than the disadvantages that follow. But can it be said that the residents of our towns and cities require Sunday trains in order to enable them to obtain that recreation which is necessary to health, and which people are reasonably entitled to enjoy? There is no analogy between the two cases. It is a matter of compromise, whichever way you put it, and a compromise which is legitimate and proper in the case of London, Liverpool, Manchester or Glasgow, is not reasonable when we come to apply it to the towns of this country. The principal objections to what this legislation seeks to prohibit are two: first, we cannot grant to those who enjoy the pleasures, if pleasures they are, of Sunday excursions, without at once trenching on the liberty of the subject in another direction, because the employees of railways and steamboats tell you that in order to run those trains and work those steamboats you deny them Sunday rest, and infringe on their liberty as much as, in the other case, you would infringe on other people's liberty. For the sake of giving a possible advantage to a certain number you inflict a disadvantage on a certain other number. Here is another question of compromise. You must distinctly and clearly establish that the benefits you confer are less than the wrongs you inflict, before the House is justified in saying that a Bill of this country should not be passed. The condition of our people does not require such a compromise, and there is no necessity, as regards the general welfare of the community, that a certain number of persons should be compelled to violate their consciences, and be placed at a disadvantage with every other class of labor. I think this is the principal point we should consider; at any rate, it is one important point, and it weighs with me very strongly. The other point to which I allude is this, that it is a dangerous thing, in legislation of this kind, to know exactly where to stop. If you once admit the principle of steamboats or railways running pleasure or excursion trains, you do not know where it will land you. This is the great argument which was brought up in England against doing that which would have been an exceedingly beneficial thing in itself, that is, the opening of museums and other such places of amusement on Sundays. It was felt in England and, I am sure, many hon. members and many other people will feel the same thing here, that the moment you allow the principle laid down by the Secretary of State to guide your legislation in this matter, there is no knowing how far it will lead you; and as there is no corresponding advantage to be gained, compared with the positive evils which may arise, it is better for us to take early steps, such as it is proposed to take by the very reasonable provisions of this Bill, to prevent that being done which otherwise is very likely to be done. For those reasons, on those two grounds, altogether irrespective of other considerations and the common arguments as to Sabbath observance, I, for one, shall heartily support the Bill of the hon. member from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton).

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The speech of the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill has been addressed to the whole subject of Sabbath observance, but the Bill is confined to only one branch of that question. The first clause provides:

"Sunday excursions by steamboats plying for hire, or by railway, or in part by any such steamboat and in part by railway, and having for their only or principal object the carriage of Sunday passengers for amusement or pleasure only, and to go and return on the same day, by the same steamboat or railway, or any other owned by the same person or persons or company, shall be unlawful and shall not be deemed a lawful conveying of travellers, within the meaning of any statute of Canada, or of any Province of Canada, permitting the conveyance of travellers on the Lord's Day."

The second clause goes on to say that the owners shall be liable to be sued in a civil court by civil action for a large sum of money, and this sum is recoverable in any court of competent jurisdiction, in the place in which the steamboat or train employed on the excursion started, or through which it passed, or at which it stopped, and the money recovered shall be divided, one moiety to go to the plaintiff, and the other moiety to the municipality of the city, town, village or place from which the unlawful excursion started. The Bill is limited to excursions, and it is provided that such conveyances shall be considered to be unlawful, and that the owners of them shall be subject to a civil action. It seems to me that the constitutional point taken by the Secretary of State is a good one; that this is a matter affecting civil rights. If Parliament should take the responsibility of declaring that such excursions, or any act of non-observance or breach of observance of the Sabbath, was a crime, it might thereby be brought within the criminal law, and therefore within the competence of this Parliament. It seems to me that the mere fact of its not being declared to be a crime, but merely to be an unlawful act, and the action to be brought a civil action for damages, gives away the case, so far as the competence of the Dominion Parliament is concerned. The hon. gentleman, in fact, declared in his speech that he did not propose to interfere with vessels sailing on a long voyage, or railways carrying through traffic. That might interfere with our relations with the United States, or with the great currents of trade. Well, it might be, Mr. Speaker, that under the authority of several decisions, that the effect of this through traffic, this wholesale traffic, being the traffic which the hon. gentleman does not wish to interfere with—that traffic might come within the Dominion law; but these excursions, such as in Toronto harbor, or those my hon. friend has spoken of from Montreal or Quebec, certainly ought to be within the governance and control of the Provincial Legislature, and the provincial administration of affairs—within the cognizance and control of the municipalities. It appears to me that the Bill is ultra vires.

* Motion for second reading negatived on a division.

PATENT ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew), moved the second reading of Bill (No. 25) further to amend the Patent Act of 1872.

Mr. CARON. I regret to say that I cannot agree with my hon. friend that this Bill should be placed on our Statute Book. This legislation may be looked upon in Canada as new legislation, but it is legislation which was attempted to be introduced into the United States by the Bill presented last year to Congress, and called the Voorhees Bill, which was rejected by the Senate of that country. The principle of the Bill would have this effect: that though the seller of the patented article might not have the right to sell it, still the sale would be valid, and the real owner would not be able to obtain redress from the person found in possession of such patented article. Viewing it as I do, from a purely legal point of view, I do not see why an exception should be made, with respect to the rights of patentees—I do not see why the principle of law which applies in every other contract, in every other line of business, should not also apply to this. It seems to me that the purchaser of any patented article should be called upon to look after and protect the interest of the public carefully, in so far as purchasing an article which he has no right to purchase. The principle of the law of contract should apply to this matter as it does to every other. The patentee under the present law obtains for a certain limited period of time the exclusive right of disposing of the article which he patents; and I would ask my hon. friend how he can expect that the Parliament of this country will apply to these persons a different principle from that which prevails in every other business transaction? Why should the patentee, who, through his skill and labor, has succeeded in producing an article which may be of considerable use to the public, not be able to protect himself like the owners of any other article, if it has been unlawfully acquired by any other individual? And when it comes to a question affecting the patent rights of a patentee, why should the whole brunt of the battle be left to him? Why should the patentee be called upon to go beyond what other owners of property are required to do to secure their property? According to the information given to me by the Department, I find that occasional, but very occasional isolated cases occur, in which damages for infringement are claimed from innocent users. But such cases are very rare, and the effect of the proposed law would be to throw difficulties in the way of honest patentees obtaining their just rights. I do not believe that the Bill proposed by my hon. friend would be an improvement on our present law. I do not see why the owner of a patent should be deprived of his property or his right because somebody buys it in ignorance. The purchaser of those rights should be called upon to take the necessary precautions to ascertain whether what he is purchasing he is entitled to purchase, and whether he can do it without infringing upon the rights of other parties. As I view it, the risk should fall upon the purchaser, and the patentee should never be called upon to assume all the burden of protecting his own patent. I believe that the present Bill would lead to endless litigation. I believe that the purchaser of any patent rights, when called upon to account for the infringement of the rights of the patentee, would invariably bring up a plea of having been an innocent purchaser of those rights. The law, as it now exists, I believe, has not proved to be inconvenient. I know that some cases may be quoted, and will no doubt be quoted; but still, judging from the results of the law as it now exists, I believe the present Bill would not be an improvement on it; and consequently, I must say I do not think that this Bill should be placed upon the Statute Book.

Mr. MULOCK. I agree very largely with the remarks which have fallen from the Minister of Militia. We have on our Statute Book a Patent Act which is designed to encourage inventions, and for a certain time to protect the inventor. Now, it appears to me that if this Bill were passed in its present form, it would practically repeal the Patent Act. There would at once spring up a new class of inventors, a class of men whose ingenuity would be directed to making use of the inventions of others and selling them to the public, concealing from the public that they were selling to them articles manufactured under a patent. I would like to know how many persons who buy patented articles are aware that the articles are patented. No one, in fact, is aware, when he is buying an article that is patented, that he is paying for a patent at all. Occasionally there are exceptions to that rule; but we take goods and chattels from hand to hand, trusting to the title of the vendor, believing that he has a good title. I sympathise with the object of the mover of this Bill, but I think he is taking the wrong course in order to provide a remedy. I fancy that what he has in his mind is the case of the sale, very recently, of certain patented articles—I think they were purifiers, which were sold, I think, in good faith; but it was found afterwards that the manufacturers of those articles had infringed certain patents, and I believe the purchasers were compelled to return the articles or pay for them a second time. Now, if the mover desires to provide a remedy, I think his plan would be to propose some scheme whereby greater penalties might be imposed on persons who infringe the Patent Act; and if it is necessary to do so, let the vendor of a patented article who has no right to sell it be punished severely, in order to enforce the patent law. In that way the innocent purchaser will, in most cases, be protected, and the patentee also will be protected. But if this Bill is passed, we might as well, I think, at once repeal this Patent Act.

Mr. SPROULE. I cannot agree at all with the expressions given vent to by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). He asks, how many know that the articles they are using are patented? and in answer to that he says, very few. Then, if men unfortunately violate a law simply because they have no means of ascertaining the fact, and have to pay, in consequence, heavy damages, this is, I think, an injustice. I think that the reference that the hon. gentleman gave himself is one of the strongest reasons why a law of this nature should be passed. During the last few years an invention has been introduced into the mills in the various parts of Ontario. The gentleman who manufactured this invention sold the articles to millers at a heavy price, and the millers, believing they were not violating any patent law in purchasing them, put them in their mills. Shortly afterwards they were notified that they had violated the Patent Act, and would have to pay heavy damages for the use of this invention. What was the result? They were compelled to pay, in many instances, damages as high as $100 and upwards. These men purchased and used the invention in good faith, believing they were not violating the patent or any other law—believing that the party who sold them had a perfect right to do so. I believe it would be quite right to punish the party who sold an invention, knowing that in so doing he was violating some other man's patent; it would be well to punish him, but I believe that the people who were led unwittingly to purchase the invention in good faith ought not to be punished. We can apply this rule to many other lines. Mowing machines and binding machines are often made up of various patents, and what farmer can tell when he is violating or when he is not violating the rights of half a dozen men who have patented different parts; yet are we to be told that he must go to the trouble and expense of ascertaining from the Department here whether he is violating the law or not? Are we to be told that the duty must be imposed upon him of investigating, when purchasing a machine, not only the machine itself, as a whole, but every part of it that is patented, before he can have the right to use it without leaving himself open to actions for heavy damages? You may apply this to other machines, to threshing, mowing, sewing machines; in every instance the rule holds equally good. That duty should not be imposed on those who use the machines. I would inflict a heavy penalty on those who violate the law in selling and manufacturing them. The party who exercised his ingenuity or skill in making an invention would thus have all the redress he required against the party in the first instance who violated the patent, and then against the party who sold the article in violation of the patent. If those which oppose this measure knew of all the practical instances during the past year in which injustice was worked against the people who had used pieces of machinery in good faith, and were compelled to pay penalties ranging from $50 to $150 in consequence, they would be inclined to agree with the mover of this Bill, that it is in the right direction, that it is what he should do in protecting people who may be brought into conflict with the patent law, without any knowledge on their part and without any legitimate means of knowing whether or not they were violating the law.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I propose to offer very few observations on this matter which I have brought before the attention of the House. In dealing with this question I will not, as my hon. friend the Minister of Militia did, deal with it from a legal, but will treat it from a common-sense point of view. It will, I think, be admitted that there are a great many articles patented in the Patent Office of this country for which patents have been obtained and which vary to a very limited extent from previous inventions. Some slight modification or addition to an article that has been manufactured and sold in the open market for a long period of time may be made, and a patent may be obtained for that invention; and it seems to me that it is a very great hardship that those who purchase those patented articles in the open market, with the conviction that the persons who are selling them and who manufactured them had the right to sell and manufacture them, should be compelled to pay damages for the innocent use of the articles, many of which are used in every-day life. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken has instanced several cases in which great hardship arose, through the purchase of articles for ordinary domestic use, agricultural implements and numerous articles used by the people every day, the purchasers of which were subjected to penalties, though they had practically no means of ascertaining that they had violated any law. It has been stated by the hon. member for North York, (Mr. Mulock), who spoke upon this subject, that the proposition I make would practically repeal the patent laws. I deny that. I say that the owner of a patent right would be amply protected by the penalties imposed upon the manufacturer and vendor of the articles patented. An instance has been adduced, that of the middlings purifiers, about which there was a great deal of trouble and difficulty within a very recent period. Now, the course which was adopted in reference to the imposing of penalties upon those who used the middlings purifiers, created a strong suspicion in the public mind that the owner of the patent right was acting in collusion with the manufacturer, and that a very large number of those articles were allowed to be put into the mills and refused by the mill owners for a certain period, and when they had been practically used by the millers all over the country, the owner of the patent came down and demanded compensation for the violation of his rights. It was from that point of view, in relation to an injustice of that kind, the possibility of collusion between the owner of a patent right and the manufacturer and vendor, that I was induced to bring this Bill before the House. The Minister of Militia has said if this Bill should pass into law the purchaser of the patented article will, although he might know that he had purchased it in infringement of the rights of the patentee, set up the claim in court that he did not know that the article was patented; but if the hon. gentleman had read this Bill, he would have seen that objection was covered. I propose that:

"1. Notwithstanding anything contained in section twenty-three of 'The Patent' Act of 1872, no person who procures and uses any invention for which a patent has been obtained, from any person not authorised to make or use it by the patentee, shall be liable for damages for so doing, if he proves to the satisfaction of the court before which the suit is brought that he was ignorant of the fact that such invention was one for which a patent had been obtained, or that the person from whom he obtained it was not so authorised to make or use the same.

The Bill proposes, therefore, that the burden of proof shall be placed upon the purchaser of the patented article, so that he shall not be able to set up the defence that he purchased this article innocently, without proving it to the satisfaction of a court of competent jurisdiction. The objection may be raised, and I think there may be something in the contention, that as regards patents that are not now existing the passage of this measure may limit or restrict the rights that have been obtained to some extent in the nature of a contract; but as regards future contracts, I do not think there can be any objection to this Bill being passed.

Mr. McCARTHY. Although I cannot add very much to what has been said, I desire to express my concurrence in the principle of the measure before the House. It is a mistake to imagine that the patentee will be without means of redress in the event of this measure becoming law. He has, of course, the right of redress against those who sell the patented article; but not only that, he has the right to interfere and protect his property in the patent by preventing a sale, on application to the proper court. On the other hand, a man to whom an article is offered has no means of ascertaining whether it is or is not a patented article, and the case put by my hon. friend from Grey must commend itself to all. The other day, in Toronto, a suit was brought by the patentee, or rather by the acquirer of the patent for an American invention, and, if that is successful, I believe it will appear that every agricultural implement which has been manufactured in Ontario for the last four or five years has been manufactured in violation of the patent rights, and every farmer who has bought these mowing or reaping machines will be liable to be followed up by this person who has purchased the right, because he has bought, in the open market, without any notice or question of right, an agricultural implement which has been in universal use. I submit that these considerations are sufficient to induce this House to pass a measure for the protection of people of this kind. What is a man to do? He is offered an article. He finds it is exposed for sale and advertised all over the country. Is he to come to Ottawa to make an examination in the patent office, in order to see whether it is patented or is an infringement of a patent? These cases cannot be tried in a court in less than a week. The case I referred to took ten days, in order to test a single matter, whether it was or was not a violation of patent rights. On the other hand, is it too much to expect of the patentee, if he has a patented article or a valuable invention, that he shall see that no one is infringing it by disposing of it, or if so, shall apply to a court and prevent the sale and prevent its going into use? For these reasons I hope this Bill, the principle of which I think is so just and fair, will receive the approbation of a majority of this House. It is a principle well known to the law, a principle in regard to real property with which we are all familiar. If a man purchases real property and acquires the legal title, and is able to plead that he is a purchaser for value and had no knowledge of the equitable title, he is protected in his purchase, and that, I venture to think, is applicable to this. It is almost impossible to discover the right of the patentee unless he himself brings it to the notice of the public. Then a man purchases with his eyes open, but, if he is ignorant of the patent right and purchases in the open market, I think, under the circumstances, he is as much entitled to protection as any other purchaser for value without notice.

Mr. BLAKE. I think the observation of the hon. gentleman who proposes the Bill, with reference to existing patents, is one to commend itself to the attention of the House. I do not think it possible to take away the rights which, under the law, we have given, subject to that and to various questions of detail with which I will not now trouble the House. If he proposes to refer the Bill to a select committee, as I presume he does, I am, for my part, rather in favor of the principle of the hon. gentleman's measure. I do not think it is now in the condition in which it ought finally to pass the House, but if it is referred to a select committee, with the view of its being carefully scrutinised, and its action limited only to future patents, and some further precautions are taken, which I need not now discuss, I should support the second reading. One question was brought out by an incidental suggestion of my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). There is a question whether the hon. gentleman's Bill is to apply only to cases where the purchaser does not know it is a patented article, or whether it may not fairly extend to cases where it is sold to him as a patented article, but it subsequently turns out that the patentee has not a good title, but is infringing another title; where there is a fight between two patentees; one says "the invention is mine;" the other says, "the invention is mine;" they have both patents, and the law is to decide, and the unfortunate purchaser for value may be ground to the dust between them. Also, as the hon. gentleman's Bill stands, it would apply to persons who received gratuitously the patented article. I am not very well satisfied that I would go so far as that. I think I would only deal with persons who bought the patented article in the ordinary market. But these are matters of detail, and if the hon. gentleman proposes to refer the Bill to a select committee, I shall be in favor of the second reading.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I intend to propose to refer it to a small select committee.

Mr. COLBY. I suppose, if the hon. gentleman is going to refer the Bill to a select committee, he would have no objection, first, to amend it in the sense suggested.

Mr. BLAKE. There is no means of amending on the second reading.

Mr. COLBY. It strikes me very forcibly that, under the existing law, having declared at the last Session that all patents shall be presumed to have been issued for fifteen years, as far as patents issued up to the present time are concerned, the law could hardly come fairly into operation until the expiration of fifteen years from the date of existing patents.

Mr. BLAKE. It may come into force with reference to all patents issued from this time.

Mr. COLBY. But it would give no practical relief to the suffering public who have purchased these articles under patents issued during the existence of the law. Consequently, it will give no remedy, in some cases, for fifteen years.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes; it will give a remedy in reference to all patents that come into operation from the day the Act passes.

Mr. COLBY. I said quod those patents which have already been issued, and which, of course, constitute a very large number of them. I think this Act strikes at the root of the whole system, as we now understand it, which gives an absolute property to the patentee. It is a matter of very serious consideration, and it may be a serious question whether patent laws are desirable in the interest of the public at all. It opens a very broad field for discussion and involves very grave questions of policy. This country, like every other civilised country, has recognised the rights of inventors, and has given them an absolute property for a limited time. It is to be an absolute property in all its consequences according to the laws of England, of the United States, of the continent of Europe and of Canada. This proposition is certainly a very novel one.

It is not consistent with any provision, so far as I am aware, which exists in any patent law in any civilised country. It is of very far-reaching consequences, and involves more, I think, than would appear from the one clause which it contains. The whole question of the expediency of giving property and rights of a valuable nature to inventors is involved. Of course, it may be fairly referred to a committee, but I think that the consideration of the committee would, in the end, be directed, perhaps, to the whole policy of the patent law.

House divided on motion of Mr. White (Renfrew) for second reading of Bill.

Motion negatived.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 27th February, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

TRAFFIC IN INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Mr. SMALL moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 70) to make further provision respecting the traffic in intoxicating liquors. He said: The object of the Bill is to compensate hotel keepers and tavern keepers for loss in consequence of the diminution in value of real estate, by reason, of the operation of the Canada Temperance Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

APPELLATE JURISDICTION OF THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. LANDRY (Montmagny) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 68) to limit the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court as respects matters of a purely local nature in the Province of Quebec.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question as to the right of the hon. member to introduce this Bill has been questioned, because he has introduced a Bill on the same or a similar subject, which Bill is still pending before the House. The vote of the House, the other day, was that the Bill should not be read a second time on that day. It is still competent for the House, notwithstanding its vote, to give the Bill a second reading, and go into committee upon it and amend it. So that it will be, in effect, the same as the Bill for which leave to introduce is now asked. The House, therefore, is not precluded from further consideration of the question. It is the final rejection, and not the pending of a Bill which creates the difficulty as to the introduction of another Bill on the same subject, and that difficulty does not exist in this case. In addition, however, to this reason, the Bill is altered in a material point, both in body and title, and therefore, according to Lord Brownell and other authorities, it may receive a second reading.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hastings) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 71) to amend the criminal law of Canada. He said: The Bill which I propose submitting to the House and which I trust will commend itself to the favorable consideration of hon. members, is an Act to amend the criminal law in so far as it relates to the punishment of a notorious class of offenders who are causing more terror even than dynamiters, namely, burglars. Depredations by this class of individuals are daily becoming more bold and frequent. I notice, that only a few days ago in Toronto, four houses in one street were burglarised, one of them being the residence of a sergeant of police. I know that business men in nearly all the large towns and cities throughout the Dominion—and what I say will be substantiated by the members from Montreal—are necessarily put to a large expense by being compelled to specially guard vaults, safes and other places where valuable securities are kept; and this is done by means of a net work of electric wires connected with a larger wire having communication with a central office and also with the police station. When an attempt is made to burglarise premises which possess such an arrangement, an alarm is given and a messenger can be despatched to the scene of the burglars' operations. These men ransack our private dwellings, as I can speak from experience, break open our sideboards and cupboards, secretaries and places in which we store our plate and valuables, and they even enter the precincts of our sleeping apartments, and if we presume or undertake to protect and defend our property, it is a matter of indifference whether they dispatch us with the pistol or bowie knife. I know that ladies, when burglars have entered the premises during the absence of the head of the family, have become so much alarmed that their health has become irreparably impaired and their lives are scarcely worth living. In the city where I reside, many of our commercial men leave their houses at 3 o'clock in the morning—notwithstanding that the gas is kept burning, and police are on duty—for the purpose of seeing that their business premises have not been disturbed or property carried away. The law as it at present stands leaves it discretionary with the judge to punish these men, when convicted, with imprisonment for a period of from two to fourteen years. In three-fourths or even five-sixths of the cases we find that the men arrested for burglary have already served a short term of imprisonment, either in the central prison or penitentiary. This vocation seems to have become chronic with them; they are either indisposed or are incapable of pursuing any other calling; and I propose by this Bill that it be not left discretionary with the judge, but that it be made compulsory for the judge who tries, to send a man, and before whom he is convicted on this crime, to the penitentiary for life. I think that is the only way we can wipe out this crime in this country. Burglars are now a terror to the community at large, and while it is competent for any hon. member to make the minimum punishment seven or ten years, I propose submitting the Bill as at present framed, which makes it compulsory for a judge to send a prisoner, convicted of burglary, to the penitentiary for life.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPERINTENDENTS OF LETTER CARRIERS.

Mr. CHAPLEAU moved that the House resolve itself into committee, to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide for the appointment of one or more superintendents of letter carriers, at a salary not to exceed $800 each, as may be determined by the Governor in Council.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MULOCK. I do not know the reason for the motion itself, but one feature in it I think is objectionable. It asks the House to sanction the appointment of "one or more superintendents of letter carriers." "More" is a very vague term, and I do not think the House should be asked to clothe the Government with such power as that.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. There are a number of letter carriers in large cities such as Montreal, Toronto, Quebec and Ottawa, and it has been found necessary that a very few—I cannot state the number exactly, but the Postmaster-General will be here directly, and he can give the information—superintendents of these letter carriers should be appointed. It stands to reason that the salary of those officers should be a little above that of the letter carriers, and the demand is made that they should have a salary not to exceed $800. The salary of the letter carriers can go up to $600 or $650, and this would give the Postmaster-General the power to appoint one or more of them as superintendents. It is impossible to state the number that would be necessary, but I suppose one for each important post office, and their salary would be according to their experience, from $350 or $400 up to $800.

Mr. MULOCK. I did not speak as to the salary. I spoke as to the unlimited number. I do not think that the House should authorise the Government to appoint an unlimited number of officers. If, as the Secretary says, only one is required for each city, then there is something to limit the number, but it should be in the resolution. Under this resolution you could appoint every man in the city superintendent of letter carriers.

Mr. MITCHELL. Have you no confidence in them?

Mr. MULLOCK. I do not think, if we have confidence in hem, it is a constitutional way of proceeding.

Mr. BLAKE. It is not a question of confidence or want of confidence in the Government. It is a question of what amount of power should be given to them, and the hon. gentleman who occupies a neutral position in this House should be as jealous as we who are opposed to the Government, of the power which is proposed to be given to them. The Secretary said that, if the Postmaster-General were here, we would hear from him. I am sure that we shall all be glad to hear from the Postmaster-General, and I am sorry—Oh, here he is.

Mr. CARLING. We have a superintendent of letter carriers for each city. In some cities we have clerks who have been acting as superintendents, and what we ask is to be allowed to promote one of the most efficient of the present letter carriers to be a superintendent of letter carriers at an increased salary. We only want one or two additional to those we have.

Mr. BLAKE. But you have some superintendents now?

Mr. CARLING. They are acting superintendents, though they are really clerks.

Mr. BLAKE. There is no authority at present in the law to appoint any person superintendent of letter carriers. The law authorises the appointment of certain persons as letter carriers, and at present the hon. gentleman appoints some of them acting superintendents. He wants to legalise that, and to appoint some at an increased salary. He intends to appoint one in each city.

Mr. CARLING. Those who are superintendents in the cities of Montreal and Toronto will continue superintendents, but, in one or two cities, the men who are superintendent letter carriers are letter carriers, and we have no opportunity of promoting them or of giving them more salary.

Mr. BLAKE. Is there a law authorising the appointment of superintendents of letter carriers in Toronto and Montreal?

Mr. CARLING. No.

Mr. BLAKE. Are they to be appointed under this Act?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Postmaster-General has the power to appoint a number of letter carriers, the number required, according to the size of the city and the number of deliveries. It is found to be absolutely requisite for the sake of regularity that some person should have in large towns general supervision of the letter carriers. We hear of letters being dropped, and of letter carriers misbehaving themselves, and so on. As the law stands just now, there may be no superintendent of letter carriers taken from that body. We may have one of them who fulfils the duty, but he gets no additional salary. The consequence is that a third-class clerk is taken and is appointed to perform the duty of superintendent of letter carriers; but the Postmaster-General desires that he may be authorised to take the most deserving of the letter carriers themselves, and appoint him as superintendent. He cannot do that now, because he must pass the qualifying examination under the Civil Service Act. Though he may be just the man to supervise the letter carriers, he must first pass the examination for clerk; so this Bill is for the purpose of enabling the most deserving of the letter carriers to be promoted and given an adequate salary.

Mr. BLAKE. I think the Postmaster-General more than any of us should thank the hon. gentleman for his intervention. But the point of the case is this: under the law as it now stands the office of the superintendent of letter carriers is not a legal office, and it is proposed to establish that office as a legal office. It is proposed to make such an officer a new officer, and it is proposed to do that for the cities as well in which there is a person, without statutory authority, acting as superintendent of letter carriers, as in certain other cities. There are two cities in which persons are acting as superintendents of letter carriers, named by the hon. gentleman, Montreal and Toronto. He says in one or two more there are clerks also who are acting in that way, and therefore there are at least three or four cases, and perhaps more, in which it is designed, under the authority of the Act to be based on this resolution, to appoint superintendents of letter carriers. Now, the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mullock) pointed out the vagueness of the proposal of the Administration. The proposal is to appoint one or more superintendents, by his own admission, and yet the hon. gentleman intends to appoint at least four more—and I do not know how many more—but he only speaks of one or more. I do not like to use the word "deceptive," but when you have at present more than one acting in that capacity, and you only ask for authority to appoint one or more—certainly I think we ought to have further information. Is it intended to have a superintendent of letter carriers in all cities in which the system is prevailing? If so, then we could understand it, and then the proper course for the Government would be to say that it shall be lawful within any city in which the system of letter carrying is adopted to appoint a superintendent; if it is not intended to do that in all those cities, in which city is it intended to do it? How many offices do you intend to fill? So far as that portion is concerned, of the hon. gentleman's explanation on behalf of his colleague, it is with reference to the expediency of evading the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The hon. gentleman will understand the matter better by looking at it not at the point of view of a nomination, which may be discussed when the Estimates providing for such nomination comes before us, but only with the view of limiting the salary if the nomination is authorised. There is at the end of the Civil Service Act a schedule giving letter carriers as officers of the Civil Service, a salary of $350 a year, with an increase of $30 per year till the salary reaches $650. To that schedule we intend to add the provision that, when appointed, superintendents of letter carriers shall have a salary not to exceed $800. An hon. gentleman who rose a moment ago stated that this Bill is rather vague and that the House would like to know how many letter carriers are to be appointed. The Postmaster-General answered that he did not know exactly and could not know. There are at present in Montreal and Toronto third-class clerks who are acting as superintendents of letter carriers. They receive a salary as third-class clerks, and at the same time are acting as superintendents, so that their salaries reach $1,000. But under the Civil Service Act these letter carriers do not have the privileges of third-class clerks. The Postmaster-General says: We may want one or two, or three, or four, of those letter carriers in the future to act as superintendents, and we ask the House to say that the salary of these officers shall in no case exceed the sum of $800. I think the House cannot ask more than that. We are not now discussing the Estimates.

Mr. CARLING. It is not the intention to make any new appointments. We ask to be empowered to promote men to that position, and give them an additional salary. In the case of Ottawa there is a very deserving superintendent of letter carriers who has been acting as such for many years, but he has no more salary than any of the other letter carriers. We want to give him a slight addition to his salary, as he has greater responsibility than any of the others. It is intended to make no new appointments.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman, the Secretary of State, says one object is to limit the salary. But these resolutions ask to authorise the creation of the office, and to assign a maximum salary to the office so authorised to be created. It is not a limitation but an extension; it is to create an office or offices, and we are now asked to provide for the appointment of one or more superintendents of letter carriers, and it is proposed that the salary of this office shall not exceed $800 per year. Then, as I understand it, the system is not to be very symmetrical. In some cases the superintendents are to be clerks in the Civil Service, and their remuneration is to go on under the Civil Service rules, and may get beyond $800 a year; but in other cases the superintendents are to be chosen from amongst the letter carriers, and they are to be under a different set of regulations.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The hon. gentleman has only repeated what I have said. I say there is no mention of any special appointments at the present moment. I say that parties acting at the present moment as superintendents of letter carriers shall not be entitled in the future to a salary of more than $800. We desire to avoid the necessity of taking third-class clerks and giving them a salary of $1,000 as superintendents of letter carriers; and therefore the Postmaster-General asks to be authorised to promote letter carriers to that position instead of appointing third-class clerks.

Mr. MULOCK. Under this resolution the Government could appoint any number of superintendents. It is true, as the Secretary of State says, we are not now passing the Estimates, but if we were passing the Estimates, and an Order in Council were brought down, saying that half a dozen superintendents had been appointed, we would be referred to this resolution, and would be told that the appointment has been made under its authority.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. My hon. friend should remember that third-class clerks now receive a minimum of $400 and a maximum of $1,000. Every year we will come to the House and say: We want so many superintendents of letter carriers and we shall ask the authorisation of Parliament to appoint them. Here we fix the salary of those clerks, and whenever the Estimates are brought down my hon. friend will be able to see how many superintendents or letter carriers have to be provided for in those Estimates.

Mr. MILLS. According to the explanations given by the Secretary of State, it appears these officers will have little to do. In the cities of Montreal and Toronto the Postmaster-General informs us that third-class clerks are in the habit of discharging the duties, and the position of third-class clerk is better than that of superintendent that he proposes to create. He does not propose to call parties in Montreal and Toronto superintendents; he proposes to continue third-class clerks in the discharge of these duties; but in other cities letter carriers who have been in the habit of discharging the duty of inspector are to be named and are to be paid a better salary than they are paid at the present moment as ordinary letter carriers. In fact all those that are in better circumstances, who are better situated officially than by this resolution they could be, are to be allowed to remain as they are; those that cannot be paid the amount the Government would like to pay them under the law, as it now stands, are to be provided for by this particular resolution. That is the proposition. Now the hon. gentleman admits by bringing down this Bill that this is an unnecessary office, that it is wholly unnecessary to create any such office. He says that in Toronto and Montreal third-class clerks discharge those duties, and will continue to discharge them, while in the other cities, in Ottawa, London, Belleville and Brantford, those duties are now being discharged by ordinary letter carriers. But the fact is that those whom the Government wish to favor have perhaps been active political agents; they have done service outside, and they are to be paid specially the sum of $800 a year. It is perfectly clear that this is a job, and that the Government are engaging in it for the purpose of rewarding those who have done them political service.

Mr. BEATY. With regard to the superintendent of letter carriers I am prepared to show that it is quite an important matter, a matter of necessity to have proper superintendence over the numerous letter carriers in Toronto. The administration of the post office affairs in this respect is so large, the letters carried so numerous, and so important to the citizens that it is necessary to have constant supervision over these officers. I think the amount asked will not exceed what will be requisite even if a subordinate officer be appointed, and the office is one that certainly requires to be filled by one who understands his business, and who can efficiently administer the duties under his charge.

Mr. BLAKE. No doubt the hon. gentleman will propose an amendment of the procedure, because the hon. Minister has stated that no change whatever is to take place in Montreal or Toronto.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Perhaps since the hon. gentleman desires it he will ask us to appoint third-class clerks for this service at an outlay of $1,000 instead of paying $800 as we now propose.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It is perfectly plain that the Government are going to appoint more officers, and my own opinion is that it is time to stop. For years past, you, Mr. Chairman, have occupied the Chair of this House with the greatest dignity, and this Government the other day seemed to vote non-confidence in you, and appoint another in your place. They were anxiously looking after the health of Mr. Speaker, who certainly does look like a delicate man, and they thought it was necessary to appoint a Deputy Speaker, and now they are about to appoint another officer. I call the attention of the Postmaster-General to the fact that there are many places in the rural constituencies that have not one mail a day, and I think further expenses should not be incurred in the cities until adequate mail service has been given to every rural constituency. I know many places where they only get two mails a week. It is quite proper that the cities should get a good mail service, and I favored their getting it, but when they are running up to such an enormous expense it becomes the Government and the House to halt and to look after the interests of those places which are deserving of a better mail service. There is no doubt that this is done for a purpose. There is no doubt that the member for West Toronto (Mr. Beaty) will come up with a friend of his to take the office when it is created.

Mr. CARLING. I am surprised at the remarks which have been made by the leader of the Opposition, by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and the hon. gentleman who has last spoken (Mr. Landerkin). There is no intention or desire to create a new office; that has been stated distinctly by the Secretary of State as well as by myself. It is only intended that in the city of Ottawa where we have an excellent man who is superintending the letter carriers—

Mr. MILLS. Let him alone.

Mr. CARLING. I am going to. We are only taking the power to give him an addition of $200 a year. I do not want any more men and do not intend to appoint them. In Montreal a third-class clerk is acting as superintendent of letter carriers, and if he conducts that business efficiently we will continue him until perhaps he is promoted to another class, and when he is promoted to another class of the service we may promote one of the most efficient letter carriers to take his place, whose salary will not exceed $800 a year. A third-class clerk may get $1,000 a year while a letter carrier can only get $800.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the Postmaster General inform us how many cities or places in the Dominion have this letter carrying service?

Mr. CARLING. The service is in force in the cities of St. John, Halifax, Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa, Kingston, Toronto, Hamilton, London and Winnipeg.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I fear the practical result will be that the good nature of my hon. friend will be taken advantage of, and as soon as the Bill is passed application will be made to have one of these deserving letter carriers appointed in each place as superintendent at a salary of $800 a year; and so good natured a man as the Postmaster General is will find himself unable to deny the requests of my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Beaty) and others. We know how it is—

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, you have been there yourself.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—and it is not one but a whole dozen who will ask to have the additional amount.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The more I look into this matter the more manifestly unfair does it appear to be that these new offices should be created with a salary of $800 a year. I am aware, and the Postmaster General is aware, that in many places the whole time of the mail carriers is occupied, or nearly the whole time, and they get sometimes less than $100 a year to carry the mail. A mail carrier in my constituency who carries the mail from Ayton, about one and a-half miles, and goes twice a day, gets about $49; and in Hanover something like $99 is paid, and so on. These officers in rural constituencies are underpaid for their work, and here we are creating an officer who is to relieve the postmasters of Toronto, Halifax and other places of the responsibility which belongs to them, and still it is not proposed to lessen the salaries of these postmasters. Why should we create these offices at a time when the country is suffering from hard times, and thereby increase the expenditure of the country? I could not allow the matter to pass without rising and making a protest against it.

Mr. CARLING. The hon. gentleman must know that the mail carriers to whom he refers, who carry the mail from the town or village to the station are not salaried officers, but that they tender for the service, and if they take it too low it is their own fault and not the fault of the Department.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I wish to point out a mistake which the hon. gentleman has made. He stated that the members for the city of Toronto were consulted by the Postmaster General. I am one of the members for the city and I have not been consulted.

Mr. BOWELL. That is manifestly unjust.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin) says that some of the mail carriers get only $50 or $60, and the Postmaster General replies that the work is let by contract. Perhaps the Government will let this other work by contract.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Hear, hear. I will support that.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I know a man at Belleville who goes to the station four or five times a day, and who collects the letters from eight or nine boxes. He has to keep two horses, and all he gets is $700 or $800. I agree with the hon. gentleman opposite that it is time to know that there are too many officers in and around these buildings. I think it is time we should understand that the members should not press the Government to fill these offices, and they should curtail expenses everywhere and in every respect. I believe what the hon. member opposite says, that the good nature of the Postmaster General will lead him to give to each city a new officer; and I think it would be better if the hon. Postmaster General would state now how many of these officers he intends to have. I agree that the members of the House and the Government should feel that we ought to curtail every expense in the country. The truth is, we are over-governed in this country. There is no people in the world who have so many men making laws for them. We have the Local Legislatures, and they are like five or six prodigal sons, as it were, coming here every Session begging. It is time that we should endeavor to curtail our expenditure, and if we are to continue to have Local Parliaments, they should collect by direct taxation what they require to manage their own local affairs.

Mr. BEATY. I was not aware until just now that Toronto had a fourth member to represent it. That being the case, and knowing the good nature of the Postmaster General, I shall take the hon. gentleman into confidence with me in order to get appointments.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The price is too high.

Resolution ordered to be reported.

CIVIL SERVICE ACTS AMENDMENTS.

Mr. CHAPLEAU moved that the House resolve itself into committee to consider the following resolutions:—

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that each member of the Board of Examiners appointed for purposes of the Civil Service Act, shall receive a salary of six hundred dollars per annum.
2. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the members of the Board shall be paid such travelling expenses while engaged in their work, as may be determined by the Governor in Council.
3. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the Governor in Council may appoint a secretary to the Board, with a salary not exceeding one thousand dollars per annum, and a clerk having a qualified examination certificate, to assist the Board, and the latter shall be a third-class clerk of the Department of the Secretary of State.
4. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the minimum salary paid to a chief clerk shall be one thousand eight hundred dollars, with an annual increase of fifty dollars per annum, up to a maximum of two thousand six hundred dollars.
5. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that when the duties of any superior officer or clerk, during his absence or by reason of his demise, but not through superannuation, are continuously performed by an officer or clerk of an inferior class, or junior rank, during a period of more than three months, the officer or clerk performing such duties may, on the recommendation of the Deputy Head, concurred in by the Head of the Department, by Order in Council, and provided that funds are available under Parliamentary vote for such payment, receive in addition to his ordinary pay the difference between such ordinary pay and the pay of the officer or clerk whose duties he has performed for the time he has performed such duties.
6. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that all payments of money to permanent employés, other than salaries to be made under the provisions of the Civil Service Act, and whether specifically stated or not in the estimates submitted to Parliament, shall be made only under the authority of the Governor in Council.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE. Explain, please.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The first resolution provides for the salary of the Civil Service examiners. Last year I put before the House a resolution providing for a more reasonable salary, but unfortunately some technical irregularity prevented it from passing. The demand is $600 for each member of the Board of Examiners. They have heretofore been paid at the rate of $5 a day, provided the number of days did not exceed 60 days in the year. This amount has proven to be not only inadequate, but completely out of proportion to the amount of work necessarily imposed upon the examiners. Some people may believe that the duties of these examiners are trifling. Let me tell the House that they have to attend to two semi-annual examinations both preliminary and qualifying; that more than a thousand candidates have been examined during the past year; that there are extra promotion examinations, besides the two regular examinations in all the Departments, and besides special examinations ordered by Council when the interests of the service require it; that over 10,000 papers have to be examined and reported upon in detail by the examiners. Another report is to be put in form for publication, and a third prepared and arranged for Parliament. During last year the examinations of the month of June alone actually took of the time of the Civil Service examiners—counting the number of hours, because some of them belonged to the Civil Service—nearly eighty days for the completion of their work. Of the Civil Service examiners, one is in the Civil Service and another one is in a certain manner in the Civil Service, having a very small salary, I mean Doctor Thorburn, and the third is a superannuated officer. Some hon. member will perhaps remark that these gentlemen are under pay from the public and should not receive as high a salary in addition as $600. Let me tell the House that if that service were done by outsiders—and to be done correctly as it has been, requires men of ability, men of knowledge, men of special qualities for the work, to avoid the difficulties and errors which might be committed if new hands or men not qualified were appointed—if we were to take outsiders, I am sure I do not exaggerate when I say that we would not be able to get men to do that work, who would be willing to give the time necessary for it, for a salary lower than at least double the salary which is fixed by this resolution. In the United States the salaries paid to public officers are not as a rule high, at least, the official salaries; well, the Board of Examiners who perform similar duties in the State of New York, where the population is a little under the population of the Dominion, are paid the following salaries: Three commissioners at $2,000 each; the chief examiner at $3,600; two clerks, $1,000 and $900 respectively; one secretary, who may be one of the commissioners, with an additional salary of $1,000; and a local board of five examiners at a salary of $5 per day about $200 each per year. The Civil Service has I must say extended immensely of late, the organisation of the service has extended with the necessity of having good service, but the service has been well appreciated by the public and the result of the examinations show it. These examinations have to take place in the whole of the Dominion, in twelve different places, from British Columbia to Prince Edward Island; these examinations have all to be superintended and the work finally and accurately done by the examiners. I have said before that service is done in the State of New York at a cost of $140,000, $15,000 being put in the yearly estimates. Their commissioners and chief examiner receive $9,600 a year, while here the same service is done for the paltry sum of $600 for each of the three members of the board. It is as well I should state now that if the secretary be an outsider he will be paid at the rate of $1,000, which is proposed to be his salary by this resolution, but I may add that should the secretary be a member of the commission the salary is fixed by an Order in Council at $700 instead of $1,000. My hon. friend from Renfrew has said that after all it is a large expenditure, that the number of officers is increasing, and the expense is beginning to be very large; but I do not think the House will conclude that the expense is very heavy when I say the fee of $2 which is exacted from every candidate, either for qualifying examination or for promotion examination, covers the expense to the extent of $2,500, leaving but a small sum to be provided to cover up the balance of the expense of the service as provided for by this resolution.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman has said that two members of the board belong to the Civil Service, the third I presume does not.

Mr. CHAPLEAU.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The third is a superannuated officer.

Mr. BLAKE. At present I think one of the members of the board is also secretary.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Yes; the superannuated officer.

Mr. BLAKE. He is the only one whose name I happen to remember and I thought that by the figures in the Public Accounts that he was receiving more than mentioned. The proposal is, instead of this smaller sum which the hon. gentleman has mentioned in the $5 for each day to make it $600, and he has said the June examination amounted to 80 days. That is the usual Civil Service computation of days; I presume, the usual number of hours a day.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. Can the hon. gentleman state what the whole year's work was?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I have not exactly the amount, but I know that, during the year, putting it 160 days would be a low figure for the examinations.

Mr. BLAKE. Does the hon. gentleman not think it is cruel to impose upon the civil servants half as much work again as they normally had to do?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. That may be the case; we have had letters from one about it and may have the misfortune to lose him. I know that outside of the service nobody will undertake to do the work for less than $1,200.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman speaks of 180 days. Is that the time occupied by the examinations themselves?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. No; that is the time taken to prepare the correspondence, answer the letters, meet together, give different decisions for the examination, and the correction of the thousands of papers they have to deal with during the year.

Mr. CASEY. As far as I understand, it is the duty of the secretary to conduct the correspondence. The other members of the board will simply have to direct him in a general way, and it is only in connection with the secretary's duties that this great length of time will be required; the other members have simply to prepare the examination papers, and correct the answers sent in. I am aware that is a very considerable job of work and that a liberal rate should be paid for it, but if I am not mistaken the proposed salaries to the Civil Service Board are very much larger than that paid to examiners at the Toronto University or Normal School, or other such institutions, where an almost equal amount of work has to be done. However, it is almost impossible to say, without more definite information as to the time required by the examiners, whether the salary is too high or not. I must call attention to the fact that one, at least, of the Board of Civil Service Examiners is already receiving a very considerable salary, that is Mr. DeCelles, the Assistant Librarian, a man in every way fit for the position, of course, but he is receiving already $2,400 as Assistant Librarian and $300 as Civil Service examiner. Well, if $300 pays for 180 days of his time, he is very much overpaid on the other account. If $2,400 is not too much for a year's work as Librarian, even $600 would be a very insufficient pay for the other work.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Does the hon. gentleman mean to dispute the salary of the Librarian?

Mr. CASEY—Excuse me, Mr. Chairman, I think I have the floor—so there is a great inconsistency between the two salaries. If the salary paid to him as Assistant Librarian enables him to take the other work at a lower rate than it could otherwise have been done, it shows that there is something wrong somewhere; because, if a man is paid for a year's work, and not overpaid, at $2,400, it does not seem reasonable that he should be supposed to do 180 days' extra work for $300 or even for $600 additional. There is something incompatible in the figures. Of course, it is not to be supposed that during these 180 days Mr. DeCelles can do his work as Librarian as well as his work as examiner. It must be supposed that he devotes his time during these 180 days to the work of the Civil Service Board and some one else must do the work in the Library or it must remain undone. I do not say that it does, because I do not know anything about the work in the Library except during the Session. Therefore another great inconsistency appears. The fact of 180 days being taken from the duties of Librarian and given to the Civil Service Board is a very extraordinary state of things. As to Mr. LeSueur, he is superannuated with an allowance of $1,024, and he gets $1,000 as member and clerk of the Civil Service Board. I do not remember exactly why he was superannuated, but it is generally taken for granted when a man is superannuated that it is because he is unfit for further service in the Department, and, if afterwards a superannuated official is taken into the Government employ, it is to be understood that he has again become fit for Government service; and he should not get the two salaries at the same time, one on the ground that he is unfit, and the other on the ground that he is fit for the public service. The two things are perfectly inconsistent. If the officer is taken on again, it implies that he is fit for work, and the superannuation allowance should be stopped or he should be given no further allowance for the work he is called upon to perform. As to Dr. Thorburn, his connection with the Civil Service is comparatively slight as Librarian of the Geological Museum, and the amount he receives for it is comparatively small, $600 a year, I think. The hon. gentleman says that, if outsiders were engaged to do this work, very large sums would have to be paid to them. He mentions $1,200 as the least which, in his opinion, would secure them. I have a very considerable acquaintance amongst gentlemen of the class who would naturally be called upon to do this kind of work—scientific examination work—amongst professors and tutors of colleges and others who have a very considerable amount of spare time during the vacation when their work in the colleges is not required. I am prepared to state my opinion, which is only an opinion of course, but based on my knowledge of those gentlemen and of what they could do in a certain time, that an equal number of them could be selected who would get through the work done by the Civil Service Board in one third of the time the Minister says it occupies. I could name a dozen of them any three of whom would get through the work in 60 days, as professors work, not as Civil Servants work, for the difference is very remarkable. I could mention a number of these men who are much more highly qualified than those who are now on the board, who have higher scientific attainments and greater experience in examining students, who would be glad to take this work for $600 or even a less sum.

An hon. MEMBER. Name.

Mr. CASEY. I contend that it would be much better for the interests of the service if outsiders were taken to perform these duties instead of members of the service. It is quite inconsistent with the theory of a Civil Service Board of Examiners that they should themselves be members of the service. The examinations in the main are for entrance. No departmental knowledge is required to test the fitness of the individuals who present themselves. The peculiar departmental examinations such as those for the Inland Revenue and the Surveying Departments must be always to a great extent got up in the Departments themselves, and that could be done just as well by a board of scientific men outside the service, with the assistance of the departmental head, as by a board of men in the service. I therefore say that outsiders could do the work as well as gentlemen in the service, and outsiders could be got who have higher scientific acquirements than any in the service whose time could be devoted to this work, and it is better that the examinations should be held by those who are not connected with the service, who have no reason for favoring anyone, and who are not hampered with any of the red tape which gets tangled around anyone who has been for any length of time in the public service. For these reasons, I think I am justified in urging that the proposed allowance of $600 is excessive if it is given to those who are already in the Civil Service or are receiving superannuation from the Government; further, that no officer receiving a superannuation allowance should be employed at a salary by the Government; further still, that outsiders should be employed for this purpose and could be obtained of the highest quality for a less price than the hon. gentleman proposes to pay to members of the service.

Mr. CURRAN. The gentleman who has just resumed his seat has informed us that he possesses a certain amount of information which he has not vouchsafed to this House, but which would be more important than anything he has said. He has made, no doubt, a very facetious speech, and we have listened to him with that enjoyment which his utterances always ensure to this House. He states that he knows some gentlemen who would undertake this work for a comparatively trifling amount, but he has not stated who these gentlemen are, though I requested him to do so. I take it that this is a very justifiable application which is made to this House with regard to the salaries of these gentlemen. I do not at all agree with the statement that superannuated officers, those who have discharged their onerous duties for years but may not be in the possession of robust health should not be employed in duties of this kind if they possess the necessary qualifications, and it is confessed on all sides that the gentlemen who occupy the present position actually do possess those qualifications. But I rose more particularly to draw the attention of the hon. Minister, and through him of the examiners themselves, to a point which has been discussed to some extent in such papers as the Montreal Star, the Post and others, with regard to a subject that might relieve the examiners of some of their anxiety and labor. The complaint has been made, and I think it is a just one, that perhaps too much time has been spent over the preparation of questions submitted to those who aspire to the Civil Service; that the questions have very often been of a catch nature; that they have extended into a range of knowledge that is never likely to be required. I think if there was less soaring in that respect, possibly a great many desirable persons for the Civil Service would not be barred out. For my part, whilst approving of the motion before the House, I hope that the objections which have been made to some of the examination papers will be taken note of, and that in the future those papers will be of such a practical nature as will enable all those who are really fit for the service to obtain access thereto.

Mr. CASEY. In reply to the hon. member's request for names I can only say, of course, that I did not suppose he could expect me to make free with the names of the distinguished gentlemen whom I had in my mind's eye when I spoke. But if the Minister would like to enter into negotiations with any of these gentlemen I will be happy to give him privately their addresses, to enable him to ascertain on what terms they would undertake this duty. If I found they would not undertake it on the terms he proposes, I would acknowledge my mistake. In regard to the catch questions stated to have been given by the board of examiners, I must say that I have heard the same complaints made by parties thoroughly competent to judge. I have not examined the last lot of papers, and cannot, therefore, speak from personal knowledge, but I have been told by parties well qualified to judge that many of the questions were of a nature such as those that schoolmasters like to argue amongst themselves at a teachers' meeting, in order to show their intellectual dexterity, and that they were not of a nature to test the average general knowledge of the applicants. This fact alone, I think, would justify us in saying that in some particulars the duties of the board of examiners were not so much onerous as the hon. gentleman stated, as they are erroneous—in the words of a friend of mine, who was once mayor of a western village.

Mr. DAVIES. I think it is desirable that we should find out just now how much this increased expenditure is to be of which the hon. Secretary of State has spoken. Whether there is to be an increase in the efficiency of the board of examiners is another question. If I understand the hon. member aright he proposes that three examiners shall be paid a salary of $600 each; that they shall have a secretary and a third-class clerk. This board costs us yearly $3,600, and I suppose he intends to continue the system of sub-examiners in every Province of the Dominion. Last year I noticed by the Auditor's report that we paid $1,625 to the examiners' secretary, and the hon. gentleman now proposes to pay $1,800 to three examiners, and $1,000 for the secretary, which makes, in other words, an increase of $2,000. Last year we paid Mr. LeSueur $1,000, Mr. DeCelles $300, Mr. Thorburn $300, and $25 to a special examiner, making $1,625. He now proposes to pay $1,800 to three examiners, $1,000 to a secretary, and $1,000 to the clerk.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. No; that is not the case.

Mr. DAVIES. On the face of it, the hon. gentleman proposes to make an increase of $2,000 at least. I wish to know from the hon. gentleman if it is also contemplated that these gentleman who are paid these $600 apiece are to be paid travelling expenses? Whence comes the necessity that they should travel if he has examiners in several Provinces? I noticed last year that in addition to their salaries we have paid Mr. LeSueur $200 for travelling expenses, $144 to Mr. DeCelles, and $50 to Mr. Thorburn. That may be all right; it may have been necessary, or it may not—I do not know; but I think the Commons should be afforded some information from the Secretary of State when proposing these alterations as to whether this state of matters is to continue. Does he propose to pay these travelling expenses in addition to the salary? And why is it necessary for them to travel if he has sub-examiners in the several Provinces who were paid $967 last year? If I understand the proposition, the hon. gentleman proposes to increase the cost next year to a sum in the neighborhood of $8,000. That is a pretty material increase, which is on a par with the increases which are proposed from time to time in the other Departments. I do not notice, when hon. members speak of economy from time to time in the abstract, that they rise to make any opposition to special instances of additions to the expenditure. Professions of economy are indulged in by hon. gentlemen opposite, but when an absolute increase is proposed in any Department there is not a voice raised in opposition. This may be right; but the explanations have not satisfied me, and I do not think they have satisfied the committee.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It seems to me that the proposition of the hon. gentleman, the Secretary of State, is objectionable on more grounds than one. All of us who have anything to do with the Public Accounts have observed that a most pernicious practice is increasing in the management of our public affairs. Constantly we find gentlemen who have one salary for a distinct piece of work, are getting another salary for other employment which, in many cases, they cannot perform without very considerably neglecting the duties which were at first assigned to them. Now, this appears to be a case very much in point. If I understand the Secretary of State aright, one of these gentlemen who ought to be pretty fully employed at his legitimate work is expected to work 180 days in the discharge of these duties. If I am wrong in drawing that inference, the hon. gentleman can correct me. Now, if I say we have an officer here, in our employment, who has got 180 days to spare, the probability is that that officer, whoever he may be, is either considerably overpaid or underworked—it does not matter which. However, my objection is to the principle of giving two distinct salaries for distinct pieces of work to members of the Civil Service. It is a mistake in itself which has led to serious abuse, and which will likely lead to much greater abuse in the future. As to the point taken by my hon. friend behind me, the member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to this: How the matter is arranged now, I am not quite sure, but within a few years, unless I mistake, in the practice of the English service where the examination is a very much more serious matter than it is with us—inasmuch as it is a competitive examination, which is a totally different thing, and a much more serious matter—than a pass examination, which is all that we, at the present time, insist upon, I think the examiners are generally taken from among the ranks of the tutors and professors in the great English universities, and it is done for the express reason of preventing the examination from being conducted by persons who may be supposed to be unduly under the influence of the existing Government. It is desirable, I think, that we should follow the English precedent, which the First Minister is always so desirous of following. I will tell the Secretary of State where I think he could obtain an extremely suitable corps of examiners, and the cost would certainly not be in excess but probably less than the sum he now proposes to pay. Most of our colleges and universities are in the habit of granting long vacations to the students, and by consequence to the professors. I am quite sure from the various universities in Quebec and Ontario, and probably in the Maritime Provinces, the Secretary of State would have no trouble in obtaining half a dozen or even a dozen examiners, perfectly qualified to conduct such examinations as these and quite ready to carry them on, for sums considerably less than he now proposes to pay. More than that, those men are specially fitted for the work. I do not suppose either the First Minister or the other members of the Government expect to obtain men for the Civil Service, at an average salary of $500 or $600 to start upon, better educated than those who matriculate at our ordinary universities. I take it that the standard will be much about the same; the standard for the Civil Service will not be higher, and I am giving the Ministry the benefit of the doubt. Those gentlemen to whom I have referred are in the habit of conducting precisely similar examinations of large numbers of young men who propose to enter the various universities. Selections from among them I am sure—and it could be made by the Government if they like, among their own political friends—I suppose they have some in the universities—would give more satisfaction than the perpetuation of this mischievous practice which is now creeping in among us and which threatens, as is apparent from a perusal of the report of the Auditor-General, to develop into a positive abuse of very serious magnitude—this practice of paying two salaries to gentlemen who already receive an adequate salary from the Dominion; or, what is just as bad, of paying very large amounts for extra work. Why, we have found that gentlemen have been paid for extra work done after hours a sum quite equivalent to the total salary they receive per month and per year. I do not think it is desirable to see this state of things perpetuated on the Statute Book, as the Secretary of State proposes, especially when he can obtain gentlemen perfectly qualified to discharge all the not very onerous functions of setting papers for a pass examination—which, I repeat, is a totally different thing from a competitive examination—out of the ranks of gentlemen who are in the habit of doing this work constantly in the discharge of their ordinary vocations, and who, during the vacation, would have ample time to attend to such work.

Mr. McMULLEN. In connection with this matter I beg to call the attention of the House to a matter which has already been alluded to by the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright). According to the Auditor-General's report there are 140 civil servants on the list during the last fiscal year, who received an average salary of $1,349.66, and in addition $57,794.18 was paid them for extra services. I think it is decidedly wrong that when men are engaged as civil servants to perform duties connected with the Department, and they are employed during a few hours after the ordinary routine which they have to do has been finished, they should be allowed to draw extra wages. It appears to me to be very absurd, and it will so appear to the people of the country. Suppose a farmer hires a man to plough, and he engages him to go and pick stones or do some other farm work, would the man think of saying that he was engaged to plough, and if he did anything else he wanted extra pay? No farmer would consent to pay extra wages in such a case. The Government has no right, when men are hired for the Department to devote all their time to the service of the country, at least a certain number of hours each day, to pay them for extra services. The idea of paying out of the revenues of Canada $57,794.18 to 140 civil servants for extra services is an outrage and a wrong which should be condemned. I hope the House and the country will take notice of these facts, and if hon. gentlemen opposite will persist in following this course, I trust that the punishment they deserve will be meted out to them.

Mr. CASEY. Will the hon. Minister tell me approximately, from his recollection of the facts, how many men went up for examination during the past year.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I am very glad that this debate has arisen on this question, and I feel perfectly at ease in answering the hon. members who have taken part in it. If there is any branch of the public service in which there has been an improvement, it is the Civil Service examinations, and if there is one branch in which hardship and low pay to those engaged in it have prevailed, it is in this branch of the public service. The first objection taken by hon. gentlemen opposite is, that it is not right that Civil Service examiners should be members of the Civil Service itself or superannuated officers. I am sorry to say that if we did not use the services of those gentlemen we would have to pay a good deal more, notwithstanding the offer made by the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright). The hon. gentleman has said that professors in our universities might, during the holidays, conduct these examinations. If he knew anything about the work of the Civil Service examiners the hon. gentleman would be satisfied that they would not leave their occupation as professors to endure the trouble and difficulty which fall upon examiners throughout the entire year. These examiners were chosen in 1832. I do not say I would not, myself, prefer to have an efficient board entirely outside of the Civil Service, but then we would be obliged to pay something like what the State of New York is paying. Hon. gentlemen opposite may think it is an extraordinary fact; but if we are to have the work efficiently done the services of such men as are suggested would be worth dollar for dollar what such services are paid for in the State of New York. Here we have the experience of men who have been organizing the service. The service is just in the way of coming to a fair state of perfection, and there are innumerable details in regard to it which require a great deal of attention and work. Another objection made by hon. gentleman opposite is, that because officers are members of the Civil Service they should not be paid for extra work. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen), said that if a man agreed to work for a farmer as a ploughman and he was put to other work and was called on to work at night, all this would be included in his day's work. If a farmer hired a farm laborer to do day work and he were to give him two or three hours extra work, he would have to pay him extra. Laborers and others who are engaged in the ordinary avocations of life, if they work outside their regular hours are allowed for such work, and why should not the civil servants, who have leisure time, be allowed for their services during that time? But the main point is this: I say that the salary of $600 is a minimum, and that it is really a ridiculously low salary for the work, and I know what the work is, for I have looked into it and have seen these men at work. I repeat that it is a mean salary; it is under the value of their actual services; they are not paid enough for their work, but still they consent to do it. The hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) says that if the Librarian gets $2,400 for a year's work, and only gets $600 for the time he works in connection with the Civil Service examinations, it shows that he is paid too little for the latter work. That may be, and I think it is the case. My hon. friend asked me about the secretary of the board, who is now paid $1,000. The secretary, Mr. LeSueur, is an able man; he is one who has devoted a great deal of trouble and pains to his work—far more than might be expected from his salary, and I may say that he is not likely to remain as secretary. I hope he will, for the good of the service, continue to serve both as commissioner and secretary. So far as Dr. Thorburn is concerned, nobody who knows him will deny that he is a most efficient man, and one who is exceedingly well qualified for his position. The position which he holds in the Civil Service is a very small one, as he receives, I believe, but $600 as librarian of the Geological Survey branch. I repeat that we could not at the present moment ask strangers—members or professors of universities—we could not have them to perform this work. These gentlemen would be travelling all the time—if not every week, surely more than once during each month; they have to consult with the Department, and have to exercise a constant supervision over this particular branch of the Civil Service. They have to get information; new applications are made; demands by members are made, and they are obliged to attend to all this work. There are preliminary examinations, entrance examinations and promotion examinations—there being as many as four examinations for promotion, and the examiners would either have to come to Ottawa or else their duties could not be attended to. I say it is impossible to have such work done so well and so cheaply. The increase will not be $3,000, as the hon. member for Queen's said. There will be $300 for each of the three commissioners, making in all $900. This year Mr. LeSueur being there, we add $700, so that that sum represents his increase as commissioner and secretary. I think I can say, Sir, that with a population of 4,000,000 people, with seven Provinces over the whole breadth of the Dominion, that the sum of $2,500 is an expenditure which cannot be considered as excessive, when the fee alone collected from candidates covers the amount.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Secretary of State has told us that when these civil servants are paid extra salaries they are paid for work performed outside the ordinary number of hours during which they are supposed to work as civil servants. I beg to call his attention to the fact that the assistant law clerk of the House of Commons, who gets a salary of $2,000 a year, appears by the Auditor-General's report to have got $2,500 for his work in connection with the consolidation of the statutes. Now, are we to understand that this sum of $2,500 was paid for work in extra hours during the year's service, and $2,000 as his salary for the same time.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Is that in connection with the Civil Service Board?

Mr. McMULLEN. It is in the Auditor-General's report, page 18.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I thought we were discussing the Civil Service examiners?

Mr. CASEY. So we were, but the discussion has taken a general turn, which has been followed by the hon. gentleman himself, and he pointed out that when civil servants were paid extra, it was for work done in extra hours. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) gives the case of one civil servant who has been paid $500 more for work done out of hours than for the salary he earned during his office hours. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman admits that the work done by the Civil Service examiners was not done out of hours. He stated in his speech that this money is paid for work done out of hours, but in his former remarks he admitted it was not, because he told the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) that his calculation of the number of days that these gentlemen were employed was based on the ordinary Civil Service day—so many days of so many hours each—and the only inference anybody could draw from that statement is that he admitted that they occupied so many ordinary civil service days in doing the work of this particular branch.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I did not say that, and I was not so understood by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake).

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. CASEY. Then it was a misunderstanding on my part, and that argument vanishes. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he can tell me approximately the number of men examined by the board last year.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Between 1,000 and 1,200, I think.

Mr. CASEY. The average severity of the examinations not being higher—unless they have changed utterly within the few years past—than those ordinarily conducted in a good high school in Ontario, and no doubt in Quebec and the other Provinces as well, the examinations are of such a nature that a schoolmaster could conduct them with efficiency. And it has cost in salary $1,625. It is proposed, as near as I can make out, that the salaries alone for the future shall come to $3,800. After the hon. Minister's explanations, I believe it is not intended to appoint a clerk in addition to Mr. LeSueur this year, but the hon. Minister takes power to do so, and when Mr. LeSueur is superannuated for the second time the clerk will be appointed. When I spoke first on this matter I was not able to speak positively of the cost of the examination of students at Toronto University. A friend of mine has since looked up the records of that institution, and informs me that the amount paid to the examiners is under $1,200, and that about 800 students are examined annually. Of course, the great bulk of that examination is done at one time. There is a second examination, but the number of students is not nearly so great. The examiners prepare the questions and look over the answers, just as the Civil Service examiners do, and they have to be much more highly educated men than the Civil Service examiners, because they have to examine in classics, in science, and in the higher arts. As a rule, the examiners are not professors, and I think the highest pay for any one of them is from $80 to $100. Even supposing it would be fair to count the cost of holding two Civil Service exam-ations in the year, at double the cost of the university examinations, that would only be $2,400 for examining 800 students, instead of $3,800. If $1,200 is the actual cost there for higher examinations, it is monstrous to take $3,800 for examining young men in the rudiments. In answer to my suggestion that professors and tutors might be engaged, the Minister says they could not give up their chairs. I never proposed anything so absurd. What I proposed was, that they should occupy their time out of hours, as the Civil Service examiners are doing, and that they should do the work in their vacation, when their Sessions are not going on. The hon. gentleman says that the Civil Service Board have to do more—that they have to supervise the Departments and listen to the demands of members. I never heard that the Civil Service Boards had any powers of supervision; I did not think they could interfere with the discipline of any Department under this Act. As a matter of fact they do not interfere to put one clerk up and another down. As to listening to the demands of members, I think that it is something that the Civil Service Board should not do. They should not have any communication with the members of the House or the members of the Government as to their duties. They should be as independent of the Government and of the members of the House as judges, and the fact that they do listen to the demands of members shows that the whole thing is a farce. We know that the influence of members of the Government must be overwhelming upon gentlemen who are appointed by that Government during pleasure, first as Civil Service employees, and next as members of this board. That is the reason I advocate that outsiders should be appointed, and appointed during good behavior, as judges are, so that they would be entirely independent of the Government and of members of the House. I admit that the secretary, because of his extra work in looking after the papers, should be paid more than the others. There is no reason why those who prepare the papers should be present where the examinations are held. In fact, in the case of the university examinations, they usually reside elsewhere; and they might as well reside at Montreal, or Halifax, or Victoria, for the efficient performance of their duties. I have heard it asserted and not denied yet that these Civil Service examinations which cost so much are not always final. I have been informed that in the Department of the Interior, on one occasion, certain gentlemen who wished to be clerks failed to pass, and that new papers were provided for them in the Department itself. The board were requested to substitute these papers, and the gentlemen, having passed under them, were admitted as clerks in the Department. We have all read, from time to time, in the press, and perhaps some of us know of cases, of men having been appointed to positions without examinations at all. That broad and generous clause allowing men to be appointed for special qualifications, has been strained to the utmost, and men have been appointed without passing any examinations, and on the certificate of a Minister that they had special qualifications, although no special qualifications were required for the place. That provision was only intended to cover the case of a man required for certain technical work that nobody in the Department could do; and it has been strained time and again, and the hon. Minister cannot deny it, to procure the entrance to the Civil Service of gentlemen who had no special qualifications, except the political influence at their back. As to the present expenses of this commission, I am told that an office has been rented for Mr. LeSueur, as secretary of the commission, at a rent of $300 a year. Now, I certainly think that the Civil Service Commission should be provided with quarters in the public Departments; I do not see why it should be necessary to rent an office outside. I hope the hon. Minister will be prepared to deny that statement. As he does not deny it, I suppose that statement is correct.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. If I were to rise to deny every statement of the hon. gentleman, we should be here till 12 o'clock and I do not intend to detain the House.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not pretend to know exactly how these examinations are conducted, and in making any observations, I do so in order that the hon. the Secretary of State may, if my suggestions are worth anything, to some extent adopt them. I am told that the examinations are not held at regular intervals, but at the will of the member of the Government in whose charge they are. Now, it appears to me that it would be better and more convenient for those who are at school if the examinations were held at periods which would be selected with some regard to the curricula of the schools. In the Province of Ontario the public and high schools have regular terms, and the long vacation commences towards the end of June; so, I think, towards the end of June or early in July would be the most convenient time for the examination of students who attend the public and high schools in the Province of Ontario. It may be that they are held at that convenient time now. If so, I apologise for making the suggestion. If it is thought desirable to have a second examination in the year, another term of our schools concludes near Christmas, and there are two or three weeks of holidays before the re-opening of the schools again after Christmas. If, therefore, two examinations in the year are necessary, perhaps it would suit the public service, as I am sure it would suit the examiners, if those two periods were chosen. Then, as to the system of holding examinations, I think it is reasonable that they should be held at different points in each Province. I do not think it is necessary at all that the examiners themselves should be present at such examinations. The papers could be transmitted in various ways safely, received and placed in safe hands, and the examination conducted with absolute safety and efficiency at various points. The whole examination could be thus directed from a central point, say Ottawa, if that is thought desirable, and then there would be practically no travelling expenses. I have had some experience in this matter for some years, and I think that examinations could be conducted in the public interest in the way I have indicated. Then as to the source from which examiners should be chosen, I would not venture to make any suggestion as to the source from which they should be chosen, outside of this Province, as I am not acquainted with educational institutions outside of Ontario; but if it is intended to appoint examiners familiar with the school system, I think we could do better than appoint permanent examiners. I think that, in itself, it is a mistake to appoint men permanently to the office of examiners; experience has frequently, in our Province, shown it to be a mistake. In Ontario we have an excellent field from which to choose examiners. I believe that there are not less than 5,000 public school teachers in Ontario to day, I cannot say how many high school teachers there are, but there are a hundred head masters, and perhaps as many more assistant masters, so that you could very well choose examiners from the source to which I refer—the public school teachers and the high school teachers of the Province of Ontario. They are acquainted with the system of teaching there and would make efficient examiners, and you could easily change them when occasion required. There is another advantage in that system; you would have independent men as examiners. They do not run in a groove; they would be faithful and reliable men; and in addition to that consideration, there is this one, that the Government of the Dominion would thus, to some extent, recognise that great and useful class. If I had the power—it is not one of my aspirations—to make such appointments, and if I were considering the interest of the public service and my position as well, I should feel that I was not only doing good to the public service, but also doing an excellent thing to popularise the Department by saying: Here are a few prizes; true, they are not much, but they are open to the whole army of teachers that are taking care of the youth of Ontario.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). And the Dominion.

Mr. MULOCK. My hon. friend from Brant says, "and the Dominion." Well, my remarks may apply to the other Provinces, but I will not take the liberty to refer to the educational institutions of the other Provinces, for I am not acquainted with their machinery. I think it would be wise if the appointments were made from the source I have named, and the examinations conducted as I have suggested, and no persons permanently appointed. It is necessary that the chief clerk or secretary should be permanently appointed, though he may be attached also to some other office in the service.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I am thankful to the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) for his suggestion on the subject of sub-examiners, though, perhaps, it may be a question whether teachers would be the best judges of the qualifications necessary for the Civil Service. I think that to choose teachers as sub-examiners would be a recognition of the services that the important profession of teachers render the country, and it would be useful in putting in their way the slight remuneration of salary as sub-examiners. I also agree with my hon. friend that changing the sub-examiners is likely to procure impartiality, though there cannot be a great deal of partiality exercised by them, because they do not correct the papers. Still there may always be something done in the way of favoritism. In one point I do not agree with my hon. friend, and that is as to the time of holding the examinations, which he said was at the will of the Minister. The time of the examinations is left to the Government, but two epochs of the year have been fixed, and I will explain why they were chosen. What has probably misled my hon. friend is this: There are promotion examinations that take place at the will of the Minister, but not as a matter of favor on his part. They are fixed as a matter of necessity for the public service. In several Departments there may be, at any time, important vacancies to be filled up, and which must be filled up before the period fixed for the general examinations. The Governor in Council, in such a case, has a right to fix a day for promotion examinations, but not for the entrance or qualifying examinations. My hon. friend said the time for examinations might be fixed so as to coincide with the holidays of the different universities and colleges. We thought of that, but came to the conclusion that what was specially important was this. Outside the Session—for examinations must not take place during the Sessions, because we want to be able to lay the report of those examinations before the House—outside the Session we thought the best time was when travelling was most easy for the candidates. We must not forget that those young men who come here to be examined are not of the richest class and their travelling expenses are very onerous to them, and we have taken the time best suited to them for travelling, some time in the month of May, after the opening of navigation, and some time before the late fall season. I am not one who likes to have any extravagance in the service. If my hon. friend wishes that the future may bring to him what he does not expect to have very soon, the position I occupy, he may be sure that it will not be the extravagance of the Civil Service or of the Department I control which will bring that future. If the hon. gentleman were in my place he would say, as I do, that the Civil Service work is done as cheaply as possible, and I may say that in the future I will always be pleased to take suggestions such as those made by my hon. friend. I wish to say, in conclusion, that the increase proposed is only this: The examiners, now at $300 a piece, will be at $600 a piece, making a difference of $900; and to this we have to add $700 for the secretary, who is one of the commissioners. The whole of the salaries will then be $1,800 for the commissioners and $700 for the secretary, making $2,500; and the fee of $2 per examination covers the whole of that expenditure.

Mr. DAVIES. Does that include the clerk?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I am not Finance Minister, but three times six make eighteen, and $1,800 and $700 make $2,500, according to my mode of reckoning, and we collect more than that in fees; but if we were taking a secretary outside of the commissioners, we would have $300 to add to that.

Mr. DAVIES. But I referred to the clerk.

Mr. IVES. I think we have wasted quite as much time here as the increase would amount to.

Mr. DAVIES. Why waste more, then?

Mr. IVES. I rose only to prevent a longer speech, which you would have made if you had got the floor. There is only one point I would like to refer to, and it is a point of considerable importance. It is said that a very large sum of money is paid annually to civil servants for work over time and out of hours. I think it is rather an important question whether that amount of money produces the same desirable results as it would if, instead of employing the present corps of civil servants out of hours, it were applied to the employment of an additional number. I think the course of hon. gentlemen on this side, when they were in power, was to appoint a considerably larger number of civil servants instead of paying those in the service for extra work. I must say that I like the course which hon. gentlemen on this side of the House pursued when they were in power, because it certainly affords a better opportunity for those of us who have friends to get them appointed to office. Now, if we go to the members of the Administration to get an appointment, we are told that the offices are full, and we find when the Public Accounts come down, that the Departments are not full, that the offices are not full, that it is necessary to overwork the men in their offices to such an extent as to pay them a large proportion of the total amount for extra hours. If this extra work brought about the speedy demise of these gentlemen whom we would be glad to get rid of in order to get places for others, there might be some compensating advantage in that, but they grow fat on it; they appear to be healthier every year; the older they grow the more healthy and the more happy they appear to be, and therefore I think the adoption of the course pursued by hon. gentlemen on this side when they were in power, of filling the public Departments with civil servants instead of overworking those who are in them and paying them for extra time, would be more pleasing to those supporters of the Administration who have friends, of whom I am one.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I would suggest that the hon. gentleman who spoke last should compare the lists of office holders as they existed when we left office, and as they exist now, and he will find that we neither resorted to the one plan nor to the other, but had the work done in a proper manner by a more limited number of servants.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I can inform my hon. friend (Mr. Ives) that he is doing a gross injustice to the hon. gentlemen opposite. To the best of my recollection, we had about 370 gentlemen employed in these buildings, and now, I think, he will find that at least 600 are employed. Surely, in six years, an addition of nearly 60 per cent. to the staff is as much as my hon. friend can expect his friends to do; and, if he will look further, and look into the extra lists, he will find that, for one extra clerk that we employed, they employ three, and pay them about three times as much per head as we ever paid them. So I think that his charge on the hon. gentleman is not as well founded as I should have expected from a gentleman of his general accuracy.

Mr. CASEY. My hon. friend the Minister who has charge of this Bill has told us that, if he replied to all the insinuations and statements I made, we would be here till twelve o'clock, and so he would treat those insinuations and statements with silence. I did not make insinuations. I made statements, which I believe to be true, which I believed to be true at the time I made them, and which I am now sure are true, because he cannot deny them consistently with truth, and I am bound to do him the credit of believing that he would not infringe upon the truth in order to be able to deny them, and therefore they must be true. One of these statements was—

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Dispense.

Mr. CASEY. What did the hon. gentleman say?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I said "dispense."

Mr. CASEY. We will dispense with the hon. Minister presently. One of those statements was that the power of appointing men for special qualifications had been strained so as to bring in men who had no special qualifications, simply to do ordinary departmental work. That is not denied, so it is correct. Another statement was that an office had been rented for this commission at $300 a year in the city of Ottawa. That has not been denied, therefore it is true. I claimed, and I still claim, that that is a misuse of public money. There should be room for Mr. LeSueur, who is not a very large individual and would not require a very large office, somewhere in the Departments. But this is not the only office for which room is required outside the Departments. The Chinese commission also have had rooms rented for them outside, and by a strange coincidence the rooms for the two commissions are in a building owned by the same person, a most estimable man, whose only failing is that he is a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, an influential supporter of theirs, whom it is worth their while to oblige, and it is in his building that these commissions, and I do not know how many other commissions, have got their offices—Mr. McLeod Stewart's building. These statements, which are not denied and are therefore correct, show a state of things which is not consistent, I take it, with the public interest. But the hon. gentleman seemed to think he would shorten this discussion by attempting to snub me in a manner by no means courteous—I speak in a parliamentary sense. I think the hon. gentleman will find it a failure in this House to try to shorten discussions by affecting contempt for, or disregard of, what is said on the other side of the House. He will find the charges which he attempts to push aside with contempt renewed by other gentlemen, until he is forced to attend to them, and is placed in the ridiculous position of being compelled to give attention to what he at first affected to despise. That has been the case with the hon. gentleman before, and that is the case on this occasion. Whenever I have occasion to discuss anything with the hon. gentleman, he seems to get into that snappish, uncomfortable frame of mind which he is in this afternoon. I should be inclined to attribute that to something especially irritating in my way of treating public questions, were it not that he is the only Minister with whom it takes place. When I have to discuss matters with his colleagues and fellow-countrymen, the hon. the Minister of Public Works and the hon. the Minister of Militia, I always find them ready to discuss those matters and to give me information, and to discuss with the utmost courtesy any point I may bring up, and to listen to any suggestions which they may think useful, or, if they do not think so, to tell me why. I am now forced to the conclusion that the cause of the difference is that the hon. gentlemen to whom I last referred are almost invariably well prepared in regard to the matters which they bring before this House. They are full of information, more especially the hon. Minister of Public Works. They can give us the utmost satisfaction with regard to all the details of their Departments; while the hon. Minister who is in charge of these resolutions has shown himself unable, or at least unwilling, which amounts to the same thing—when it is his duty to state what he knows—to give us information on some of the most important points of this question. I am therefore sorry to be compelled on this occasion, as I was last year, to refer him to his colleagues for a lesson as to the manner of conducting public business before this House. It is true he has conducted public business very successfully for a number of years in another sphere, but in this arena he has yet to win his spurs; and I think as a young Minister in this House he could not do better than to follow the example of his grave and reverend seniors—like the hon. Minister of Militia, who now sits smiling at me.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I beg to move the first resolution.

On resolution 2,

Mr. BLAKE. Is it intended that these travelling expenses shall be paid on a different scale to that which is provided by the Order in Council and which regulates travelling expenses generally?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. They will be regulated by the Order in Council. That provides, I think, for the allowance of $3.50 per day for travelling expenses; and instead of paying them, as in the past, upon vouchers, &c., for their travelling expenses, they will be allowed the regular rate fixed by Order in Council.

On resolution 3,

Mr. DAVIES. I asked a question with regard to travelling expenses; I wish to know why it is necessary for the gentlemen in Ottawa to travel if you have sub-examiners in the several Provinces.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. We have found that in large cities like Toronto and Montreal, the sub-examiners were not able properly to organise the examinations and to carry them on without making many mistakes. It must be remembered that a very large quantity of papers have to be distributed to the different sub-examiners, and it has been found necessary that the secretary should remain here while one of the examiners goes to Toronto, or Montreal, or wherever he may be required. The examiners do not travel for their own pleasure; they prefer remaining here, but it has been, and will be, found necessary for one of them to visit the large centres in order to put the machinery into working order.

Mr. CASEY. The information as to the salary should properly come in here. I did not quite understand the hon. Minister's explanation, but I make out there are three salaries at $600 a year each, and one salary at $1,000, for the secretary of the commission, and another person who is to be a third-class clerk in the Department of the Secretary of State whose salary may reach $1,000. All this makes $3,800. Of course, I understood that it is not all to be taken this year, that there was to be a saving on Mr. LeSueur's salary, but the resolution gives the power to use that amount of money in the future, and probably it will be found necessary to do it.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Last year we provided for the salary of a clerk at $600. I may inform the hon. gentleman that I made the appointment during the year, but I did not pay all the salary voted by Parliament. The clerk has been paid $500, and it is not the intention to raise the salary to more than $600. But it was necessary to put that officer, seeing that he would be subjected to a qualifying examination, into the rank of a third-class clerk, for it is thought that he will be a link between the Department and the Board of Civil Service Commissioners. The expense of the secretary will be borne as part of the expenditure of the board.

Committee rose and House resumed.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Bill (No. 59) to incorporate the Brantford, Waterloo and Lake Erie Railway Company.—(Mr. Paterson, Brant.)

Bill (No. 62) to amend the Act to incorporate the Bank of Winnipeg.—(Mr. Watson.)

CIVIL SERVICE ACTS AMENDMENT.

House again resolved itself into committee to consider certain proposed resolutions (p. 273) respecting the Civil Service Act.

On resolution 4,

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The fourth resolution is to provide that the salary paid to chief clerks shall be from $1,800, with an annual increase of $50 per annum until a maximum of $2,600 was reached. I do not, however, propose to insist upon this resolution; still, I think it is but due to the House to give an explanation of the reasons why it was inserted. The office of a chief clerk is an important one, requiring long service, and I thought that commencing his duties at a salary of $1,800, and rising to a maximum of $2,600, the salary would not be too high, in view of the fact that the officer would have been many years in the public service before he reached the position of chief clerk. I did not consider the salary too high; moreover, in view of the fact that the difference between a chief clerk and a deputy head would still amount to $600. However, in order not to change anything as regards the minimum and maximum of the salaries of the different clerks, the Government have decided that they will not insist on this resolution, and I therefore ask permission to withdraw it.

On resolution 5,

Mr. CHAPLEAU. This is the old law with a slight change.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It looks to me as if it would be quite possible, in the case of a junior clerk entering upon the performance of higher duties, to leave him for an indefinite space of time receiving full pay for the office whose duties he was performing.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It is only during the fiscal year, and it is only provided where funds have been voted by Parliament.

Mr. BLAKE. Suppose, for some reason the Government choose unwarrantably to delay for thirteen or fourteen months the filling of an important office like the librarianship of Parliament. It is for their convenience that the office has not been filled. It is provided that an inferior officer shall discharge the duty and shall be paid the salary of the superior officer. I think it is very advantageous that offices should be promptly filled, if they are to be filled at all. It is sometimes said that it is rather economical not to fill offices, because the salary is not going on. But my belief is, that so long as the office is necessary—and if it is not necessary it should be abolished—it is really better for the public service that the office should be promptly filled, because the administration of the office suffers seriously from the absence of the officer, and particularly when the officer is a superior officer. But these arrangements do not occur from economical views or are they attended with economical results. The objection I have to this resolution is, that it really proposes we should, in a sort of way, give our warrant and sanction to the custom of leaving offices unfilled for a long period of time, and I think that is very objectionable.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But the hon. gentleman promises that the office will be filled ere long; it is only a period of thirteen months that the office has been vacant.

M. BLAKE. Is it the case that the hon. gentleman does not feel able to fill an office within three months?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. When offices are not filled it is not because the Government is not placed in the condition to fill them. The Government only abstains from doing so when there are difficulties in the way. In discussing the estimates of my Department the hon. gentlemen will see that, in cases where offices have become vacant, I have not thought proper and I have not given the salary to the succeeding junior officer.

Mr. BLAKE. But the hon. gentleman says wherever offices became vacant by reason of decease.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. But not by superannuation. Demands were made on me which I have not complied with.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman's virtue has sustained him up to a certain point; but he is afraid that he will fail, and he asks our assistance to keep him in the correct path. So far, I am quite prepared to sustain him. I feel the hon. gentleman has rightly estimated the difficulty of long continuance in the path of virtue, and he has a right to call on us to help him. Will the hon. gentleman be able to resist the suggestion which is, no doubt, pressed on him to a considerable extent, how to delay filling appointments when to that is added the circumstance that somebody else is getting the salary. The hon. gentleman has said that the offices are not filled for want of opportunity to fill them. I suppose there is such a multitude of applicants that the difficulty is to make a selection, but I should think the combined energy, intelligence, perspicuity and power of the fourteen gentlemen who comprehend the Cabinet, should enable them to make choice of a librarian or a chief clerk in three months, and certainly in fourteen months.

On resolution 6,

Mr. CHAPLEAU. This resolution provides that when a vote is given by Parliament it need not necessarily be expended, but the case shall be decided by Order in Council.

Resolutions ordered to be reported.

CARRIERS BY LAND.

Mr. McCARTHY moved the second reading of Bill (No. 5) respecting the liabilities of carriers by land. He said: In moving the second reading of the Bill which I have had the honor to introduce to the House, perhaps a brief explanation, although not necessary, may as well be given. The Bill, Sir, has already been before this House, and had reached the motion for the second reading when a question arising as to the constitutionality of the measure, it stood over from time to time, in order that the First Minister might say what he thought with regard to that disputed point. I desire, however, to recall to the recollection of my hon. friends what the measure is. The Bill respects merely carriers by land. The reason I limit it in that way is that there is already a measure on the Statute Book providing for the regulation of carriers by water; though, I think, perhaps, if I had to commence again, it would be better to make the one set of rules and the one law to regulate carriers, whether by land or by water. I do not know that there is any good reason for separating the regulations respecting carriers in one way from those respecting carriers who carry in another way. However, if the Bill receives the assent of the House, it may perhaps, on reference to a select committee, be so altered as to embrace both these kinds of carriers. Now, it is well known, of course, that in common law—and in that respect I do not find that the civil law differs much from the English common law—the liabilities of carriers is to deliver the goods with which they are intrusted to the consignee, unless they are prevented by what is called the act of God or the Queen's enemies. That was at an early time—or in the early part of this century, at all events—found to be a hardship, and the law was limited by a statute brought in, I think, in 1830, whereby certain classes of goods—goods of large value and put up in very small parcels—were excepted from that general rule, and it was provided that unless the value—if it was beyond £10—was specified to the carrier, and he was paid an additional compensation for the risk he undertook, he should not be responsible for a greater amount than £10, no matter what the value might be. The earlier sections of this Bill are a re-enactment, substantially, of the Act to which I refer—the Act of 1830; and it is to that extent in aid of the carrier. It provides that it shall be necessary to point out, when goods are delivered to a carrier, that they are of such a value, and that such a fair additional rate as he may choose to ask shall be paid; else, he shall not be responsible beyond a given amount, which is fixed in the Bill at $50. The next and other provisions of the Bill are in the other direction. In the 6th section of the Bill it is provided that a carrier shall not be at liberty, by simply putting up a notice limiting his liability—he shall not be at liberty by a notice put up in his office, which people perhaps will not read, though they may have an opportunity of reading it—to say: You must understand that I am not going to be responsible for the goods you hand me to carry, except under certain circumstances. The Bill provides that the carrier shall not be at liberty simply by a notice to limit his ordinary and common law responsibility. But it goes on to say, that such a provision may be made by a contract signed by the party; and the contract must not only be signed, but the judge before whom it may afterwards come must deem it to be a fair and reasonable contract, in order that it may have force. The difference, therefore, is this: That at common law a carrier is responsible in any event, except in those two extraordinary circumstances, when he is, by the act of God, as it is called, or the act of the Queen's enemies, prevented from delivering the goods and fulfilling his bargain. This Bill stipulates that he shall not be at liberty, simply by a notice, in any way to define or cut down that responsibility. But it does not prevent him from making a special contract, to be signed by the consignor—it does not prevent such a contract as that being made—but it does provide that if that contract is not just and reasonable, if the judge before whom any disputed cases comes to be tried, does not pronounce that special contract to be a just and reasonable one, it shall not be binding. I think that these few observations will sufficiently explain the object of the measure, and the general features of the Bill which I have the honor to promote; but if the House will pardon me, I will read an extract in a recent case in the House of Lords, where this principle of the measure is very clearly stated:

"The real question," says Lord Blackburn, in quoting from an earlier case, "is whether the individual and the public are sufficiently protected from being unjustly dealt with by the parties having the monopoly. The mischief was supposed to consist in giving a practical monopoly to the railway companies by compelling people to enter into contracts, whether they willed it or not. The Act says, 'if you have signed a written contract expressing a certain condition, a judge or a court shall see whether it is reasonable or not.' Crompton, J. says, and I think rightly, that in order to judge whether it is reasonable or not you must look at this consideration: Are the individual and the public sufficiently protected from being unjustly dealt with by the effect of that monopoly."

Now, that is the whole object and necessity of this measure. Practically, the railway companies are the carriers in this and most other countries at this time, and practically, therefore, they have an absolutely monopoly. As a matter of fact, when persons desire to send goods, the companies place before them a certain written document, and unless they sign this document they will not carry the goods, and people are therefore compelled, in order to have their goods carried—without scrutinising very closely what they have agreed to—sign this document, and in the end, they may find that they have signed away the right to hold the carrier responsible, no matter what may happen. I say that this is manifestly unjust. The carrier should be responsible for his negligence, but I think he should not be deprived of the liberty of making a contract which will, to a certain extent, reduce the company's liability of which I have spoken. So much for the general features of the measure. But the other question upon which the Bill of a former Session stood over yet remains to be discussed, and I have a few words to say with regard to that. It is said by some, and by a gentleman for whose opinion I have the highest respect, that he did not think this measure was within the competence of this Parliament, that it was a measure of a local character, which could only be carried into law in the Local Legislatures.

Mr. CASGRAIN. In part.

Mr. McCARTHY. Perhaps in part. I understood him to argue in whole. However, whether in part or in whole, I join issue with him in that particular contention, and I will briefly state why I think this Bill is within the competence of Parliament, and within the competence of Parliament alone. Now, I do not pretend to say it is not a matter of civil right; and every matter, probably, may be brought within that category. But matters which belong to the Parliament of Canada, although they entrench upon civil right and contract, nevertheless can be dealt with by us. Take the great question of bankruptcy and insolvency; it is impossible to deal with it without entrenching upon matters of civil right and contract. But the law is now clearly defined, that matters of that kind are within the competence of Parliament, so far as it is necessary to the carrying out of the particular jurisdiction invested in us; and it would be a great misfortune if we had not the right to deal with this question. What is the law of carriers? It is a law regulating commerce and trade. In fact, you cannot imagine any matter more properly commercial in its character than the law regulating carriers. It would be a great misfortune if these matters had to be dealt with by the different Provinces and not by this Parliament, which gives law where it has a right to give law, over the whole Dominion. A law passed in the Province of Quebec might be a good law, and yet it might differ very much from the law in the Province of Ontario; but we know that carriers carry goods from one Province to another, and if the law is good for Quebec—and I am happy to say I believe the law there under the code is very good—that law would regulate the consignment of goods from the Province of Quebec to the Province of Ontario. But suppose a man living in the Province of Quebec has goods consigned from the Province of Ontario, where the law is not so good, he would find his right determined, not by the law at the place of delivery, but by the law at the place where the contract was made. Now, it is absurd, it seems to me, that there should be different laws in the different Provinces of the Confederation. We have several Provinces now, and are likely to have more. In the case of the Pacific Railway, for instance, which will run through Ontario and Manitoba, and on west to the Pacific, there would be a different law regulating its carrying for every different Province through which it will pass. Well, a condition of that kind is not one to be envied, and I am glad to think that it is not one which the constitution requires us to be governed by.

Mr. AMYOT. Would the hon. gentleman prefer a legislative union.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am not speaking of a legislative union at all. I am speaking of such matters as under the constitution are to be regulated by this Parliament; I am not going beyond the line of the system we have. My hon. friend knows that the law with regard to bills of exchange and promissory notes has to be regulated by this Parliament.

Mr. AMYOT. That is provided for by the British North America Act.

Mr. McCARTHY. Precisely. Trade and commerce are also provided for by the British North America Act; and the question is, does this come within the meaning of the words "trade and commerce." Now, I will read, if hon. gentlemen will pardon me, an extract from a judgment of a judge of the State of New York, not bearing exactly, of course, upon the constitutionality of this Bill, but giving a good reason why this Parliament, and not the Local Legislatures, should deal with it. Speaking of this question of carriers, he says:

"It is a question in relation to which, almost above all others, the law should be uniform throughout the commercial world, especially among the different States of the Union. It relates to questions which, in their nature, expand themselves over and through extensive districts of country and to places widely separated from each other. None can fail to perceive the great inconvenience that must result from having different and hostile rules on the subject prevailing between the different Atlantic cities, or between them and the western States."

Now, every word of that applies with equal force to this Dominion, and I believe it would be a great misfortune, as I have said, if the law on the subject were not within the purview of this Parliament. I have heard no good argument to lead me to a different conclusion, and I am fortified in my opinion by the judgment of one of the judges of the Court of Appeal in the Province from which I come, who spoke as follows:—

"Mr. Bethune's suggestion, that the interference with the defendants' right of contracting against their own negligence is ultra vires of the Dominion Parliament, would not, even if we could adopt it, help the defendants. No good reason has, however, been given for holding Dominion legislation to be ultra vires, and there would be obvious inconvenience in having the liability of the carrier in respect of goods or passengers differing in different stages of the one journey under the statute law of each Province through which the railway passed."

I do not mean to quote this as a decision; it is merely an expression of opinion; but it is an expression of that judge's opinion, Mr. Justice Patterson, that the law is one within the competence of this Parliament. For these reasons I submit the law is a good law. I submit that it is in the interest of the people of this country and of the carriers themselves that the law should be clear and well defined. I think this Bill imposes no undue burdens upon the carrier. So far as small parcels are concerned, it places the carrier in a fair position, and it provides that the consignor shall not be bound by a notice unless he makes a contract, but the contract that he makes shall always be subject, in case of dispute, to the decision of the court that it is just and reasonable as between the consignor and the carrier who takes his goods. The other question is one which each hon. member shall have to think out for himself. The Bill deals, I think, with a matter which is purely and clearly a matter of trade and commerce in its widest sense; it is inter-provincial in its character, and that is a character which appertains to this Dominion. I move the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. BOSSÉ. I regret to be obliged to oppose this Bill, not because I do not believe its provisions to be good in themselves; on the contrary, I believe its provisions are as good as they can possibly be made; but the principle of the Bill, I believe, is against our constitution. It regulates accessories of trade and commerce; but this House has no right to legislate on civil rights, unless they become accessories to the main principle; and this House cannot legislate upon the subjects of contracts apart from the general principle of trade and commerce. This is a measure by itself, not upon general principles, but merely upon special civil contracts over which this House has no jurisdiction; and it is for that reason, I believe, that last year the Bill was not persisted in. I raise this question, not merely as a constitutional, but as one in which our Province is more specially interested than any of the other Provinces. We have on this matter our own special legislation, which has been borrowed from the code Napoleon, which is the best of all codes, a code that has been taken for a model for the laws of many other nations, in the making of which the best legal talent were engaged, in which all the judges of France took part, and which has been made clear by the French jurisprudence. We have, in our Province, the benefit of the experience and the jurisprudence of the whole of France since 1804, and the benefit of the experience of our own Province since 1866, when our code, founded on the code Napoleon, came into force. Now we have in our code ten articles embodying all the laws with reference to common carriers, not only that portion of the law to be found in this Bill, but the whole law; and that law comprises every section, every line of the Bill now before the House. I wish that the promoter of the Bill had read those articles. He would then have found the whole law which he intends to become the law of this country, and he would have found the whole of that law comprised in a little more than fifteen lines, condensed as much as possible, and made as clear as the wisdom of the most eminent legal minds could make it. Now, I say it would be an act of injustice to our Province to deprive us of our present legislation, which combines the experience of the jurisprudence of France since 1804, and our own experience and jurisprudence since 1866, and to give us instead a new law, formulated in different terms, a law which would compel us to begin over again and establish a new jurisprudence. For these reasons I hold that our Province is much more interested in this than the other Provinces, and should the Bill go into committee I will there move to substitute our own articles of the code for the different portions of the Bill, because I believe our own articles contain better provisions than those found in the Bill.

Mr. CASEY. I take the object of the Bill to be to define more clearly than the present law does the obligations of carriers. Taking that to be the principle of the Bill, I am inclined to support it, and to urge that it should go as far as the committee, but I wish to call attention to one or two points which I think ought to be considered when it goes into committee, as qualifying my approbation of the Bill as a whole. As far as I can understand, as a layman, the first section of the Bill relieves the carrier, to a certain extent, of the liabilities under which he is at present, with reference to the enumerated classes of goods, unless the consignor is willing to pay a certain rate of insurance upon those goods as well as give notice that they are goods which require special care in handling. I do not know that it would be well to reduce the liability of the carrier to that extent, to give him the option of saying: I will treat these valuable goods with no more care than ordinary goods, I will not be liable for damages exceeding $50, unless you pay a rate of insurance upon the goods. The consignor is compelled to pay insurance upon the carriage of those more especially valuable goods, and if the carrier be allowed, as provided in another part of the Bill, to dispense himself from this liability by special contract—if he is to to obtain payment for the imposition of liabilities with regard to special goods—I think no contract into which a carrier may enter with a consignor, exempting the carrier from liability, should be valid unless some value is given by the carrier in return, in the shape of reduced rates. The same principle should apply in both directions. I doubt indeed whether it would be wise to allow this special exemption by contract at all, because it is always open to the carrier to say to the consignor: Unless you sign some contract of this sort I will not carry your goods, or will put obstacles in the way; and it is always easy for the carrier to make it unpleasant to the consignor, unless the latter will agree to such provisions as the carrier has, under the law, the right to make. I think there would be great difficulty in getting any special property carried, especially when the carriers enjoy a practical monopoly as our great railways do, unless the consignor is willing to sign any contract which is allowed to be made under the eleventh section of the Act. I have not the slightest doubt of the hon. gentleman's intention of making a great improvement in the state of the law, and I believe that on the whole this Bill does make an improvement, but I hope he will be able to explain why the changes I propose would not be desirable, when we go into committee, or willing to adopt them.

Mr. IVES. If the proposition of the hon. member were to amend the Consolidated Railway Act, as regards the particulars proposed in this Bill, I fancy that the hon. gentleman from Quebec (Mr. Bossé) would hardly contend that it was ultra vires of this Parliament to adopt such legislation as an amendment to the Consolidated Railway Act, for the reason that the incorporation of railways of a certain description is within the power of this Parliament; and for the reason just stated, and stated without dissent, that where we have power over the main subject we have power over the accessories, though the exercise of that power may affect civil rights—for both these reasons I fancy that the hon. member for Quebec Centre would not contend that we had not the power to pass this Bill as an amendment to the Consolidated Railway Act. So much, then, for that part of the Bill that relates to such railways as pass from one Province to another, the incorporation of which is within the power of this Parliament. That part of the Bill then, I think, is clearly within the power of this Parliament; the passing of legislation which shall regulate contracts to be made by railway carriers or companies, under powers of this Parliament, is clearly within our power, in my opinion. I have more doubt as regards that part which applies to coach lines and express companies and other lines, in respect to which we have not clear power over the main subject. But if we have the power, as I think we have, to incorporate in a general railway Act in the Dominion, the legislation proposed by this Bill, so far as it affects railway companies, then I think we may pass it in an independent Bill, as proposed, and I shall vote for the second reading of the Bill, reserving the right to oppose more doubtful provisions which seek to establish legislation affecting express companies, stage companies and other companies, that less clearly are within our power.

Mr. CURRAN. I shall add very few words indeed to the able argument of the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Bossé). I think that it is evident, not only from the argument of my hon. friend, but even from the statement that has been made by the mover of this Bill, that the only means by which we can arrive at even the supposition that we have the power in this Parliament to legislate, as herein provided, is by implication, while by direct enactment this subject falls within the power of the Local Legislatures. His reference to the first clause fortifies the position taken by the hon. member for Quebec Centre. The whole drift of his argument, I think, consisted in stating that this was desirable legislation; that it was very much to be regretted, indeed, that such legislation does not exist. I presume we have to take our British North America Act as we find it; we have to deal with the matter as is therein provided; and, under the provisions of that Act, I consider these contracts fall within the province of the Local Legislatures. For these reasons, I shall now move that this Bill be not now read the second time, but be read the second time six months hence. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down has not, in my opinion, given any good reason for combatting the principle advocated by my hon. friend from Quebec Centre (Mr. Bossé) with regard to accessory legislation. He has, it is true, admitted that there are various classes of carriers who he believes come within the provisions of this Bill, and that this House cannot legislate upon. He has also expressed an idea that this might be made part of the general railway Act. Well, I do not propose to discuss, at this moment, what might be done under a different form, but taking the Bill as I now find it, and believing it to be ultra vires, as far as this Parliament is concerned, I now propose the motion that I have just mentioned.

Mr. McNEILL. The main questions involved in this Bill are, I think shortly, two. The first question is whether it be in the public interest desirable that public carriers should be responsible for damage, by their own negligence, done to goods entrusted to their care, or whether they should, on the other hand, be permitted to compel parties entrusting goods to their care to sign contracts or agreements exempting the carriers from all liability with respect to the safe carriage of those goods; in other words, whether they should be permitted to compel individuals who desire to have goods conveyed by this mode of transport to sign contracts exempting the carriers from the obligations imposed upon them by the law of the land. That is the first main question, and the second question is, I think, whether or not it is competent for this Parliament to deal with this matter. Now, with reference to the first question, I think it seems very reasonable and right, on the first blush of it, that carriers should be responsible for the safe conveyance, for the safe carriage of the goods that have been confided to their care, and for the safe carriage of which they are paid. It has always been held to be important in the public interest that this obligation should attach to carriers. It attaches to them by the provisions of the common law, and also by the provisions of our own statute, of an Act of this Dominion Parliament, which has been ratified again and again, the Consolidated Railway Act, under the 25th section of which, and the 3rd and 4th sub-sections, we find this obligation imposed upon railway companies at all events—I will deal with the other question as to other carriers hereafter:

"Such passengers and goods shall be taken, transported and discharged at and from and to such places on the due payment of the toll, freight, or fare legally authorised therefor. The party aggrieved by any neglect or refusal in the premises shall have an action therefor against the company, from which action the company shall not be relieved by any notice, condition or declaration, if the damage arises from any negligence or omission of the company, or of its servants."

Therefore, as I have said, this Parliament has already imposed this obligation upon railway companies as public carriers at all events, and I think it will commend itself to the common sense of every hon. gentleman in this House that, if any hon. gentleman, for example, were to purchase a piece of furniture here in Ottawa, and desired to have it carried away and delivered in some other part of the Dominion, the carrier who has charge of this piece of furniture and is paid for the safe carriage of it, should be held to be responsible for its safety, and if he damages or smashes it, as we know frequently occurs, he should be responsible and liable to the person who has paid him for carrying it. And so, if a cattle dealer purchases a quantity of cattle, and wishes these cattle to be carried from Guelph, for example, to Montreal, and hands over these cattle to a railway company, and pays a large sum of money to this railway company for the carriage of these cattle, it is only reasonable and right that the company should be responsible to the cattle dealer if they, in the carriage of these cattle, make a smash of all this property. I think it is reasonable, and the law says it is right. The law of the land provides that this should be so. The law of the land says that the carrier is so responsible. But, then, these great monopolists, these great railway companies, come forward and say: It is perfectly true that such a legal obligation rests upon us, but we wish you to understand that, unless you relieve us of that legal obligation, we will not carry your cattle for you; unless you make a contract with us to relieve us of the obligation which the law of the land, and the House of Commons, has said devolves upon us, you may walk your cattle from Guelph to Montreal. The cattle dealer cannot walk his cattle from Guelph to Montreal, and the consequence is that he is compelled, he is coerced by these great monopolists, to enter into what is called a private contract, as to which I shall have a word to say by-and-bye. He is coerced to enter into an arrangement by virtue of which he is deprived of the right which the law of the land has declared he possesses—the right to recover damages if his goods are destroyed by the carrier who is charged with them. Well, that provision of my hon. friend's Bill, which I look upon as, after all, its main provision, says, that hereafter no such arrangement as this shall be binding upon a private individual, unless it is a reasonable arrangement; and the Bill goes further, and says that the court or judge before whom the matter is brought is to decide whether the special contract which the railway company compels this man to enter into is or is not a reasonable contract. Now, a similar provision has existed in the English law for many years—I think since 1854—and that provision has been found to work admirably and has given great satisfaction to the public at large. I believe that on a former occasion a good deal of exception was taken, on theoretical grounds, to this provision of the Bill. I think that such theoretical objections will not have much weight with hon. members of this House, provided they find that in point of fact the test of practical experience has proved that the provision is a good and satisfactory one. These theoretical objections, I think, are not at all interesting to us, except, perhaps, as a sort of intellectual gymnastics. But, Sir, the question comes up whether we have really power in this House to deal with this matter at all. I would say, in the first place, that I think it would be a very great misfortune if we were to decide that because there might be some doubt as to whether our action in this matter might conflict with the jurisdiction of the Local Legislatures, we ought to leave the matter alone altogether. I think it is quite clear to every hon. gentleman that the matter is one of vast importance to the people of this Dominion, and therefore, as I say, I think it would be very unfortunate if we were to decide that, simply because some doubt existed, we should leave the matter alone altogether. If the mere fact of such an argument being advanced were to be considered as conclusive in the matter, I think we should be reduced to a very helpless state in this House. It seems to me that the questions which arise, and that seem to threaten a conflict between the legislative powers of this Parliament and those of the Provincial Legislatures, are very numerous and varied, and if the mere objection that a possible conflict might arise between the two powers was sufficient to preclude this House from dealing with any measure brought down, we would be reduced very much to the condition of those interesting insects with which the country has become so familiar owing to the extremely well known and apt comparison of the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright). It would never do for us to allow ourselves to be made flies on the wheel in that way. But, Sir, I cannot believe that this measure of justice which my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has proposed, is beyond the competence of this House to deal with. That may, perhaps, appear to be a very presumptuous statement on my part. I hope it will not be so considered; however, I confess that in saying so I almost hope against hope, because I have thought very often that an attempt to reconcile the provisions of the 91st and the 92nd sections of the British North America Act, with reference to many matters, was very much like a plunge into the thickets of free will and predestination. Looking at the matter from one point of view, it seems to be perfectly clear that we can if we will, and looking at it from another standpoint, it seems just as certain that we cannot if we would. No doubt it is exceedingly difficult in many cases to pronounce any opinion for a person like myself who does not profess to be a lawyer, but in this case I think there cannot be much doubt. View the matter as we like, from any reasonable point of view, it seems perfectly clear that this is a matter which falls within the competence of this House to deal with. Now, Sir, that a safe and expeditious transport of goods upon reasonable terms is a matter of the utmost importance to every man, woman and child in every part of this Dominion, is a proposition so self-evident, I think, that it requires no argument to prove it; and that a carrier, however small his business may be, and however remotely he may be situated, forms, in fact, a link, if I may so express it, in the continuous net-work of the carrying trade of this whole Dominion, is a proposition that seems to me just as evident as the first. For instance, a public carrier in a remote part of my own riding of North Bruce, may find himself to be in point of fact simply a link in that great carrying system which commences on the one hand in Prince Edward Island in the east, and extends to British Columbia in the west. This is no fanciful supposition, because there are many of my own constituents who have relatives and friends in Prince Edward Island, and many of them also who have relatives and friends in British Columbia, and it is only a few weeks ago that a letter was handed to me at Dunblane post office, in North Bruce, with reference to the loss of certain goods which had been shipped at Paisley, in North Bruce, to some point in British Columbia. Therefore, the whole carrying trade of the Dominion is one system, extending from one ocean to the other. I say it is but reasonable and right that we should treat the whole carrying trade of the country as one continuous system. It seems to me that it is unnatural and artificial to suppose, and that it would be injurious to the interests of this country, as one united Dominion, to treat this system, which is important, as it is carried on in Ontario, to the residents of British Columbia, and important to the residents of Prince Edward Island, as it is carried on in Ontario—I say, it seems to be most unnatural that we should suppose that the system is not continuous, and can be divided into a number of separate carrying trades for each separate Province—that it is, in fact, if I may so express it, to be regarded as a sort of net-work which is co-extensive with the Provinces, and which terminates just at the boundary line of each Province, in place of regarding it as one continuous net-work, the strands of which pass over from Province to Province, as we know is, in point of fact, the case. Why, just in proportion as those strands of the net-work do pass over from Province to Province, just in proportion as they cross and re-cross and interlace one another, in that proportion, to a great extent, is the unity and solidity of this Dominion rendered a reality. And, I venture to say, that this Parliament, in the prosecution of the Intercolonial Railway, and of the Canadian Pacific Railway, has recognised the fact, that the carrying trade, to a very great extent, partakes of the very essence of the Confederation itself. Yet this is the trade as to which this Parliament is to have nothing to do. It seems to me it is monstrous to suppose that this Parliament, which has expended such enormous sums of money for the express purpose of providing facilities for the transmission of goods from one Province to another, and from one part of the Dominion to another, should have nothing to do with the laws which regulate it, that we are not to be allowed to interfere with it, even to the extent contemplated by this Bill, although the matter is of enormous and of common interest to every individual residing in every part of the Dominion. I say that hon. members representing Montreal ought to have a say in determining what the laws shall be, or, at all events, in determining that the laws shall be reasonable to which their constituents are to be subjected in the transportation of their goods, which business is so largely carried on from Montreal to every part of the Dominion. It is quite clear that if the different Provinces are to have different laws to regulate this carrying trade, you may have laws imposed in one Province under the color of such compulsory contracts as these, for the express purpose of giving special facilities to some particular city or place in that Province, to the prejudice of cities and localities in other Provinces. You may have laws passed in Ontario, for example, which would aim at giving special facilities and advantages in the carrying trade of that Province, to the great city of Toronto and to Hamilton or Guelph, and conflicting with the interests of those who have goods to send through the Province of Ontario from the city of Montreal. And thereupon, finding those laws so discriminating in favor of Ontario, you may have the Province of Quebec setting about to enact other laws to counteract the effect of Ontario's laws, giving special facilities to Montreal. So you may have a conflict going on through every Province. This matter lies at the very root of Confederation itself, and if you say that this Parliament cannot deal with this matter you strike a vital blow at the unity and solidarity of the Dominion. On these general principles and general considerations, it is to me quite clear that this is a matter which specially falls within the jurisdiction of this Parliament. I say, shortly, it is not a matter relating to locality or province, but is one of general interest to the Dominion, and it is a matter that is co-extensive, at least, with settlement; and you may as well say that you can properly control this trade by having a separate carrying trade for Ontario, for Quebec and for Prince Edward Island, respectively, as you may attempt to declare that the circulation of the blood may be fairly divided into the circulation of the head, of the lungs and of the trunk. The contention is an entirely erroneous one, especially when you recognise the fact that the Dominion has spent an enormous sum in order to provide due facilities for the carrying of goods and of persons throughout this country as a whole. I desire to ask the indulgence of the House while I look at this subject from another point of view. As the hon. gentleman has said, this is a matter which affects trade and commerce. Trade and commerce is one of those matters which falls specially within the jurisdiction of this House to deal with, and it is perfectly impossible to suppose that a matter of this kind does not fall within the heading of trade and commerce. If you so legislate as to injure the carrying trade of the country, you must to that extent injure its trade and commerce. It is quite clear that a good condition of trade and commerce is dependent on a good condition of the carrying trade. So far as that argument is concerned, it is impossible to gainsay it. I know that another argument has been adduced, and it was pressed with a good deal of force in this House, during the last Session of Parliament, at all events, and it has been touched upon to-night, and that is, that if you interfere with this matter you are interfering with civil rights. With respect to that matter, the hon. gentleman has said that if such an argument obtains it would be difficult to say what we can deal with in this House

—what is not a interference with civil rights. I should like to read an authority on this subject. In the decision in the case of Russell and the Queen, I find the following passage occurs:—

"Few, if any laws, could be made by Parliament for the peace, order and good government of Canada, which did not in some incidental way, affect property and civil rights. And it could not have been intended, when assuring to the Provinces exclusive legislative authority on the subjects of property and civil rights, to exclude Parliament from the exercise of this general power, whenever any such interference would result from it."

Therefore, I think that that is quite conclusive as to the fact, that the mere statement that this Bill may interfere with civil rights, is not a valid objection to the measure. But I think if you look at the case of Citizens and the Queen's Assurance Companies vs. Parsons, we shall find that that matter was very carefully considered by the judges on that occasion, and the question decided on that occasion had reference to an Act of the Ontario House, the preamble of which is as follows:—

"Whereas, the provisions of an Act passed in the twenty-eighth year of the reign of Her Majesty, entitled an Act to amend the laws relating to fire insurance, the Lieutenant Governor issued a commission to certain commissioners therein named, requiring them to consider what conditions are just and reasonable conditions, to be inserted in fire insurance policies on real and personal property in this Province.

And it was on that ground, namely, that the Act had reference to real and personal property wholly within the Province, that the decision was eventually given, as is expressly laid down in the judgment of the court.

"And whereas a majority of the said commissioners have, in pursuance of the requirements of the said Act, settled and approved of the conditions set forth in the schedule to this Act; and it is advisable that the same should be expressly adopted by the Legislature as the statutory conditions to be contained in policies of fire insurance entered into or enforced in this Province."

Well, when we come to see what the decision of the court was with reference to this matter, you will find, on page 278, what the court said:

"Construing, therefore, the words 'regulation of trade and commerce' by the various aids to their interpretation above suggested, they would include political arrangements in regard to trade requiring the sanction of Parliament, regulation of trade in matters of interprovincial concern, and it may be that they would include general regulation of trade affecting the whole Dominion. Their Lordships abstain on the present occasion from any attempt to define the limits of the authority of the Dominion Parliament in this direction. It is enough for the decision of the present case to say, that in their view, its authority to legislate for the regulation of trade and commerce does not comprehend the power to regulate by legislation the contracts of a particular or trade such as the business of fire insurance, in a single Province."

Which is exactly the contention I make here. This is not a matter in reference to the regulation of trade and commerce in a particular Province. It is a regulation with regard to a trade which is co-extensive with the trade—or rather, I should, perhaps, say, with the system, as it would, to a certain extent, be begging the question, to say trade, of the Dominion. At all events, it is an attempt to deal with a matter which affects the people in the Province of Quebec, in the city of Montreal, very much more than it affects very many people in the Province of Ontario, and therefore I say that the attempt to allege that the decision in this case of the Citizen's and the Queen's Insurance Companies vs. Parsons is in any way hostile to the provisions of the Bill is, I think, contrary to the fact. I think, from the decision of the court in that case, it is quite clear that it is specially and distinctly laid down that they were only deciding in those matters which dealt with trade which were confined to a particular Province, and within the limits of that Province. But, Sir, the 12th clause of this Act, which strikes at the special agreements made between individuals and these railway companies has been alleged to interfere with the right of private contract. Well, it seems to me that these contracts cannot fairly be considered by us as contracts at all. It seems to me that the very essence of a contract is absent in the case of these agreements, because the person making the agreement is not a free agent at the time. The agreement is made under compulsion; there is no consenting mind—no more consenting mind on his part than there is in the case of a person who hands over his purse lest a worse thing befall him. I hold, therefore, that this argument as to the Bill interfering with the right of private contract is unsound, and should not have any weight in this House. I find that in making that statement I am supported by such high authorities as some of the most eminent law lords in England. I find that when this same question came to be argued in the House of Lords, in England, it was argued there by Lord Brougham himself that:

"The railway companies sought neither more nor less than to evade responsibility by this special contract—a contract forced upon a passenger—a contract upon which he entered under compulsion—a contract which might almost be said to be bad, on account of the dress under which the passenger was compelled to enter into it."

Therefore, it seems to me that the attempt to persuade this House not to deal with this matter, because we may, to some extent, interfere with contracts which are almost bad, is a very bad argument. I think my hon. friend deserves the thanks of the country, and I believe he has obtained the thanks of the country, for bringing forward this measure in the way he has done, and for the tenacity with which he has adhered to it. I am perfectly satisfied that every hon. member who supports this Bill will receive the thanks of his constituents for so supporting it. I have to apologise to the House for the length of time I have occupied, and I have only to say, in conclusion, that I have much pleasure in supporting the Bill.

M. McCARTHY. One word before the motion is put. I quite agree with my hon. friend from Quebec, that the law of that Province is a very good one, and needs little improvement, but it is no reason why we should not have a good law for the whole Dominion, that one part of the Dominion, the Province of Quebec, has a good law at present. Now, I think, in one respect, perhaps the amendment I propose is an improvement upon the law. Perhaps the law of the Province of Quebec is in one respect better than the proposal now before the House. All that, however, can be dealt with, if the principle of the Bill is accepted, by the committee to which the Bill is referred. By the law of the Province of Quebec it is possible for a carrier to make a man contract, as it were, by simply giving him notice; that is to say, if he is told, or has an opportunity of seeing a notice which is published, that the carrier will only be responsible under such and such conditions, provided the court decides that the consignor was aware of them at the time he sent the goods. That I do not believe to be a fair and reasonable state of the law, and I believe the Bill is an improvement, in declaring that the party shall not be bound simply by any pretense of notice given unless he signs a contract. The other part of the code of Quebec is perhaps an improvement on the English law:

"Notwithstanding such notice and the knowledge thereof, carriers are liable, whether it is proved that the damage is caused by their fault or the fault of those for whom they are responsible."

So that, whether the conditions be reasonable or not, in the opinion of the judge, if the goods are damaged through the fault of the carrier the carrier is responsible. These are matters of detail, however, which may be dealt with by the committee, and which do not affect the principle of the measure I have the honor to submit to the House. I think the question of constitutionality has been so fully dealt with that I need not add anything to what I have said already. I believe the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), put the question very clearly. We have already in the law with regard to railways a regulation determining their liability. The right to make that provision has never been questioned, except in the case to which I have referred, and when questioned there was overruled, so far as was necessary, by the judge. If that can be done with regard to railways, why not with regard to express companies, and, if, with regard to them, why not with regard to any carrier? The argument appears to me to be practically conclusive, and I trust the House will accept the principle of the Bill and allow the details to be worked out by a committee, whether the railway committee or a sub-committee, as the House thinks proper.

Mr. ORTON. I would like to ask my hon. friend if clause 9 is intended to hold carriers responsible for the felonious acts or the neglect or misconduct of their servants or agents.

Mr. McCARTHY. The object of that clause is to put it beyond doubt that a carrier cannot make the excuse, if goods have been stolen, that it is a felony.

Mr. MILLS. The House has, of course, before it two questions, which are entirely distinct in their character. The first is, whether it has jurisdiction to deal with this particular matter; and the second is, with regard to the merits of the measure which the hon. gentleman has submitted to us for the second reading. Of course it is not necessary that we should go into the discussion of the merits of the Bill at all if in the opinion of the House it is ultra vires. I observe that by the second section the hon. gentleman provides that the Bill shall include railway companies, express companies and large coach proprietors. Why large coach proprietors and not small ones? Every department of the law is under the control either of the Local Legislatures or of this Parliament. If this subject is under the control of this Parliament, then the subject of small coach proprietors is as much included within the purview of this Parliament as those the hon. gentleman proposes to deal with; and whether we legislate upon the subject or not, that particular department of law, even though he may not have referred to it in this Bill, is part of the law of Canada, and not of the law of any one of the Provinces. It seems to me, taking that view of the case, that the hon. gentleman would go as far as to contend that a party carrying a parcel from one part of this city to another is doing so under a law within the jurisdiction of this Parliament, and not within the jurisdiction of the Province. Looking at the principle of the Bill, it seems to me that it does interfere with civil rights. It assumes the power to regulate the terms of a contract which one party may make with another, and so far as it does this, I think it encroaches on the powers and authority of the Local Legislatures. Now, this Bill is a part of the law of bailments; yet, the hon. gentleman will admit that there is a great deal in the law of bailments, hiring and letting, with which this Parliament would have no power to deal—that if any matters are matters of civil right and contract, such matters are. Then, take the question of goods in transitu. The hon. gentleman does not deal with that question in this Bill, but if the principle of this Bill were sound, this Parliament would have a right to deal with that subject, and not the Local Legislatures. Now, one hon. gentleman, I think the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), said the subject of this Bill was accessory to the law of trade and commerce. Well, Sir, if we undertake to deal with everything which may be an incident of trade and commerce, we might embrace almost the entire field of property and civil rights. I do not think we can deal incidentally with a subject of this sort, upon the theory that it is a matter affecting trade and commerce. I think there is an old case in which it was argued before the House of Lords that a certain measure was an interference with the terms of union between England and Scotland. It was a measure relating to trade in Scotland, and was confined to the kingdom of Scotland, but it was there said that the provision relating to trade and commerce, and which provided that the laws on that subject should be uniform, did not embrace trade which was confined to Scotland. If you embrace within the definition of trade and commerce every kind of trade and all kinds of intercourse between one party and another, you would deal with the laws relating to retail trade, and the sale of goods in every town and city in the Dominion. Now, all these matters come under the law relating to civil rights; they are never regarded as being embraced in the term "trade and commerce." The hon. gentleman, in undertaking to include a number of those matters relating to the local trade of the various Provinces within the provisions of this Bill, undertakes, it seems to me, to deal with a subject with which this House ought not to deal, but which comes within the jurisdiction of the Provincial Legislatures. Whether we might not undertake to regulate interprovincial trade is another question. The hon. gentleman's Bill, however, goes beyond that, and interferes with the domestic trade of each Province.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not intend to detain the House at any length. I do not quite agree with my hon. friend on my left (Mr. Mills) in everything he has said. It appears to me the general scope of the Bill is a good one; it appears to me that the Bill is in the interest of the general public, and if it is within our jurisdiction I, for one, will gladly vote for it. The limitation of the power of common carriers to impose contracts is, in my opinion, a good limitation, because the shipper of goods is, as a rule, to-day, compelled to agree to any contract the carrier may impose on him. The only question at issue is whether by this measure we would infringe unduly on provincial rights. We know very well, so far as the character of goods carried in this Dominion is concerned, that a very large portion comes within the term of interprovincial trade, and so far as this Bill deals with interprovincial trade I believe it to be intra vires. The mass of trade affected being so large, I hold that it is worth while to pass a Bill of this nature, so far as it affects interprovincial matters. The definition of what is trade and commerce has been given in the Parsons case, in which the Privy Council defined this term as follows: "The words 'regulation of trade and commerce' include political arrangements with regard to trade requiring the sanction of Parliament, and the regulation of trade in matters of interprovincial concern." In my own opinion, so far as this Bill attempts to deal with the carriage of goods within any city, or within the limits of any Province, it is ultra vires; but so far as it concerns interprovincial trade it comes within the jurisdiction of this Parliament. I therefore cannot vote for the six months' hoist, because I believe the Bill to be intra vires in the latter sense. I shall vote against the six months' hoist, and in committee I hope that it will be amended in such a manner that it will deal solely with interprovincial trade.

House divided on amendment of Mr. Curran :

That the Bill be read the second time this day six months.

THE ESTIMATES.

Mr. BOWELL presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the message, as follows:—

LANSDOWNE.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons Estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending 30th June, 1886, and in accordance with the provisions of "The British North America Act, 1867," the Governor General recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, 27th February, 1885.

Mr. BOWELL moved that the said Message and Estimates be referred to the Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 10:15 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 2nd March, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

RETURNS—SECTION B.

Mr. CASEY. I beg to call the attention of the Acting Minister of Railways to the fact that some of the returns ordered a fortnight ago in relation to section B, with reference to sums paid the Canadian Pacific Railway on account of work done between Port Arthur and Winnipeg, engineers' reports, etc., have not yet been brought down. Can the hon. gentleman tell me when we will have them?

Mr. POPE. I cannot say; we will bring them down as soon as possible.

SHORT LINE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BLAKE. Can the hon. gentleman tell me when we will have the return with reference to the Short Line Railway Company—the contract made by Sir Charles Tupper, which the hon. gentleman promised to bring down?

Mr. POPE. I will enquire and let the hon. gentleman know to-morrow.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 50) to incorporate the Fredericton and St. Mary's Railway Bridge Company.—(Mr. Temple.)

Bill No. 54) to confirm the union of the Canada Congregational Missionary Society and the Congregational Union of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.—(Mr. Abbott.)

Bill (No. 63) to incorporate the Portage la Prairie and Lake of the Woods Railway and Navigation Company.—(Mr. Watson.)

LIFE BOAT—CAPE BRETON.

Mr. DODD asked, Is it the intention of the Government, during the present year, to place a life boat or a life saving apparatus at or near Flat or Low Point, in the County of Cape Breton?

Mr. McLELAN. The matter is in the consideration of the Government.

RAILWAY BELT LANDS—BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. HESSON asked, Whether the Homestead Act of Manitoba and the North-West applies to lands within the railway belt, British Columbia? If so, can entries be now made by proxy as permitted in Manitoba and the North-West. In case said lands are not open to homesteaders, are they now for sale, and at what price per acre and on what conditions?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Homestead Act of Manitoba will not apply to the lands within the railway belt. The lands are now being surveyed, and will soon be put in the market, and the price will then be settled on the completion of the survey.

LONG POINT FISHING GROUND.

Mr. JACKSON asked, For how long a period has the Government leased to the Long Point Company in Ontario, the fishing grounds convenient to Long Point, and what is the price received per annum for the same?

Mr. McLELAN. They were leased for nine years, from January 1st, 1880, until 31st December, 1889, at a rental of $100 per annum.

CANAL TO THE MUSKOKA LAKES.

Mr. BAIN (for Mr. COCKBURN) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to send an engineer to enquire into the feasibility of connecting the Lakes of Muskoka with the Severn River and Trent Valley Canal system by means of a very short canal, and if so, about what time will engineer be sent?

Mr. POPE. The Government are now considering the whole question.

POSTAGE PRIVILEGES.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to grant to the members of the several Local Legislatures of the Dominion, during the Sessions of the said Legislatures, the right of sending their letters and documents free of postage by Her Majesty's mail?

Mr. CARLING. It is not the intention of the Government to make any change with respect to mail arrangements with the Local Legislatures. At the present time, Votes and Proceedings, or other papers printed by order of the Legislatures, go free. The question has special reference to letters. It is not the intention to make any change in regard to them.

RAILWAY BELT ON VANCOUVER ISLAND.

Mr. GORDON asked, Has any application been made to this Government either through their agent in British Columbia or through any Provincial officer on behalf of any purchaser or purchasers of lands within the railway belt on Vancouver Island for a grant or grants under the Great Seal, as provided for under 47 Victoria, Chapter 6, section 7, sub-section 1? If so, have any such grants been issued, and to whom?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Several applications have been made—eight or nine—but no grants have yet been issued.

STATIONERY FOR HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked, What is the total expense for stationery for the House of Commons during each of the past Sessions of the present Parliament?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think that statement must be made by officers of the House.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Is that the only answer?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The only answer I can give.

Mr. SPEAKER. The expense is about $20,000.

M. FABRE.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation) asked, Whether the Government have received a report from Mr. Fabre, their agent in Paris, and whether such report, if in existence, will be laid before Parliament during the present Session? What is the amount paid to Mr. Fabre for the last fiscal year, and to date?

Mr. CHAPLEAU (Translation). Mr. Fabre has, from time to time, held correspondence with the Department of the Secretary of State, since last year. The reports he has made will be brought down, if asked for by any hon. member. The amount paid to Mr. Fabre is that which is indicated in the Public Accounts for last year, to which there has been no addition since that time.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS FOR DUNDAS.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth) asked, Does the Government propose making any provision this Session for the erection of public buildings in the town of Dundas, as implied in the statement of the hon. Minister of Public Works in Committee of Supply last Session?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As this is a new work I have to say that when the Supplementary Estimates come down I shall then be in a position to give a positive answer to the hon. gentleman's question.

ASSISTED IMMIGRANTS.

Mr. MACKINTOSH asked, Has the Government issued any instructions to the High Commissioner at London with reference to the class of emigrants to whom inducements are offered to emigrate to the Dominion? Has the Government decided upon discontinuing the policy of assisting immigrant labor coming to the Dominion? If not, is it the intention of the Government so to do?

Mr. POPE. The Department, in view of the fact that the work on the Canadian Pacific Railway will soon be completed, instructed the High Commissioner in December last that no more general laborers or navvies should be assisted or encouraged to come to Canada, neither mechanics nor artisans should be assisted. The Department also instructed that the greatest exertions should be made to induce agricultural laborers, agricultural families and female servants, both in the United Kingdom and on the Continent of Europe, to come to Canada. Having received from the working men a respectful remonstrance against assisting a certain class of laborers that come into competition with them, the Department is now considering the best means of assisting agricultural laborers, agricultural families and domestic servants, and excluding from all assistance or encouragement those classes complained of by the working men of the cities and manufacturing districts.

CLOVIS CARON.

Mr. BLONDEAU asked, What are the salary and the amount of expenses paid to Mr. Clovis Caron, fishery overseer, for the year 1883?

Mr. McLELAN. Salary, $200 per annum, and expenses last year, $81.43.

JULES GAUVREAU.

Mr. BLONDEAU asked, What are the salary and the amount of expenses paid to Jules Gauvreau, fishery overseer, for the year 1884?

Mr. McLELAN. Salary, $100, and expenses $51.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—LABORERS' WAGES.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, Has the Government taken measures to secure the payment of wages to laborers employed in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway? If not, is it proposed to take such measures?

Mr. POPE. No, they have not.

EXCISE REVENUE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What is the total revenue from Excise for the six months ending 1st January, 1885, also for the six months ending 1st January, 1884?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The total receipts for the six months ending December 31st, 1884, were $2,863,290.87; for the six months ending December 31st, 1883, $3,081,984.87.

DOMINION LANDS REVENUE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What amount has been received from all sources on account of Dominion lands up to date of enquiry? What amount in the seven months ending 1st February, 1885? What amount in the seven months ending 1st February, 1884.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The amount received to February 27th, 1885, was $4,349,378.99. For the seven months ending 1st February, 1884, $670,141.90; for the seven months ending 1st February, 1885, $242,819.52.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—EXTENSION TO QUEBEC.

Mr. LAURIER asked, Has the Government received any communication from the Government of Quebec, asking that the sum of $96,000 reserved last year by the Statute 47 Victoria, chapter 8, for the extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway from its terminus at St. Martin's Junction, to the Harbor of Quebec, be paid to the said Government or otherwise disposed of, and has any action been taken in such demand, and if so, when ?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government has received such a communication, but no action has been taken upon it.

REDUCTION OF LETTER POSTAGE.

Mr. CHARLTON moved :

For copies of all correspondence, memorials or communications received by the Government since January 1st, 1885, asking for a reduction of the letter postage of Canada to two cents per half ounce, or relating to any proposal for the reduction of letter postage.

He said : There is no tax that can be remitted or reduced by the Government, the remission or reduction of which would be received with greater favor than that of postage. In England, in Canada, and in the United States, the rate of postage has been reduced at various times, and always with excellent results and without material loss to the revenue. The last reduction which was made in England brought the rate down to one penny per ounce, and neither it nor the reduction in the United States from five to three cents was followed by loss of revenue. Canada followed the example of these countries in this respect, and reduced the letter postage from five to three cents without permanent loss of revenue or other serious consequences. Since then the United States Government have reduced the rate of letter postage to the English standard of one penny or two cents. That reduction took place in October, 1883, and there can be no question, Sir, that the example of the United States in this respect is one which it is desirable for us to follow. I suppose the question, however, with the Postmaster General is whether it is an example which we can follow without too great loss of revenue. I find, Sir, that under the operation of the reduced postage of the United States for nine months, according to the report of the Postmaster General to 30th June last, the shrinkage of the revenue amounted to $4\frac{7}{10}$ per cent., and it was held by the Postmaster General that, although the reduced rate was in force nine months, the effects of the reduction of revenue extended through the whole year. The estimate made by him is that the annual increase of postage under the old rate would have been 9 per cent., which, with the actual decrease of $4\frac{7}{10}$ per cent., would make a total of about 15 per cent. decrease. Even on this basis, however, the public were largely the gainers. The reduction in postage was $33\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., the loss in revenue was 15 per cent., so that the net gain to the public was $18\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. There is reason to suppose, I think, that the loss to the revenue was not really as great as $14\frac{7}{10}$ per cent. I find, Sir, by comparing the postal revenues of the United States with those of Canada, that apparently the causes which operate in one country, operate in the other; that in the years in which the increase of postage is large in one it is large in the other, and on the contrary in years in which the postage collections are either reduced or nearly stationary in the United States, the same feature applies to the revenue in Canada. If we take, for instance, the year 1876-77, we find that the falling off of the postal revenues in the United States was \$1,102,612, or 4 per cent. In Canada in that year the increase was very slight indeed,—about one per cent., the total increase being \$12,405. In 1878-79, the increase in the United States was $2\frac{9}{10}$ per cent., and in the same year the decrease in Canada was $2\frac{9}{10}$ or \$35,372. In the year 1881-82, the increase in Canada was \$235,779, or $17\frac{4}{10}$ per cent., while the increase in the United States for the same year was $18\frac{8}{10}$ per cent. In the following year the increase in Canada was \$212,503 or $13\frac{4}{10}$ per cent., and in the United States $8\frac{6}{10}$ per cent., while in 1883-84, under the reduction in the United States, there was a decrease of $4\frac{7}{10}$ per cent., and a decrease in Canada, without a reduction of postage rates, amounting to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I think these comparisons will naturally lead us to the conclusion that the estimate of the Postmaster General of the United States that there would have been a natural increase last year of 9 per cent. was fallacious, and that while we had an increase of only $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent it will be reasonable to suppose that the United States postal revenue would be nearly stationary under the 3 cent letter rate. If this is the case the United States has not sustained a loss of more than about 5 to 8 per cent. on the gross receipts of the Department, and the public have gained $33\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I think that a careful examination of these statistics may possibly lead my hon. friend the Postmaster General to modify somewhat his views of the probability of a large loss to the revenue from a reduction of the postal rate. There are certain causes which will tend to mitigate the evil consequence, financially, which would naturally result from the change. It is found in the United States that the adoption of the 2 cent letter rate has led to a large diminution in the number of postal cards used. The people instead of using so many one cent postal cards use more letters and pay the 2 cent rate. There is another circumstance that decreases to some extent and probably to a considerable extent, the postal revenue of Canada, and that is the fact that the business men of Windsor, Sarnia, Clifton, Fort Erie, and other places on the border, opposite to places in the United States where letters can be posted, are in the habit of sending their letters over the border in batches, prepaying them at the 2 cent rate. This habit I believe, entails a serious loss to the postal revenue, and it is a loss which would cease if we adopted a rate corresponding to the rate on the other side. I trust the postal authorities of this country will give the matter careful consideration, believing as I do that if it is carefully considered the difficulties which apparently beset the Government in taking the course I suggest will largely vanish.

Mr. HESSON. I am quite in sympathy with the objects of the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in this matter. I had previously purposed bringing the question more fully before the House after seeing the report of the Postmaster General, as I supposed I could obtain from it some information which might guide me in what I thought the Government might consider in connection with this matter. There is no question I think as to the desirability of reducing our rate of letter postage to meet the rate which has been established in the United States. The result of reducing the rate in that country has been that the loss of revenue has been much less than was anticipated, and if we follow the history of our own country in reference to postal changes which have been made from time to time, under the demand of the people for greater facilities, we find that the revenues of the Department have not suffered so much as was usually looked for. In 1859 the rate of threepence currency per half ounce was established. That rate continued until 1866, when the revenue amounted to $813,726 and the expenditure to $834,561, a deficit of $20,834; but to this has to be added $64,000, which was granted by the Legislative Assembly at that time to cover the cost of departmental postage which made the deficit something like $84,000. I have not had an opportunity of comparing the charges which prevailed previous to that time; but coming to a later period we find that the balance against us, has sometimes been larger. In 1879, for instance, the revenue was $1,534,363 and the expenditure $2,167,266, leaving an adverse balance of $632,903. Now, it is true that the balance is still very largely against us, although not to so great an extent as it was then; and when we look at the marvellous growth of the Post Office service in Canada, I think we will admit that nothing shows more strikingly or clearly the substantial progress made by the Dominion. In 1884 the revenue amounted to $2,330,741, an increase of $795,378 over 1879, five years previous, an average increase of $159,275 per annum. This is certainly a very large increase; and when we take into consideration the large extent of territory still unsettled, the great distance between settlers in many parts of Canada, and the mileage covered among a sparse population, it is certainly a very gratifying evidence of the prosperity of the Post Office Department that the expenditure has not increased at a greater rate than the income—in fact not so much, because the expenditure of 1878 was $2,167,266, while the expenditure of 1884 was $2,931,387, showing a difference of $764,121 between the deficits of those periods, or an average of $152,824 per annum. Now, there is really nothing in the fact of the deficit for the present year, representing as it does something like $600,000, to deter the Postmaster General from taking a wider view of this question, and if possible making arrangements to meet the wants of the people of Canada by reducing the rate to a point equivalent to that fixed in the United States. The reduction of the rate to two cents per half ounce would, I believe, give a very largely increased revenue with a minimum of expenditure. The total mileage in 1879, I find, was 45,880,000; in 1884 it had arisen to 69,100,000 miles, an increase of no less than 23,220,000 miles in five years, or an average increase of 4,844,000 miles per annum. This is a very large increase, and indicates the great advance which has been made in this department of the public service. As to the effect of the low rate of postage on the revenue, I may instance the introduction of the postal card. It is not very long since that privilege was granted to the people. For some time it did not seem to take with the public to a very large extent. In 1879 there were only 6,940,000 used; but in 1884 no less than 13,580,000 postal cards were used by the public, an increase of 6,640,000 cards in five years, or at the rate of 1,328,000 per annum. The fact that the circulation of postal cards has doubled in five years is, I think, pretty clear evidence that the people are prepared to take advantage of a low rate of postage even in that to some extent objectionable mode of sending correspondence. Now, Sir, my confident belief is that if the two cent rate were established for letters, the postal card would not be so largely used as at present, the two cent covered letters taking their place. There might be a diminution in the cards; and I do not know that the Government derives any great profit from printing those cards and furnishing them to the public at one cent each; and they are quite as cumbersome to carry and deliver as a letter. When all this is taken into consideration I do not think the revenue is likely to suffer much from the adoption of the two cent rate. While on this subject I would say that if the Postmaster General cannot see his way to granting this concession at once, he might relieve a grievance felt by the public in being obliged to pay six cents on a letter exceeding half an ounce. For instance, a sender posts a letter which is a small fraction over the half ounce, putting on a three cent stamp, and it sometimes happens that it is sent to a second post office before it reaches the person to whom it is addressed, when he is obliged to pay six cents more upon it, thus making a letter cost nine cents because it is a fraction over half an ounce. The Postmaster General might, perhaps, find it convenient to grant the privilege, under the present rate, of sending a letter at one rate, so long as it is under an ounce weight. That, I am sure, would be a great convenience to the public. Although there is a very large expense for the past year as against one or two preceding years, it is largely owing to the enormous increase of new offices, no less than 444 having been established during the past year ending 1884, making an additional mileage of travel of 4,664,000 miles. This certainly will account for the very large expenditure this year over income, but at the same time it is evident that the income is of solid growth, and that it is a very considerable increase over that of the preceding year. This is a cause I think for congratulation to the Postmaster General, showing as it does, that the revenue, although it has suffered to a heavy extent, will not fail in course of time to overtake the expenditure. There is no single portion of the Government service so valuable to the public as the postal service, and I would be very happy indeed if it were in the power of the Postmaster General to make a move in the direction indicated as early as possible.

Mr. CARLING. There is no objection whatever on the part of the Government to bring down any correspondence that may have taken place relative to the reduction of postage from three to two cents, but I think the time has not yet arrived when we should make this reduction considering that the expenditure is so largely over revenue as it is. The American Government, when they recommended the reduction from three to two cents, had a large surplus, a surplus of something over $2,000,000; and according to the estimate of the Postmaster General of the United States the expenses next year over the revenue will amount to something over five million dollars. I think that with the large additional mail accommodation that is asked for by the people in all parts of the country, and with the desire of the Government to meet their desires as far as possible, this is hardly the time to make a reduction and thereby reduce the revenue so very largely as the reduction asked for would reduce it. The new post offices established during the past year, as mentioned by my hon. friend, number some 430, chiefly in the North-West and in the rural districts of the different Provinces. The Government are desirous of doing everything they possibly can to increase the mail accommodation in the rural districts and especially in the North-West. We have opened up that large country from Lake Superior to the Columbia River and in the course of a few months we expect to have a through line from one end of Canada to the other. When these new roads are established, the settlers going in will require still more mail facilities which will be a very large charge upon the revenue, and I think that under all circumstances the Government are wise in not at present counselling the reduction asked for, but I can assure the hon. gentleman that the Government have given the subject full consideration; and when the time arrives, which I hope is not far off, when the revenue will equal the expenditure, then I am sure that the Government will give the matter every consideration with the view, as far as possible, of meeting the wishes of the House with regard to reduction in rate.

Motion agreed to.

REPRESENTATION OF NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved for:

1. Copies of all correspondence between the Government and the North-West Council respecting the representation of the Territories in this Parliament;
2. Copies of all petitions, representations and correspondence addressed to the Government or any member of it, on the same subject, and any replies thereto;
3. Copies of all petitions, representations and correspondence with the Government or any member of it, on the subject of the establishment of Local Governments in the Territories, and of all replies thereto.

He said: The right hon. gentleman, the First Minister will recollect that some time during the last Session of Parliament the council of the North-West council transmitted, I believe, to the Government, a minute of that council with respect to the representation of those Territories in the Parliament of Canada. I find on referring to that paper that there were a number of grievances complained of by the council, for which redress was sought at the hands of the Dominion Government. The sixteenth sub-section of the memorial is in the following words:—

"Your memorialists believe that the success of the North-West Territory is of such importance to the whole Dominion that the time has arrived when representation for the Territories should be had in Parliament. At the present time the people of the North-West Territory are without representation of any kind and have to depend solely on petitions and memorials to let their wants be known."

We know perfectly well from the newspapers published in the North-West that during the last year meetings have been held in almost every centre of population in the North-West at which resolutions were passed and transmitted, I believe, to the Government, asking the Government, as a matter of right, that representation should be given to the people of the North-West Territories in the Parliament of Canada. The hon. gentleman will recollect, on referring to the speeches—and some very able ones were made upon this subject—that the people complain, and I think very rightly, that the system in the North-West Territory is one of taxation without representation. The old principle and tyranny of the worst kind. The people in the North-West Territory complain that their grievances and representations are disposed of by Parliament in their absence and without giving them an opportunity in the face of Parliament of stating their case. They complain, and I think with good reason, that now their population exceeds the population which Prince Edward Island had when it was admitted into the Union with a representation of six members; they complain that their population is now, and I believe they state it correctly, at least ten times what the population of Manitoba was when it was admitted into the Union with a representation of four members. They complain, and I believe they are correct, that their population is now at least ten times the population British Columbia had when it was admitted into the Union with a representation of six members, and that they are yet without any representation. Being so far away from the centre of business, they add that any representation of their wants must be made known to the Government by petitions or remonstrance, or communication of some such kind. One can easily understand how the people in the North-West, most of whom are settlers from the older Provinces, and accustomed to local self-government as well as to parliamentary representation, should feel aggrieved at the fact that hitherto the Government have taken no tangible steps to give them representation in the Parliament of Canada. It will be recollected that, during the last Session of Parliament, the Minister of the Interior stated in the Senate Chamber, in reply to a question submitted by Senator Plumb, that the Government were prepared to earnestly consider the question of the representation of the people of the North-West Territory in the Parliament of Canada. I am not aware that the Government have taken any steps in that direction so far. I know that the Acting Minister of Railways has introduced a Bill with the view of taking a census, but that census will not be in the hands of Parliament, to be acted upon before this Parliament has ceased to exist, and unless prompt and decided action is taken by the Government, the people of the North-West will be without representation, not only during this Parliament, but during the whole or a portion of the next Parliament. Although the population in the North-West is not what we had a fair right to expect it would have been, still it is very considerable. In the district of Assiniboia there are very large centres of population, and it is supposed that there are somewhere between 50,000 and 100,000 people there. How far that is correct I do not know, but there are certainly considerable centres of population there, and I can see no reason why the Government should not give these people a representation of some kind, if not such as we have in this Parliament, at all events such as they have in the United States. I do not propose to discuss this motion at present. If there are any remonstrances or petitions of this kind, I desire to have them at as early a date as possible, as I wish to discuss them upon the Bill I have introduced for the purpose of granting representation to the people of the North-West Territories; and I therefore hope that the First Minister will see that any papers in the Department which are called for by this motion are brought down as soon as possible.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no objection to this motion going. Any correspondence which there may be will be brought down at once. I do not propose to enter into the discussion of the question now, as the hon. gentleman has a Bill on the subject, and the matter will be discussed on that measure.

Motion agreed to.

FOG-HORN ON DUMMY LIGHTHOUSE, LAKE ERIE.

Mr. JACKSON moved for:

Copies of all correspondence between the Government and one Captain Conally, or any other person, in regard to placing a fog-horn or fog-whistle on what is called the dummy lighthouse, near the head of Lake Erie.

He said: I wish to call the attention of the Government to this matter, which is of very great importance to the marine interest navigating the waters of Lake Erie, that is, the placing of a fog-whistle on Dummy lighthouse. This lighthouse is placed opposite Point Pelee to show the channel between Point Pelee and Pelee Island. Point Pelee extends into Lake Erie ten or twelve miles, at a distance of about 30 miles from the mouth of the Detroit River. Pelee Island is some miles distant to the south-west, and all shipping entering Lake Erie from the west or from the Detroit River has to pass through this channel, with the exception of the shipping destined for points to the south, like Toledo, Sandusky and Cleveland, which passes to the westward of Pelee Island. During clear weather the light is sufficient, but, in foggy or heavy weather, they are not able to see or to distinguish where they are, and it is necessary in passing through that channel that they should know where they are. Vessels passing up the lake with a free wind, passing Point Pelee, have to change their course to get to the mouth of the Detroit River, and if there is a fog, so that they cannot discover the light, they are liable to strike the point on the north or the island on the south. As they have to change their course after passing the point, it is necessary that they should be able to see the light or to know where it is, and in consequence of there being no whistle there, there have been many disasters on that point. In fact, it is second in the number of disasters only to Long Point. I have had a number of communications from captains in reference to the matter, asking me to bring it up as one of great importance to the shipping interest. It will only require a small outlay of money—perhaps $500 to $1,000—and I hope the Minister will see his way clear to place a fog-whistle on this Dummy lighthouse, which will be a great advantage to those navigating this lake.

Motion agreed to.

SEIZURES AT THE PORT OF WINNIPEG.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant) moved for:

A statement showing the seizures made at the port of Winnipeg by the Department of Customs or any of its officers or officials, between 1st January, 1883, and 1st January, 1885; giving the estimated value of each of such seizures, the amount of fine imposed in each case and the manner in which the said fines were disposed of, and stating in detail the amount paid to each officer or employé of the Government, the name of such officer or employé and when paid; also the salary paid to each such officer or employé; the disposal made of all such goods seized, and if sold, when, for how much, and how the proceeds were disposed of.

Mr. BOWELL. There can be no objection to giving all the information asked for in this motion, but if my hon. friend will look at the return moved for by the leader of the Opposition, and laid before the House, he will find that all the information he asks for is contained in that, with the exception of the salaries paid to each of the officers and the sale of the goods. He will also find, if he looks at the Trade and Navigation returns, that the name of every officer in the employment of the Customs' outside service is placed under each port, with the salary paid to each one of them. This motion would only be duplicating the information which is already before the House, with the exception of the points to which I have called the hon. gentleman's attention. The information asked for in the six months prior to the 1st of July, or from July, 1883, to the 31st of December, 1884, is also contained in the information laid before the House last year. If, however, the hon. gentleman requires this synopsis, I have no objection to have it made out for him; but I would remind the hon. gentlemen opposite, who have such thirst for knowledge, that if it were possible it would be as well for them to place all the information they require in one return, so as not to necessitate the same return being made two or three times. The notice on the paper given by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) also ask for this information, and a little more, by adding the names of parties from whom the seizures were made in the Province of Nova Scotia, and if the motion had been made in the first place to cover the names of the parties from whom seizures were made, together with information as to the disposal of the property, when it was sold, and how much it realized, all this could have been put in one motion. I merely point out this to the House in order that they may not be at all surprised if, on account of the multiplicity of returns for which we are asked, they do not get them as rapidly as they would like.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I would just say for myself that whether the charge will lie against any member of the House, of moving unnecessary returns, it is not for me to say, but I think I may fairly claim that I am not liable to that charge. I make no motions for papers except I have a definite object in view. I have not forgotten, either, to look over the Order paper and to notice the fact that a general return had been moved for by the leader of the Opposition, but it would not give all the information that I sought for, nor in as definite a form as I desired, and it will not contain all the information I desire. I may just say to the Minister that representations have been made to me from that quarter, with reference to some of the seizures, and I suppose that it is the duty of a member of Parliament to pay attention to complaints. I am not going to found a charge against the Department without having the papers, and therefore I abstain from saying anything at present, but I can tell the hon. Minister that I am moving for cause. It is quite possible that when the papers come down they may do away with the necessity of any remarks whatever being made on the subject. But I just wish to remind him that I have not been so negligent as to overlook the general return that has been asked for. I had taken that trouble, and found it would not contain all I desired. I am sorry the hon. Minister is so overworked, but I do trust he will put forth this one extra exertion and give me this one little return, because I do not think it can amount to a great deal, unless his officers have been seizing very generally.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is only a little one.

Motion agreed to.

SUPREME COURT OF NEW BRUNSWICK.

Mr. FOSTER moved for :

The number and title of all causes entered for argument upon the docket of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick in banco, the date of each entry thereof, the date of the argument of each cause, and the date when judgment was given in each cause, the return to include all causes from 1st May, 1879, to 31st December, 1884, and to specify the causes in which questions arising under the provisions of the Canada Temperance

Mr. BOWELL.

Act of 1878, or of the Liquor License Act of 1883, were involved, and the cities or counties in which said actions were brought, or such questions were first raised.

He said: In moving for this return I beg leave to state my reasons therefor. For a number of years past there has been an impression, more or less general, in the Province of New Brunswick, that unnecessary and tedious delays take place between the arguing of causes in our Supreme Court and the giving of judgment upon the same. Within the last two years this impression has become even more prevalent, and has found expression in many quarters. It has found expression amongst the members of the bar, and although I am not a member of the bar I have conversed with a good many who are, and I find the impression quite general that these delays are unnecessarily frequent, and quite too tedious to be in the interest of justice. Within the last year several of the more prominent newspapers in the Province have called the attention of the public and of the Supreme Court to this matter; but what is more significant than all is, that the people generally are beginning to remark it. So long as these cases were individual cases, in which the general public were not much interested, the general public did not take it much to heart; but since cases concerning the Canada Temperance Act of 1878 and the Liquor License Act of 1883 have come up, the people generally are very much interested; and I think the House will agree with me that it is not in the interest of the Supreme Court or of the demands of justice that unnecessary delay should take place. I am not founding any charge, but I am simply saying that the impression exists, and I call for these returns so that the impression, if it is erroneous, may be removed. If the impression proves to be correct, something will need to be done to provide a remedy for the grievances alleged.

Mr. CARON. There is no objection to the information being brought down; but I must point out to the hon. gentleman that the information will have to be obtained through the Lieutenant Governor.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the hon. gentleman will expedite the matter as much as possible.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—VERNON SMITH'S REPORT.

Mr. LESAGE (Translation) moved for :

Copies of the report of survey by Vernon Smith, C.E., in relation to the extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway to Canadian Ports on the Atlantic.

Mr. LAURIER. (Translation.) Is the hon. Minister of Public Works prepared to state when these reports will be ready?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) In answer to the hon. member, I must say that the reports are now being prepared as speedily as possible. The Government desire to lay them before the House, together with the plans and profiles. It is impossible to name the day, but as soon as they are prepared they will be brought down without one day's delay.

Mr. LAURIER. (Translation.) Will it be to-morrow?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) No; not to-morrow; as soon as they are ready.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) I suppose it is useless to ask for any one of these reports in particular, as they will all be brought down.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) Yes; it is useless to ask for them separately, because they will all be laid before the House.

Motion agreed to.

FISH TAKEN IN THE MIRAMICHI.

Mr. MACMILLAN (Middlesex), for Mr. Mitchell, moved for :

A return of all fresh fish taken in the bay and river of Miramichi and its branches for the year ending 1st February instant, defining the separate quantities of each kind by weight—the places to which they were exported and the route of transport in each case and the average price received for each kind of fish ; together with an estimate, in detail, of the several kinds of fish taken in that time.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the Minister says anything in regard to the motion, I wish to take this opportunity of calling his attention to a communication which I have received with reference to the hatchery on the Miramichi. My correspondent, who appears to be a respectable man and for many years a resident of that part of the country, declares that the hatchery is a slaughter house for the wholesale destruction of breeding salmon. He says further that he has been settled on his farm for 36 years, that he has always had something to do with the salmon fishing in that branch of the river, and that the number of salmon has steadily decreased until last year they would hardly pay for the time which was employed in the work. He states also the reasons which he supposes had produced this state of things, but in the absence of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) I will not trouble the House with them.

Mr. McLELLAN. The return will be brought down.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman, instead of moving for a return of all fresh fish taken in this place, had better move for a return of the quantities of fish taken, or the fish will not be very fresh when they are returned.

Motion agreed to.

EXCHANGE BANK—GOVERNMENT ADVANCES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I wish to move the following resolution pro forma, so that the debate may be adjourned as understood :

That it appears by the Public Accounts that $237,000 are due to the Government in respect of the advances made to the Exchange Bank in 1883.

That the said bank had already, within two years, suspended payment and reduced its capital by 50 per cent.

That the papers laid before this House—and the statement of the Minister—show that the bank was in difficulties when said advances were made, and that no proper enquiries were had or precautions taken in respect of the loan of the $300,000 of public money put in jeopardy by such advance.

That the present condition of the loan is such that a serious loss may occur to the Treasury.

That the developments in connection with the Exchange Bank show that the institution was at the time of the loan insolvent, and under grossly careless and fraudulent management, and that the result of the action of the Government was to bolster up the bank by restoring in some measure public confidence, during an interval in which the said careless and fraudulent management was continued, enormous sums of money disappeared, the positions of shareholders, depositors and creditors of the bank, was changed, the liability of shareholders and creditors was lost, and the whole situation changed for the worse.

That this House regrets that the Government should have advanced the said sum of $300,000 to the Exchange Bank.

He said : Of course it is understood that I speak on the resolution when it comes up on Thursday.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. O, yes.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I move that the said resolution be the first order of the day on Thursday.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—PORT MOODY WHARF AND FREIGHT SHED.

Mr. BLAKE moved for :

Copies of all reports, plans, specifications, contracts, estimates, correspondence and other papers in connection with the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway wharf and freight shed at Port Moody, B.C., and relating to its deterioration and repairs or reconstruction. And like papers as to the bridge on the railway near Spuzzum, B.C.

He said : I make this motion partly in consequence of a statement made in the appendix to the Minister's report which reads as follows :—

"The two front rows of wooden piles in the wharf at Port Moody should be replaced by piles of iron or some other material equally proof against the ravages of the sea-worm, which is so destructive to timber on the British Columbia coast. This wharf can be approached by vessels of great draft, and is sufficiently spacious for the conduct of a very considerable ocean traffic."

Now the wharf is only just built, and the Minister having just managed to construct it brings down a report that he must put in iron instead of wood. I have a communication in my hand on the subject of the wharf, which reads thus :

"I will take as one sample, the terminal wharf or pier of this place—Port Moody. This structure was built in 1882. It is composed of wooden piles, with the ordinary superstructure. I learn from a perfectly reliable source, that it cost considerably over $69,000. It may be stated in round numbers at $70,000. This structure was to be a wooden pile wharf. It is obvious that those who planned it could have made no enquiry whatever as to the suitability of that material ; for almost everybody upon the coast is well aware of the speedy and enormous ravages of the teredo upon timber submerged in any British Columbia harbor.

It is, however, a fact, also well and widely known upon the coast, that, if pile timber is cut at the proper season, and care is taken not to remove the bark before diving into place, the presence of that bark will in itself protect the piles from the attacks of the teredo, for a space varying from three to five years. No provision was made as to the time of year when the trees to form these piles were to be cut ; in point of fact, they were cut at the wrong season ; and before the piles were driven home to form the wharf, they were almost carefully stripped of their bark. The result is, that so long ago as in the summer of 1883, when a number of rail-laden ships were discharging at this wharf, the latter was already obviously in an unsafe condition. Now, a large portion of it has already subsided to a depth of several feet ; so that, as to nearly the whole of its extent, it would be rash in the extreme, to attempt making any use of it as a wharf. We are now in daily expectation of the first of a squadron of ships—ten in all, I understand—loaded with railway for the completion of the Canada Pacific. There is barely one berth at this large wharf at which any of such ships can possibly be unloaded, and it is very problematical whether it can be safely attempted there or not. In fact, the whole structure is in such a flimsy condition that when once the squared face-piles—those which form the seaward face of the wharf—begin to sway from their position, which may now occur at any hour, the whole work must collapse, become a ruin and be carried off to sea—a speedy way of getting rid of $70,000. We are told, indeed, that these squared face-piles are to be replaced by iron piles. This should have been done last year, when the weakness of the present structure became obvious to every observer. Indeed, it should have been done in the first instance. But no iron piles have made their appearance yet ; and when, if ever, they do come, it may be too late ; and the whole of this $70,000 job may have to be done over again.

"I may add that the freight shed, built upon and simultaneously with this wharf, is of the same flimsy character. Last year, 1884, it already had to be roofed anew, and a large amount of patching done to make it serve any good purpose at all. Both it and the station house are miserably inefficient for the purposes which they were intended to serve, even if but temporarily. The designs and plans for these structures were all prepared at the office of the chief engineer at Ottawa, and obviously by those who were woefully ignorant of the requirements of the works which they were planning, of the materials to be used in them, and of the circumstances under which they were to be constructed. They have been, however, constructed under peremptory orders from the same head office."

Then, with reference to the bridge near Spuzzum, my correspondent says :

"From the same quarter have emanated all the plans and specifications for the very numerous truss bridges and trestle works between the terminus and Savona. It has been found that the specified dimensions of the timbers to be used in these works have, in all cases, proved too ridiculously slight to answer the purposes intended. The engineers upon the line, and who know the country, saw this from the beginning ; and I am credibly informed that some of them remonstrated accordingly ; but the remonstrances went for nothing, and the peremptory orders had to be obeyed. The result is, that these bridges, &c., have necessarily been constantly undergoing patching ever since they were built. In some cases it is much more than patching. I have evidence of one bridge near Spuzum, which has been entirely built not less than three times; I do not know but oftener still. It is far from being the only one which has thus had to be rebuilt. As all this patching and rebuilding are, in no way that can be well seen, owing to any fault of the contractor, the Dominion will, of course, and in every such case, be called upon to pay him an enormous bill for extras."

I would like the hon. Minister—as no doubt his attention has been directed to the subject of the Port Moody wharf, as would appear from the report of the Department—to explain the condition of things which has resulted in the reconstruction, to a large extent, of this wharf, almost immediately after its completion. There must have been a lamentable amount of ignorance or carelessness on the part of the engineer as to the proper material to be used in its construction, and as to the management of that material, to produce this result. In fact, it almost reminds one of the experience of the great inventor, Lord Dundonald, who, a number of years before the use of copper-bottoms was discovered, invented a plan of covering the bottoms of ships with tar, in order to prevent the ravages of worms. He applied to the Home Government, and they would not do anything, and then he applied to a builder at Limehouse, who said to him: My good sir, we are living by repairing ships as well as by building them, and if you ask me, I would rather cover the ships with honey to attract the worms than with tar to keep them off. So, the hon. gentleman's engineer covered the wharf with wrong material, and that was stripped of its bark, so that the worms could get at it, so that it might go to pieces the sooner.

Mr. POPE. I am afraid the hon. gentleman's correspondent though I do not know him, has covered his paper with molasses.

Mr. BLAKE. No; vinegar.

Mr. POPE. It is true there was a bridge, which was carried off two or three times while it was being built; but there is no other bridge which has been built three times. With respect to this wharf, I do not want to say that the hon. gentleman does not understand these matters, because it annoys him.

Mr. BLAKE. Not at all.

Mr. POPE. But I want to say this—if he were to examine the building of railroads, he would find that it is necessary, and a great deal better, to put in timber work, although he knew it would not last for a year. Now, that is exactly what has taken place with respect to this wharf. Everybody knew when it was put there that it would not last long; but we were obliged to land our rails and other freight, and consequently we built this wharf with material that would have to be replaced with iron piles. But this correspondent, who says they cannot land their freight now, labors under a very great mistake. If the hon. gentleman will let me know the name of his correspondent—

Mr. BLAKE. No; I will not.

Mr. POPE. He will not. Very well; then I say this correspondent has misinformed the hon. gentleman. He is perhaps some disappointed engineer who could not find employment.

Mr. BLAKE. He is not an engineer at all.

Mr. POPE. If he is not, I venture to say he is a disappointed man, or else is an extreme Grit, which is the same thing. He is disappointed, whichever way you take him. Now, the hon. gentleman need not press for papers, because we have not got any, but I will read the information which the chief engineer has given. The wharf is built with wooden piles; the three outer rows are evidently eaten through by the sea-worms. This was not unlooked for, but the wharf has served a good purpose in connection with the landing of rails and other material, so that no loss has occurred. It is now proposed to replace three front rows of wooden piles with iron piles, which will probably cost

Mr. BLAKE.

$100,000, because it is a large wharf. In every other respect the wharf is in good order, as is also the freight shed. The plans, specifications and estimates are now about ready for receiving offers to furnish the iron. If the hon. gentleman will take this paper, he will find in it all the information; there is no correspondence to bring down.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not think the hon. gentleman would so neglect my motion. There must have been a plan for this wharf.

Mr. POPE. There may be a plan; I said there was no correspondence.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman asked me to take his paper as an answer to this motion. My motion is for plans, specifications, estimates, contracts, correspondence and other papers in reference to this, and the hon. gentleman says that a memorandum by the chief engineer is all that there is.

Mr. POPE. If the hon. gentleman would be good-natured enough to wait and send me this paper back, he will get all the papers.

Mr. BLAKE. Take the paper away; I don't want it.

Mr. POPE. I will see that you don't get it.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman has just said, reading from his paper—for after all there is something in it—it is intended to replace the three front rows with iron piles. This shows how rapidly this wharf is deteriorating. Only a few weeks ago the hon. gentleman's officers reported that it was necessary to replace two front rows with iron piles. Now it turns out that half as much more has to be added to the expense, and the expense is to be $100,000, so that we get a very enormous addition since the report was made, as to the expense involved in making this wharf permanent.

Mr. POPE. I did not say what it would cost.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman forgets what he has just read. He mentioned $100,000 as the cost.

Mr. POPE. O, but that is the paper; I have locked it up.

Mr. BLAKE. Then it is not even to be treated as read.

Mr. POPE. You said you did not want it.

Mr. BLAKE. O, no; I do not want the paper. The paper is locked up, but the fact remains that $100,000 is to be spent now to give us three rows of piles, when a little while ago it was to be two rows of piles. Now the hon. gentleman says it was expected the wharf would not last. I suppose it was intended to prepare for replacing it with iron, and the reason the bark was stripped off was to hasten the work and save the Government the expense of pulling out the outside piles. The hon. gentleman says that my correspondent must be a disappointed man, and that he must be a Grit. I do not know that he is either. He has not told me what his politics are, but living at the spot, he has given me these facts which appear to me, as far as I can judge, to be pretty correct, because after all it does appear that the hon. gentleman has not denied the statements made as to those circumstances which made the duration of the wharf less than it would have been if proper care had been taken; and it does appear that three instead of two rows have to be made of iron at an expense much larger than the whole cost of the original wharf. The hon. gentleman said it was quite true the same bridge was rebuilt two or three times.

Mr. POPE. No, not rebuilt; it was partly carried off, while being built, by the ice.

Mr. BLAKE. And what remained was rebuilt, I suppose; a part taken away and what remained was rebuilt; it was the only one. Well we have hit on the only one. I would like to know the particulars of the only one. It may be that the hon. gentleman was so unfortunate as to have the bridge carried away three times in the course of construction, and that it was an inevitable misfortune and not the consequence of any fault. If he knows so much about it, he must know it, not from his having been there himself, for he was not there; and if his engineer knows so much about it, it was not for his being there either, for he was not there. The hon. gentleman must know it through correspondence, and I yet believe there is something in the Department with reference to this unfortunate bridge as well as to the wharf.

Motion agreed to.

HARBOR OF REFUGE AT PORT ROWAN.

Mr. JACKSON moved for :

A copy of any memorials that may have been addressed to the Government with respect to the construction of a harbor of refuge at Port Rowan, in the Province of Ontario. Also for a copy of Richard Stevens' report made to the Department of Public Works on the same subject.

It appears that the Government are desirous, or if not, they are willing to assist in the saving of life by constructing a harbor of refuge on the north shore of Lake Erie, if they could ascertain the point at which a harbor could be constructed, where it would be most advantageous to the marine interest. It would seem that the Government are willing to do this, inasmuch as I understand that during the recess of Parliament an engineer was sent out by the Government to inspect or survey certain localities, namely, Port Burwell and Port Stanley, but I have not been told that the said engineer was instructed to visit Port Rowan, which, I believe, is, in the opinion of mariners who have not private interest to serve, the proper place for the harbor of refuge. It is all-important, before the Government undertake operations which is of such great importance to the mariners navigating Lake Erie, that they should acquire all the knowledge possible with reference to those different points, and, if possible, decide upon some point where the harbor would be most advantageous to the mariners interest, which is the only interest that should be consulted in constructing said harbor of refuge. I propose to show to you that Port Rowan is, and Port Burwell or Port Stanley is not, the proper place at which to build a harbor of refuge. To do that I will have to show the location of the different points. Lake Erie, from the mouth of the Detroit River on the west, to Buffalo on the east, is about 245 miles in length. A vessel entering the lake from Detroit River on the west, takes a south-easterly course until they pass Point Pelee, a distance of about thirty miles from the mouth of Detroit River; she then has to change her course to about east-north-east, which is a direct course from there to Buffalo or the Welland canal. In passing down the lake from Point Pelee, she leaves the Eau harbor, which is forty miles distant from the Point of Pelee, a few miles to the north, when going on a direct course, and as you leave the Eau Point the main shore turns into the north. So that vessels on a direct course down the lake are, when opposite Port Stanley, fully twenty miles from the mainland. Port Burwell is still twenty miles to the east, and when opposite Port Burwell the vessel is some eighteen or twenty miles from the land. The shore, after you leave Port Burwell to the end of Long Point, takes a different direction, running east by south, or nearly that, so that when vessels arrive opposite Long Point on their direct course down the lake, which is about forty miles from Port Burwell, they barely escape the end of the point. That is the position of the three different places. Port Rowan is on the west side of Long Point, about midway between Long Point and Port Burwell. Prior to 1857, nature had provided this place with a magnificent harbor of refuge, which was utilised to a very large extent for a great number of years. I have a statement here signed by twelve of the oldest inhabitants living in that section of the country, who state that they had lived there for over 40 years, wherein they state that this place afforded an excellent harbor of refuge, and that in severest storms a number of vessels came in there, as many as twenty-eight or thirty vessels lying at anchor at one time inside the cut. This natural harbor was formed by an opening from Lake Erie into Port Rowan Bay, which formed a basin of sufficiently large dimensions to allow all class of vessels navigating this lake to enter therein. In 1843 the Government placed there a floating lighthouse, which was a great benefit to the mariners, because, before that, they could only approach in daylight, while, after the light-ship was placed there, they could enter night and day. This harbor was kept up until 1857, at which time, on account of the natural harbor becoming filled up, it had to be abandoned. To show you the importance of this harbor, I may quote the statistics for ten years after the natural harbor was closed, which showed that during that time twenty-seven lives were lost in that vicinity and an amount of property of something like $225,000, or more than double that at any other point on the whole coast of the lake. Where much is required, I believe much is given. At this place very much is required. There was, at the time of the closing of this cut, a small channel opened through the beach into Port Rowan Bay, about one and a-half miles further west, which still remains open, but it is not large enough to allow vessels to enter. But, just west of this, a marsh commences, which covers an area of several square miles, and a large stream of water flows through it which formerly entered Lake Erie direct, but now enters Port Rowan Bay through a channel formed there by the lumbermen some years ago, for the purpose of taking lumber and timber into the bay. I claim that this stream could be utilised in connection with the marsh surrounding it, to make one of the most magnificent harbors that a person could imagine, and just in the place where it is needed. In connection with this, I will show you how Port Burwell is located. It is twenty miles further west. The harbor is constructed at the mouth of a shallow, rapid stream, flowing from the interior through two high hills, and during the freshets at some periods of the year, a large amount of wash is brought down from the hills and the sediment is deposited in the basin or harbor. When this harbor was first constructed at Port Burwell, they placed the piers 175 feet apart. And on account of the amount of detrital matter or sediment which comes down with the current, and is deposited by the stream, they found it impossible to keep the harbor open, and in later years they contracted the width of the piers to 86 feet, which is now the width. At the present time, with that contracted width, it is very difficult to keep the harbor open, on account of the wash from the hills coming down and deposited in this stream. I will show you what Mr. Page, the chief engineer of this Department, says, in regard to this matter. He says:

"The entrance to Port Burwell harbor was originally formed of two lines of piers, placed 175 feet apart, each having a direction nearly due south. Great difficulty having been experienced in maintaining a sufficient depth of water between the piers, it was some years ago decided to contract the width of the entrance to 86 feet, and thus, by confining the current, endeavor to guard against deposit taking place in the channel. To accomplish this a close line of piling was driven from the docking in front of the warehouses for a distance of 700 feet outwards, beyond which 205 feet of cribwork was sunk, terminating about 140 feet within the head of the west pier. The eastern portion has been cut off altogether by a cross range of piles, and in it there was found 4 to 5 feet of water. This appears to have had, in a great measure, the desired effect, as less obstruction from deposit is experienced than heretofore. A bar is, however, formed immediately outside of the piers, which has to be dredged more or less every year, but it is said that some seasons, during heavy spring freshets, it is swept out en masse into the lake. There is also an outer bar, on which was found from 8 to 9 feet of water at a point about 225 feet south of the end of the west pier. This seems to be part of a continuous bridge that runs in the direction parallel to the shore for a considerable distance to the eastward and westward of this place. The position of the harbor is such that vessels failing to weather Long Point during south-westerly gales would gladly avail themselves of its shelter, if it could be safely entered. But, from the limited width between the piers, and the bars which accumulate outside, this is attended with such risk as to be rarely attempted, except in cases of absolute necessity, as vessels endeavoring to make the harbor are liable to get stranded on the bar, or by missing the piers, go ashore alongside of them. A great improvement would doubtless be effected by extending the piers beyond the outer bar, but a work of this magnitude, it is to be feared, would exceed the means of the company, and even if carried out, the place, in heavy weather, would still be very difficult of access. From what has been said it will also be evident that the inside accommodation is confined to a width throughout of very little, if any, more than that between the piers; and were this increased by the formation of an inner basin it is quite probable that the space excavated, as well as the existing channel, would be more or less silted up by the detritus brought down by the stream."

Now, Sir, you see from Mr. Page's report that the construction of a harbor at this place is not at all practicable. To construct a harbor for the convenience of vessels navigating the lakes you must have a width between the piers of at least 300 feet, and you require a basin occupying an area of not less than fifteen acres, in order to accommodate the shipping interest. So, by his report, you see that Port Burwell is not the place to build a harbor, and if it was a place to build a harbor, the sediment coming down would prevent its being of any use. The same may be said of Port Stanley, which is twenty miles further west, and, like Port Burwell, is constructed at the mouth of a shallow, rapid stream. During the dry time in the summer this stream is very feeble, the bottoms are nearly dry, but in the spring and during the freshets there is a very large amount of water coming from the interior which drains a very large surface of territory, and brings down a very large sediment of earth. When this harbor was formed the stream came down very close to the lake and formed a short curve. In order to form this harbor and to make a basin, the idea struck him to take this ox bow off, which was done between 1852 and 1854, and a basin was formed there of about five acres. The harbor at Port Stanley is of about the same width as at Port Burwell—I think about 80 feet wide, and Mr. Page's report says, speaking of Port Stanley harbor :

"The harbor is situated at the mouth of Kettle Creek, 43 miles north-east half-east from Rondeau Point, and 57½ miles west-three-quarters-north from the lighthouse at Long Point. This creek is of considerable width, but although draining a large extent of country to the northward, is for the greater part of the year an ordinary feeble stream. For several miles before entering the lake it has a tortuous course through a deep clay valley, and is liable to heavy spring freshets, which bring down a large amount of the detritus and frequently causes considerable damage near the outlet."

Now, to show the amount of sediment and detritus that flows down this stream, Mr. Page's report states that between 1852 and 1856 :

"There had been removed by excavation and dredging 133,485 cubic yards. In 1857 a plan was prepared, showing the depth of water throughout the harbor. On comparing this with the soundings of 1868 it appears that the area of shoal water in the basin has considerably increased, although between the years 1859 and 1863 there were 107,000 cubic yards of material removed by dredging. From this, some idea may be formed of the large quantity of deposit which annually takes place in the harbor."

And he says again :

"It is said there is always a bar at the entrance, but that its position changes more or less every season. This, together with the narrow space between the piers, renders it extremely difficult to enter the harbor during stormy weather. Vessels attempting to make it at such times have frequently gone ashore to the eastward or the westward of the entrance. Still, when once fairly inside, they are safe, as the basin is fully protected by the high banks of the cliffs."

Now, these are the statements made by the chief engineer in regard to these two places, and I claim that neither of them are sufficient for a harbor of the requisite dimensions for the marine interests now navigating those lakes. I affirm that the vicinity of Port Rowan is the only place that affords large facilities for constructing a harbor of proper dimensions. There you have the stream, and by changing the current to its former course and compelling it to enter into the lake as it did formerly, you have a first-class stream to support the harbor, while you have no sediment from the interior, because this stream flows down through the marsh for a number of miles, whereas the water becomes pure before reaching the lake. Now, in Mr. Page's report in 1870, in regard to Port Rowan, he said that on account of the sand and bars changing so materially it was not practicable to construct a harbor at that point. Well, Sir, I have a statement here, signed by one of the oldest captains of that section, the present captain of the life-saving service there, wherein he states :

"That beach opposite Port Royal has not changed any since Mr. Munro made the survey. I have been acquainted with the beach for forty years, and it has not changed any worth mentioning in that time. I was with Mr. Munro all the time, and furnished the boat to do all the surveying with, so I am well acquainted with the beach all along."
" (Signed) WM. WOODWARD."

Now, that shows that Mr. Page's anticipations have not been realised, for the beach in that vicinity has remained as it was for a number of years. Again, Sir, the obstacles that appeared to be insurmountable fifteen years ago, when this survey was made, are now, on account of the advancement in science and engineering skill, comparatively of easy removal. I claim that even if there was some change in the sands and bar, the advancement of engineering skill could overcome that difficulty. These men state here that there has been no material change for the last twenty years or more. Now, I find that, in 1880, petitions were forwarded to this Government from all the municipalities bordering on the lake in the county of Norfolk, signed by the reeves of each municipality, also a petition from Simcoe, signed by the mayor, and also a petition from the inhabitants of the county of Norfolk, signed by 657 persons, all praying the Government to construct a harbor at the mouth of Big Creek, the point I have spoken of. Now, Sir, although these petitions are worthy of due consideration by the Government, I claim that they are of minor importance to the other petitions that were handed into the Government that same year. I find that, in the year 1880, there were petitions sent to the Government from the city of Hamilton, the city of St. Catharines, Bay City, Port Huron in Michigan, the town of Dunnville and Port Dover, containing the signatures of 623 mariners and owners of vessels navigating the lakes, praying that the Government would construct a harbor of refuge at the above named place. I say these men know where a harbor should be constructed to their advantage, and I claim it is the marine interest that should be consulted in constructing said harbor, and that alone. Now, here are 623 owners and mariners who have signed this petition which was forwarded to this Government in 1880, representing a capital of perhaps one million of dollars or more, all asking that a harbor should be constructed at this particular place, which shows conclusively to my mind that this is the proper place to construct said harbor. About that time I understand an engineer was sent out—Mr. Stephens, I think was his name; I have had no way of knowing what his report was, although I have heard it was favorable to building the harbor at this place. Now, Sir, I submit that in the opinion of mariners who have no private interests to serve, Port Rowan or its vicinity is the proper place to construct a harbor of the requisite dimensions such as the service requires, and that it can be built and maintained at that place at a much less cost than either at Port Burwell or Port Stanley, for the reason that there is no sediment coming down, no wash from the interior, and because the material that would have to be excavated is of so much softer a nature. As I said before, a harbor competent to maintain the shipping that navigates Lake Erie should contain an area of not less than fifteen acres, and at this particular point the width of the pier should be at least 300 feet. At this particular place you have plenty of room, and nature has provided there one of the nicest places for a harbor that could be desired. Another reason why a harbor should be constructed at this place is, because the captains coming down the lake often find themselves struck by gales that spring up on that lake very quickly in the fall of the year. On some occasions, and under some circumstances, captains would be too far down the lake when a gale struck them to be able to make either Port Stanley or Port Burwell, if they saw fit to do so, and in other cases captains coming down the lake would rather take the chance of weathering Long Point than undertake to run twenty miles out of their course and attempt to make the harbor of either Port Stanley or Port Burwell. I therefore claim that Port Rowan or its vicinity is the only place where a harbor can be constructed which will be advantageous to the marine interest, and I claim that is the interest that should be consulted before any steps are taken in that respect, and that from a harbor constructed at either Port Burwell or Port Stanley mariners would receive no benefit. I hope the hon. Minister will give this matter his best consideration.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is a memorial in the Department from shipowners, mariners, etc., of Buffalo, praying for the construction of a harbour at or near Long Point. We have also a report from Mr. Richard Stephens, in 1879. I think these are all the papers we have, and they will be brought down.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—EASTERN SECTION.

Mr. EDGAR moved for :

Copies of the estimates in detail furnished to the Government by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and by the Government engineers, upon which the estimated cost of $23,000 per mile was based for the portion of the eastern section from the 100th mile to the 120th mile west of Callander, giving quantities, classification and prices; also, for a statement of the actual quantities, description and classification of the work from the 100th mile to the 120th mile west of Callander, on 12th August, 1884, when the subsidy and loan were paid by the Government as for a completed line.

He said: It will be observed that the resolution is limited to the section of twenty miles, from the one hundredth mile to the one hundred and twentieth mile west of Callander. The reason of that is, that this portion of the line is the first which was paid for under the Act of last Session, and also, it was estimated at $23,000 per mile, which was a different and smaller estimate than that for any other portion of the eastern section. So that I desire, in drawing attention to this particular portion of the eastern section, to keep this portion separate from the rest. The House will recollect that last Session an Act was passed which related to the mode of payment of the subsidy of $15,385 a mile, which had been apportioned to the eastern section as a cash payment, and also related to the distribution, advance and payment, over that same eastern section, of the proportion of the loan of $22,500,000, which was by that Act made payable to this section. The way in which the Act provided that the subsidy should be paid and that portion of the loan should be paid, was the same. Both payments were governed by the second section of that Act. That section provided as follows:—"That the money subsidy hereafter payable to the company may be paid as the work on either section of the railway proceeds, in the proportion which the value of the work done on such section, and for which payment is demanded, bears to the value of the whole work now remaining to be done under the contract upon such section." It cannot seriously be argued that it makes no difference what was the estimate of this particular portion, or what the payments on this particular portion were, so long as the entire sum made payable in respect of the eastern section should not be exceeded in the whole. I do not think that could possibly be fairly contended for, because while it is true that the proportion of money payable on this section must bear the same proportion as to the value of the work remaining to be done as the monies payable on the other section, and it is true that this section is a very cheap one, and there are other very dear sections, some as high as $80,000 per mile, still it is perfectly clear that it is a very important and a material question for the House to ascertain whether the estimate for this section was not less than the actual value. If the estimates and payments on this particular portion of the work, or on any other particular portion, are less than the actual value, I admit that so long as the gross amount is not exceeded it made little or no difference. But if it should appear, as I think it will appear, that the estimate for the section is greater than the actual value, and that the payments made by the Government to the railway company are really largely in excess of the total value of the work done on this section, then it is most material that the House should know it, and by granting this return the House will be able to ascertain it. I do not ask in the return for statements of the payments made on this twenty mile section, because we have returns now before the House which show those payments. I do not ask for the profiles of this section to be laid before the House, because we have had them brought down, and I have had an opportunity of examining them very carefully, with such assistance as I could get, and I think, therefore, that the only quantities which it is necessary to ascertain are those I ask for in the resolution. We have seen the payments, and we have seen the profiles. Now, though I am only a lawyer, and not an engineer, I think I am able to form a very fair idea of the cost of this portion, by examining the profile, and I was assisted in investigating into it by a very able engineer. On these twenty miles I found only one mile of heavy rock work. I found four miles in which there was some light rock work, and fifteen miles in which there was no rock and no difficulty of any kind. It was merely levelling, or what engineers and contractors call "scraper work." The other day, in answer to a question, the Acting Minister of Railways gave me some information which will help us very materially to arrive at what was the actual cost, and what should have been the proper estimated value of these twenty miles. He informed me that the fixed sum which appeared in the progress estimates which are before me, of $5,100 a mile, included the rails, the sleepers, the track-laying, the engineering, buildings, water service and ballasting. The estimate seems to be fair and I do not think anybody can find fault with it. Then, in those progress estimates which are before me, I find another fixed item, which enables us to get further at the value of the twenty miles—that is the item of bridging, which is put at $1,500, whereas, as a matter of fact, on this particular portion the bridging is very light, and this estimate is a largely excessive one. We have, therefore, for these items, a total of $6,600 per mile. Now, the only items, except excavations, which can be included in the work to complete that road, are clearing, close-cutting and grubbing, and it is perfectly easy to estimate what those are. In order that there may be no mistake as to the prices of that work and the excavation, I turned up a contract which had been entered into by the Government with Messrs. Parcell & Co., in 1879, for the construction of over 100 miles between English River and Eagle River, on the Port Arthur and Winnipeg section. There were two prices in that contract—one lower and the other higher. The latter was for the construction of a work at an early period, so I take the schedule prices of quantities per acre in that contract, and I find, going into the minutest details, that it came to $176 per mile for clearing, close-cutting and grubbing. That makes, therefore, except for excavation, the sum of $6,776 per mile. Now, fortunately, in these profiles which I had the privilege of examining in the House, the actual quantities for a very great part of these twenty miles were given, and we can ascertain what the quantities were from that source. By calculating all these quantities, as if all the excavations in the cuts were wasted, and not used; and allowing in the same way for all the filling, there would be only in this light work, at the most, an excavation of 12,000 yards per mile. An engineer who looked at the matter very carefully and made the calculations, expressed his willingness to eat any earth which there was over that quantity, and it is quite apparent that it is a low estimate. Now there was only one mile in which there was any rock, and four with a trifling quantity of rock, and from the profiles there could not be over 30,000 yards altogether in that section. Take that figure and take in addition 12,000 yards per mile of earth, and we have an earth excavation of 240,000 yards, at the price in Messrs. Purcell & Co.'s contract, of 26 cents per yard, which is a good price, and we have $62,400. Add the 30,000 yards of rock which we take also at Purcell & Co.'s highest contract rate, $1.55 per yard, and we have $46,500, making, for the excavation, $108,900 on the twenty miles, or at the rate of $5,445 a mile; and any one who examines the profiles and sees the quantities upon it will at once understand that that is a full estimate. Add that to the other fixed charges which we ascertained the other day from the Minister of Railways, and we have $12,221 per mile as the entire cost without equipment. The Minister, perhaps, could tell me if he included the equipment or not. If he did, the estimates on that section will only be $1,300 per mile more at any rate, which makes $13,521 per mile for that section. Now that result is obtained from the examination of such information as has been laid before the House up to this time, as to that particular section. But we have some other evidence as to the cost of a line such as this is, from the engineers of the Canadian Pacific Railway themselves. Mr. S. B. Reed, engineer for the Canadian Pacific Railway, reported, only on the 9th of September last, to Mr. Van Horne, after a minute personal inspection of a large section of the country in British Columbia, on 113 miles there, in which he elaborately described the nature of the country, and in which he showed there is a great deal of rock, that there is very heavy work among the timber of the Pacific coast, which necessitates the expenditure of some thousand of dollars a mile for clearing and grubbing; and yet with all that, making a description of the country which is infinitely heavier work than this before us, he estimates that it can all be done, including station buildings and water service, for $16,600 per mile. Therefore, I think anybody who looks at this section from the information which is before the House, must come to the conclusion that its cost, including equipment, could not be more than $15,000 per mile. If it has cost more, the returns asked for in this motion will show it; and if it has not cost more, what has been the result? The result has been, that the moment the Act of last Session was passed—and the House will remember that the Royal assent was given to that Act in a great hurry on the 5th of March—and ever since then, monthly and semi-monthly, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has been drawing cash from the Government on account of subsidy and on account of loan. On the 12th of August last they had drawn, less 10 per cent., which is kept back until the whole section is finished, $23,000 a mile in cash on this section as completed road. As I believe it did not cost them to build, even if they had paid their contractors, more than from $13,000 to $15,000 a mile, the country has been paying the company from $8,000 to $10,000 a mile more than it cost to build, besides giving them the road thus built and 9,000 acres a mile, in addition to other good things in the shape of guarantees of their stock and portions of the road handed over to them. So far, therefore, I think a very strong case has been made out for asking the Government to give this additional information.

M. POPE. There is not the slightest objection to bringing down all the information we have upon this in regard to these twenty miles; but I can say to the hon. gentleman that the rate of $23,000 a mile was first established during last Session by a comparison of the profiles not of these twenty miles alone, but of 109 miles on the line from Sudbury Junction to twenty-seven miles east of Dog Lake. The twenty miles were included in the 109 miles. Of course, I cannot speak positively about these twenty miles, for I have not now the information, and I think it would have been just as well if the hon. gentleman had waited until he got the information, if it is information he wants, before discussing this matter. However, all the papers touching these twenty miles will be brought down, but I doubt if we can bring any down with respect to the twenty miles alone.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. EDGAR. The motion I now desire to propose will meet entirely the objection of the hon. Minister of Railways, because it covers the eighty miles which, together with the twenty miles, make the 100 miles which the hon. gentleman says were taken into consideration when this estimate of $23,000 a mile was made for the twenty miles. I am afraid my hon. friend is a little astray in his figures, for if he looks at the matter he will find that the whole of the rest of this 100 miles is estimated at $27,000 a mile; so that it is impossible that it can be taken into consideration to estimate $23,000 a mile for the twenty miles. I took the twenty miles up first, because the estimate for them was the lowest estimate. Now, the resolution which I propose, dealing with this further portion, is this:

Copies of the estimates in detail furnished to the Government by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Government engineers, upon which the estimated cost of $27,000 per mile was based for the portion of the eastern section from the 120th mile to the 200th mile west of Callander, giving quantities, classification and prices for each division of twenty miles; also, for a statement of the actual quantities, description and classification of the work, from the 120th mile to the 200th mile west of Callander, on the 30th November, 1884, when the subsidy and loan were paid as for a line completed, except station buildings and water service, for which $6,000 in all was kept back.

Now, this will entirely meet the hon. gentleman's difficulty about the twenty miles, and I am glad he will be so thoroughly satisfied, because there is a great deal about these eighty miles which we would like to know. The profile of that portion of the road was also in my hands, and was very carefully examined by an expert. We found from it that more than half of that portion was absolutely without rock at all, and at least half of that is light scraper work, such as I have been describing most of the twenty miles to be; and it is to be observed that $3,000 a mile more was estimated for that and paid for that. If we assume that the figures which I gave with reference to the twenty miles are correct—and they will be found to be absolutely correct by any one who examines them—the additional $3,000 per mile which has been paid for these eighty miles would cover the cost of 3,000 extra yards of rock on the half where there is any rock, and would pay $2 a yard for it—a great deal more rock, and a great deal bigger price than they need allow. That would still leave on this section of eighty miles an overpayment of about $10,000 a mile. I am assuming that all that had to be filled was filled, not with temporary trestle work or trestle work of a cheap character, but honestly filled, as the profile says it ought to be filled. It is well known that about a week ago an unfortunate event occurred on this very portion of the line, this eighty miles, which was paid for in cash by the Government as a completed line on the 30th November, 1884, according to the papers we have before us. Between 160 and 170 miles west of Callander there was an unfortunate accident, when a construction train broke down the trestle work and six cars fell through. I do not know whether that was on any of the trestle work called temporary. Certainly, judging from the result, it was exceedingly temporary; it did not last till any passenger traffic went on the road at all, but it lasted until the road was paid for at the rate of $27,000 a mile, or $10,000 a mile more than it cost. This subject is so important that we may as well discuss it thoroughly. All over the country it has been stated that the construction of this portion to which I refer has been exceedingly bad; that it was built in a wretched way; that it was rushed through, in many respects, in an unfinished manner. I think we should have the papers I have called for, in order to ascertain the value of these statements. And remember, I have based my calculations on a good road. I do not want to give currency to mere rumors about loose construction—

Mr. POPE. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." I hope he will agree with me in the opinion that the proper way to proceed in this matter is, if there are people who say they have personal knowledge of the defects in that construction, these people should be asked to make their statements over their own signature. I have taken the liberty of doing that, and I have here a few documents which show these statements are not mere rumors. With the permission of the House I will read a few of these documents, which refer to the manner in which this part of the road has been constructed. I have in my hand now the statutory declaration of Hensley Reed Holinden, now of the city of Ottawa, county of Carleton, clerk, who solemnly declares:

"That I have been employed upon the construction of the eastern division of the Canadian Pacific Railway from the 6th day of September, 1884, to the 21st day of January, 1885; that I have travelled upon the train from Sudbury to Nemogossenda, a distance of about 163 miles west of Sudbury, and I have walked over nearly all the portions of the road extending from about eighty miles beyond Sudbury to Nemogossenda, a distance of upwards of eighty miles, while I was in the employment of the said railway company, as aforesaid; that there is a large quantity of trestle work used in the construction of the line all the way from Sudbury to Nemogossenda, a considerable portion of which will require to be filled in before the railway can be said to be permanently completed; that such trestle work is commonly used instead of filling, and a culvert wherever the road bed is built across streams or creeks. That some of the trestles so employed are very low, and one about ten or eleven miles above Negoyms not being more than 5 or 6 feet high and upwards of 30 feet long. That another well known trestle between Sudbury and Biscotching is constructed in the form of a letter "S," that is with reversed curves, and is commonly regarded by those using the road as dangerous and unsafe; that the amount of trestle work upon the whole of that part of the line above mentioned is very considerable, and the whole work has been pushed forward with great haste and with little regard to permanence or durability; that the common understanding among those engaged in the construction of the road is that the trestle work upon the line is only intended as a temporary work, and that it is intended to replace it by earth filling or other permanent work. And I make this solemn declaration, conscientiously believing the same to be true, and by virtue of the Act passed in the 37th year of Her Majesty's reign, entitled, 'An Act for the Suppression of Voluntary and Extra-Judicial Oaths.'"

This is a solemn declaration, made 13th February, 1885. It will be perhaps contended that the trestles above described were all for temporary works, only, unfortunately, this line has been paid for as a completed work. I have another document, the declaration of Alfred Norris, now of the city of Ottawa, laborer, who solemnly declares:

"That I was employed in the construction of part of the eastern division of the Canadian Pacific Railway from the 23rd day of November, 1884, to 18th January, 1885; that I started to work two miles east of Negoyms, and worked at the line both east and west of Negoyms, and also on each side of Nemogossenda; that I was engaged in working upon the grading of the line and also in getting the foundation ready for the trestle work; that the work of grading is very badly done in lots of places where the men could not get earth on account of water. The grade filled in with mud and ice. That at one place, two miles beyond Nemogossenda, they had to make a cutting 3 feet 3 inches in depth, and although we were working in water up to our knees we could only get down 2 feet 3 inches, and could not get any lower on account of the water. The water filled this in at night after we had finished our work, and a few days after the ties and rails were laid over this part of the line on top of the ice. That in another place I was sent to prepare the foundation for some trestle work near Nemogossenda, and the foot of the trestles was laid upon a tie cut in two, which rested on ice and water, and a few stones thrown in on the surface of a soil of black muck or bog, in such a way that the trestle must settle down as soon as the ice thaws; that the work of repairing the foundation, for the trestle above described, was done under the direction of the company's foreman; that the grade for the greater part of the distance over which I worked is made up of black muck and moss, pieces of ice and stumps, frozen moss and some sand and clay; that the surface soil is generally composed of black muck, covered with moss, which was taken from the side and thrown on to the grade, but we were not able to get very far down, so as to get more solid material, on account of the water which flowed in and filled the hole while we were digging; that I have been employed upon railways for more than ten years in England and have seen a good deal of railway construction and repair; that in my opinion the portion of the road-bed of the Canadian Pacific Railway above described will have to be all rebuilt before it will be possible to run trains on it, and the present grade and road-bed will melt and be washed away when the ice and soil thaw in the spring."

There is another short affidavit, the declaration of John Reeves, of the city of Ottawa, who declares as follows:—

"That I was employed in the construction of part of the eastern division of the Canadian Pacific Railway, from the 23rd day of November, 1884, to the 18th day of January, 1885; that I was employed in the same gang with Alfred Norris, and worked with him during the said period. That I have heard his declaration, dated this 21st day of February, 1885, read, and that I believe that the said declaration is true in every respect. That I have worked upon the construction of the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa & Occidental Railway, between Ottawa and Montreal; that, in my opinion, a great part of the grade and the road-bed over which I have worked on the Canadian Pacific Railway will melt or wash away in the spring thaw as the foundation, for long distances together, is only black muck and swamp, and the grade is largely composed of frozen moss, frozen muck, and ice, some sand, and a little clay."

Now, these declarations are made by people who were on the premises and who were engaged in the work, and who have, as I am informed and believe, no interest one way or the other, for or against the company or the contractors, and, if the hon. gentlemen wants to satisfy the House and the country that they are not correct, the sooner they bring down the answer to this motion the better. The first thing I ask for is the estimates of the company themselves, upon which the $27,000 a mile was based; then the estimates of the Government engineers, because they may not have been the same; they may or may not have agreed with the estimates of the company upon which that is based; and then I ask for that which is much more important than either, what has been obtained, or can be obtained, or ought to have been obtained long ago, when the Government was paying to the extent of $27,000 a mile, I want to know what were the actual honest quantities in the road and what was the cost at a fair estimate. If the Government brings down the return, the whole question will be set at rest one way or the other.

Mr. POPE. The hon. gentleman assumes that we are paying for a completed road all the time. Now, our payments are made for the work done per yard, whether the road is completed or not, but we do not base our payments on the statements of men who come down from that district and tell all kinds of stories, but upon the statements of the engineers of the Department. Let me tell my hon. friend that one of these engineers, and the engineer who made these estimates, is Mr. Ridout, whom he must be acquainted with, and it is upon his returns that every single dollar of this is paid. In no instance on any part of the road has a single dollar been paid, except upon the estimates of the engineers reported to us. It is true that Mr. Ridout has not gone all over the road, but he has gone all over this part of it, and we have paid exactly as we should have paid for every yard of earth or rock that has been moved upon this section. If we are to take the stories of everyone who comes down from there, if the hon. gentleman is going to proceed to debate these questions upon the stories or affidavits of everyone who considers himself injured for this, that and the other, if we are to have that kind of debate before the hon. gentleman gets the information, we shall have plenty to do, and may keep on the debate all through the Session. We prefer to debate this upon the estimates of the engineers when they are brought down, upon the estimates of their engineers and ours, because they had to come to an understanding, and upon these there can be no mistake. I know something about this road. I travelled over a considerable part of the road the hon. gentleman spoke about, and it is a road fit to run sixty miles an hour upon. I know it can be run upon easily at the rate of sixty miles an hour, and I did not ask for letters from disappointed workmen, I did not go down picking up this information and getting them to make declarations. He makes a formal matter of bringing these statements, as if we were going to take these stories and affidavits in the place of the reports of our engineers and in the stead of what I have seen in travelling over the road. I do not say there is not some trestle work. There is not a great deal. I do not say it will not be filled some time or other; of course it will. All these things will go in time, but there are trestles, not very high, as he says, that in eight or ten years undoubtedly will have to be put in, as on the Thunder Bay branch, built by my hon. friend Mr. Mackenzie, we have already had to put in. But this is permanent trestle work. I have heard nothing about any accident, but the papers will be brought down, as far as they can be.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. EDGAR moved for:

Copies of all Estimates, Reports and evidence, not already laid before the House, upon which the Government engineers made their progress estimates numbers 28 and 29, Eastern Section, Western Division Canadian Pacific Railway.

He said: I have here copies of the progress estimates which were brought down to the House, and I find that, on the 30th September, by progress estimate No. 28, relating to the western division of the eastern section, that means the portion from Nepigon this way, not counting from Callander—the estimate brought down, and signed by some gentlemen—Mr. Caddy, I think, signs this one, and also Mr. Chamberlain, and Mr. Lynch, and Mr. Collingwood Schreiber, the chief engineer himself—it is a very formal document, and I must attach some importance to this—the total amount of work done and materials delivered to that date was so much money, showing a balance to be paid, over and above what was paid before, of $751,858. Now that is a very elaborately signed document, and purports to be, I suppose, a true statement of what it says, the total value of the work done and material delivered up to the 30th September, 1884, on the western portion of the eastern section. Now, remember, Sir, this is in detail—there is no lumping here—and it shows how much was on the thirty-four miles from Nepigon to Gravel Bay, how much on the ninety-five miles from Gravel Bay east, and how much on the 125 five mile section and on the twenty-seven mile section, and it shows the actual percentage of grading—96 per cent. of grading done at one place, 59 per cent. in another, so many sleepers, so much percentage of grading and bridging, so much for engineering on another section, etc.—all very carefully and elaborately done, showing the total amount done up to that date, and calling for the payment of $751,858; that was very promptly attended to by the Governor in Council and paid on the 6th of October, and strange to say, the next estimate, No. 29, signed by the same gentlemen, Mr. Caddy, Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Lynch and Mr. Schreiber, covering absolutely the same section—remember one was the 30th of September, giving the total amount done to that date, and the other the 1st of October, 1884—shows the strange result that there was $1,078,171 worth of work done upon that section between the 30th of September and the 1st of October, this year. Now, Sir, I think that is what requires explanation, and I have no doubt whatever the hon. gentleman can explain it off hand. I can show from these papers how that million was made up exactly. It was made up by changing the 59 per cent. bridging to 68 per cent. on the thirty-four miles; by changing the 41 per cent. bridging, which was all that was done on the 30th September, to 69 per cent. on the ninety-five miles, as being done on the 1st of October, and changing the grading from 91 per cent. to 97 on the ninety-five miles; and then there were 12,400 additional ties, and the raising the percentage of grading and bridging, etc., on other parts. It was not a lump estimate, but a detail elaborately given. But the most striking and original item put in there that occurred on this line between the 30th September and 1st October, was $100,000 for "tote roads," or service roads, added into that estimate. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman will explain all that. This million dollars was added in and it was paid; it was not merely put in there for amusement, but actually paid, because the Order in Council was passed on the 9th October, and it was paid on the 10th, although on the 6th October $750,000 had been paid on this very same piece of work. It was not because they had not got the money, because on the 1st September they had received $1,220,000 on the same section. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman can explain it, but it does seem to me that when the engineers certified that the total work of one day is a million less than that certified to the next day, it is worth while that the House looked into it.

Mr. POPE. There is no trouble in bringing that down.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—CHANGE IN ROLLING STOCK ON WEST DIVISION.

Mr. EDGAR moved for:

Copies of all applications, statements, estimates or letters sent from the Canadian Pacific Railway to the Government or any of its officials, in relation to the change made by the Government between 7th April, 1884, and 16th May 1884, in the dealing with rolling stock in progress estimates and payments in the eastern section, western division, and copies of all correspondence and papers upon the same subject.

He said: My reason for moving this return is this: In regard to the estimate No. 13, which is dated 7th April, 1884, Sir Charles Tupper, who was then Minister of Railways, held back on this western division of the eastern section $450,700 for rolling stock. Now it is a curious circumstance that on the very next estimate of this western division, No. 15, (No. 14 relates to the other end), which is dated 1st of May last year, it appears that although not one mile of that portion of the road is finished, the whole $450,000 that had been held back by Sir Charles Tupper for rolling stock was allowed for and paid out to the railway company by the hon. gentleman who is now Acting Minister of Railways, on the first certificate that he signed after Sir Charles Tupper left, and there is no evidence that any rolling stock was delivered. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I should not say it was allowed for rolling stock; it was not really allowed for rolling stock, but it was put into the grading and paid for after that in the grading. The rough estimate for grading was increased by $450,700 at one fell swoop by the present Acting Minister of Railways. Now the estimates either allowed for rolling stock or they did not; if they did—and Sir Charles Tupper, in this House, last year, as reported in the Hansard, stated that the estimate for finishing the road did allow for it—then this sum of $450,700, and also another sum on the other end of this section, in the estimate No. 12, of $68,000, altogether $518,700, were paid over before one mile of the road was completed for rolling stock, by the Acting Minister. Now, if these estimates did not include the rolling stock—I do not know, but my hon. friend will say, whether they did or did not—then the estimates I made before, on my former motions, are correct as to the cost of the twenty miles and of the eighty miles. But, as a matter of fact, it appears that while Sir Charles Tupper was Minister of Railways, rolling stock was included, and afterwards it was certainly paid for by grading—it was called grading, and was paid for as such. All the percentage calculations of grading are made on this sum of $518,000, which Sir Charles Tupper said he was reserving for rolling stock, but which the Acting Minister of Railways puts into grading, and has been paid the company ever since on grading. I trust that the return called for and the explanation given by the Acting Minister, will enable the House to understand whether rolling stock was in it or not; and if it was in it, where the rolling stock is which was paid for before a mile of the railway was completed.

Mr. POPE. The papers will be brought down. I can say to the hon. gentleman, that there is no rolling stock paid for which was not put on the road; and when it was put on the road, it was paid for according to the understanding and agreement.

Mr. BLAKE. My hon. friend's difficulty is, that what had, before this last estimate, been reserved to pay for rolling stock, which is certainly included in the gross estimates made, was afterwards applied to grading, paid for as grading and not as rolling stock.

Mr. POPE. I know the hon. gentleman says so, but it is not the fact.

Mr. BLAKE. It is so in the progress estimates, because I saw it.

Mr. POPE. Because it had been kept out, and when it was put in it had been paid for.

Mr. BLAKE. The payment is not for rolling stock, but the sum which was formerly reserved for rolling stock is taken into grading. The sum reserved for rolling stock is absorbed in grading, according to the progress estimates.

CANADA AGRICULTURAL INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. AMYOT moved for:

A statement showing the receipts and expenditure of the liquidators of the Canada Agricultural Insurance Company, from date of appointment up to this day, giving in detail the names of shareholders who have paid instalments, the dates and amounts of payments made, the balances due, the amount now owing by each shareholder, and the amounts for which they were liable when the company was put in liquidation; also a detailed statement of the sums paid by the said liquidators, the names of the persons to whom payments were made, the dates thereof, the objects for which such payments were made, and all other information necessary to show precisely the financial condition of the said insolvent company, including a statement of the affairs of the company when it was placed in liquidation."

He said: I move this motion in the interests of the stockholders of the company. Seven years ago this company was declared insolvent. In the beginning stock was taken under false pretences, if I am rightly informed, through the agency of the company. Those who were asked to take stock were told that they would never be called upon to pay more than a certain amount. The next thing they knew was that the company had become insolvent. As the insolvency of the company took place seven years ago, one would think that the risks would now be over; but, instead of such being the fact, the amount due by the company seems to increase every year. There is another peculiarity. The courts in Ontario have dismissed actions brought by the liquidators, asking that stockholders be compelled to pay amounts due. That caused the liquidators to incur costs. The courts in the Province of Quebec have, on the other hand, maintained the actions. So, while in one Province cases are dismissed with costs, in another Province the stockholders are compelled to pay the costs, together with the amount of shares for which they were declared liable. Besides, in Quebec, I am told that a great deal of discrimination is exercised by the liquidators. They will ask payments from certain stockholders while they make no demands on others, who are quite able to pay. From these circumstances those people who were induced, by false pretences, to take stock in the company, find themselves in a very awkward position. They do not know when their liability will terminate. I hope that by having this return brought down a clue may be found which will place them in a position to seek the protection of the courts. Liquidators have been appointed by Parliament, and Parliament is in a position to ask them for an account. I hope the Government will do their best to have an account furnished as soon as possible.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (Translation). Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether we will be able to give to the hon. member the information asked for, but we will do our best to meet his desires on that point. I thought that the Minister of Finance would be here to-night, and that he would be prepared to give the information sought for by the hon. member, but as he is absent, I make this reserve, because I am unable to answer in a precise manner.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION SUBSIDIES TO THE PROVINCES.

Mr. AMYOT moved for:

Copies of all correspondence since 1st January last, between the Dominion Government and the Government of the Province of Quebec, in relation to an increase or readjustment of the Dominion subsidy to the several Provinces, including any letter written to that end by one of the said Governments to the other, or by any of the Ministers thereof in relation to the subject; also of any such correspondence with any of the other Provinces of the Dominion.

He said: This question is one very well known to the House and to the country. I do not belong to a Province which threatens secession, as another Province is now doing, but I belong to the Confederation which we seek to keep solid and make prosperous. It has been created by men of good will, by patriots. It was then understood that a certain share of work should be given to each Province, and to attain this end certain revenues were necessary. It was impossible to foresee, at the beginning, what monies should be apportioned and would derive to each Province. Now, we have the materials of eighteen years, and we see by the arrangements made that money enough is not left each Province to accomplish its share of Confederation. I think, therefore, that the time has come when we should give to each Province of the Confederation, the necessary strength and money to accomplish its end, putting each Province within the possibility of doing its share. I think the whole Dominion is strong and wealthy enough to bring in measures to attain that end, so that all parts of the Confederation will feel easy and their work will be better done in the future.

Motion agreed to.

BANKRUPT ESTATES.

Mr. MACMILLAN (Middlesex), for Mr. MITCHELL, moved for:

Return from all official assignees under the Bankrupt Act of 1859, and subsequent Acts in amendment thereof, for a list of all estates of which they were assignees. The estimated value of the several estates when taken possession of by the assignee. The amount realised from each estate. A list of creditors of each estate severally, and the amount of dividends severally paid to each of the said creditors. The several amounts in detail retained by the said assignees in each estate for their charges for management thereof. The amounts severally held by the several assignees which they have neglected or declined to pay over to such creditors as are entitled thereto, on each and every estate. Also a copy severally from each and every assignee on each estate, of the certificate of his discharge from the court, as laid down by said Act and the amendments thereof.

Mr. BLAKE. Surely, Sir, there must be some defect in this motion. I do not hear anything about the Grand Trunk.

Mr. MACMILLAN (Middlesex). It is not the same gentleman who moves in the Grand Trunk.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I would be most happy to consent to the granting of this return, but I do not think that we really can supply the information. These returns have not been made, and a number of those who were official assignees throughout the country are dead. I think, therefore, that it would be better for the hon. gentleman to withdraw his motion, and perhaps my hon. friend, in whose name it stands (Mr. Mitchell), will at another period be able to limit himself to something we can give. Even if it were possible to supply this information, it would make an immense return and would take at least two years to bring it down.

Motion withdrawn.

INDIAN TROUBLES AT METLAKATLA.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE moved for:

Copies of all correspondence between the Government of British Columbia or any other person, and the Dominion Government, in reference to the troubles at Metlakatla in the year 1834.

He said: I desire only to make a few remarks with reference to this matter. I regret much that there has been any trouble in this settlement of Metlakatla, which has been quiet for a number of years. I am informed that some twenty-five years ago the Rev. Mr. Duncan went to this place as a missionary, and on arriving in that settlement, he found that cannibalism and cruelty existed to a very large extent, but through his energetic and zealous labours he succeeded in winning those people over to a very high state of civilisation, and he has done, I can say, a great and a noble work. He succeeded, Sir, in inducing those people to do away with their wigwams and to build houses for themselves, as white people generally do. Not only that, but he started industries of various kinds, and induced the Indians in that locality to adopt habits of economy and industry. Through his instrumentality churches and school houses were established. Everything went on very prosperously in that little settlement, until some three years ago, when the bishop was sent there by the Church Missionary Society. On his arrival there, and before he had time to acquire an intelligent knowledge of the manners and customs of those Indians, he at once commenced to condemn the work of Mr. Duncan, who had been there for at least twenty-four or twenty-five years. This, of course, agitated the minds of the Indians, who were very much attached to Mr. Duncan. The bishop commenced to erect a building on the Indian reserve, to which the Indians in that locality objected. The result was that a difference occurred, the bishop wishing to step into the boots of Mr. Duncan and have Mr. Duncan retire from the work in which he had been engaged for a number of years. Of course Mr. Duncan declined. However, the bishop succeeded, I believe, in gaining over to his side something like a dozen of Indians, whilst Mr. Duncan had at least 1,000 who adhered to him, and who raised strong objections to this bishop erecting his buildings on the reserve. The result was that there was a little skirmish between them and the bishop, wishing to have the support of the Government at his back, I presume, sent word down to Victoria that there was a great riot at Metlakatla. The result was, that a gunboat was sent up north to protect the bishop and his half dozen Indian followers whom he had with him. When the gunboat arrived there, it found that the trouble was simply a tempest in a teapot—that there was no riot, except in the bishop's own mind. To send that gunboat there cost considerable money. I believe it has cost the Government $6,000 or $7,000 to send gun-boats there; and they have been sent there twice during the last three years. This is a matter which should be taken into the serious consideration of the Government, especially at this juncture of the affairs of British Columbia, when so many people are going there and settling on her lands and wishing to go into the interior. There is no doubt that any report of the troubles among the natives would greatly retard the settlement of the country, and hence the necessity of prompt action being taken to enquire into a matter of this kind. There is no doubt that great dissatisfaction is growing up among the Indians of that country. Apart from this little trouble which has occurred between the Indians and the bishop, the Indians have not the confidence in the officials to-day that they did have. I remember hearing of a council held at Metlakatla with the Indians. They complained of grievances, and they had the promise of the official that they would be attended to; but I am informed that no attention whatever was paid to that promise. The consequence was, that when the official returned to that locality a second time the Indians refused to take his word, unless he would put it in writing. This is a matter of very great importance, and I feel certain that having brought it to the notice of the Government they will look into the matter at once and do whatever is necessary under the circumstances.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In the absence of the First Minister, I may say to my hon. friend who moved this resolution, that the troubles mentioned as having taken place at Metlakatla were very much exaggerated. Of course, for obvious reasons, I do not wish to express an opinion about the dissensions between Mr. Duncan and the lord bishop who went up there; but, I think, these difficulties have disappeared, to a very great extent, and that so far as serious troubles amongst the Indians are concerned, there need not be any apprehension on the part of immigrants going to that country to settle. This matter has not failed to receive the attention of the Minister who presides over the Department of Indian Affairs, and I am sure that his attention will be still further directed to the matter, after the speech of the hon. gentleman. There is no objection to the production of the papers.

Mr. GORDON. From the appearance of affairs in British Columbia at the present time, I am under the impression that the troubles at Metlakatla are more serious than the hon. Minister of Public Works supposes. Only a few months ago a commission was sent by the Local Government to enquire into the matter, and so far as I can judge from the report of that commission, the Indians at Metlakatla have only insisted on what they think to be their rights. They have been taught under the Rev. Mr. Duncan for a number of years, who, as my hon. friend states, has brought these savages to a state of civilisation. They have their own councils, they have their own factories of various kinds, and they have been pursuing a life of sobriety and industry. They have their own schools and their own church, and they have established a council, which the authorities in the Province seem to complain is at variance with the Indian laws passed by this Parliament. Under the circumstances, I think it would be well for the Government to enquire very closely in what respect the Indian Act may conflict with the council established at Metlakatla. That council has grown up during the past twenty-five years, having existed long before the laws of Canada were applied to British Columbia. The Indians along the coast are, as a general rule, more or less under the influence of Mr. Duncan. He has educated them, they labor along the coast in various capacities, on the steamers and in fishing, and there is scarcely a place along the coast of British Columbia and Alaska where the influence of that gentleman among the Indians is not felt. Now, any carelessness or dereliction of duty on the part of the Government of this Dominion or the officials in British Columbia will have a tendency to bring on an Indian war in that Province; and we know from the experience of our neighbors what it is to have an Indian war. White settlers are scattered at various points throughout the Province, in fishing, in mining, and in agriculture; and we know that when Indians declare war they take vengeance on all with whom they come in contact, whether innocent or guilty. I do think it is the duty of the Government to make serious enquiry and to take prompt measures whereby an Indian war may be averted. There is a class of men who would like to see an Indian war—the class who visit the coast of British Columbia to traffic in intoxicating liquors among the Indians, and who are prejudiced against Mr. Duncan and his teachings, on account of his successful repression of that traffic at Metlakatla. With regard to what has arisen in the church in that locality. I do not wish to express an opinion. From all that we can learn and from the reports of that commission, there does not seem to have been much christian charity shown, and the least said about the matter the sooner it will be ended. I desire simply to move in amendment to my hon. friends' motion that the following words be added:

Also all correspondence including the Order in Council recommending the commutation of the death sentence, passed by the court of British Columbia upon the murderer of Mr. Yeomans.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I would ask my hon. friend to be kind enough to explain how his amendment agrees with the first motion—what relation there is between the two.

Mr. GORDON. My object is to ascertain all the facts in connection with the commutation of the sentence. It is essential that we should have them, in order to discuss the whole question on its merits.

Mr. MILLS. I think the murder of Mr. Yeomans took place at Stickeen River. He was in company with some Indians, one of whom, unfortunately, was drowned. Mr. Yeomans did not report the accident, as is required by the Indian custom, on his return to the village. He was then two or three days without reporting the matter, and the Indians looked upon him, therefore, as in some way privy to his death. The relatives of the drowned man took, according to the Indian custom, vengeance on Mr. Yeomans; one of them killed him. The Indian who committed the murder was arrested and taken to British Columbia to be tried. The correspondence of the Canadian Government with the Indian band shows what the custom is, and also refers to the fact that the Indian who murdered Mr. Yeomans, it was feared by the band, would not receive a fair trial. Of course, there has been a great deal of discontent among the Indians, not only in that particular locality but up the Stickeen River, and the representations from that district, which I have seen, go to show that there is a very serious prospect of disturbance between the Indians and the white population. It has also been represented in some of the British Columbia papers that the Government here have pressed upon the Local Government of British Columbia to make the bishop, or Missionary Society in his interest, a deed of two acres of land within the Metlakatla village. The Indians declare that if that be done they will burn their village and make war upon the white population. No doubt this matter is serious, and there are a number of things connected with the subject which it would be desirable to have.

Mr. BLAKE. From the correspondence it appears a man-of-war was necessary to settle the differences between these holy men. The Indians settled the Yeomans affair according to their notion, and the bishop and the other people appealed to the civil power. They want to settle the matter according to their notion, with vessels of war. Both sides seem to be equally Christian, as far as I can judge.

Mr. MILLS. I understand that one of the vessels of war sent there was an American vessel, employed to assist to keep the peace in the British territory.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. At all events, the papers will be brought down, as I understand the House wants complete information in regard to this matter.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

ANTWERP INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. BERGERON moved for:

Copy of all correspondence between this Government and the High Commissioner in England, or the representatives of the Belgian Government in this country, or from the Belgian authorities at home, or any other correspondence and papers concerning the International Exhibition in Antwerp.

He said: We were told in the Speech from the Throne by His Excellency the Governor General that:

"An International Exhibition will be opened at Antwerp during the present year, and a Colonial and Indian exhibition is to be held in London in 1886. Canada should, I think, be represented in her various manufactures and natural productions on both occasions, and I invoke your consideration of the best means of aiding in these important objects."

I saw, the other day, in some of the newspapers, that the commissioners had already been appointed. This is a question of money, and a national question as well, and from such points of view this is the place where it should be discussed. We have had an example, in the Paris Exhibition of 1878, of what these exhibitions are for us. In what capacity are we invited to go to Antwerp? Are we going there as a nation, or only as a colony? Of course, any member can answer that without having the response from the Government. We are going there as a colony. We were there in that capacity in 1878. I read, the other day, in a paper, a long letter signed by Mr. Drolet, who was one of the commissioners in 1878, who knows what he is writing about, and who gives us a good deal of information, which may excuse my presenting this motion to-night. At that exhibition we had a little place in the great square which was allotted to England. Of course, this was quite natural. At that exhibition, Sir Cunliffe Owen, who was the English commissioner, was the man to whom everyone had to address himself for anything concerning Canada. If anything was wanted, we had to have recourse to Sir Cunliffe Owen. It even went so far that official invitations had to come through Sir Cunliffe Owen. In fact, every time that Canada, as a country, had to show herself, she was entirely erased and put aside by the British commissioner. That exposition of Canada's products at the Paris Exhibition of 1878, cost the Dominion Government over $200,000. What were the benefits which we derived? I will not say it was money spent for nothing. I will not say it did not do good to Canada, to expose her products at the general exhibition in Paris; but I may say that, under other circumstances, we should have had perhaps, 200 per cent. more benefit than we derived from that exhibition. I may give, as an example, what happened to a merchant of Toronto at that Paris Exhibition of 1878, and perhaps that example will do more than a long speech, to explain what I want to arrive at. A gentleman from Toronto, named Malcolm, a dealer in leathers, had in Paris at that exhibition a splendid show of his goods. A gentleman visiting the part allotted to Canada was struck by the sight of a splendid lady's saddle. He wanted to buy it. Mr. Malcolm had no objection to sell it, but he asked him to wait a few weeks, and told him it would be better for him to have another saddle made, in Toronto and brought to Paris, than to take the one which was exposed. The gentleman consented to this, and Mr. Malcolm sent to Toronto. The saddle was made there and shipped over to France. Mr. Malcolm had a notice from the Customs authorities to go for that saddle. He went there, and he was not asked 50 per cent. duty, to bring it to Paris, he was not asked 75 per cent. duty, but it was entirely prohibited; he could not bring his saddle to Paris and sell it, but he had to send it to England, and it had to pass as an English saddle at a duty of 5 per cent. If we are going to-day to Antwerp under the same conditions, if we have not the right to make our commercial treaties with the different nations we have to meet in the markets of Europe, I will not say it is money wasted, but I think we should either beg our Government to do it, or should find some way ourselves to do what we want, and to get some commercial relations with those we have to meet over there, and then these exhibitions of our goods may bring us a better result. I may say something further. My motion does not tend to that, but it is a case I may refer to en passant. Every nation exposing its goods in these great international exhibitions makes it a duty to send there as its representatives men who speak the language of the nation where the goods are exhibited. In France, in 1878, Germany was represented by a gentleman who spoke as good French as any Parisian in Paris. As to England, every one knows that the Prince of Wales speaks French as well as any Parisian, and every other nationality, without naming them all, had representatives who spoke the French language. But Canada alone, with 1,500,000 French Canadians, was represented by Mr. Keefer, who did not understand one word of French. When Marshall McMahon passed before the exposition of Canada, he thought it his duty to say something in French; he thought that, addressing the representative of a country in which at least a third of the people were French, he would be perfectly well understood in the language of France; and he took advantage of the opportunity to thank Canada for her generosity in sending money a few months before to the relief of those poor people, the submergés of La Loire; but, when he thought he might receive one word of acknowledgment from the commissioner of Canada, Mr. Keefer made a bow and did not say one word. After the President had gone away, Mr. Keefer turned to a gentleman beside him, and said, "It is a wonder, and I do not understand it, that the President of France should speak to us as if we came from the Department of La Loire," that was the only word which he had caught. This is not the way in which to arrange these things, now that we are sending commissioners to Belgium, where French is the official language. It is true that the Government may tell me that Mr. Desjardins or some other gentleman will be appointed. Some gentleman said that Mr. Drolet and Mr. Perreault were there in 1878, but they acted more as secretaries than as representatives of Canada, and probably the same thing will happen now. I do not make this motion for the sake of having a French Canadian appointed. I do not ask them to appoint a French Canadian or an English Canadian. Let them appoint a Russian, or a German, or any other man, but let him understand the language of the country in which Canada is exposing her goods. I am not speaking of the political side of this question, but only of the commercial side, and the two papers in which Mr. Drolet's letter appeared—La Minerve and La Presse—are read by thousands of readers in our Province, and when they see us voting money to send a representative of this country to that exhibition they will be perfectly in the right to ask us why we do not get some good results to Canada from this expenditure. What will be the effect of our exposing our goods in these international exhibitions? What would be the best outcome to Canada of these exhibitions? Would it not be to have commercial relations, commercial treaties directly, either with Belgium or Germany or France, or any other of these countries with whom we might be placed in commercial relations? I remember having spoken of this on the hastings one day, when my adversary said that England was opposed to our making treaties with any other nation.

Mr. BERGERON.

Well, now, Mr. Speaker, this is not true. I know, as a fact, that England is above these little annoyances. England is too great a nation to prevent 5,000,000 of her sons from dealing with other nations. And if we do so, will it not put us in a position to pay the immense debt that we owe to England? For these considerations, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is the duty of the Government—whether it happens to be Conservative or Liberal—to treat this as a national and not as a party question. We have here the best interests of Canada at heart, and I ask the hon. members here assembled to say something or to propose something that may throw light on the question as to whether we may have commercial relations with the different countries that we shall be glad to meet when we go to the International Exhibition at Antwerp.

Mr. POPE. Of course I shall not undertake to discuss the question whether Canada ought to make her own treaties or not. I will say, however, that no commission has yet been appointed in this country. Some gentlemen are collecting information in Canada, and exhibits to be sent to Antwerp and London, but no commissioners have been appointed, and I do not think we shall appoint any commission for the Antwerp Exhibition. Sir Charles Tupper has that under his control. Mr. Law, who speaks English, French, and German, is there attending to it now. That is all I can say to my hon. friend.

Mr. MASSUE. Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with the remarks made by my hon. friend, the member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), but I think his motion would be more complete if he would add to it that the Government should furnish us with copies of the existing tariff between Belgium and England, in order that the Canadian exhibitors in Antwerp should know what to do, and not be subjected to the same inconveniences that have attended them at former exhibitions.

Mr. AMYOT moved in amendment:

That the said motion be amended by adding the following words at the end thereof:—"And also copies of the existing tariff between Belgium and England."

Mr. BLAKE. Of course this is a very proper motion the hon. gentleman has made. I do not know what the various officers are that have been appointed by the Government with reference to this exhibition. We were requested by the Speech from the Throne to give our best consideration to the method by which Canada might be represented there, and I, at any rate, thought that though the invitation was couched in a very polite form of words, yet in fact and substance the Government had already arranged the whole business; that some time before we were called to meet here and in this very polite form of words to consider the matter, they had made arrangements, because we saw it announced in the papers that Mr. this, Mr. that, and Mr. the other, had been appointed to one office or the other to attend the Antwerp Exhibition, and were busy about the necessary preliminaries. I saw, for example, that one gentleman who, I may remind the hon. gentleman, up to that time had been secretary of the Manufacturers' Association of Ontario, resigned his office as secretary and received a handsome testimonial avowedly on the score that he had received a Government appointment to go to Antwerp—I do not say as commissioner, but in one shape or the other. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) extend his observations beyond the somewhat narrow purview of his motion, and enter into a much larger discussion; and he requested us all to discuss this question, and throw some light upon it. I have no more light to throw upon it than I endeavored to throw upon it in the year 1882, when I presented to this House a motion which I believe afforded a practical solution of the question. I do not know whether I was honored by the support of the hon. member for Beauharnois or not; I do not remember. There were six or seven hon. gentlemen from this Province who usually act with me, and who acted with me on that occasion. I think, Sir, that if the hon. gentleman will read that motion over again he will see that whether he agreed with me then or not, we acted pretty well. Now, it is not necessary to discuss the matter, for I am quite sure that when this House comes to a conclusion upon the lines of that motion, there will be no difficulty whatever in obtaining from the Imperial authorities power to do what is therein described.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

DOMINION LICENSE COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. BERGERON moved for :

Correspondence between this Government and the Local Government of the Province of Quebec, about the working of the License Act.

He said: This is another very important question. Two years ago the Government here thought it wise to pass a law which has been called the Federal License Act. It only worked one year, when the question of the constitutionality of the Act was raised, and I understood a few weeks before the Session commenced that the Supreme Court had declared the Act unconstitutional. Now, the Local Governments also are granting licenses, and so far as we have heard to the contrary, this Government continues, and will continue, to issue licenses. There is a conflict somewhere. The hotel keeper or other person who wants a license wishes to know to whom he shall apply. Should he apply to the local authority, or should he apply to the federal authority? As a rule the applicant for a license is not a lawyer, and is not an educated man. He is not bound to know all these things, and I think it is our duty here to advise him how to act. Now, a circumstance occurred the other day, in Montreal, which led me to move this motion. Last year Mr. Desnoyers, one of the magistrates in Montreal, was one of the federal commissioners to grant licenses. In that capacity he granted a license to Mr. Beliveau, an hotel keeper, who paid for that license $200, besides the costs of the federal officer, $15 or $20, I believe. The hotel keeper was then perfectly sure he had acted according to law. This law had been put into force by the Governor General of this country, and it had been passed in this House by an overwhelming majority, and Mr. Beliveau naturally thought he was perfectly safe. But when the Supreme Court of Canada declared that the Dominion Act was unconstitutional, the Quebec commissioners sent an officer to arrest Beliveau for selling liquor without a license. He was brought before Mr. Desnoyers, acting magistrate of Montreal, on a charge of selling liquor without a license, and he was condemned to pay $75, including costs. The defendant says that he has not been treated justly. I did not hear the evidence in the case. I was, however, under the impression, last year, that there was some understanding, at least between the Dominion Government and the Government of Quebec—I know there cannot be much understanding between this Government and the Ontario Government—under which men holding licenses from Ottawa should not be sued by the local authorities, and that persons holding licenses from the Quebec Government should not be sued by the Ottawa officers. I may have misunderstood the matter, and I desire this correspondence to be brought down, in order to ascertain whether there is any way of settling the claim of that poor man, Beliveau, or any other man who may be in a similar position.

Mr. BLAKE. Once again the hon. gentleman has opened a question very much larger than the comparatively innocent terms of his motion would seem to indicate. The hon. Minister of Public Works thinks that is so, as he wants the motion to be carried very speedily, but it cannot be carried for a moment or two yet. The hon. member wishes us to remedy the grievance of those unfortunate tavern keepers who have been ground between the greater and the lesser power, between the upper and the nether millstone, and have suffered great hardship. He explains to us that it is our duty to set them right. As far as the Government are concerned, they deny the hon. gentleman's proposition, for I see that a respectable person of that class, at Halifax, telegraphed to the appropriate Minister, the Minister of Inland Revenue, to know whether they, the tavern keepers, would be held safe if they took out licenses under the Government commissioners, and the Minister of Inland Revenue told them to act on their own responsibility and at their own risk; they would not be defended by this Government in case anything went wrong. The hon. gentleman has also pointed out to us that he thought this law was surely right, because it was passed in this House by an overwhelming majority, of which he was one. I may assure him that not only this law which was passed by an overwhelming majority or any other law is either good in point of policy or in point of law because a majority passed it, although the hon. member was one of them. No, Mr. Speaker, the question is, as I have said, one of wider and of pressing importance. The hon. gentleman has indicated to us that he thought there was an understanding between, at all events, the Quebec and the federal authorities, that neither should hurt the other's licensees. No such understanding has been made public at least, and I have not that means of information which the hon. gentleman should possess as to the existence of such an understanding, and I am sure every one will be much interested to hear of it. However that may be as regards Quebec, the opinion of Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Manitoba and British Columbia, with respect to this license question, is sufficiently pronounced; because these have all officially declared themselves to be hostile to the encroachments, as they believed them to be, and as the courts have decided them to be up to this point, on the part of the Federal Parliament. A little while ago an hon. gentleman, I think the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) or the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) enquired of the Government whether it was their intention to order the commissioners under the Dominion license law to act this year. The First Minister, with a very grave face and diplomatic air, said that this subject was receiving the anxious consideration of the Government, and we certainly expected that so soon as that anxious consideration had borne fruit and a decision had been arrived at, this House would have been told what the Government intended to do. But instead of that being done, the very next thing we find, the anxious consideration having terminated, but without any communication having been made to this House of the Government's intention, is from the ordinary sources of information, that all through the country, from Vancouver to Halifax, the Government commissioners have been ordered to act. This Act was passed in 1883, contrary to our protests. We declared that it was upon a mistaken notion of the law that it was proposed. It was passed then as an Act of necessity. Last year it had been proved not to be necessary, and we called for its repeal. Its repeal was refused. I am afraid the hon. member (Mr. Bergeron) was amongst those who refused it. We then called for its suspension, and the Government in the end so far yielded that they agreed, not that the Act should be suspended, but that the penalties should be suspended, until a certain time. They also arranged to obtain a decision of the Supreme Court, and that has been given unanimously against the Act; and now we find, that without submitting the matter further to Parliament, without even as yet communicating—for they have not communicated, though they have been called on to do so—the decision of the Supreme Court, without having come to a decision, or at all events without having announced their conclusion to Parliament and stated what they were about to do further, the Government have taken this other executive step and have called on their commissioners to act. It is very clear what should be done: It is, to repeal the Act in so far as it has been declared unconstitutional, and so desist from this effort to encroach upon that which the judicial committee of the Privy Council and the Supreme Court of Canada have agreed to be within provincial jurisdiction. If that is not done, at all events we should suspend the operation of the Act altogether, while the Government are making further efforts to save their reputation, somewhat battered in this matter, and acquire, if they can, a justification for encroachment on provincial rights. What have the Government done? Last year they compelled the license victualers, from one end of the country to the other, to pay $15 for a license. For what good? The Dominion Government were not going to exact any penalties if the people failed to take out their licenses. It turned out that the Government could give those people nothing in return for their money. Besides all the trouble, annoyance and difficulty connected with the matter, the dealers were money out of pocket. And what is to be done this year? We had a difficulty created by a decision of the Supreme Court. You go on, Sir, in the same direction, calling on them to make a double set of applications and pay a double set of fees. Is it to pay these cormorants, the commissioners whom you have established all over the country, or if not, for what reason do you insist in keeping this Act in operation? I say if you insist on further trying this question, at any rate if you do not repeal the Act, suspend its operation; or if you will not do that, at any rate suspend the operation of the penalties, so that even without a decision of the Privy Council, and until Parliament meets again, that part of the Act may be inoperative. There are three things open to us. I am in favor of the first; failing that, I am in favor of the second; and failing that, I am in favor of the third; but I say it is intolerable to leave matters as they are to-day and allow these applications to be made all over the country, allow this class of the community to be harassed, allow the community itself, which is interested in limiting the licenses, to be harassed by a double set of applications, and all these transactions which were so regretted last year to be repeated this year, simply in order that the Government may not be humbled by an acknowledgment that they made a great misstep? The question raised by the hon. member is an important one, and though I cannot acquit him of his share in the responsibility of passing this Act, I hope that he sees it in a different light from what he saw it in 1883 and 1884. I have no doubt that in a few days he will be called on to vote on this question, and I hope that this time he will vote with me.

Mr. BERGERON. The hon. chief of the Opposition is quite right in saying that this is an unpopular measure. Two years ago, in 1883, when we were called upon to pass a license law by the federal Parliament, I, as every man here, thought I had good reasons for the course I took on that occasion. It was thought proper then to make the license law a Federal one instead of a provincial one, as it had been before. I had no doubt, because I have confidence in the Government, that when the Government proposed such a law to Parliament, they were in earnest; they based their judgment then, as I understood, on a report of the courts, which declared the provincial law to be unconstitutional. The new law was only put in operation in 1884; it was the first year it was put in operation, and like any new law, it did not work immediately as well as it should have worked. It was, I may say, unpopular, and one reason was that it cost a little more than the provincial Act. Tavern keepers and hotel keepers paid a few dollars more license than formerly. But another reason, and a great deal more important one, in my mind, than the question of money, was this: That formerly the people of the parishes, the municipal officers, those who knew the good and the honest from the bad, and the dishonest tavern keepers, were the parties called upon to give or to refuse licenses. I am not saying anything new either to the Government or to the hon. gentlemen opposite, when I say that our people were surprised to see strangers coming in and saying: You shall have a license, or you shall not. But when that law was made we were, and I was, under the impression—and I say it sincerely—that it had to be made by this Parliament, that the local laws on this question were unconstitutional. It is true that the hon. leader of the Opposition last year proposed a repeal of this law. He says, and I hope he did not say it in any sneering way, that I did not vote for the repeal of this law which to-day I do not look upon as being as good as the local laws. I did not vote with him, Sir, and I will tell you why. It has been said before, and I repeat that every man voting in this House has not to rise up and give his reasons for or against any measure that may come before the House. One or two can do it, and when we follow them, people are supposed to believe that we agree with them. We, members of this House, made a law in 1883, and that law was just one year in operation. It is true that a judgment had been rendered in the courts against it, or rather that a judgment was rendered which showed that a previous judgment on which the law was framed was not a proper one. We had two judgments, and we were in a state of uncertainty; and I ask any reasonable man, either here or outside of this House, could we, as sensible men, say immediately, without being sure, that the law we had made the previous year was not a good one? We were not fools, and we did not do that. I believed like the majority, and like sensible, earnest men we voted against the repeal of the law. Since then that question has been brought before the courts. The Supreme Court of Canada, in which I have not the greatest confidence in the world, has declared it unconstitutional. I believe that was a good point for the court; I believe they were right; I wish the law to be unconstitutional; I wish the licenses to be issued by the local authorities. If I voted for that law it was not because I was in favor of it, but because I thought the local laws were unconstitutional. The leader of the Opposition says we put ourselves in a bad place, but I do not agree with him in that point of view. Whenever we are making laws here we are doing it seriously; it is important work, and I am sure every hon. member here understands the responsibility resting on him. We are not here for pleasure or amusement, and when that law was made, it was done, as I heard people on this side say, because we thought we could not help it; we had to do it. The question is, how to get right to-day? I agree with the hon. gentleman that the Government should come down and say what they intend to do—whether they intend to uphold the law or to appeal from the judgment of the Supreme Court. That is not my business, and when they do something I will judge it for myself. I may say, however, that I have advised the hotel keepers and the tavern keepers in my county to take the licenses from the local authorities, from whom they used to take them before.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). The leader of the Opposition appears to be anxious for provincial rights, but would it not be well for him to take into consideration the municipal rights in this matter. He thinks this Government took from the Local Government rights belonging to them, but I ask him, as a lawyer, did not the Provincial Governments take from the municipalities rights which belonged to them? Of course the hon. gentleman sneers, as he always does at every person who speaks on this side; he is welcome to sneer—he knows that. But were not the licenses granted by the municipal councils? Will the hon. gentleman deny that? And did not the Local Government take away from the municipal councils rights which belonged to them for political purposes? Does the hon. gentleman deny that?

Mr. BLAKE. I do.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). You do! When Mr. Mowat passed a license law he said he would appoint one Conservative and two Reformers. This he did do the first year, but refused to do it a second time, and has not done it since. It is a well known fact that through Ontario certain men, for political purposes, get licenses on buildings that are merely little huts, while men who have good, decent hotels are refused. What does this law do? It gives back a portion of the power and license fees to the municipalities of which they had been robbed by the Mowat Government; and the warden, the judge and one man appointed by the Federal Government, are to give the licenses. Is that not better than to have three men appointed, as they were under the Crooks' Act, to give licenses for political purposes and no other. The licenses given by the municipal councils, I contend, were better given, and the hotel keepers were better looked after and lived within the law better than at the present time. And what do we find? Under the old municipal law, when they granted the licenses, they were only $30, while under the new law they are $60. Mowat and his Government were not satisfied with a portion of the $30—they had to get $60 without any increase to the municipalities. This is not denied; and I contend that the McCarthy Act is the best License Act ever placed on the Statute Book. If Mr. Mowat had left the authority as it was with the municipal councils, we would not have asked for an Act from the Federal Government; but the people do not want to lose every right they have. If this Government is guilty of centralising everything in the city of Ottawa, Mr. Mowat is guilty of centralising everything in the city of Toronto. Hon. gentlemen need not sneer; they know it is true. Let a man enter a suit in court, and it is not ended until it is decided in Toronto. At one time the judges had the right to appoint clerks and bailiffs, but that has been taken away. Day after day the municipalities have been losing rights they had, and I wish, for my part, there was not any such a thing as a Local Government in the country, for I believe we should be better off to-day without them, as they are ruining the country with their extravagance and expense.

Mr. GIROUARD. This question is not a question of feeling or sentiment. It is not whether we were asked to prevent the municipal or provincial authorities from granting licenses. The question is a legal one, and so it has been considered in the past. In 1881, in the case of Russell vs. The Queen, a decision was given by the Privy Council to the effect, as we understood it then, that the Provincial Parliaments had no right to grant licenses. A year later, in Hodge vs. The Queen, a somewhat contradictory decision was given by the same authority. The Supreme Court, in its last decision, when the constitutionality of the Act was before it, admitted that the two decisions were contradictory. Under these circumstances we were right in referring the question to the Supreme Court. Now, what have we to do? The decision of the Supreme Court is not final upon any constitutional question; the hon. leader of the Opposition, who is an able lawyer, knows that much better than any member of this House. In order to have a final decision, you must resort to the Privy Council of England, and therefore on this question there is nothing decided finally to-day. If this Government does not go to the Privy Council, any individual in the country will have a right to carry a case there after beginning it at the court of lowest jurisdiction, and then taking it to the Court of Appeal, then to the Supreme Court, and then to the Privy Council. There is always an appeal from the Supreme Court to the Privy Council on constitutional questions; therefore, I contend, that it is the duty of the Government to appeal this case to the Privy Council, unless, on reasons of public policy, it chooses to petition the Imperial Parliament to pass a statute declaring that the constitution of 1867 is in the sense of the decision of the Supreme Court. There are only the two steps to be taken, and I defy the leader of the Opposition to contradict my statement—either to appeal to the Privy Council, or to ask the Imperial Parliament to define the constitution of 1867, as it is defined by the Supreme Court of Canada. Until that is done, I agree with the leader of the Opposition, that the Act should be suspended. Last year it was partly suspended, and I was, I may say, in favor of its total suspension, until the decision of the proper authorities should be obtained. The leader of the Opposition says, that at least the penalties should be suspended. That is already the law. The statute of last year, as I read it, says the penalties shall be suspended until the decision of the Supreme Court and the Privy Council shall be obtained. I am decidedly in favor of the penalties being suspended, but I would go farther, seeing that there is a decision of the Supreme Court against the law. There is a strong presumption that it is unconstitutional; my own opinion as a lawyer is, that it is constitutional, but we know that lawyers do not always agree. However, I think it is the duty of the Government, not only to suspend the penalties, but to suspend the Act entirely, until the decision of the Privy Council is obtained.

Mr. LISTER. As this is a matter which the leader of the Opposition said a few moments ago would probably come before the House in a few days, I think it is premature to discuss it now. However, I wish to say a word or two with reference to the speech made by my hon. friend from Hastings (Mr. White). I think he was not very long on his feet before he convinced the House that he knew nothing at all of the subject under discussion. He talked about the Parliament of Ontario taking from municipalities rights which they had before. The Parliament of Ontario had a perfect right to do that, as it was a matter over which that Parliament had jurisdiction. He seemed to blame the Parliament of Ontario for taking away from the municipalities the right to issue licenses. Sir, at the last Session of this Parliament, when the Bill now under discussion was being passed, a clause was incorporated in it, expressly reserving to the Province of Quebec the rights which existed previous to Confederation. My hon. leader proposed an amendment, giving the same rights to the Province of Ontario, and the hon. gentleman who gets up to-night and is so loud in his protests against the Local Government, was found voting against the resolutions for giving back the rights of the municipalities which were taken from the Province of Ontario, and which he voted to give to the Province of Quebec. That is the consistency of the hon. gentleman, so far as I have been able to see, since I have had the honor of a seat in this House. So far as this question is concerned, the leader of the Government represented to the House that he did not want to interfere with the rights of the Provinces, or to take from them the right which they supposed they had, in fact, exercised for fifteen or sixteen years, and he caused the Government to make the statement that the interference was an imperative necessity and not a matter of policy. He caused the Governor General to make that statement as an excuse for introducing legislation into this House, which took from the Province of Ontario the undoubted right to issue licenses; and upon that statement a Bill was passed, against the wishes of the temperance people of this country and without being asked for by the liquor dealers. Nobody asked for it; but the hon. gentleman passed it in pursuance of a promise made in the elections of 1882, that if he got into power he would show that little man Mowat—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Tyrant.

Mr. LISTER—that little tyrant, Mowat, what he would do. It was in pursuance of that threat, and not because it was a necessity, that that legislation was passed in his House. In the course of twelve months the courts decided that it was in the power of the Local Legislatures to issue licenses and to regulate the sale of liquors. That decision did not go so far as to say that this Parliament had not a concurrent power, but it decided that it was not an imperative necessity on the part of this Parliament to pass that law. Whatever were the reasons which prompted the gentlemen on the other side of the House to support that law, the first duty of the Government, after that decision, was to repeal it. But instead of doing that they harassed the liquor men of this country; they doubled the number of licenses; and instead of protecting the people and restraining the evil which they said existed, they doubly increased it at the expense of the liquor men, and against the wish of those in favor of temperance. They appointed their boards of license commissioners, and they took a tax from the people of this country, for the purpose of maintaining licence inspectors, who were of no use whatever. There was not one prosecution under that Act, but every prosecution that took place, every enforcement of the law that was attempted, was on the part of inspectors appointed by the Local Government. It is the duty of the Government to return those men the money which they have illegally taken from them under that Act, and the hon. gentleman who introduced this motion said properly that people did not know what they were giving their money for. I say here, and I believe I am giving utterance to the feeling of the people through the whole country, that it is the duty of this Government, instead of trying to wrest from the Provinces the rights they claim, and which the courts have decided are theirs, to give them the benefit of the doubt and return them their rights. They are able to exercise them better than we can, as they have proved in the past. There is not one Province in this Dominion that can be found acquiescing, confirming, or in any way recognising the law this Parliament enacted. They are satisfied that things should be as they were, and all they ask of us is to give them back the powers which they had previous to the passing of this Act. That Act having failed, it is the duty of Parliament to repeal it. If we should not repeal it, it is our duty to suspend its action altogether, and not go through the legal farce of calling upon people to take out a license which can give them no protection whatever. So far as the Province of Ontario is concerned, every man who sells under Dominion license and without a provincial license will be prosecuted as far as the Province can prosecute him. There is not a tavern keeper in Ontario, be he a Conservative or Reformer, who will be found taking a license from this Government. This Government having no right to issue licenses, they cannot enforce the collection of fees; they cannot prosecute successfully one man in the whole Province of Ontario. I believe there can be no doubt whatever, notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has said, about the constitutionality of the law, that the highest court of the realm will hold that that law is unconstitutional, that this Parliament has no power whatever to deal with the question. It is so held by the Supreme Court, and I believe that decision will be confirmed by the Privy Council. But why go to the Privy Council, why seek to deprive the Provinces of the rights our courts decide that they possess? There has been and there is in this Parliament a tendency to encroach on the rights of the Provinces, and if we go on as we are doing we will have a legislative instead of a federal union. There will then be no protection for a certain Province in this Dominion. It is of the most vital importance that they stand by the Liberals of the Province of Ontario in asserting the provincial rights whenever and wherever they come up.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The hon. gentleman, the leader of the Opposition, has already announced that we are going to have an opportunity of voting on this question before the Session is through, and I presume, therefore, there will be abundant opportunity of discussing it at greater length before that time. But in the meantime, I desire to call attention to an error into which the hon. gentleman who has just sat down has fallen, in relation to the action of this House when the McCarthy Bill, as it is called, was before us. The hon. gentleman says, by the amendment put into that Act by the majority of this House, it was resolved to reserve to the Province of Quebec certain rights which she enjoyed before Confederation, with reference to the issuing of licenses, and that when it was attempted to pass a similar motion in the other Provinces the same majority voted that down. It is as well to point out that these hon. gentlemen who talk so loudly of provincial rights and of the importance of leaving to the different Provinces freedom of action in relation to this question of licenses, ought, at least, to remember that the motion that they made with regard to the other Provinces was a motion to destroy the action of the Provincial Legislatures in relation to this very question. The difference between the Province of Quebec and the other Provinces was this, that before Confederation in Quebec, the municipal councils had the power of their own individual action, without the intervention of the ratepayers in any way whatever, to refuse licenses. The people of the Province of Quebec, as represented in their Legislature, had never repealed that, had never modified it or altered it in any way whatever. They were satisfied with the law as it existed before Confederation, and the amendment that was made by Parliament when the McCarthy Act was brought in was simply that, inasmuch as the Provincial Legislature of the Province of Quebec had in no way signified by its own action a disposition to change the law as it existed prior to Confederation, we ought not to interfere and override that law. But in the Province of Ontario particularly, and I believe I am right in saying in the other Provinces as well—certainly in Ontario—and the hon. gentleman's amendment having relation to all the Provinces has therefore relation to Ontario among the others—the Local Legislature had, by its Act, signified its disapproval of the law as it existed before Confederation. The Province of Ontario had adopted a new law, and what these hon. gentlemen wanted us to do was this, that we should, by our Act, set up our judgment as against the modifications of that law adopted by the Province of Ontario, and that we should go back to the law which that Province, by its own Legislature, having, as it supposed, the power to legislate for itself, had set aside. I can understand the hon. gentleman saying that we were doing that under the McCarthy Act, that we were changing the law under the McCarthy Act; but if we were, there was no proposal by those hon. gentlemen that we should include the provisions of the Crooks' Act, the provisions of an Act which Ontario had itself adopted, but there was a proposal that we should set aside the decision which Ontario, in its Legislature, had adopted as applicable to the Province itself, and substitute a different state of things—a state of things they had voluntarily set aside. That was the distinction between the two cases, a distinction every hon. gentleman who looks fairly at it will realise, and which justified the action of this Parliament, even from the highest standpoint of provincial rights, in taking the action it did take, in confirming ante-Confederation laws which had never been interfered with in the Province of Quebec, and at the same time in refusing to set aside the action of the Provincial Legislature of Ontario, in modifying and changing the law as it prevailed before that time. Then the hon. gentleman has told us that the Privy Council have declared that the Crooks' Act is absolutely legal, and that the Supreme Court have practically confirmed that decision. The Supreme Court have done nothing of the kind. They have confirmed, to some extent, that decision; but they have declared that there are portions of the McCarthy Act which are legal and constitutional. They have declared, for instance, that the right to issue and control wholesale licenses belongs to this Parliament, leaving us to determine what are wholesale licenses. We know that at this moment that in the different Provinces the term "wholesale licenses" has an entirely different signification. In some places a pint is considered a sale by wholesale. Do hon. gentlemen admit that we have the right to deal with the selling of liquor by the pint? That is not what is meant by the people of the Province of Ontario when they talk of wholesale licenses. There, a wholesale license is a wholly different thing, and therefore we are left, by the decision of the Supreme Court, with the whole question worse confounded than when it went to the Supreme Court. One cannot read the reports of the discussion which took place before that body, and the remarks of the learned judge when the argument was had before them, without realising that they felt that they were embarrassed by the two decisions, which some of the learned judges did not hesitate to declare were entirely contradictory—that in the case of Russell against the Queen, and that in the case of Hodge against the Queen. And, in neither of these cases, as far as a layman can read them—and I profess to discuss them only from a layman's standpoint—did the question arise on the point of trade and commerce. In the Russell case we were told that it was a matter of peace, order, and good government, and that it therefore belonged to the Dominion as far as that was concerned. In the Hodge case, we were told that it was a matter of peace, order, and good government, and that therefore it belonged to the Province. Precisely on the same ground, the regulation of the sale of intoxicating liquors was declared to belong to the Provinces and to the Dominion as well. I see the hon. the leader of the Opposition laughing. The hon. gentleman, in his mightiness, may laugh, but this House will recollect that, from the time this question was first discussed in this Parliament, the hon. gentleman has not had the courage to express his own individual opinion upon it. He has told us what were the opinions of the courts; he has told us what this court has said and what that court has said; he referred us, in former debates, to the decisions of Mr. Justice Ramsay, if I rightly remember, and to the decisions of other learned judges on the subject. But his own opinion we remain as ignorant of to-day as we were the first day he rose up to speak on the subject. We know, however, that this very question of the constitutionality of provincial license laws, of the place where the authority rested to deal with this question of the regulation of the liquor traffic, has been a subject of discussion and controversy almost ever since Confederation. Before the Conservative party went out of power it was a subject of discussion. After that Government went out, and, if I mistake not, when the hon. gentleman himself was the Minister of Justice, his Deputy Minister, a man of eminent ability, a man whom we could not retain in the public service of this country, because we could not pay him enough—and everyone will regret that we could not retain him, because he was a man of eminent ability—I refer to Mr. Lash—in a report he made to Council in relation to an Act of the Provincial Legislature of Ontario, expressed grave doubts—that hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) being his chief at that time—as to the powers of that Legislature to pass a law conferring upon a municipality in the Muskoka district, I think it was, or in some of the unorganised territories, the power to deal with these licenses. We know that the late Mr. Bethune, a man of great parts, a man whose eulogy, if I mistake not, was pronounced as a lawyer and as a Christian gentleman by the leader of the Opposition, when sitting in the Local Legislature of Ontario, and speaking on this question even from the Ministerial side of the House, in relation to a measure introduced by his own leaders in that House, expressed the gravest doubts whether they had the power to deal with this question. This is not, and this ought not to be, a question to be bandied about simply for party purposes, as a political shuttlecock in the game of party conflict, but is a question of serious political import in regard to which gentlemen as eminent as any on the other side of the House who have expressed their opinion—and that, of course, excludes the leader of the Opposition—have expressed their grave doubts, and, in the case of Mr. Bethune, more than a grave doubt, an absolute certainty of conviction, that the Local Legislatures could not deal with the matter. What is the position in which we stand to-day? Everyone admits that the decision of the Supreme Court is not a satisfactory decision, that it does not fairly settle this question, that it does not really determine the position which the Local Legislatures and this Parliament stand in to-day. I may say here that, for my part, I do not believe a legislative union possible in this country, and that I would not desire to see it attempted. I believe we have the very best system of government, by which the Local Legislatures have full control over local affairs. But we are acting under a constitution which leaves, as the constitution of the United States has done, some of its clauses subject to controversy before the courts, for years after its adoption. We are under a constitution which ensures those rights to the Provinces. When the court of final resort decides upon them, and they become a settled part of the constitution, those rights are confirmed to the Provinces, and they can exercise them without the possibility of this Parliament interfering with them. And the one feature, it seems to me, which is in favor of Provincial rights—not, as I say, as a matter of party shibboleth or party clap-trap, but having regard to the well-being of this constitution and its proper observance—is the consolation and surety they have, and the confidence they may feel, in the fact that the courts can interpret the constitution above the action of this Parliament or of the Provincial Legislatures; that we are, in fact, subject to that interpretation, and are ready to bow to it when the interpretation is finally given. Hon. gentlemen speak of provincial rights. Do they remember that when they were in office Acts were disallowed; that more were disallowed—if you leave out the repetition of disallowance by the Conservative Government in connection with Manitoba and the Streams Bill, while they were in office—than during the whole time the Conservatives have been in power? Do they recollect that an Act which has since been declared to be within the competency of the Legislature of Ontario—I mean the Escheats Bill—was disallowed by a Minister of Justice of their own, who is to-day, I believe, a judge of the Supreme Court? No, Sir; this question of provincial rights, which is raised now for mere party purposes, will settle itself, as many other questions have settled themselves. We will find our constitution settled by continued—and in the nature of things they must be continued—interpretations and decisions of the highest courts upon it; and, when these decisions are given—and in this question in its present position it is most desirable that the highest decision should be given—then we can go on, this Parliament and the Provincial Legislatures respectively, each confident in their own ability and power to legislate within their own sphere, and for the benefit of the constituencies which elect them.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman has stated that the question of provincial rights will settle itself. I can only allude to the fact that it will take a long time to settle itself if the course pursued by the House is to be that pursued on the occasion to which reference has been made. At the time when the amendment was moved by the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet), when the McCarthy Act was passing through this House, to exempt the municipalities of the Province of Quebec from the operations of that Act, so far as they were in possession of power, that received the unanimous support of the House, receiving the unanimous support of the Liberal party, because they considered it was the affirmation of the principle of provincial rights; but when a few moments after, a resolution was moved, couched in the same language as the resolution of the hon. member for Laval, it was voted down by the gentlemen, many of whom had a few moments before voted to reserve that right to the Province of Quebec. To do our French Conservative friends justice, they do stand up for provincial rights when they are standing up for the rights of the Province of Quebec; but, if provincial rights are to be asserted and maintained in their integrity, I would ask them if they do not think duty requires them to go a little further than to see the rights of their own Province maintained; do they not think they should find it their duty also to see the rights of every other Province maintained? They cannot expect to occupy a peculiar position in this respect. It is a grand principle, and all the Provinces are equally affected by it. Striking at the rights that are enjoyed by any one Province in the Dominion is in effect striking at the rights enjoyed by all the Provinces; and that there may be no mistake about how we voted, just let me read again to the House the two resolutions that were before it at that time. The hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet) moved:

"That the Bill be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole, in order to amend the same by adding thereto the following clause:—'Section 44. No provision in this Act contained shall affect the powers conferred on municipal councils in the Province of Quebec, on each county, city, town, village, parish and township, by the laws in force in the said Province on the 1st of July, 1867, to restrict or prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the limits of their respective territorial jurisdiction; and the powers and the by-laws now in force passed under the authority of the said laws are hereby confirmed.'"

For that every Liberal member of the House voted. I believe every Conservative member here, whatever Province he came from, with the exception, I think, of one hon. gentleman from the Province of Quebec, voted for it. In a very few moments after that had been declared carried, Mr. Blake moved in amendment thereto:

"That the Bill be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole, to amend the same by adding to clause 46 the words following:—'And nothing in this Act contained shall affect the powers conferred on the municipal authorities of any Province by the laws in force in such Province at the time of its Confederation with Canada, to restrict or prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors within the municipality; and these powers are hereby confirmed and continued.'"

And the mover added: "I have paid my hon. friend the compliment to adopt his language." And what was the result of the vote, Sir? Every Liberal in the House, I believe, voted, as it was his bounden duty to vote, in favor of provincial rights and in favor of giving to the other Provinces in the Confederation just exactly the same rights and powers that a few moments before we had given to one Province; and, Sir, the Conservative members of this House from the other Provinces stood up and voted down the proposition to give to the other Provinces that which a few moments before they had given to one. Sir, I cannot excuse our French Conservative friends for their action on that occasion. Having got what they wanted for their own Province, was it the way to maintain the rights of their own Province by voting down the rights of the other Provinces? That, Sir, I believe, is the record of that question. It stands upon our journals for hon. members to examine for themselves, and in the light of that action by this House, and if that same course is to be pursued, the question I desire to ask the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) is, how long he thinks it will be before provincial rights will take care of themselves.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) undertook to defend the difference in the treatment of the Mr. PATTERSON (Brant.)

Province of Quebec and the other Provinces of the Dominion, in reference to this question two years ago, by stating that the law with regard to the issuing of licenses in the Province of Quebec remained precisely the same as it did at the period of Confederation. This was not the case in the Province of Ontario, for the law there had been changed. But, Mr. Speaker, the whole proceeding of this House on that question was based upon the theory that the Provinces had not the power to legislate, that the power to deal with this question of licenses was a power vested in the Parliament of Canada, and not in the Provinces, and every Act passed by the Province of Ontario, if the hon. gentleman and those who are associated with him in this warlike enterprise, are correct, was ultra vires the powers granted to them by the constitution. Now, Sir, if these Acts of legislation on the part of the Provinces were mere waste paper—if the hon. gentleman and his leader were right as to the law enacted by the Parliament of Canada before the Union of 1867, then every Act passed by the Legislature of the Province of Ontario after the Union was an Act ultra vires the power conferred upon them by the constitution. If that, Sir, were the case, then there was no reason whatever for dealing with the question upon a different basis from the manner in which the other Provinces were dealt with by this House. Sir, that excuse or defence put forward by them will not bear a moment's examination. It is perfectly obvious that the hon. gentlemen from the Province of Quebec who support the Government, entertain upon the subject of the constitution the same views that we do upon this side of the House, and while they were ready to protect the interest of their own Province they had not the generosity to deal with us of the other Provinces in the same way. But, Sir, I am convinced myself we will have an opportunity for discussing this question at a very early period. I am convinced that the only way of defending the provincial rights of the Province of Quebec is to defend the rights of all the Provinces under the constitution. With the exception of those special privileges or special instances that are provided for in the British North America Act, the Province of Quebec stands exactly upon the same footing as the other Provinces of the Dominion, and it is impossible to draw the line separating the provincial from federal rights at one point with regard to the Province of Quebec, and draw it at another point with regard to the other Provinces. Sir, I congratulate the hon. gentleman who brought this motion forward, and several of his political friends who have supported it, on the new light that they have had. I congratulate them on the fact that they are entertaining more correct views with regard to the rights of the Provinces under the British North America Act this Session than they did last Session or the Session before.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Mr. Speaker, in rising to move that you leave the Chair and that the House go into Committee of Ways and Means, I desire, as is the custom, to ask the attention of the House not only to the consideration of the Estimates for the next year and the changes that the Government propose in the tariff, but to review, as briefly as possible, the financial condition of the country and the results that have followed the adoption of the policy accepted by Parliament in 1879. We have had laid upon the Table of the House since 1879 the Departmental reports, including the Trade Returns and the Public Accounts, which put Parliament in possession of all the information connected with the administration of the Government, with its expenditures, with its policy, and with its acts. I desire, Mr. Speaker, on this occasion, as the House is in possession of these reports, to call the attention of Parliament to their contents, and I trust that before I close I shall be able to satisfy the supporters of the Government as to the economical administration of the affairs of this country during the five years, as well as the success that has attended the policy called the National Policy, adopted in 1879. I say I hope to have the assent of the supporters of the Government to the facts and statements that I propose to submit; and as we also have before Parliament the returns from 1874 until 1879 containing the results of the administration of our predecessors, I hope that by the contrast we will be able to make, we will also have the assent of hon. gentlemen opposite to the declarations that I am about to make in favor of this policy.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Your faith is great.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. My faith is great—yes, Mr. Speaker, and I am glad to know that it is greater than that of the hon. gentleman opposite, and I trust that before we close this discussion—because I have no doubt that, as in Sessions past, it will take a wide range, and that a good deal of time will be occupied in it—we will have reason to feel that I am nearer right than my hon. friend opposite, who takes a more gloomy view than we do on this side of the House with reference to the circumstances to which I refer. It has been the custom, during the last three Sessions of Parliament, and it has been the custom of hon. members opposite out of Parliament, to endeavor to show that the Government of the day has been extravagant because we have added largely to the expenditure of the country, and they claim that it must necessarily, therefore, add to the taxation of the country in proportion to the increased expenditure. Now, Sir, one of the objects that I have in view in addressing this House on the present occasion is to show that while we have increased the expenditure largely, we have not increased the taxation of the country beyond the increase of the population. It is a very easy thing for hon. members to say here or elsewhere that the expenditure of the country has increased from $24,000,000 to $30,000,000 or $31,000,000, and to state that that is ample and sufficient evidence to prove the extravagance of the Government. I find on looking over the expenditure of the late Government that from 1874 to 1879 the average expenditure was nearly $24,000,000, I think $23,900,000. The smallest expenditure, I believe, was in 1877-78. It was remarkable that the expenditure that year was less than usual—I will not say what object hon. gentlemen had in reducing it then and increasing it the following year—but I will take for the purposes of comparison, and in order that hon. gentlemen opposite may have the full benefit of 1877-78, the expenditure for that year, and compare it with the expenditure in 1874, and I will call the attention of the House to each of the items to show that many of those expenditures on which there were increases did not add one dollar to the taxation, and were necessary and justifiable in the public interest. The difference between the expenditure for 1877-78 and 1884 was something like $7,500,000, and I can quite understand that that statement, made in Parliament and out of it, is calculated, without explanation, to mislead the public with regard to the expenditures of the Government. The first item I will consider is the expenditure under the head of railways and canals. The expenditure in 1884 was $1,035,443.81 more than that of 1877-78. Well, Sir, did that cost the country anything? On the contrary, it was a saving to the country. Let me give you, Mr. Speaker, the receipts and expenditure from 1874 to 1879, for railways and public works, and the receipts and expenditure from 1879 to 1884, as an evidence that that increased expenditure did not cost the country anything, but that it was in the interest of the country and of the revenue. Here are the figures :

Receipts from July 1st, 1874, to July 1st, 1879	$ 8,616,298
Expenditures from July 1st, 1874, to July 1st, 1879	11,688,318
Deficit.....	$ 3,072,020

or $614,405 per annum—

Receipts from 1st July, 1879, to 1st July, 1884	$13,718,389
Expenditure from 1st July, 1879, to 1st July, 1884	14,476,470

or $151,616 per annum. It must be borne in mind that between 1877-78 and 1884 there was an increased railway mileage worked by the Government, that there was increased business transacted, and that, of course, must necessarily increase the expenditure, especially when by the additional mileage worked we had additional business, for every person understands that you cannot carry 100,000 tons over a railway at the same expenditure that you could carry 70,000. There must necessarily be an increased expenditure; and, therefore, so far from this $1,030,000 odd representing increased taxation to the country the deficit was reduced from $600,000 to $100,000, making half a million dollars, as the benefit in a financial sense received by the Dominion. The next item of expenditure to which I desire to call the attention of the House is that of the Postal Service. The expenditure for 1884 was $588,026 more than it was in 1877-78. That added so much to the expenditure of the year. But did it add to the taxation? No, it did not. I heard an hon. member opposite—I do not see him in his place now—complain because the Government, and especially the Postmaster General, had not provided additional postal accommodation in a certain district. We know that since 1877-78 there has been an enormous increase in the accommodation given. We know that the number of offices established, the increased mileage of road over which the mails are conveyed, and the number of letters, papers and postal cards have respectively increased, and I can appeal to hon. members on both sides of the House, who will agree with me that the increased facilities provided during the last five or six years have been very great indeed, to say nothing of the increased expenditure to establish postal service in Manitoba and the North-West Territories, where the expense would naturally be far in excess of the receipts from the service rendered there for a number of years. In view of all those increased facilities, all the increased accommodation, the opening of 4,000 or 5,000 miles of railway since 1874-75, the railways receiving subsidies for the mail service they perform, so soon as the mails were sent over them, it was but natural that there should have been a very large and considerable increase. Has it added anything to the taxation of the country? Nothing whatever. Let us see what are the facts with respect to that service. Here is a statement of the receipts and expenditure :

Receipts, 1st July, 1874, to 1st July, 1879....	$ 5,753,025
Expenditure, 1st July, 1874, to 1st July, 1879	8,358,360
Deficit	$ 2,605,335

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

Receipts, 1st July, 1879, to 1st July, 1884...$ 7,748,560
Expenditure, 1st July, 1879, to 1st July, 1884 10,064,549

or $463,196, against $521,067 for the first five years. It is all very well to point to increased expenditure, but so long as there is an increased return equal to, or in excess of, that expenditure, and so long as we are giving additional accommodation to the country, I am sure this House and the people will never object to any such increased expenditure made under those circumstances. The next item to which I desire to call the attention of the House by way of comparison is the Dominion Lands expenditure. That expenditure was in 1877-78, $87,628; 1884, $166,898, an increase of $79,270. Now, Sir, when we consider the vast territory which has been transferred to the control and management of the Department of the Interior, when we consider the large sales that have been made in the last three or four years, when we consider the number of settlers who have gone upon the lands of that country—and from which lands we have received no money return—when we consider that the receipts for lands from Manitoba and the North-West from 1874 to 1878 were $89,392.61, while the receipts from 1879 to 1884 were $4,070,543.67, I think it will be understood by this House why the management of so large an estate as that, the sale of such a large portion of that country, and the settlement of tens of thousands of people upon its lands, justified the increased expenditure of something like $60,000 or $70,000 last year, as compared with the expenditure of 1878.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Is that exclusive of the capital expenditure?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No, I will come to that by-and-bye—the hon. gentleman will find that I have not forgotten it. The next item of expenditure is public works and buildings. The expenditure under that head in 1877-78 was $998,594.70. In 1884 it was $2,908,851.65, or an increase of expenditure amounting to $1,910,256.95. The expenditures last year on public buildings and harbors, and all other works under the management of the Public Works Department, were nearly treble what they were in 1877-78. Now, Sir, so far as this expenditure is concerned, I admit that it is a charge on the country—I admit that there is no direct return given. But who will say that if the Government or the country has a surplus sufficient to induce Parliament to vote sums of money for the construction of public buildings, for the improvement of harbors, and the navigation of our rivers—that the Government is not justified in spending it in that way? These works and buildings are part of the assets of the Government. If we do not erect these buildings we would have to pay rents for inferior ones, and we know perfectly well that it has been, and necessarily will be, the policy of the Government of Canada, that whenever the funds of the Government admit it, these buildings shall be erected in every important town and city throughout the Dominion of Canada. The only question is whether the treasury will admit it, and how rapidly these works are to be undertaken. We know perfectly well that the trade and commerce of the country must largely depend on the facilities that are given to it. We have since 1867 expended a large sum of money in improving the navigation of our rivers, in improving our harbors, in establishing harbors of refuge throughout the country, and I do not hesitate to say that in my judgment, whenever the funds of the country will admit it, Parliament will justify the erection of these buildings for the public service throughout the Dominion just as rapidly as the work can be done. The next item is Interest, and under the head of increased expenditure for that item is the sum of $651,297.06, paid in interest over and above the interest which was paid in 1877-78. Now, Mr. Speaker, a large portion of that interest is met by the increased receipts of interest, perhaps reducing it by $300,000. But I am in a position to state here that, though that sum is nominally $651,297 more than was paid in 1877-78, the net interest paid by the people of Canada during 1884, in proportion to its population, was less per head by 8½ cents than it was in 1877-78. The next item that swells up the expenditure is the excess of $337,746.65 paid into the Sinking Fund more than was paid in the year 1877-78. It is only necessary for me to remind the House that the sinking fund is a sum laid aside towards the redemption of the debt, and that it is practically a reduction of the debt to that amount, instead of an increased tax, though it appears on the expenditure side of the account. The next item is Immigration and Quarantine. In the year 1877-78, the expenditure under that head was reduced very materially from what it had been the previous three years. It was $180,691.44, while in 1883-84 the expenditure was $575,326.72, an increase of $394,635.28. I may state to the hon. gentlemen opposite that the average expenditure during their Administration for immigration and quarantine was $300,000 a year, and for the five years from 1879 to 1884 it was $340,000 a year, with results which, I need hardly say, were three-fold greater than the results of the expenditure during the five years from 1874 to 1879. Sir, I think it is not necessary for me to say anything more than to make that statement with reference to that branch of the expenditure. The next item is Militia and Defence, the expenditure upon which in 1877-78 was $618,136.58, while in 1884 it was $989,498.22, or an increase of $371,364.64. But if we go back and take the five years from 1874 to 1879, we find that the expenditure for militia was about the same as it has been from 1879 to 1884—that is for the five years from 1874 to 1879. The whole expenditure for militia and defence varied very little from the expenditure that took place for the five years 1879 to 1884, though there is a considerable difference in the expenditure of 1877-78 and that of 1883-84. But we know perfectly well that notwithstanding that over the five years there has been an average about the same, yet in 1884, we had four new organisations, consisting of three infantry schools and one cavalry school—one in the Maritime Provinces, one in the Province of Quebec, one in Ontario, one in British Columbia and a troop, I think, in the Province of Quebec. These additional organisations were established last year. I think, Mr. Speaker, that on this question, perhaps, there may naturally be in the House some little difference of opinion with reference to the expenditure under the head of militia. But I recollect perfectly, though then not a member of the Parliament of Canada, that engagements were entered into by gentlemen belonging to both parties, with the Imperial Government, when in England, for an expenditure of $1,000,000 a year for the defence of the country. I think such an arrangement was entered into before the Union took place. At all events, I think under existing circumstances, there will be very little objection to this increase. When the establishment of those four organisations is considered, this expenditure is not in excess of the five years previous; and I think it will not be considered a useless expenditure, but by a large portion of the members of this House and the people of Canada will be regarded as a wise and judicious protection of the country. The next item of expenditure is under the head of Fisheries. In 1877-78 $93,262.28 were expended, and in 1883-84 $286,700.14, making an increase of $193,437.86. I need not explain to the House that this increase is the result of its action in giving the fishermen of Canada a bounty, which has had the most beneficial results, so far as the production of our fisheries is concerned. I think there were no objections offered to that proposition even on the opposite side of the House. The only anxiety hon. gentlemen opposite manifested, if my memory serves me, was that it should be simply a vote of Parliament for $150,000 a year, but that it should be embodied in a Bill so that it might be made permanent. Therefore, under these circumstances, I think no hon. gentleman on the other side will raise any objection to this increase of expenditure. Then we come to the expenditure on account of Indians. In 1877-78 it was $421,503.66, and in 1883-84, it was $1,116,153.87, an increase of $694,650.21. I may remark that in 1877-78 all the Indian treaties that had been entered into just before were not so far completed that all the Indians received in that year the sum provided for them under the treaty arrangements; and therefore a considerable proportion of the $694,000 is the result of treaties that were entered into previous to 1878. We had hoped in the present year to have had a decrease in that expenditure; but, unfortunately, owing to circumstances over which neither this Parliament nor the Government have any control—owing to the fact that the buffalo has ceased to make its appearance in the North-West Territories—it has been found expedient, in the interests of the country, during the last two or three years that these unfortunate Indians, instead of being left to starve or to imperil the property or the lives of the white men in that country, should, at all events for a time, until educated to farm or to provide for themselves, be maintained at the public expense rather than bring upon that country any such disaster as would follow from their being allowed to fall into a starving condition. Therefore, much as the Government and the House may regret that we have not been able yet to bring about a decrease of that expenditure, it is hoped ere long that that amount will be reduced. The next item, Sir, is the mounted police. The expenditure has increased from $345,958.68 in 1877-78 to $485,983.66 in 1883-84, or an increase of $140,024.98. This increase is due to the necessity of an increase of the force. I may say here that, taking the force that was in Manitoba from 1874 to 1878, and the mounted police together, the expenditure during the last five years on the mounted police has been equivalent to the expenditure for the force that was in Manitoba and for the Mounted Police. But this increase of $140,000 was considered necessary by the House. Last year Parliament voted the sum of money for this increase, for various reasons which were then presented by the First Minister. The next item is Subsidies to Provinces, which have increased $130,906.51. This has been caused mainly by the concessions that were made to Manitoba from time to time from 1879 down to 1884. The next item is Legislation, in which there is an increase of $44,731.85. This is the result of increased cost of the publication of Hansard and of the increased number of members of Parliament under the census of 1881. Then the Lighthouse and Coast Service has increased from $461,967.71 to $520,524.38; an increase of $58,556.67. Now, Sir, I think there is perhaps scarcely any expenditure made by the Dominion of Canada from year to year, of something like $40,000 a year in the first place for the construction of lighthouses, then perhaps $10,000 a year or nearly that for their maintenance, that is more in the interest of the country than that expenditure. We know that in 1867, when this Dominion was organised, the lighthouse service was very inferior to what it is to-day, and we know perfectly well that during the early administration of the Department that had charge of this expenditure, very large appropriations were made, and the result has been, as every man connected with trade and commerce knows, to cheapen the rate of insurance on vessels coming into the country, to diminish the risk of the life of the mariner, and to reduce the rate of freights on imports coming into the country, as well as the rate of freights and expenditure on products going out of the country, and this has been a direct benefit to the whole country much greater indeed than any additional expenditure that it was found necessary to make for that great and important interest. The expenditure for the maintenance of the lights—because the increase is largely due to that—is one which I am satisfied will be justified by Parliament and by the people of Canada. The next item is Civil Government, and I take the expenditure of 1877-78, because it was lowest in that year; I take the most favorable year for hon. gentlemen opposite, because I do not wish them to say during this discussion: You have selected the highest year of our expenditure. I desire to stand upon firmer ground than that, and am willing to give them the benefit of the lowest expenditure for the purpose of making the comparison to which I now call the attention of the House. While the expenditure of civil government for 1877-78 was $223,869, last year it was $1,084,417, or an increase of $261,047—

Mr. CASGRAIN. Hear, hear.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The hon. gentleman says, hear, hear. I do not wonder at it, because hon. gentlemen opposite have made this one of the great charges against the Administration throughout the length and breadth of the country, to prove the extravagance of this Administration. Now I desire to call the attention of the House to the circumstances that have led to this increase of $261,000 in six years. One of the difficulties that every Government must experience in preparing the Civil Service estimate, is the increase that is inevitable under the provision of the Civil Service Act, by which a very large proportion of the employés receive each a yearly increase of $50. This increase for the last six years is estimated as follows: It is estimated that 420 of the Civil Service employés have received an increase of $50 a year, and each year since 1877-78, that is during six years, or a total increase of salary to each employé of $300. That amount for 420 civil servants gives $127,000 of an increase. Then we have had transferred to the Civil Service account the expenditure on the Geological Survey, the cost of the employés in that branch of the public service. These officers were formerly paid by a vote of the House, which did not appear under the head of Civil Service appropriation, but last year and the year before this vote was transferred to the Civil Service, and the amount of their salaries, $36,000, is added to the expenditure, making, not an increased expenditure, but a simple transfer from one account to another. As it appears now under the head of Civil Service expenditure, it increases that vote to the extent of $36,000. Then, there is the High Commissioner's salary and contingencies $14,000. Well, our friends opposite had not a High Commissioner, but they had a gentleman for a time in London, an Agent-General with a liberal salary; and I may say with reference to the services rendered by the High Commissioner that the very fact of sending him to London, apart from the other services he has rendered, has placed the Government in a better position towards their financial agents. It was intended at the time that he should be our financial agent, but it was found impracticable to carry that intention out. The very fact, however, of such intention being made known, led to a reduction in the charges of our financial agents and the saving of a sum of money annually greater than that which the High Commissioner's office has cost us. I venture to say that hon. gentlemen opposite, should they, at a future day, have the responsibility of office thrown upon them, will find that the services of this gentleman, or if not of the present incumbent, the services of one of their own friends acting in a similar capacity, would be found of so much value to them and so much in the public interest of the Dominion that, object as they may to the expenditure now, I doubt if they will ever repeal that arrangement or discontinue the office. At all events, that adds $14,000 to the civil list. Then there is the Board of Examiners who last year were paid $4,661, another addition to the Civil Service vote. This leaves about $80,000 to be accounted for, and it may be accounted for in this way: $80,000 is the increase from 1877-78 to 1884, on new employés. I heard the other night the remark made that the number of employés in the Civil Service had been about doubled. Well, Sir, that is not the case. If we take the number of permanent employés of 1877-78 and the extra men paid by the day, and the number of employés in the Civil Service in 1884, and the extra men, we will find that the increase is just 119, or twenty men a year, on an average, added to the service during the last six years. Now, I desire to lay before the House the circumstances which, in my judgment, warrant that increase. Take, in the first place, the Department of Public Works. The expenditure under that Department last year, as I have said, was three times as great as it was in 1877-78. This House will quite understand that it is impossible to carry out an expenditure of $3,000,000 at the same cost as you would an expenditure of a million dollars. That is quite clear. Then we come to railways and canals. The expenditure in that branch has increased. It will be quite understood by this House, when we take into consideration the increased mileage of railways that are being worked by the Government, when we take into account the large expenditure since 1879 on contracts from the head of Lake Superior to Winnipeg and in British Columbia, when we take into account the supervision which is necessary to be exercised in the construction of the easterly portion under contract by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, when we consider the increase of business as compared with 1877-78, this House will agree with me that these circumstances warrant the increase in cost of this Department during the last five years. Then we come to the Department of the Interior. I called attention a few moments ago to the fact that the Department of the Interior had to deal with a territory nearly as large as the whole of Europe; three-fourths as large at all events; that in the last four years the Minister of that Department has sold and received money for sales made to the amount of $4,000,000, that he has had necessarily to superintend the surveying and all the arrangements necessary for the settlement and selling of this enormous territory, so that it cannot be expected that the expenditure would be anything like what it was five years ago, when only $90,000 was received for sales of land, when that country was not penetrated by railways, and there was little or no expenditure necessary. Then we come to the Post Office Department. There has been a very large additional number of employés engaged in the Post Office Department. When we look at the facts, I think it will be admitted that the increased number of employés is warranted. What were the duties performed in 1884 as compared with 1878? In 1878 we had arrangements made for the sale of money orders only with Great Britain, the United States, and Newfoundland. Since that period that privilege has been extended to sixty countries in addition to these—extended, I may say, to the whole civilised world. Money orders can now be had from the Postal Department to almost any part of the civilised world. That could not be done without increasing the expenditure; but, on the other hand, let me say to this House that the increased expenditure has been largely met by the charges made for these money orders. Therefore, if while this extension has increased the expenditure of the Department and the number of employés, it has given in return to the revenue, no doubt, a sum quite equal to the expenditure for those additional employés. In addition to that, we find that the number of open accounts in the Post Office Savings Banks in July, 1878, was 25,535, and in 1884, 66,682, showing an increase during the five years of 41,147. We know perfectly well that this increase in the number of accounts involved an enormous amount of labor. If any one goes to the Post Office here and deposits $10 or $20, under the provisions in regard to the postal savings banks, that money is transmitted to the general office, and the general office has to send to the man who makes the deposit an acknowledgment of the receipt in each case. That is the protection of the Department and depositor, as the depositor is told that, unless he receives a notice from the Department that the money is to his credit he must at once make enquiry with regard to it. But every one of these deposits, even if it be only of $1, requires an acknowledgment, and entered by a person in the Department here; so that, when that is extended to 41,147 additional accounts all over the Dominion of Canada, you will see how great must be the increase of work in the Department under such circumstances. And that is apart from the general extension of the business of the Department outside of these two particular accounts to which I have referred, and warrants us in coming to the conclusion that, with an increase of sixty-three countries outside of those named in 1878-79, there must necessarily be an increased expenditure in the Department, but for that expenditure there is an equivalent return. The next Department is the Finance Department. The additional work that is thrown upon that Department is mainly through the Savings' Banks. The deposits, as the House is aware, have largely increased. The number of open accounts in 1878 was 19,922, and, in 1884, 43,406, making an increase of open accounts of 23,484. These accounts all require to be checked here, the parties having deposits are notified by the Department, and a large amount of increased work is involved, though, perhaps, the increases are not so great as in some other Department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not want to interrupt you unnecessarily, but are these separate accounts, separate depositors?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes, they are separate accounts.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I beg pardon, but I dare say it will not embarrass you. Does each separate account mean a separate depositor?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No, not in the Savings Banks, but it does in the Post Office. In the Post Office, notice is given of each deposit, it is not so with the Government Savings Bank. It is an increase in the number of accounts, but does not involve the same amount of increased work as in the Postal Department. The next is the Militia Department. As I stated before, the establishment of the additional schools must necessarily lead to some extent to an increase of expenditure, but the increase of expenditure in that Department is not larger than would reasonably be expected from the increased force and the additional schools and organisations that have been established. The Audit Department, as hon. gentlemen know, is a separate and distinct department, which is now necessarily more expensive than before, because it is much more efficient in its operation, and, although it requires a certain additional number of clerks, not much increase has been made in the last four or five years. Still, as the business of the country increases, some increase has been necessary there. In the Customs Department, the increased revenue collected, the increased number of ports, the extension of the Customs Department to Manitoba and the North-West Territories, the increased vigilance required under the Act of 1879, which has thrown very considerable additional work upon that Department, would naturally lead to some increase in the expenditure there. In the Indian Department, there is the Mounted Police, and there is an increased expenditure for the Indians, which would account for the increased expenditure there. In the Inland Revenue Department, an additional expenditure has been necessary owing to the passage of the License Act, which threw upon that Department some additional expenditure last year. In the Department of Agriculture, I desire to call the attention of the House to the increase of that Department since 1878, and I think the hon. members will be fully satisfied that that Department is justified in asking the additional expenditure which is proposed.

Mr. POPE. It is a model Department.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is a model Department I know. When we consider the additional work that has been performed in that Department in the last three or four years in connection with immigration, we can see that it would warrant some increase in the expenditure; but there is a portion of its business to which I wish particularly to call the attention of the House, which would warrant to the fullest extent the additional amount expended in that Department since 1878. In 1878, the number of patents issued was 1,172, and the revenue received from the Patent Office was $33,663. In 1884, 2,456 patents were issued, with a revenue of $69,530. This gives some idea of the increased work thrown upon that Department in that particular branch, and it must be borne in mind that the salaries of the increased number of employés there have been paid fourfold by the additional fees received from the increased number of patents granted, an increase of $36,000 since 1877-78. Then there is the Department of Justice, in which there is, necessarily, an increased amount of work, from the increased population of the country, which leads to an increased number of convicts. The Departments of the Secretary of State and the Privy Council depend, as far as their work is concerned, largely upon the development of the country from the increase of the population, from the settlement of the North-West, and from the various questions and orders that reach the Council, and the correspondence that passes through the Secretary of State. Every hon. member will understand that an increased population means, to these Departments, an increased business, an increased number of documents which pass through them and which must necessarily increase the expenditure. Taking these facts into account, the increase of $80,000, or of twenty men per year from 1878 to 1884, is, I think, sufficiently justified, and so there is a justification for the employment of these 119 men in addition to those employed either temporarily or permanently in 1877-78. Now, Sir, I have gone over the items of the increases to make up the expenditure of $7,500,000 in 1884 over the expenditure of 1877-78. Many of these, as I have shown, do not cause an increase of taxation, but, on the contrary, have caused increased revenue, and, therefore, we should confine our consideration to these expenditures for which there is no money return; they are limited in character, and if they are limited in character it is found that the advantages the country derived from these expenditures is an equivalent, and more than an equivalent, for the expenditures that have been made. Under these circumstances I wish it to be understood that when hon. members opposite make the statement that the extravagance of the Government must be judged by its increased expenditure of $7,500,000 in six years, we have a good and sufficient answer to give, and that is that that sum, during those five years, has not necessarily resulted in increased taxation to the people. Now I proceed to establish that fact. From 1874 to 1879 the necessary taxation of the people of Canada, based upon the average population between those periods, had the Government of the day collected the money necessary to pay the expenditure, would have been, as I have stated before, $4.88 per head of the population. When I state here—and I have the data to prove it—that from 1879 to 1884 the necessary taxation per head of the population to meet the expenditure, was less than $4.88 per head, by 10 cents per head—when I make that statement, it is, if I can prove it, the answer to the assertion I have just made that this expenditure of $7,500,000 does not and has not led necessarily to the increased taxation. I have made this statement before, and I think it is necessary to give the data upon which it is made, because an hon. member of this House has, within the last two or three months, made an alarming statement that has gone, not alone through Canada, but the world over, I may say, to show that the taxation of the people of Canada is now nearly double that of the United States, and that it is increasing at such a ratio that before long it will be equal to that of the most highly taxed nations of the world. Now, Sir, I think it is necessary, under these circumstances, that we should here, rather than in any other place, give the answer to that statement and relieve the anxieties of the people which must naturally result from such a statement as this going over the length and breadth of the country. Sir, I am about to establish the statement I made as to the necessary taxation from 1874 to 1879, and the necessary taxation from 1879 to 1884. The Customs, Excise, and stamp dues collected from the 1st July, 1874, to the 1st July, 1879, were $93,295,770.34. The deficit during that period was $4,818,789, making a taxation necessary, if the revenue had been collected sufficient to pay that expenditure of $98,114,559.34, or on an estimated average population during that period of 4,021,000, or $4.88 per head. I may state that the deficit was caused in this way: The total receipts during those five years were $114,860,495; the total expenditure during that period was $119,679,284, which represents the deficit I have named. Now, then, we come to the years from 1879 to 1884. Received from Customs, Excise and Stamps, from 1st July, 1879, to 1st July, 1884, $124,723,659.84. The surplus during those five years was $20,429,725, made up in this way: Total receipts during the period named, $157,687,879; total expenditure during the same period, $137,258,154. If you deduct the $20,000,000 surplus from the receipts, the necessary taxation—the hon. member (Sir Richard Cartwright) laughs, I will give him a statement that will require more than a laugh to answer. The necessary taxation for that period was $104,293,934.84, on an average population of 4,364,800, or $4.78½ per head, against $4.88 per head.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The hon. member laughs. What was done with that $20,000,000?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Wasted on the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No, Mr. Speaker, not wasted on the Canadian Pacific Railway, or on any other railway. I will tell you what effect that surplus of $20,000,000 had. Let us see what the net interest of the Dominion of Canada was in 1874 when these gentlemen came into power. The net interest paid in 1873-74 was $5,113,573.31, on an estimated population of 3,873,920, or $1.32 per head. The net interest paid in 1878-79 was $6,456,383.51, an increase in the net interest of $1,342,810.20 in five years, or $1.54½ per head, or an increase of 22½ cents per head in five years, on an estimated population of 4,178,890. Then, as the result of that surplus, as the result of the improved credit of the country, as the result of the redemption of maturing liabilities bearing 5 and 6 per cent., the net interest paid in 1883-84 was $6,713,482.24 on an estimated population of 4,600,000, or $1.46 per head, or 8½ cents per head less than was paid in 1878-79. That is one of the effects of the surplus of $20,000,000, and that, Sir, while they expended $33,000,000 or $34,000,000 during the five years that they were in office, chargeable to capital. These are the results so far as the taxation per head is concerned, after we have spent in the five years to which I refer $65,000,000 in the construction of the Pacific Railway, in the completion of the Intercolonial Railway, in the deepening and enlarging of our canals. The result is that the interest paid during the last year was 8½ cents per head less than it was when we came into power in 1878-79.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

I think I hear the hon. gentleman opposite saying, as was said by the hon. gentleman who sits on his right: What about the capital account? You have not taken into account $1,800,000 that is charged to capital for surveys of the lands, which outlay hon. gentlemen opposite charged to capital when they were in office. I think I hear the hon. gentleman say that in answer to my declaration. I admit that I have not in this statement taken that into account, but if that had been taken into the calculation the taxation per head of the population would have been still less than $4.88. I, therefore, think that so far as the past five years are concerned, though we expended in 1883-84 $7,500,000 more in the development of the country and in the carrying out of great public works than hon. gentlemen opposite did, yet the necessary taxation of the people has been less during those five years than during the time hon. gentlemen opposite were in office. That is a sufficient answer to the country as to the increased taxation and as to the alleged extravagance of this Government.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Hear, hear.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That is feeble, but I am glad to have it from the hon. gentleman. I wish it were stronger for his sake and for mine also.

Mr. MILLS. Especially for your sake.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I must say that I have always found the hon. member (Mr. Mackenzie) an opponent just as difficult to meet as could be found on that side of the House. I appreciate his ability, and I regret that the state of his health is such as prevents the hon. member taking as active and vigorous a part in the discussions of Parliament as he did formerly. I would now like, as we have had experience of the National Policy developed outside of Parliament and in Parliament by the trade returns, to discuss that question from a five years' standpoint. We have for years taken up the results of the policy, its effect upon trade, the development of our manufactures, and we have compared the results year by year; but it will be profitable, I think now, having before us the returns of the five years with respect to its known effects upon trade, and with respect to its general influence on the country, to spend a little time in taking a review of its operations for that period. We know that in 1879 various objections were urged by hon. gentlemen opposite to the resolutions that were submitted to Parliament defining and declaring the policy of the Government on the trade question. One of the objections that was raised—I think it was put forward by the hon. member who passed a word across the House a few moments ago—was that the imposition of a duty on breadstuffs would interfere materially with the foreign export trade we had enjoyed down to that time. He went into a very elaborate calculation, as to what would be the direct results under the operation of this tariff, consequent upon forcing the trade through the United States ports instead of bringing it through our canals or over our railways, as heretofore, giving employment to the people of Canada. No doubt there were grave doubts at that time as to the effect that would be produced by the imposition of a duty upon foreign breadstuffs, because it would subject exporters to transmit their goods in bond at some little trouble, and perhaps at some expense; and it was contended by hon. gentlemen opposite, that these circumstances would drive the trade into channels other than the St. Lawrence. I have, from year to year, been able to make a statement, showing that the fears expressed by hon. gentlemen at that time were, so far as our experience then went, without foundation, and I think the experience of the last five years goes to show that their fears were groundless. For instance, I find as follows:—

Value of exports foreign goods from 1st July, 1878, to 1st July, 1884.....	$53,384,455
Increase.....	$12,380,545

That will be a sufficient answer to hon. gentlemen who entertained fears upon this subject at that time for shipment, instead of sending them by the St. Lawrence and by the winter ports of the Maritime Provinces. Again, it was said when those resolutions were introduced that they were unpatriotic, that their effect would be to diminish trade with the mother country and increase our trade with the United States. That was the statement made by hon. gentlemen opposite, and we were told we were unpatriotic, that we were really assisting our American neighbors rather than the country to which we owe allegiance, and the country to which our sympathies naturally lean. Here are the facts with respect to that matter :

Value of goods imported from Great Britain for five years, from 1st July, 1879, to 1st July, 1884.....	$224,112,853
Value of goods imported from Great Britain for five years, from 1st July, 1874, to 1st July, 1879.....	209,077,876
Increase.....	$ 15,034,977
Value of goods imported from the United States for five years, from 1st July, 1879, to 1st July, 1884.....	$220,865,271
Value of goods imported from the United States for five years, from 1st July, 1874, to 1st July, 1879.....	240,559,480
Decrease.....	$ 19,694,209

I think that may be considered as a sufficient answer to the fears expressed as to the effect of that policy on trade between Canada and Great Britain, and trade between Canada and the United States. Then it was asserted that under the policy of 1879 the duties would be increased on British goods to a greater extent than on United States products. Let us see what the results are for the five years to which I refer, as shown in the Trade and Navigation Returns :

Percentage paid on imports from Great Britain from 1874 to 1879.....	16	per cent.
Percentage paid on imports from Great Britain from 1879 to July 1st, 1884....	19 ³⁷ / ₁₀₀	"
Increase.....	3 ³⁷ / ₁₀₀	"
Percentage paid on goods imported for consumption from the United States, from 1874 to 1879.....	9 ⁴⁵ / ₁₀₀	"
Percentage on goods imported for consumption from the United States, from 1879 to 1884.....	14 ⁸⁶ / ₁₀₀	"
Increase.....	5 ⁴¹ / ₁₀₀	"

That is the answer to the fears expressed by the hon. gentlemen opposite, that the tariff then about to go into operation would work adversely to Great Britain and in favor of the United States. The question of the balance of trade has been referred to frequently, and on several occasions by the leader of the Opposition, who has quoted statements made by me, I think in 1879 or 1880, when the imports and exports had approached an equality, and in one year, I think, the exports were a little in excess. For the subsequent years the imports were in excess, and I expressed at that time my satisfaction that the imports and the exports assimilated more nearly than they had done for many years previous. The leader of the Opposition said that it was my desire that the imports should go on decreasing until we would have a perfect balance of trade, as we had in 1879-80 or 1880-81. Now what are the facts? The facts are that during the last two years the importation has been exceptionally large. First, the imports for the Canadian Pacific Railway—imports of rails, rolling stock, and other articles brought into the country, added to the imports of the last year, and to a considerable extent to those of the previous year. Then the general prosperity led to larger imports and larger consumption. But I give the following facts to show that the National Policy has had the practical effect of keeping the difference between imports and exports in a much more favorable condition than it would have been but for the National Policy :

Exports for same period.....	386,543,729
Excess of imports over exports.....	$105,111,076
The imports from July 1st, 1879, to July 1st, 1884, were.....	$559,891,152
Exports for same period.....	477,831,784
Excess of imports over exports.....	$82,059,368

In addition I may state that there was a large increase in the trade of the Dominion in the last five years. The increased production of our manufactures, as shown by the returns submitted to the Government, and laid on the Table of the House—and I am sorry they are not printed, but hon. gentlemen will have ample time to examine them before this discussion closes—must have diminished the value of the imports of manufactured goods for the five years to the extent of $100,000,000. When I say that the increased labor paid during the last year to the men and women employed in the manufactures of the country was $15,000,000 alone, you may fairly infer that for interest, on the outlay on buildings and the profits to the manufacturers it would reach an average of $20,000,000, or for the five years $100,000,000. The imports have been necessarily decreased by the operation of this policy, and the balance of trade would have been that much larger against us had not these factories been built and these industries established in the country; and the consequences would have been, I think, unfortunate if such had been the condition of things. So much for the question of the balance of trade. I do not desire to see the consumption of the people diminished; but what the Government prefer is that while they desire to see the consumption of the people increased, they prefer rather to see them consuming articles produced and manufactured in the country, by the labor of the country, than that they should be imported from outside and involve the necessity of sending the money out of the country to pay for them. Now I desire to give some further evidence with reference to the success of this policy in increasing the industries of this country. There is nothing, perhaps, that can mark more clearly the increase of these industries than the increased demand for machinery. It is known perfectly well by every man who is engaged in the manufacture of machinery, that the orders he has received and executed since 1879 have been largely in excess of his orders from 1874 to 1879. You will find, perhaps, that leading men who are not members of Parliament, who are advocating this policy, and are the most effective speakers in its favor, are the men who speak of their own industry, who go to the country and tell the people what benefits they have received from this policy, in the increased demand for their machinery. I may, perhaps, point to a man whom my hon. predecessor met recently, and who, speaking from his own experience, spoke so effectively that he carried the people with him, because he was able to show that the increased demand for his products and the increased employment given to mechanics were the result of the National Policy. In addition to the increased demand at home, we find that the machinery imported from 1874 to 1879 was $3,100,018 in value, while the value of that imported from 1879 to 1884 was $8,597,300. I think this is an indication that some new life or vitality was given to industries requiring this increased amount of machinery. Then take the article of raw hides in order to show the development of leather manufacture. We find that the raw hides imported from 1874 to 1879 were valued at $6,419,294, and from 1879 to 1884, $9,517,744. This is some evidence of the increased demand for hides for the manufacture of leather, and the manufacture of boots and shoes and other articles made from leather. We come next to coal. The amount of coal entered for consumption from 1874 to 1879 was 4,230,984 tons, and from 1879 to 1884, 7,085,985 tons. The output of coal in 1878 was 650,000 tons; the output in 1884 was 1,550,500 tons, or 900,000 tons more than it was in 1878. Hon. members who were here in 1879 will recollect that I estimated—and I thought it was a liberal estimate—that in four years the output of coal in the Dominion of Canada would be increased 400,000 tons, and now, in a little over five years the increase has reached 900,000 tons, or 3,000 tons for every working day of the year 1884. I think some hon. gentlemen opposite will say: Well, if you have increased the imports of coal 3,000,000 tons, you have taxed the people 50 or 60 cents a ton on that increased import of coal. Well, I admit it. I will not undertake to prove—though it might be proved to some extent—that in some cases the duty is paid by the party selling the coal; I am not going to take any doubtful ground. I will admit for argument's sake, that the people pay every cent of that duty. But what does it enable us to do? It has enabled us—because the duty is just about the same—to take the duty off tea and coffee and place it on coal, which gives us an industry that has increased its output 900,000 tons in 1884 over 1878. Were that duty taken off coal to-morrow, the Government would have to come to Parliament and ask them to impose a duty on tea and coffee instead. Now, Sir, the next question is the question of sugar. That is a question which was pretty fully debated here. Very strong language was used by hon. gentlemen opposite with reference to the effect of our policy upon sugar. It was stated that we were enriching the sugar refiner and taxing the consumer. I should not at all wonder if we should now have from the same gentlemen the declaration that our policy has ruined the refiner, while, perhaps, they may not admit that it has benefited the consumer. The change in the duty on sugar has had this effect: It has restored to Canada an industry she had lost; it has led to the erection of two or three new refineries in addition to the old, giving employment to a large number of hands. I am not quite sure we have not one refinery too many; but if they are not making as much money at present as they did in former years will it not be right for hon. gentlemen opposite to take into account the large profits said to have been made in 1879 and 1880, to counterbalance the small profits at the present time, and average the return which the investor had from this industry? I think that would be reasonable.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Only the men who made the money then won't divide with the others now.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Not at all. But, Mr. Speaker, I am now combatting the argument that may be raised by-and-by, and I am calling the attention of the House to the fact that when this question of sugar was under discussion, it was charged that our policy was to enrich the rich and to impoverish the poor; and now we are to hear that these gentlemen are engaged in an enterprise in which they lost money last year, not from the effect of the policy, but from the downward tendency of the price of sugar during the last twelve months. Hon. gentlemen say, hear, hear, to my statement; but let me call their attention to the fact that the argument that applies to sugar will apply to cotton and other industries. If, as hon. gentlemen said, these industries were yielding large profits then, and if they are making small profits now, if the inference from their statement is that we have induced men to engage in enterprises that have not paid, they should take into account the profits they had in the first years, and make an average by a comparison with the less profits that they have had since. That is my answer to that line of argument. With regard to sugar, the question is, has it cost the people any more than it did before? Never before in the history of the country was the price of sugar so low as it is to-day; and I will say, never before was sugar so good either. I admit that that is not a sufficient answer to the statement of hon. gentlemen opposite, that the cost was increased to the consumer, because the price of raw sugar has been lower than it was; but when we take into account the cost of yellow and refined sugar during the past five years, I believe you will find that the consumer has had his sugar as cheap as he would have had if he had imported it from the United States and England, under the tariff which prevailed in 1877 and 1878. What has our policy done more than that? In 1878 only 6 per cent. of the sugar consumed in the Dominion of Canada came direct from the country of its production; last year 89 per cent. came from the country of its production, and only 11 per cent. from Great Britain and the United States. That is my answer to the statement of the hon. gentleman who said that the duty on sugar meant a great loss of revenue, and an increased cost to the consumer. The revenue received during the last year on account of the increased quantity of raw sugar imported, although the value was low, was greater than the revenue of years previous. All this shows that we have not only obtained the usual revenue from sugar, but that we have given employment to a large number of people. We have restored to Canada an important industry. Our trade with the West Indies has increased by 40 or 50 per cent., and our policy with regard to sugar has been eminently beneficial to the whole Dominion of Canada. Well, Sir, the next industry I come to is the cotton industry. We recollect the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite about the cotton lords. The sugar refiners, the cotton lords and the woollen manufacturers were the favorites; and their industries were the three pet industries of the Government.

Mr. BLAKE. Do not leave out the iron.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We did not do much for the iron industry until 1881.

Mr. BLAKE. You gave it a bounty.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I am now referring to the statements made in 1879. I admit that we did do something for the iron industry; and if $1.50 a ton, to be, after a certain period, reduced to $1 a ton, should be found necessary to more fully develop this industry, I have no doubt that the protection of $1.50 will be extended to it. Coming back to the cotton industry. Hon. gentlemen opposite objected to this policy on the ground that the men engaged in that industry would make fortunes out of it, while the poor man would be forced to pay higher prices. I should not wonder if we were to hear the same hon. gentlemen now say that the poor unfortunate men who invested money in the cotton mills of the country are suffering badly. Well, I can say, so far as the consumer is concerned, that he is not suffering. There was great solicitude felt by hon. gentlemen opposite for the poor man and I remember that that solicitude extended to the leader of the Opposition. In his speeches here and elsewhere he dwelt upon the great tax the poor man would be subjected to by requiring seven yards for a certain garment.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Well, nine yards, perhaps. Whether it was seven or nine, I know he was extremely solicitous about the consumer of cotton. I have had placed in my hands the prices current on the 31st of January, 1885, taken from the New York Economist, giving a comparison of the prices of cotton at New York and in Canada:

	American.		Canadian.
	in., 6 cts. per yd.		in., 5½ cts. per yd.
Whitemisville.....	33	“	33
Pelham	35½	“	36
Heron	35½	“	36
Whitemisville.....	35½	“	36
Dwight Anch'r.....	36	“	36
Langdon, G. B.....	36	“	36

If these figures are reliable, and they have been given to me by a gentleman upon whose veracity I can rely—they are copied them from the Economist—they show clearly, as far as the consumer is concerned, that he is having his cotton at less or about the price at which the consumer in the United States can purchase similar goods. I refer, of course, to the retail purchaser. With reference to the manufacturers, it will be said that under this policy, capitalists were induced to extend this industry far beyond what circumstances have shown was justifiable; but the difficulty that has arisen is due to a very great extent to the fact that the manufacturers confined themselves, for a year or two, to one or two classes of goods. The result has been they overstocked the market, and for the last six months or so, they have been quietly discussing what arrangements they can make, by varying the character of their manufactures, which will enable them to obtain a living profit on their investments. I recollect hon. gentlemen opposite rising, three or four years ago, and stating that the dividend declared by one of these companies was something like 40 per cent. If statements of that kind were correct, the manufacturers probably invested those large profits and incurred far greater liabilities in extending their operations, with the result that, owing to those operations being exceedingly limited as regards variety in the goods manufactured, they created so sharp a competition among themselves that they are compelled to reduce the prices to the consumer to a figure as low or lower than the prices in the United States. Hon. gentlemen opposite will say: "Oh, very soon they will remedy that," for they are meeting together and are endeavoring to make such arrangements as will enable them to increase the price and have a living profit. I doubt if there is a single gentleman in the House, at all events a single member who believes in the National Policy, who desires that the men who have invested their capital in that industry should not receive a fair return, for the capital they have invested. And this the manufacturers can do because the number of spindles in operation in Canada is not equal considering population, to the number in operation in the United States; and the fair inference is that the moment the Canadian manufacturers have so arranged as to increase the variety of their goods, they will obtain a fair profit on them and the consumers will not have to pay an additional sum for the goods, not as much as they would pay on imported goods under the tariff of 1878. To show what an impetus has been given to this trade since 1879, I will quote from the Trade Returns giving, the imports of raw cotton for the five years from 1874 to 1879, and compare them with the imports during the five years from 1879 to 1884. From 1874 to 1879, the imports of raw cotton amounted to 31,847,880 lbs.; from 1879 to 1884 they amounted to 94,038,219 lbs., and their value increased from $3,563,185 to $10,531,532. This, I think, will show that an impetus has been given to this industry, that there has been a large amount of cotton manufactured in the Dominion, that it has been purchased by the Canadian consumer at a very low rate, and that, considering the number of spindles that are now in Canada and the demand that must exist for these goods, the day is not far distant when all these manufactories will be profitably employed. Subsequent to 1879, the Government came down and asked for an increased duty upon agricultural implements, and that was one of the grievances that has been magnified. It has been for a year or so presented, especially to the people of Manitoba and the North-West, by our opponents and used by them to create a feeling averse to the National Policy and the action of the Government in that matter. I may state now what I stated. When, on behalf of the Government, I asked that the duty should be increased to 35 per cent., that I had the assurance of the manufacturers of the Dominion that the increased duty would not increase the cost to the consumer. If that assurance had not been carried out, the Government would have felt themselves perfectly free to say to these manufacturers: your assurance has not been carried out, the cost has not been kept where it was, but has been increased to the people of Canada, or to that portion of Canada specially affected, and we will repeal that resolution increasing the duty from 25 to 35 per cent. I think that I am in a position to say that the manufacturers of Canada have carried out their engagement, that the various articles of agricultural implements will be sold this year in Manitoba and the North-West as low, many of them, as they can be purchased in Dakota.

An hon. MEMBER. Lower.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. All of them as low as, and some lower, than the prices at which they can be bought in Dakota or Minneapolis, including the expenses of carrying them from those places. I have here the comparative prices of agricultural implements at Winnipeg, for several years past:

	1881-2	1883	1884	1885
Self-binders.....	$340	$330	$300 to $275	$225 to $249

Let us compare these prices with the prices in Dakota and Minnesota:

* Retail price to consumer in Minneapolis, $250.

Now, Sir, as far as the prices of these articles are concerned, the policy resulted in the reduction to the consumer; and I think I may venture to say, with reference to every leading industry in the country, that the productions, whether of agricultural implements, or sugar, or leather manufactures, or cottons, or woollen goods, or the articles which enter into the consumption of everyday life, and especially among the masses of the people, that it cannot be shown that in any case, except perhaps that of coal, where a duty of 60 cents a ton is imposed, there has been an increased cost to the consumer; and in consequence of the competition of the manufacturers, which is very sharp at present, the prices have been in favor of the consumer. And, though the manufacturers are at present under very great disadvantages in consequence of the competition from outside, and are compelled to sell with a very small margin of profit, still this policy has given employment to a vast number of people in the country and has been in the public interest. Before I refer further to that, let me call attention to a few other facts. Take, for instance, the value and the products of fish and their exports. I think I hear hon. gentlemen opposite say: What have you done for the fishing interest? Whether it be the effect of the bounty which has been paid during the last two years or not, we find that there is a considerable increase in the catch of fish, as shown by the following statement:—

Value.		Value.
1875.....	10,447,886	1880.....	14,499,979
1876.....	11,116,999	1881.....	15,817,163
1877.....	12,005,934	1882.....	16,824,692
1878.....	13,215,678	1883.....	16,958,192
Total.....	$58,468,383	Total.....	$77,628,679

Fish and Products of Fish Exported.				Fish and Products of Fish Exported.
Produce of Canada.		Not Produce of Canada.		Produce of Canada.		Not Produce of Canada.
1874...	$5,292,368	$104,359	1879...	$6,928,871	$143,332
1875...	5,380,527	5,232	1880...	6,579,656	73,691
1876...	5,500,989	232	1881...	6,867,715	31,169
1877...	5,874,360	1882...	7,682,079	15,529
Total...	$28,902,219	$185,214	Total...	$36,867,439	$311,529

With reference to our cattle exports, which, thanks to the great tact and energy of our High Commissioner in England and the policy pursued by the Government, have been secured from the great loss to which the shippers of cattle in the United States have been subjected, we find that the products of that industry sent out of the country from 1874 to 1879 amounted to $11,417,642, and from 1879 to 1884 to $41,062,474. Then there is the question of the effect of the general policy upon the development of the industries of the country. I have given some evidence, I think, of the progress of these industries, by the increased demand for machinery in the country, by the greatly increased import of cotton, by the import of hides, by the consumption of coal to drive the machinery of the country, and by various other facts which have been presented here; but there has been laid on the Table of the House, and will be placed in the hands of every member shortly, the result of the enquiries of two gentlemen, who were appointed by the Government, to examine the leading factories of the Dominion of Canada, in order to show their development since 1878. As these papers are not yet in the hands of members, I shall only, at present, just quote generally the results, because, when the discussion goes on further and hon. members have those papers to refer to, it may be interesting and valuable to go more into detail. I will simply give the results of their enquiries for six months in the prominent towns and cities of the Dominion. It is estimated by them that they have visited factories employing about two-thirds of the people who are engaged in the various manufacturing industries, and these are the results:

	No. of Factories.	No. hands employed.	Yearly wages paid.	Products.	Capital invested.
1878.....	1,501	42,794	13,833,733	49,963,282	37,819,931
Increase in five years....	595	34,552	$10,564,432	$52,906,884	$29,473,442

If we add 50 per cent. to that, supposing their calculation is correct and the results should be found to be the same, it will appear that the adoption of this policy in 1879 has increased the number of factories in Canada by 892, the number hands by 51,828, the yearly wages paid to the people employed by $15,843,648, the products by $79,360,126, and the capital invested by $44,210,163. It does appear to me that, under these circumstances, we have reason to be satisfied with the results of this policy during the first five years of its existence. I have not said anything up to the present moment as to the effect this policy has had upon the credit of the country. I have been in the habit of referring to that in the past, and I desire here, though I shall touch upon that further on, to say that the credit of the country stands better to-day at home and abroad, than it ever did before; and money can be obtained on more favorable terms

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

than ever before. Before I refer to the last loan which was made, and to which the late Finance Minister will probably refer, let me say that I have had a table prepared of the price of 4 per cent. securities for various countries in order to compare them with the rates obtainable for Canadian 4 per cents. It is as follows:—

	5 per cent.		4 per cent.
	When Due.	Rate.	When Due.	Rate.
Canada.....	1904-1908	105-107
Cape.....	1900	104-106	1922	89½

New Zealand.....	1929	98-100
South Australia.....	1929	102-102½

Thus it appears that Canadian 4 per cents stand higher to-day than any of the countries that I have named. With reference to the last loan placed upon the English market, at 3½ per cent. interest, the House will remember authority was given to the Government to loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company $22,500,000 towards the construction of that railway, and it became necessary that we should obtain, on the best terms possible, money to meet our engagements in that direction. A £5,000,000 sterling loan was offered at 3½ per cent, and the minimum named was 91. That loan produced £91 1s. 8d. It was a 50 years loan, and the sum realised is equal to 2 per cent. premium on a 50 years' loan at 4 per cent., as will be shown by a book I have in my hand, and which any hon. member can see, there he will ascertain the value of securities at various rates, with the number of years to run. Perhaps the late Minister of Finance has seen it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have the book.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. When that loan was placed upon the market it brought equal to 2 per cent. premium on 4 per cent. loan for fifty years. That, Sir, was the highest rate ever obtained for any Canadian loan that had been placed on that market. The loans placed by my hon. predecessor from 1874 to 1876, and the loan placed upon the English market by myself, in 1878, realised about the same sum at 4 per cent. The fact is, Sir, we did not realise as good a rate even at 4 per cent. as the 3½ per cent. loan of 1884. The 4 per cent. debentures placed at 30 as appears by this table. The loan effected by my predecessor in 1874, at the price it realised, yielded to the purchaser £4 12s. 6d. for every £100 bought. The 30 year 4 per cent. debentures placed in 1875, cost Canada, in interest, £4 11s. 2d. per annum on every £100 that was realised. The 50 years 3½ per cent. debenture at 91—which was the minimum placed, though it brought a little more, gave a rate of interest of £3 18s. 3d. That is what we are paying on that loan. A 50 year 4 per cent. debenture, selling at 102, would yield an interest to the holder of £3 18s. 2d., so that I may fairly say we realised what was equal to 102 per cent. on a 50 year 4 per cent. loan. Now, Sir, the difference between the rates at which the hon. gentleman opposite, and I myself in 1878, obtained for the 4 per cent. at that time, is about ½ per cent. and that ½ per cent., were it used as a sinking fund, would pay off the principal in between 40 and 50 years, and that shows the nature and extent of the value to Canada of the different loans that were floated. My hon. predecessor asked for the names of the persons who tendered, and what they tendered for. We had not the names in our possession to give him, but I may say that when I placed the minimum at 91, almost everybody who was in the habit of dealing in securities of this kind thought the minimum high, and I had a conversation with the manager of the Bank of Montreal on this subject, and he declined to tender, as many others also did, because the minimum rate was considered too high. Now, Sir, there has been a good deal said with reference to ample notice not having been given of this loan, that the number of papers it was advertised in was too limited in circulation, and therefore the interests of the country were sacrificed. The hon. gentleman moved, if you will recollect, for the names of the papers in which that loan was advertised, and you will also remember that I asked him to amend that request and go back to 1874. I had a reason for doing so, because I was satisfied there was no difference in the papers that were used as the advertising medium of his loan and those used for the loan of 1884. The result showed that, with the exception of 1876, when he floated his loan and the loan I floated in 1878, the papers were the same, that there was not one paper which he used in 1876 that I did not use in 1884, and I imagine only from the name of that paper that it has gone out of existence. There is nothing to be gained by the Opposition by an investigation into the number of papers in which tenders were asked, for the loan of 1884, as compared with the papers in which tenders were asked for the previous loans. Now, with reference to the time that was given for the parties to tender. If you will compare the prospectuses that were issued by the hon. gentleman opposite, and by myself, it will be found there is very little difference. But I will tell you what the Finance Minister of Canada has to encounter. There is in London an organisation of men who are opposed to the Pacific Railway, and who are opposed to the Government of Canada, because they have given facilities to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the construction of that great work. There are men connected with the Northern Pacific Railway whose interests lead them to oppose that road and to destroy the company if possible, and you will find that, whenever an opportunity arises, the Northern Pacific Railway Company very naturally seeks to defeat the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, because when completed it will be one of its great competitors. Then, I think I may fairly say that the stockholders of the Grand Trunk Railway are not peculiarly demonstrative in their regard for the Canadian Pacific Railway. And what do we find when we go into that market to float a loan? Just what I found last summer, and that was a most determined hostility to the successful placing of that loan. The morning that tenders were asked for to be deposited at Messrs. Baring Bros., the parties opposed to the Canadian Pacific Railway had a most violent article in one of their papers against the Government of Canada and the Canadian Pacific Railway, and from 10 o'clock in the morning until 3 o'clock in the afternoon, while the tenders were being deposited at Messrs. Baring for this loan, a man stood there with a placard advertising this paper, and calling the attention of everybody who came along to the article in the paper. But, notwithstanding that fact, when the tenders were opened, I do not hesitate to say that on no occasion have we had so many offers of sums varying from £100 sterling to £10,000. Had the matter rested there, we could have made out a case to which there could have been no reply from hon. gentlemen opposite. But I think I hear the late Finance Minister saying: Oh, but New South Wales has floated a 3½ per cent. loan since then, and that loan brought a higher price than you received for our 3½ per cent. loan. There are reasons why the New South Wales 3½ per cents should have sold for a higher price than our securities. Ours were for 50 years, theirs for 40 years.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Ours are for 50 years.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes, ours are for 50 years, and theirs are for 40 years; and therefore if the purchaser of a £100 bond pays £92 for it, he gets back into his coffers £8 in 40 years; while the purchaser of one of our bonds does not get it back for 50 years. So the purchaser of the former has the use of his money for 10 years longer than the purchaser of the latter. According to the table in my hands, it makes a difference of nearly 1 per cent. to the purchaser. The purchaser can give 1 per cent. more for a 40 years bond than for a 50 years bond when it is sold for 8 per cent. discount. It is just the opposite when you buy at a premium. In addition to that, the payments which were to be made on the New South Wales bonds were distributed over a longer period than the payments on the Canadian bonds. The buyer had, therefore, the use of the money for a longer time, and the difference between the payments on the Canadian and the New South Wales bonds was about one-half per cent., which gave 1½ per cent. advantage to the purchaser of the New South Wales loan. It is true that shortly afterwards, owing to circumstances of an exceptional character, both our bonds advanced. The Chancellor of the Exchequer of England was about converting 3 per cents into 2½ per cents, and the rate was favorable to our colonial securities, and ours advanced rapidly for a month or so, and the New South Wales bonds also advanced in about the same ratio. That led to comments in the Opposition press attempting to show that I had sacrificed the interests of Canada in placing the loan at 91 when the securities subsequently advanced to a higher rate. What I cannot understand is why our 3½ per cents are selling comparatively lower than New South Wales' 3½ per cents, and our 4 per cents having the same period as theirs to run are higher than theirs. What is our position? While Canada has comparatively few friends in the money market of London, and many opponents when we are placing our loans on the market, whenever an Australian colony places a loan the twelve Australian banks take hold of it, and there is a different feeling manifested as compared with that displayed towards a Canadian loan, and a deep interest is felt on the part of the Australian bankers for the success of an Australian loan.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is no Grand Trunk against them.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There is a hearty and commendable desire manifested by Australian capitalists to keep the credit of the Australian colonies at the highest possible point; and although we cannot get at the facts, I believe there must have been some arrangement made between the New South Wales Government and the syndicate of Australian banks as purchasers of the loan, that as the proceeds are not required for a long time a moderate rate of interest should be paid until called for. That loan should have brought 1½ per cent. more than ours; it brought over £93, or practically £1 more than our loan brought. I do not hesitate to say that the rates at which our 4's are quoted, and they form the larger part of our indebtedness as compared with the 3½'s, show that the price of the latter may be influenced at present by the fact that we have five million pounds maturing in June next. To-day our credit at home and abroad stands higher than ever before, and I believe it is to a very considerable extent the result of the adoption of a policy which has enabled us to have a surplus, after making the expenditures necessary to carry on public affairs, and without increasing the taxation of the people per head, or increasing the burdens they have to bear in the shape of interest.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. When we separated, Mr. Speaker, I was discussing the general effect of what is termed the National Policy on the general industries, and especially the manufacturing industries, of the Dominion of Canada. I now propose briefly to call the attention of the House to the amended estimates for the current year, both of income and expenditure, and I will then proceed to submit an estimate of income for the next fiscal year, the estimate of expenditure being on the Table of the House. Then I shall ask the indulgence of the House for a short time while I submit evidences of the prosperity of the country as proved by the facts which I desire to submit for their consideration. But before doing so I wish to call the attention of the House to a matter of which I intended to speak earlier in the evening, and that is a statement that has been made relative to the taxation of Canada as compared with that of the United States, in which it has been represented that the taxes of Canada at the present time are nearly double those of the United States, and that we are fast becoming the most heavily taxed country in the world. I desire to give some facts to the House on this point. The most of them are taken from the Finance Report of the United States of 1884, recently published in Washington, dealing with the expenditure of 1883-84. The expenditure for the first quarter of 1884-85, an estimate of the expenditure for the remaining nine months of the current year, and the estimate of the income and expenditure of 1885-86 as contained in the volume before me. I find from this document for 1883-84, page 4, the following figures:—

Receipts from Customs.....	$195,067,489 76
" Inland Revenue.....	121,586,072 51
National Bank Tax.....	3,108,730 13
Fees, &c.....	4,323,603 03
	$324,085,895 43
Less surplus.....	57,603,296 09
	$266,482,499 34

Estimating the population for that year at 54,000,000, the necessary taxation per head to meet the expenses and sinking fund was $1.93½ cents per head. The taxation necessary in Canada to meet the expenses, out of consolidated revenue including sinking fund for the five years from 1879 to 1884 was $4.78½ per head against $4.93½ in the United States for 1883-84. I would call the attention of the House to the fact, that of the necessary Dominion taxation $1.75 per head of the sum received into the Dominion Treasury goes towards the relief of the Provinces, either in the interest of their debt assumed by the Dominion of Canada, amounting at the close of the last fiscal year to nearly one hundred millions of dollars, and $3,600,000 paid annually in subsidies to the Provinces; whereas, in the United States, no portion of the revenue collected by the general Government goes to the relief of the States. The State taxation as shown by return laid before Congress is 32 cents on every $100 of taxable property in the United States, or $1.20 per head of the population, in addition to that collected by the general Government. So when we are considering this question as to the taxation of the United States, we must remember that we collected for the Provinces $1.75, last year, while the inhabitants of the United States, in addition to the sum which is collected and paid into the general treasury, pay $1.20 state taxation per head. Now, Sir, this makes the necessary taxation in the United States, including sinking fund, $6.13½ per head, against an average necessary taxation in Canada for five years of $4.78½ per head, or for

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

Dominion purposes alone, $3.03½. And as to this amount which we contribute for the Provinces, it is not now a question of whether the policy is wise or unwise; the only condition on which the various Provinces would enter this union was that the Dominion should assume their debt and pay the interest, and give what would be considered sufficient to maintain and pay the working expenses of the different Local Governments. The facts of the case nevertheless are these: That if we had been in the position of the United States, leaving the Provinces to collect by provincial taxation such as is collected by the States of the Union, we would have only required, in order to pay the necessary expenses for 1883-84, to have collected $3.03 per head. I may here state that I desire to put this case in as fair and as accurate a position as it can possibly be presented. The sinking fund of the United States is larger in proportion of the population than that of Canada, and therefore it may be said that the fair way to test this question is to look at it without reference to the sinking fund at all, and to say what the necessary taxation would be not taking into account the sinking fund. The necessary taxation to meet the expense of the Dominion for the fiscal year 1883-84, less sinking fund, was $4.84 per head. The necessary taxation to meet the expenditure of the United States for the same period, less the sinking fund, was $4.07 per head, and if you add State taxation $1.20 we have as the necessary taxation of the United States for that year $5.27, as against $4.84 in Canada. Now, Sir, I take from this document before me—the Estimates of the United States for 1885-86—I will refer presently to the Estimates for the Dominion of Canada for the same year—and with this result: The estimated revenue for the United States from Customs, internal revenue, bank tax and other fees, is $307,000,000. Deduct estimated surplus and sinking fund $54,656,000, and you have left $252,344,000 the amount necessary to assess and tax the people of the United States to pay the expenses of 1885-86, or $4.58 per head of a population of 55,000,000; add State taxation, $1.20, making a total of $5.78 as the estimated taxation of the United States; while the estimated taxation of Canada for the fiscal year 1885-86, less sinking fund, based upon a population of 4,800,000, is $4.75 per head. Now, Sir, with reference to the statement that we are fast approaching in taxation to the condition of the most heavily taxed nation in the world, I have here a statement of the revenue and expenditure per head of the population of various countries, which I desire to submit to this House to show whether that statement, is reliable or not. This statement refers to the year 1881-82:

Country.	Revenue per head.	Expenditure per head.
Queenland	$43 44	$42 51
New South Wales.....	42 90	36 75
West Australia	40 34	23 10

In the case of Canada the revenue received from railways is deducted, and adding to the United States taxation the taxation of States, it is below all the countries that I have named, and the countries in Europe whose taxation is below that of Canada are:

Countries.	Revenue per head.	Expenditure per head.
Sweden	$4 79	$4 73
Turkey	3 22	3 82
Switzerland.....	3 07	3 03

And then we come to China, British India and Japan. If we take into account the value of a day's labor in these countries as compared with the value of a day's labor in Canada, the taxation at their figures is greater than that of Canada, without any of the compensating advantages that our people enjoy. Sir, I fail to see in these statements any warrant whatever for the statement made by a member of this House in another place that the taxation of Canada was nearly double that of the United States, and that our taxation was fast approaching that of the most heavily taxed country in the world. Our taxation is not one-fourth of the average taxation of the Australian colonies, when we contrast our condition with that of the countries to which I refer. In our case the expenditure is not on war or on standing armies, but for the development of a great country, and to secure for Canada the most magnificent canal system in the world, and railway facilities such as are scarcely to be found in any other part of the world. Sir, if I am right in these statements, how deeply is it to be regretted that any gentleman occupying the prominent position of the gentleman to whom I refer, should have put into the hands of American land and steamboat agents who are striving to divert immigration from Canada to the United States—should have put into the hands of the people of Ireland to deter them from emigrating to this country—should have put into the hands of the people of England and the people of Scotland statements such as these, calculated to damage our credit and prevent immigration to the country—should have put into the hands of the people of Germany a statement made on high authority that if they come to Canada to settle, they will come to a land which is or soon will be more heavily taxed than any other country in the world; and these statements made at variance with the facts and without warrant or justification. I now pass to another subject. I desire to consider the Estimates for the current year, with the view of making an amended statement relative to the income and expenditure. The estimate made of Customs receipts last Session was $20,000,000. The amended estimate is $19,500,000. There will evidently be a falling off in the receipts from Customs, arising mainly from the decreased value of the imports. Every person knows that during the last year there has been a large reduction in the values of goods imported into Canada; and I may mention as an illustration of that the article of sugar. The revenue derivable from sugar entered this year, and upon which an ad valorem duty of 22½ per cent. is collected, has been materially affected by the reduced value of the sugar. We know that the depression that exists in England, in France and in the United States, is such that the products of these various countries are sent into Canada at lower rates, and sold in those themselves at lower rates than the rates that prevailed a year ago. Therefore, the articles imported into Canada paying ad valorem duty, supposing the volume was the same, would necessarily show a reduction in Customs duties; but in addition to that there is no doubt that the energy which our own manufacturers have displayed in developing their industries has had the effect of reducing to some extent the imports. I may say, however, that in the current year the reduction in the Customs revenue will arise very largely from the decreased cost of the goods imported. It is quite true that the falling off in Customs for the first six months of the year amounted to over half a million, but I wish to call the attention of the House to one or two facts which will justify me, I think, in estimating that at the close of the year the reduction will not be more than half a million. For instance, on the 1st of January, 1884, we increased the duty on printed cotton goods from 20 to 27½ per cent., and there was at the close of 1883, in the months of November and December, a large amount of revenue collected on these goods that did not legitimately belong to that year. The result is that in comparing the first six months of the present year with the first six months of last year, the latter will show an increased amount of revenue on that account. The return placed in my predecessor's hands (Sir Richard Cartwright) shows that for January and February there is nearly $200,000 increase in revenue which indicates very fairly, I think, that the diminution of imports in September, October, November and December, was the result, not only of depreciation of value but of the low price of our wheat which remained in the country and was not sold or exported, causing a depression in trade that made every man in business feel it was wise to import only what he absolutely wanted during that period. But since then, a considerable portion of the wheat having gone into the market and having been sent forward, things are improving, and we may fairly consider that while the deficit for the first six months was over $500,000 in Customs duties, the imports of the second half of the year, taking into account the increase of duty on printed goods, will be such that we may fairly estimate that the revenue will be from Customs duties $19,500,000 or only half a million dollars less than the estimate of last year. The next item is that of Excise. It is estimated the revenue from Excise will be $5,400,000. There has been some falling off in that direction which may be attributed in part to the action of a good many of the constituencies in Ontario of late, by which the amount of duty collected on spirits and malt liquors will be reduced; but it will be found before the Session closes, that the Government propose to make it up to some extent in another way, in Excise duties, a portion at least, of the money we are likely to lose this year and likely to lose to a greater extent next year on malt and spirits. It is estimated that this year, the revenue from Excise will amount to $5,400,000. The postal service we expect to yield $1,900,000, railways and canals $3,000,000. The interest which last year was put down at $750,000, will amount to $1,900,000, with however more than an equivalent increase on the other side, because, under the authority of this House, the Government floated a loan by which money was raised to be advanced to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. This increased, of course, the amount of interest payable by us, to a very considerable extent, but it increased on the credit side, the receipts from the estimate of $750,000 to $1,900,000. From the miscellaneous items we expect to obtain $800,000, as estimated last Session; and the lands in the North-West, from which I estimate we would obtain nearly a million dollars, I now have to estimate at $500,000, making altogether $33,000,000 revenue, with an estimated expenditure of $32,850,000. The receipts from interest for the present year will be less than the charge for interest, because there will be, between March and the first of July, a portion of the debt of the Canadian Pacific Railway bearing interest, but the interest, however, is not payable until September. Consequently the surplus is reduced to the extent of $300,000 from that fact. The estimated expenditure is $32,850,000, leaving $150,000 surplus for the present year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Including Dominion lands.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes; including receipts from Dominion lands. I trust that hon. gentlemen who complained that we were unnecessarily collecting taxes from the people, two or three years ago, will be satisfied now, as as the receipts and expenditure are very close for the current year. The increases in our expenditure are the following: The interest will be increased about $550,000, but practically about $250,000; the expenses on account of Indians $250,000; subsidies to Provinces in excess of what was paid last year and under the Act of last Session, $425,000. Then there will probably be a decrease in the immigration expenses of this year of $100,000, but at all events the estimate now is that the revenue will be $33,000,000 and the expenditure $32,850,000. Before I pass to the next year I think it but right that I should state to the House something with reference to the loan issued last summer and the temporary loans made since then. The loan made last summer netted to the Government $22,500,000 or thereabouts. The temporary loans made since that time amount to $12,500,000, making altogether $35,000,000. I think it right to state to the House how this money has been used and for what purposes it has been expended. Since the 1st of March last we have paid to the Canadian Pacific Railway, under contracts of Mr. Onderdonk, $3,379,873, on account of the Canadian Pacific Railway subsidy, $8,386,418; to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, on loan account, $19,459,000; redemption of debt $3,991,056; total $35,216,347. The members of the House may wish to know the course the Government are likely to pursue with reference to the maturing liabilities bearing 5 per cent. interest, as well as with reference to the floating debt. There are $25,000,000 of the present 5 per cent. loan in the hands of the public. The balance of about $7,000,000 is held by the Government in the sinking fund, and therefore, of the loan which matures in June next, $25,000,000 must be provided for either by the payment to the holders direct or by some other arrangement by which other bonds will be exchanged. I am not in a position to state definitely which course the Government will take, but it has been suggested that the Government should offer to the holders of 5 per cent. bonds, debentures payable in 7 or 10 years, in exchange for the 5 per cent. debentures that they hold. The Government look upon this proposition somewhat favorably because, in 1891, the loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway will be payable. When the Canadian Pacific Railway has been completed and its value fully established, arrangements will, no doubt, be made by which the mortgage which we hold upon it will be paid. If we issue debentures payable in 30 or 50 years, the Government would have to go into the market and buy back debentures at an advanced rate. At any rate, it would put the Government in a position, with a very short time intervening, to make arrangements for these $25,000,000; and then it is suggested that by the issue of Treasury bills we could provide for the temporary loans made in Canada and in England, so that in fact the Government may not be required to place on the London market any debentures during the present calendar year, except for the redemption of the $25,000,000, due on the 1st July next. At all events we will be in a position to provide for our maturing liabilities without materially depressing the value and character of our securities. Now, I will pass from the amended estimate for the current year to the estimate of income and expenditure for the next year. The Government estimate that the receipts from Customs will be what we have estimated for the present year, $19,500,000. We expect that Excise will not yield quite as much as in the present year from the fact that, on the 1st May next, several districts will come under the operation of the Scott Act, and it is natural to expect that the consumption of spirits and malt liquors will diminish and that there will be a decrease of revenue on that account. The receipts from Post Office we estimate at $1,950,000; from Railways and Canals, $3,000,000. It is true that we are running seventy or eighty miles more of railway than we were last year, that is, the road which was purchased from the Government of Nova Scotia; but we have not estimated any increase of revenue, because the Minister of Railways puts down the receipts for the Intercolonial Railway at $100,000 less than for the current year. For interest, we estimate $1,950,000. I may say here that the interest will not be as large as in the present year, because we are receiving interest this year on $7,000,000 of sinking fund debentures, which will be cancelled on the 1st July next, and therefore, while we shall receive the whole of the interest from the Canadian Pacific Railway next year, it will only increase the receipts $50,000, but the payments on the other side will be diminished in the like proportion. We estimate miscellaneous receipts at $700,000; and lands, &c., North-West, at $700,000, instead of $500,000 for this year. The estimate for the current year and next year of the proceeds from lands in the North-West is only one-third of the amount which will fall due on the pre-emption lands within that period. The expenditure is estimated at $31,757,032, leaving an estimated surplus of $1,242,968. The supplementary estimates may reduce this surplus to $700,000, and, if that should be the case, the taxation necessary for the next year will be $24,000,000, and that, on a population of 4,800,000, is just $5 per head, which is 12 cents more per head than the sum required during 1874 to 1879, but we, during the next year, will give to the different Provinces of the Dominion more than the 12 cents per head, under the action of last Session, for local expenditure and local benefit. Then the net interest which we will have to provide during the next year will be $7,500,000, and that, divided by 4,800,000, is $1.56½ per head of the population, or 1½ cents more, after the Canadian Pacific Railway is completed, after all the money is paid that we are bound to contribute for the construction of that work, after many millions of dollars have been expended in the enlargement of our canals, after six or seven millions of dollars have been expended in the completion and extension of the Intercolonial Railway, than was paid in 1878-79. It strikes me this should be considered a somewhat satisfactory condition of affairs. Many of us, when we agreed to contribute $25,000,000 for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to spend $38,000,000 more for the construction and completion of sections to be handed over to that company, were somewhat alarmed at the responsibility that we assumed. In the financial statements that have been made from time to time with reference to the completion of that work, we have all been basing those estimates upon the completion of that work in 1891; and it can quite well be understood why, in the current year, we have found it necessary to borrow more money than was anticipated and to increase the interest on the net debt of the country, from the fact that that work has been carried on with such wonderful rapidity towards completion. Many argue that it was unwise to press on this work so rapidly, and that it would have been better to spread the expenditure over a greater number of years. But when we consider, Mr. Speaker, that with 1½ cents per head of increased taxation in the shape of interest upon the debt; when we consider that with 12 cents per head of increased taxation next year, and that for the relief of the Provincial Treasuries, we will be able to complete this work—and the taxation necessary for the payment of interest is practically but a cent or two in excess of what it was in 1879-80; when we consider that the 150,000,000 acres of land that we have opened up for settlement in that country—which was comparatively worthless without the railway, and which will probably give us a return equal to our contribution to its construction, I think that with such a showing every man will feel that it was in the interests of this country that the work should be completed rapidly and expeditiously, in order that we may enjoy the advantages to be derived from the completion of that road, and that some of us who are now growing grey may yet live to enjoy its benefits. But before dealing with the evidences to which I refer of the prosperity of this country—"evidences of prosperity!" I hear an hon. member say. Yes, the evidences of prosperity, not perhaps as great in every respect as we could desire, but evidence of prosperity in advance of that which is enjoyed by any other country in the world. Before I proceed to give the evidence on which I base that opinion, I desire to submit to the House the resolutions with reference to changes in the Tariff that the Government have thought desirable to submit for your consideration. I may say that the first sheet or two of these resolutions are confined to articles that are placed upon the free list or to articles that have been made free by Order in Council, and it was thought better by the Government that Parliament should be asked to assent to them rather than allow them to remain as Orders in Council, and therefore we propose that they shall become part of the statutes of the Dominion of Canada by which the concessions will become more generally known. Therefore I am in the first place, simply giving a list of articles that are at present free, but which we desire to be placed on the free list under statute.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Have you that paper ready for distribution?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No; I have not.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It has been the custom to distribute them when you move resolutions.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I will lay it on the Table. There are reasons why it was not desirable to distribute it this afternoon.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Usually when we have introduced these changes—of course I did not expect the hon. gentleman would present them to the House until he had them in his hands—but usually speaking, those sheets have been sent all around the House just as you explained them to the House. You are not prepared to do that, I suppose?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. If that has been usual, then my memory is at fault.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did it two or three times.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I do not know what course the hon. gentleman may have pursued, but since I have had the honor of occupying this position I do not recollect of having done so, although it may be an omission on my part.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not blaming the hon. gentleman.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. These are the resolutions:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the tariff of Customs duties and schedule of free goods as follows: By adding to the free list, Schedule B, the following articles now admitted free by Orders in Council under authority of sub-section 12, of section 230 of the Customs Act, 1883, as coke, when used in Canadian manufactures only; woollen rags; steel, imported for use in the manufacture of skates, musk, in pods or in grains; white shellac, for manufacturing purposes; jute cloth, as taken from the loom, neither pressed, mangled, calendered, nor in any way finished, and not less than 42 inches wide when imported to be manufactured into bags only; salt cake, being a sulphate of soda, when imported by manufacturers of glass and soap for their own use in their own works; "foot grease" the refuse of the cotton seed after the oil is pressed out; tagging metal, plain, japanned or coated, in coils not over 1½ inches in width, when imported by manufacturers of shoes and corset laces for use in their factories; locust beans, for the manufacture of horse and cattle food; hoop iron, not exceeding ¾ of an inch in width, and being No. 25 gauge, or thinner, used for the manufacture of tubular rivets; buckram, for the manufacture of hat and bonnet shapes; recovered rubber and rubber substitute; silver and German silver, in sheets, for manufacturing purposes; steel of No. 20 gauge and thinner, but not thinner than No. 20 gauge, to be used in the manufacture of corset steels, clock springs, and shoe shanks, when imported by the manufacturers of such articles for use in their factories; cotton finer than No. 40, unbleached, bleached or dyed, and not finer than No. 60, for the manufacture of Italian cloths and worsted fabrics; steel, in sheets of not less than 11 or over 18 wire gauge, and costing not less than $75 per ton of 2,240 pounds, when imported by manufacturers of shovels and spades for use exclusively in such manufacture in their own factories; red liquor, a crude acetate of alumina, prepared from pyroligneous acid for dyeing and calico printing; iron liquor, solution of acetate of iron, for dyeing and calico printing.

Also, by adding the following unenumerated articles to the free list. Precious stones, viz.:

Agate, amethyst, aqua marine, blood stone, carbuncle, cats eyes, cameo, coral, cornelian, crystal, crysolite, crocodolite, emerald, garnet, intaglio, inlaid or incrustated stones, onyx, opal, pearl, ruby, sardonyx, sapphire, topaz and turquoise, not polished nor otherwise manufactured.

Some of these precious stones are named in the present tariff, but there are others not named, and a question has arisen with regard to them. Therefore, agates, amethysts, etc., are all named when not dressed or polished, as free, in order to prevent difficulties in working out the Tariff.

Bichromate of soda, sulphate of iron (copperas), indigo auxiliary, fancy grasses, dried but not colored or otherwise; oil cake meal, paintings in oil or water colors, the production of Canadian artists, under regulations to be made by the Minister of Customs.

Now, Canadian artists go to Paris or Rome, and execute paintings while there, and we thought it right, that when they brought them home to Canada, they should be admitted free. At present they are subject to a duty. By adding to the following articles now on the free list, the explanations and additions attached to each respectively: Bolting cloths, of silk or worsted, not made up. At present the question arises as to whether brass bolting cloth should not be admitted free, and it is in order to settle this question that bolting cloth, silk or worsted should be specified. Borax, not ground or otherwise manufactured. Articles have been admitted as borax which have been found to contain very little of that substance, and therefore the article dealt with by this resolution is confined to unground borax. Duck for belting and hose, when imported by manufacturers of rubber goods for use in their factories; mineral water, natural, not in bottle; pitch, that is from pine, in packages of not less than 15 gallons. It has been found that attempts have been made to enter as pitch articles for medicinal purposes in smaller packages, and it is in order to define what was no doubt the intention of Parliament, that we now declare that pitch in barrels only shall be admitted free. Pumice and pumice stone, ground or unground. A question has arisen between the different collectors as to whether ground pumice stone is a manufactured article, and we now place both ground and unground on the free list. Quercitron or extract of oak bark, for tanning; resin, in packages of not less than 15 gallons; steel railway bars or rails, not including tram or street rails. The Customs Department have for years decided that tram or street rails are subject to duty. They have ruled to that effect. But we ask for a declaration by Parliament on the point, so that no question can arise in the future. Tar, pine, in packages of not less than 15 gallons. We come now to articles in regard to which we propose to change the duty. By repealing all duties chargeable under any Act now in force or any of the articles hereinafter mentioned, except so far as they are the same as those hereinafter mentioned. Costume cloths, serges and similar fabrics, under 25 inches wide, 25 per cent. ad valorem. We now come to the wincey question, which it has been found almost impossible to solve, and as parties are now manufacturing this class of goods in Canada we propose to place the duty at 25 per cent. ad valorem. Pickles and sauces increased from 20 to 25 per cent. ad valorem; bottles pay 30 per cent. and vinegar pays a higher rate than 20 per cent. Those engaged in the trade therefore very properly ask that they should be placed in a fair position, and we propose to place the duty at 25 per cent. Barrels containing petroleum or its products, or any mixture of which petroleum is a part, a specific duty of 40 cent each. A difficulty has arisen with respect to the value of barrels and this change is the solution of that difficulty. Cutlery, not otherwise provided for, 25 per cent. ad valorem. In 1879 cutlery was not made in Canada and it was left at the regular tariff rate. Cutlery, knives and forks, are now made extensively here, and it is proposed to give the makers the benefit of another 5 per cent. Red prussiate of potash, 10 per cent. ad valorem. Mouldings of wood, plain, 25 per cent.; 25 per cent. is the present rate of duty on plain wood mouldings, but mouldings are introduced in a finished condition, and all that is required to convert them into picture frames is to cut them into certain lengths and put them together. Picture frames come under the head of furniture, for which the duty is 35 per cent. For the future, mouldings, gilded or otherwise advanced in manufacture, will be charged 30 per cent., being an increase of 5 per cent. Imitations of precious stones, not set, 10 per cent. instead of 20 per cent. Jewellery will remain at 20 per cent., because if a higher duty was imposed much smuggling would occur. We do not, therefore, propose to add anything to jewellery, but to give Canadian manufacturers the benefit of 10 per cent. on imitation precious stones. Manilla hoods, 20 per cent. instead of 25 per cent. This is an article which will be imported and finished in Canada. Umbrellas, parasols and sun shades of all kinds and materials, 30 per cent. At present the manufacturers have to pay 30 per cent. on silk, and we shall be able to get over the difficulty experienced by the Customs Department by placing all these goods at one rate of duty. China and porcelainware, 30 per cent. This is an increase of 5 per cent. Chinaware paid less duty than the coarser now manufactured in Canada, and it is proposed to remedy the anomaly by placing all at 30 per cent. House furnishing hardware, 30 per cent. Difficulty has arisen in connection with this matter. For instance, some articles have been entered at 20 per cent., as castings, and in order to remove the difficulty all furnishing hardware will be 30 per cent. Chains, iron or steel, over $\frac{9}{16}$ inch in diameter, 5 per cent. They are now charged 5 per cent. ad valorem when used for ships, but it is found that parties import this article in connection with the lumber trade, and therefore we propose to place all articles of this class at 5 per cent. Acid, acetic, specific duty of 25 cents per imperial gallon and 20 per cent. ad valorem. It has been found that importers have brought in a gallon of acetic acid of sufficient strength to make 20 gallons of vinegar, and it has much interfered with the vinegar manufacturers as well as revenue. Tissue paper, white and colored, when imported by manufacturers of artificial flowers for use in their factories, 10 per cent. Glucose syrup, 2 cents per lb. Carpets, Brussels, tapestry, Dutch, Venetian and damask, 25 per cent. Plate glass, not colored, in panes not over 30 square feet, 6 cents per square foot; plate glass, in panes over 30 and not over 70 square feet, 8 cents per square foot; plate glass, in panes over 70 square feet, 9 cents per square foot. Colored labels, for fruit, vegetables, meat, fish, confectionery and other goods, also tickets, posters, advertising bills and folders, 10 cents per lb. and 20 per cent.; sheet iron, hollow ware, and all manufactures of sheet iron not elsewhere specified, 25 per cent. These goods now pay that amount, but owing to the different rulings at different ports it was considered advisable to name them, and thus to enable the departments to escape the difficulties which now beset them in that respect. Asbestos in any form other than crude, and all manufactures thereof, 25 per cent. This article is now manufactured in Canada; the duty in the United States is 25 per cent., and as we have plenty of the raw material it has been considered advisable to increase the duty. Axle grease, and similar combinations, a specific duty of 1 cent per pound; cotton bed quilts, exclusive of counterpanes and woven quilts, 27½ per cent., ad valorem; print cottons now pay 27½ per cent., and if these articles were made in the country the manufacturers would have to buy the material here, or import it at 27½ per cent.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

duty, and the duty collected on counterpanes would only be 20 per cent., so that this change will place them in the same position as the manufacturers of print cotton. Extract of fluid beef, not medicated, 25 per cent. ad valorem. This article is being made in Canada successfully, and it is considered fair to give them the benefit of the additional 5 per cent. It is quite clear from the returns received down to the present time and from the adoption of the Scott Act by so many districts that we will lose a considerable Excise revenue next year; and as cigars manufactured in the Dominion of Canada to-day pay into the Treasury but 10 per cent. of their value of Excise duty, it was thought, as the general revenue tariff is 20 per cent., that the Government might fairly collect from cigars a portion of the revenue they will lose on spirits and malt. It is proposed that on cigars of all descriptions, made in whole or in part from foreign or imported leaf tobacco, or any substitute therefor, an excise duty of $6 per thousand—which is double the duty at present paid, making it about 20 per cent. that the consumer will have to pay instead of 10. On cigars of all descriptions made solely from tobacco grown in Canada, and in manufactories where no foreign leaf is used or kept, the duty shall be $3 per thousand instead of $1.50. On wet snuff a specific duty of 12 cents, when put up in packages of less than five pounds. The present duty is 8 cents. The trade are anxious to put up snuff in small packages, and to pay the additional duty, and we are willing to take the money and let them have the advantage. On cigars and cigarettes, the Customs duty, specific, to be just double what it is now. It is now 60 cents per pound, and the new duty will be $1.20 specific and 20 per cent. ad valorem. These are the propositions by which we expect to get back a considerable portion of the money we are liable to lose on spirits and malt liquors during next year. Then we propose the following resolution:—

Resolved, that it is expedient to repeal so much of Schedule A of chapter 15, 42 Victoria, as imposes a duty of 10 per cent. ad valorem on "endless felt for paper makers."

This article is now made in Canada, and it is proposed to strike out that exception, and as the manufacturers are prepared to furnish it at a reasonable price, there is no reason why they should not be permitted to do so. Further:

And the following parts of chapter 13, 46 Victoria, intituled, "An Act further to amend the tariff of duties of Customs," viz:—Item number 7, of section 2, and all of section 5, of the said Act; also to repeal section 9, chapter 15, 42 Victoria, intituled, "An Act to alter the duties of Customs and Excise," and to enact as follows:—In determining the dutiable value of goods, there shall be added to the actual wholesale price, or fair market value thereof—at the time of exportation—in the principal markets of the country from whence the same has been imported into Canada, all costs of inland transportation, shipment and trans-shipment, whether by land or by water, with all expenses included from the places of growth, production or manufacture, to the vessel in which shipment is made, and to and at the port from which such vessel finally clears for her outward voyage direct to Canada.

It will be remembered that from the application of this principle Great Britain was exempted, and when in England, last year, a deputation waited on me at Liverpool, pointing out the disadvantage under which they were placed by this provision which was intended for their benefit. Great difficulties have resulted from the importation of iron and the charges on it, and the merchants of Liverpool begged that we should either place a specific duty on iron or make the duty payable on the cost on board ship, and thereby obviate the difficulty which existed in Great Britain on this subject. It is proposed to make this change:

When any manufactured article is imported into Canada in separate parts, each such part shall be charged with the same rate of duty as the finished article, on a proportionate valuation, and when the duty chargeable thereon is specific or specific and ad valorem, an average rate of ad valorem duty equal to the specific or specific and ad valorem duty so chargeable shall be ascertained and charged upon such parts of manufactures.

There has been an attempt to bring in certain articles of manufacture and to evade the payment of the duties which Parliament intended to impose. It is proposed that we also add partridges, prairie fowl and woodcock to the articles the exportation of which is now prohibited. It is found that the shooting of these birds has been prohibited for a time in most of the States of the Union, and the result is that we have been overrun by people during the last year, who buy the birds and encourage their destruction. Before the adoption of the system of freezing the birds there was only a limited period after the frost set in during which they could export them; but they have established places at which they have freezing houses, and they have taken them in by thousands and sent them out of the country in that frozen condition. It is therefore thought necessary to take this step, in order to prevent the utter extermination of these birds.

Mr. MITCHELL. Have you nothing about cornmeal and flour?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The next change is as follows:

Resolved, that it is expedient to prohibit the importation into Canada of all goods manufactured or produced by prison labor, or which have been made within or in connection with any prison, gaol or penitentiary, and to attach a penalty to any such importation.

The Government have thought it advisable to ask Parliament to consider this question, because there are three large prisons in the United States in which labor is employed in manufacturing articles which are largely sent into Canada. They will not interfere with their own manufactures at home, and were we to double the duty they would, perhaps, still continue to send in the goods, to the destruction of the industries of the country; for while the honest labor of the country should receive, and has been receiving, $2 per day, those who hire prison labour pay only 35 cents per day. It has been considered advisable, in justice to the honest and industrious artisan of Canada, that he should be protected from that kind of labor.

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that on and after the 1st day of July next (1885) all fish imported shall be chargeable with, and there shall be collected thereon, the following rates of duty, viz.:-

- Mackerel, 1 cent per pound.
- Herring, pickled or salted, 1½ cents per pound.
- Salmon, pickled, 1 cent per pound.
- All other fish pickled, in barrels, 1 cent per pound.
- Foreign codfish, imported otherwise than in barrels or half barrels, whether fresh, smoked, dried salted or pickled, not especially enumerated or provided for by this Act, 50 cents per 100 pounds.

We have adopted the exact words of the American Tariff and the rate at present imposed in the United States, and unless some arrangements are made in the meantime, it is intended, on the 1st of July next, to collect on the fish named when imported from our American neighbors the same duty that they will collect from us after that date.

Anchovies and sardines, packed in oil or otherwise, in tin boxes measuring not more than 5 inches long, 4 inches wide and 3½ inches deep, 5 cents per whole box.

Their duty is 10 cents; but it was thought that rate would be a practical prohibition, and therefore we placed on the different sized boxes of sardines and anchovies only half the duty they collect.

In half boxes measuring not more than five inches long, four inches wide and one and five-eighths deep, 2½ cents each; and in quarter boxes measuring not more than four inches and three-quarters long, three and one-half inches wide and one and a-quarter deep, 2 cents each; when imported in any other form, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Fish preserved in oil, except anchovies and sardines, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Salmon and all other fish prepared or preserved, not specially enumerated or provided for in this Act, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Oil, spermacetti, whale and other fish oils, and all other articles the produce of the fisheries, not specially provided for, 20 per cent. ad valorem.

These are the terms exactly of their Act, but we add this provision:

Provided that the whole or part of the said duties hereby imposed may be remitted upon proclamation of the Governor in Council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that the Governments of the United States and the island of Newfoundland, or either of them, have made changes in their tariffs of duties imposed upon articles imported from Canada, in reduction or repeal of the duties in force in said countries.

In the case of Newfoundland, for instance, there may be no great object in their imposing duties on Canadian fish; but it may be in the interest of Canada to make arrangements with the Government of that colony that in return for a reduction of duties on flour or other products of Canada, we will reduce or remove the duty on fish imported from Newfoundland. We are naturally anxious to have all the trade possible with Newfoundland, and also with the United States, but on equitable terms.

Mr. CHARLTON. If the Finance Minister will allow me, I will call his attention to a precedent with regard to these tariff resolutions, which, I believe, he would have been wise to follow. I find in the Budget Speech of my hon. friend at my right (Sir Richard Cartwright) made in 1874—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to consider for a few moments evidence to show that the Dominion of Canada during the last five years, and even during the last year, has been in a much more hopeful condition than hon. gentlemen opposite would have us believe. I take, for instance, the deposits in the chartered banks of Canada.

Mr. MITCHELL. Would the hon. Minister, before he proceeds to that branch of the subject, inform us whether he proposes to take the duty off cornmeal, or to increase the duty on flour.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I do not propose to deal with that question to-night.

	$16,284,940		$56,425,936

It may be said by my predecessor that the increased amount of deposits in saving banks is no evidence of the prosperity of the country. But I would call the hon. member's attention to a letter he addressed to intending investors in Canadian securities in 1875, in which he pointed out to capitalists that there had been a very great increase in the deposits in the banks and saving banks of the country. Therefore, I hope the hon. gentleman will consider it some evidence of the prosperity of the country and the financial condition of the people that they have increased their deposits in the banks from $16,000,000 to $55,000,000. The capital expended on factories since 1878-79, as shown by the return presented, is something like $44,000,000. So that, from 1879 down to the end of June last, by the deposits in chartered banks, in saving banks and loan companies, by the purchase of loan companies' debentures, and by expenditure in factories, the people of this country have invested about $100,000,000 in the manner stated. I might go further and point to the additional mileage of railways which has been built and which has involved the expenditure of a large sum of money. I might point to the different cities in Canada, where millions have been expended in the construction of houses that have found tenants since 1879, when those alongside of the recent erections were previously to let but now occupied. We might go further and speak of the other investments since 1879 to show that the people of Canada, and especially the masses of the people, must have had a very handsome surplus during those periods from their earnings which they have thus laid by for a wet day. An hon. gentleman opposite referred to what he termed the exorbitant rate of interest that is paid to depositors in the savings banks as one of the reasons for increased deposits. When I called his attention to the fact that we offered less inducements since 1880 to depositors than our predecessors had, the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) rose and with some degree of triumph expressed in his face said: Well, we simply continued the policy pursued by our predecessors. We, on this side, considered it a compliment that they should have found it desirable in the interests of the country to follow our precedent, but I do not know that it was a justification for their course, considering the line they have taken in complaining of the lower rate now paid. It has been said that a great injustice has been done to the people of the country, especially to the banks of the country, and to the men who obtain discounts, because the Government now give 4 per cent.—formerly, in many cases they gave 5, but to-day, we only pay interest beginning the month after the deposit is made. No interest is paid on any deposit during the month in which it is deposited. It is said this is an exorbitant rate, that we should not pay more than 3 per cent., and that then the banks would have more money to loan to their customers. If we will look at the returns of the banks, we will find that the most of them have as much money to loan as they can find good customers for. The Government are prepared to take this stand, that while it is of the utmost importance to obtain for Canada money on the lowest terms possible, the depositors of small sums, the hard working people of the country, the men and women who want a safe place to deposit their money, should have the fullest amount of interest this country is warranted in giving. An hon. gentleman said why the rate of interest has been reduced from 30 to 40 per cent. since 1878. I examined the rate of interest charged by the banks in 1878, and I find that it is just the same as it is to-day. There is, therefore, no reason why we should say to the 100,000 depositors you must take less than 4 per cent., in order that the banks may make more money out of their deposits. No, Sir, the policy of this Government is to grant the greatest benefit possible to the largest number of persons, and we feel that in paying 4 per cent. interest to the depositors we are paying them a fair rate of interest, taking all things into consideration. In 1879 what was the value of bank stocks compared with their values to-day? This paper has been handed to me by a gentleman who I asked to look into this question:

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

PRICES OF BANK STOCKS IN MONTREAL.

	Jan. 1st, 1879.	Jan. 1st, 1885.
Bank of Montreal.....	139	187
Molsons Bank.....	62	109
Merchants Bank.....	79	109
Eastern Townships.....	92½	107½
Commerce.....	101	117
Toronto Bank.....	118	175
Telegraph Company.....	185½	113

Mr. MACKENZIE. Take 1878.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. In 1878 the weeding out of the bad debts made during the previous years led, of course, to a reduction in the value of stocks, but when these bad debts were ascertained, they started in 1879 knowing exactly the basis upon which they stood. It would appear that the business operations of the Dominion had not been disastrous during the last five years, judging by the statement I have just given. I stated something about the rate of interest charged by the banks in 1884. The following statement shows it:—

1884—Rates of discount at Montreal, 7 to 8 per cent. throughout the year.
Loans on stock collateral varied from 5 to 6 per cent.
1879—Commercial discount easy at 7 to 8 per cent. for the first 7 months of the year; firm at same rates during the fall and easy again after harvest.
Stock loans range from 4 to 6 per cent., until December, when they advanced to 6 and 7 per cent.

We now come to the mileage of railways, to show what has been done during the last ten years. The following statement shows the railway mileage from 1875 to 1884, constructed and open. Statement of railway mileage, 1875 to 1884:

	Constructed. Miles.	Opened. Miles.
1876.....	5,157
1877.....	5,574
1878.....	6,865	6,143
1879.....	7,077	6,484
1880.....	7,229	6,891
1881.....	7,596	7,260
1882.....	8,069	7,530
1883.....	9,066	8,805

This gives some evidence, I think, of the development of the country. Then with reference to the number of failures in Canada of which we have heard so much lately, there has been a very considerable increase; but if we take the five years from 1875 to 1879 inclusive, we find that the number of failures was 9,185, with liabilities amounting to $143,128,724. From 1879 to 1885 there were 5,040 failures, with liabilities of $57,467,724. The number of people engaged in business in 1884 in Canada was 69,924, so that the number of failures for that year would be equal to one failure for every 53 traders. Taking 56,000 traders, the number engaged in business during the five years ending 31st December, 1879, the average would be equal to one failure to 30½ traders; and taking 69,924 traders as the basis of the five years ending 31st December, 1885, the average would be equal to one failure to 75½ traders. Now a word or two as to the general condition of the country, and of the laborers of the country. I have before me an extract made recently from a speech of the leader of the Opposition, and I have a statement in tabulated form of the value of the different classes of labor in Canada, taken from the Bureau of Statistics of Ontario. There may be a question raised by the Opposition as to the statement made by the commissioners, that they were prepared by the employés of the Dominion Government, but as regards the statement made up in the Bureau of Statistics of Ontario, I am quite sure hon. gentlemen opposite will accept it as quite correct. Mr. Blake, speaking at Toronto, attributed the prosperity of that city in part to the absence of highly protected manufactures, and as a consequence labor is better paid there than in other cities. I would call the attention of the House to one or two important facts.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not say that; that is not my speech.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Oh, it has been given to me as taken from the Globe.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is a bad source to get it from.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I think it is just what the hon. gentleman might say. But this is noticeable: One gentleman who has a seat on the other side of the House visits Montreal, and makes a speech to the Montreal people, pointing out the terribly distressed condition of Canada and its people, that the emigration from it is marvellous, that the taxation is something unprecedented, and in making his statement he finds it necessary, if correctly reported, to refer to the fact that in Montreal perhaps they had not experienced as much of this depression as they had elsewhere. I can imagine that, comparing the condition of Montreal to-day with what it was in 1878, a great many of that audience, if they were told they were in a worse condition than they were in 1878, would question the statement somewhat. It was found necessary for the hon. gentleman to refer to that fact, and, supposing that this report also was correct, it was an evidence that my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, speaking in Toronto, found it necessary to call the attention of the audience to the fact that matters were not as bad in Toronto as they were in some other places.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear. So I did.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That is correct, then. That is very natural—that is what I wanted to get at—that matters in Toronto were better than they were elsewhere; and the statement which was given to me, and which he says is not correct—and, of course, I accept his statement—is that this was attributable to the fact that there were not as many highly protected industries there.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman added, “and that therefore labor was better paid there.” I said that I did not make that statement.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. But still Toronto was in a better condition; matters were better in Toronto than in other places, because there were not so many highly protected industries there.

Mr. BLAKE. No; I did not say that.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. If the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) were making a speech in Brantford, where I am informed a quarter of a million of dollars have been expended in buildings in the last year, he would, no doubt, say that Brantford is an exception to other places. It would appear that, wherever hon. gentlemen go, it is necessary to show that the locality they visit is a favored locality. I think that, if I wanted to make a case, I would go to the locality which was the worst, and would point out to them their condition, and if they were warranted in the statement that it was the result of the National Policy, it would be endorsed by them and would have a greater effect. What said the hon. the leader of the Opposition:—

“I have no hesitation in saying to you that there is one test which I have always sought to supply when I have desired to consider what the material condition of the country was, and that test was, what is the material condition of the lowest class of honest labor in the country?”

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes, and I endorse the whole of it:

“If I find the lowest class so fairly paid that there is enough for the support of a man and those dependent upon him, and something to lay up for a rainy day, I know that I need enquire no further.”

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Well, I may say that the tables show a state of affairs which will enable me to comfort the hon. gentleman by showing it to him. This is taken from the statement of the Bureau of Statistics of Ontario, and it shows that the blacksmiths and their helpers, the boiler makers and their helpers, the bricklayers, the carriage-builders, the carpenters, the cigar makers, the cotton mill men and their laborers, the machinists, the moulders, the painters, the plasterers and their laborers, the printers, the sewing machine men, the tin and coppersmiths and the tool-makers, have a surplus averaging $18 at the end of the year, comparing the receipts with their expenses during the year. This will be a comfort, I am sure, to the hon. gentleman. It appears that the plasterers are put down as costing more to live than any of the others. I do not know why that should be the case. Of course, they are not employed as many days in the year as some others, and their receipts would be less, but I cannot understand why they should expend more than the others. It is stated that the laborer works 265 days in the year, that he averages $1.13 per day, that his yearly wages are $304, and his expenditure $255, which leaves $49 for him as a surplus at the end of the year, and for a rainy day. This statement should make the hon. gentleman supremely happy. He should accept the condition of Ontario at least as prosperous, when the laborer receives a surplus over his actual wants and expenses. The leader of the Opposition, referring to the state of the country generally, in his speech on the Address, alluded to the city of St. John, the constituency I have the honor of representing. I cannot take exception to the tone of his language on that occasion, but his declaration was that, for forty years, as he had been informed, matters had not been as bad in the city of St. John as they are at present. I think I know something of the city of St. John as far back as forty years, and I have seen several periods since 1845 when the people of that city were in a much worse condition than they are to-day. I recollect when the laborers in that city, in order that they might be saved from great want, were employed by the corporation at 1s. 6d., or 30 cents a day to cut down the rocks of that city. I know that, under the peculiar circumstances of the country at that particular time, there was great want felt everywhere throughout the Province. I know there was great depression. I know that has occurred two or three times since the date to which I refer, but to a less limited extent. Nothing of that kind exists at the present day. But I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that the city of St. John especially labors at this moment under certain disadvantages. Previous to 1873, there was a large ship-building interest in that Province. I know that in 1854 there were constructed 106,000 tons of vessels. It was then a very important industry in the Maritime Provinces, and especially in the Province of New Brunswick. At that time the city of St. John was the principal point where deals were manufactured from logs brought there. Now, a very large portion of the deals are manufactured near Fredericton, by Mr. Gibson, in mills owned and leased by him. The result has been that owing to the depreciation in the value of shipping, owing to the decreased demand for wooden vessels, owing to the depression in the shipping interests being so great at this moment that there is scarcely any demand for even iron ships in the old country, there is but a limited number of vessels being built in the Province of New Brunswick or the city of St. John to-day. And, Sir, were it not for the new industries that are being established and that are taking the place of those that will not be restored to the position which they occupied from 1854 to 1868, there would be in that city and Province to-day an amount of depression much greater than that which now exists. The industries to which I refer have been replaced by other industries, and other manufactures have been brought into existence, and fostered by the operation of this tariff. Perhaps, Sir, it may not be out of place for me to say that to-night, in the city of St. John, there is depression and gloom. Unhappily within the last 48 hours a representative of that city and county, and a member of this House, has been summoned hence—a gentleman with whom I acted in concert for many years, a warm and a true friend and an honorable opponent, a gentleman I regretted to separate from on political issues, a gentleman universally respected and esteemed in that city, a kind father and an affectionate husband, a most enterprising citizen, and an able and zealous member of Parliament, has been taken away and to-day that city mourns. I take this opportunity, though politically opposed to each other of late years, of paying this passing tribute to his memory, because there are few men who could be removed from the city of St. John who will be more missed, whose loss will be more deeply felt, than that of the late ex-Minister of Customs. Sir, when I look at the country to-day and think what might have been its condition if we had not, in 1879, by the action of Parliament, established new industries in Canada, I think it is not so much a question of what depression exists to-day as it is of what would have been the depression in Canada had we not adopted a policy that has brought into existence the industries that have given employment, and are giving employment at the present moment to 50,000 more men and women than were thus employed in 1878. Sir, we know perfectly well that throughout Canada almost every city has thought it advisable to spend large sums of money for sanitary purposes. Take the city of Ottawa, for instance. When we came here in 1867 it was not as healthy a city to live in as it is at present. A large sum of money has been expended in the drainage and in procuring a supply of pure water. I know, myself, as a resident of the city and a house owner, that it costs more for water than it did when I first came here. But, at the same time, the reduction in insurance upon my property has been equal to the increased taxation, and the sum expended has given increased sanitary advantages to the city. And so it is in nearly all the cities of the Dominion of Canada. Sir, suppose that an epidemic should prevail here next year; suppose the cholera should, unhappily, be introduced into the cities of Canada, and large numbers of the population should be swept off by it. Why, Sir, it would be as inconsistent for some of the inhabitants of the towns to give as an evidence of the unwisdom of the expenditure for sanitary purposes, that the mortality had been increased by reason of this epidemic, and therefore to condemn that expenditure, though the death rate was not as great as formerly, as it would be for hon. gentlemen opposite, while this epidemic of bad trade exists all over the world, and has reached us to a certain extent, to denounce the protective policy because there are a few manufacturing factories that are not employed full time, and who have a less number of men engaged in them than they had six months or a year ago. I think the country understands this question very well, and I believe it will be found necessary for hon. gentlemen opposite, wherever they go, to use the language that has been used in some other cases, namely, that the locality in which they are speaking suffers less than other localities. Sir, I must apologise to you and the House for the time I have taken in quoting so many figures in laying these matters before Parliament. On former occasions, when referring to the amount of taxation per head of the population, I have merely stated the figures, but in this case I thought it necessary, in order to fortify myself, to take figures from the Public Accounts and from official documents of the United States, and submit them for your consideration, as proof of the position I have taken. I feel that whatever may be the opinion expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite, the fact that the Pacific Railway has been completed, and that the large amount of money expended on the canals in order to complete them, with the light taxation I have mentioned, warrants me in saying that the taxation of the country has not been increased. When you take into account the amount that has been contributed for the support of the Provinces by the legislation of last year, and when, notwithstanding all these liabilities so incurred, the net interest paid upon the debt is only 1 or 2 cents per head more than was paid in 1879—I say when this is known, there will be a general feeling of relief in the country and a conviction that we have obtained wonderful advantages for the Dominion of Canada in developing its resources, in increasing the value of our magnificent estate in the North-West, in laying the foundation for a powerful nation, and in enabling us to realize that we are a great and prosperous people, and at the same time are subjected to smaller taxation than almost any other country in the world. Mr. Speaker, I move that you do now leave the Chair and that the House resolve itself into Committee on the following Resolutions:—

I. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Tariff of Customs Duties and schedule of free goods, as follows:—

When any manufactured article is imported into Canada in separate parts, each such part shall be charged with the same rate of duty as the finished article on a proportionate valuation, and when the duty chargeable thereon is specific, or specific and ad valorem, an average rate of ad valorem duty, equal to the specific or specific and ad valorem duty so chargeable, shall be ascertained and charged upon such parts of manufactures.

Also to add partridge, prairie fowl and woodcock to the articles the exportation of which is prohibited by section 9, chapter 13, 46 Victoria.

3. Resolved, That it is expedient to prohibit the importation to Canada of all goods manufactured or produced by prison labor, or which have been made within or in connection with any prison, gaol or penitentiary, and to attach a penalty to any such importation.

4. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that on and after the 1st day of July next (1885), all fish imported shall be chargeable with and there shall be collected thereon the following rates of duty, viz.:—

Mackerel, 1 cent per lb.

Herrings, pickled or salted, ½ cent per lb.

Salmon, pickled, 1 cent per lb.

All other fish, pickled, in barrels, 1 cent per lb.

Foreign-caught fish, imported otherwise than in barrels or half-barrels, whether fresh, smoked, dried, salted or pickled, not specially enumerated or provided for by this Act, 50 cents per 100 lbs.

Anchovies and sardines, packed in oil or otherwise, in tin boxes measuring not more than 6 inches long, 4 inches wide and 3½ inches deep, 5 cents per whole box; in half boxes, measuring not more than 5 inches long, 4 inches wide and 1½ deep, 2½ cents each; and in ¼ boxes, measuring not more than 4½ inches long, 3½ inches wide, 1½ deep, 2 cents each.

When imported in any other form, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Fish, preserved in oil, except anchovies and sardines, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Salmon and all other fish, prepared or preserved, not specially enumerated or provided for in this Act, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Oil, spermaceti, whale and other fish oils, and all other articles the produce of the fisheries, not specially provided, for 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Provided that the whole or part of the said duties hereby imposed may be remitted upon proclamation of the Governor in Council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that the Governments of the United States and the Island of Newfoundland or either of them have made changes in their tariffs of duties imposed upon articles imported from Canada in reduction or repeal of the duties in force in said countries.

Resolved, That there be imposed:—

1. On cigars of all descriptions, made in whole or in part from foreign or imported leaf tobacco, or any substitute therefor, an Excise duty of $6.000 per thousand.
2. On cigars of all descriptions made solely from tobacco grown in Canada and made in a manufactory where no foreign or imported leaf is used or kept, $3.00 per thousand.
3. On wet snuff, a specific duty of 12 cents per lb., when put up in packages of less than 5 lbs.
4. Cigars and cigarettes, a specific duty of $1.20 per lb., and 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, the task that lies before me to-night is one that I fear will be a disagreeable, as well, perhaps, as of a somewhat delicate character. Up to the present time I have not considered it necessary to pay much attention to the allegations so freely and so constantly hurled across the floor by hon. Ministers and their supporters, that it was a most unpatriotic thing on our part to prick any of their bubbles, or to tell the truth when the interests of the country required it to be told. I have always held, Mr. Speaker, than when hon. gentlemen opposite say that it is unpatriotic to make any particular statements about their actions, it meant simply this, that they are aware that there is no excuse whatever which can be offered for their conduct, and, therefore, they find it convenient to charge us with want of patriotism. But, on the present occasion, I am bound to say, that taking the view I do of the situation of the country, knowing what I know, having examined the data and facts, to some of which, but only to some of which, the hon. Minister has called our attention, I could wish, if it were permitted to me, if I could reconcile it with my ideas of my duty to the people who sent me here, not to be called upon to speak, not to be required to dissect the statements which the hon. gentleman has made, not, in a word, to say here what I believe to be the real facts about the state of the country. Unfortunately, it is not permitted to me to do that. I say, unfortunately, because I know that, in the present instance, much of what I have to say may grate unpleasantly on the ears of the hon. gentleman and his supporters. I am only too well aware, that those hon. gentlemen do not like to have their attention called to certain facts, however well those facts may be known, however clearly established those facts may be, when they interfere with the pet theories which the hon. gentleman has just been elaborating. Now, Sir, I hold that the position of this country has been very seriously compromised indeed by the misconduct of hon. gentlemen opposite. I say that it is needful for us to point out the causes, because our criticisms would otherwise be valueless, and although some temporary inconvenience may be risked by such a course, still I say that it is the only course from which any permanent benefit can possibly result to the people of this country. Sir, that conviction has been increased by what I must call the rash statements which have been made recently in various places both by the First Minister and by the Finance Minister. I quarrel with no man for saying the best he can of the position of the country; but I doubt if the First Minister was wise, or was well advised when, on a comparatively recent occasion in London, he intimated that it was desirable there should be a large emigration to Canada. I fear, Sir, if his words bore the weight which those of a man in his position might be expected to bear, and if many emigrants had come to Canada, even to the Province of Ontario, on the faith of the statement, and against the advice of the trades unions and the trades councils, they would have found themselves in the position in which many other emigrants found themselves who were brought out to this country at the public expense by hon. gentlemen opposite, namely, that the only way in which they could have provided for themselves was by depriving some native-born Canadian of his proper and lawful employment. I am sorry that the hon. Minister who has just sat down should have deemed it necessary on this occasion to indulge in language somewhat similar to that used by the First Minister. The First Minister, perhaps, may be excused for not knowing so much as to the condition of the country as the Finance Minister is expected to know. I am sorry, therefore, that the Finance Minister should have indulged in some of the statements in which he has indulged, and which I shall feel it my duty to analyse and dissect before I go much further. I can hardly doubt that the Finance Minister does himself know that the situation is serious, although he would not admit it to-night. Although he appeared to have chosen deliberately to shut his eyes to a great many facts which ought to have warned him, I cannot doubt that the Finance Minister does know that the position of Canada at present is very far indeed from that in which he and I would wish it to be. In the speech just made by the hon. gentleman, he brought forward, as he said himself, a great many facts, not, the House will observe, by any means so much directed to the present condition of the country, not by any means so much directed to what he supposes to be the future condition of the country, as to comparisons with a period eighteen months or two years ago. There are certain rough tests by which, I think, you can determine with pretty considerable accuracy the condition of the country at the present time, and these I mean to employ. They are tests which the hon. Minister has often used, tests which on other and more favorable occasions the Minister has found it very convenient to employ, but from which he shrunk most carefully on the present occasion. We will take, first, the state of the revenue; next, the present amount, not merely of our nominal, but of our real taxation; we will take the volume of trade, the rate of increase in our population; the profits of our leading occupations, the number of bankruptcies, the number of persons unemployed in this country, the rate of wages, bank and railway statements; we will apply these successively, and we will see what the result is. First, I call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the present condition of the revenue. In 1833 we had a revenue of $35,794,000. In 1884 that revenue had fallen to $31,861,000, a reduction of very nearly four million. On 1st February, 1884, our receipts amounted to $18,846,000. On 1st February last our receipts from all sources amounted to $18,465,000. We had lost nearly $400,000 in receipts on the operations of those seven months. In 1833 our expenditure amounted to $28,730,000, and in 1884 it was $31,107,000, or a difference in those two years of nearly $7,000,000. Our receipts were less by $4,000,000, and our expenditure was more by about $2,500,000. We find that on 1st February, 1884, our expenditure was $18,026,000; on 1st February, 1885, $19,513,000, so we are in a worse position by $1,500,000. The hon. gentleman appeared to think that because a new tariff was about to be brought down and changes made, and therefore some considerable addition had been made to our revenue in the past month, that all would be well. I call his attention to these pertinent facts. In 1876, on 1st February, we had a deficiency of $694,000. And as the House knows, we had a deficit at the end of that year. In 1877 there was a deficit of $304,000 on the 1st of February and a deficit at the end of the year. On the 1st of February, 1878, we had a surplus of $706,000, but nevertheless a deficit. On the 1st of February, 1879—and the same is true of 1880—we had also very considerable deficits, and deficits also at the end of the year; and taking all those years, except perhaps the last, on the 1st of March we had a distinct surplus. So that I fear the hon. gentleman is innocently deceiving himself, and is misleading the House, if he thinks there is any fair ground for anticipating that the income of the next four months is likely so far to overpass the expenditure for the next two months as to give him any reasonable surplus, even the very moderate surplus on which I understood he calculated. Now, Sir, there is another thing to which I call the attention of the House. On the 1st of July, 1883, the gross debt of Canada stood at $202,159,000. On the 1st of July, 1881, it had risen to $242,000,000; on the 17th of February it was given by the hon. gentleman himself at $258,000,000; and there is only too much reason to fear that before the 1st of July, 1885, is reached, that debt will stand at $270,000,000, judging from the statements made in the Public Accounts, which are now in our hands. Now, Sir, I do not enter into a computation of the net debt and the net assets for this reason: that there is no possibility that I and the hon. gentleman can agree in estimating what the value of the net assets will be. But we can see for ourselves that in a little more than eighteen months that debt has increased nearly $60,000,000, and that the probability is very strong that it will have increased $70,000,000 between the 1st of July, 1883, and the 1st of July, 1885. And I put it to the common sense of the House, is that state of the revenue and the public debt a token of prosperity? Are those, Sir, evidences that this country is in a wholesome and healthy state? Now, Sir, as to the amount of taxation. We found that in 1884 our nominal taxation amounted to $25,485,000; our real taxation, according to my estimate—the money taken out of the pockets of the people, which did not find its way into the Treasury—was not less than $36,000,000; and if the statements made by the Finance Minister be correct, it was a very great deal more. Now, Sir, I come to another test; I take our volume of trade. I find that in 1873, before Prince Edward Island was admitted into the Confederacy, our total volume of trade, eleven years ago, stood at $217,801,000. This volume which has been laid on the Table, the Trade and Navigation Returns, shows that the total volume of the trade of Canada eleven years after that time, with Prince Edward Island added to the Union, amounts to $207,873,000. Again I ask, is that one of the evidences of rapid growth; is that one of the evidences of steadily increasing prosperity to which the hon. gentleman desires to call the attention of the people of Canada? Sir, this matter requires more attention at the hon. gentleman's hands than it has received. I find that in 1873 the exports of our own produce (and they are more favorable to him than the ordinary statement—which includes bullion and short returns) amounted to $73,240,000. I find that in 1884, on a statement which is not varied very greatly in 1883, our total exports of our own products amounted to $77,132,000, making the same deductions as before; so that in those eleven years, with the addition of Prince Edward Island and practically of Manitoba, our exports are almost absolutely stationary. Again I ask the hon. gentleman, does he consider the fact that in eleven years a young and growing country like Canada has not added 5 per cent. to its own exports, an evidence of rapid and growing prosperity? The hon. gentleman enlarged on the effect that his tariff had had on our trade with Great Britain. He takes five years of bad harvests, he compares them with another five years of substantially good harvests, he adds them together, and he divides the product. I say, Sir, that this is not the way to find out how the tariff has affected our trade with Great Britain. I will tell him exactly how it has affected our trade. Of our own produce, we sold to Great Britain, in 1873, $31,876,000; in 1884, $37,410,000 worth. We sold $6,000,000 more of our own produce to Great Britain in 1884 than we did in 1873, and from the people of Great Britain, with whom he desires to favor our trade, we bought, in 1873, $68,360,000, and in 1884, deducting bullion which he imported, I suppose to replace the gold the banks have drawn from him, we imported $41,826,000. We sold them $6,000,000 more than we did eleven years ago and we bought from them $26,000,000 less, and the hon. gentleman considers that a proof, I suppose, of how favorable his tariff has been to the interests of our trade with Great Britain. I apply the same rule to our exports to the United States. In 1873, deducting bullion and short returns, we sold to the people of the United States $33,416,000 worth of goods. In 1884 we sold $31,632,000 worth. We sold them about $2,000,000 more than in 1873, and deducting the goods in transit, with which the hon. gentleman has no right to complicate the account, although, I believe, he did it in many of his statements, we find that in 1873 we bought from the people of the United States $38,147,000; and in 1884 we bought $49,785,000—and that is the way in which we improved our trade with Great Britain and in which we diminished our trade with the United States. Our trade with Great Britain is $26,000,000 less than it was eleven years ago, and our trade with the United States is $12,000,000 more than it was eleven years ago. And, Sir, that is not all. Our trade with Great Britain was based on a much smaller population in 1873, and our trade with the United States in 1873 was much more in our favor than appears on the trade returns. Then it was we who did the smuggling; now it is the Americans who do the smuggling into this happy country. Then a large amount of such goods were sold to the Americans, and as the hon. gentleman knows, a great amount of goods are now sold by American merchants to their customers here which do not, by any means, go through our Custom offices. Then, I will give him another proof of how rapidly this country has improved under his fostering care. In 1878, of our own manufactures—and I hope he will attend to it—we sold $4,127,000 worth; in 1884, of our own manufactures we sold $3,500,000 worth—a most remarkable evidence of the skill of the hon. gentleman in fostering our general trade. But, Sir, there is another, and a much more important thing to which I call his attention, and it is this: The hon. gentleman has assumed a rate of increase of our population with which I can in no respect concur. The hon. gentleman stated just now that the whole population of Canada was 4,800,000.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Next year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What may happen between this and next year heaven only knows. I do not suppose the hon. gentleman pretends to omniscience though he may pretend to omnipotence in the matter of the tariff; but I can tell him that there is the strongest ground, unhappily, for believing that since 1881, since the last census was taken, the increase of population in Canada has been exceedingly small, and it is very doubtful, indeed, if to-day, exclusive of Indians, there are 4,400,000 people resident in Canada. Now, Sir, I am not going, considering the lateness of the hour, although I should have liked to do so, to enter minutely into this question; but I will tell the hon. gentleman this: I have looked over all the attempts that have been made to answer the calculation that I submitted to the people of Montreal, showing that there has been an enormous loss of population to Canada in the period covered by our census of 1861 and 1881. I showed there, and I repeat the statement here, that if you allow for the ordinary natural increase of our population from 1861 to 1881, and for the number of people who are alleged by our immigration returns to have come into this country, the total loss of population to Canada in that period must be reckoned by very many hundreds of thousands. Now, Sir, there is one point, and but one, to which exception may justly be taken. It may be that the rate of increase of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum, was a little larger than was warranted. With respect to that, I would just say this: We possess in Canada one body, and one body alone, of vital statistics which is really worthy of respect, that is, the statistics which—to their honor be it said—have been computed for many years by the Catholic clergy of Lower Canada. If the hon. gentleman or any of his friends choose to examine the statistics furnished by these clergymen as to the Catholic population of the Province of Quebec, they will find, both before and during that time, that my estimate of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. is perfectly correct; and if they choose further to examine the evidence from our own census returns, supposing them to be approximately accurate as to the ages of children, they will also find that, although it is quite true that the number of infants born in Quebec is greater than the number in Ontario, still the rate of infant mortality is so much greater among the children of Quebec than among those of Ontario, that by the time they have arrived at five years of age the proportion in favor of Ontario is fully made up; and, therefore, if $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. is established for Quebec, it also holds good for Ontario. I may add, if the hon. gentleman takes up the matter, that the increase in Canada, prior to the date I refer to, is greater than $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and that in the United States, when they had the same population as ours, it was very much greater than $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; and if the hon. gentleman chooses to look at the position of countries in the same position as ours, he will find that I am strictly accurate in stating that an enormous loss of population must have occurred in Canada during the twenty years to which I have alluded. I may add also that these facts are strongly confirmed by the census returns of the United States. Now, Sir, since April, 1881, it is quite true we have not absolute facts, we have only an exceedingly strong presumption to go upon. Sir, I have called attention again and again to the lamentable fact, that not only the ordinary returns of children between the ages of five and sixteen, in Ontario, which are furnished by the assessors, I believe, but the number of pupils actually enrolled in our schools, which furnishes the only substantial evidence we have, shows that from 1881 steadily down to the present hour, there has been a serious decrease year by year, at the rate of nearly 5,000 children per year, in the enrolled school population in the Province of Ontario. Now, Sir, I have heard one answer given to that statement, which I hoped the hon. gentleman who made it had never considered sufficiently. We are told that the school children in Ontario have decreased considerably in number because the population of Ontario, the greatest and richest Province of this Dominion, had been so degraded and reduced in circumstances, that they were no longer able to send the same number of children to school that they had sent formerly. If that be the argument, I give the hon. gentleman the alternative—either there has been a positive decrease in the population of Ontario or there has been a decrease in the standard of comfort or the capacity of educating their children among the people of Ontario. Now, Sir, I know my fellow-countrymen too well not to know the importance they attach to giving a good education to their children. I do not believe there has been that degradation in the condition of the population of Ontario. But, I believe there has been a decrease, and a serious decrease, in the population of that great Province. Now, Sir, we have no means of ascertaining what is going on in the Province of Quebec in that respect, but I am told that there is a very satisfactory means, if only the hon. gentleman chose to use it, and desire to get at the facts, of ascertaining whether the same decrease that has gone on in the Province of Ontario has also been experienced in the Province of Quebec. If hon. gentlemen wish to contradict me, and wish to prove the truth against me, they may apply to the heads of the Catholic Church in Quebec, and ask them to give in detail the returns, which I understand are annually given to them, of the population of the several parishes in that Province. In that way it will be easy to see whether or not I have been mistaken in the statements I have made, that the people of this country, since 1881, have left it in greater proportions than they ever did before.

Mr. FARROW. Where have they gone?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am afraid they have gone to swell the ranks of the neighboring Republic. But here is a fair challenge for these hon. gentlemen. I have the greatest respect for the statistics prepared by the Catholic clergy, and if hon. gentlemen desire to know the truth about this matter, I say they have the means in their hands, they can get that information in detail, and no doubt they will lay it on the Table of the House. If they decline my challenge, and do not choose to ascertain the facts, then the House will know that the statements made to me by many hon. gentlemen in this House coming from that Province, with reference to the lamentable exodus going on among the people of Quebec are absolutely true. I leave the hon. gentlemen to decide for themselves what they will do in that matter. Now, Sir, having dealt with this question of the rate of increase of the population, I would like to know what the hon. gentleman has got to say about the profits of the leading industries of Canada this year. Surely this House can recall the time when we were told that it was the duty of the Government to see that good prices were got for everything produced in the country. I ask the hon. gentleman has the price of lumber risen materially in the past year? Has the production of lumber increased under the operations of this beneficent policy? Does the hon. gentleman not know that for perhaps 30 years the prices of the leading cereals have not been so low in Canada as they are to-day? What of the prices of our stock? Have they risen under the beneficent influence of the hon. gentleman? How much dividends have our cotton mills been paying? What dividends have our sugar refineries declared? What is the present prosperous condition of these great iron industries into which the capitalists of the United States and the world were rushing to invest untold millions? What of all these new enterprises which were to spring up under the fostering care of the two hon. gentlemen opposite? While the hon. gentleman dealt very lightly, I thought, with the question of the increase of bankruptcies, I find that whereas the bankruptcies in 1883 amounted to $15,949,000, they now, in 1884, amount to $19,190,000. Now, that is much more serious than it appears, for this excellent reason, that in 1878, and before that, we had a bankruptcy law; we knew quite well who went into bankruptcy, we knew all about them. Now, unfortunately, under the existing state of the law, which I would be glad to see the Government, as they ought to have done, take in hand and remedy as they may think best—now, the fact is, that the bankruptcies reported are only a portion of those that actually occur. I know myself, I am sorry to have to say it, that in many cities in Canada there are numbers of persons who are in a state of bankruptcy, and whom their creditors choose to support, whom they do not wish to put into bankruptcy, because the state of the law is such, that the bankrupt is subjected to great temptations, and in many cases, is very likely to defraud his just creditors. These figures are therefore much more significant than they appear on the surface. I believe they do not represent more than 70 or 80 per cent., at the outside, of the true bankrupts, and that the volume of bankruptcies to-day is as great as was ever attained in the last year of the depression, which ended in 1878. Let us take another test. Has the hon. gentleman, who discussed the increased mileage on our roads, paid the least attention to the great diminution in the receipts on those roads? Is he aware that the Grand Trunk, whose receipts in 1883 amounted to $18,900,000, have only received $16,700,000 in 1884? And it will not do to say that this is due to recent competition, because that competition has only affected them for a small part of the year, and they did not lose as much proportionately in that part of the year as in the eight months preceding. Then, with reference to the Intercolonial Railway, we were told the other day, that the receipts to January were $1,208,715, and the expenditure $1,415,499, showing a loss of $200,000 for the half year in running the Intercolonial Railway. Is this another proof of the thoroughly satisfactory condition of the present trade of the country? The hon. gentleman spoke just now of the condition of the laboring class. Well, I wish with all my heart that the condition of the laboring class throughout Canada was as good as he represented it to be; but if the hon. gentleman were called upon to support a wife and four or five small children on $300 a year, would he have a surplus of $44 to invest at the end of the year? Or does he consider that $304 is a satisfactory average year's wages? Does he consider that it is a very satisfactory exhibit of the state of the laboring class of Canada at a time when by his tariff he has enormously increased the cost of all these poor fellows have to buy? My hon. friend beside me (Mr. Blake) said, and said truly, that perhaps of all the cities of Canada Toronto was the one which had prospered most, all things considered, within the last four or five years. Does the Finance Minister know, or does he not know, that last Christmas in Toronto, the reports of the various societies there alleged that of the 100,000 people or thereabouts within the limits of Toronto, 8,000 people received relief at Christmas time? Does he know that one man in twelve, apparently, out of that 100,000, was in a condition in which he required to receive relief from his richer neighbors? If these men were in want, it is well that relief should be given them; but that is not a state of things on which any Canadian can look with pleasure, to which the Finance Minister can appeal as a proof that there is considerable prosperity in Canada, or even in the most prosperous city we can find throughout Ontario. Now, I shall, at a later period, have something to say as to the banking system; but I think if the hon. gentleman had perused carefully certain recent bank statements—those, let us say, of the Exchange Bank of Canada and of the Federal Bank, which we were recently considering—the hon. gentleman would have seen only too great cause to suspect that there was much rottenness beneath the superficial prosperity to which he alluded as existing. Let us sum up the results. In the first place, our revenue has fallen until it is barely sufficient for our present needs, and until, according to the statements of the hon. gentleman himself, there is imminent danger that there will be a considerable deficit next year, even when he has recourse to the extraordinary expedient of adding $500,000 to income from Dominion lands, as I understood him to have done. We find there has been an enormous increase of taxes; we find there has been an enormous increase in our debt; we find there has been a serious shrinkage in the volume of trade, and even though that might be accounted for in part by the fact that there has been a shrinkage in value; still, taking into consideration the long periods of time to which I have referred, that is a very serious matter. We find that our population in our greatest Provinces is stationary, if not absolutely decreasing; we find that profits are small in almost all trades, and in those which were the special favorites of the hon. gentleman, we find that the profits to-day are nil. We find that bankruptcies are reaching very high figures all through the country; we find that many persons are out of work. I am afraid the hon. gentleman would not have to go to St. John to find that out; I am afraid that all over Canada, and particularly all through Ontario, wherever he chooses to go to-day, he will find more persons out of work than there have been at any time within the last ten years. We find, moreover, very heavy unpaid liabilities. The hon. gentleman said very little about the millions for which he will have to provide within the next six months; he said very little of the liabilities incurred by our legislation of last year. He kept those things entirely in the back ground in any estimates he made of our probable indebtedness. Briefly, the result is this, that in 12 years, dating from 1873, it appears that the population of Canada has only increased a matter of 10, or at the outside 12 per cent. It appears that the exports of our produce have barely increased 5 per cent., as the hon. gentleman's own trade returns show; it appears that the total volume of our trade in these ten years has diminished by 5 or 6 per cent., and the returns laid on the Table of the House show a further diminution of five or six million dollars in the first six months of this year. We find that our debt in six years apparently has increased about 60 per cent.; we find that our taxes are increased at the rate of 150 per cent., the average amount to-day of taxes being 150 per cent. greater than they were six years ago. From about 17½ per cent. the hon. gentleman has made them very considerably over 35 per cent., taking them all round. We find our expenditure has increased by about 40 per cent. If I were to take those figures and place them in the hands of any statist of reputation, and if I were to say to him that, in a period of eleven years, or a period of six years, as the case might be, these figures exhibited the progress, the increase in population, the increase in exports, the increase in the total volume of trade, the increase in debt, and in the expenditure of a young country, having large fertile territories not occupied, why, Sir, that statistician would say to me: It is clear on the face of it from those figures, though I do not know to what country you allude, that some great calamity must have swept over it; either there has been a fearful pestilence, or there has been a fearful war, or there has been a famine in the land; no ordinary causes would account for such an exceedingly slow progress in a young country having large resources yet untouched; there must have been some great misfortune. And, if I came to explain to him that for twelve years not a shot had been fired in Canada, that we had had as good harvests and better than our neighbors, that we had been free from earthquake and pestilence, then that statistician would have been perfectly unable to account for the fact of this extraordinary and unprecedented stationary condition of a country like ours, until I had further explained to him that, although Providence had spared us man had not, and that for the last six years this unhappy country had had a protective tariff, administered by a Government of practical politicians, presided over by a philanthropic Minister of Finance, who desires to increase the greatest happiness of the greatest number—and I do not doubt the hon. gentleman's desire to increase their happiness—by giving to a few hundred persons, influential political partisans who had access to him, unlimited power to tax the millions of consumers who were not equally fortunate. The hon. gentleman apparently desires to make a sort of review of his whole connection with the finances of this country. I have here a statement written in 1874, just after the hon. gentleman had concluded his first connection with the finances of Canada, by a perfectly impartial person, with whom I had no acquaintance then, nor, I suspect, had the hon. gentleman, and this is what that person said in 1874. He had been speaking of the administration of the hon. gentleman opposite from 1867 to 1874, and I may say at once that I am quoting from an eminent writer on the subject in the London Economist:

"Thus," he says, "a splendid position has been changed into one of danger, if not of imminent danger. At the beginning, there is a moderate surplus upon moderate totals of receipts and expenditures. Then these totals on both sides increase, with a very large surplus. Finally, there is an enormous increase of the total on the expenditure side with a deficit of nearly half a million pounds sterling. It is not difficult to see how all this has been brought about. First of all, the great expenditure on new works has gradually increased the direct charge for debt interest. The second cause of increased expenditure has been the maintenance and working of certain undertakings which were intended to be reproductive, but so far from having that character are a direct source of loss. The third source of increased expenditure has been the political extension of the Canadian Dominion. The incorporation of outlying Provinces like Manitoba is immediately a source of expense, just as Central Asia costs money to the Russian Government, and many of our Indian Provinces yield less than the cost of governing them. So Canada has added to itself a territory which is a burdensome charge. The older and richer Provinces of Canada are, in fact, paying heavily for the accomplishment of certain political objects, and, now that the penalty must be paid for all these extravagances, the history may be left to tell its own tale. There is no kind of expenditure which requires more careful study beforehand and more rigorous restriction by Governments than expenditure on new public works. Territorial expansion is also a luxury, the cost of which should be carefully counted beforehand. Canada has committed the most serious blunders in both respects, and the result is the large deficit and the disagreeable outlook we have described."

These were very wise words, addressed to the people of Canada in 1874 by a gentleman who then had no connection with anyone in this country, that I am aware of. The hon. Minister would have done well to lay them to heart, because they describe almost precisely the position into which his improvidence and folly and the improvidence and folly of his colleagues have again brought Canada in 1884. Now, I would like to contrast a little the statements made to-day and the statements made a couple of years ago by the hon. gentleman. Surely this House can hardly forget how, within less than two years, the hon. gentleman who now sits before me rose to tell the House that, had he been a young man, he would have crowded on sail and looked forward to ten years of unabated prosperity; how the pendulum, which he says always swings to and fro, was arrested, and seven years—not more nor less—of prosperity awaited this happy country. The hon. gentleman, five years ago, said something of the same kind. He promised us then that, if we would only be patient and give his policy time, we would certainly have very speedily a similar period of prosperity. I call attention to his statements then. I call attention to this also, that when times something like these—although there is no reason why they should be so severe as they are now, from anything which has occurred in the last year—had overtaken our people, not the hon. gentleman, because he was not here, but the First Minister and his colleague, Sir Charles Tupper, were constantly ringing in the ears of the people of this country every imaginable charge against the Government. The First Minister, in 1878, I quote from Hansard, said we had no work-people; that they had gone to the United States; that Canadian artisans were adding to the strength, to the power, and to the wealth of a foreign nation instead of to ours; that our work-people in this country were suffering from want of employment; that their cries were rising to heaven, and more to that effect. We know that the First Minister is a most tender-hearted person. I remember very well when the First Minister was out of office, how his heart bled, he used to tell us, for the woes of those unemployed and suffering workmen; and, now that he is in office, his heart has become so much more tender that, as recently happened in Montreal, he cannot bear even to look at a suffering workman. These hon. gentlemen would tell us now that it is unfair to hold them responsible; they would tell us now that this is an epidemic of commercial distress that spreads over the country, and that no Government can prevent—that it arises from uncontrollable causes. I have been Finance Minister at a time when it might be said with truth that the causes of the depression were uncontrollable; at a time when we had three bad harvests in succession; at a time when our main industry, the lumber trade, was almost in a state of prostration; at a time when, not only in Europe, but in North America, there was almost universal depression from one end to the other; and at that time, Sir Charles Tupper, as reported in the Hansard of 1878, said:

And again, at another page, 456, Sir Charles Tupper goes on to say:

“The hon. gentleman” (myself I suppose) “says that the prosperity of the country cannot be obtained and promoted by Acts of Parliament. We deny it. We say that you may make the very taxation necessary to sustain the public credit by meeting the interest on the public debt and discharging the ordinary administration of public affairs, a means of so fostering our industries as to give to the people the money that is required in order to pay the taxes.”

And again:

“The policy the Government has pursued has had the effect of depopulating the country; it has sent away the most skilled and intelligent labor, the finest sons of Canada, to a foreign country, to obtain the employment their own country denies them. That is a fatal policy, and one which must induce us to forego all our aspirations for anything like a rapidly increased greatness for this country in the future, and to consent to become hewers of wood and drawers of water for our friends across the line in the great Republic of the United States.”

What a commentary on these statements, when we find from the municipal census of Ontario, and still more from the school returns of Ontario, that during the time when my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) was Premier, the population of Canada increased three-fold as fast as it has done under those hon. gentlemen. Why, Sir, in 1878-79, when we went out of office, there were 30,000 more school children enrolled on the school registers of Ontario alone than there were when we entered office. To-day there are 20,000 less, according to the school statistics, enrolled on the school register of Ontario than there were in 1879, when these gentlemen first began to restore prosperity, by Act of Parliament, to Canada. Now, Sir, the Minister of Finance last year had a good deal to say about bad harvests. This year the hon. gentleman has said very little about that, the harvest, providentially, having been good. But it is quite evident to everybody who listened attentively to the hon. gentleman that he was unusually perplexed. His tone was not confident, not at all as confident as we have been accustomed to hear. The hon. gentleman did really not appear to understand how it was that when he had laid on so many new taxes, when he had been so very civil, and accommodating, and obliging to all these manufacturers who pressed upon him—he could not understand how it was that the revenue was falling, he could not understand how it was that the exports were not increasing; he could not understand, apparently, how it was that all these things were going wrong. Now, in former times, to do the hon. gentleman justice, his mind was very clear on all these points, and it is not uninteresting to trace the workings of the hon. gentleman's mind. As I said, Sir, from 1873 to 1878 there was a good and sufficient cause why everything was not going right as it ought to have done. The hon. gentleman was not here, as he says himself, but he says, when he came back in 1879:

“Then, Sir, I could point with pride and satisfaction to the increased capital of our banks and the large dividends they paid. To-day I regret to say that we must point to depreciated values and to small dividends. Then I could point to the general prosperity of the country. To-day we must all admit that it is greatly depressed.”

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

He did substantially admit that to-night:

“Then I could point with satisfaction to the various manufacturing industries that were in operation throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion, remunerative to the men that had invested their capital in them, and giving employment to tens of thousands. To-day, many of the furnaces are cold, the machinery in many cases is idle, and those establishments that are in operation are only employed half-time, and are scarcely paying the interest on the money invested.”

Now, this was in 1879, not in 1884, as you might naturally suppose. Then he says:

“We could point to the agricultural interest as most prosperous, with a satisfactory home market, and satisfactory prices abroad. To-day they have a limited market, with low prices, and anything but a satisfactory market abroad.”

As I said, the reason is clear to the hon. gentleman's mind; he had been absent from the Treasury. Now it is true that other causes have been assigned. It is quite true that during that period there was unusual distress in England and the United States. It is quite true that we had three poor harvests in succession, that our lumber trade had broken down, and that we had suffered from the extreme improvidence of the Government from 1870 until 1873. It is true that all this greatly hampered and impaired the prospects of Canada at that time, but the Finance Minister, with the eye of genius, divined the true cause of these troubles—it was because he was not here during that unfortunate period. But now, Sir, the hon. gentleman is here; he has been here for these many years, and I have no doubt it appears to him very odd that to-day there should be a drop of four million or five million dollars in the revenue with the prospect of a farther drop. It appears to the hon. gentleman very odd that when he was here the people should have grown poor and that when they grew poor they should have left this country. Well, Sir, I can tell the hon. gentleman that it will be very odd indeed if, under the burden of taxation which he has laid upon them, they should remain here; I can tell the hon. gentleman that it will be very odd indeed if, while he was increasing our debt in the fashion he has done, while he was increasing our liabilities and throwing away extraordinary opportunities, our people should not have resented it in the only way they could, which is practically, I am sorry to say, by removing themselves to another country. But when the hon. gentleman tells us that things were as bad seven years ago, I beg leave to differ from him. I say, in the first place, that that is not a correct statement of the case; and I say, in the next place, that it is no answer at all, if it were. So far as any Government whatever was responsible for the fact that there was a serious depression between 1875 and 1879, it was the Government which deliberately imposed the huge liabilities under which we are still laboring, and who imposed them in the years between 1871 and 1873, against the strongest possible protest on the part of every hon. gentleman on this side of the House. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman has other pleas. I think the business men of Canada will learn with some surprise that at a period when trade is known to be at its dullest, when prices are lower than they have been for a long time past, when enormous masses of our people are known to have left the country, when he knows that our leading industries are so much depressed, when our manufacturers are paying no dividends—although the hon. Finance Minister seems to think it of very little consequence—I say business men will be surprised to learn that the chief evidence of the well-being of our population appears to rest on the simple fact that our savings bank deposits have gone on increasing. The hon. gentleman implied, at the same time, that it was absurd to think there had been any serious loss of our population, because our factory hands had increased in number. Now, Sir, I say that this is no answer whatever; and I say, as regards the savings bank deposits, the facts are these: Within the last half dozen years there has been a great fall in the rate of interest—and here I do not speak of the fall in the rate of discount at banks, as the hon. gentleman thought, although that has taken place—but there has been an enormous fall in the rates of interest at the great centres where money rules. It is no more wonder that at this present moment there should be large deposits, when the hon. gentleman is paying 4 per cent., than it would have been a few years ago if I had paid 6 per cent. At the time I paid 4 per cent. all the banks in the country were paying from 4 to 5 per cent., and now substantial banks throughout the country are barely paying 3 per cent. Sir, I pointed out to the hon. gentleman that the annual cost to the country was immense. The hon. gentleman has borrowed an immense sum of money at call; for that he is not only paying 4 per cent., but paying the whole charges of management, and if he conducts his business as a prudent man should, then beyond all doubt a further large sum will require to be added as interest on the money, which he ought to keep to enable him to meet sudden calls. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman spoke of English practice. Here let me say that, as regards one part of the hon. gentleman's argument, I also am quite willing that every reasonable facility should be given to the poorer class of the population, to encourage them in thrifty and saving habits; but the hon. gentleman knows, and I know perfectly well, that the vast bulk of those depositors who deposit money with him are not, by any means, members of the poorer classes of the population. There are a certain number who are really such as the hon. gentleman described, and if the hon. gentleman would confine himself to those—if the hon. gentleman would do as they do in England—fix a reasonable limit, beyond which he would not take deposits, and place the money which he receives in the hands of commissioners, who would invest it in the national securities of the country and hold it in trust for those persons, then there would be exceedingly little risk of any considerable abuse in deposits. But I believe the facts are simply these: that of the $31,000,000 now held through the medium of the savings banks, probably not more than $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 at the outside are held by persons whom he is justified in speaking of as among the poorer classes of the community. I think, in dealing with the savings banks, the hon. gentleman has committed a great mistake, and the effects of his folly or rashness are likely to do very great damage to the class whom he claims to desire to serve. Canada is not a lending country, but a borrowing country. If the Minister chooses to borrow many millions from the people of this country, it follows that our people must in turn borrow other millions, and in all probability they will borrow them from foreign countries and pay a much higher rate of interest than was necessary for the hon. gentleman to pay if he availed himself of the credit of the country. We know, and the hon. gentlemen must know, that most of the industries of the Dominion cannot be carried on without very large sums of borrowed money, and that the rate of interest is unusually important to persons dealing thus with borrowed money. He knows that the rate of interest which those men pay goes a very long way in deciding the rate of wages; that many enterprises cannot be gone into because the rate of interest is higher here than in other countries. He has made that fact a ground in part for the tariff he introduced, and yet we find that the Minister of Finance is doing the very utmost in his power to keep the rate of interest up, to diminish the wages which the laborers are paid, and to prevent persons in this country from going into new enterprises, which they are ready to enter upon if they can obtain money at low rates. I point out to him another serious cause of mischief, due, as I believe, more to the rate paid for this money in the savings banks than any other cause. It has a very bad effect on weak banks, by increasing the rate of interest which they are called upon to pay. The stronger and better banks do not suffer from this. No one cause contributes more to bad banking than being obliged to pay larger interest than the money is really worth, and whether the hon. Minister knows it or not, and I do not suppose he knew and intended it, the hon. gentleman is largely responsible, in my judgment, for much of the bad banking which has occurred in Canada during the last few years. He has deliberately contributed to raise the rate of interest beyond what was safe; the banks which have to pay more than they should pay are constantly being tempted to enter into perilous speculations, are constantly being tempted to risk their money abroad, and in that way, it being distinctly due to the hon. gentleman's conduct, there has been a very serious loss, as has been shown to have occurred in the case of many banks, and notably in the cases to which I have referred. Then there is a third objection to the hon. gentleman's policy, and it is this: Every dollar the Minister of Finance pays out of the Treasury costs the people of this country a very great deal more than that sum itself. Before you can put one dollar in the Treasury you must take a great deal more out of the pockets of the people. Under the protective system of the present Government, for every dollar paid out they take two dollars out of the pockets of the people, and it is not in the interest of any portion of the community to pay a higher rate of interest than the money is worth, for the simple reason that it involves the imposition of very heavy unnecessary taxation on the people. I repeat that I do not object to the hon. gentleman dealing very liberally with the poor class of depositors; but I suspect that if the returns which are moved for are brought down, it will be apparent that the bulk of the money now on deposit in the savings banks is held in large sums, and held by persons who cannot by any possibility be considered as deserving the particular protection of the Finance Minister. In England, I find the limit is £30 per year, equal to $146, and the savings bank will not receive more than $735 in all, while here it ranges to $3,000. I may point out that no possible harm could have occurred from giving 4 per cent. interest in 1877 and 1878, for the simple reason that it was the minimum rate at which money was lent at call in Canada at that time. Now, the circumstances are entirely altered. Money is now lent freely in this country at 3 per cent. on call. But the hon. gentleman deliberately chooses to pay 33 per cent. more than the money is worth in open market, and he does this in a way that costs the people 25 per cent. more than it might be got for elsewhere. I may point out another danger, of which I shall have something more to say on another occasion. The hon. gentleman has gone into a huge banking business. The Government are the largest note issuers in this Dominion. They have besides $31,000,000 of the people's money at call; in all, they hold very nearly $50,000,000 at call. The hon. gentleman deliberately chose to abolish the rules which I had laid down, which required the maintenance of a good gold reserve, and he is practically in this position, which is contrary to all sound rules of banking, of having nearly $50,000,000 at call and only $2,500,000 of gold with which to meet his liabilities. That is one of the things which the hon. gentleman has done, thoughtlessly, it may be, but the consequences of it, as may be very easily imagined, might involve very serious danger to the people of this country. Now, I come to deal with the hon. gentleman's factory statistics. Again I say that these prove nothing, if true, as to the question whether depopulation is going on or not. It may be true that the hon. gentleman has caused the employment of 47,000 people in the Dominion; it may be true—we will discuss that question presently—but that would not in the least show that the hon. gentleman had been successful in keeping our population in the country. I tell the hon. gentleman what it does prove. But first, lest I should unwittingly misrepresent him, I desire to know whether the statement which he made, and which is substantially the same as that recently made to the House, is correct. I find that on a late occasion the hon. gentleman declared that the number of hands employed over and above the number employed in 1878 was 47,828; wages paid $15,000,000; increase of manufactures, $77,543,000; increase of capital invested, $39,000,000. He changed the last amount to $44,000,000, I observe, in the course of his recent remarks. Now I take it that that is substantially what the hon. gentlemen stated, and if otherwise, I am ready to be corrected.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That statement was made before the returns were completed—a month before they were sent in, and therefore it has increased by additional enquiries made since then.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then it is under the mark rather than over.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then I cannot, in the least degree, injure the hon. gentleman by using it. Now, I want the House to understand what this means. He declares in that statement that the present tariff causes us to produce and use $77,000,000 worth of goods which we would otherwise import. The hon. gentleman does not object to that.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes. The increased value is the increased labor connected with it. For instance, a portion of this is raw material—sugar and articles of that kind.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course; but what the hon. gentleman stated is, that the increase of manufactures was $77,000,000, the wages paid $15,000,000, and the increased capital $39,000,000 or $44,000,000. Now you can only pay $15,000,000 wages if they produce about $77,000,000 worth of manufactured goods, according to the hon. gentleman's own showing. The hon. gentleman has, as I said, practically stated that his tariff caused us to use, in 1883, or in 1884, $77,000,000 worth of goods, including the price of the raw material, which otherwise we would have imported. Now I do not think the hon. gentleman had reflected on what that statement made at Toronto involved. I find that of dutiable goods, which are substantially the same as these same manufactures, we imported in 1874, $76,000,000 worth; in 1878 we only used $59,000,000, and in 1883, $91,000,000 worth, so that practically the statement of the hon. gentleman is that the people of Canada (in addition to the goods they made in 1878, which were no trifle) required to use $168,000,000 worth of these same classes of goods in 1883, against $59,000,000 worth in 1878. That is the inevitable inference to be drawn from the hon. gentleman's statements, made at Toronto and made to-night. I leave that statement to the House. Everybody knows that we were manufacturing large quantities of those goods in 1878, and I ask what sort of foundation can there be for a report which declares that, whereas $59,000,000 worth of those goods, which we imported in 1878, sufficed for the needs of the country, we now, adding together the dutiable goods which we imported and those we made by virtue of the tariff, which otherwise we would have imported, consume $168,000,000. I think that is sufficient proof of the accuracy of the statement which has been submitted to the hon. gentleman by his commissioners. I point out certain other deductions which result from that statement and are clearly inevitable. These $77,000,000 worth of goods are made by virtue of a protective tariff, which ranges from 30 to 70 per cent., and therefore it is clear, and I call the attention of the House to this fact, that if the hon. gentleman's statement can be taken to be accurate, he has imposed upon us an additional taxation equal, in all probability, to over one-quarter, and probably equal to one-third of $77,000,000, so that our additional taxation is from $22,000,000 to $25,000,000 a year, if his statement be correct, and his 47,000 hands, cost us from $400 to $500 a year each. Sir, that is worse than a standing army; it is worse than pauperism; and I say that it is no wonder if, as appears to be the case, by the statement of the immigration Department, between 500,000 and 600,000 people left the country during the last four or five years—as I will be prepared to show from the statements made by that Department. But, Sir, I do not think the case is as bad as the hon. gentleman would have us believe. In the first place, I say that we had no reliable data to start from, as to the condition of things in 1878. It is impossible to-day, in 1884 or 1885, to obtain any reliable evidence of the number of factories, the number of hands, the amount of capital and other necessary details of the state of things in 1878. Moreover, the parties whom the hon. gentleman selected to do the work had a clear and distinct object of their own in exaggerating the matter. I dare say that a large number of these persons mentioned in this report had nothing to do with, and received no benefit from the hon. gentleman's policy. Moreover, the growth of this country, even under the worse circumstances, must be something. Besides, when we have a series of good harvests the manufacturers reap the benefit, to a large extent, and the hon. gentleman is not entitled to take credit for his policy for the fact that there were three successive good harvests in 1881-82-83, and three poor harvests in 1876-77-78. Such an argument merely requires to be stated to be exposed.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). But if you came in, we would have bad harvests again.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But I will not base my statements merely on a priori arguments. We have had the facts given us with respect to one or two towns, which will show the accuracy of the statements of these commissioners, to whom many thousands of dollars were paid to in order to obtain an accurate report of our industries. I find that in Chatham they reported that in 1878 there were four factories, and in 1884, six; that in 1878, 63 hands were employed, and in 1884 329 hands. Now, Sir, I find that in 1878, instead of their being four factories of various kinds there were 50 factories, and I am prepared to give the hon. gentleman the names. I find that of the nine foundries at work in Chatham in 1878, four are now bankrupt, and of the remaining number of industries, 13 have succumbed, making 17 in all. But of all that there is not a word in the report. All of these facts escaped the attention of the hon. gentleman and his commissioners. But I will turn to another place, one of the most important, and formerly one of the most thriving manufacturing towns in Ontario—Oshawa. I am informed by the member from that place, that whereas Mr. Blackeby, or whatever his name is, reported that in 1878 there were six factories, employing 421 hands, and in 1884 there were eight factories, employing 575 hands, the facts are, that instead of there being six in 1878, there were 21 factories, of which I hold a list. I find also that whereas in August, 1878, there were, at least, 800 men employed, without counting the men dependent on allied trades, there are apparently now not more than 300. Those are the facts, vouched for by a man who is, at least, as competent to know all about Oshawa as the hon. Minister or his commissioners. When those statements come down I trust that hon. gentlemen will take special pains to analyze and examine them. But I do not wish to rest the statements I make merely on a priori arguments, or merely on those two instances. I believe that the Minister has been most grossly deceived, and that fortunately for us instead, of our now being compelled to purchase $77,000,000 of manufactured articles, as the hon. gentleman appears to think, it is very doubtful if one-third or one-fourth of that amount is being manufactured under the influence of this tariff.

Still the reality is bad enough. It is bad for our farmers that they should be obliged to pay more than they need pay for the goods they consume and require to use to produce their crops. It is bad for the bulk of our manufacturers; it is bad for the settlers of the North-West that they should be subjected to the operation of a most unjust and injurious tariff; and, Sir, if the hon. Minister of Finance be correct, the triumph of his policy has forced us to pay $77,000,000 for what was worth in open market from $50,000,000 to $55,000,000. He has given temporary employment to 47,000 people, and most probably driven 600,000 away; and now I have a word or two to say touching the immigration into this country. Sir, I find that from 1881, the time the census was taken, to the present time, 397,897 immigrants are reported to have come and settled in Canada—47,990 in 1881, 112,458 in 1882, 133,624 in 1883, and 103,824 in 1884. Of this number the same returns show that 65,539 are said to have settled in the North-West down to the 1st of January, 1885. So there remain to be accounted for 334,358 immigrants. Now, Sir, every man here knows right well that Ontario, with its 2,000,000 or thereabouts of people, has always absorbed an enormous percentage of all the immigrants that came to this country. No man pretends that the immigrants go to the Maritime Provinces. In fact, the answer given in this House the other day shows, even on the calculation of the Department, that only a paltry few hundreds go to the Maritime Provinces. So, if you strike out the North-West, and allow Ontario two-thirds of the remainder, what do you get? If your statements are in the slightest degree accurate, Ontario, instead of diminishing in population, ought to have increased in these four years by 224,000 immigrants, and by 200,000 of natural increase. Does the hon. gentleman, or any hon. gentleman, suppose that there are to-day, in the teeth of the municipal census and the school returns of Ontario, 424,000 more people in Ontario to-day than there were four years ago?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. Minister of Agriculture believes it. Then, where are they? I have seen very recently the details of the returns of the municipal census of Ontario, and if these, which are much more favorable than the school returns, show anything, they show this: That it is physically impossible that these men could have come to Ontario, but that if they have, they have driven out from Ontario an equal number of our own people.

An hon. MEMBER. You would be glad of that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, Sir; I would not be glad of that. I would think that an extreme misfortune. I think a native-born Canadian is worth very much more to us than any imported immigrant. But I think this whole system is a fraud and a sham. I think this system of bringing in immigrants is about the greatest waste of public money that has ever been made. I do not believe that we have received 397,000 or 334,000 people, or that, apart from those who have settled in the North-West, any immigrants at all of any value have been brought into Canada through the medium of assisted immigration. I believe the time has come to abolish that system altogether, and I heartily concur in the view expressed by the labor council in Toronto and elsewhere, that it is a most shameful waste of the money of the people of Canada, and a most serious departure from the sound rules of government, to bring people from other countries for the purpose of taking the bread out of the mouths of our own mechanics and artisans. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman boasts of his success in dealing with the sugar question and in establishing the West India trade. He was cautious, in the face of some recent developments, not to say that it was a matter of great congratulation to the people of Canada, that whereas in Glasgow to-day you can buy a fair quality of sugar, I am informed, for $2 per 100 pounds, in Canada we have to pay $5 per 100 pounds for sugar of the same quality. The hon. gentleman said that he got as much revenue as before. Why, from the importation of a little over 100,000,000 pounds in my time, we got a revenue in excess of that which the hon. gentleman now receives from 170,000,000 pounds. True, that is not of first-class quality; true, about 20,000,000 pounds of that is wasted in the process of refining; but even so, we are probably to-day importing the equivalent of 150,000,000 pounds of refined sugar. Now, that sugar stands us at least 3 cents a pound more than it could be bought for in the open market. That represents $1,500,000 of taxes levied on the people of Canada, of which $2,500,000 goes into the Treasury, and $2,000,000 I know not where.

Mr. HESSON. We get better sugar, and get it cheaper.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Because sugar has fallen enormously in all the great centres of production, not because we have been foolish enough to tax it 50 per cent. more than we did half a dozen years ago. Let us take the case of cottons. The hon. gentleman would not tell us what the increased production of cotton was. I have had a series of estimates submitted to me on this subject; I have been told that the production was $7,000,000, that it was $5,000,000, that it was $4,250,000; what it is, I do not know; but whether it is four or five or seven millions, it is equally clear that we have to pay more for it than we could buy it for in the open market, if the tariff were removed. It may be true, as the hon. gentleman has said, that for a short time, until the happy condition which he sketched has arrived, when the manufacturers will lay their heads together and decide how much they will tax the people of Canada, we may get cottons nearly as cheap, if not quite as cheap, as they are in the United States. But the Minister himself declared that he did not expect or desire than state of things to continue. His desire, apparently, was, that these poor innocent cotton manufacturers should be so protected that they could levy a considerable tax upon the people of Canada, even if it involved the necessity of paying many millions of dollars in pensioning off some of them, as has been done in many cases in the United States and elsewhere. Now, I take the whole truth of this matter of cottons to be briefly this: I believe the climate is rather against us for the manufacture of cottons. I believe that those acquainted practically with the manufacture of cottons will admit that where there is a small market you manufacture at a greater disadvantage than where there is a large market; and we know that the cost of fuel, the rate of interest and the price of other things necessary to manufacturing, are higher in Canada, and we cannot manufacture cotton here as cheaply as can be done elsewhere. Although I do not pretend to say that the manufacture of cotton is not a desirable thing per se, I do mean to say that there is no ground for the hon. gentlemen inflicting a grave loss on the whole people of Canada for the sake of encouraging a few of these people. More than that, while they had a moderate revenue tariff these people were doing exceedingly well; they were doing better, in point of fact, than they have done under the hon. gentleman's highly protective tariff. It is worth while noticing this for many reasons, and for this in particular, because it shows clearly, as I always maintained, and my hon. friend behind me maintained, that there was a steady growth on the part of textile manufacturers during the period from 1874 to 1878. It is worth noticing, that whereas in 1874 the importation of raw cotton amounted to 3,500,000 lbs. or thereabouts, in 1878, in spite of the depression and bad times, the importation of raw cotton, which is the true measure of the growth of manufactures, had increased 120 per cent., or 7,000,000 lbs. and more. It is curious enough, that since then the growth has not, in proportion, been much more rapid, although for a time it was very unduly stimulated by the policy of the hon. gentleman. Briefly, the position appears to be this, that what the hon. gentleman has done is really rather a measure of the loss he has inflicted on the public. The hon. gentleman has succeeded in adding enormously to the real taxation of the country; he has imposed a taxation nominally of $25,500,000, but which, in all human probability, is not less than $36,000,000 or $37,000,000; he has succeeded in locking up a very large amount of capital, although not so great as he supposes, in unproductive operations. If the situation were less grave, it would almost be ludicrous to recall the innumerable processions of the hon. gentleman and his friends, the innumerable visits the hon. gentleman made to all those manufacturers from one end of Canada to the other, and the receptions they gave him. Now is the time when, if the hon. gentleman were such a wonder-working magician, he might use his presence to advantage by visiting these distressed manufacturers and enlightening them as to their own business, by showing them how to improve, and explaining to them in detail wherein they had gone wrong; and he might, perhaps, be instrumental in bringing them together in the way he has suggested, so that there might be a comfortable combination of monopolists arranged in the office of the Finance Minister, in the case of all these distressed industries. I have now to say a word or two as to the hon. gentleman's own administration, and first of all I want to call the attention of the House to some actual facts as to his administration of 1884. The hon. gentleman claims, I see, that he had a surplus that year of $700,000 or more. Now, I maintain that the hon. gentleman's mode of book-keeping is not quite correct. I think it will be found, if we look into the statements which he has submitted, that he had no right to claim any such surplus, if indeed, he had any right to claim any surplus at all. He says last year he had a surplus of $754,000; but when I come to examine the hon. gentleman's charges, I find that on the Intercolonial Railway alone there are such charges as these put to capital account: for rolling stock $441,000; for Intercolonial commission $22,000. There are also charges for Prince Edward Island Railway rolling stock $9,000; for Canadian Pacific Railway commission a matter of $19,000. So that, in point of fact, when you deduct these items, all of which ought to be charged properly to ordinary revenue account, we find that the hon. gentleman has scarcely got a surplus of $260,000 in place of a surplus of $754,000—or a surplus of just about the amount which he has so carefully deposited, as a matter of permanent investment, I suppose, in the Exchange Bank of Canada. Now the hon. gentleman said a great deal as to the mode in which the Intercolonial Railway had been managed. He claimed great credit, indeed, for the fashion in which the expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway had been reduced. Now it would have been no wonder at all, considering the country that railway runs through and the date at which it was completed, if the hon. gentleman were able to make a better showing to-day than my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie), could possibly have made during the time he administered the Intercolonial Railway. The House will recollect the long array of figures the hon. gentleman presented on that point. He showed, I think, that whereas we had a deficit of several hundred thousand dollars a year, he had merely an insignificant deficit. But he did not choose to call the attention of the House to this fact, that whereas, when my hon. friend went out of office, the capital account of the road was closed and stood at $36,091,000, the capital account on the 1st of July 1884, under the management of the hon. gentleman and his friends, stood at $43,866,000. There can be no very great difficulty in making both ends meet when you add $7,866,000 to capital account, consisting largely of items such as those I have alluded to. We find that, in 1878, the item of stores was charged at $345,000; to-day it is put down at $837,000, being, to all intents and purposes, the addition of another half million dollars to capital account; and if you include the $800,000 we are to spend this year on the 1st of July, 1885, the capital account will stand at $45,204,000, against $36,000,000 at which it stood when my hon. friend went out of office. The consequence is that the cost to the country, for interest alone, is $420,000 more, or will be on the 1st of July, than it was when we went out of office. Such book-keeping as that is a positive disgrace; it is only calculated to mislead the people. I desired to close the capital account of the Intercolonial Railway, when I was in office, for this obvious reason, that I knew perfectly well that, so long as a Government keeps a capital account of the sort open, all manner of improper charges will be added to it. It is the interest of the Minister and his subordinates to throw everything into capital account. Every bunker, every coal shed, every piece of rolling stock that can by any possibility be charged to capital account will be carried to it—and who is to correct it? Who is to tell us whether rolling stock to-day is really maintained? That rests entirely with hon. gentlemen themselves. Hon. gentlemen have added very nearly $10,000,000 to the capital account of the Intercolonial Railway, and yet they claim that they have been very economical, compared with my hon. friend, in the administration of that railway; because, after adding $420,000 to the interest on their capital account, they produce an annual saving apparently of $10,000 a year. Judging, however, from the statement to which I called the attention of the House, the hon. gentleman apparently, in six months, has been able to reduce this to a deficit of $240,000. Now, the hon. gentleman alluded to his management of the loans in London. I do not desire to criticise too severely what the hon. gentleman did there, and for this excellent reason, that it is very difficult, at a distance, to know whether the hon. gentleman took the best advantage of the condition of the market or not; but as the hon. gentleman challenged comparison with the loans previously made, I may point out it is not a matter for very great wonder or commendation that in 1884 Canada should be able to borrow at 3½ per cent., whereas in 1876 she was only able to borrow at 4 per cent., or to speak more accurately, that in 1884 we borrowed at 4 per cent., whereas in 1876 she was only able to borrow at 4½ per cent. The fact of the matter is, that the interest on money, as every security in the London market shows, has fallen very considerably since that time, and at the time the hon. gentleman went over to effect this loan, indeed considerably before it, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had announced his intention of reducing the English 3 per cent's. ultimately to 2½ per cent., a fact which every capitalist knows ensured every fair security being at once rapidly taken up at a rate lower than before. If the hon. gentleman could show that he had reduced the rate of interest on our bonds in proportion to the fall of money within the last six or seven years, then I would say he had made an excellent bargain, but I doubt very much if, on a fair comparison, he would be able to establish any such claim. The hon. gentleman said nothing about the various charges which he had incurred in connection with this same loan. If I understand aright, the sum of 1½ per cent. was paid by way of commission and in brokerage, in all a sum of £67,000 sterling, wholly independent of advertising, and so on.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. One and a-quarter.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. £67,000 would be more than 1½. In addition to that, there are the allowances. He did not say how much he computed them at, but they would represent, I suppose, the better part of 1 per cent. I do not say that it is any discredit the transaction, but it means that the price of 91½ really netted us 89, or thereabouts. What I object to in the conduct of these loans is this: We have at this moment an unusually large sinking fund, a much larger sinking fund than our debt in London at all requires. I have again and again called the attention of the hon. gentleman to the desirability of dispensing with the sinking fund, and I very much regret to see that, in the prospectus, he has found it necessary to retain the sinking fund, so that we pay 4 per cent. or nearly that—£3 18s 3d, I think is the figure—for our loan, besides an additional ½ per cent. to the sinking fund. I again repeat the remark I have made before, that it is very inexpedient to allow our sinking fund to be loaded down in this way, and to be compelled to raise money by way of taxation for the payment of a sinking fund, and that for the plain and obvious reason that on all occasions taxes cost the people a great deal more than the money that comes into the Treasury. I regret, too, although at this moment I am not going to insist too much upon it, that the hon. gentleman was unable to pay off his 5 per cent. loan when it matured on the 1st January. It would have been better for our credit, and would have saved us, probably, $125,000, because, if he could have obtained the money at a little less than 4 per cent. it is clear that the ½ per cent. he has had to pay during the present six months would have been saved to this country; and I think it was an error on his part, and negligence on his part, that he did not provide for that repayment in January, either in the way he has indicated or in some other way, and so save us this unnecessary payment of $125,000. But, Sir, when I come to look closely into these accounts for 1884, I find that these are very far indeed from the only cases in which the hon. gentleman has been, in my opinion, exceedingly careless of the interests committed to his charge. I find in the accounts of 1884 a number of charges, the like of which I venture to say have never appeared since Confederation. I find charges like this: For printing and advertising, $163,000, wholly apart from all the regular printing, amounting probably to as much more, done in connection with Hansard or statutes, or a great variety of matters in connection with this House; I find for extra clerks alone $175,000; for law costs, wholly apart from our Department of Justice and legitimate costs, there is put down a sum of $66,000; for two commissions I find $40,985 charged, and I find also that in these cases a good deal is charged to capital which belongs to ordinary account. Now, that we may understand the full effect of this statement, I will just run out briefly a comparison with similar expenditures in England. Our income is to the English income as 1 to 14, so that if Mr. Gladstone, when submitting the Public Accounts, was to produce charges for printing and advertising amounting to £400,000 sterling, it would no more than represent in England the equivalent of the $163,000 the hon. gentlemen have paid here, and if, further, it were to appear that this £400,000 included allowances of £20,000 a year apiece to the Times, Daily News, Morning Post, Pall Mall Gazette, Standard and Telegraph, I wonder what Englishmen would think of that mode of encouraging and fostering an independent public opinion in the press. And yet these monstrous charges are not one whit more, having regard to the relative revenue of the two countries, than the charges which are actually paid by the hon. gentleman to several distinguished organs of public opinion, which I will not enumerate here, but which are well known to a great many members of this House, and in which some of the members of this House have a lively and active interest. Then, for extra clerks, which I take to be a synonym for useful political friends, in some form, Mr. Gladstone's expenses should be £450,000 sterling, and to Mr. Gladstone's legal friends, had he adopted the plan the hon. gentleman has done, apart from all the regular sums paid in due course, £200,000 would have been paid. For commissions £100,000 would have been paid, with the result that about

£2,000,000 sterling would have been distributed among a number of claimants who, if they had any just claims, ought to have preferred them before the courts, and probably were referred to these commissions because there was not the slightest chance that the Exchequer Court or any other court would entertain their claims. Those are the reasons, those are some of the ways in which our expenses have been run up from $23,500,000 to $32,850,000 in the space of about seven years, that being the sum the hon. gentleman tells us he expects to expend for the service of the current year. Now I have a word or two to say as to certain more serious errors of policy which I lay to the charge of the hon. gentleman. Although those I have spoken of are grave enough, although they are indications of fearful waste and extravagance, and although in many respects they are much more objectionable—for I hold that a Minister can hardly do worse than use the funds placed at his command to corrupt and debauch the representatives of the press, as has been done in this case, and on a very extensive scale—I come now to deal with other and larger errors of policy for which the hon. gentleman is responsible. The hon. gentleman, in common with his colleagues, but he, more particularly, because it fell to his duty to warn and caution them of the results of their conduct, is responsible for the great and unnecessary concessions which were made to the Canadian Pacific Railway last year, and for the still more mischievous concessions which were made to certain members of this House, for the purpose of inducing them to sanction that outrageous loan. The hon. gentleman ought to have known and ought to have warned his colleagues, I think, what very serious issues were involved in making these grants to the Canadian Pacific Railway at that particular time. The hon. gentleman does not know to-day whether the people to whom he expects to pay this 5 per cent. loan will accept his terms. The hon. gentleman therefore must know that he may have to raise $25,000,000 by way of loan in London, for the purpose of refunding our debt. He must also make provision for the $13,000,000 of floating debt which he has incurred up to the 1st March, and from this time out there are, as he knows, other large expenditures going on, which will involve further large loans. The hon. gentleman occupied, prior to 1884, a very good position indeed. I pointed out to him, before this loan was granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway, that for his own sake he ought to have refused his consent to that proceeding, because it would most seriously hamper and impede him in dealing with the refunding of the debt which would necessarily come on this year. At the present moment it is impossible to say how much the hon. gentleman has lost or how much he may lose; but I believe that wholly independent of the unnecessary sinking fund which he consented to create in the loan of $25,000,000 to which he has alluded, he lost at least ½ per cent. by reason of the serious injury to the position and credit of Canada, because of our unwise concession to the demands of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I believe if that could be traced out it would be found that whereas we have had to pay practically 4½ per cent., including the sinking fund, for the loan recently negotiated, that it could have been obtained in London, prior to that unfortunate error on his part, in all probability, at a mere fraction, if at all, over 3½ per cent. And, Sir, it remains to be seen how far the large loan which it is inevitable that the hon. gentleman or somebody else must obtain in London within a few months, will be affected by the results of that unfortunate transaction. I tell him that it would not in the least surprise me if, when we meet again next year, it should be found that an enormous sum of money annually had been lost to this country for the next 25 years, as a result of that most unfortunate proceeding. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman ought to have seen and ought to have warned his colleagues that granting these other demands was going to lead to most interminable entanglements, that by granting those demands you have set up a precedent from one end of this country to the other for all kinds of claims and demands being made upon you, which you will find it difficult indeed to refuse. You have tied your hands by your own action, and the hon. gentlemen opposite, unless I greatly mistake, are at present experiencing, and seriously experiencing, the results of their impolitic concession on that occasion. Now the hon. gentleman takes great objection to the comparison I made between our position and that of the United States. Sir, he might have taken the trouble to see what I actually did say. The hon. gentleman, had he referred to my speech—my Toronto speech, to which, I suppose, he is alluding—would have seen that what I have said is this: That whereas seventeen years ago we were in a very advantageous position as compared with the people of the United States, the enormous increases in our expenditure and in our taxation which took place between 1867 and 1873, and between 1879 and 1885, have completely reversed our position. I did not say that our present taxation was twice that of the United States; what I did say was, that in 1884 the expenditure of the United States was $5 per head, and our expenditure was something at the rate of $7 per head—and that I shall proceed to show. The hon. gentleman says that our taxation has increased, I think he said 10 cents per head. Well, Sir, if the hon. gentleman will condescend to look up our taxation for 1878 he will find that even adding the million of deficit which occurred in that year, our total taxation did not amount to more than $18,500,000. Our total taxation in 1883—I am excluding, of course, items which appear on both sides—our total taxation derived from Customs and Excise amounted, according to the hon. gentleman's own statement, to close on $30,000,000. Now, does he mean this House should believe that whereas the people were taxed $18,500,000 in 1878, while they now pay $30,000,000, they only pay 10 cents per head more? And will he say that whereas the people were taxed $25,449,000 in 1884, while they only paid $18,500,000 in 1878, allowing for the deficit in that year, the people are only taxed 10 cents per head more? Now I am not going to take up the time of the House by following the hon. gentleman through that most ingenious calculation which he took off surpluses and applied them in reduction of the rate of taxation. First, he takes our money; he takes $20,000,000 more than he wants; then he deducts this sum and says: Because I took $20,000,000 more, by an expensive process, out of your pockets, than I required, therefore, gentlemen, you are $40,000,000 better off. I have here the financial report of the United States, and it contains some facts to which I call the attention of the hon. gentleman, and of the House. I find that the net debt of the United States on the 1st of November, 1884, deducting cash in the Treasury, was $1,408,000,000. Now, the hon. gentleman knows well that in all human probability our net debt will be very little less than $240,000,000 on the 1st July. So here are we, a people of 4,400,000, with a net debt, in all human probability, on the 1st July, of $240,000,000, as against the net debt of the United States of $1,408,000,000. I find, Sir, from that same report, that the annual interest charges of the United States is $47,000,000. Now, in the estimates which the hon. gentleman has submitted, the annual charge, deducting the sinking fund appears to amount to $9,400,000. So that under the guidance of the hon. gentleman we have brought things to this pass: that we, who are barely one-thirteenth as numerous as the people of the United States, are paying one-fifth of the total sum of interest paid by the people of the United States. Is that a pleasant or a satisfactory state of things? And which of the two statements, mine or his, do these facts most fully bear out? We look in the same volume, at the statement of the expenditure, and I find the net expenditure, deducting the amount which goes for the reduction of the debt, amounted to $244,000,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Now, Sir, $244,000,000 are the total expenditures required by the people of the United States, with an estimated population, in 1885, of about 56,000,000—not 54,000,000, as the hon. gentleman supposed; my hon. friend near me says 57,000,000. Judging from the rate of increase which took place between 1871 and 1881, I think 56,000,000 is about the exact figure. Then this result follows, that the people of the United States, as I said, are thirteenfold as numerous as we, and we are required, deducting the sinking fund, to expend this year $31,800,000, or thereabouts. The hon. gentleman says he will want $32,850,000, but I deduct a million for the sinking fund, which is about the amount he expects to pay. He expects to provide $31,850,000 from various sources, while the people of the United States are required to provide for an expenditure of $244,000,000. Well, Sir, this is very little more than one-half per head for the expenditure of the United States. Let the hon. gentleman divide $31,850,000 by 4,400,000 population, and he will find that it amounts to very nearly $7.25 per head. Let him divide $244,000,000 by 56,000,000 population, and he will find that it very little exceeds $4 per head. Now, Sir, as to the other argument which the hon. gentleman had recourse to—the argument that because a large part of this money goes for the payment of subsidies, goes to pay for the maintenance of public works, etc., therefore a comparison is not fair. I beg to call his attention to the fact that the Americans pay huge sums of money for which we have no equivalent whatever. Where have we an equivalent to the $55,000,000 pensions which I find entered in the American expenditure?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That does not affect the case.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It does affect the case most materially. My argument is this, that we are in a worse position, compared with the Americans, than we were seventeen years ago. The hon. gentleman answers that we are not in a worse position, because we pay subsidies, they do not; while the fact is that, although the expenditures are not precisely similar; that although we have some items which the Americans do not pay, they have some items which we do not pay, such as pensions, and maintenance of the army and navy, the latter of which amounts to some $57,000,000. When the hon. gentleman tells us that he must include the municipal expenditures of the Americans and the expenses for State and other purposes, does the hon. gentleman suppose there are no municipal taxes in Canada? Does the hon. gentleman not know that very large sums of money are raised, particularly in the Province of Ontario, for municipal purposes?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I did not refer to the municipalities; I might have done so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Had the hon. gentleman referred to the municipalities, so far as Ontario is concerned, he would have found this result: That the municipal taxation of Ontario compares with the State and municipal taxation of the Union. In any case, it is a total mistake on his part, to refer to the State and municipal taxation. The great bulk of the State expenditure is supplied by the municipalities. They do not, of course, supply it all.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is an assessment on personal property and real estate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is collected from the municipalities. The hon. gentleman will find, if he chooses to go into that matter, if he takes all we have to pay in the municipalities, particularly in our major Province—it is not so to the same extent in the Province from which he comes—the comparison will not come out as he has stated it, it will not by any means be such as he appears to think. Nor does it in the least affect the point I made, which was this: We were in a more favorable position 17 years ago, as compared with the American Federal expenditure, than we occupy to-day. That was the point to which the hon. gentleman ought to have directed his attention, and when he has shown, and not until he has shown, that we have improved relatively as compared with the position which the Americans occupied 17 years ago, he will have been able to satisfactorily dispose of the argument I have used. The fact is this: The hon. gentleman has chosen to disregard the whole past history of this country. The hon. gentleman has disregarded every well-known rule of finance and has disregarded every plain dictate of common sense. He and his colleagues have chosen to try a most risky experiment. They have chosen to introduce a total revolution in our fiscal system, and have selected that period for a most uncalled for expenditure and for involving us in wholly unnecessary liabilities. More than that. They have thrown away very great opportunities, which opportunities may never again recur. The hon. gentleman, when he came here in 1879, had every advantage he could well ask. It was perfectly clear to everyone that it was a time at which an improvement all over the world might be looked for. There had been an unusually protracted period of distress in the United States, and signs of revival were apparent. It was quite clear that our speedy revival depended almost entirely on the speedy revival of trade in the United States. Then the hon. gentleman had—I suppose he will claim that for the National Policy also—several successive good harvests, and the country obtained good prices for the grain. There was a very great fall, as I have again and again pointed out, in the price of money all the world over. The North-West had been opened up, not by him, but by the energy of other persons, with whom he had nothing to do. The foolish bargain made by his colleagues with British Columbia had so far been modified that full time was given to complete the obligations entered into. More than that, the vast increase in the expenditure, which had been going on from 1867 to 1873, had been checked by the action of my hon. friend and his colleagues. In every possible way, therefore, the hon. gentleman had the way made easy to him. All those difficulties to which I have been alluding, which confront him, though he may choose to say they are not very serious, are self-sought by hon. gentlemen opposite. They have flung away their advantages; they have deliberately created all these difficulties, and now they appeal to us for consideration, and tell us they are the victims of uncontrollable circumstances. They are not so. They are the victims of their own deliberate disregard of the plainest rules of common sense and the plainest rules of finance. It is quite clear to us, as it is to everybody, that Canada has very formidable competition ahead. We no longer enjoy, in North America, as we thought we would do years ago, anything like a complete monopoly of the supply of cereals. We have not even the control—although the hon. gentleman appears to think so—of the stock trade with the mother country. Our farmers are called on to compete with farmers in all parts of the world—with California, New Zealand, Australia, India, Russia, and the Danubian Provinces, while they are exposed to the competition to which they have always been exposed in the United States. What method has the hon. gentleman taken to relieve the serious position of the agriculturalists and to help them? He assisted our agriculturalists by weighing them down with enormous taxation. I say it is the ne plus ultra of folly for the hon. gentleman and his colleagues to say that the farmers are better off under a load of heavy taxation. What the hon. gentleman has been telling us to-night is briefly this: that we are better off because we have wasted, taking into account the liabilities we have incurred, $52,000,000, which we need not have wasted, and which we have been compelled to borrow; because our taxes are now treble what they should have been; because heavy duties hamper all our producing industries; because our lumber costs us much more than it should do to produce, our grain costs us more to raise, our cattle more to feed, because our clothing, fuel and almost every necessary of life has been largely increased in cost by reason of the policy of the hon. gentleman. All I can say is this:

Than taxing men that they may richer grow.”

Let me contrast for a moment, as the hon. gentleman has challenged me to do, the policy of the Mackenzie Administration. I say that Government was not only frugal itself, but it produced frugality among the people. That that Government was a frugal Government I will give the hon. gentleman proof from his own Public Accounts. When they came into office the controllable expenditure was $3,300,000; when they left office it was $6,500,000. To-day, in the very last statement which the hon. gentleman has laid on the Table of the House, we find that the controllable expenditure, which we left at $6,500,000, has been increased to $11,300,000. It is all very well for the hon. gentleman—we will examine this in detail at a more fitting opportunity—to offer excuses more or less plausible for the enormous increase in that expenditure. What possible expenditure was ever incurred by any Government for which an ingenious gentleman could not offer some plausible excuse? I take my stand on this plain fact, that the expenditure which alone the Government can control was reduced by 25 per cent. by the Mackenzie Government and increased by nearly 100 per cent. by hon. gentlemen opposite. We preached frugality ourselves; we inculcated on the public thrift and self-reliance, and a great many of the facts to which the hon. gentleman has alluded go to show clearly and distinctly that, in spite of all the talk of distress which existed from 1874 to 1878, the great industries of the people were in no respect damaged; that the people, during that time, were accumulating property, the very property which they used afterwards and of which the hon. gentleman makes such boast. Sir, the $100,000,000 which he mentioned, if it did exist, and so far as it did exist, was largely the result of the thrift and frugality which were necessarily practised by the people during the years 1876-77-78, and not of the extravagant folly which took its place under the régime of the hon. gentleman. As to the Provinces, our policy was neither to meddle with or trample upon their just rights, nor to bribe them. Our policy was to settle our new territory with all possible speed, and the House must remember how my hon. friend was denounced because, under circumstances of great difficulty, he proceeded with the opening up of that new territory at the earliest possible moment. I must say that the Finance Minister should have been the last man in Canada to criticise the Government of Mr. Mackenzie and his colleagues; and for this excellent reason, that more than to any other human being, was it due to the imprudence and lack of foresight of the Finance Minister that there was any difficulty in administering the finances of Canada. Sir, in 1873, what the hon. gentleman did was this: He came down to this House, as he came to-night, with an estimated expenditure of $20,000,000. He did not tell us, he did not breathe a word, he did not give a hint, which might lead us to suppose that there were millions upon millions of other expenses of which he gave us no intimation; and before the House rose, that hon. gentleman had added $4,000,000 a year to the permanent expenditure for which he had made no provision whatever. In the first place, by the terms upon which he admitted Prince Edward Island, an annual addition of $820,000 was made to our expenditures. By the better terms he granted to the New Brunswick and the other Provinces, a further addition of $320,000 was made. By the Mounted Police Bill which they introduced, $330,000 was added; by increases of salaries, $300,000 more was added; by the loan which he negotiated, and of which he said nothing at the time, $450,000 was added; by Indian treaties negotiated, and for which, I admit, his colleagues were more responsible than the hon. gentleman, $300,000 or $400,000 were added, and besides that, he and his colleagues had committed the country to a huge series of public works, the cost of which, for interest alone, he himself estimated as amounting to about $3,300,000 of a permanent addition.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. For interest alone?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes. I do not charge him with all this interest, but for at least $1,000,000 a year the hon. gentleman was chargeable. He made no provision for that addition; he did not inform the House of it; he went out, leaving behind the certainty to his successors that that they would have to provide for all these huge sums which he added. Sir, I say that the object was twofold. The House will recollect the circumstances under which that was done. First of all, the hon. gentleman and his colleagues supposed, at one time, that by all this extraordinary extravagance they could induce the House to condone the fault they had committed, and in the next place, though I do not charge the hon. gentleman with it, I fear his colleagues intended that if they did fall they would leave behind such a precious legacy to their successors that no skill, on their part, would enable them to cope with it successfully. And what is the policy of the hon. gentleman now? First of all, he imposes excessive taxation, he stimulates inflation in every conceivable way. The second result of his policy has been that the hon. gentleman offered extraordinary inducements to many men to rush into manufactures, extraordinary inducements to put capital into those enterprises to which he alluded; and he no doubt succeeded for a time in blowing the bubble. He has immensely increased our debt. He has enormously increased our expenditure, and he has further needlessly incurred monstrous liabilities. Now, Sir, what was our policy with respect to manufacturers? The hon. gentleman has alluded to that. Our policy was briefly this: to keep taxation as low as possible, and for this reason: That the lower we kept the taxation the less cost the manufacturers would be at in producing articles. They would have a better chance of competing abroad with other competitors; they would have more and better home customers, and what is quite as important, as they have since discovered, they would have less indiscreet competition at home than they were formerly subjected to. The hon. gentleman has adopted a precisely opposite policy, and here we see the fruits of it. He has given us very high taxation. He has increased to all manufacturers the cost of production, and he has therefore exposed them to a considerable extent more than before to foreign competition, because in a good many cases among the manufacturers the report which reaches me is this: That owing to the increased cost of production under his tariff they suffer more from foreign competition than they would have had to suffer under a moderate revenue tariff. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman, has seriously interfered, as is quite clear, with their chances of exporting. I showed just now that although we ought to have increased our absolute exports of domestic manufactures, there had been a decrease of one-half million; and the hon. gentleman behind me tells me that in several branches of trade in which we were doing well before, our progress has been exceedingly slow since 1878. There are other things of importance to which the hon. gentleman should have alluded to-night. The hon. gentleman knows the position of the Maritime Provinces; he knows that in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and, I fear, in Prince Edward Island, many industries are languishing; that the people are not profiting in the slightest degree by his tariff, but are earnestly looking forward to see whether the hon. gentlemen are taking any steps whatever to ensure them reciprocity with the United States. Not a word, not a syllable, did the hon. gentleman say upon that question, or as to our fisheries, although he knows that, within a few months, our treaty with the United States will expire, although he knows that, within a few months, a large portion of the most valuable market of the Provinces with which he is specially connected may be taken away from them. He has nothing to tell us on all those important questions; he preserves an ominous silence, and perhaps he is right, because, unhappily, his policy has placed us in a far worse position to negotiate a reciprocity treaty than we were in before. One significant thing occurred in the recess, to which no allusion was made, but to which it is well that we should allude, because it shows, in a very marked degree, the extraordinarily desperate position to which the public mind has come with respect to the position of the country, especially in the Maritime Provinces. I allude to that rather remarkable proposition to annex Jamaica to the Dominion of Canada. Now, it is quite clear that the steps taken in that matter were not taken without some concert with some person high up in the councils of the Dominion, and it is remarkable that when that matter was first alluded to in the press, we found that the paid subsidised Ministerial organs, from one end of the country to the other, took up that project, and pointed out what an extremely desirable thing it would be for Canada to annex an island 2,000 miles off in the Caribbean Sea; and what an extremely desirable thing it would be for the hon. gentleman to have 25 or 30 additional supporters, in order that he might be prepared for the worst emergencies. Now, the hon. gentleman did not deal—and I do not know that we can blame him too much for that—he did not deal much in forecasting the immediate future. I fear, Sir, from old experience, the hon. gentleman has suppressed a good deal. We know perfectly well—and there are gentlemen in this House who have not hesitated to tell us, although the hon. gentleman has preserved a discreet silence—the position in which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are placed. The hon. gentleman did not say one word as to the policy of the Government on that head; he gave us very little indication as to what we might expect. Now, Sir, I shall not stop at present to analyse the various remarkable statements made to us on the subject of the Canadian Pacific Railway, although I did notice that the hon. gentlemen told us that the expenditure he had incurred was likely to give us railway facilities quite unequalled in the world; and if the statement I have seen as to the grades and curvatures on the Canadian Pacific Railway be correct, I am bound to say that we are likely to have a railway in that respect quite unequalled in the world. I could very well believe that the original cart road proposed to be laid in British Columbia would not have had a bit steeper grades than those which appear by the returns to be permitted by the Government. The hon. gentleman cannot tell, and I do not know, what the future of the production of grain will be. I do not believe that the prices will, for a long period, continue to rule as low as they are at present; but when next the hon. gentleman is making a statement of our prospects, he would do well to remember that we may be confronted with low prices in various directions. The hon. gentleman knows that there has been a large diminution in the production of lumber. The hon. gentleman does not, I suppose, anticipate any such difficulties as we had to contend with in 1877 and 1878. I do not anticipate them, and I hope, for his sake, and for the sake of the country, that he will not have to face any such a disastrous period. But it is quite possible that the value of imports will continue to fall, and that on account of the cessation of the enormous expenditure going on on the Canadian Pacific Railway, there may be a very serious collapse; that there may be a heavy reduction in the total volume of our imports, and consequently of the revenue of the hon. gentleman. He recognises that contingency, but he does not profess to make any preparation on that account; and I say nothing of other contingencies that may occur, or claims that may be made upon the Government. But these are things that cannot be omitted, if we desire to make an accurate forecast of the future; and I think it would be well that the hon. gentleman, when reviewing the situation of the country, should have given us some little more idea than he did, as to how he proposes to deal with the serious contingencies that may arise, or in the event of any one—I do not say any two or three—of these things to which I have called attention, taking place. Now, Sir, I have once or twice pointed out, though not in this place, the political issues which have been involved by the conduct of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman and his colleagues, when they came into power in 1867, ought to have proposed, I think, these three things above all others. They ought to have endeavored to see that our Provinces should rely upon themselves. I have never denied that there were difficulties to be overcome in carrying on our Confederation. It required much mutual forbearance and concession on the part of all the Provinces who brought it about. But it is plain to every man acquainted with the debates which took place, or acquainted with the history of the United States, that you can do no greater injury to Confederation than to encourage all these Provinces into believing that when they get into difficulty they have a right to have recourse to the general Exchequer. I say the hon. gentleman and his colleagues, by their conduct in that respect, have done a great injury to their own cause. They have placed us at a great disadvantage in a comparison with the United States, and they have not pursued the third object that should have been put before them, that is, the speedy development of the North-West. I want to call attention to the effect of the course pursued with respect to these various Provinces. Unfortunately, in both Ontario and Quebec, for different reasons, grave difficulties exist. We know that Quebec has been making demands and is continuing to make demands on the Dominion Treasury which it may be difficult to grant and difficult to refuse; and Ontario, in like manner, has been, through the mouths of her responsible Ministers, calling attention to the fact that Ontario has claims which cannot be overlooked, and rights which must be respected, and that Ontario must insist when grants are made to the other Provinces that like grants are made to her who, to say the least, pays her full proportion of the revenue which the hon. gentleman disburses. When I come to the Maritime Provinces, what do I find? Theirs, I must admit, is a hard case. They were brought into this Confederation by distinct promises on the part of the hon. gentleman and his colleagues, which have been ruthlessly violated. It was at least a tacit understanding that no such tariff as that we now labor under should be imposed upon them. They appear to be injured at all points. They are largely an importing people, a maritime and fishing people, and it is absurd to say that such a tariff as the hon. gentleman has imposed can be otherwise than injurious to those Provinces. Their trade has been taken away at both ends. We need not say anything of the city of St. John, as the hon. gentleman admits it is in a distressed condition; but I may point to the fact that some of the hon. gentleman's own friends have been advocating annexation as the only possible means of escape from the distressed position in which they are placed; and the other day resolutions were laid on the Table of the Nova Scotia Assembly, proposing that the Union with the rest of Canada should be dissolved, and that that Province should resume its old station under the Crown. Then, turning to the North-West, I do not think the hon. gentleman can say that its condition is one that he can look on with satisfaction. There, too, primary rights have been trampled on. Without excuse, and in defiance of their own interests, the hon. gentlemen have interfered with the development of that country and have probably prevented many thousands of most excellent settlers from going in there. I say nothing of their land policy, which will come up for discussion further on; but if these hon. gentlemen had the slightest understanding of the wants of that country, they would sooner have cut off their right hands than have flung away, as they did last year, $30,000,000 of the people's money. I say no greater blunder was ever committed than the throwing away of that amount of money to carry a railway around the rocky coast of Lake Superior or through the gorges of British Columbia, when one-tenth of that sum, judiciously expended, would have secured for that North-West country 200,000 settlers within the space of two years. I tell the hon. gentlemen that they have not yet realised the extent of their folly with respect to that country. Had they left it alone and not interfered with its natural development, it would have been in a much more advanced position to-day. Those years which have been thrown away are true seed years; they are years that cannot return; long time must elapse before we shall find ourselves in half as favorable a position as we were before the hon. gentleman chose to interfere on behalf of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Not only have we to begin at the beginning, but we have to conquer the bad reputation the hon. gentlemen have established for themselves. Hon. gentlemen should remember that it is only too true at this moment that there are about a million of native-born Canadians in the United States, a large portion of whom would have been in Manitoba but for the maladministration of hon. gentlemen opposite, and that these people will continue to attract a very large number of their fellow-countrymen who, under more favorable circumstances, would have been only too happy to have settled under the British flag. Now, I have spoken of the adverse comparison which our policy compels everybody to make between it and that of the United States. I have pointed out, in addition, the effect of our fiscal policy on our trade with Great Britain; in fact, we have been treating Great Britain worse than a foreign country. The hon. gentleman opposite me (Sir John A. Macdonald) has thrown out vague and lofty promises as to his desire to co-operate in some scheme of Confederation, a subject as to which, however, it has not been convenient for him to give us any indication here; but I point out to him none of those things can be done without large contributions from our Exchequer, and the House knows now only too well how difficult, how almost impossible it is for us to contribute practically or effectually to anything of the kind. I do not pretend to say that all the mischief I have pointed out has been due to protection. If it has been due to protection indirectly, it has been more due to the extravagance of the present Government, to their mistake in over-taxing the people and thus acquiring great surpluses, the possession of which always tempts a Government to gross extravagance, as it has tempted the present Government. But I do not pretend to say that with us, any more than with the United States, protection in itself would have been anything more than an impediment. What is really damaging our position is not the effect of the protective system so much as the effect of the enormous extravagance of the Administration. I desire to call your attention briefly to the position at which we have now arrived, the position to which gentlemen opposite have brought us. Practically speaking, the federal taxation alone will involve, according to my calculation, very nearly one-sixth of the income of our people. Practically speaking—I do not take the extravagant estimates of the Finance Minister, but my own much more moderate estimate of the real taxation—practically speaking, the taxes which we are levying from our people would suffice to maintain about 130,000 families in comfort, or very nearly the sixth part of our whole population. The efforts of the Government to bring people into this country, their enormous expenditure, the so-called National Policy, have resulted in this, that according to our own returns and statistics there is, as I have said just now, only too great reason to fear that out of every native-born Canadian now in existence, one man in four is to be found in the United States, and out of the immigrants that we pay for and bring to this country, three out of four, if not nine out of ten, exclusive of those who go to Manitoba, find their way to the United States also, as is most conclusively shown by the census returns recently laid on the table. As I have said, the population in our chief Provinces is nearly at a standstill, the outlying Provinces are clamoring for annexation as a remedy, and what have these hon. gentlemen done? They have failed to get reciprocity; they have failed—and failed utterly—to make commercial treaties; they have failed in colonising the North-West; they have failed entirely to restore the balance of trade or equilibrium between exports and imports, to which the hon. gentleman attached so much importance; so that, instead of having an equilibrium, the imports have been $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 more than the total volume of exports. They have failed entirely to keep their promises in the matter of keeping up the prices of agricultural products; they have failed to satisfy the Provinces, for every single Province in the Dominion is knocking at our doors for more; they have failed to keep the advantage they had over the United States; they have failed entirely to keep our people in the country, and they have failed in obtaining the enormous amount of revenue which they alleged they were to have extracted from our Dominion lands. Why, the amount of revenue extracted from those lands will not pay the expense of surveying them, an expense which they charged to capital account; but their course has not been an entire failure; no doubt they have succeeded in some things. They succeeded in producing an inflation in business; they have succeeded in turning what might have been honest prosperity into a sort of South Sea Bubble—or North-West Bubble, if you choose to call it so; they have succeeded in creating huge monopolies, and they have succeeded, to a very great extent, by means of subsidies to the press and by other similar means, in degrading the moral sentiment of the country. If the question be asked, can we repair this? I say frankly and candidly that the effects of such evils as these are likely to be very lasting. I do not believe, for my part, they will be very easily removed. I fear that the taint has gone deep. One of the worst results of the extravagance of the Government is this, that, to a very great extent, and for a very long time to come, it will tend to make any honest government impossible, and so the people of Canada are discovering to their cost. A very sharp surgery will be needed. In these six years our position has altered very materially for the worse, and not only materially, but morally. Our case is much like that of the man in the parable. We did succeed in casting out the evil spirit of 1873, but in 1878 he returned again, and if the evil spirit did not quite fulfil the direction of the parable and bring seven other spirits worse than himself with him, probably it was because, having searched diligently, he could not find them. I say that we have wasted great opportunities; I say that we have greatly impaired resources which, wisely used, might have given us in the North-West a more prosperous Province than any we now possess; I say, moreover, as I pointed out, that we have incurred great liabilities to which the Finance Minister made no allusion, but which will undoubtedly have to be met. I admit frankly that the way out of this is not going to be easy, that it will be painful, tedious and difficult. It is true, we are not without good points; it is quite true that all over Canada at present food is cheap and abundant, and is likely, for many years to come, to be cheap and abundant; it is true, we have great resources in our fertile lands which, year by year and day by day, will become more valuable, because a very large proportion of equally good country in the United States is likely to be used for other purposes than wheat growing. I know that there are great potential resources in the country, and that in time we might regain the vantage ground we have lost. Moreover, it is quite true that, in spite of these difficulties, there is, and always will be in, a country like this, a considerable growth, even though it be in a one-sided direction, but no man can consider the facts I have laid before this House and say that the increase in our population, that our progress, that our position, are at all such as we had a right to expect they would be when we first entered Confederation some seventeen years ago. I am aware that in stating all the facts, I have been obliged to state some very unpalatable truths, and I am quite prepared, hon. gentlemen opposite and their press and friends should attack me in any way they please; they will find it much easier to attack me than to refute the arguments I have used. These gentlemen are fond of declaring that my speeches are mischievous; an hon. gentleman opposite was good enough to say that I had done mischief by my speeches, not only in Canada but all over the world. It is not my speeches, Sir, that are mischievous, but the acts that call them forth. It is those acts and not my speeches that have done injury here and elsewhere. Now, I say it is for us to face the facts. We challenge investigation. This is the third time at least that we have taken issue with these hon. gentlemen. We took issue with them in 1871 and in 1872 and in 1873, and, had our advice been listened to then, Canada would have been the richer to-day by hundreds of millions than it is. We took issue with them in 1878, when they entered on this foolish mis-called National Policy, of which they will in a very short time be reaping the unpleasant results. We took issue with them in 1880 and in 1881, when they chose to deliver over the most valuable portion of this continent in posse, if not in esse, to a monopoly, the like of which never before existed in any country under the sun. Again we take issue with them, and we say that, if they persist in their recklessness and go on piling up debt and piling up expenditure as they have been doing, for a year or two more, the end is near. We tell them that there is less real union among our people than there was twelve years ago, and that it is their maladministration that has been the cause of it. Where is there a Province that has not got some separate grievance of its own, that has not got some separate demand? We have some Provinces alienated from us by our unjust tariff. We find that, while our population remains stationary, our debt keeps increasing in an enormous ratio, the like of which has never been known or seen in Canada before; and all this is the result of a most unusual combination of favorable circumstances. No man could have had better fortune; no man could have had greater luck; and the result of all these favorable circumstances is, that they have dragged us a great deal deeper into debt, that they have enormously added to our expenditure, and that they have driven away an enormous mass of our population. I say in conclusion, and I say it, not as a matter of rhetorical statement, but as a simple matter of fact, capable of mathematical demonstration, that I believe to-day, if we sat down and counted the cost, we would find that this country has lost more in six years of evil Government relatively to its population and its resources than the people of the United States did in the four years of desperate civil war which immediately preceded the formation of our Confederation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I desire to move the adjournment of the debate.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I propose that the House should go into committee now in reference to the resolutions affecting cigars, and should take the report of the committee before adjourning.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE. There may be some enquiry needed afterwards, and I suppose we shall have the same privilege as if we were in committee?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Just the same.

Resolutions in reference to the duty on cigars (p. 333) agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that it is expedient that these resolutions should take effect from and after the 4th day of March inst.

Motion agreed to; and resolutions to be reported.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12:55 a.m., Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 4th March, 18-5.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 80) to incorporate the Fort McLeod Rancho Telegraph Company.—(Mr. Ives.)

Bill (No. 81) respecting the Canada Co-operative Supply Association (Limited).—(Mr. Curran.)

Bill (No. 82) to incorporate the Winnipeg and Prince Albert Railway Company.—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria.)

Bill (No. 83) to incorporate the Kootenay Railway Company of British Columbia.—(Mr. Small.)

AMHERST AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY.

Mr. TOWNSHEND moved for leave to introduce a Bill to incorporate the Amherst and Prince Edward Island Railway Company.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). Before that motion is carried I would like to enquire whether the rules concerning the introduction of Bills have been complied with in reference to this Bill. I may say that in connection with this Bill I was present several times before the Standing Orders Committee, and I there found that the necessary notices had not been given, and I was informed by the chairman of the committee that it would be impossible to introduce that Bill this Session. As this Bill would affect the constituency in which I am interested, and no notice has been given of it in that constituency, I think it is unfair that it should be rushed through contrary to the rules.

Mr. SPEAKER. The Committee on Standing Orders to-day have reported that among the petitions which they examined and found correct, was one of Moffatt and others, of Amherst County, praying for an Act incorporating the Amherst and Prince Edward Island Railway Company.

Mr. WOOD. Is that sufficient?

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose that the report is the usual report of the Committee on Standing Orders, that the notices have been complied with. We are left to infer that the proper notices have been given.

Mr. BEATY. The matter stands in this shape: The hon. member did appear before the committee on a former occasion, but the time was enlarged so that notices might be proved. Since then, evidence of publication has been produced, and the committee decided to report favorably on the Bill. We regret that the hon. member was not present, but the clerk stated he had notice of the meeting; and as the notice has been proved, the committee saw no reason why the Bill should not be reported.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). No notice was given to me, and I am bound to oppose the Bill at the present stage, as it will affect my county.

Mr. BLAKE. I understand that the rule with respect to the action of the Standing Orders Committee, is this: When the committee come to the conclusion that the notice was such as to actually comply with the rules, they simply report the fact. But when they come to the conclusion that the notice was not sufficient they state the fact and call the attention of the House to it, so that the House has the opportunity of dealing with the particular question upon its merits. The committee appears to have deviated from the course. It seems the notice was not sufficient at the time, according to the strict rules.

Mr. BEATY. The committee thought there was not sufficient reason to make any special remarks about the matter.

Mr. BLAKE. We ought to know on each occasion upon which the Standing Orders Committee has come to the conclusion that the notice is not sufficient on the day on which they act, and a recommendation should be made to the House. Such committee has heretofore recommended that the notice be deemed adequate and the Bill allowed to proceed. Then the House has an opportunity of considering the matter; but until the statement was made by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), we had reasons to suppose that the rules had been complied with, because the terms of the report are such as have hitherto been confined to that class of cases. The proper course for the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) to adopt is, to move that such portion of the report as refers to the Bill in question be referred back to the Standing Orders Committee.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In this case you find that one of the members interested in this matter, because his county is interested in it, says he had no notice, and that the committee's report as presented to the House does not cover the ground; it only states that the committee considers the notice sufficient. We have another member of the committee who goes further and says that the time fixed by the regulations of Parliament have not been complied with; but inasmuch as the time fixed in those regulations would expire before the Bill could reach the Railway Committee, the committee decided under those circumstances they would report that the Bill was satisfactory. An hon. member (Mr. Wood) who is interested in the project claims there should be more time allowed. It would be proper for the motion for leave to introduce the Bill to be withdrawn, as suggested by the leader of the Opposition, and that such portion of the report as refers to this matter be referred back to the committee to give them time to report according to the rule.

Motion withdrawn.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland) moved that so much of the report as refers to the Bill to incorporate the Amherst and Prince Edward Island Railway Company be referred back to the Committee on Standing Orders.

Motion agreed to.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY.

Mr. MITCHELL. As I see the right hon. Premier in his place, I would like to ask him, with the permission of the House, whether he is prepared to bring down the list of Grand Trunk stockholders, which was ordered by the House last Session.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am not prepared to bring it down because I have not got it to bring down. As I understand, my hon. friend moved for this return by an Order of the House. The Order was granted and was sent in the ordinary way to the Secretary of State, and his Department sent it to the Railway Department, seeing that it was a railway matter. They however did not communicate it to the Grand Trunk.

Mr. MITCHELL. It got buried there, I suppose.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They have, however, sent it to the Grand Trunk, and they have forwarded it to England in order to get the list.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is all right; we will get it some time or other. I would also ask the Premier at what time he will send us down the agreement between the Government and the Grand Trunk about the million pounds sterling.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am glad the hon. gentleman has reminded me of it; I will hunt it up and bring it down.

TEMPORARY LOANS TO GOVERNMENT BY BANKS

Mr. CHARLTON asked. What is the total amount of temporary loans made by the Government from banks up to February 25th, the date and amount of each loan and from what bank made, and the terms of each loan as to time—whether upon a call or otherwise?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There was a loan to the Government by the Merchants' Bank on the 7th of November, 1884, of $500,000 for six months; by the Imperial Bank, on the 17th December, 1884, of $250,000 for six months; by the City and District Savings Bank, on the 9th of January, 1885, $250,000 for eight months and $250,000 for twelve months; and on the 18th of February, $250,000, for six months; by the Bank of Montreal, on the 1st of February, 1885, $2,000,000 for eight months; total in Canada, $3,500,000. In England—the London and Westminster Bank, on the 1st of January, 1885, £1,300,000 sterling for six months; from Baring Bros. & Co., at various dates, and Glynn, Mills & Co., for Baring, Mills & Co., £233,986 12s. 9d., due in September, 1885; from Glynn, Mills, Curry & Co., £267,500, due in September, 1885; total in England, £1,801,486 12s. 9d., in all about $12,500,000.

SHORT LINE SURVEY FROM ST. CHARLES STATION.

Mr. LANDRY (Montmagny) asked, Whether the Government have issued orders for an instrumental survey of the line beginning at St. Charles Station, on the Intercolonial Railway, passing by the second range of the Township of Montmagny near River Du Sud, and thence towards Sever Islands?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There has been no application for this survey in the Department of Railways and Canals.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY RELIEF.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to propose any measure for the relief of the Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.

Canadian Pacific Railway Company from its embarrassments?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There has been no application from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to propose a measure of relief from its embarrassments.

INTEREST OF LOANS TO THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has paid to the Government any, and if so, what amounts for interest on the loans of last Session; and at what dates? If not, has any, and if so, what arrangement has been made as to such interest?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. All the interest due on the loans made to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company up to the present day have been paid, and the following are the amounts: $147,136.87, on the 17th August, 1884; $273,750.78 on the 12th of September, 1884, and $147,769.24 on the 17th February, 1885.

APPRAISER OF CUSTOMS AT SUMMERSIDE.

Mr. YEO asked, Why was the office of appraiser of Customs at Summerside abolished, and who at present is acting, and what is his pay?

Mr. BOWELL. The office of appraiser at Port Summerside was abolished on the 1st of September, 1879, the service of the officer not being required. The collector is, by virtue of his office, the appraiser, and his salary is $900 per annum.

SUPERANNUATION OF J. B. SCHURMAN.

Mr. YEO asked, Why was the locker, Mr. J. B. Schurman, superannuated, and who at present fills his place, and at what salary?

Mr. BOWELL. Mr. Schurman was superannuated on account of age, and his services were no longer required. There being nothing for him to do no successor was appointed, and consequently no salary was paid.

COLLECTOR OF INLAND REVENUE AT SUMMERSIDE.

Mr. YEO asked, Why was the collector of Inland Revenue at Summerside discharged, and who is at present filling his office, and at what salary?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The services of the collector of Inland Revenue at Summerside were dispensed with on the repeated reports of our inspector that he was entirely unfit to discharge the duties of his office, that he made not even a pretence of keeping accounts, and that he was so infirm as to be unable to attend to the office. No successor was appointed, the work has been done by the staff, and there is no salary paid for the office.

ETCHEMIN RIVER LINE.

Mr. LESAGE asked, Whether the Government have come to a decision as to an instrumental survey of the line by the valley of the river Etchemin, of which a barometrical survey has already been made by Messrs. Light and Wicksteed? If so, when will the survey be commenced?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A barometrical survey has been made, and the Government are now considering the question of an instrumental survey.

IMMIGRANT SHEDS AT MEDICINE HAT.

Mr. WATSON asked, Did the Government call for tenders for the construction of the immigrant sheds at Medicine Hat, or was the contract let without tenders being asked for?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Tenders were called for the construction of the immigrant sheds at Medicine Hat in the papers of Winnipeg, Emerson, Minnedosa, Morris, Regina, McLeod, St. Boniface and Selkirk.

STAGE LINES TO AND FROM FORT McLEOD.

Mr. WATSON asked, Have the Government subsidised a stage line between Medicine Hat and Fort McLeod, as well as a stage line between Calgary and Fort McLeod? If so, who are the contractors and by what route are the mails to and from Fort McLeod carried?

Mr. CARLING. There is no subsidised stage line between Medicine Hat and Fort McLeod. There is a contract for carrying the mails between Calgary and Fort McLeod. The contractor is Mr. J. Stewart. The route is direct from Calgary to Fort McLeod.

MOUNTED POLICE BARRACKS.

Mr. WATSON asked, Were tenders advertised for by the Government for the erection of mounted police barracks at several points in the North-West Territories before the contracts were let?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It has not been the practice heretofore to advertise for tenders for the erection or repair of mounted police barracks. The services of the men being largely utilised for that purpose.

GRANT FOR WHARVES ON PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. DAVIES asked, Whether the sum of $53,222.19 voted last Session to the Government of Prince Edward Island for the construction and maintenance of certain wharves on said Island has been paid to that Government? If so, at what date? Was that Government required to sign a receipt in full of all claims on the Dominion Government in relation to those wharves as provided for in the Minute of Council agreeing to the payment of the money? If not, was any other, and what agreement come to with reference to the claim of the Island Government, and is it intended to pay the latter Government any further and what amount on account of said wharf claims?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman will see that it would be much more convenient to embody this question in an order for papers. If he does so they will be brought down immediately.

Mr. DAVIES. But I do not know that anything has been done.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The fact that I suggest that to the hon. gentleman shows that something has been done.

Mr. DAVIES. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to transform this into a notice of motion? If he does, I will move for a return.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It will come at the proper place.

Mr. DAVIES. Does the hon. gentleman give me an answer or decline?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I said that if the hon. gentleman made the motion, it would be granted and we would bring down the papers. But he must see that this is beyond an ordinary question; I cannot come down and read all these papers; it is really one of those questions that should be embodied in a notice of motion. We do not intend to refuse the papers; on the contrary, they will be brought down as soon as the motion is made.

THE GOVERNMENT GOLD RESERVE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved for:

Copies of all correspondence since 1st January, 1884, between the Minister of Finance and any of the banks of the Dominion in reference to withdrawals of gold from the Government, together with a statement of all sums of gold imported by Government from the 1st January, 1884.

He said: In moving for this return I desire to say that at the present moment the amount of our gold reserve in proportion to our total liabilities appears to me to be exceedingly small. I will require to go back a little in order to explain to the House why I entertain that opinion. The elder members of this House no doubt recollect that almost immediately before the formation of the Confederation the Government being then in great straits for want of money, practically seized upon one-half of the gold reserve theretofore held by the banks, and substituted for that reserve their own legal tender notes. Now, I do not want to discuss that original measure further than to say that I opposed it at the time, believing that it would perilously reduce the total amount of gold held in the Dominion, which I thought was quite as small as a country in our position ought to hold. After I became Finance Minister, I took steps at once to increase the amount of our reserve of gold; I altered the law in such fashion that after we issued $9,000,000 worth of notes, we were compelled to hold up to $12,000,000 at least, 50 per cent. in gold. After $12,000,000 were issued, we held dollar for dollar. I may also state that that step was taken not only for the purpose of giving greater security to our note-holders, but also because it was found that the amount borrowed at call from the people through the medium of the savings banks was increasing. Later on this measure was repealed, and the present measure substituted, which reduces the total amount of gold held by the Government to 15 per cent. of the total note issue without any reference to the amount of that note issue; and it provides that 10 per cent. are to be held in notes guaranteed by the Imperial Government. I desire to call the special attention of the House to this. In 1866 the position of the banks of Canada was as follows: On the 1st of January, 1866, the various banks held $7,594,000 in gold against a total liability of $43,000,000. A little after that date, as I have said, the Government took possession of a large portion of the gold. In 1878, the position of the Government gold reserve was as follows: We had on the 1st of July, in gold, $2,519,000, and our total liabilities payable at call, whether they were in notes or for savings bank deposits, amounted to $18,900,000, so that against $18,900,000 we held an available reserve of gold of $2,519,000. We had also at that moment a large amount of guaranteed securities, although they were not specifically pledged as security for our notes and savings bank deposits. Now, by the return in the Gazette, I find that on the 1st of February last, we had $2,610,000 in gold, against a total liability for notes and savings bank deposits of $47,750,000, in round numbers; so that although we had added very nearly $30,000,000 to our liabilities, payable at call, we had not increased our gold reserve at all, or only to the extent of a few thousand dollars. It is quite true there is the sum of £600,000, not quite $3,000,000, guaranteed bonds, which are, as I understand, by law specifically pledged for this purpose. Nevertheless, I doubt very much whether it is expedient for us to reduce our total holding of gold to the sum I have named. Anybody who chooses to compare our bank returns of to-day will see that at this moment, with total liability on the part of our banks of $133,000,000, we only hold about as much gold as we did in 1866 when our total liabilities were only $43,000,000, the remainder of the cash reserves being made up of about $11,000,000 of Dominion notes. The exact figures are as follows: On the 1st of February, 1885, the gold held by the various banks amounted to $7,620,000 and the Dominion notes held by them to $11,923,000. Now the gold and also the Dominion notes represent that amount of cash which the banks hold to be an adequate reserve for their $133,000,000. It bears nearly the same proportion, not quite one-sixth, to their liabilities, which the gold they held in 1866 did. It is quite clear that if the banks had been left to their own devices, there would have been at present at least $20,000,000 gold held by them as against any calls that might be made upon them. At present they only hold $7,600,000, and the Government hold $2,600,000, so that in point of fact all the gold in Canada is just about one-half of what it would have been, in the natural course of things, had no interference been made. It is quite true that it is not very likely that any very large amount either of savings bank or post office deposits will be called upon, at the same it is quite possible that circumstances may occur which may produce a sharp withdrawal of them, and that is a thing that should be carefully taken into our reckoning. We are, at this moment, practically carrying on a very large banking business. We have a bank note issue of $16,660,000, we have also borrowed from the people at call $31,000,000, so that we owe $48,000,000 in round numbers, against which we hold in gold only $2,600,000. It is quite true that we hold, or did hold, a considerable amount of guaranteed securities; no doubt those are a very valuable class of securities, no doubt, when reasonable notice is given, the Finance Minister can from time to time obtain gold for them. But I submit that notwithstanding all that, that so large liabilities as $47,000,000 would justify us, on ordinary banking principles, in holding a very much more considerable reserve in gold than the very small sum of $2,600,000; I submit further it is doubly desirable in this country that the Government should be fortified with a large amount of gold, because our position is considerably worse than those of other countries where the circulation is dependent on a gold basis. In the United States the Government have in their possession an enormous amount of gold and silver bullion. I think that at present they are the largest gold holders in the world, in any case, they hold an enormous sum which would be available in case of any disturbance in their markets. Then in England there is a very large amount of gold in circulation, because there the bank notes in use are of very much higher denominations than our own. I doubt whether it would be safe for us to hold bank deposits as a sufficient reserve against these large liabilities in Dominion notes and deposits on call. I doubt this for the excellent reason that in a time of stringency and contraction, by drawing on these bank deposits the Government would only aggravate the evil, and the securities, whether they be our own or guaranteed securities, are not by any means, a perfect equivalent for gold. I do not know and I intend to ask the Finance Minister to state what he has done with this £600,000 sterling. He has imported a fair amount of gold, and I desire to know whether, for the purpose of obtaining that gold, he found it necessary to pledge or to dispose of any part of the £600,000 guaranteed 4 per cents. But wholly apart from that, even if there had been no inconvenience in dealing with this question of gold reserve and of the withdrawals of gold on the part of the banks, it would be desirable on general principles that a Government having such huge liabilities should strengthen their hands and should hold something more than the exceedingly small amount of gold which they now hold. I am informed, and it was freely stated in the public prints, that all through last year, very considerable practical inconvenience resulted from the small amount of gold held by the Government; I am informed that demands were often made by the banks to the Finance Department for gold, to which it was found exceedingly inconvenient to accede; I have been told that in point of fact there was almost a feud between the Department and the banks, the banks wanting the gold and the Department finding it exceedingly inconvenient to give it, that remonstrances, written or verbal, were addressed by the hon. Minister or his Deputy, on several occasions, to several banks which, in the natural course of business, wished to withdraw gold for Government legal tenders. If that be the case, I say it is very unfortunate, and I say it is desirable the Government of Canada should be in a position to retire at call all its own tenders which the banks may require the Government to retire. I am quite aware the hon. gentleman has incorporated a provision requiring the banks to hold a large percentage of their cash reserves in legal tenders, but the more stringent is the rule the more the hon. Minister should see it is not worked to the detriment of the public. If the banks see fit to reduce their cash reserve and to send in a demand for gold, they should not be told that the Government considered their proceeding a very unfriendly one. Judging by the statement which the hon. gentleman laid on the Table, it appears to me great inconvenience might arise should a stringency unfortunately occur in the money market in the great money centres. Every day it is becoming more and more clear that, when money stringencies occur, they are likely to occur very nearly simultaneously all the world over. It is very probable that stringencies might occur within a very short space of time in New York and London and Paris and other great centres. Then very likely there would be a demand on the part of the Canadian banks for gold, and, with the very small reserve which the hon. gentleman possesses and looking at the serious liabilities he has incurred, very grave and very unfortunate results might happen unless our reserves are strengthened. There is due at call or on very short notice for the savings banks deposits and notes an amount of $47,700,000. The hon. gentleman has just told us that he has borrowed some $12,500,000 at short dates, all of which, I think, matures within four or five months; also, that he has given notice in London absolutely and positively to repay $25,000,000 on the 1st July, and it is well known to this House that there are constant expenditures going on on capital account which will probably compel him between this and the 1st July to borrow other large sums of money, possibly not less than $10,000,000, or it may be $12,000,000. It appears to me, in reference to all these facts, that, if circumstances should arise under which the banks would require to draw large sums of money from the Government, to exchange large amounts of these legal tenders for notes, very serious mischief might accrue unless the gold reserve is strengthened. I do not want just at this moment to complicate the discussion by offering any suggestions, but I desire to call the attention of the House and the attention of the country to the fact that, in the actual working at this moment, as evidenced by what took place last year, considerable practical inconvenience has accrued from our having so small an amount of gold considering our large liabilities; and to press upon the Finance Minister the extreme desirability of strengthening his hands and providing himself, under these circumstances, by holding a larger amount of gold, if necessary, than the law requires, for such demands as were made before and may at any moment be made again. With a view of giving the hon. gentleman the opportunity of stating his own views on the subject and also of giving us such information as he has as to what he has done with the £600,000 guaranteed by the Imperial Government—whether that is still actually in his possession or whether he has pledged it or disposed of it in any way for the purpose of obtaining gold—and also ascertaining if possible what correspondence has passed between him and the various banks, I beg to submit the motion of which I have given notice.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There can be no objection to furnishing the returns asked for by the hon. member. I might say to him, however, that there is no correspondence between the Finance Minister and the banks since the date named. There has been some official correspondence between the Deputy Minister and some of the banks during my absence last summer.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then we can amend the motion, or will you bring that down without the amendment?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes; I will consider that it includes the Deputy Minister. The hon. member has called the attention of the House to the position in which the law stands at present with reference to the security for the gold that is required to be held and other securities for the redemption of the Dominion notes, and he has also called the attention of the House to the large amount that is due to the savings bank. I think there is very little to be feared with reference to the savings bank deposits. They are separate and distinct from the note circulation. I think, when I refer to the fact that, during the five years from 1874 to 1879, during the depression that existed at that time, there was an increase in the deposits in the bank amounting to $1,900,000, that is an evidence that, judging from the present condition—gloomily I have no doubt considered by the hon. gentleman who moves this resolution—there is very little chance of any considerable sum being called for over and above the deposits that are made. I think we are perfectly safe in that respect, especially when the temptations and inducements are so great as the hon. gentleman pointed out yesterday in the interest given to the 100,000 depositors in the savings banks of Canada. As to the change in the law since 1878 with reference to the gold that is to be held, he has stated that in 1878 the Government were required to hold 25 per cent. of gold up to $9,000,000, from $9,000,000, to $12,000,000 50 per cent. additional, or $1,500,000 for the additional $3,000,000, and for all above $12,000,000, dollar for dollar. That was practically providing that the circulation should never go beyond $12,000,000, because the Government would never put out a circulation for which they would have to hold dollar for dollar in gold. There was no advantage, in that at all. That was amended, and we were authorised to issue $20,000,000 circulation, and 15 per cent. of that was to be held in gold, and 10 per cent. in securities guaranteed by the Imperial Government. There has been little or no inconvenience resulting from that down to the present time. The amounts withdrawn by the Government from year to year, whenever they had to provide for the demands of the banks, have not been exorbitant, and I think it is unfortunate that the hon. gentleman should have stated here that difficulties have arisen during the last year when demands were made to which it was found difficult or inconvenient to respond. That requires some little explanation, and I may say that there was no difficulty whatever in meeting the demands that were made, only that it required to be done at the expense of the country in importing that gold for the purpose of making the payments. Never was there an application made that was not responded to, but I state, as I have stated before, that the Government have, in addition to the amount held in the banks, various amounts from $2,000,000 to $3,000,000 over the 15 per cent. in gold required by law, and those are generally left in the banks without interest. This has had this effect that, if the Bank of Montreal or any other bank held, in the moneys they received from customs and excise and post office, $300,000 or half a million not paying interest, it was a question for them to consider whether they would ask for gold from the Government as the Government would call upon them to pay up the money, or whether they would refrain from asking for gold. The correspondence will show that, when some of the banks, in May or June last, were asking for considerable sums of money, they were informed that, if they continued to draw the gold, the Government would be under the necessity of drawing upon them for the balance in their hands to provide that gold. Sir, in June £200,000 of gold was imported by the Government to meet the demands that were made. I do not at the present moment know how much gold we have had to import during the past year, but the return asked for will show the amount exactly. At that time it was not necessary to sell any portion of the 4 per cent. guaranteed securities for the purpose of procuring that gold, and about the month of January last, in order to meet the advances that had been made by our agents in England, £200,000 of the £600,000 was disposed of by our agents in London—I am quite sure £150,000 were sold; I am not quite sure whether the other £50,000 was sold or not, but I know they have authority to sell £200,000 when a favorable opportunity offers. Therefore, as the circulation under the authority of law cannot exceed $20,000,000, it is only necessary that we should hold, under the provisions of the law, £400,000 or less of the guaranteed bonds of the Dominion Government. At present, I think, the circulation is something like $15,000,000 or $16,000,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. $16,000,000.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We reduced the circulation a million about the 1st of February, because we found the amounts held by the banks were considerably in excess of the 40 per cent. required to be held as a portion of their reserve. But the whole matter has changed since 1878, because the amendment to the Banking Act required that 40 per cent. of their reserve should be held in Dominion notes, and so far as that amount goes we cannot very well be called upon for it; and the one dollar, two dollar and four dollar notes have gone up to something like $6,000,000 the last year or two. This is in the hands of the public, and is not presented for gold except in small sums. The notes presented for gold are $100 and $1,000, for the convenience of transactions between the banks, and there has been no difficulty in providing it. But it is just a question now whether, instead of leaving in the banks the entire sum of money that may be necessary to meet any demand that may be made for gold, we ought to strengthen our reserve and keep it in gold, or whether we ought to leave it as we have been doing, and as the hon. member did himself. But there is no fear whatever of any difficulty arising. The only question is as to what the Government would lose in the importation of gold to meet any demands that may be made; and with the view of keeping that in hand, as I say, the Government have reduced the circulation a million within the last month. Therefore, I think the hon. member may rest perfectly easy with reference to the character of these notes, and as to the probability of their being redeemed in gold when they are presented. We consider that the provisions of the law are ample, and that we have taken the precautions necessary on that subject to strengthen our position by keeping a very considerable reserve in the bank available to purchase gold if necessary.

Mr. HESSON. The hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) has thought it his duty to warn the Government as to the prospects in store for us by their not having a sufficient amount of gold on hand. I think it is unfortunate that he should have endeavored in drawing attention to that matter, to create distrust in the minds of the people of Canada. If there is any circulation that is well established and well received by the public, and that has the confidence of the public, it is the Government

Dominion note issue. Now the various chartered banks of Canada are required to keep 40 per cent. of their circulation in Dominion notes. Well, what are the facts to-day? The circulation of the chartered banks is $31,935,933, and they are holding, of Dominion notes, $17,620,000. Now, if any gentleman will take the trouble to make the calculation, he will find that they are holding at present 50 per cent., and consequently the Government cannot be in any danger from that quarter at present. I rose chiefly for the purpose of pointing out, as I have done on one or two occasions before, that the great danger we will have to meet in the future arises chiefly from the privilege possessed by the chartered banks to-day of circulating their own paper instead of circulating Government notes; and I can easily see that it is possible for the banks to grasp the whole of this issue of $16,000,000 in Dominion notes, and that the balance they hold over and above that, as required by their charter, may at any moment be presented to the Government for redemption in gold. That is the only danger I see from that circulation, namely, that the banks may accumulate that extra circulation and that the Government may not have the advantage of circulating the $20,000,000 which they took the power to circulate, and which I feel the country ought to have the benefit of. Now, if the hon. gentleman wanted to throw distrust upon the institutions of the country, he might have drawn attention to another fact which I think ought to be patent to all who consider the circumstances of the banks. He will find that the depositors in the various chartered banks to-day are creditors to them to the amount of $93,309,870 in deposits, partly on call and partly on time; and all these depositors feel that they may go at any time and draw specie for that amount. The chartered banks to-day hold $7,469,753 in specie. Will that meet their nearly $32,000,000 of circulation? Will it meet the demand for $93,000,000 in deposits? Will the $7,000,000 cover the whole of that? The hon. gentleman might have pointed out that fact in saying that they have certain reserves. Are they in specie? Are they available? Are these reserves held in such a position that the banks of the country cannot at once lay their hands upon them? Then why throw distrust upon the Government circulation, which everybody ought to know is in the interest of the whole country? This is a very wide question, indeed, and I am not now trying to throw discredit or distrust upon the banks of the country, or intimating that those institutions are not perfectly solvent and able to meet any ordinary emergency. But when the hon. gentleman, in presenting the case to the Finance Minister, suggests that difficulties may arise because he has not a sufficiently large specie reserve, he is fixing his attention altogether too much on the dark side of the question, as he is accustomed to do. Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in saying that the country will accept that issue from the Government gladly in preference to any bank issue that was ever made. The Government will have the means of redeeming that circulation; they have now the means of redeeming it under all circumstances, because they have the power of taxing the people and of collecting a revenue. The Government now hold over $2,000,000 of the specie to meet this demand. From what source can that demand come? It could not come from the banks of Canada if they were restricted in their circulation; and if it was entirely withdrawn then they would no longer have a Dominion note circulation to meet, and they would be only too glad to see the circulation of the $37,000,000 now lying idle. Is it not a fact that there is something like $18,000,000 lying in the hands of the banks and not earning a dollar? Is it not also a fact that there are millions lying idle, although first-class business men may offer the very best security? Not because there is not sufficient bank circulation, but because the chartered banks control it. I hold that if the only note circulation of the country was in the hands of the Government the difficulty would not arise, and the banks would be able to lend all the money they possess without being afraid of not being able to stand a run on the bank. No country professes to make a circulation for people outside of their own boundaries. We are not called upon to do that; but a circulation to pass from hand to hand to enable us to meet our liabilities and to pay our debts is all that the people want. Such a circulation established and endorsed by the Government and paid by the people, will be the best source of credit, and the hon. member for Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) should not attempt to throw distrust on the Government's course in this matter. The Government should, indeed, be encouraged to go forward in this direction, and I trust several hon. members will have the courage to speak out. So many members are bound up by being stockholders in banks or by being embarrassed by reference to this subject, that they are unwilling to express their feelings; and I regret that the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright), who ought to know something about the welfare of the country, should have attempted to throw discredit and distrust on the Government's policy so far as they have gone in this direction.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. member for Perth (Mr. Hesson) has stated that there are many members who are tied up by being stockholders in banks or are embarrassed by being debtors to banks so that they are unwilling to express their opinions and vote according to their convictions. No doubt the hon. gentleman made that statement after making due enquiries.

Mr. HESSON. The hon. gentleman misunderstood me if he thought I said vote. I said unwilling to speak their sentiments.

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose the hon. gentleman's accusation has reference to the way of voting as well as speaking. I suppose the hon. gentleman made due enquiry before he cast such an aspersion on so large a proportion of the members of this House. It is not exactly proper when an hon. member sets up to act the role of accuser of others that he himself should be so careless on the subject of casting aspersions. The hon. gentleman in the early part of his observations, when contrasting the position of the Government with that of the banks with respect to the specie reserve, spoke only of the specie reserve, and adverted to the $7,000,000 as the sum which the banks held to answer the large amount he mentioned as due to depositors. At that time, and indeed for a considerable portion of the speech the hon. gentleman took no account whatever of the $11,000,000 or $12,000,000 legal tender which the banks also have—although he did in a parenthesis subsequently mention the fact, but only in that part of his speech in which he said they had nothing. The banks have specie reserves and the legal tender as their bases of credit. It is by means of having that cash, or what is supposed to be equivalent to cash, that they are able to secure that measure of confidence which the people, rightly or wrongly, choose to place in them. That is the proposition which my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) sets out. He does not propose, as does the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Hesson) any radical change. The hon. gentleman is dealing with the policy which has been in existence for a considerable period of time and through various Administrations—the policy of a note issue more or less extended, guaranteed by, in fact the issue of the Government of the country, and the principle of security in respect of that issue. He has pointed out that this Government in its former state of existence proposed that the measures with respect to the security to be given to the public in respect of that issue, should be very much more stringent than that which at this time obtain. He pointed out that such as they were they had not met his view of what was right, and when he had the opportunity of directing, to some extent, the legislation of the country, he had taken still greater precautions, and he has pointed out that the present condition of things is one which deserves, and ought to attract, the attention of the House. So far from those observations being unkindly, it appears from the answer of the hon. Finance Minister that they were kindly in the extreme, because the hon. Minister states that it ought to be a fair question for consideration by the Government whether a considerable portion of the deposits in banks at this time, without interest, should not be put into gold and reserved expressly and specifically as a further security against the outstanding obligations of the Government. So it is very clear that when the Government itself acknowledges that the question is one for consideration, as to whether the gold reserve ought not to be strengthened, it cannot be said to be unkindly when an hon. gentleman on this side, who has filled the position of Finance Minister, urges that greater security be afforded than now obtains should point that out. I should like to know from the hon. Finance Minister at what time during January the guaranteed debentures were sold, the £200,000 to replace the million.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It was in January.

Mr. BLAKE. But at that time, was it not necessary to sell the guaranteed debentures?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No; because we took the proceeds out of the loan.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman has stated that it was some time in January that he sold the guaranteed debentures. About what date?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I forget; I cannot say.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman was correct in supposing that January was the date, and he has told the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) this afternoon, as the dates of the various loans indicate, that he would not feel disposed to retain those guaranteed debentures under those circumstances. I call the hon. member's attention to the fact that in the Gazette statement indicating the condition of finance on 31st January, it is represented by the Government that the whole of the £600,000 guaranteed debentures was in hand. The hon. Minister shakes his head. I will read him the statement:

Specie held by the several Assistant Receivers General on the 31st January, 1884.....	$2,550,473 14
Additional at Montreal.....	90,000 00
	$2,640,473 14
Guaranteed sterling debentures.....	2,920,000 00
	$5,530,473 14

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I think that must be a mistake on the part of the clerk who prepared the statement.

Mr. BLAKE. I dare say it is a mistake; that is the conclusion to which I came. When I heard the Finance Minister state that during January he sold £200,000 of the £600,000 guaranteed debentures, and I found that on the 13th February the hon. gentleman represents to the public that he had that £200,000 of debentures in hand as against those notes, I was sure there was a mistake somewhere.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is a matter of very little importance, and the mistake was committed no doubt by the clerk who made up the statement. But, under the law, all that was required was less than £400,000, to make up 15 per cent. Therefore, as far as that is concerned there was no disadvantage arising from it and no violation of the provisions of the law. My attention had not been called to it, and the attention of the clerk who made up the statement has not been called to the fact that the £200,000 had been authorised to be sold.

Mr. BLAKE. Although it is a fact that the law requires only a sum less than this sum, in the aggregate of specie and guaranteed debentures, it is also a fact that the law requires, for the security and information of the general public, that the amount actually held should be monthly returned and made public; and it is also a fact that the public relies upon this statement of the amount in gold and guaranteed debentures held as indicating the degree of preparation that the Government has made at any one time to meet possible demands, and it is a serious thing to be told that there is a blunder of five or six millions in the statement which the Government presented to the public of the resources it was holding specially against its issue. The hon. gentleman says the clerk has made the blunder. I find here the signature of Mr. Courtney, the Deputy Minister of Finance, so I suppose as the clerk made a blunder the hon. gentleman made a blunder; and of course he deals in millions—he deals in so many millions that he tosses them about as if they were playthings, and the habit has got into the office, and the clerk did not think it worth while to knock off a million, and the Minister did not think it worth while, and so the public is told that there exists—what? An excess of this enormous sum—an excess of specie and guaranteed debentures of $1,364,423, that the excess is nearly $1,400,000, when, in truth, the excess was only about $400,000.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Pounds.

Mr. BLAKE. No; the aggregate excess of specie and guaranteed debentures is stated at $1,363,000, and it was less than that by something approaching a million of dollars, and therefore the public was told that the Government was doing far more than its duty; that while it was bound to hold only so much it was holding nearly $1,400,000 more; it was not repeating the operations of June when it ran the proportions away down; it was not repeating the operations of June when they had to warn those calling on them for money that if they drew on them they would have to draw in revenge. They had imported a million, and they were going to keep on the safe side. That is the appearance which the thing presented on paper, but the paper does not represent the case in truth and in fact, for as a matter of fact the amount held by the Government was only one-third or one-fourth of the amount they represented. What security have we got for the gold? Perhaps we will be told when we come to enquire about the gold that some other clerk has made a mistake about it.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I do not think the hon. member need have got so excited about a matter of this kind, though, it is true, he has had small ground for fault finding this Session so far, and I am not surprised that a little mistake of this kind in the preparation of the paper should be made a great deal of. What is required is, that at the end of every month there is so much gold held in reserve, and that reserve must be over 15 per cent. of the amount of notes in circulation. The amount of guaranteed bonds required to be held for circulation would only be £300,000 to cover the provisions of the law. But we had £600,000 of unguaranteed securities when the law was passed, and, therefore, feeling that we held them and that it was not necessary to sell them, we retained them for the purpose of meeting any demand that might come for the redemption of notes. We held in the hands of our agents in England £600,000 when it was not required that more than £300,000 should be held. Therefore, I say that it did not affect the case. All that was necessary was that it should be shown that we held in reserve for the purpose of meeting these notes £300,000 or £280,000 as the case might be. Well, these securities have been deposited in England for that express purpose. The clerk who has been in the habit of making up that statement gets a statement of the gold reserves, and shows what they are, from our representative in Montreal—the man in charge of the matter has put this amount down at £600,000 and carried it on in that way. But as for the public interest suffering, as for any insecurity or any liability on the part of any man holding a note of the Dominion of Canada, or his being affected by the question of whether it was £600,000 or £400,000 held for their redemption—he cannot be affected by it in the least. The hon. gentleman has called my attention to it, and I will make enquiry and ascertain exactly where the matter rests. Of course as Minister of Finance I am responsible for the mistakes, but my attention has not been called to it nor had I noticed it till the hon. gentleman referred to the figures.

Mr. CASGRAIN. When this change in the addition to the borrowing power of the Minister was made by statute, I had occasion to call the Minister's attention to the amount of gold that was required in order to secure his paper money, and I desire to repeat in a few words what I said to him at that time. I said, and I maintain at the present moment, that for the amount of gold he has to redeem, his notes are entirely too extensive to make that security sufficient. Whatever he may say I accept, in so far as that he believes it, but he does not leave the impression on my mind that the security is sufficient. I believe and assert, whatever damage it may do the Minister, that the amount of bullion is entirely insufficient; and we need not go very far back to know what the value of paper money is, when we know what took place on the other side of the line some years back, or what I saw myself in Germany and Italy when I bought Government securities for 50 or 60 or 80 per cent. discount. I suppose the same thing may happen at any moment in this country, for we may have some difficulties on this side of the line too. The present state of the Imperial Government is not so sound as that we may not have some little trouble on this side of the water; and I would like to know what would become of the $18,000,000 of paper money which is on the markets of our country to-day. It would drop down like the paper money of other nations. That is what I wanted to say, and that is the danger which may be apprehended, and which may come upon us at any moment.

Motion agreed to.

RELIEF OF MUNICIPALITIES FOR GRANTING RAILWAY AID.

Mr. WILSON moved :

For copies of petitions from the County Council of the County of Elgin, presented to the Governor General in Council or the Minister of Railways and Canals, praying for a general measure of relief to municipalities of Ontario which have aided railways, declared to be for Dominion purposes by granting bonuses to them, and of all correspondence in reference to such petitions.

He said: I think I will be able to convince the Government and the House that the County Council of Elgin was fully justified in presenting their claim to this House for compensation, on account of aid granted to railways by that county. My first reason for making this assertion is that during last Session, when the railway resolutions were presented to this House, the Minister of Railways on that occasion declared as a reason for granting aid to the Quebec Government that it was on account of aid granted to a railway that was really in the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He knows full well that the amount paid to these various railways—to the road running from Quebec to Ottawa was very large, and also that the Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental received a large sum in the same way. Now, Sir, although I have been all along opposed to the system inaugurated in this Parliament of granting aid to railroads in the manner in which it was granted during the last Session, yet I think that after this House, by an overwhelming majority, has declared that it is the policy of the Government to grant aid to municipalities or to Governments on account of their having granted aid to railways, the county I have the honor to represent is fully justified in presenting its claim to this House. That is true, I think, if I can show that the circumstances in connection with the relief sought for by the County of Elgin are the same as those other cases. Now, Sir, you are aware that during the last Session of this House about $30,000,000 were granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway; that the greater portion of that amount will be paid by the older Province of Ontario; that the municipalities throughout that Province will have to bear a large share of the burden of that vote; and that the several counties in the west have granted aid to railways which are now being used and operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway. If that be the case those municipalities which have thus granted aid are justified in coming to this Parliament, and I cannot for the life of me see how Parliament can resist their just claims. Further, we know that during the last Session, the Government not satisfied with granting aid to the Canadian Pacific Railway so far as that road was constructed in the North-West, went further and granted a charter for the construction of a road from some point near the Town of Ingersoll through to the Detroit River. The application for that charter was made by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and it was very evident that they intended to utilise that road in connection with the Credit Valley and the Ontario and Quebec as one of the principal lines for the traffic of the Canadian Pacific Railway. That being the case, a considerable amount of the money granted by the Government to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is likely to be utilised for the construction of branch lines through the older portions of Canada; and in that event, of course, it would be no more than reasonable that we should be refunded the money which we have already given in aid of the construction of roads now operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Some few years ago there was a road projected from Toronto westward, which was to be a farmer's road. It was understood, when the charter for that road was obtained from the Local Legislature, that it was intended to enable the farmers to have their freights conveyed cheaply from the west to the principal city in the Province, Toronto; and certain agreements were entered into between the municipalities and the company, securing to the municipalities, as far as an agreement of that kind could secure, that privilege. That road was first built as far west as Ingersoll. After reaching that point, it was found that the road was not in a paying condition, and its promoters felt it necessary to project it further. They accordingly made application to the municipalities lying between Ingersoll and the City of St. Thomas for aid. We in St. Thomas granted very liberal aid indeed. Now, Sir, if the moneys granted by this Parliament be used for the construction of a branch line from Ingersoll west to the Detroit River, it will very seriously impair the usefulness of that road to those who granted so large an amount towards its construction. It will be unreasonable to expect us to give a large bonus for the purpose of bringing freight and traffic to that locality, if a road is to be built by means of public aid which will destroy to a great extent the advantages we anticipated when we were asked to grant the bonus. I will detain the House only for a few moments in order to show the amount of aid granted for the construction of this Credit Valley Railroad. We find that the County of Oxford, along with the towns of Ingersoll and Woodstock, granted $200,000; the County of Wellington, $135,000; the County of Waterloo, $110,000; the County of Peel, $75,000; the County of Halton, $70,000; the City of Toronto, $350,000; the City of St. Thomas, $50,000; the Town of Milton, $30,000; the Town of Brampton, $20,000; the Town of Ingersoll, $10,000; the Town of Orangeville, $15,000; the Village of Streetsville, $20,000; the Village of Elora, $15,000; and the Village of Fergus, $15,000; in all, there was granted by the municipalities between Toronto and Ingersoll, $1,165,000. I remember very well that a deputation from the City of Toronto came to St. Thomas and urged upon us the propriety of granting aid to this road, and the representations made by that deputation. Among the reasons they urged why this road should be constructed, they said it would be a direct connecting link between Ottawa and St. Thomas; they urged and pressed upon us the propriety of granting aid, and the amount I have mentioned was accordingly granted. In addition to all this, the Ontario Government granted aid to the amount of $457,500. We find therefore, that the total amount of aid granted to the Credit Valley Railway by the municipalities between the City of Toronto and the City of St. Thomas, and by the Ontario Government, was $1,622,500. The people of the locality to which I belong have granted aid to other roads. Prior to that time, the County of Elgin granted $200,000 for the construction of the Canada Southern Railway, and the City of St. Thomas granted $25,000, making in all for the county and city $225,000 granted to that road, and the Government of Ontario also granted to the Canada Southern $147,858.65. The Canada Southern, to a very great extent, is a very important link in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the various municipalities granted a total amount of $470,358 on account of its construction; or making a total amount, if we take the total amount granted by the municipalities and the Government, of $2,092,858. If this large amount was granted for the construction of this road which is being now, to a certain extent, either utilised or operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and which is admitted to be an important road in the interests of the Dominion, I say that the county which granted so large an amount ought to be recouped for the aid it has given. Mark you, I do not complain, nor am I offering here the excuse that because the Dominion Government has assumed those roads as Dominion roads, I base this claim on the Government. I say on the contrary, that as the Dominion Government has intimated that it is part and parcel of its policy to recoup the Provinces and municipalities which have rendered assistance to the Canadian Pacific Railway, that being a road in the interests of the Dominion of Canada, these municipalities I have mentioned are entitled to just as much consideration as the municipalities in other Provinces. It is true that the representatives from Ontario, who are generally found supporting the Government, are not so firm and determined on getting equal advantages and rights as the representatives of some other Province. It is true they gave their votes in favor and in the interest of the Government, regardless of the interests of their Province; but when they come before their electors, when they appeal to the country for re-election, they will be asked why they gave their votes and encouragement aid to one Province, and when the question was put them refused to have the same rights, privilege and justice granted to their own Province. It is no more than reasonable, right and just, no more than what the Government ought to consider it their bounden duty to carry into effect, to grant this aid to the municipalities now praying for it. It is unfortunate that the time has arrived when the Provinces find that their only means of obtaining redress is by insisting that what is granted to one Province must be granted to another, but as the Government have inaugurated that policy, upon them be the responsibility, and I hope they will be found equal to the occasion and come forward and grant the aid to the municipalities I have mentioned.

Mr. LISTER. The importance of the subject involved in the motion of my hon. friend from East Elgin (Mr. Wilson) must force itself upon the attention of the Government and this House. The other day, when a motion somewhat similar was before the House, I took the opportunity to say a few words in favor of it, and I was then surprised to find that in this whole House there was not one Conservative from the Province of Ontario who had the courage to get up and advocate any aid to the municipalities and to the Government of Ontario for the moneys they have expended in the construction of railways in that Province. We know that large delegations have waited upon the Government from the various municipalities in Ontario, urging the Government to do what in their opinion is right and just, by repaying to them the whole or at least a part of the money they expended in the construction of those roads. We know also that reports have been made for the purpose of turning away to a certain extent those delegations, for the purpose of making them believe that they have not an honest claim upon the Government for the money which they seek to recover. How far the delegations have been successful I am unable to say, but I do say that any delegate who fails to urge vigorously and honestly the payment of these moneys is recreant to the trust the people have imposed upon him, and I say any Conservative member who fails to urge upon the Government this simple measure of justice is not doing that duty which to my mind he owes to his constituency. It is said that it is the intention of the Government to repeal this Act. I say that if the Government take that stand, they take a cowardly position, but whether they repeal the Act or not does not affect the principle involved here, namely the right of these municipalities and of the Provincial Government to be repaid, to a certain extent, the moneys they have expended. It is the boast of the Minister of Railways that this Government, during the past few years, has expended large sums of money in the construction of railways, that it has given, as it were, an impetus to the building of railways, to the benefit of this country. I would remind him that long before this Government got into power, the Ontario Government invested millions of dollars in the construction of railways, and it is wholly to that cause, if not wholly, at all events to a certain extent, that Ontario owes her prosperity. So long as the Dominion Government were willing to leave the Province of Ontario in the position she occupied, so long that Province could not demand one dollar from this Government, but without a word of warning, the Government thought proper to change its policy under the pretence of the British North America Act, because I say that the Act passed last Session was a pretence, was passed under a misconception, a deliberate misconception, I believe, of the position under which the Minister of Railways took this power. They took away from the Province of Ontario the roads which that Province had so much assisted to construct. They took away from the Province of Ontario the roads which the municipalities of that Province had so liberally contributed towards. We find that the Province of Ontario expended in railways from the Provincial Treasury no less a sum than $6,630,000 and we find that the municipalities of the Province of Ontario contributed $13,961,000, or between the Government and the municipalities upwards of $20,000,000. That money was expended under certain stated conditions. These railways were chartered by the Provincial Parliament. Those charters gave to the municipalities certain rights. The Provincial Parliament had the oversight of those railways. Whenever they thought it necessary in the interest of the people to pass Legislation preventing amalgamation, fixing the tolls, and doing everything that was necessary, they had their own Legislature, directly under the control of their own people, to appeal to for that purpose. But this Government takes away from the Province the railways, the right to legislate as to those railways; in a word, it alters the position that existed when this money was expended. On that ground, if on no other, I contend that, if these railways are in the interest of the Dominion, if they have been confiscated, as it were, in the interest of all Canada, it is but fair that Canada should pay to the Province the money expended. The ground is strong, the reasoning is powerful, so powerful that I believe this Government cannot resist it, that they will be forced to it. Let the representatives who support them be false to their duty now, and I venture to say that many of them will never come back to this House again. Now, what was the policy of this Government during the last Session? It was that Provincial Governments ought not, had no right to aid and assist provincial railways, that provincial railways were for the benefit of the Dominion, and in carrying out that policy certain resolutions were brought into this House. They were for the purpose of giving aid to the Province of Quebec; and they have a right to get it, I do not find any fault with the representatives of Quebec if this Government is weak enough to yield to them; let them get what they can. But the policy of the Government, as announced, was to assist local railways. What was the state of affairs then? We find that the Government of Quebec had constructed the North Shore Railway. We know that that was a Government work. It was paid for exclusively by the Provincial Government. We know that that Government sold the railway out and out to a railway company. At the time this resolution was brought before the House, they did not own one nail or one tie in that railway. They had parted with every interest they had in it, but, in the face of that, this Government, urged, I suppose, by hon. gentlemen from the Lower Province who represented their case as favorably as they could, became convinced that they were entitled to take from the Dominion Treasury a certain amount of money for the construction of that road. The Government then, in pursuance of the policy they had announced, gave to the Province of Quebec, which did not own one tie in that road, $3,350,000. If Confederation is to be continued, the Government must act honestly, squarely and equitably with every Province in this Dominion. It cannot give aid to one Province in this way and deny it to another Province. The Province of Quebec had no more right and can show no more equitable claim to this money than the Province of Ontario and the municipalities therein can. If the Province of Quebec had a right to get this money from the Dominion Treasury, then, by parity of reasoning, the Province of Ontario and the municipalities therein have the same right to get aid from this Dominion Treasury. It is a question which must inevitably force itself upon the attention of the Government. Delegations have come from all parts of the country. Those supporting, as well as those opposing, hon. gentlemen opposite have united upon this question, and they must face it sooner or later. They cannot face the difficulty by repealing the statutes which confiscated our railways. They have announced a policy—and, if they had not, they might have got out of the difficulty in that way—and that policy is that it is the duty of this Government to aid railways, and, in carrying out that policy, they gave between three and four millions of dollars to the Provincial Government of Quebec for a road which had entirely passed out of their hands. I repeat that the recent action of hon. gentlemen opposite must hold good, as far as the Province of Ontario is concerned. I said a moment ago that I believed it was a misconstruction of the British North America Act to take over these roads at all. I believe that, under that Act, this Government had no right to take them over. I believe that, under the true meaning and intent of that statute, they had no right to take over those roads. The very wording of this Act shows that there were to be two classes of roads, roads that would be beneficial to the whole Dominion, and other roads. We will admit that every road in every Province of the Dominion is for the benefit and in the interest of the whole

Mr. LISTER.

Dominion; and, if it was not intended to except certain roads, the Act would have said that the Government should have the right to take over all roads, but it says certain roads in the interest of the Dominion. I take it that that statute means only interprovincial roads, and does not bear the forced construction put upon it by hon. gentlemen opposite, that, if a road touches or crosses a through line, it must necessarily be a Dominion line. That is not a proper construction to be put upon it, but that is the construction which the Minister of Railways thought fit to put upon it, and, under the authority of this statute, he took possession of these roads. I can only express the hope that a number of hon. gentlemen whom I see before me, whose counties are deeply interested in this question, will have the manliness to stand up here and insist upon the Government doing what is right in regard to them. If they do not, if they fail in discharging that duty, I almost venture the prediction that the men who were true to them before will perhaps treat them as they are treating their own counties and the Province, and will forget them when they need to be remembered.

Mr. CASEY. My hon. friends who have preceded me, the mover of this resolution (Mr. Wilson) and the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), have gone over the ground very thoroughly. Yet, as seconder of the resolution, and representing the county which has sent down the petition, I wish to say a few words on the question. It has been assumed by too many who have discussed the subject of recouping municipalities which have given bonuses to railways, that the only, or at least the chief, ground for asking such compensation is the assumption of jurisdiction over these railways by this Government. Now, in my opinion, as in that of the gentlemen who have spoken, that is not the only ground, nor even the strongest ground, for asking such compensation as the county of Elgin and other counties are demanding. The great basis of our demands, which we consider just in substance and obvious to everyone who considers the question without bias, is that the Government has established and declared a well-defined policy of giving general aid to railways throughout the Dominion. The Canadian Government, in the first place, began by building a railway of their own, the Intercolonial Railway. Then we built a large portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and afterwards engaged a company to build the rest of that road. Finally, within the last two Sessions, a policy has been developed of aiding, not only the feeders of that great transcontinental road, not only the feeders of the Intercolonial Railway, not only the roads touching the frontiers, and which might be regarded as international in their character, and therefore properly coming under the legislative authority of this House, but local roads, purely and simply local roads, colonization roads, in all parts of the Dominion. I might instance the colonization road known as the Quebec and Lake St. John; the Gatineau Valley Railway; the Napanee and Tamworth; the Kingston and Pembroke, and various other railways in Ontario, which are, in their essence, purely colonization roads. I have named one or two in each Province to show that the principle of aiding local roads has not been confined entirely to one Province, although the great bulk of the money has gone to Quebec. We have adopted the principle of aiding purely local roads throughout the Dominion, and that policy has been defended in each case on the ground of the usefulness of the particular road in the locality through which it passed. It has been argued in favor of these roads that they would develop a large extent of territory along their course, that there was a large amount of timber somewhere that they would reach, and that their construction would lead to the rapid settlement of a large extent of new country. The argument was put forward by my hon. friend from Ottawa county (Mr. Wright) that the population along the Gatineau Valley was specially intelligent, and the large population on the line of that road have certainly shown their intelligence by frequently sending him back to this House. Sir, I merely quote these instances to show that the grounds urged for aiding these roads were not at all that they were of Dominion interest, not at all that they were of Canadian interest, in the sense of connecting one part of Canada with another, in the sense of opening up a new territory belonging to the Dominion of Canada, but simply that they would be useful to the localities in which they were to be built, useful in opening up provincial lands, useful in giving facilities to active, intelligent and energetic settlers in that particular locality. Now that the policy has been clearly established, of aiding purely local roads for purely local reasons, I claim that that policy, or its equivalent, should be extended to all parts of Canada which can show equally good reasons for receiving local aid of that kind. I claim that, in justice, the new local roads should be aided in every locality which can show as good reasons for it as the localities which have already received aid, or else that the municipalities that have spent large sums for local roads should be recouped for the money they have thus spent. So much for the general question. I think my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister) effectually disposed of the contention that the responsibility of the Dominion Government could be got rid of by repealing the Act under which the Government assumed jurisdiction over these roads. He has shown clearly enough that, even if the repeal of the Act were possible—and I doubt whether it is possible, without rendering illegal all the grants that the Government have made under that Act—but even if the Government were inclined to try such a foolish trick, in order to get rid of their responsibility, it would not free them in the least from their obligations to those parts of the country to which aid has not been extended. The tax-payers in every part of the country have contributed to the grants made to purely local roads elsewhere, and every part of the country has a perfect right—and would have just as good right if that Bill were repealed—to ask that they should be compensated to some extent for their own expenditure upon railways. Before coming to the particular claims of the county of Elgin, I must refer to what I have just seen in the large Railway Committee room. I have just had the pleasure there of meeting with a large delegation, composed of more than 60 reeves and deputy reeves from the Province of Ontario, representing 20 counties and cities, who came there to demand from the Government what they conceived to be justice in regard to this subject. I was not able to wait and hear the reply made by the Ministers who were present, the right hon. Premier and the Acting Minister of Railways, but I heard from the latter a hint in the shape of a question, that gave me some idea of the line that might be taken by the Government. He said: "Do you suppose, gentlemen, that the municipalities along the line of the Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway, were recouped for the bonuses they had given to that road?" I understood him to argue that as the Province only had been recouped in that case, the municipalities in Ontario had no claims in regard to railway bonuses in that Province. I cannot, for the life of me, see the distinction. If it is proper to recoup a Province for the money she has spent in building a road, and which has since become a part of the Canadian Pacific Railway system, it is proper to recoup a municipality which has aided a road that has become a part of the same system. I have since heard, since the deputation withdrew, that the leader of the Government stated to them that the Government had never adopted the policy of granting money to a road already built. If that is not a correct representation of what he said I hope the hon. gentleman will correct me—I see he is now present—because I wish to draw certain conclusions from the statement I heard attributed to him, that the Government had never adopted, and did not intend to adopt, the principle of granting aid to roads already built.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; I did not say that.

Mr. CASEY. I am glad the right hon. gentleman has put me right on that point, because if he had said what is attributed to him he would have taken a false and unfounded position. I could refer him and the Minister of Railways to one or two instances where aid had been granted in consideration of roads already built. And since that plea against compensation has been put forward and may arise again, I may as well refer to the roads now. I will refer to the International Railway Company, which received a grant, in 1883, for 49 miles of its road, from Sherbrooke, in the Province of Quebec, to the United States frontier, not exceeding $3,200 per mile, and not exceeding, in the whole, $156,800. This part of the International Railway was then built and in operation. A further grant for a part of the road to be built through the State of Maine was also made. I may remark also that the principle of giving aid in consideration of roads already built was established by the grant to Quebec in consideration of the Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental road, for which they received $954,000 in regard to the whole road, and $1,440,000 in regard to the part from Ottawa to Montreal. Then, Sir, the principle of aid to local railways generally has been established; the principle of recouping Provinces, at all events, who have given aid to railways or built railways of a similar character, has been established. The question is, Why has not this principle been applied more extensively in Ontario? My hon. friend from Lambton has urged that the Conservative members from Ontario should do something towards securing the granting of that aid—though he has not been able to see why they have not done so. Well, Sir, I am able to say, to some extent, why they have not done so. My attention has been called to the fact that some of these Conservative members, while they are opposing or, at all events, not supporting, the claims of the municipalities generally to receive this compensation, have quietly succeeded in obtaining Government grants for railways under construction in their own constituencies. They have used their influence, not for the benefit of Ontario municipalities generally, but for the benefit of their own localities. We had grants made for this and the other railway, a whole string of them, last year, and when proposing those grants the Minister stated that he had consulted Mr. so-and-so, in connection with the line, perhaps the member for the county or the promoter of the line, and he had found out what amount would be necessary to secure the construction of the road, and that amount he had placed in the estimate. That was the explanation given time after time. It is not so much to be wondered at that those hon. gentlemen who have been so fortunate as to secure grants for railways in their own constituencies should not be very eager for an extension of similar favors to other municipalities which have not the good fortune to be represented in this House by Conservatives. Yet I believe there are some Conservative members who have not secured such favors for their counties. There are some Conservative members whose counties have given large bonuses to railways, which counties have not been recouped for those bonuses and which still have claims on the Government and I shall expect that at least those counties will add to the general outcry raised by Ontario municipalities to have justice done them in this connection. In regard, more particularly, to the claim of the county of Elgin, I have to point out that her case is exactly parallel to the case of the Province of Quebec, except as to the amount of money paid towards the construction of the railway in question. The Province of Quebec built a road, to which I have referred once or twice already, from Quebec to Ottawa via Montreal. A part of that road is now incorporated with the Canadian Pacific Railway; the other part remains an independent road, but is a very important feeder to the Canadian Pacific Railway. The reason given for the grant of $954,000 to the whole road was, that it was an important feeder to the Canadian Pacific Railway, that it connected the Canadian Pacific Railway system with the city of Quebec, and therefore the Province of Quebec should be allowed $954,000 on account of that part of the road. The reason given for our paying the full cost of the railway from Montreal to Ottawa was that it was already incorporated into the Canadian Pacific Railway and had become a part of their through system. Let me show the parallel between that and the case of the county of Elgin. That county, in 1871, secured the construction of the Canada Southern by giving a bonus of $200,000. We were assured by the promoters that if we did not give that bonus the road would not be built, and I have no reason to doubt that such was the fact; that the receipt of that amount of aid at that particular time enabled the company to make arrangements for building the road which otherwise would not have been made. At a subsequent period St. Thomas gave a bonus of $50,000 to secure the extension of the Credit Valley from Ingersoll to St. Thomas. No doubt that road would not have been so extended, at all events at that time, if this aid had not been granted. These two bonuses secured the construction of the Canada Southern and the extension of the Credit Valley to the city of St. Thomas. The Credit Valley is in exactly the same position as the Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental road, between this city and Montreal. It is incorporated with the Canadian Pacific Railway and is part of that company's line. The Canada Southern is in the same position as the North Shore road, between Montreal and Quebec. Although it is an independent line, still it is the only through western connection of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and it is in such intimate relations with that railway, being its principal feeder from the west, that it may almost be regarded as part of that system. It is as much and, in fact, far more part of the Canadian Pacific Railway than is the North Shore from Montreal to Quebec, because the latter is controlled at present by the Grand Trunk, a rival of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I claim, then, that the position of Elgin is so strong that it cannot be successfully attacked. I have not thought it necessary to elaborate the case very much, for that reason, and I have given more attention to the claims of other municipalities. I believe that the uncommonly large deputation of respectable and influential gentlemen of both political parties which I saw in the Railway Committee room this afternoon, is a sign of what is going to happen in Ontario. The tax-payers of the municipalities interested have been paying from year to year their share of what has been paid to the Canadian Pacific Railway and to other lines, in which they have no more interest than they would have in a railway to the moon, and they are beginning to ask where it is going to stop, and when they are going to receive something in return. Upwards of 60 of the most influential men of the respective municipalities were in the Railway Committee room, asking that question to-day, and I am afraid they got a very unsatisfactory answer. There were gentlemen present of both political parties, and of all classes, and they were unanimous in the feeling that the time had come when their municipalities should have some share in the general distribution of the surplus of this Dominion which has been going on during the last few years. I said they were tired of always paying without receiving. My constituents and those of the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson), have special reason to be so tired. Not only have they taxed themselves to the extent of $275,000 for the railways mentioned, but they have also been taxed, taking the average per capita share of the taxation of the Dominion, to the extent of at least half a million for aid given to other railways in Canada. Out of their pockets at least $775,000 have been taken, and they have not received from this Government a single dollar of recompense. I am bound to point out, in this connection, that the justice of the principle of recouping municipalities which have bonused railways, was acknowledged by the Ontario Government at the time the municipal loan fund was arranged and part of the then existing surplus distributed. It was recognised by the Provincial Government as just that those municipalities which had paid for railways for themselves should be considered when railways were being built at the public expense for the benefit of other municipalities which had made no such grants. To a certain limited extent, limited by the amount of money at the disposal of the Government, attention was paid to the claims of those constituencies. Some of them were given large and others small sums. At all events, the principle was established, and it was one of fairness and justice, which has done very much to establish Mr. Mowat, the leader of the Ontario Government, in the confidence of the people of the Province, a confidence which he still possesses to a degree which is remarkably annoying, no doubt, to hon. gentlemen opposite. I must tell this Government that if they wish to retain the confidence of even their own friends in Ontario, they must imitate the fairness, justice, and even-handed dealing of the Premier of the Local Government in connection with this matter.

Some hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. Some hon. gentlemen who are howling "hear, hear," represent counties which received very considerable sums from the distribution of the Ontario Municipal Loan Fund, and yet they howl in derision when the name of their benefactor is mentioned in this House. This is not a spirit which I would expect to find in the representatives of the respectable Conservative population of Ontario; it is not the spirit of that population throughout the Province. Conservatives as well as Liberals, in Ontario, are willing to recognize fair treatment when they get it. They have got it from Mr. Mowat in his dealings with the railway question. If they do not get it from the leader of this Government they will soon let the First Minister and his supporters understand that they know when they get fair treatment and when they do not get it. I have no doubt, Sir, that the agitation which has already obtained such striking proportions, as shown by the size of the deputation to-day, will attain to still more striking proportions, and that it will extend to every county in Ontario which has not received Government aid for railways in which it is interested; and I have no doubt, as my hon. friend from East Elgin (Mr. Wilson) said, that in the end the Government will do as they always have done when the agitation gets strong enough, they will yield to it; they will do as they did when the members from the Province of Quebec, who for years had been urging her claims to these moneys, on the grounds of justice and fair play, and did not get them. Last year they put their foot down—or rather I should use the plural, and say feet, though they put them down as one foot—they put them down solidly and said: If you do not give us justice we will not vote for you. The hon. gentleman admitted that constitutional pressure had been brought to bear on him by members—that is the only interpretation that could be put on the circumstances. Now it is time that the Conservatives of Ontario set up a little Maison Bleu of their own, for the representatives of Ontario, if they intend to remain representatives of that Province, will have to put their foot down and say to the Government, If you do not do justice to our Province, and to our constituencies, we have as much spirit as any Bleu in the Province of Quebec, and we are prepared to show it, and then the Government will back down and give what they had refused them while using argument alone.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). This matter of aid to railways is one with respect to which we may as well have it understood that the Government, under its present leader, has done justice, not only to Ontario, but to Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. It is a known fact that at Confederation the proportionate debt which would have to be paid by Ontario was $6,000,000. It is a known fact that the proportionate debt by the Province of Quebec was $4,000,000. The Government of John Sandfield Macdonald collected and saved altogether $4,000,000 to pay the debt of Ontario the time it was decided what the amount was which the Province of Quebec would have to pay. This Government assumed the $6,000,000 of debt, and therefore left $6,000,000 for Mr. Mowat to expend in building railways in Ontario. He spent $6,000,000 and Quebec spent $14,000,000, and the little Province of New Brunswick spent $6,000,000. We are told that if we do not do so and so, and insist on the Government giving aid to the municipalities throughout the length and breadth of Ontario, we need not expect to occupy seats in this House again. That is the threat, that is the prophecy, but I do not believe it is correct. We are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that the Province of Quebec got some $12,000 per mile for the distance from the city of Quebec to the city of Ottawa. Does the hon. gentleman forget that Ontario got, on the line between Pembroke and Gravenhurst, $12,000 per mile; that the Province of Ontario got, on the line from Callander to Rat Portage $12,500 per mile; and that $12,000 per mile was given for the road from Gravenhurst to Callander in order to connect Ontario with the Canadian Pacific Railway at the latter station. We are prepared, in the House and out of the House, in any constituency of the Province, to contend, as representatives from the Province of Ontario, that we have got as much money, as much fair play, as much justice, as any other Province in the Dominion of Canada. The hon. gentleman says that the Act of last Session took away rights from the different municipalities granting aid to the various railways throughout the country. I ask him have these railways been removed? Are they not still in those counties which gave them aid, for all purposes, for the use and benefit of the parties who granted the bonuses? Is there any hon. gentleman who will deny that? Now, I want to give the hon. gentleman a few little facts concerning some railways of which I know something. The city of Toronto gave a large sum of money to build the Nipissing Railway. The towns of Port Perry, Whitby and Port Hope, the towns of Peterborough, Lindsay and others, as well as the counties interested, gave large sums, including the city of Belleville, the county of Hastings. The townships of Rawdon and Madoc gave large sums to build a line of railway through the different counties. The county of Hastings took $50,000 stock in this road, the Grand Junction, and they had six directors on the board. This county, the city of Belleville, the town of Port Hope, and the town of Lindsay applied to Mr. Mowat, at the time the Grand Trunk got control of something like 500 miles belonging to the Midland system, for justice. What did Mr. Mowat do? I ask any hon. gentleman, either on the Conservative or Reform side, what did he do? He passed a law handing over that 500 miles of railway to the Grand Trunk. They asked him to give them a representative on the board—by the Bill handing over the railway—to give them justice according to the by-laws of the different municipalities, and the arrangements made with the companies building the road. Mr. Mowat said: It is in the interest of your counties and towns and localities that these roads should be handed over to the Grand Trunk, and they were handed over accordingly. We have no benefit—only the benefits that may be derived from the Grand Trunk running a road through the different sections of the country. As one who has to pay some taxes, and who knows a little about the different municipalities—in my own county, at least—I say it is a benefit to that county and those sections of the country that the Grand Trunk took the control and management and bought those railways. They are now, Sir, in a better shape; they are better served; freights are cheaper than under the old system, when the charters were given to the different railways. Now, what is this motion for? It is brought up in order to encourage the delegates, who are here from Ontario to look forward and expect the Government to pay back to the different municipalities the amount of money they paid to help in the construction of these railways. Well, where is this going to stop? Let us ask the question honestly and fairly. Will not all the other Provinces come in and get a portion of this money? I ask how, in the name of common sense, can the Government meet these demands? It is utterly impossible. These delegations should be told honestly and frankly and candidly that it cannot be done—that it is not fair or right or reasonable. It has been said by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) that the Bill passed last Session is not legal and constitutional according to the Act of Confederation. If it is not constitutional, what is the use of saying that these parties have taken the railways from the different counties? I say it is the duty of the Government to set that matter right and pass a bill giving back—if they have taken it away—the power to the Provinces and the municipalities, and any power which they took from them. Let us settle this matter finally and forever.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Of course that meets the views of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), and I am glad to see that it does, as there is so little that comes from the representatives on this side of the House that seems to please him.

Mr. BLAKE. I like to hear a confession of error.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Well, I am open-hearted enough if I do wrong to acknowledge it, but the hon. gentleman is so wise and knows so much, and is so self-willed and determined, that he never acknowledges a wrong because he never thinks he is wrong. Then I say that we should tell the people throughout the length and breadth of this country that this Dominion of Canada is not going to refund any of the bonuses granted by the different municipalities; but let us say to these people that if there is any authority taken from them, it shall be handed back, and I say the sooner the better. Would it not be better for us, as Reformers and Conservatives, to be honest with these people? Are they not coaxed to come here? Are they not sent here by Mr. Mowat whenever they apply to him for aid? Are we not told by hon. gentlemen opposite that we are plunging this country into debt that will not be paid in this generation? And yet they want us to refund moneys to these municipalities. Why does not Mr. Mowat do as an honest man, as the Province of Quebec, the Province of New Brunswick, and the Province of Nova Scotia have done—why does he not take the $6,000,000 of paper surplus which he says he has, and hand it back to these municipalities? He cannot do it, because he has not got it. He says he has $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 of surplus on paper, in the shape of a debt due by the Dominion of Canada. When he comes to refund to this Dominion the amount that he owes it for wholesale licenses, decided by the Supreme Court to belong to the Dominion, and other debts, he will find that the surplus claimed to be $6,000,000 will dwindle down to $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 below the amount left by the late Sandfield Macdonald.

Motion agreed to.

THE GOVERNMENT GOLD RESERVE.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I wish to read a statement which I have received from Mr. Courtney, in reference to the question of the leader of the Opposition in regard to the 4 per cent. bonds: He says:

"We were certainly advised by cablegram that the guaranteed 4 per cents. were to be sold for certain dates, but not until after the publication of the return did we get the accounts from England. The transactions, in fact, were not completed at the time when the return of the circulation was published in the Gazette."

Then, later on, he says:

"I wrote hurriedly, and I have since looked at the brokers' sale notes. The bonds were sold in January, but delivery was not completed until the 9th of February. The last circulation statement published was for January."

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

FACTORY BILL.

Mr. BERGIN moved that the order for second reading of Bill (No. 2) to regulate the employment of children and young persons and women in the workshops, mills and factories of the Dominion of Canada, be discharged. He said: I may say, in explanation, that I ask this because I have found that many clauses of the Bill conflict—so I am advised by counsel—with the powers of the Local Legislatures. I have caused the Bill to be remodelled, and I think it is now in a shape which will entirely avoid any conflict between the powers of the Local and Federal Legislatures. It will be impossible for us to go on with this Bill without very serious objections being made to it in its present form; and if I were to propose to have it printed and submitted to the House as I desire to have it amended in committee, the objections made might be so serious as to interfere with the success of the Bill. I am very anxious that this Bill should be passed this Session, and for that reason I hope the House will not offer any opposition to the proposition I make. The new Bill, as I propose to submit it to the House, is ready, and there will be no delay, beyond the delay required for the notice. I move therefore that this order be discharged.

Mr. BLAKE. I am afraid the result of this course will be to render impossible the accomplishment of that which the hon. gentleman desires, because if he proposes to give notice of the introduction of a new Bill, the delay in getting that Bill printed in English and French will be such that by the time it comes up for its second reading and reference to the committee, the time for Private Bills will have elapsed, and this, with other infants, will be slaughtered.

Mr. BERGIN. I would prefer to go on with the Bill and have it amended in committee to save time, but advantage might be taken of the rules of the House to prevent my going on with it, and I think there is still plenty of time.

Motion agreed to, and order discharged.

REPRESENTATION OF THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 45) respecting the representation of the Territories in the House of Commons.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is scarcely worth while that the hon. gentleman should make a speech on a subject of this importance to such a thin House. I will take care that he will have every opportunity of discussing the Bill.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I will have to be absent from Parliament after next week, for a couple of weeks, and if I allow the Bill to stand to-night, I will not be able to reach it during the week, and it will be too late, after I return, to reach it during the Session. If the hon. gentleman would consent to have it put on the Order Paper, so that it will come up the first thing on Wednesday next, I will have no objection to let it stand.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I see no objection to that.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I move that this Bill be the first order of the day amongst Public Bills and Orders.

Motion agreed to; and order for second reading discharged.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 8:25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 5th March, 1885

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 85) respecting factories.—(Mr. Bergin.)

Bill (No. 87) to amend the Act 40 Victoria, chapter 36, intituled: An Act to provide for the employment, without the walls of common gaols, of prisoners sentenced to imprisonment therein.—(Mr. Sutherland, Oxford.)

Bill (No. 88) further to amend the Canada Temperance Act, 1878.—(Mr. Townshend.)

Bill (No. 89) further to amend the Patent Act of 1872.—(Mr. Hay.)

SALE OF RAILWAY PASSENGER TICKETS.

Mr. McCARTHY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 86) to amend the Act respecting the sale of railway passenger tickets. He said: The Bill is a short one, and its purpose is to compel railway companies to post a notice in stations where their tickets are to be redeemed. The law, at present, requires them to redeem tickets, but in practice that provision is of very little use, as the companies insist on the tickets being delivered or sent to the head office, which is, of course, quite contrary to the intention of the Legislature, and almost useless to the traveller.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

LIEUT.-GOVERNORSHIP OF NEW BRUNSWICK.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether any understanding has been reached between the Government and the Lieut.-Governor of New Brunswick as to his continuing to fill the office for any, and if so, for what time?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No understanding has been reached on that subject.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—AMENDED PLANS AND PROFILES.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Whether the Government has received the amended plans and profiles of that part of the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia of which the plans and profiles were returned for amendment? If so, when? Whether the location shown by such amended plans and profiles has been approved? If so, when? Whether the road is being constructed in this part? Whether further papers will be laid on the Table?

Mr. POPE. These returns were received on the 7th of January, 1885, and approved by Order in Council, dated the 16th of January, 1885. The work is in progress there.

It is not the intention of the Government to lay any further papers on the Table.

CATHOLIC POPULATION OF THE PROVINCE OF QUEBEC.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to request the Catholic clergy of the Province of Quebec to supply Government with such information as they possess, in detail, showing the number of the actual resident Catholic population of the Province of Quebec, in the years 1883 and 1884, respectively, for the purpose of testing the accuracy of the statements made to this House and elsewhere touching the large emigration from the Province of Quebec in recent years?

Mr. POPE. It is not the intention of the Government.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT, 1878.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill amending the Canada Temperance Act of 1878, in the direction asked for by the delegation of temperance men that waited upon the Premier recently?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government as yet has come to no conclusion on that subject.

ENQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to enquire whether the statement required by Statute to be laid on the Table touching the affairs of the late Bank of Upper Canada has yet been prepared.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I asked the Deputy Minister to have it prepared some days ago. I do not know whether it is ready yet; I will send at once and see.

Mr. CASGRAIN. May I enquire if there is any prospect of soon seeing the plans and reports concerning the Short Line Railway?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think the hon. gentleman has already given notice of that question, and it will come up to-morrow or on Monday.

EXCHANGE BANK—GOVERNMENT ADVANCES.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed resolutions (p. 295) of Sir Richard Cartwright on the subject of advances made by the Government to the Exchange Bank.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is to be regretted, I think, Sir, that the papers in connection with this question, which were brought down in answer to a motion of mine last year, have not been printed. They are of some importance; they involve questions of importance; and as they have been the subject of two motions in this House I trust that the members of the Printing Committee will see their way clear to order them to be printed even at this somewhat late period. As they have not been printed the necessity will devolve on me of reciting the facts which have been already established from those papers for the information of those hon. members who either were not present when this subject was under discussion before, or who may not entirely recollect the facts. Now, Sir, the fact with respect to these advances to the Exchange Bank are briefly as follows: First of all, about two years ago, on the 12th or 14th of April, I think, $200,000 was advanced by the Minister of Finance to be placed on deposit in the Exchange Bank. It is shown by these papers that that advance was made for the purpose of strengthening the bank—not in the ordinary course of business, but for the special purpose of enabling the bank to keep its doors open a little while longer. It further appears that another advance, amounting to $100,000, was made a month afterwards under peculiar circumstances. It was made on the personal guarantee of a member of the other branch of the Legislature, Mr. Senator Ogilvie; and as the document has not yet been printed, I will read his letter on the strength of which the advance of $100,000 was made. The letter is addressed to Mr. Courtney in his capacity as Deputy Minister of Finance, and is as follows:—

“OTTAWA, 11th May, 1883.

“MY DEAR SIR,—I beg that the Government will place a further sum of $100,000 at deposit with the Exchange Bank on the same terms as the former deposit of $200,000, and on the Government agreeing to comply with the request, I hereby undertake to hold myself personally responsible for the further deposit of $100,000.

“Yours very truly,
“A. W. OGILVIE.”

It also appears from these documents that this advance was made without any enquiry being made as to the solvency of the bank, or any precautions apparently being taken to ascertain what would be the result of refusing the advance. Now, Sir, I do not want the House to judge of the circumstances under which advances of this kind should be made by the Finance Minister to banks in this Dominion entirely on my ipse dixit. I happen fortunately to have found a very excellent résumé of the conditions under which alone advances of this kind ought to be made by the Government of the Dominion; and as it has been very rare of late years for me to be able to do myself the pleasure of concurring with the hon. First Minister, I take especial pleasure in calling the attention of the House to the very excellent résumé of those conditions very recently given by the First Minister. Speaking on this subject, he declares:

“It has been, in my experience, looking back, found requisite or expedient by several Governments, in times of great depression, to prevent universal ruin, universal panic, to come to the help of some of the banking institutions. Those hon. gentlemen who have lived as long as I have, will, if they look back, find that Governments have, on occasion, prevented universal panic by acting in concert with strong banking institutions, in helping to sustain banks which were not quite so strong. That has happened and will happen everywhere.”

Now, Sir, on the whole I think that is a very admirable statement, made by a gentleman eminently well qualified to make it, of the conditions under which in times of great difficulty, to prevent universal panic, Governments may, in concert with strong banking institutions, come to the rescue of some of the weaker banks. As the First Minister has lately developed a taste for Shakespeare, I may observe that it occurs to me that this is an excellent illustration of the well known passage in Shakespeare which says it is much easier to teach twenty men what to do than to be one of the twenty to follow one's own showing. Perhaps, Sir, I may be pardoned for saying that I could quote other instances in which the hon. First Minister has laid down in admirable fashion the conditions under which Governments should act in dealing with questions relating to the rights of the Local Legislatures—for instance, in a very admirable speech of his on the New Brunswick School Act, in which he pointed out that if the Acts of the Local Legislatures were disallowed, there was practically an end to this Confederation. Now, I turn to the defence made of this transaction by the hon. Minister of Finance. That hon. gentleman pleaded in the following fashion. First of all, following a little in the track of the Finance Minister, he stated that it was a case of extreme urgency in which this advance of the 12th of April, 1883, was made; and this is what he said:

“I think, however, that the House and the country will sustain the Government when, under such extreme circumstances and for the purpose of preventing a run on the bank, we took this step; because we all know, by looking at the returns, that if to-day two-thirds of the banks in the Dominion were suddenly called upon to redeem their circulation, where those banks would be and where the business of the country would be. Under the circumstances we feel that we were perfectly justified—and feeling at the same time that we were safe in doing so—in endeavoring to save the country from the consequences which would follow from the breaking down, it might be, of two, or three, or four, or five of the banks.”

On that, at present, I will only say that if these remarks had been made by any unpatriotic gentleman on this side, many and many a day would have elapsed before we had heard the last of such an attempt to cry down the credit of the banks of the Dominion. But the hon. gentleman, besides extreme urgency, pleaded also previous practice; he pleaded that he had been in the habit of interfering for the protection of banks in the Dominion. And for the third plea, he stated that there would be no loss. Now I desire to examine these several pleas successively and in detail. First of all, let us take up the plea of extreme urgency. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that the hon. gentleman's advances to this bank were made on the 14th of April, 1883. Fourteen days before that, on Friday, the 30th March, 1883, the Finance Minister delivered his Budget speech. Now the Budget speech is a very important speech indeed. We publish it at the public expense; we circulate it far and wide; it stands almost on the same footing as a State paper. Every word contained in the Budget speech is expected to be carefully weighed, all the information which his office can give him is at the disposal of the Finance Minister, and the Budget speech is looked to as being a particularly accurate statement of the then condition of the country. Now I find that on the 30th March, 1883, the hon. gentleman, the Finance Minister, spoke as follows:—

"I believe, from the fact that we are spending annually a large amount of money in opening up and developing the great North-West country, from the fact that the population coming into the country at the present time are bringing in a large amount of money for investment, from the fact that, last year, we had of the value of imports over $1,000,000 of settlers' effects, and which will be increasing, and which of course, does not create any difficulty financially, I hold that the return of the pendulum, which always does come back, will be deferred, and that we have seven years of prosperity before the country."

Now, not only in the passage I have quoted, but all through this speech, the Finance Minister, speaking with full knowledge and speaking under these peculiar circumstances, pointed out to us that the policy which he had inaugurated, besides producing temporary prosperity, had laid the foundation of a general, a universal prosperity so firmly established on such stable ground that the greatest law known as yet to us, the law of gravitation, was suspended in favor of the National Policy, and that the pendulum was going to cease its oscillations and return, not for a paltry week or fortnight, but for seven long years. You will observe we have here the definition of the First Minister as to the circumstances under which alone the Government is justified in coming to the rescue of the banks; we have here a statement made a fortnight before these events took place by the Minister of Finance showing that this country was in an unprecedented condition of prosperity and stability. Now, putting these two things together, the alternatives which present themselves to my mind are three in number. Either, when the Finance Minister pointed out to us that we were in such a stable condition of prosperity, he knew better, and for political exigencies he was not accurately representing the condition of the country; of course, I cannot suppose that was the case, but that is a possible alternative. There is a second alternative and that is this, that the Finance Minister, in declaring that the country was in a condition of stability and prosperity, was utterly and completely in error, and that, I regret to say, he not only deceived himself but he also deceived us, and that a fortnight later he woke up to the conviction that the country was in a condition such as would warrant him in taking the very extreme measure which the right hon. gentleman the First Minister, so well described in the passage I have just read. Well, there is a third alternative, namely, that the country was really in a condition of stability and prosperity, in which case the Finance Minister will see that his conduct in interfering for the preservation of a trumpery bank like the Exchange

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT,

Bank was, as held, and correctly held, by the First Minister, utterly and entirely unwarranted. Which of these three alternatives the hon. gentleman will choose, I will leave entirely to his discretion. Then we come to his second plea, the plea of previous practice. The hon. gentleman the Finance Minister, tells us this was not the first nor the second, nor apparently the third, nor the fourth time that he had come to the rescue of banks in difficulties, and he says that up to the present time no harm had arisen. If that be so, all that I can say is that the hon. gentleman had indulged in a very bad practice. It is not possible for him or any man in his position to do these things in a corner; other banks soon get to know that the Government have assisted banks in difficulties; and when they get into difficulty it is but natural and reasonable on their part that they should come to the same beneficent power which had helped their comrades out of difficulty and danger, and sooner or later, just as happened in this case, these little difficulties occur. The worst possible thing the Finance Minister, or any other Finance Minister can do, in the interest of the banks, is to lead them to believe that they have only to get into a scrape in order to come to the Government and to obtain an advance of $\frac{1}{2}$, $\frac{2}{3}$, or perhaps $\frac{3}{4}$ of their whole paid up capital. That does not consort in the least with the admirable definition laid down by the First Minister, who lays down the rule, the Finance Minister will observe, that these things, although they may be done, are to be done with great care and only in times of extreme depression, for the purpose of averting great national injury leading to universal panic. I have quoted the Finance Minister and may perhaps be pardoned for quoting myself. I recollect a good many years ago, as far back as 1873, under circumstances closely analogous to those which now exist, I had occasion to discuss the policy then pursued by the hon. gentleman, and I take the opportunity of reading to the House what I then said. I said my chief objections to that policy are these:

"(1) That it is an error on the part of the Government in a country like this which wants all its available capital for its own internal need, to borrow in the home market at all except under very peculiar circumstances, or from absolute necessity.

"(2) That it is a further error to borrow any considerable sums repayable at call at short notice which is just what my hon. friends are doing; and lastly that the practical working of this system is such as to risk intermixing the public credit with that of various trading and banking corporations to the great injury of both. In connection with this last charge I may remark that the policy of the Government has a direct tendency to aggravate any inflation on the one hand and every turn of depression on the other, and though I will not say that the present stringency results solely from the action of the Government, I do assert that it has contributed direct and powerfully towards bringing it about, and that it will be a fortunate day for the Dominion when the Finance Minister discovers, as I believe he very soon will, that it is no part of his proper duty to charge himself with the task of carrying on the banking business of the country or any part of it."

Now the hon. gentleman's third plea is, I observe, that there would be no loss. Well, that is possible, if possible at all, only I am sorry to say, on one condition, and that is that the Government should use or should abuse their legal power by sweeping away the last crumbs which the extravagance and mismanagement of their directors have left the unfortunate shareholders or rather the unfortunate depositors in the Exchange Bank. Since the hon. gentleman made that statement, many new and very startling facts have been disclosed. In all my experience—and I include in that not only my experience as to affairs in Canada, but I include likewise the evidence I have perused as to the dealing with banks and bank estates in England and Scotland—I do not remember to have read or heard of such shameful malversation or such shameful disregard of their duties on the part of any body of directors as has been shown to have existed in the directorate of the Exchange Bank. Some of them no doubt were innocent of guilty intention; but all of them have been guilty evidently of the greatest laches and of neglect of the duties which they were appointed to discharge. If the Government rank, as, for reasons I shall give later on, I think they ought to rank, as ordinary creditors, there is scarcely any possibility but that a very serious loss indeed must be endured by the Government, and then the hon. gentleman's third plea falls entirely and wholly to the ground, unless on the condition that the Government choose to take an extreme view of their legal right and to sweep away all that remains for the unfortunate depositors in the Exchange Bank. I am advised that an enormous sum has been lost by this bank after this advance was made. I am advised that on a single account something like $170,000 was lost by the bank after the advance was made. I am advised that the account of the president, or chief manager, or whatever he was, shows that, on an overdrawn account of the chief officer of that bank, one-third or thereabouts of the whole paid-up capital of the bank was advanced. I am not of my own knowledge acquainted with those facts, but I believe there are gentlemen in this House who are prepared to testify to them. It must have been known to the Finance Minister that, when you interfere with the affairs of an insolvent institution, there is always great reason to expect that the managers, from the desire to play double or quits, or from some more guilty motive, are very apt to plunge into more extravagant or adventurous transactions; and precisely that, as I am informed, has been the case in this bank. There were special grounds why the hon. the Minister should have been careful in this case. It was not a bank of unstained reputation. It had prior to the advance once suspended specie payments and reduced its capital, and the sum which was asked for should have called the attention of the Government to its very dangerous condition. We have been so accustomed to deal with hundreds of millions of dollars that an advance of $300,000 may appear to be a mere bagatelle, but that was three fifths of the whole of the paid-up capital of the Exchange Bank, and was just as great in proportion as if $7,000,000 had been advanced to the Bank of Montreal with its paid up capital of $12,000,000. The hon. gentleman knows, and in fact he makes it an excuse for his proceeding, that the board of the Exchange Bank had upon it a number of men of great wealth. The House will not have forgotten, nor will my hon. friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) have forgotten, the contemptuous manner in which the suggestion was met last Session, that before an amount of $100,000 was advanced on the guarantee of Senator Ogilvie, he should have made himself acquainted with that gentleman's position. But the hon. gentleman thought it an insult. He knew that the members of the board of directors were wealthy men. Did it occur to him that, dealing with a board of directors of such wealth and standing, he should have said to them: You want $300,000 to save a bank in which you are interested; pledge your security to other banks, and do not come craving aid from the Government. That is the line which should have been adopted. That is the line which common sense would have suggested. Mr. Buntin and Mr. Ogilvie and others of them had no right to come to the Government of Canada for $100,000, but they should have gone to the Bank of Montreal and pledged their credit, and I venture to say that they would have got the money without the slightest objection. Another gross impropriety to which I have to call attention is the action of the hon. the Minister with regard to Senator Ogilvie. What is the use of an Act of Independence of Parliament if Ministers can allow members of this Chamber or the other Chamber to take such advantages as this? We can all see the mischievous results; we are confronted with the difficulty arising from mixing up dealings with political supporters and with bank directors. It is true that the Government may prefer the claim which I understand they have already advanced, that, because they are the Government of Canada, they are entitled to claim everything which the bank possesses in discharge of their debt. But, if the action of the Government did, as I am informed it did, a great damage and no good to the shareholders and depositors in the Exchange Bank, what an inequitable thing it is for Government to avail itself of this claim, not so much for the purpose of recovering public money as for the purpose of avoiding enforcing the letter of guarantee given by Senator Ogilvie which I have just read. Although I speak under correction in regard to this, I am informed that they have a distinct legal remedy against Senator Ogilvie, and that, under that, they could have recovered this amount from him, but they refused to do so, and they enforced, or tried to enforce, their inequitable remedy against the unfortunate shareholders of the Exchange Bank. As regards Senator Ogilvie, no doubt he is entitled to the benefit of the law, but let the Government and the House know this important fact as between the directors and the country. Senator Ogilvie may be comparatively an innocent man, he may be, or he may not be. I do not know sufficiently the way in which the affairs of the bank were conducted to pronounce an opinion, but, regarding the great bulk of his own shareholders, and, still more, the great bulk of his own depositors in that bank, he has no right. He was one of those directors. It was largely due to his laches and to his ignorance that this misfortune came about, and the Government should never have shown any preference whatever to a man who, having been a director of the Exchange Bank, had acted in this way. Sir, the whole of this business, I must say, reflects serious discredit on the administration of the Department. There may be occult reasons for it. No doubt, under certain circumstances, these banks are very useful institutions. I am informed, Sir, that among the assets of this bank there is one sum of several thousands of dollars which was advanced on the security of a member of this House, whom I am sorry not to see in his place—the member for Montreal West (Mr. Gault)—and that this represents a part of the cost of his election, and has never been paid—for what reason I do not know. Now, Sir, if that be the case I am very sorry for it. When that hon. gentleman returns it will be for him, I think, to explain to the House, if there be any explanation possible, how it comes that he, a former president of the Exchange Bank, drew, or caused to be drawn, several thousands of dollars from the bank for the purpose of defraying his election expenses. Now, I hope the hon. Minister of Finance did not know of that transaction—I think it probable he did not know of it, I am bound to say. But I must point out to him that this sort of thing is really very awkward, and his position, in some respects—as I recollect explaining to him some half dozen years ago at the City of St. John—is one rather peculiar. Sir, it is possible that very charitable persons like myself, very charitable minded persons, who know the hon. Minister well, may take a very lenient view of this matter. When the hon. gentleman made this speech of his on the 30th March, 1883, and when he declared as I have pointed out, that so firm and stable were the foundations on which he had laid the prosperity of this country that the greatest of all natural laws was going to be suspended for seven years in his interest; Sir, we may be willing to admit, for the sake of argument, that the hon. gentleman on that occasion really did not know what he was talking about, and, Sir, in like manner when, on the 12th and 14th of April, he chose to make an advance which he ought only to have made for the purpose, the First Minister says of averting a universal panic, and in time of extreme depression—then, Sir, we may also charitably believe that the Finance Minister really did not know what he was doing. But, Mr. Speaker, however charitable the view we may wish to take, I want to point out to the Finance Minister that everybody will not be so charitable. This is a censorious world as he knows. People will look at facts. They will say:

Here is an old experienced parliamentarian and administrator, an hon. gentleman who has been Finance Minister for many years, and a financial colossus at that; we find that he neglects the commonest precautions; he walks straight blindfolded into the snare; he violates all kinds of parliamentary rule and etiquette in dealing with Senator Ogilvie, and he puts $300,000 of the public money in a bank which turns out to be the rottenest of all rotten eggs. Now, Sir, they may require an explanation. For myself, I know that the hon. gentleman, probably erred from over good nature. I know that the hon. gentleman has made great sacrifices for his party. The hon. gentleman is, if he will pardon me for saying so, a good Pharisee, and a man who makes broad his phylacteries occasionally, and yet the hon. gentleman, in view of party exigencies, and in his zeal for the public service, has not consented to be a consort with, but actually a colleague of publicans and sinners for this many a day. Now, Sir, it will be a very sad thing indeed if the Minister of Finance's usefulness should be gone. It would be presumptuous on my part to advise the First Minister what he ought to do in such circumstances, and I am very sure that he would not take my advice if I gave it. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I am quite well aware that the same causes do not always produce the same results with different persons. I know as well as anybody that sauce for the Grit goose is not always sauce for the Tory gander.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh! oh!

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman dispute the proposition? There are too many proofs that I could bring. We know very well what, in a somewhat similar case, the First Minister did. We all recollect when the usefulness of my lamented friend, Mr. Letellier, was gone, and what followed? Mr. Letellier lost his Lieutenant-Governorship. Now it would not surprise me, in case the Finance Minister's usefulness should be gone, that a directly opposite result would happen, and that he would get a Lieutenant-Governorship, and as the thing seems to be in fashion, perhaps a testimonial also. Or, Sir, we might follow the precedent set in your case, and appoint a Deputy or Assistant Finance Minister specially charged to look after banks, and pay them out of the surplus which the hon. gentleman expects to get but which I fear he will not get. Now, Sir, to speak of the matter more seriously, let me recapitulate the facts as they appear. First of all I call attention to this: That in 1853 when this advance was made, the Minister of Finance was perfectly well aware that the bank was in difficulties; he was perfectly well aware why this advance was sought; it was not disguised or concealed for the purpose of enabling this bank to keep its doors open. Now, Sir, if he had perfect knowledge that that bank had been in difficulties he ought to have taken extra precautions. But he took no precautions; he did not consult these experienced bank managers whom he might have consulted; he did not consult them, either, as to the real position of the Exchange Bank, or as to the results which would follow if it was obliged to close. He must have taken an ex parte statement from two or three gentlemen who had the strongest imaginable personal interests for keeping the bank's doors open for a short time longer. The result, as I have said, has been that an enormous loss has accrued to its depositors; the result has been that a further unfortunate loss has taken place, and that the public at large are likely to say that the Finance Minister and the Government favored Senator Ogilvie at the expense of several hundreds of unfortunate people whom they themselves had misled, whom they themselves had deluded into leaving their money in this bank, and in whose case great injury had arisen from the action of the hon. gentleman. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman has not merely committed, I think, a grave error of judgment, he has not merely neglected ordinary precautions, but he has committed a very serious fault indeed in refusing to proceed against Senator Ogilvie, against whom he ought to have proceeded—or, if it is not the hon. gentleman's personal affair, I say the Government ought to have taken every legal remedy against Senator Ogilvie and ought not to have advanced the inequitable and, I think, unreasonable claim against those unfortunate people that are concerned as depositors in the Exchange Bank. Sir, in my judgment the whole business shows what indescribable mischief results from his having departed from sound and well established custom. Here we have Ministers acting as if the public money was their own, or rather as if the public money was nobody's. Now, Sir, it is very easy, no doubt, to grow popular by being generous with other people's money, the hon. gentleman understands that too. I recollect very well, a similar transaction which occurred in 1879 when the Finance Minister, sitting in that place, confessed, in answer to a question of mine, that he—and he is the only Finance Minister who ever did it, that I have heard of—had aided and abetted the banks to advance money to the merchants of Canada to enable them to anticipate the effects of his own tariff whereby, as I explained to him he was practically in the position of a gentleman who was assisting to rob his own till,—in this case the public till; and whereby many hundreds of thousands of dollars were distributed among a certain class of men at the expense of the whole community. Now, Sir, this is a case somewhat similar. The hon. gentleman has been very good to two or three persons; he has been very good to a number of gentlemen who came and asked for assistance, but he did not sufficiently recognise the consequences which would result from his action to many innocent persons, who I am quite sure he never desired to hurt, but whom he, in fact, desired to aid and assist. The true position of the Finance Minister on this as on other matters is very clear: he is in the highest degree, by right of his office, the official guardian of the public chest. He is bound, as far as he can, to check the lavishness of his colleagues, if by any extraordinary accident they should be lavish in their expenditure of the public money. He is bound to foresee danger; he is bound to warn us and the Government as to future contingencies, and he is especially bound to guard against the establishment of dangerous precedents from which much mischief, as in this case, might flow. I am very sorry this should have occurred—very sorry. The present case is perhaps a comparatively insignificant sample of the results which flow from this lavish dealing with the public money. And yet mischief enough has been done. I am told there are probably nearly one thousand depositors of small amounts of money with the Exchange Bank who, if the hon. gentleman and the Government persist in their course, will lose all except a most insignificant dividend on their deposits. And the thing has been made much worse by the obstinacy of the Finance Minister. If he had only manifested a quarter as firm resolution not to advance money as he has displayed in insisting on and pressing the Government claim, it would have been better for the depositors, better for himself, better for the Government and better for all of us. I cannot truthfully say that I have any great hope that this motion will carry. I am tolerably well aware of the tenacity and strength of the ties which bind hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to the present Government. And it is my present impression that if an angel descended from heaven and appeared visibly before us with conclusive proof that the hon. gentleman opposite has violated every law of the Decalogue and every law on the Statute-book, those hon. gentlemen would only see in it another opportunity of doing as the First Minister says he wishes his supporters always to do, vote for the Government once when they are right and twice when they are wrong,—and this is the second time; unless, peradventure, the angel hailed from No. 8, in which case there is no saying what the result would be. But I say that a very considerable public benefit will, in all probability, result from our action. I feel tolerably certain of this, that this most vicious and mischievous practice which the correspondence shows to have been creeping into the management of the banks all through this country, that when they get into scrapes they come to the Finance Minister to be assisted, is likely to be considerably checked by the two debates which have taken place on this subject. I think in future both the banks and the Finance Minister will take to heart the wise remarks of the First Minister, and say that assistance from Governments to banks is only to be given, as the First Minister justly said, for the purpose of averting a universal panic in times of extreme depression; and then, as he also wisely said, in concert with other and larger banking institutions which have unusual facilities for ascertaining the real condition of the chartered banks. I beg to move the resolution.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I desire to say a few words in reply to the speech made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. But before doing so I would state to this House that during the eleven or twelve Sessions I have had the honor of a seat in Parliament I have received during that period every respect and consideration from all hon. members on both sides of the House, except the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I might call attention to two or three occasions on which, as on the present occasion, he has used language perhaps less parliamentary than that which he has used on this occasion. On the present occasion, in a satirical manner, he has been disposed rather to reflect upon my honor and integrity, and upon the honor and integrity of the gentlemen with whom I am associated in the Government. He has on more than one occasion, in, I think, an unparliamentary manner, I may say in an ungentlemanly manner, referred to the construction of my sentences as being ungrammatical; and he has sat in his place as a critic upon the moral character and the educational standing of members of this House. I am reminded by his conduct and statements of a circumstance that took place not long since in the south of England at a meeting held for the purpose of discussing and considering some important question with respect to the locality. There were present on that occasion a country gentleman, whose organ of self-esteem was very large indeed, and whose organ of benevolence was as small as the other organ was large, and who imagined that he knew everything and that few other people knew anything at all. At that meeting a humble farmer was also present, and he had the audacity to differ in opinion with the country squire. The squire took him to task for it, saying: You are an illiterate man, but I have been educated in two universities. He did not say whether he had ever taken a degree or not. The farmer, looking at the country squire, replied: What of that? I had once a calf that sucked the milk of two cows, and the more milk it sucked the greater the calf grew. That is the spirit in which the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat treats members on this side of the House, whether they are educated or uneducated. It is true I had not the advantage of a university education; but I trust I have had sufficient education to enable me to make my statements to the House in such a manner that members can understand them, and I trust with such clearness that they are prepared to believe them. The hon. gentleman has intimated that in the action of the Government, or, if he will, in the action of the Finance Minister—though it was not the action of the Finance Minister alone—there were party or political considerations with reference to it. He says I am very kind and considerate and generous to these banking institutions, that for political considerations I am anxious to give them certain advantages. Sir, if he will find a parallel, during all the time I have been Finance Minister, to the consideration which he himself gave when he was Finance Minister to the only political bank in the Dominion of Canada, I will retire from my office. In that bank they mesmerized people by the score; and collections were taken in it to carry the elections and help gentlemen who now sit on that side of the House. Yes, Sir, I repeat, that if he can point to a parallel in my career as Finance Minister, if he can find a case equal to that in the way of advantages given and advances made to banks, I will retire from my position. When that very bank came to us three or four years ago, along with the Consolidated Bank, and said: There is a feeling of distrust in the country, in the minds of certain people who are depositors in the bank and people who hold its paper, which is leading and has led to a demand for gold for our notes. They said: we are sound; we have ample assets to pay our liabilities, but if this drain on us continues, if this demand continues, we will have to shut our doors and there will be considerable loss to the country; our stockholders will suffer, the business of the country will suffer, everybody will suffer, if this run is allowed to continue and the bank is allowed to go down. The banks I refer to are the Consolidated and the Ontario, and the gentleman who came from the Ontario Bank was Sir William Howland. Now, if we had been influenced by political considerations we might have turned to them and said: No, we know your bank, and we know its political influence; we know that its political influence was used to defeat our candidates in years past. But we did not do that; we felt that it was in the interests of the whole banking institutions of the country that we should at that time prevent a run on these banks—prevent them from closing their doors. Every man will understand the effect of a disaster of that kind. The moment there is distrust with reference to one or two banks, no matter how strong they may be, there is a general fear on the part of those having deposits or holding notes, and they go to the banks and say: I want our money. The effect of this would be that the managers and directors would say in a day or two afterwards to their customers: You will have to pay up in full. They may offer to renew for 50 per cent., but the answer will be: No, the drain is going on; a demand for specie is made, and you must pay. The result would have been disastrous, and a loss to the public generally apart from the loss sustained by the holders of notes or stock.

Mr. CASGRAIN. And the National Policy, too.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes, the National Policy, and that is to protect the masses of the people. There was no political consideration in making the advance. If that bank and its stockholders and managers had been as warm supporters of the present Government as they were of hon. gentlemen opposite, I have no doubt that we would have heard of that advance when it was made, and we would have been censured for making it on the ground that the manager and stockholders were political friends. The Government considered the proposal; they felt it was safe, and they made advances of $300,000, I think, to each bank, and the result was that it was soon known that the Government had given them sufficient money to pay their demands, and the drain was stopped. The Consolidated Bank, it is true, subsequently closed its business, but they paid us our money in full and 5 per cent. interest, and the Ontario Bank is, I am happy to say, alive and doing a good business, whereas it would have been closed, or at least suspended for a time, if the Government had not stepped in to their relief, not alone in the interests of the bank, but in the public interest. But we heard no complaints then; there was no motion made by the hon. gentleman censuring us now; no question by the hon. gentleman who has moved in this matter to know why we did so. There was no violation of the law; no violation of duty on our part; we were not censured in the least at that time. Well, Sir, what happened? Two years later the Exchange Bank found from circumstances that transpired—some little distrust or something of the kind, I suppose—that there was a pressure on them and a demand, and the people were withdrawing their deposits and asking specie for them. The directors came to Ottawa; I happened to be at the time confined to my house. I said to them: This is a serious and important matter, and I cannot take the responsibility on myself. In the first place, I will confer with my Deputy Minister, who has the returns from the banks, and has a more thorough knowledge of the state of the banking institutions from the fact that all these returns and documents come to his hands. I sent for him and told him exactly the nature of the application, and asked him what he thought about it—whether the Government could advance the money with sufficient safety. He gave me his views on the subject. As I was not able to leave my house, I said to him: Confer with the leader of the Government and my colleagues. It was, I think, in April, before navigation opened—before the produce of the country was going forward; the banks were not in a position to draw exchange and were unable to meet extra demands of this kind. It strikes me that it is one of the cases like that of the Ontario Bank, and the Consolidated Bank, in which the public interest may require something to be done. If the public interests would warrant us in doing it, it would be better to come to the help of these banks rather than have other banks involved; because everybody knows that when one bank comes to grief, it creates distrust with reference to the strongest banks in the country. I said, therefore, that if it was found to be perfectly safe, it was desirable to avoid any such calamity as that. I may say that my Deputy did communicate with a person in Montreal with whom he had the utmost confidence, and the answer was that it was perfectly safe to do it. I may add that the communication was confidential, but I say that if I was to give the name to the hon. gentleman, or to any hon. member on the other side of the House, he would say that he was in a position, and should be in a position, to be a good judge. Accordingly an arrangement was made for $200,000—half of that sum at first, and another $100,000 if it was found absolutely necessary to carry them through. Well $100,000 was advanced, and subsequently a report was made that additional claims had come in, and another $100,000 was necessary. Subsequently Senator Ogilvie and Mr. Buntin, I think, came here, and put themselves in communication with myself and other members of the Government, and in addition to the assurances we had already received they said they were so certain as to the position of the bank that they were willing to give their security. They said we know all the affairs of the bank—though it turned out they did not know them, because there were some wonderful developments afterwards—developments which I think were perhaps unprecedented in Canada. But these facts were not known to the public, they had not transpired when these communications were made by the party in Montreal, and the result was that this step was taken. These parties were so satisfied that they said: We are willing to give for this $100,000 our personal security. The money was advanced on that understanding, but they were distinctly told that not another dollar would be advanced beyond that. Now, it may be that the Government were wrong. It may be possible that there will be some loss, although I think there is not any reason for anticipating that. But I will say this: It may be an error of judgment; but, I say, even if there had been some little risk at that time in preventing what the Government felt would have been a disaster among the business men of the country, by men engaged in business having their operations in the banks limited, it was a justification on the part of the Government even to run a little risk, and save them if it were possible to do it. I quite agree that these things should be done cautiously; and I may say here that at that very time we had a large surplus, and perhaps the hon. gentleman will say that it is one of the faults of having a great surplus that we had money to deposit with the Exchange Bank. The surplus was large, and the hon. gentleman opposite would have been the first member in this House to attack the Government if those portions of the surplus had not been drawing interest. And what arrangement did we make with the different banks at that time? I will give a statement of the deposits at 4 per cent. interest: Bank of Montreal, $1,500,000; Commerce, $600,000; Imperial Bank, $120,000; Merchants', $300,000; Molson's, $140,000; Nationale, $140,000; Ontario, $200,000; Quebec, $200,000; Union, $200,000; Standard, $50,000; St. John, $15,000; Ville Marie, $25,000; and Nova Scotia, $100,000. These sums, amounting to over $3,500,000, were deposited at the time, bearing interest of 4 per cent., instead of being left without interest. Therefore, there would be some responsibility assumed in making these arrangements, and it was considered safe when they were made. With regard to political considerations, I see that the leader of the Opposition has said something about $300,000 for election purposes. I am glad to say that in this transaction there were no political considerations whatever, and the fact of these gentlemen supporting the Government had nothing whatever to do with the matter. It was purely and solely done in the public interest. The hon. gentleman might have liked to see at that time a suspension of the banks all over the country; perhaps he might; it would have suited his purpose probably. But then we had $3,600,000 on deposit, and we had not to borrow money to put into this bank. It was just a question whether we would add to the deposit in the Bank of Montreal without interest $200,000 or $300,000, or deposit it at 5 per cent. interest in the Exchange. When they came asking for the money, we asked 5 per cent., as in the case of the Consolidated Bank and the Bank of Upper Canada. Whatever may be the result, I do not anticipate any loss in the matter. It was done by the Government with the best intentions, feeling our responsibility, and feeling that what we did was safe, and was in the interest of the country. This is the second time that this question has been brought up as a vote of want of confidence, but I believe this House has sufficient confidence in the honesty and integrity and good intentions of this Government to vote down a proposition which has been brought against them as a direct vote of want of confidence.

Mr. HOLTON. I desire to add a few words to the discussion upon the resolutions now under the consideration of this House. I have listened with attention to the explanations of the hon. Minister of Finance and I must say that in my humble opinion that hon. gentleman has utterly failed to answer or to meet satisfactorily the charges laid at his door by the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright). These charges I do not propose now repeating at length; but from my personal knowledge of the affairs of this unfortunate Exchange Bank, and upon my responsibility as a member of this House, I assert emphatically, that the facts as alleged by my hon. friend from South Huron are absolutely correct in every particular. We on this side of the House complain of the extraordinary action of the Minister of Finance in advancing enormous sums from the public treasury to an institution, which, at the time this loan was sought, and upon the voluntary admission and statements of those seeking assistance, was in a condition of serious difficulty and embarrassment. We moreover complain that the hon. gentleman should have done this without taking the most ordinary precautions to ascertain the extent of the risk he was assuming, or the nature of the investment he proposed making on behalf of the people of Canada. Had he taken such precautions, he would, upon the very threshold of his enquiry, have been made aware of many facts bearing upon the gross mismanagement—I may say truthfully the criminal and fraudulent mismanagement—of this bank, which must certainly have deterred him from placing any portion of the public funds in such serious peril. He would, for example, have been informed that but a few days before the demand was made on the Government for these loans, his friend and supporter in this House, the hon. member for Montreal West (Mr. Gault), had disposed of a large lot of his shares in the stock of the concern to the manager and cashier of the bank, who paid for those shares by a draft upon his personal account in the bank, already overdrawn to an amount largely in excess of $100,000. It would doubtless have been hinted to him that this same cashier and manager was living in princely fashion, in a mansion recently erected and luxuriously furnished at a cost to the bank of $50,000 and upwards. He would have ascertained that a block of 1,000 or 1,200 shares of the bank, out of a total of 5,000 shares, had been and was being manipulated by the manager and cashier of the bank with some of his co-directors, very largely with the funds of the bank, in such a manner that an enormous loss has accrued to the bank, and it has since been found well nigh impossible to establish the ownership of these shares. He would, upon enquiry of almost any bootblack or newsboy in the city of Montreal, have been informed that the bank was at the time regarded with extreme suspicion by the commercial community of the city; and that with the management of this precious concern the surest passport to unlimited credit and favor that a proposing customer could present, was that he had neither credit nor reputation elsewhere. And if the hon. gentleman had but prosecuted his enquiry a little further, he would, in all probability, and without incurring the risk of being considered too inquisitive, or curious, have been informed of the fact that two accounts, standing in the names of the West End Committee and the Montreal Conservative Association respectively, were, as they now are, indebted to the bank in the sum of $3,400 for advances made in September, 1878, to Thomas Craig, then election agent and manager for the present member for Montreal West (Mr. Gault), at that time president of the bank and Conservative candidate for Montreal West, for the purposes of whose election these advances were made. In fine, he would have discovered that, as the result of such fraudulent and criminal practices, as those to which I have alluded, the bank was, at the time the loan was made, hopelessly and irretrievably bankrupt. These are but a few of the facts, the corroboration of which is to be found among the records in the Superior Court in Montreal, which would have met the enquiry of the Finance Minister had he but thought it wise and prudent in the interests of the people, whose trustee he unfortunately is, to investigate matters a little. I mention them merely to show the hon. gentleman the utter rottenness of the institution which he so eagerly entrusted with large sums of public money. There is, however, another and in some senses perhaps a more serious consideration, which ought to have much weight with members of this House, as it certainly will have with the country. It was bad enough to place a large sum of the public money in the serious peril in which it now is; but, worse than that, the result of the action of the Government in this matter has proved disastrous to all interested in the bank and absolutely ruinous to many. My statement in this respect is fully borne out by the numerous facts which have been brought to light during the process of the liquidation of the bank now going on, and I have no hesitation in declaring, and I do now declare most emphatically, that had the bank closed its doors in April, 1883, as it must certainly have done had the Government not come to its rescue at that time, the creditors and shareholders would be to-day many times better off than they now are. The former would, beyond question, have been paid their claims in full, while the shareholders would have saved the amount of their double liability, at least, and possibly have received something on account of their shares. The effect of the action of the Government however was to re-establish the concern in the public confidence, in a measure at least; in the course of the four and a-half months which intervened between the granting of these loans and the final suspension of the bank, large additional amounts were received on deposit, large amounts were borrowed wherever they could be had, and at any cost; these sums, with the advances so kindly provided by the Government, were squandered in the wildest and most extravagant manner; and many of the accounts which ultimately proved so disastrous to the bank were fearfully augmented on the wrong side. To-day, therefore, as the direct consequence and immediate result of the Finance Minister's stupendous blunder in bolstering up this rotten institution, as and when he did, the shareholders lose everything, and will have in addition to pay to the full amount their double liability, while the creditors may consider themselves exceedingly fortunate if they receive 50 cents on the dollar on the amount of their claims. For these losses, amounting to at least $1,500,000, and for all the unhappy circumstances attending this unfortunate loan to the Exchange Bank, the Finance Minister and the Government must and will be held responsible by the people of this country, and they certainly ought to be condemned by this House. I shall support the resolution of my hon. friend.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I am very glad to have the approval of my hon. friend from the Province of Quebec whenever I take any part in the debates of this House. They remind me of the geese in the capitol who gave warning of the approach of the enemy, and as they are very often rather mute when the interests of their Province are concerned, perhaps they will make their voice heard in the proper time. After this short digression I will come to the point. The point is this: I understand that the Finance Minister said last Session that no action would be taken against Mr. Ogilvie for the reimbursement of the loan.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I did not say we would not. The question was asked if any action had been taken. I said no.

Mr. CASGRAIN. The question was whether action would be taken or not, and the Finance Minister's answer was that, in the meantime, while proceedings were going on in the courts, no action would be taken. I desire to call the attention of the Government to this fact, that a judgment has been rendered in the court of Montreal by which the pretended privilege claimed by the Government as a depositor is declared not to be a privileged claim, and the Government to-day are appealing from that decision to a higher tribunal. The consequence is that whether this judgment be right or wrong, the public are the sufferers by this delay on the part of the Government. The mere effect of the appeal is that while it is going on the assets of the bank are being eaten up; moreover, the distribution of the small portion, about 20 per cent, which is to be distributed to the poor depositors, will be delayed. Mr. Ogilvie ought to be put in the position he occupies; he ought to be made to pay up, and the consequence of his paying up would be that Mr. Ogilvie, presenting himself before the bank, would not be regarded there as a privileged creditor in using the name of the Crown, and he would not be saved, as he is by the action of this Government to-day, from the debt. He owes the money and should be forced to pay it. If Mr. Ogilvie be made to pay, it will be so much money into the general fund in order to secure some dividend to the poor shareholders. On the contrary, while this appeal is going on, all the costs are taken from the assets of the bank to the detriment of the depositors, and to this fact I desire to call the attention of the House and the Government. The hon. gentleman may say he has great confidence in the leader of the Government. I am not bound to share his confidence. Though I heard the Prime Minister when he said, speaking of his own hands: "These hands are clean," I am not of that opinion. He may believe it, but he cannot force me to believe it, because I know too much about his antecedents. I will say this on the floor of the House and through the country, for I am not ashamed to say it. The hon. gentleman sitting on my right (Sir Richard Cartwright) has quoted Shakespeare. I would, if my memory serves me right, apply another quotation from Macbeth:

"All great Neptune's ocean will not wash this spot clean from my hand."

Mr. MULOCK. It frequently happens that we have some difficulty in getting at the fact on which we are to pronounce. In this case, however, everything appears to be admitted. I will not take the liberty of saying that in either the speech of my hon. friend the member for Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) or that of the Finance Minister, matters irrelevant to the subject under debate were introduced, although it did appear to me that they travelled somewhat out of the record. I take the matter as I find the facts to justify it. I take the question in its relation to the public interest, and I try to find whether the act that is complained of was one which, under the circumstances, it was in the public interest that the Government should have taken the responsibility of. Now, it will not do for the Government, or for the Finance Minister on this occasion to take shelter behind any alleged ignorance of the fact, because the Minister could have informed himself of both the law and the circumstances under which this misfortune occurred, and of the circumstances which have been subsequently revealed, if he had chosen to do so. The Minister of Finance resented with some degree of warmth the accusation that the advances were made by the Government to the Exchange Bank for political purposes. He denied that statement, and stated that they were made in the public interest after he and his colleagues had come to the conclusion that it was a safe investment to make. I accept that position. I take him on ground on which he places himself. He, as the Finance Minister, of all others most responsible for the financial position of this country to-day, declares that he came to the conclusion, from a knowledge of all the facts, that this was an investment in the public interest and was safe. He stated so a year ago, as well as to-day, so that I need not cite evidence to prove the position which he takes. But he must see that the facts with which he was familiar would not have justified a prudent man in coming to the conclusion which he came to. This bank was incorporated by the Parliament of Canada in 1872. When it came actively into operation I do not know, but the next fact in order of time is that, in 1880, the bank suspended payment. It had an original capital of $1,000,000. In 1880, it failed. In 1881, the bank appeared before a committee of this House, when the Finance Minister was in his present position, two years before the advance in question was made, and he, as a member of the Committee on Banking and Commerce in 1881, investigated the affairs of this bank. An Act of Parliament was then passed, reducing the capital of the bank to $500,000. The Finance Minister in 1881 knew the whole affair. He knew the assets, the liabilities, the system of management which prevailed, and, if he did his duty as a member of the committee at that time in advising the House to recognise the statements presented as true statements, what did he find out? He found out all these accounts which have been complained of. He found out that money had been withdrawn from the coffers of the bank for political purposes, for the return of a member of his own party. He found out that the cashier of this bank was a man absolutely unacquainted with the banking business. Mr. Craig, I am told, was not a banker; he had no banking experience whatever, and he succeeded in 1880, or thereabouts, the former cashier who had absconded. The hon. gentleman found out that the Banking Act had been violated; that Mr. Craig, in addition to his position as cashier, had been placed upon the board of this bank. As a framer of Bank Acts and of the Acts amending those Statutes, he knew that Mr. Craig was acting in an illegal position as master and servant, and that, as managing director, he was set to watch himself. The president, on the eve of this application for aid, as was stated by my hon. friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), had seen fit to wash his hands of the concern, had seen fit, after being president for ten years, to withdraw from the management, to slip out of the concern; and who was installed in his place but the managing director, the last man in the world who should have been placed there, not only from want of qualification, but by reason of the fact that there was an Act on the Statute Book which is altogether opposed to such dual offices. I think the country must hold the hon. gentleman responsible as knowing the true position of affairs when he made the advance in question. He must also have known—he says he knew—the financial position of this bank. He says that these gentlemen came to him in April, 1883, and applied for a loan. Why did they apply for a loan? They told him they were in difficulties. Had he not therefore notice at once that there was trouble? They told him they feared a run, that the depositors had been withdrawing large sums of money, but they said they were solvent. The interested parties came before him and asked him to loan not his own money but the money of the country, and he, instead of making enquiry, took the statement of the borrowers as conclusive. If he had chosen to make enquiry—he says he did—he would have found the true state of the bank, he would have found that, on 1st March, 1883, the liabilities of the bank to the public amounted to $2,980,000—of course liabilities amount to nothing if there are plenty of assets to meet them—but on the asset side he would have found that the gross amount of specie and legal tenders immediately available to meet the liabilities was $78,052.58. So that, if creditors to the amount of $78,052.58 had applied for payment in gold, they would, if they were paid, have withdrawn from the coffers of the bank every dollar available for payment of debts of the bank, and would have left the bank without a dollar to meet the amount of $2,912,947.42 due to the public. The Finance Minister may say that I have given all the liabilities of the bank to the public. I have. Well, I will give him the benefit of the classification, and take the overdue liabilities, for which the creditors could at any moment have demanded payment. The gross liabilities on the 1st March, 1883, amounted to $2,980,000. Now, if we take its gross liability on the 31st of March the bank only had at that time, with which to meet its liability, a sum equal to a little less than 3 cents on the dollar; or if we give the benefit of the classification and say that the bank could not have been called upon to pay on demand more than $1,700,000, then I say that the available assets at that moment would only have paid 5 cents on the whole amount of debts immediately payable. That was a transaction which the Minister of Finance investigated. He saw these bank returns, he examined every one of them before he made this loan. He took that bank return and analysed it thoroughly. He is reported in Hansard to have said that he had the bank returns before him. Mr. Courtney brought them to him. He knew all about it, and he examined thoroughly into the affairs of the bank and pronounced it a safe transaction. Well, if it was a safe transaction let me mention some of the liabilities. Amongst those liabilities immediately payable was that under the head of circulation, $441,529, or a fraction less than half a million dollars. There were creditors of this bank to the extent of nearly half a million dollars who were the first mortgagees of every asset of the bank. Under the Banking Act introduced by the hon. Minister himself, the provisions of which were, no doubt, present to his mind at that time, he knew that this bank had then in circulation this sum of $441,529 which was a first mortgage on everything the bank owned—and yet, Mr. Speaker, he thought the bank was in a sound condition. Why, there was not a banker in Canada, with the exception of the hon. Finance Minister, who believed it in a sound condition. A bank which he sought to prop up—nominally in the interests of the public as he, I believe, honestly thought he was doing—the bank, instead of being one that ought to be maintained in the interests of the public, was one that ought to have been crushed out in the interests of the solvent banks of Canada. And when he decided that it was in the interest of Canada that this advance should be made, what was the course open to a prudent man under the circumstance? Should he not have investigated the condition, and not have taken the mere statements of those interested? Yes, Mr. Speaker, he should. Why did he not first of all say to these gentlemen, who appeared asking for aid: There are many of your sister institutions in Montreal who have plenty of money; I have the bank returns before me for the 31st of March, and they show that these banks have millions of money in their coffers at this moment. Why not go to them, if you have so much available security? If you have got two or three million dollars of bills under discount, take them to the banks in Montreal and they will give you any amount you require, if the security is good. It is their business and their interest alike to aid you on this occasion, if you have got the security which you say you have; and if you have not got that security, then you should not come to this Government and ask for aid. Well, Mr. Speaker, did he take that precaution? He does not appear to have taken that precaution. He took no precaution whatever at that stage, that I can see, to secure the country in respect to this matter. Now, if the Finance Minister had candidly told us what strikes me is the real fact, that he was deceived under the circumstances and that he had made a mistake, I believe—I will not say for the good he has done in the past—but I believe from a sense of generosity, the public of Canada would say no more about it. But when he pledges his financial credit in support of that transaction I think that his action is properly open to criticism. Well, he made the first loan of $200,000, part one day and part another, and he was assured when he made that loan that it was going to restore credit and that everything would be smooth. I am not discussing the morality of that transaction, I am not discussing the effects on third parties, the disasters that have fallen upon others; I am looking at the transaction simply as one between the people of Canada and the Government of Canada. Well, a few days elapsed and the promise they made to him was found to be fallacious. He was told that this advance of $200,000 was going to put the bank in a sound position and restore confidence, and that no more would be wanted. In a short time, however, another demand was made. And here, Mr. Speaker, let me say that I have not yet been able to observe from the Finance Minister's own statement any satisfactory explanation with reference to the security, and I would now directly draw his attention to this point, for I believe that it is due to the people of Canada that he should explain it to us. He was offered as security for that third loan of $100,000 two persons as sureties, the Hon. Mr. Ogilvie and Mr. Buntin, of Montreal. He tells us himself in Parliament that these two gentlemen came forward and volunteered to become security. Now, as a trusted Minister of this country, when he was offered the security of the endorsement of two men for a loan which he had decided to make, and which he contemplated recommending, I say, Mr. Speaker, he had no right to refuse to take all the personal security that was offered to him. It has never yet been explained why the second surety was not accepted, and I think it is due to the people and to this House, which represents them, that we should have that point cleared up. Well, that was the way the security was taken. First of all, this rotten concern was aided in this way; secondly, the country is not put in the best position that the hon. Finance Minister could have put it in. Well, a few months rolled by. The 17th of September—I believe that is the date—arrives, the bank closes, and goes down with ignominy and disgrace, a wretched sham, alike disastrous to private and public interests. That is the culmination of the interference of the Government in this transaction. Now, the Minister of Finance tells us that he did this in the public interest. Whom did he consult as to the course he should take? He himself had his misgivings as to the wisdom and propriety of this course, because when he called in the Deputy Minister of Finance to consult with him as to whether he should make the loan, what question did he put to the Deputy? He asked him: Is this proposed aid a proper policy? The Finance Minister shakes his head.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I asked, is it safe?

Mr. MULLOCK. I will read from the Hansard, page 154, 7th February, 1884, what the hon. Minister said:

"I sent at once to the Deputy Minister and conferred with him upon the subject. I asked him, is this a proper policy? Is it quite safe? At least, is there any doubt about this money being repaid?"

Now, I see that the relations between the Minister of Finance and his Deputy are most extraordinary. It is the first time, I think, we have had it publicly placed on record that the policy of a Government in dealing with public money should be decided by an irresponsible man not occupying a seat on the floor of this House.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That is an error. It was not with respect to the policy, but with respect to the security.

Mr. MULLOCK. I will not press the argument further. I will not press it because the Minister of Finance intimates that he has been incorrectly reported.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes, I think I was not reported correctly. I know I did not ask him as to the question of policy, and therefore it was not likely I would make that statement, because the policy had been settled on a previous occasion and it was a question of security.

Mr. MULLOCK. The hon. gentleman will admit that I am reading correctly from the Debates.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I do not doubt that.

Mr. MULLOCK. The Minister of Finance did not then, he alleges, take into the Government the Deputy Minister of Finance, nor did he ask that question. But he made the loan, having decided that it was safe; and having made the loan, and the bank having failed, I will ask, what was the duty of the Minister as trustee of the public money in respect to that transaction? It was an overdue debt. He had collateral security; he had the security of one man at least. From the time of the loan to the present moment we do not hear of any effort having been made to call on the surety to make good his bond. Why has that apparent negligence been permitted? If an unwise transaction were entered upon, that did not justify negligence afterwards in trying as far as possible to correct the error, to restore to the public money which has been unwisely taken from them. From the beginning to the end, therefore, it appears to me that this transaction has been characterised on the part of the hon. gentleman by errors of judgment, mistakes and, last of all, by negligence. The Minister of Finance, however, defends his course on public grounds. His argument amounts to this, although he does not use so many words: Perhaps I have imperilled a large sum of public money. But even if not a cent comes back to the treasury, the good result which was achieved in averting danger is full compensation to the public for the risk or loss, as the case may be. Let us see whether his prophecies as to the consequence of the failure of such an institution were sound ones. He says that when he made the loan in the month of April, 1883, he was told by those gentlemen who came to him: unless you make this advance there may be universal ruin. And the Minister of Finance intimated that nothing would have been more pleasant and acceptable to the hon. member for Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) than universal ruin, and in fact he makes out that he and his friends are no better than the conspirators of Catalina as regards their country. But we do not hear so much in regard to patriotism just now; I suppose an instalment of that will come up later. But the Finance Minister says he was carried away with the arguments of those gentlemen, that a bank panic would take place, that a business calamity would be the outcome unless this advance was made. The advance was made then for two reasons. The hon. gentleman says the difficulty occurred in April, when navigation was not open, and it was difficult for the banks to dispose of the produce of the country and draw bills of exchange against it. Does he mean to say that he deliberately postponed the evil day, knowing that it must come sooner or later; that he transferred it from April to September? Does he claim prescience, and was he able to foresee that it would happen in three or four months; or did he do it to prevent the evil extending beyond one banking institution; does he say that it was any more difficult in April for the banks to take care of themselves than it was in September? Does he put it that way? If he does, I will not venture to place my opinion as an authority against his opinion under those circumstances. But, whatever it may be worth, I will venture the opinion that of all months in the year the middle of April or May, when he says he concluded his arrangements, is the time when the banks are strongest. That is the time when business is closed up and the new spring trade has not begun. The wool trade has not begun, the produce of the former year has been marketed, the money is back in the country and is lying idle in the banks. I have not made a comparison, but I am satisfied that the public returns will show if you examine them, that the amount of cash and of legal tenders in the country and in the banks during the spring of the year, taking any average year, is far larger than at any other period. I may be wrong in regard to that matter: the Finance Minister, of course, knows exactly how that is. The only argument left to him is, that it was desirable to let this bank down easy. That by this process of financing and keeping its doors open for a certain time, and by having a gradual process of liquidation going on when the end arrived the banks would be so reduced that practically there would be no creditors to make demands, and practically, therefore, no persons to create alarm, trouble and ruin. The Finance Minister says that when he decided to go into that transaction he felt that unless he did so there would be trouble not only in the bank itself but outside of it. From what source would the trouble come? From the volume of creditors, from the persons likely to be prejudiced by the suspension of the bank. What was the state of the bank at the time? I have already mentioned that at the time of the advance the bank owed to creditors $2,980,324.24. If at that time, the Finance Minister tells us in so many words, the bank had been allowed to close its doors owing that sum, nothing short of a commercial crisis would have taken place; but claims were tidied over until the process of liquidation has gone on so far that when the bank's doors were closed there were practically no creditors. What was the change that occurred in the gross amount of the liabilities at the time of the advance and at the time of the final failure respectively? I find by the bank returns that the bank owed when it failed on the 17th September, 1883, the sum of $2,668,884.64, or only $111,439.60 less than the sum it owed at the time of the advance. The condition of the bank was practically the same at the time of the failure in September, as it was at the time the advance was made in April or May. Did the failure in September produce a bank panic? Did it produce a single ripple except among the unfortunate creditors? Did it affect the stock markets? If the Finance Minister will examine the reports of bank stocks as they are to be found in the Library, he will find that the failure of the Exchange Bank in September, did not depress the market one iota. I have examined the quotations appearing in leading monetary journals published in Montreal and there I find that the bank stocks, the most sensitive of all stocks, did not recede in the slightest degree in the city of Montreal where this institution was best known, at the time the bank closed and immediately following it. What therefore becomes of the prophecy about the suspension of this bank producing trouble with other banks? How is it that the facts did not verify that prophecy? I fear that the people of Canada will come to the conclusion that their prophet is a false prophet, one who is good at prophesying, but one unfortunately whose predictions are not sustained by the logic of after events. For all these reasons I think I am justified in saying that I concur in the conclusions arrived at by the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), as set forth in his resolution. I listened to his arguments and considered the facts presented by the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), and they lead me to but one conclusion, and that is, that a great mistake was made, that the transaction was not justifiable, that it was not entered into with proper skill, that it was a breach of trust of the public moneys, that when the advance was once made efforts were not made to recover it, as they should have been made—in fact, that the people's interests in this case have not been, as they should have been, properly considered by this Government and by the Finance Minister, a member of that Government.

Mr. IVES. It is not often that the members of the House have the opportunity and the honor of sitting in judgment on such a distinguished body of men as the present Administration. Our friends who sit on this side of the House have not often had the temerity to arraign the Administration and call on the House to pass upon their executive and other acts. But on the present occasion the Administration have been arraigned, and, as we might have expected, the arraignment has been drawn and presented by that hon. member whom we would naturally expect to be the boldest in making charges of this description, or any other description. In this matter I address those hon. members with whom I generally act, and as we are to sit in judgment on the Administration, it strikes me there are three questions which we must consider; and I think it will not take us very long to consider them and to arrive at a fair conclusion with reference to the matter. The first question is, as to whether the Government, in making these advances to the Exchange Bank, took reasonable precautions before making them; secondly, whether they were in good faith in making the advances—whether their intentions were laudable in so doing; thirdly, whether they have pursued all the remedies they ought to have pursued in the matter since the failure of the bank took place. It is very easy to be wise after the fact in this as in many other matters. It is not everybody that can look long years ahead and predict a storm, but there is a Wiggins who can do so, and possibly there may be some one on the Opposition side who could look through the bank returns, look into futurity, and know that the Exchange Bank returns were not trustworthy, that their assets did not exist, that the liabilities were understated, and that the internal management of the bank was rotten from beginning to end. Possibly there may be some hon. gentleman with that presence on this side of the House, but I undertake to say that the business community of Montreal, and through the townships—and I know something of their views in my Province—had not lost confidence in a great degree in the Exchange Bank at the time the advance was made by the Government of the country. I do not mean to say that it was considered to be the safest bank in the Province of Quebec; I do not mean to say that business men considered that its management was the safest management in the world. It had the reputation of being a speculative bank—of desiring to make large dividends, but while I admit that, I claim the advantage of the statement I make in favor of the Government, that the general public thought at that time, it was solvent and worthy of credit. That was the general impression, and I have no doubt that if it had not been the general impression the gentleman in Montreal to whom application was made by the Finance Minister would have given him, on that occasion, a very different answer from the one he did return. But it turns out that the affairs of the bank were considerably worse than anybody expected, and as my hon. friend who last took his seat has stated, the crash came, and the public knew all about it. The hon. gentleman tells the truth exactly—I presume unintentionally—when, he says, when the crash came the public knew all about it. The Government knew no more about this bank than what the returns showed; the public knew all the Government knew about it. The public were trusting this bank every day; they were making advances to it, and the directors of that bank were so satisfied that it was solvent that two or three of them came up here on an express train to say that they were so confident of the safety of the bank that they would become responsible for the last $100,000 advanced. On the first point, as to whether the Government used reasonable care in regard to this matter, I think the Government ought to be excused, and that we, the jury sitting on this case, are bound to find them not guilty on the first count. On the second, the question of good faith, there can be no question that the intention of the Government in making this advance was a good intention. Some effort has been made by the hon. member for Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) to show or to insinuate that it was made for political reasons or on account of friendliness to Mr. Ogilvie. That matter has been entirely and satisfactorily disposed of by the Finance Minister, and I do not believe that there is a man in the House or out of it who supposes that anything but the interest of the country, generally, actuated the Government in making this advance. And there is one point on which the hon. member who last spoke thinks he has entirely got the Government—the point that they did not use proper diligence. He asks, why have the Government sought repayment of the loan rather than sue the sureties? The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) must know, as a lawyer, that if the Government had instituted proceedings against the Hon. Mr. Ogilvie for the recovery of this loan, for which he was merely a surety, until they had obtained all they could get out of a discussion of the assets of the bank, they would have been taking an entirely useless course. I undertake to say that under the contract of suretyship Mr. Ogilvie was entitled to the exception of discussion, and that he could not have been made to pay this amount under the obligation that was made, until the assets of the bank had been discussed. I do not propose to occupy the time of the House any further. It is quite apparent, upon the three points which have been raised in this matter by the hon. mover of the resolution and the other gentlemen who are supporting it, that the Government are entirely blameless and are entitled to the support of this House. But I will venture a prophecy, and that is, that every Conservative member in this House will support the Government, and every Liberal member in this House will vote for the resolution; and I will tell you why. It will be perfectly consistent with our policy to vote against the resolution, and it will be perfectly consistent with their policy for hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House to support the resolution. Why? Because the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite is to do nothing; their motto is, do nothing though the heavens fall. They believe, as flies on the wheel, that nothing can be done; if a bank is in difficulty, if there is likely to be a run on it, if there is likely to be a public calamity for the want of something being done by the Government, they believe the last thing to be done is for the Government to alleviate the difficulty and prevent a catastrophe. That was the policy of the hon. gentlemen from first to last; it is their policy, not only with reference to this, but every other matter; but our theory is, that it is possible, by executive as well as parliamentary action, to assist the country and develop the resources of the country. The Government have been endeavoring in this case, by a deposit in the Exchange Bank, to steady the confidence of the public in the resources of that bank. They were carrying out their legitimate policy, and I hope their action will result in no loss. But even if it should, the country has already many times declared in their favor, and it will not now pronounce against them for endeavoring to avert a calamity.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman has said that he is quite sure that the Conservative members will sustain the Government and that the Liberal members will vote against them, and he is quite sure of that because that course is quite consistent with the policy of the two parties respectively. He says we are the do-nothing party, whereas they are the active party. Sir, is there a man in this House today who, if he felt himself quite free to act, would not say that he was sorry on this occasion that the Government had not done nothing? Is there a man in this House today who, if he felt free to act precisely as he believes, would not say that he did, as this resolution asks us all to do, regret what the Government had done? Does the hon. gentleman himself, who spoke just now, rejoice that they did what they did? Of course there is a sense in which he rejoices, because as a Conservative and a supporter of the Administration, he says hon. gentlemen opposite are going to vote for the Administration, and therefore that is one of the things about which they have to make a hurrah. They have not merely to affirm the good conduct and the wisdom of the Government, but also to glorify the transaction. The hon. gentleman says the Government would have been wrong if they had done any other thing than what they did on this occasion—that they did what was just right. He does not say what the Finance Minister himself says, that he might have made a mistake. No; he did not make a mistake; he did the right thing, says the hon. member, whose, I won't say subserviency or servility, but whose unswerving support in this matter should fortify the claim he is making for a place in the councils of the country. I hope this vote and this speech will not be forgotten when the question comes up as to who is to be Minister of Railways, or who is to fill the vacant shoes if a member of the present Cabinet becomes Minister of Railways. Well, although the hon. gentlemen may feel that it is important always to act, I think the sober second thought and common sense of the people will agree that it is important sometimes to abstain from action—that there are occasions on which it would be wise not to act, and that upon all occasions action of this description, action incurring such a grave responsibility with reference to our public funds, of which the Government are the custodians, not to lend them upon risky securities, not to invest them in speculative banks, but simply to hold them safe and account for them to us—action, I say, of so grave a character, should be preceded by careful and full enquiry and investigation. It is not simply because, as it now turns out, this money has been placed in jeopardy, that this motion is made. It is not simply because, a few months after the third of these advances, this bank closed its doors, that this motion is made. But it is made because the whole circumstances of the case demonstrate that the transaction was entered into and carried out by the Administration without due care and caution, without a due sense of their responsibility to the public and to Parliament, without a proper enquiry, and without the existence of those conditions which alone could render it proper for them to take the responsibility they did, which alone would justify them in asking Parliament to approve of their action, and which conditions were stated only a few days ago, as my hon. friend from Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) pointed out, by the First Minister himself, with reference to this very transaction. On that occasion he (Sir Richard Cartwright) charged the Finance Minister with having done wrong in connection with this matter, and, as my hon. friend from Huron said, the First Minister stated the circumstances under which a transaction of this kind might be entered into by a Government:

"It has been in my experience," he says, looking back, "found requisite or expedient by several Governments, in times of great depression—"

The first condition—

"to prevent universal ruin, universal panic, to come to the help of some of the banking institutions."

Now, let us pause. Was this or was it not a time of great depression? Was the month of April, 1883, and the month of May, 1883, a time of great depression? Is even the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) prepared to aver that? Will his fidelity to his friends and leaders enable him to agree that that first condition stated by the First Minister existed—that that was a period of great depression? Will he tell us, in the second place, that this was done to prevent, and that therefore the consequence of not doing it would have been to produce, "universal ruin, universal panic?" What! A little bank, which the hon. gentleman himself has described as a speculative bank, which had a few years ago a capital of $1,000,000, which had lost half that capital, which had been obliged to come to Parliament to ask that its capital should be reduced by 50 per cent., and which, since that time, had been doing business speculatively—as the hon. gentleman tells us, and I thank him for the statement—doing business on speculative principles, with its diminished capital of half a million;—even if the condition of this country was not one of great depression, to use the hon. gentleman's words, was its condition such that even if this speculative bank, which was so handled that it had lost half a million dollars, had suspended, its suspension would have produced "universal ruin, universal panic?" Will my hon. friend's loyalty to his friends and leaders induce him to aver of the condition of things at that time, and with reference to this bank, that its suspension in the month of April or the month of May would have produced "universal ruin, universal panic?" If that be so, I want to know if at a time of year when, as my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) has pointed out, the business of the country is such that the banks contract their advances when they are necessarily relatively stronger—I do not speak of their condition at this particular time, because I have not looked at it, but in the general course of business they are relatively stronger than in the fall of the year, when the crops begin to move, and their circulation is large and there is a general expansion—if at the time of the year when the banks are so relatively stronger, the suspension of this little, speculative, and discredited bank, with its half million dollars capital, would have produced serious panic and ruin, I want to know why, when it did suspend on the 17th September, it did not create even a ripple of alarm in financial circles? But it did produce a sensation, and the sensation was a sensation of relief. For it was well known to the banking community, if not to the Minister of Finance, that the operations of that bank, for months and months before, had been operations of an unsound, a speculative, an unbusiness-like character. Now we will go on a little more; we will deal a little more with the speeches of the hon. gentleman. We have got the condition of things, and he repeats it again:

"Those hon. gentlemen who have lived as long as I have will, if they look back, find that Governments have, on occasion, prevented universal panic."

The hon. gentleman felt that that condition of things, which was to be avoided, had been so aptly expressed by himself that he repeated the phrase a moment afterwards, "prevented a universal panic." How? In what method?

"By acting in concert with strong banking institutions, in helping to sustain banks which were not quite so strong."

There is the second condition. How is it that universal panic and universal ruin, or, not to adopt these strong expressions, serious difficulty and disaster and embarrassment, may ensue under certain circumstances from a bank failure? And what institutions are first and most likely to be affected? The Finance Minister has answered that this afternoon. We all know the answer. It is by the loss of credit and the general effect, even upon sound and safe banks, of one banking concern, from mismanagement or misfortune, going down. That is the difficulty; the Finance Minister pointed out. The First Minister, on the occasion to which I referred, recognised it, for he said:

"In concert with leading banks, to help banks that are not so strong."

Who, then, have the chiefest and most immediate interest in preventing the suspension of any bank which is solvent, which possesses as yet the elements of vitality and stability? The banking institutions, its brothers. The other banking institutions of the country are those who, by the admission of both hon. gentlemen, will suffer most, and it is from the action and reaction upon them that the difficulty is to come, and therefore it was that the First Minister was perfectly correct when he stated the second condition, the condition of helping a corporation to be, that the Government would act in concert with the leading banks.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. BLAKE. I was calling your attention to the conditions the First Minister had laid down. One of these conditions was the action of the Government should be action in concert, with strong banking institutions, to help the bank which might not be quite so strong. I had pointed out the fact that the banks were, of all the institutions and persons in the country, those most interested and most likely to be immediately affected. That was the condition which the hon. gentleman stated as what was not only natural and reasonable, but also likely; and that condition being stated, I want to apply it. Which is the bank—which are the banks—with whom the Government were concerting measures to assist the Exchange Bank on this occasion? Where are the banking institutions with which the First Minister and his colleagues consulted, and which they found anxious to assist the Government in their policy as to the Exchange Bank? Where are the other institutions in whose name, in whose interest, he said he was acting, and who felt it was the common interest of the Government, and themselves, that action should be taken, and who showed their faith by their works? What were the relations of the Exchange Bank to the other banking institutions of the country at this time? I asked an hon. friend to look at the Gazette returns of this epoch, and from them it appears that at the time of the loan the Exchange Bank was actually a creditor of the other banks to the extent of $10,000. That was the extent to which the banks on their operation, their ordinary cash operations, I presume, had allowed the Exchange Bank to take their paper, and so far from there being assistance rendered at that time or assistance proposed, so far as we know—we have heard something more to-day than we heard last year from the Finance Minister—but even to-day, with the amplified statement he has given us, we have no suggestion whatever that the condition, the reasonable, proper, and just condition which the First Minister announced, namely, that of acting in concert with leading banking institutions, was applied or attempted to be applied on this occasion. "By acting in concert with the other banks," the First Minister says, but the other banks would not and did not assist, they did not or would not act in concert with the Government, because they thought the methods of the Exchange Bank were unsound and that the bank itself was rotten. Compare the case of the Federal Bank with that of the bank which is before us just now. Look at what was done in the case of the Federal Bank. You find that they called the other banks into council; you find that they asked representatives of other banks to form a committee; you find that the latter did so, that they took up the affairs of the Federal Bank, and investigated them, and made arrangements whereby they might, acting in concert and upon proper terms, advance certain sums to assist the bank. That was the course taken then, and that is the course that has been taken, more or less formally, on other occasions. But on this occasion we did not hear of it. Of what bank did the Government make any enquiry? Did they ask of Mr. Greene? of Mr. Ogilvie? of Mr. Buntin? Did they say to them, which of your sister banks are helping? what are your relations with the Bank of Montreal, with which you keep your cash account? what are your relations with the other banks? have you asked them for assistance? have they refused you assistance? and, if they have refused you assistance, why? And if you did not ask them, why did you not ask them? These are the first questions that would be put, that ought to be put, that must have been put by the Government, if they did their duty, before they made a loan of this description and this amount to a bank with this amount of capital. Yet, upon that subject, we find nothing. We hear for the first time of some confidential enquiry having been made from some other unnamed individual in Montreal, to whom the Finance Minister gives a reputation which, I dare say, he deserves, but of which we have no means of judging. But these are the enquiries and these are the sources, the quarters of enquiry which ought to have been resorted to. Why, Sir, this is, no doubt, as the First Minister put it, a very grave affair. It is, as the Minister of Finance put it, a very grave affair. I do the Minister of Finance no injustice whatever when I say that Ministers more able, more powerful, more experienced than himself, have left Administrations before now because they found the Cabinet would not agree with them in transactions of this kind. Sir Alexander Galt, the Finance Minister in the first Cabinet of Confederation, left the Government because his views in regard to a loan to the Commercial Bank were not shared by his colleagues, and he would not agree in the views of his colleagues, and they declined, and I believe rightly declined, to advance money to the Commercial Bank. So that bank was permitted to go under, and in consequence the Finance Minister was lost to the Ministry of the day. Nor is that the only case in which applications have been refused. What about the Ville Marie Bank, a few years ago?

What about the Jacques Cartier Bank, a few years ago? What happened to them? What applications were made? What answer did they receive? I am not blaming the Government, for I have not the materials for praise or blame in reference to these applications, but I have reason to believe they were approached, and that those approaches were not favorably received. I think I have shown you that the second set of conditions that the First Minister has declared to be essential have not been complied with, that this was not an act of the Government, after consultation and in concert with the leading banks of the country, upon a common course of policy agreed to by them in a risk and in a course of action in which they were making common cause and taking a common part. After stating that condition, the First Minister returned to the occasion, he returned to the gravity of the case, and went on to say:

"That," that is to say, "that Governments have, on occasion, prevented universal panic by acting in concert with strong banking institutions, in helping to sustain banks which were not quite as strong." "That has happened and will happen everywhere. It has happened in England, where Governments have come to the rescue of the Bank of England, in times of panic, to prevent a run on the bank."

We all know how the Government have assisted the Bank of England, not by depositing their money there, for all their money is there already, but by allowing the bank to issue notes in excess of their chartered power, with reference to the specie held by them:

"Every Government must, of course, act on its own responsibility to the best of its judgment, in coming promptly to the protection of the commercial and financial world, and the people generally. If they make mistakes, they are liable to animadversion."

I call the attention of the hon. gentleman, the member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) to this point—"If they make mistakes, they are liable to animadversion." But he says they are not liable to animadversion.

Mr. IVES. I say they did not make a mistake.

Mr. BLAKE. I was going on to say that, as they were not liable to animadversion, they could not, according to the hon. gentleman's view, have made a mistake. I say they have made a mistake, and I think the hon. gentleman is the only member in this House, who does not in his heart think they made a mistake on this occasion.

"If they make mistakes they are liable to animadversion, but no Government ought to deprive itself of the power of assuming that position in times."

And here we recur to the state of the circumstances. In what kind of times? In that kind of times which we have enjoyed since hon. gentlemen opposite resumed power in 1878? No—

"In times of great depression, great commercial distress and panic."

And there the hon. gentleman leaves the subject, and there for the time I leave him. If you read his statement from the beginning to the end, you will see that he lays down the conditions that it is "to prevent universal ruin, universal panic," that it is to be "by acting in concert with strong banking institutions" and in conclusion, that the power must be reserved to the Government to act in times of great depression, great commercial distress and panic." You find a condition of things described which, according to the description which we daily and nightly receive from those benches, could not have existed in April, 1883, or in May, 1883, or even in November, 1883. This description of the condition of affairs, and, therefore, of the consequences of the failure of the Exchange Bank at the time of this loan, was not the statement only of the First Minister—it was, probably, not rashly made—it was the statement of the Finance Minister, last Session, when dealing with the question. In the first place, he gave us the account of the intending borrower. Mr. Greene, one of the directors of the bank, called on him on the 10th or 11th of April, and saw him at his house, and the hon. gentleman accepted the statement of Mr. Greene, apparently in good faith, apparently as if there could not be any doubt about Mr. Greene's judgment, apparently as if it was conclusive as to the general situation and not merely as to the situation of the bank. What did he say?

"He stated," said the Finance Minister, "that, owing to one or two circumstances that had taken place in Montreal, there was some distrust on the part of the depositors and noteholders, with reference to the condition of the bank; that it was expected there would be a run made upon the bank that day, and probably the next day, and he came up here to see if some arrangement could not be made with the Government by which their position would be strengthened, and by which the run would be prevented."

So much with reference to Mr. Greene's statement about his own bank and his own conduct. Now, he goes on, and enlightens the Finance Minister as to the consequences generally:

"He also stated that the run might reach half a dozen institutions of the same kind in the city of Montreal and in the Dominion of Canada, by which the public interests would be imperilled, by which the free trade, commerce and business of the country would be imperilled."

Mr. Greene, the director of this small bank, who had so mismanaged its affairs that he had to come to the Government and ask for relief, in order to prevent a run and to prevent the closing of its doors; Mr. Greene, who had failed to conduct successfully the bank, informs the Finance Minister, instructs, enlightens the Finance Minister of the Dominion of Canada, as to the probable consequences of that bank's doors being closed. He tells the Minister, and the Minister seems to have swallowed it as if it were gospel, "that the run might reach half a dozen other institutions of the same kind in the city of Montreal and in the Dominion of Canada," and that by that, "the public interests would be imperilled, and the trade, commerce and business of the country would be imperilled!" If I had been asked to say whether Mr. Greene, the well-known failure as a banker, whose experience as the director of a bank had been with the Exchange Bank, or the Finance Minister of the Dominion of Canada, who had undertaken the somewhat onerous task of regulating the trade and commerce and manufactures of this country, who had undertaken the somewhat onerous task of making all things prosperous by legislation—which of the two should instruct or enlighten the other upon the consequences of the Exchange Bank closing its doors, I should have thought that the Finance Minister would say to Mr. Greene: "I am a better judge of that than you are; I have had a wider experience of the effects of runs on banks than you can possibly have had; it is my business to act upon the information I may receive; it is your business to inform me as to the condition of your bank; that is your affair, but I beg you not to inform me, seeing the way in which you have conducted your business, seeing that there is a crisis impending in regard to your bank, whether or not this run will affect other institutions. You have managed to get your own nest fouled, do not foul the nests of others; I keep my eyes open and I know something about the position of other banks." No, Mr. Speaker, he seems not only to have received the statement of Mr. Greene as to his own bank, but also his statement as to other banks. I wish we knew what they were. I wish we knew which were the six other banks which were to close their doors if the Exchange Bank closed its doors. However, the Minister thought it was true. "Well," he says, "I must leave it to the Government." Then he despatched his Deputy to his colleagues, and of course I hold that, while in this transaction the hon. gentleman, as Minister of Finance, has a somewhat special responsibility, under the exceptional circumstances and in his condition at the time, it would be unfair, unjust and ungenerous to hold that he has any very special responsibility, because he happened to be ill. He affirmed a general opinion, and had to hand over the details to the Government generally, his colleagues; that is the position as he states it, he sends his deputy to his colleagues, and what is the message he sends?

"And you may say to the leader of the Government, and to my colleagues, that if they think it is in the interests of the banks of the country, in the public interest, and in the interest of the commerce and trade of the country, that this assistance should be given, they have my support with reference to it."

There is his message. Well, now, would it not have been a good thing to find out from the banks what they thought about it? Would it not have been a good thing, if it was to be in the interest of the other banks, to find out whether they were lending a hand? But the Government had determined this without having acquired that knowledge. Once again he says:

"When this advance was made to the Exchange Bank, it was felt, on the part of the Government, that it would sustain the institution and carry it through and prevent a crisis, and relieve the pressure on other banks in the Dominion; for we all know how sensitive public opinion is."

Then, Sir, he goes further, and he makes a statement of a very grave character. You find him, in the passage I have just referred to, declaring that it was to prevent a crisis, to carry the institution through, and to relieve the pressure on other banks—and once again, without having consulted the other banks at all. A little lower down he says:

"But I say that when you touch one of these banks, we know how sensitive all the other banks in matters of this kind are. I think, however, that the House and the country will sustain the Government when, under such extreme circumstances, and for the purpose of preventing a run on the bank, we took this step; because we all know, by looking at the returns, that if to-day two-thirds of the banks in the Dominion were suddenly called upon to redeem their circulation, where those banks would be, and where the business of the country would be. Under these circumstances, we felt that we were perfectly justified—feeling, at the same time, that we were safe in doing so—in endeavoring to save the country from the consequences which would follow the breaking down, it might be of two, or three, or four, or five, of the banks."

Now, Sir, this is a statement, the gravity of which cannot be over-estimated. You find a statement of the Finance Minister, that the breaking down of a small bank like the Exchange Bank would have resulted in a general panic, and in the breaking down of two, or three, or four, or five, of the banks, and you find him suggesting as a practical question "that we know if, two-thirds of the banks were suddenly called on to redeem their circulation, where those banks would be." I suppose the hon. gentleman was making a mere technical statement of what the effect would be if every dollar of circulation came suddenly in on the banks; but if he was, he ought to have said so. He was not speaking, we know, with reference to banks in a fair condition, but he was making a practical statement as to the practical results. In saying what he did, he was inflicting a much greater blow upon the stability of the banking institutions of this country than the failure of the Exchange Bank could do. He was suggesting what the consequences would be of a call upon two-thirds of the banks of the country for the redemption of all their circulation, and pointing out that they would have to close their doors. That was the practical statement of the hon. gentleman. Now, Sir, if that were so—and you will find other banks adverted to throughout this discussion, by the First Minister, and by the Minister of Finance as well—if it were so that the banks were so deeply interested in this, once again I ask, why were they not taken into counsel? Why was it not ascertained what their views were upon it? Why was not some concert, such as the First Minister suggests as proper and reasonable and the essential condition, engaged in on this occasion? None such was engaged in, and $100,000 was loaned on the 12th of April. Oh! but I forgot; I ought to have placed to the credit of the hon. Minister that he secured 5 per cent. for it; he secured an extra rate of interest for it. He was so cautious that he was not going to incur risks without a reward. You do not find him loaning money to a speculative, shaky bank. Oh! no; he takes 5 per cent. as his security against risk.

He thinks: Well, I am loaning a certain sum, and there is a certain amount of risk, but I am going to make a profit out of it; why, I am going to make 1 per cent. more than I am making in the other banks, and this is my justification, or part of it. We find him taking, as a careful husbandman, some extra rate of interest, and this is an acknowledgment of the risk of the operation. We find it acknowledged on the 13th by Mr. Craig, the ex-president, when he says:

"Things are much quieter, and I think the worst is over, though we may be troubled for a few days yet."

Then, following on the 16th, they telegraphed for another $100,000, and Mr. Craig, writing the same day, says:

"I think this will be all that we shall require, because there is a perceptible falling off in the demand."

Well, $100,000 is sent on. In the meantime Mr. Ogilvie must have been up at Ottawa and must have seen the officials, because it is sent on in another way. The first $100,000 was sent through the Bank of Montreal, but we find, on the 17th, that a cheque for $100,000 was sent on the City and District Savings Bank. "Mr. Ogilvie told me" says the Deputy Minister, "that you preferred payment in this manner." They preferred to get the money through the City and District rather than through the Bank of Montreal. I suppose they did not want the Bank of Montreal to know that they were getting another $100,000 from the Government, but for some reason or other, instead of there being concerted action, co-operation, on the part of these other banks so deeply interested, and whose stability was being sustained by the Administration, there appears to have been a desire to conceal the transaction that was going on, by taking the second $100,000 through another bank. Well then, Mr. Craig says, on the 19th:

"The demand has about ceased. I do not think I shall require any more. If anything turns up I shall let you know."

It was not very long before something turned up. That was on the 18th, and on the 21st he wrote again:

"I find I shall require another sum of $100,000 to place me in an independent position."

Well, now, what was to be done? The hon. gentleman had given him $200,000 about the middle of the month. Mr. Craig says:

"I have paid $356,000 in deposits since the first of the month, and have notices of withdrawal of $60,000 more, besides a reduction in circulation of $45,000."

There you get $461,000 paid, or immediately payable, as against the first $200,000. The position is worse by $260,000. Now, where has the money gone? We find here some of the concert, of the action, of the understanding, of the feeling, of the larger banks. "Most of the money has gone into the Bank of Montreal—at least, two-thirds of it," says Mr. Craig. So the Bank of Montreal was receiving the money that the Government was paying in. The amounts were going out, and instead of the Bank of Montreal assisting to strengthen this institution—and I am not blaming the Bank of Montreal, because they had no understanding with the Government; the Government did not talk with them, and the Exchange Bank did not talk with them, I suppose—but the Government was paying money which was passing into the hands of their own bankers, the Bank of Montreal. Mr. Craig goes on to say:

"The drain on ordinary deposits has stopped, but I must meet the deposits of which I have received notice; therefore, I shall have to trespass on your kindness once more. The knowledge that the Government were assisting me as had a wonderful effect in quieting matters. I am reducing, as fast as I can, but when you have been so good—

He always was a good man—

"but when you have been so good, I do not want to force my customers into a corner, but all who can pay I am collecting from. I take the liberty of sending you in advance the third deposit receipt."

Now, there you see, Sir, what with the knowledge that the Government were assisting him had done for the gentleman. It "had a wonderful effect in quieting things." However, the Government declined this demand for the other hundred thousand, the demand made on the 21st. And then it would seem that about the 10th or 11th of May, Mr. Buntin and Mr. Ogilvie came up to Ottawa, and the account of that is found in the First Minister's speech:

"Its representative came to myself personally—Senator Ogilvie, who was a director of the bank—and Mr. Buntin, I think, came with him. They said they knew all about the bank, because they were directors—I am sorry to say they did not know all about it, and I mention this as evidencing that they thought they knew all about it—and they were prepared to give their personal security for $100,000, over and above the security we had under the position we would occupy as having a claim on all assets under the double liability, which amount they said would carry the bank successfully through. Those gentlemen spoke in the most confident terms respecting the bank, and offered, as I have said, to give their personal security for $100,000."

That was the statement. They over-persuaded the hon. gentleman. The Government had refused, on 21st April; matters had gone on from that date to 10th or 11th May. Then his friends, Mr. Ogilvie and Mr. Buntin, came up and over-persuaded him. There was no further enquiry, no further ascertaining as to how the other banks were assisting, no question as to concerted action, nothing about that; but the statement of Mr. Ogilvie and Mr. Buntin was accepted, and the loan was made. Was it made with the offered security? Mr. Ogilvie and Mr. Buntin both offered security, but the Finance Minister took Mr. Ogilvie alone and let Mr. Buntin go. No explanation has been given up to this time. I have heard rumors as to what the reason was, but I will not state them. It is the business of the hon. gentleman to inform us how it was that when he had the offer of those two gentlemen of means to give security, he took the security of only one; how it was that he accepted half the security for which security went. I will not relate the story I heard, but it is for the hon. gentleman to make the explanation. The hon. gentleman said this was not a political bank and this was not a political transaction, and he fortified himself by referring to advances which had been made to the Ontario Bank and to the Consolidated Bank. And he declared that the Ontario Bank was a political bank. I deny the statement. The Ontario Bank was not then, and never has been, a political bank. It never was a political bank, and at the period to which the hon. gentleman refers, even the gentleman to whom he alluded obviously by other references, inaccurate as they were, as being the reason why the bank was political, had ceased to be its president, and its president was Sir William P. Howland. Among its directors was no less a political friend of hon. gentlemen opposite than Col. Gzowski, a personal friend of all who know him, and a well-known and consistent Conservative, and a supporter and personal friend of the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government. And yet the hon. gentleman said, in his closing remarks, that the Ontario Bank was a political bank, a Grit political bank, and he showed his liberality and broad feeling by saying it was a Grit political bank in which Col. Gzowski, a Conservative, was a director, and in which other Conservatives were directors, and in which as many shareholders were Conservatives as Reformers. If you talk about political banks, I ask what is the complexion of a bank in which Mr. Gault, the present member for Montreal West, was president, and of which at the time Mr. Bulmer, Mr. Greene, Mr. Ogilvie, Mr. Craig and Mr. Buntin, all of Montreal, formed the directors? We know their politics; we know they are all supporters of the Government. They were not merely the directors, the moving power of the bank, but they also held one-half or more than one-half of the whole capital stock. So if you want an instance of a political bank, give me the Exchange Bank; and if you want to show me what the consequences of a bank being a political bank are, read me the history of the Exchange Bank. The hon. gentleman can strike no heavier blow at the banking institutions of the country than to declare they are political banks. It is upon no such principle that those institutions can be safely conducted. I deny the statement, so far as I know, as regards any one of our existing institutions. Well, then, the hon. gentleman says, What did you do? You made loans to the same amount: $300,000 to the Ontario Bank and $300,000 to the Consolidated Bank, and he contrasts those $300,000 loans with the $300,000 loan to the Exchange Bank. What was the capital of the Ontario Bank? $3,000,000. What was the capital of the Consolidated bank? $2,000,000. A loan of $300,000 would be one tenth of the capital of the Ontario Bank, and one-tenth of the capital of the Consolidated. It would leave, in the case of the Ontario Bank, $2,700,000 of capital, apart altogether from the double liability. If you were to loan in the same proportion to the Ontario Bank, as you loaned to the Exchange Bank, as regards capital, you would loan the former $1,800,000. If you were to loan in the same proportion to the Consolidated the amount would reach $1,200,000. And yet the hon. gentleman talks of those comparatively small loans, having regard to the capital of those institutions in question, as bearing a comparison with an advance of three-fifths of the capital of a bank, which was the case when a loan of $300,000 was made to a bank with a capital of $500,000. The same proportion as was loaned to the Consolidated and the Ontario Banks would have given $50,000 or $70,000 in the case of the Exchange Bank; but, instead of the Finance Minister loaning it $50,000 or $70,000, he loaned it $300,000, or four times as much as the larger of those two sums. As to the general position of the banks in April, as compared with September, I find by the bank returns there were, in April, $33,000,000 notes in circulation, and total liabilities, $146,000,000; September, $34,000,000 notes in circulation, total liabilities, $156,000,000. But I do not consider that is of very much consequence. Why? Because I do not consider the hon. gentleman intended that the bank should fail in September. I do not understand the hon. gentleman's defence to be, that this was a bank which he knew was about to go down, and that by making advances he would be able to keep it afloat until some day when its failure would do less harm; and, therefore, it was not, I take it, with reference to such a contingency that the hon. gentleman acted. He was acting not to postpone an inevitable fall, but to prevent a fall which he thought could be avoided and the bank brought through. Now what happened? The president tells us. He says that the knowledge that the Government was assisting us had a wonderful effect. The public were made quiet. The demands on deposits ceased to a large extent; stock changed hands; depositors let their money remain in the bank, and some put their money in the bank; the shareholders changed. The double liability of many shareholders at that time, including the double liability of the member for Montreal West, for the shares which he had sold as the late president—his double liability, which continued for a period of three months from the time of the transfer, was wiped out by the bank being carried on, and somebody else—Mr. Craig, who ran away and is an absconding criminal, was the party whose double liability was secured to the public and the Government in lieu of that of the hon. member for Montreal West. Why did the knowledge that the Government was assisting the bank do good, as the president says it did? Why did it do that which the Finance Minister says he thought it would do? It inspired confidence. Why? It inspired confidence because the people said it cannot be that the Government of the country, having the funds of the country in its hands and authorised and instructed to deposit them safely in banks and keep them for the people, would deposit their funds in a breaking bank. But if they have done so we may well feel confidence. They would not risk the public moneys; they would not risk our moneys, and knowing that they put it in there, they hung out a flag to us; they said: there is no risk for you; and that is the reason that public confidence was restored to a certain extent, and that to a certain extent the drain ceased and the bank was kept along. But they were deceived. The people were deceived by the action of the Government. The bank was then an absolutely broken bank, and if any reasonable enquiry had been then made it would have been found by the Administration to have been an absolutely broken bank. It was obviously and palpably a broken bank. A change did take place in these few months, but it was a change for the worse. The condition of the bank got worse day by day, week by week, month by month. Very soon the Government itself became alarmed; they called for the money; they took $50,000; they called for another $50,000; they had piteous requests for delays; they agreed to take it by $5,000 at a time, and then by $10,000 every three days, and then a portion of that for which they called was overtaken by the common ruin of the 17th of September. Then we hear that those interested in these concerns were surprised. It is not so. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) acknowledged that in banking circles there was distrust of that bank at this time. The general public, he said, had some degree of confidence. Quite so, because the general public did not know much about it. But it was not from the general public that the Government were to take counsel; it was not the knowledge of the general public that they were to use; it was not that degree of knowledge which was derivable from bank returns, though these, if properly looked at, might have given an indication of unhealthy expansion. It was the other institutions, who knew the mode in which this bank was conducting business, who could have given information to the Government. What was said on the 18th of September by the Montreal correspondent of the Toronto Mail, with reference to the Exchange Bank. I will read this for two purposes—to show the opinion of the banking community, and to show what was the consequence of the failure of the bank:

"It is a gratifying feature of the soundness of trade and commerce in this great city to report that the failure of one of our banks, doing an extensive business, has passed over without the least excitement, or the bringing down of a single firm that was leaning upon it for support, as many have been doing. It would not have surprised certain croakers if many disasters had occurred under the circumstances. Although many of the clients of the defunct institution must suffer inconvenience, yet every consideration is being extended by the other banks to those who are so suddenly deprived of the accommodation they were receiving. It is a fact that public confidence in our financial institutions has not been weakened in the least, but rather strengthened, by the collapse of the doomed bank."

Now, why? Why had public confidence in our other institutions not been weakened in the least, but rather strengthened, by the failure of the doomed bank? Here it is:

"In banking circles the air has been purified by the suspension, for the unfortunate institution has been considered by leading bankers an evil in their midst."

There is what the leading bankers, in concert with whom the hon. gentleman was acting, thought about it. Leading bankers thought it an evil in their midst, and their banks were strengthened by its going down:

"This has been sufficiently demonstrated by the high rate of interest which it is proved the bank has been giving to depositors, who took their money out of other banks, where they had ample security, to place it where the absolute needs of the infirm concern had made its management promise a much larger rate. I am informed by the president of a local bank that a capitalist who had $30,000 deposited at 4½ per cent. was induced, shortly before the failure, to remove it to the Exchange to get 6 per cent. Had the management been taking the conservative course of reducing loans whilst temporarily paying a high rate of interest, their policy might have been justified; but, on the contrary, the inflation was going on as brisk as ever. This kind of business could only have one result, and intelligent brokers anticipated what was inevitable, and took advantage of the opening to make little fortunes at a stroke by selling short."

This is from the Toronto Mail. I read it, because I like to convict my adversary out of his own mouth. But I quote from another organ; I read from the Montreal Gazette—its leading editorial article of the 18th of September:

"The announcement of the suspension of the Exchange Bank created not the slightest distrust or uneasiness in business circles yesterday."

Collapse! Panic! Ruin! Distress!

"The cause of this suspension was so manifest from the statement of the affairs of the institution—too extended a business for the cash reserve carried—and so remote from any disturbance in the general condition of trade, that an entire absence of alarm was shown from the first inception of the news."

There you see, Sir, what even a newspaper knew about it. They saw, from the sources of information open to the ordinary public, from the general state of affairs, that there was, as my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) said, too extended a business for the cash reserve carried. Then the article goes on to say—though I am afraid he is not very accurate, judged by the result:

"Then the standing of the directors, their large interests in the concern, and the great surplus of assets held, at once relieved the anxiety of note holders and depositors, who will, at the most, suffer only a little inconvenience, or a loss of interest, if they prefer to cash their claims at once. No mercantile embarrassment has occurred from the suspension, and none of consequence is anticipated, as customers enjoying credit will easily be able to transfer their accounts. It may be added, that notes falling due in the bank yesterday were very promptly met."

Now it will be interesting to know—what the Government did not choose to find out, when making the loans, and in the course of their action in concert with leading bankers—what the leading bankers thought, and this convenient article goes on to tell us:

"As showing how unconcernedly the news of the suspension has been received, and how unconnected it is with the condition of the trade of the country, we quote the following opinions of eminent bankers:—

"Mr. Smithers, general manager of the Bank of Montreal, in answer to questions stated: 'I do not regard the suspension of the Exchange Bank as in any case or way an indication of general weakness in trade or commerce. It is not likely to cause much trouble. I have been looked for, and has, to a great extent, been prepared for, or in other words, its effects have been discounted.'"

At whose expense?

"Mr. Penfold, manager of the Montreal branch of the Bank of British North America, stated that the suspension was no indication whatever of any general weakness of trade. The Exchange Bank stood absolutely alone with regard to its position and its business. It is not likely to cause any general trouble."

"Mr. J. Wolferstan Thomas, Manager of the Molson's Bank, stated: 'that the suspension was not the slightest indication of any general weakness in trade. It was not likely to cause trouble. No people who had good assets to show will have any trouble to get all the accommodation they require.'"

The article goes on:

"The stock market was quite firm yesterday, indicating that the suspension was not regarded as any index of the real state of trade, and that no difficulties are expected to arise out of it."

Now, Sir, I dare say the hon. gentleman will take credit for all that—will claim that he did it all with his little $300,000. Not at all, Sir. What he did was to make the position very much worse, for everybody, than it was in the month of April. In the meantime the banks had, to some extent, intervened on business principles. The Exchange Bank had offered them the cream of its notes. They had taken the cream of its gilt-edged notes secured by bonds—taken them secured by the collaterals of four or five of the directors. They made themselves perfectly safe, as far as they were concerned, and of course they did not improve the condition of the bank, which was literally stripped of everything worth having before its doors were closed; and these operations were assisted and forwarded by the action of the Government. Now, Sir, I fully expect that we shall not hear from the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) only on this occasion. I suggest to the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) that this is a fit occasion for him to speak. It won't do for the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe to stand up as the sole defender of the Government on this occasion, and I am afraid it will interfere with the chances of the hon. member for Cardwell if he does not also step into the breach. Representing as he does an Upper Canada constituency, residing as he does in the city of Montreal, having as he has a distant connection with the eminent journal to which I have referred, and having certain expectations, as we know he has, I have no doubt we shall hear from him, and in the way a Conservative ought to speak under these circumstances, a thorough defence of this transaction as one not merely to be excused, but as an additional instance of the common sense, the prudence, the good management, and the active administrative powers of this Government. Then the Government goes on and sets up a preferential claim. The hon. Minister of Finance did not appear to think of that at the time; it was apparently an afterthought. I cannot conceive myself that when the Government decided to make this loan, they thought at that time that they would make a preferential claim on the assets of the bank, because I think it would have been an act of positive wickedness to have lent the $300,000, even with the little they knew of the persons in control of the bank, for the purpose for which they lent it, if they knew that they were the first mortgagees of the assets remaining after the circulation. It would be pretended to the public that the Government was taking an equal risk with the other depositors, while, in fact, the Government was only helping the bank to pay some of the depositors, and taking first mortgage on the balance of its assets. That would be a most unjust position to which to reduce the other creditors of the bank. What is the whole theory of the bankrupt law? It is that there should be an equal distribution of assets amongst the creditors; and if, without communicating with the public, you advance a sum of money for which you take a mortgage upon the assets, you are assisting that some creditors should be preferred, to the wrong and loss of others; and therefore I cannot conceive that at the time the Government were making this advance they thought they were going to establish a preferential claim, and were, in fact, assisting this bank to pay its favored creditors to the damage of other creditors. An hon. gentleman says they ought to have sued Mr. Ogilvie, and the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) tells us that they could not sue him until they had discussed the assets. That may be the Quebec law, with reference to the security of a guarantee, but it is not the law of Ontario; and if I rightly understand the law the rule would be the same. It would depend on the form of the instrument; and this is not a liability that would be after discussion; it is a liability of default; and if the law of Quebec be the same as that of Ontario on this subject, Mr. Ogilvie was sueable the moment the liability was made on the payment of this deposit. The hon. Minister of Finance evidently expected from my hon. friend from South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) a different speech from that which he made. He evidently expected that he would be very violently attacked, and he had prepared the panoply of indignant virtue and retort and counter accusation, and even his jokes, for the occasion, and they came out one after the other. He even insinuated against my hon. friend, that he could not take his degree. Well, my hon. friend was a student at Trinity College, Dublin, where he passed eleven examinations, and his name is to be found in the honor list in every one of those examinations. Being born in this country, he came out, not having time to remain for his degree examinations. As to the old story about the calves, which we have read so often that we cannot laugh at it any more, but which the hon. gentleman appears to have dug out for the first time from the south of England, I did not see its application to the present occasion. My hon. friend may have his faults, but no one, even his bitterest enemy, will say that that story was extremely à propos. With reference to the hon. gentleman's remarks about some former attacks of my hon. friend upon him, all I can say is, that I have nothing to say about the hon. gentleman's knowledge of the three R's, except one, and that is the last, arithmetic, and I do not think he is a great success in arithmetic. Now, Sir, I say, as this resolution says, that this transaction is a subject of regret. I say that no man in this House or out of it can affirm in his heart and conscience that it is anything but a regrettable transaction. You know it, but you won't say so; the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) has given the cue; and you will say not guilty. You won't say as the famous jury did, not guilty, but don't do it again. No; you will say not guilty here, but you will whisper into the ear of the Minister of Finance, don't do it again; it will be whispered only. But here, so far from agreeing with the facts, so far from agreeing to that qualified verdict, not guilty, but don't do it again, you will do as the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe did, say: "Well done, good and faithful servants, you have been faithful over a few things, be ye masters over many things, enter ye into the joy of your Lord."

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). We are having, to-night, a very remarkable illustration of that kind of wisdom which comes after the event, and which is generally, according to the proverb, considered a very cheap commodity. The hon. gentlemen who have addressed us, from the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) down or up, as they may prefer to the hon. leader of the Opposition, have taken the ground that, because of certain circumstances which have since occurred in relation to the management of this bank, the loan made to the bank at a time when it was in difficulties ought to be condemned; and they have laid down this general proposition, that any act of a man's life which he may, upon reflection, or because of the results which have flowed from it, regret having been committed, must, by the fact of that regret, be open to censure. Now, Sir, it seems to me that that is a proposition which the hon. leader of the Opposition himself would hardly like to have applied to his own life and conduct. We know him to be a gentleman of very high personal character. We know him to stand, in his own estimation and that of his friends, upon a pedestal far above that upon which ordinary mortals are permitted to stand. We know that, reading the commentaries as to his position in this country, with which we are favored by the press and by hon. gentlemen opposite, when, with bated breath, they venture to refer to him at all, he is one of those favored gentlemen who never make a mistake; that he is one who never in all his lifetime committed anything which subsequently he could in any way regret; and, that therefore, the ordinary rule which applies to ordinary mortals, that an act performed in perfect good faith and at a time when, as everyone believes, it is not only not censurable but commendable—I am laying down a general proposition—does not apply in his case; and that, therefore, should the result turn out to be not precisely what was expected, it is to be condemned, and the person who committed it is to be censured. I do not think, in this particular case, we can take into account, as circumstances which ought to have been known to the Finance Minister, which he had the opportunity of knowing, when he made those advances, the events and circumstances which have since been made known in connection with the management of this bank; and I propose, before I get through with the very few words I intend to address to the House, to establish this to the satisfaction of this hon. House. There are two propositions laid down in the resolution. The first is, that an advance made to a bank in difficulty is censurable; and the next is, that where a bank has applied to have its capital reduced, that alone ought to put the Government on its guard, and no further consideration or loan should be given it. These are the two propositions affirmed in the resolution. Now, the hon. gentleman, the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Blake), made reference to an antecedent case, one that occurred in this country immediately after Confederation, when an hon. gentleman, who occupied at that time the position of Finance Minister, and whom the leader of the Opposition described as very much more able than the present Finance Minister, retired from the Government on a question arising out of a proposed loan to a bank. It is worth while looking for a moment at the statement made by that hon. gentleman, when he made his explanation on the floor of Parliament; and I think this House will agree with me, that whoever is entitled to bring in this motion of censure, it is certainly not the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright). What do I find, according to the statement of Sir Alexander Galt, who gives the history of that whole transaction? He says:

"The first intimation which I received in reference to the Commercial Bank being in danger was from my hon. friend (Mr. Holton). I was at the time on a visit on public business to the Treasurer of Quebec."

And I am bound to say that when I heard the son of that hon. gentleman (Mr. Holton), the gentleman who succeeded him in the representation of Chateauguay, a gentleman for whom, personally, I have the very highest respect and whom I am very glad to number as a personal friend—when I heard him laying down the doctrine that no loan should be given to a bank which is in difficulties, I was reminded of the fact that the very first suggestion that came to the Government in 1867, in relation to the Commercial Bank, came from the honored father of that hon. gentleman, who went to the then Finance Minister and urged him strongly to advance to that bank a loan from the Government, in order to save it from difficulty. Sir Alexander Galt went on to say:—

"On my return to Sherbrooke, I found a telegram from Mr. Holton, informing me he desired particularly to see me on public business, and wished to know where he might do so."

I wish to call your attention, Sir, to the fact that Mr. Holton was at that time a director of the bank; that he stood, in relation to the Commercial Bank, in precisely the same position as that in which Mr. Greene stood to the Exchange Bank, and when he came to the Finance Minister of that day he came in precisely the same character and on precisely the same mission as did Mr. Greene to the present Finance Minister in this city a short time ago; and when one reflects upon the language which the leader of the Opposition ventured to use with reference to Mr. Greene's visit, when he suggested that the Finance Minister should have said to Mr. Green: Sir, you are a personally interested party; I will have nothing whatever to do with you; your visit to me is practically an impertinence,—

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. WHITE—go about your business, and I will enquire into this matter. When one remembers that language applied to Mr. Greene, and then remembers that Mr. Holton stood in relation to the Commercial Bank in precisely the same position and came with the language I am about to read to the then Finance Minister, and came, I venture to say, if it had been the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake's) case, with the entire approbation of the hon. member for West Durham, one has an opportunity of knowing the difference it makes on which side of the House an hon. gentleman happens to be seated:

"I replied, I wished him to come to Sherbrooke, which he did by the first train. He then informed me that the business on which he desired to see me related to the Commercial Bank, which, owing to the partial but continuous and continual withdrawal of deposits, was, in the opinion of the directors, getting into a position of serious danger—and that he was desirous of submitting the case to me, that I might, if I thought proper, bring the matter before the Government, and obtain a deposit of public moneys, in order to give the bank an additional reserve as a security for their meeting their engagement."

That was the proposition made by the late Mr. Holton, when the Commercial Bank was in difficulties. His first thought was to obtain from the Government an advance in order to strengthen the reserves of the bank and enable it to avoid the difficulties. This statement goes on to point out that Sir Alexander Galt suggested some difficulties in the way, but he proceeds to say:

"However, at the desire of the directors of the bank, and particularly of its president, Mr. Cartwright—

Who, for the purposes of this discussion, I may assume to have some relation, at anyrate, to the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright)—

"I consented to accompany them to Kingston, for the purpose of myself submitting the case to Sir John A. Macdonald, ascertaining whether his views would differ in any material respect from those which had been expressed by Mr. Cartier and myself."

Then we have the statement of what occurred, and then we have this further statement:

"I then went down from Montreal, accompanied by Mr. Cartwright, the president of the Commercial Bank, and the other gentlemen who were then acting on behalf of that institution. I saw Mr. Angus, the manager of the Bank of Montreal—Mr. King being then in England—and expressed to him the hope and desire of the Government that that bank would, so far as was consistent with its own safety, and on the deposit of satisfactory securities, extend such assistance to the Commercial Bank as would meet the exigencies of the case."

I think I hear hon. gentlemen opposite saying that is precisely what we have been urging the Government should have done in this case—that it should have gone to the banks. Let us see a little further what happened. Mr. King at first showed a disposition to grant this assistance on the part of the other banks, he having come back from England, where he was. Sir Alexander Galt says:

"I would prefer postponing any decision as to the course I would recommend the Government to take, until the following day; I wished to have their sanction to communicate to Mr. King the information which had been conveyed by them to me, and they agreed to this."

They went on to consider, and this is a point of some little importance:

"We considered, moreover, the effect which would probably be produced on the country if the failure of the Commercial Bank became a fact. We looked into the condition, so far as the published statements enabled us to do so, of all the various banks of the country, compared it with what it had been at previous periods, and considered what effect, according to the best of our judgment, the failure of the Commercial Bank, coming unexpectedly on the country, would have. The conclusion which Mr. King and I arrived at was, that it might be fraught with very serious disasters indeed."

Then he goes on still further:

"After, as I have said, several hours of very serious consideration on these points, I came to the conclusion, and it was acquiesced in by Mr. King, that the best course to take under the circumstances was this: that the Government should take the responsibility of coming to the assistance of the bank, and that it would be well for me to submit the case to the Government, with a recommendation to give assistance to the amount of half a million of dollars."

Now, there was a recommendation that the Government should come to the assistance of this institution; but some members of the Cabinet still thought that the bank should assist, and we find a letter, and a rather remarkable letter, from Mr. King, showing, finally, the reason why the bank would not assist, and showing also the kind of management under which that bank labored at that time, and from which it failed, and, I think I may say, the responsibility in connection with that management rests largely on the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And of the hon. member for Carleton (Sir John A. Macdonald) another director.

Mr. WHITE. The hon. member for Carleton was a member of the Government at the time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And a brother director and solicitor of that bank.

Mr. WHITE. He was a member of the Government at the time, with a great deal to attend to in connection with public matters; and, if he erred at all, it was probably in placing too much confidence in the gentleman who was the president of the bank. Now, what said Mr. King?

"I believe that the difficulty of the bank has been rendered more imminent by an unwise expansion of its discounts within the last few weeks, upon the unsatisfactory plea of rendering assistance to others when its own life was in danger."

So, according to Mr. King's statement, after agreeing that practically some assistance might be given to this bank, we find him writing a letter to the Finance Minister, withdrawing all offer of assistance, on the ground that, after the bank was in difficulties, at the very moment the president was travelling about with the Finance Minister, for the purpose of getting assistance for it, its manager was playing ducks and drakes with the interest of the bank, by extending loans right and left for the purpose of saving other institutions while its own life was in danger:

"I think it extremely improbable," said Mr. King, "that the bank can obtain assistance from any other quarter than the Government, as I should most strongly advise my directors not to increase the amount this bank has already advanced to the Commercial Bank, with the knowledge of the Government, for the reason that I believe all assistance will be in vain if there is not a peremptory contraction of their loans."

Well, did the hon. member for South Huron, the Mr. Cartwright who was the president of that bank, say: Since the banks will not assist us, since Mr. King declares that any assistance will be helpless and hopeless to relieve us, let us close our doors? Not a bit of it. He still travelled about with the Finance Minister; he still, in the face of that letter, stating that the bank would not assist the Commercial Bank, urged upon the Government of the day to advance this half million of dollars to relieve that bank from difficulty, and so to prevent, probably, a commercial disaster in the country. I am bound to say, in the face of that record of the hon. gentleman, in connection with that bank of which he was president, and for whose failure I fear he was as much responsible, to say the least, as any other gentleman connected with it, that it hardly lies with him to move the resolution of censure which has been moved tonight. So much for that precedent. Then, as to the other proposition laid down in this resolution, what is it? It is that, where a bank has reduced its capital, where a bank had come to Parliament and got its capital reduced, the fact of that reduction should prevent the Government from coming to its assistance; or, in other words, that, when once a bank reduces its capital it is practically no longer worthy of public confidence. That is substantially the proposition we are asked to affirm by the resolution now submitted to this House. What do I find? The Merchants Bank, the successor to the Commercial Bank, got its capital reduced, the Act reducing it being assented to on the 16th April, 1878. The hon. gentleman was Finance Minister at that time. What did he do? I find that, in July 1877, the public deposits in that bank were $55,843; I find that, in January, 1878, they were $83,134, and I find that, in May, 1878, immediately after the reduction of the capital of the bank, he had increased the public deposits in that bank, which practically amounted to a loan to the bank, to the amount of $216,497. I only give two illustrations, but I venture to say that we might go through every bank and find that the same thing practically occurred in every case. We had a statement the other day from the manager of the Federal Bank, that already the Government of that day have had sufficient confidence in the future of that bank to renew their relations with it and to make deposits in it. If that be the case, we ought to have these gentlemen moving a resolution to condemn the Government for putting money in a bank which is at this moment before Parliament for an Act to reduce its capital. I venture to say that they will do nothing of the kind. I take the Ontario Bank, whose Bill was assented to on the 17th May, 1882. I find that, in February of that year, after the notice had been given for the reduction of capital, the Ontario Government, whose careful management I presume hon. gentlemen opposite will not venture to impugn, had on call in that bank $94,794.28, and on deposit to be drawn after notice $300,000. I shall not read all the figures, but so these deposits continued in that bank, as an assistance to that bank undoubtedly, as Government deposits by the Government of Ontario, in spite of the fact that the bank was applying for that it obtained, and after it obtained the reduction of its capital. The hon. member for West Durham tells us that the Ontario Bank never was a political bank, that he never knew it to be a political bank. Well, that is rather a remarkable thing. I have here a letter from the president of that bank, which undoubtedly has some influence in the particular district where he was. It was dated Bowmanville, 17th January, 1874, rather a remarkable time, for, if I remember rightly, the elections took place on the 20th of that same month. I speak from memory.

An hon. MEMBER. The 30th.

Mr. WHITE. Yes, the 30th of that same month. Here is the circular letter :

"DEAR SIR,—Although I am not disposed to oppose Mr. Gibbs on personal grounds, in the approaching election, still, as one who has labored long and hard to promote the interest of Canada, I now ask my friends to support men who will support the present Government, for the following reasons:—

"Because many of the men forming the present Government are my personal and esteemed friends."

That is a very good reason, though it is not a banking reason :

"Because, if the present Government is sustained, I will be able through them to get justice for our party in needful appointments and otherwise."

In view of the fact that every gentleman who either recommends the exercise of patronage or is the object of patronage himself, is charged with being corrupt, it is rather remarkable that the president of this bank should have made the fact of getting needful appointments and patronage one of the reasons why the customers of the bank should support the opponents of Mr. Gibb. But here is a stronger point still :

"Because, if they are sustaining our bank, and other Ontario banks, and through them the country will have the use of the Government surplus until required."

And then follows:—

"May I ask you to give my old friend, Mr. Cameron, your candid and honest support?"

This is written by the president of the bank which the hon. leader of the Opposition declares had never been a political bank. His guilelessness in reference to everything of this kind causes him not to know that Mr. Simpson had ever been a political friend. I find that Mr. Simpson was not wrong in his anticipation of what would happen, and that the bank returns, as they came down afterwards, showed a steady increase of deposits, not simply from the Government here, but from the Ontario Government as well—deposits on call, not on interest at all, showing that he did not at all misunderstand the character of his friends for whom he was acting, in the issue of that circulation, when he told them that his bank and other banks—although the other banks did not fare so well—that his bank would get the advantage. Now, Sir, that is not the only case. I find here another circular that was issued—a more important one, in some respects, because, important as the president of a bank is, and especially such a president as was our good old friend, Mr. Simpson, one who understood the knack of mesmerising in batches, and who explained it to the court on a memorable occasion—the manager of a bank, the gentleman who comes into direct contact with the customers of a bank, may be said to be even a more influential person. And what do we find? Here is a circular letter, dated from Oshawa, in January, 1874, to this effect :

"MY DEAR SIR,—We are very largely interested in the success of the present Government, as their continuance in power will add largely to the success and prosperity of the bank—

Not of the country, but of the bank, in this case. The president was a cunning old fox, who understood how to throw in a word or two about the country and all that kind of thing, but the manager knew exactly what he was required to do, and therefore he put the matter in plain English :

"And, through them, of the business people of the community. Our president, the Hon. John Simpson, is calling upon our friends to give us a hand for Mr. Cameron."

Signed by Mr. Holland, who was at that time manager of the Ontario Bank, and that was the bank that the hon. member for West Durham says he does not believe ever was a political bank—in fact, he knows it was not. He says that he never read these particular letters; of course the hon. member's reading is of an entirely different class. Now, Sir, as to this matter, I have shown that as far as precedents are concerned, at any rate, the hon. gentleman, to use a common phrase, has not a leg to stand upon in the motion which he has proposed, and the only question which arises, and the only question with which we have to do, practically, here, is this: had the Government reasonable ground to believe, when they made this advance, or gave this deposit, that the effect would be to enable the bank to tide over its difficulties, and to enable it to hold its own, and in that way, to avoid the difficulties which might occur in the event of a suspension of a bank at that time? The hon. gentleman, the leader of the Opposition, has spoken of the small effect of the failure of this bank, at the time it did fail, and he has done me the honor to make special references to myself, as having a remote connection with a particular newspaper from which he read a remarkably good article. Now, I want to point out to the hon. gentleman, that the condition of the bank, and the condition of trade in relation to it, in the month of April, was a very different thing to the conditions in the month of September. There is no doubt whatever that in the month of September those conditions had so far changed that the bank failed without any serious effect upon the commerce of the country, or upon other institutions. But what was the position in April of that year, at the time the directors came up to Ottawa? The hon. gentleman is good enough in this, as in all other discussions, to drag in the National Policy. He is good enough to tell us that we had promised prosperity and well-being to this country, and that there could be no depression, no difficulty, and no necessity for aiding the bank. But we know that at that time we were passing through a period—not of legitimate commercial depression, owing to difficulties arising from legitimate commercial operations—but we were passing through difficulties arising from the insane spirit of speculation, as it looks now, and as it looked to level-headed people then—although I am bound to say there were some people who were not level-headed at that time, in relation to particular transactions—but there was a widespread spirit of speculative transactions, especially in connection with our great North-West; and the failure of the boom, as it was called, in the North-West, made men feel that they might be on the verge of a serious crisis that would result disastrously to the welfare of this country. This was the condition of things at that particular period. It was then, Mr. Speaker, that the failure of even a small bank like the Exchange Bank, taking place in the presence of the failure of that boom in the North-West, when men who had gone in there expecting to be millionaires came out practically paupers—it was at that time that this application was made, and that the Government had to face this difficulty. To say that five months afterwards, when men had come to feel that, after all, this difficulty was not going seriously to affect the welfare of the country, when, as Mr. Smithers fairly pointed out, the effect even of a bank failure had been discounted, and the difficulty would not be so great as it might have been, coming in the midst of this practical crisis—to say that at that time the effect of a failure of a bank was not disastrous, is a proof that it would not have been disastrous at the earlier period, is simply to ignore the condition of things at the two periods respectively. Now, Sir, what was the position of the bank? The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) told us that their reserves were almost exhausted. He says that if anybody had looked at the position of the bank, and seen how little gold and Dominion notes they had in reserve, and compared that with the liabilities which they might at once be called upon to meet, they would have said the bank was not in a safe condition at all, but in a condition of hopeless bankruptcy at that time. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman knows this, that the specie reserve and Dominion notes of no bank in Canada would enable it, at a moment's notice, to meet the calls to which it is liable at any time. The strongest institutions in the country are enabled to meet their liabilities from their reserves, or from their Dominion notes, although they are happily abundantly able to meet them from their loans as they come in. But in this case, it was because the reserves were small, it was because their reserves were being exhausted, that they came to the Government, that they wanted assistance to tide them over their difficulties, until they could collect the money that was owing to them, and in that way meet all the obligations that they had incurred; it was precisely because their reserves were getting exhausted that it was necessary for the bank to come here. Had its resources been stronger, had there been sufficient gold and notes in the vaults of the bank to enable them to do what the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) thinks they ought to have been able to do, that is, to meet all their liabilities the moment those liabilities were called for, and in the event of those liabilities being called for suddenly, why, Sir, there would then be no necessity for their coming here at all. But what was the position? When I tell you that after the fall of the bank, that after the doors were closed, at a meeting of creditors, a statement was submitted by Mr. Campbell, of whose ability there is no doubt, who stands so high that at this moment, while there have been discussions in Montreal amongst the creditors in relation to the other liquidators, all concur in leaving him there as a liquidator—a statement was submitted, I say, by Mr. Campbell to those creditors, declaring, on an examination, a tolerably careful examination, so far as he could make it, within the two or three weeks he was there, that there were still sufficient assets to meet the claim of every creditor, you will agree with me that no examination of the books such as could be made at the time by an officer of the Government would likely have shown the condition of things which was afterwards developed. The unfortunate fact was simply this: the bank was undoubtedly badly managed. The unfortunate fact was, that the system of book-keeping was such that many of the bad debts and losses, which have since been shown, have only been discovered in books apparently hidden away, which even so skilful a banker as Mr. Campbell was unable to see. And so the consequence was, that he was in a position to come down to the meeting of creditors and declare, after the bank had closed its doors and when he had made that examination for the special information of the creditors, that the bank was solvent at that time and was able to pay all the claims of its creditors. What was the further fact? The directors have been referred to here almost as if they were a band of robbers, as if they were men who came here to plunder the country. They, unfortunately, are the heaviest losers. They held, as the leader of the Opposition has told us, more than one-half of the entire capital of the bank. Certainly one would say that that was a ground for security rather than a ground for doubt, as to the management of a bank. And what is the further fact? That so shrewd a business man as Mr. Buntin—and those who are acquainted with him know him to be a shrewd business man; he was a director of the bank, and presumably knew how things were going on—on learning, on his return from England, that a loan had been obtained from the City and District Savings Bank to the amount of $250,000 on the collateral security, if one may use the term, of the directors themselves, he had such confidence in the soundness of the bank and of its ability to pay all its debts, and to pay its stockholders as well, that he actually proposed, though not obliged to do so, to become a party to that loan. So we have this extraordinary fact in relation to this matter, that the directors of the bank who were there, who possessed a daily knowledge of what was going on, were so thoroughly convinced of the soundness of the bank and that its difficulties were merely temporary, the result, simply, of a bear movement on 'Change, that they were ready to risk their own individual fortunes in connection with that institution. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has told us that this bank had failed before and had closed its doors, and he told us that it had taken, as manager, a gentleman who knew nothing of banking, who had had no banking experience, and who never should have been in that position. I can appeal to the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), that the directors of the bank, previous to that first failure, included in their number some gentlemen, who certainly were not Conservatives, and who were eminent and leading business men in Montreal. One was Mr. James Crathern, one of the shrewdest business men of the city, and another was Mr. Thomas Caverhill, and so confident were they, when they were directors, that they actually risked their own money in making the stock good on a reduction of the capital taking place, and they did that which, I believe, no directors have ever done in relation to a bank in this country, either before or since. Then as to Mr. Thomas Craig. He was well known in Montreal. I do not know whether he was trained in a bank, but he was recognised as a clever business man; and the gentleman who pressed his appointment on his brother directors was not his brother-in-law, the member for Montreal West (Mr. Gault), not Mr. Ogilvie, Mr. Buntin or Mr. Greene, but it was Mr. James Crathern, a political opponent, and a gentleman who, as I have said, is as shrewd a business man as there is in Canada. It was Mr. Crathern who urged his appointment, and his opinion in regard to that gentleman is certainly as good as that of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), much as we may esteem his judgment of human nature. Under those circumstances, when the directors came to Ottawa they came here precisely as other bank directors had come. Why had we no resolution of censure in the case of the Consolidated Bank? We know what happened in regard to that bank. We know that the bank had as its president a gentleman who, from the time he came into this country, in 1836, down to the time he left it, in 1855, was the financial model of the Liberal party in Canada—I mean Sir Francis Hincks.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The hon. gentleman says, hear, hear. All I can say is, that Sir Francis Hincks then was Inspector General of the Government in which the hon. gentleman's father was Solicitor General and supported in 1848-49 until he left Parliament.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Does the hon. gentleman say no?

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman's observation was that Sir Francis Hincks had the confidence of the Liberal party up to the time he left Canada, in 1855.

Mr. WHITE. (Cardwell). So he had.

Mr. BLAKE. I differ with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Then all I can say is, that the hon. gentleman is splitting straws in a manner unworthy of him. It is quite true that a section of the Liberal party, from 1851 to 1854, opposed him. It is quite true that a section at that time thought a coalition between the Liberals and the Conservatives would be a good thing; that a section of the party endeavored to defeat him; and that to that end in Huron they supported Mr. Cayley against Mr. McQueen; that in Hamilton they supported Sir Allan McNab against Mr. Buchanan; that in Kingston they supported the present leader of the Government against Mr. Counter; that in various parts of Ontario, during that time, we had that condition of things, and a section of the party withdrew its support from Mr. Hincks. But if I do not mistake the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake), judging him by what we have seen since he came into public life, was not of that section, his boast being that he never was a Clear Grit, whatever he might be; and his efforts ever since have been to raise the Liberals out of the ruts into which they had got, through the actions of the leading man who at that time had not confidence in Sir Francis Hincks. What I was going to say was this, that Sir Francis Hincks was the president of that bank. He had a salary as president. He was at the bank every day; he had an office there; he was watching it continuously. Yet what occurred? We know that when the bank failed exposures occurred and a large number of transactions came to light to which Sir Francis Hincks would never have been a party if he had known anything about them; and the only question which seems to me to arise is this: whether there may not be something done by law or otherwise which will secure, not the inspection of the banks, which to my mind would be utterly futile, but the greater responsibility of directors in connection with the management of banks. How that can be done is a difficult question. We are told by the hon. member for Chateauguay (M. Holton) that a number of things have since come out which the Government might have ascertained for themselves if they had examined the books; but the answer to that is, that Mr. Campbell, who made an examination of the books after the failure, with the sole desire of finding out precisely what the condition of things was, reported that the bank was all right. True, it has not turned out to be all right, and everybody will regret it. It is somewhat difficult to understand what is the precise position of those hon. gentlemen with regard to the security of Senator Ogilvie. I know there are a great many persons who think that the Government should not have pressed its claims against the bank at all for those loans; that they should be willing to accept their chance with the rest of the depositors, and take their share out of what the assets will produce. I do not quite know whether that is the view of hon. gentlemen opposite, though I am bound to say that the statement of the leader of the Opposition would lead one to believe that that is his view; for while he condemns, in the strongest possible way, the granting of the loan, objects to the possible loss of the money as the result of granting the loan, he at the same time urges—if his argument means anything—that we should make the loan an ordinary one, and consent to come in with the rest of the creditors for share and share alike. Well, Sir, I do not pretend to be a lawyer, but I venture to say—and I do not think the leader of the Opposition will deny it—that if we took that ground, if we undertook to release the bank of our prior claim—if we have a prior claim—to that $200,000, if we undertook, of our own action to say that we would take from the bank the same proportion that the bank is able to give to its other creditors—in that case, at any rate, we could not hold the security. That is a proposition which, even according to Ontario law, the leader of the Opposition will hardly dispute. We must at least—if we did sue Senator Ogilvie—put him in as good a position as we are, to recover from the bank the full amount of that deposit. There can be no question about that, as a legal proposition; and therefore the only question which would arise would be this: so far as the bank is concerned, it would make no difference; so far as the creditors are concerned, it would make no difference, whether we are to ask that gentleman for the money in the meantime—and he has already lost seriously by his personal confidence in the bank, and has risked large sums of money as a shareholder in connection with it—whether we are to do that, or first to exhaust our rights against the bank, and then, if it is found that we have any claim against Senator Ogilvie, to go for him and recover that claim. That is the only difference between the two positions. I think no one will deny that having regard to the precedents, having regard to what has been the invariable practice, having regard to the opinion of the hon. member who has moved this motion in the case of the Commercial Bank—that even after the president of a bank had declared that it was hopelessly gone, because of its later mismanagement, still the Government should come to its assistance—I say, under those circumstances, I think the House should have no difficulty in voting down this resolution, and relieving the Finance Minister of the imputation which has been attempted to be placed upon him, for an act which he performed in good faith, upon precedents which are abundant in the records of this country; when he believed himself, in attempting to prevent the disaster of the failure of that bank, to be averting the consequent disaster, which, in view of the peculiar and speculative condition of things in Canada, and the failure of those speculations at the moment, might have resulted to the commercial interests of the country.

Mr. DAVIES. Hon. members must have observed that a large portion of the speech of the hon. gentleman has been devoted to the discussion of subjects which are not legitimately before the House, and which do not legitimately come before the House, in the proposition submitted by the hon. member for Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright). The hon. gentleman is in the position of a man who, finding he has a bad case, is trying to draw a red herring across the track. He opened his speech by putting in the mouth of his opponents as theirs—a very weak mode of defence—a proposition which was almost diametrically opposed to the one they submitted. And the hon. gentleman cannot be excused on the ground that he did not correctly understand the statement made by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), and the hon. member for Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), because the proposition to which they invited the attention of the House, to which they asked the consent of the House, has been formulated by them in a resolution which is in the Votes and Proceedings of the House, and which the hon. gentleman had before him when he spoke. The proposition to which the hon. gentleman asked the assent of the House, was not the proposition that under any and all circumstances it was unwise for a Government to come to the relief of banks in difficulties. No such proposition is advanced—no such argument was advanced in the speeches which were made in support of the motion. I invite the attention of both sides of the House to the proposition that we do ask the House to assent to, and which I say, in view of the language which fell from the leader of the Government a few days ago, should command the assent of himself and hon. members who have confidence in him. The proposition is that it be resolved:

"That it appears by the Public Accounts that $337,000 are due to the Government in respect of the allowances made to the Exchange Bank in 1883.

"That the said bank had already, within two years, suspended payment and reduced its capital by 50 per cent.

"That the papers laid before this House—and the statement of the Minister—show that the bank was in difficulties when said advances were made,"—

And now, Sir, comes the crucial point of the proposition which the hon. gentleman, for his own purposes, seems entirely to have forgotten:

"and that no proper enquiries were had, or precautions taken, in respect of the loan of the $300,000 of public money put in jeopardy by such advance."

The proposition is not that the money was advanced, but that it was advanced without enquiries, without those precautions which a prudent man should have taken, and which the leader of the Government himself, a short time ago, laid down as essential to an advance being made. The advance was made in this case in total disregard of the conditions laid down by the leader of the Government. Having laid down that proposition, the question for the House is, has that proposition been proved? The papers show it, the Finance Minister admits it, the member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) almost glories in it, and the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) ignores it. Then the resolution goes on:

"That the developments in connection with the Exchange Bank show that the institution was, at the time of the loan, insolvent, and under grossly careless and fraudulent management, and that the result of the action of the Government was to bolster up the bank, by restoring, in some measure, public confidence, during an interval in which the said careless and fraudulent management was continued, enormous sums of money disappeared, the position of shareholders, depositors and creditors of the bank was changed, the liability of shareholders to creditors was lost, and the whole situation changed for the worse."

And then it goes on to ask the House to express regret that the Government, under those circumstances, without making any enquiry, without taking those precautions, and with a recklessness and want of prudence which we say deserves censure, should have gone on to make the loan. Now the hon. gentleman attempts to argue that this is an attempt to be wise after the event; that we are condemning the action of the Finance Minister on the ground that something has been discovered since that was not known, and he says that it is very well for us to be wise now, and that we could not then have ascertained the condition of things. The position we take is, that he being the trustee of the public money, was bound to take wise and prudent precautions—not that he must be wise above other men, not that he should be omniscient, but that he should take precautions which would commend themselves as those which a prudent man would have taken when acting as a trustee of public moneys. We condemn him because he has ignored the circumstances under which alone the Premier says the Government is justified in advancing moneys to a bank, not because of anything we have discovered since. What does the Premier say? Coming from a gentleman so highly respected by his party, and having the experience of his many years of public service, I think it will bear repetition. He says the Government of this country is justified, in times of "deep depression," for the purpose of avoiding universal panic and universal ruin, and acting in concert with other banks, in making advances to a bank in distress, but not in other circumstances or without making full enquiries. Has that been done in the present case? This is my third Session in this House, and I have never heard the hon. member for Cardwell saying, that the country was passing through a period of great depression. I have heard him saying, with his silvery voice, year after year, that we are on the wave of prosperity—

prosperity in the North-West, prosperity all through these Provinces; so that the condition of affairs which the Prime Minister laid down as essential to justify an advance of money by the Government has been wanting. This is not a discovery made since, but known to the Finance Minister then—that it was a time, not of depression, but a time in which, with prudent management, that bank should not have been in the position requiring Government aid. Then, the hon. leader of the Opposition condemns him, and, in my opinion justly, because, the times being good, prosperity, as he says himself, reigning everywhere, at the time the application for an advance was made, he was warned by the gentleman who made it that the affairs of that bank were not as they ought to be. He was told that the public had lost confidence in the bank, and that those who held its notes were making a run on it. He was informed of the fact which was mentioned by the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), and has not been contradicted, that the commercial public of Montreal had no confidence in this speculative bank; and these facts combined threw an onus on the Finance Minister which I think he will hardly get rid of, of making an investigation before he yielded to that demand. Did he make any investigation whatever? Did he do what his leader tells us he ought to do, even in a time of deep depression? Did he go to the Bank of Montreal or to any of the other banks who would be supposed to know the condition of the affairs of the bank? Not a single enquiry was made of any of these banks; he took nobody into his confidence; he recklessly, without taking any precautions, without exercising reasonable prudence, advanced this money; and he therefore deserves the censure of the House and the country. Now, Sir, the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) brought forward certain precedents to justify the House in voting down this resolution. He says there are certain precedents in the history of Canada which show that the present Opposition have acted in a manner which they now condemn. I have been accustomed to listen to precedents and to analyse them, and to my mind the very precedents quoted condemn him most. He says there was a bank called the Commercial Bank, and that bank had the honor of having, as one of its directors, and the honor of being advised as its solicitor by a gentleman who then occupied and now occupies the position of Prime Minister of Canada; and that bank applied to the Government of which the right hon. gentleman was Premier for assistance. What does the hon. member for Cardwell say? He says that because the right hon. gentleman did his duty when that application was made, because he took those very precautions which a short time ago he took occasion to reiterate in the presence of us younger members should always be taken, because he consulted with other banks whether or not it was prudent to make such an advance, and because, after investigation, his Government determined that it was not prudent and did not make the advance, therefore we should not condemn Sir Leonard Tilley, the hon. Finance Minister, because not having made any enquiries he did make the advance in the case of the Exchange Bank. If there was a precedent required to condemn the action of the Finance Minister, that precedent was quoted by his successor, as we hear he is to be in a very short time, or as he hopes, at any rate, to be. If he does become his successor, I hope he will follow the lines of the gentleman whose action he has quoted as a precedent and not the lines of the gentleman whose action he is defending to-night. Then the hon. gentleman quoted another case, a case of a deposit made in the Merchants Bank of Canada. He stated that at a certain time the Government deposited in that bank a certain sum of money, which grew from $60,000 or $70,000 until it reached the sum of $216,000, and with a triumphant air he turns around and asks: Is not that an analogous case; is not that in point?

Why did he not tell the House what proportion that $216,000 bore to the capital of the Merchants Bank? The hon. gentleman tells the House that that bank had its capital reduced, but did he tell us that at the time the Government had that deposit, the capital of that bank in its reduced state, was $6,000,000, and that not a dollar of that deposit was lost? Why, Sir, if the hon. gentleman wanted to draw an analogy which would make the two cases parallel, he would be defending the Finance Minister of the day for an advance equivalent to $3,600,000 to the Merchants Bank, for that sum would bear the same proportion to its capital which the advance of $300,000 bore to the $500,000 of capital of the bank in question. So I submit to the House that the hon. gentleman has been most unfortunate in his precedents and quotations, and that the logical conclusion to be drawn from them is directly the opposite of that to which he wished the House to assent. The hon. gentleman, I regret very much, has gone out of his way in this discussion, to make a statement which I think is calculated to prejudice the commercial interests of this country to a very great degree. He stands in a responsible position in this House—in a more responsible position, I venture to say, looking at his expectations, than almost any other ordinary member—and he does not hesitate to rise and repeat here the fearful blunder—I say it advisedly—which the Finance Minister himself made in the debate on this question a year ago. I remember well when the Finance Minister, a year ago, when this question came up, declared that the condition of the banks of this Dominion was such that if called on to-morrow to meet their liabilities to the public, nearly every one of them would go down. I remember the alarm—the hon. gentleman laughs. Does he deny that he made that statement in the debate last year? If he does, I will read it from Hansard; and I will do more. I will call his attention to the storm that arose in banking quarters when that statement got circulated throughout the Dominion. I will tell him that the answer of the banks saw that the statement made was one that the facts would not justify—not from one bank, but from many; they denied that they were in that position; and so, I say, it is to be regretted that the hon. gentleman, who it is rumored is soon to be Finance Minister, should have been guilty of repeating that blunder of decrying the credit of the country and doing what he could to damage the solvent banks of this country. It is not only untrue in itself, but it would be unjustifiable, even if it had a basis of truth. It was not called for in this debate; it could do nothing but damage the banks, and being made without a fact to justify it is deserving of nothing but condemnation and censure. The hon. gentleman apologises for this advance to the Exchange Bank on the ground that, although the country was not then passing through a period of deep depression, still there was depression. Great speculations had been gone into; enormous speculations in the North West. The commercial world was almost panic-stricken; the air was pregnant with fear and danger; it was a time when men were almost trembling in their shoes; the boom in the North-West had been already broken. To hear the hon. gentleman talk, one would suppose that those who studied the signs of the times were anticipating depression and commercial disaster in Canada of the worst kind. Did the hon. gentleman forget the celebrated speech made by the Finance Minister within twelve days from that period? Has the hon. gentleman forgotten that speech? Has he forgotten the statement, which he, more than any body else in the House, cheered, made by the Finance Minister, to the effect, not that we were in danger of panic, not that there was any fear of commercial depression, but that the foundations of commercial prosperity of this country had been so deeply laid, that there was such a beautiful, splendid, and magnificent outlook for the future, particularly in the North-West, that every young man who had a head on his shoulders should clap on all sail for seven years, because the pendulum was going to stop its swing, and for that time we were to have unbroken prosperity. It may be said I have exaggerated the language used by the Finance Minister. Well, I will ask the House to bear with me while I quote from the remarkable speech made by the Finance Minister twelve days after the time when the advance was made to the Exchange Bank, which the hon. member for Cardwell defends on the ground that we were on the eve of a tremendous depression. What did the hon. the Finance Minister say? He said:

"The leader of the Opposition called the attention of the House to a remark which I made to a personal friend—and merchant of St. John—and I suppose I repeated it in public afterwards—to the effect, if I were his age, and engaged in business, I would put on the whole of the canvas I could carry for ten years, and then take in sail. I believe, from the fact that we are spending annually a large amount of money in opening and developing the great North-West country, from the fact that the population coming into the country at the present time are bringing in a large amount of money for investment, from the fact that, last year, we had of the value of imports over $10,000,000 of settlers' effects—and which will be increasing, and which, of course, does not create any difficulty financially, and I hold that the return of the pendulum—which always does come back—will be deferred, and that we will have seven years of prosperity before the country."

I invite the attention of the hon. gentlemen who give weight to the argument of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), a financial authority, as he is, in this House, and who are prepared to follow him in this vote, because of his argument, into the facts which I have read, and which scatter that argument to the winds. I invite their attention to the answer which I take from the mouth of the Finance Minister himself, and ask them to pause before determining to vote against this resolution which asks the House to condemn the unfortunate advance made to this bank. The hon. gentleman attempts to argue—and, perhaps, there might be some degree of force in his argument—that really and truly, after all, when this bank wound up, in the month of September, affairs did not look so bad even then. And what authority does he quote? He quotes as authority a gentleman named Mr. Campbell, who enjoys the confidence of the commercial community of Montreal. I have no knowledge of the gentleman in question, but am informed by those who know, that the hon. member for Cardwell very largely over-estimated the confidence which the business community of Montreal have in Mr. Campbell.

Mr. MACMASTER. No, no.

Mr. DAVIES. It may be there is a difference of opinion, but the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Macmaster), who says no, will, I think, bear me out in this statement, that Mr. Campbell was called in as an accountant by the directors of the Exchange Bank, who brought about the state of financial ruin in which the bank was in the month of September; that he, as their accountant, made out a statement of the bank's affairs; that the statement was a false statement of the condition of the bank, as the facts afterwards proved; that he deceived the shareholders; and that, if he was afterwards appointed one of the liquidators, it was at the instance and through the efforts of the directors themselves, and not the shareholders. So far as regards any weight to be attached to statements of Mr. Campbell, these facts are a sufficient answer. But we are not discussing in what condition Mr. Campbell found the bank. We know that bank to have been rotten, to have been bankrupt beyond redemption. The fact we are trying to get at is this: Did the Finance Minister lend the money after taking the precautions every prudent man would have taken? I think the Finance Minister will rather accept the defence made by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) for his action, than that advanced by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White). What is the defence advanced by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe? He said the policy of the Government is displayed in their action in lending the money, and as it is opposed to the policy of hon. gentlemen on this side, every member who supports the Government should support their policy. I find him not only supporting the policy of lending money to a speculative bank at the time when there was a run on the bank, without consulting the other banks in Montreal—I find him, not only defending that, but the results that flows from it. And why? He says it is part of the National Policy to help the banks. He said a great deal there. Very often a man in his position, advocating a bad cause, speaks, in a sentence of that kind, more than he ever intended to say. What was the policy of the Government? Their National Policy is to make the rich man richer and the poor man poorer, and their policy in this instance was to make the directors richer and the creditors and shareholders poorer. The result of the policy which the hon. gentleman defends was to put money in the hands of the rich directors, in order that they might relieve themselves of their shares and the liability which by law attaches to them and escape the payment of enormous sums of money, and throw the onus of that payment upon the other shareholders, innocent people, not responsible for the state in which the bank was brought, and thus make the poor shareholders and creditors poorer for the benefit of the directors. I accept the statement of the hon. gentleman, that this advance made by the Finance Minister was part of the National Policy, and the hon. gentleman was logical in calling upon his friend to defend it. From our standpoint we cannot defend it; we think it deserves condemnation. I am not going to detain the House very long; but I think that after the calm and judicial speech which was delivered by the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), we would have had some reply from hon. gentlemen from Montreal who know the facts. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Holton) stated four or five broad facts, none of which were contradicted. In the absence of contradiction we are bound to consider these facts to be true. I say that, if these facts are true, no member, except one who is tied to his party, can refuse to vote for this resolution. What are the facts? The hon. gentleman says that, at the time the loan was made, the commercial public of Montreal looked with suspicion upon this bank. It was not a bank which enjoyed the confidence of the people of Montreal. It was believed to be shaky. Its customers were those who could not get credit elsewhere; and, as the hon. gentleman himself remarked, in a very pithy sentence, the best recommendation for your opening an account in their ledger was the refusal of the Bank of Montreal to give you credit. You have there a speculative bank, a bank which had not the public confidence, a bank whose customers are speculative customers, men who cannot get credit elsewhere; and, with all those facts before him, knowing that the cashier of the bank was, as he says, living openly a life of reckless extravagance; with all these facts stated by him, undenied, known or within the means of knowledge—for I say that the one is equivalent to the other—he made this loan, without enquiry, without the existence of one of these conditions which his leader says are alone a justification for an advance to a bank. How can it be defended? The miserable defence set up by the member for Cardwell has, I think, been already exploded. It is no defence at all. There is no defence, except that of the Minister of Finance himself, that possibly he erred. We know he erred. The question is not whether he erred, but whether he exercised and used those means of knowledge which were within his reach, to prevent him from erring. We say that he did not. We say that he did not attempt to exercise any of them, and therefore the facts which would justify a loan to the bank are absent, and therefore his conduct demands the expression of regret contained in the closing part of this resolution. But the effects of this loan are not confined to the loss of this money. That loss is in one sense a small matter, if you consider the indirect effects which followed it. As the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) has stated, if, at the time the loan was made, the bank had been wound up—and it would have been wound up if the loan had not been made—the creditors would have been paid in full and the shareholders would not have been called upon for the double liability, in all probability. If that is the fact, what is the result of the loan, made without this inquiry and under these improper circumstances? The result is, that the shareholders, many of them innocent people, are called upon to pay this double liability, and the creditors are left unpaid or nearly so, and a great deal of misery and ruin has followed to innocent people as the consequence of this improper and unjustifiable advance. The consequences are far-reaching. The loss to the Government itself is nothing in comparison with the heavy loss that innocent people sustained in consequence of this loan. I will go further. I say the subsequent conduct of the hon. gentleman cannot be defended. He has, as has been stated already, a guarantee from one of the chief offenders in this bank, the Hon. Mr. Ogilvie, a Senator, a supporter of his own—a guarantee for the payment of $100,000. He has never attempted to enforce it, but he has attempted to enforce what is called the prerogative right of the Crown, the right to take precedence of all other creditors of that bank, to gobble up—to use a vulgar expression—all, or nearly all, the assets, and let the creditors go without anything. I say it is most unjust that the principal offender should escape payment of his guarantee, and innocent creditors should be punished for his want of prudence and his mismanagement of this bank. It is absolutely indefensible, and the hon. gentleman knows it. There is another direction in which that injustice goes. It has not been the custom of the Crown in this country to enforce this prerogative right. In the case of the Liverpool Bank, of Nova Scotia—I believe I am right, but if I am wrong, hon. gentlemen can correct me—the prerogative right was not claimed; the Crown claimed pari passu with the other creditors; and, I think that, when the Crown goes into the banking business, when it goes into the business of lending moneys to shaky banks, it is the height of injustice that it should come in and refuse to share pari passu with other creditors, and should gobble up the whole. It is unfair and unjust in itself, and it has not been the practice heretofore, but the effect of this unfortunate loan has been, that not only to the creditors of this bank, but to those of the Bank of Prince Edward Island, has this prerogative right been extended, and the unfortunate creditors of this latter bank, many of whom were almost ruined but were left with a dividend of 15 per cent. from the bank, are still further injured by the Crown stepping in with their prerogative claim, because they had stepped in in the case of the Exchange Bank. Thus, widespread ruin has been caused among the shareholders, many of them women, and commercial men and other persons. This has been disastrous in the case of the bank itself, and it has established a wrong precedent which Parliament should condemn, which will be used in the future if Parliament approves of it now, and has ruined innocent people by the unjust pressing of this hitherto unused prerogative claim.

Mr. MACMASTER. It was not my intention to take any part in this debate, and I even had some doubt as to whether I had the right to vote until I submitted that question to yourself. I happen, like the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) to be a shareholder in this unfortunate Exchange Bank. I happen, also, to be a creditor of the bank and a depositor in the bank, and I happen to be engaged in the further capacity of counsel for the bank and for the creditors, in resisting the claim of the Crown to be paid by privilege. All these facts I have submitted to you, in view of the question, whether I ought to cast my vote on this subject, and I think I have your authority, Mr. Speaker, to say that I have the right to do so. I would not say anything to this House were it not that certain statements have been put forward as matters of fact and matters of argument, which I believe to be neither, and upon which I think it to be incumbent on me, as one having a very intimate personal knowledge of the circumstances of this bank, to say something before this hon. House. In the first place, it is assumed by hon. gentlemen opposite that the Government, in the month of April, 1883, had the knowledge which the public had in the month of September, 1883, when the bank failed. It is assumed that they knew all about the failure at the time of the advance, and that, therefore, they acted wrongly in making the advance at the time they did. Well, what do we find the condition of the bank to be when the advance was made? The hon. gentleman who last addressed the House says, that if, at the time the advance was made, the bank had been liquidated, the shareholders would have lost nothing but the stock they had invested, and the creditors would have been paid 100 cents in the dollar. That is the best proof we could have that the bank was solvent at the time. Therefore, the proposition embodied in the resolution, that this was an insolvent bank, is not true and should not be sustained by the House. My hon. friend from Chateauguay has stated that the effect of the loan was to re-establish the credit of the bank and restore public confidence. That was the object of the loan and that object was achieved in that respect. How was it that the bank, at a later date, failed? I will explain. The bank was steadied by the loan; its business went on as usual; but about that time a new president was elected—Mr. Craig. The member for Montreal West (Mr. Gault), who had been the president of the bank, withdrew in consequence of ill health, and ceased to take an active part in the management of the bank. Mr. Craig came in as president and took absolute control of the bank, and what resulted? In the months succeeding the loan, when the bank was in good credit, he engaged in enterprises personal to himself; he forfeited the obligation of good faith he owed to the creditors and shareholders of the bank, and engaged, with some of the customers of the bank for his own benefit, without the knowledge of the other directors of the bank, in enterprises personal to himself. He engaged with Mr. Baird, a prominent coal merchant; he engaged with the firm of Taylor & Robertson, and with others, in business transactions far beyond the capacity of the bank, for purposes entirely personal to himself; and, by reason of this dereliction of duty and this forfeiture of duty to the bank and to the shareholders and creditors of the bank, these transactions having turned out unfortunately, the bank became ultimately ruined. Sir, it has been stated by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) that Mr. Campbell, one of the liquidators of the bank, made a statement while acting in the capacity of an accountant of the bank, that the bank was solvent in September and October, 1883, six months after this amount was loaned by the Government. That statement was perfectly true. Nay, more, Sir; in the month of December, 1883, at the meeting of the creditors and shareholders of the Exchange Bank, at which my hon. friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) was present, the statement was submitted and affirmed before the meeting of shareholders, that the bank showed sufficient assets to pay the creditors of that bank, dollar for dollar, in full. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) has cast a slur upon Mr. Campbell—not intentionally, because any man who knows the capacity of Mr. Campbell, who knows his honorable and upright character, would not willingly cast a slur upon him; but he has done so when he said that Mr. Campbell was the nominee of the directors, and elected by the shareholders of the bank, and those who had an interest to put him there. I will tell the hon. member for Prince Edward Island, that not only was he the nominee of the directors of the Exchange Bank, but he was the nominee of the faction represented by my friend Mr. Holton, in the meeting of the shareholders, in December, 1883. Nay, Sir, he was the nominee of both parties; he received the nomination of all sections of the shareholders as liquidator of the Exchange Bank. My hon. friend from Chateauguay will not deny that. Further, Sir, at a late period, when it was thought proper to remove the other two liquidators of the bank from their position, and to replace them by a third gentleman, more competent to fill that position, what happened? Not a word of dissent was raised against the retention of office by Mr. Campbell. All parties agreed that he was highly competent for the position, that he was the one man above all others who should be retained until the liquidation of the bank was finally completed. He was entrusted with the liquidation of the Consolidated Bank; he had been previously manager of a bank, and was regarded as a man whose capacity and honor was beyond all question in the commercial community of Montreal, and of the city of Toronto, where he was thoroughly well known. Well, Sir, I say it was this man who, in the month of December, 1883, eight months after this loan was made by the Dominion Government, who stated that this bank was in a solvent condition. Now, there were more people than Mr. Campbell who thought the bank was solvent. Whom does my hon. friend from Chateauguay represent in the litigation now pending in the Province of Quebec? Does he not represent the Crathern & Caverhill estate, which deposited large sums of money in that bank? Somebody has said this was a speculative bank; but, I ask my hon. friend from Chateauguay, if it was a speculative bank, how does it come that his client, James Crathern, a good Grit and a good business man, that the Crathern & Caverhill estate, which he advises—how does it come that these people left their $40,000 in the Exchange Bank over the speculative period during which it is said this loan was made, until the time of the collapse in September, 1883? These are things for the hon. gentleman to explain, and for the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution to explain. More than that, Sir; the leading financial men in the city of Montreal had their money deposited in this bank. Mr. Mussen, one of the richest men of the city of Montreal, had some $30,000; Mr. Beaudry, one of the richest men in Montreal, had some $50,000; Mr. Andrew Allan, one of the richest men in Montreal, had some $10,000 or $20,000—and so I might increase the list. I only mention these to show that this bank was not regarded as a speculative bank, but was regarded as one enjoying the confidence of business men, and they deposited their money in it. Now, Mr. Speaker, a good deal has been said during this debate about the duty of the Dominion Government to proceed against Senator Ogilvie, who guaranteed the loan; and, in fact, this resolution states that sufficient precautions were not taken by the Government. I ask you what better precaution could be taken than the guarantee of a man in Senator Ogilvie's position? The hon. member for Chateauguay, who knows the city of Montreal as well as the hon. member for Cardwell or myself, and perhaps better, knows that Mr. Ogilvie was reputedly a rich man, and that he enjoyed the financial reputation of being worth something in the neighborhood of a quarter of a million of dollars. "Put yourself in his place," as the novelist said; and to any one occupying the position of Finance Minister it would seem, at once, be he political friend or political foe, that he was a safe man. He would look for the guinea stamp, and he would say: Mr. Ogilvie is a man who occupies a high financial position and I will accept his bond; and he did accept his bond. Yet it is contended that the Dominion Government should have enforced their claim against the warrantor before proceeding against the principal on the bond of the Exchange Bank. But I say, as a position of law, and I challenge any hon. gentleman of the Province of Quebec, who is a legal gentleman, to deny it, that we cannot enforce, according to the law of Quebec, the bond against the surety until we have exhausted the principal debtor, and that the Dominion Government has no recourse against Senator Ogilvie until they have exhausted their full recourse against the Exchange Bank. That is the law of the Province of Quebec, and I have statements to the effect that a somewhat similar law exists in Ontario and the other Provinces. Now, Sir, it has been said, with regard to the directors, that they were reckless in the management of this bank. Sir, Thomas Craig, from the time he came into the management of that bank, was the factotum of that bank—the whole bank. He took control of it, and he managed it to suit himself, and for his own purposes. It may be that these men should have exercised greater supervision; I do not know but they should, in the light of latter events. Perhaps they should have been more careful; if they knew what we do to-day, they certainly would have exercised more care. But how were the books of the bank kept under Mr. Craig's supervision? They were so kept that it has been established by sworn testimony in the courts of justice—not merely by Mr. Campbell, but another gentleman, who was accountant in the bank—that the books of the Exchange Bank were so kept that certain entries never were discovered until long after the bank suspended. A few days ago, in a suit in which the hon. Senator Lacoste was opposed to me, it transpired that a certain remarkable entry was made in an obscure part of the books of the Exchange Bank, and the accountant of the bank swore that he never saw it until it was shown to him in court, and Mr. Campbell swore that he never saw it before, and could not have discovered it, because it was out of the usual place for making such entries. And slips of papers and documents of the highest importance to the bank pledging its credit, instead of being kept in the regular books, were kept in Mr. Craig's private drawer, so that even the regular executive officers could not have known of their existence. How could these business men have become aware of them? Sir, it may be possible for us to make too much reflection upon these men; they have lost severely. I am not here as their justifier—I have no right to do that—but they have suffered most keenly and lost most severely. They owned more than half the capital of the bank, and they have lost that completely. The stock was once at 80 above par, and they have lost the advance above par. They will lose the double liability and half their deposits. The leader of the Opposition, I think, said: Why did they not go to the bank and put their names on the back of a piece of paper to give it financial strength before asking the Government for aid? Well, no; I beg my hon. friend's pardon; I think it was his colleague, his armor-bearer, the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) who made that statement, who is himself an ex-bank president and an ex-Finance Minister. Sir, the directors did go to the City and District Savings Bank, and they gave their personal security to that bank for $250,000. They are on the bond, and they will have to pay it. These men have lost personally more than the value of the capital of this bank. That is not a justification for the Government making this loan, but I merely state the circumstances here, in order that it may be seen that these men, who are supposed to have neglected their duty, have paid in their own financial strength most severely for the whistle. Now, Sir, who was the prime mover in putting Thomas Craig into the position where he brought this bank to ruin? It is true, as my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island said, the failure of this bank has brought ruin to a good many people. The hon. member for Chateaugay is a sufferer, and several others in this House are sufferers. I happen to be, in a light way, a sufferer myself. But who was the prime mover in placing Mr. Craig in this bank, in a position where he ruined it? Sir, it was a friend and client of my hon. friend from Chateaugay, James Crathern, Esq., a good Reformer of the city of Montreal. It was he who came, and, after laying hands upon the head of Mr. Craig, said to the directors of the Exchange Bank: Here is a worthy man and true; you are in a difficulty now; your former cashier has absconded to the United States; take this man, and he will draw you out of the hole; he will bring your bank to prosperity. And they took the advice of Mr. Crathern and trouble came which resulted in all the misery so graphically pictured by the hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies). Some reference has been made here of the account in the books in the bank in which there is a sum charged to the Conservative Association or the West End Association of Montreal. It is quite true there is such an entry in the books. As I said before, the books were so kept that it was impossible for the directors to become aware of all the entries in them, and I have no doubt—and I know it, in my professional capacity—that the hon. member for Montreal West (Mr. Gault) was unaware of the existence of any such entry. But Mr. Craig had kept the transactions in such an extraordinary manner that we find an entry in regard to the Montreal West Association, and certain sums are charged as having been spent on the Montreal West election. The question of the liability of Mr. Gault to pay the amount to the bank, $2,000, was submitted to my learned friend, Mr. Greenshields, my colleague and associate, an able man and a good Liberal, and he and I, conjointly, gave an opinion that Mr. Gault was in no way liable for the entries made in that form in the bank book. That opinion has never been questioned, and is not questioned to-day; it cannot be questioned and it cannot be successfully controverted. I regret that under the circumstances, it should be necessary for me to make any statement to this House. I will add but one statement further. It is this: That this extraordinary account of Mr. Craig's was not kept in the books containing the daily transactions of the bank, but in the savings bank ledger, where the savings of the poor were recorded; and in that way the manager kept from the directors the fact that he had overdrawn his account $220,000. Why, if the Government is to be held responsible for the acknowledged defalcations and defaults of this officer, who is an absconder from the country, it would be a most outrageous injustice to the Government of the day. When under examination in New York before Mr. McGibbon, commissioner, in which Mr. Geoffric, another good Liberal, represented the other side, and I represented the creditors, what did Mr. Craig acknowledge? He acknowledged that he had endeavored, with two gentlemen in Montreal, to buy up the stock of the Royal Canadian Insurance Company, in order to ensure control of that company, and the profits would be divided between himself and those two gentlemen; and he declared he temporarily took the funds of the bank for that purpose. Is it fair that men like Mr. Buntin, Mr. Ogilvie, Mr. Greene and Mr. Gault, men who have obtained a high reputation and position in the commercial world, should have their honorable names tarnished by the acts of such a man? Is it fair that the Government which has administered its funds with such success and prudence should be reproached because a mishap has occurred beyond human prudence and foresight, which may result in the Government losing a small sum of money. I forbear to say what the loss may be. The Government claim that they must be paid in full. They have a right to make such a claim, and the creditors have an equal right to resist it, and to submit to a legal arbitration the question as to whether the Government should be paid in full or not. It is true, as the hon. member for Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) has said, that up to this time the decision has been against the Government, to the extent of saying that its claim is not so privileged. The Government has taken the case to appeal. It is further true that the Government have facilitated the appeal; that they have communicated to the liquidators and counsel of the bank their desire that every facility shall be given to try and determine that question at the earliest possible day; and so far as I am concerned, in connection with the liquidation, speaking personally and on my responsibility as a man, I say the Government have acted with that fairness which should characterise a Government, able and willing to do justice to the people as a whole and to a section of them who unfortunately met losses in connection with an unfortunate bank.

Mr. LISTER. Before the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Macmaster) commenced to speak, I had no intention of saying anything on this subject. The hon. gentleman told this House that he occupied many positions, so far as this question was concerned—that he was a stockholder in the bank, that he was a depositor, that he was the solicitor of the bank, the solicitor of the liquidators. And I would ask him what position does he occupy to-night? He appears here and argues the case with a warmth that would lead us to believe that he is the solicitor still of certain gentlemen in Montreal. I can say, from what I have heard to-day, from what I have seen in Hansard, and from what I have heard from the Minister of Finance, that there never was a more utter disregard of his duty, as Finance Minister, than that which has been shown in this matter. If anyone had gone to the Finance Minister and asked him to lend him $10 out of his own pocket, he would have shown more care than he has displayed in expending $300,000 of the people's money. The hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Macmaster) has told us that this was not a speculative bank. In that he contradicts the statement made by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives); he also contradicts the statement made by a coming Minister, the proprietor of the Montreal Gazette; both hon. members said this was a speculative bank and a speculative institution. We know, as a fact, to-day, that at the time the money was borrowed from the Government the bank was hopelessly insolvent; and the question before this House to-night is, whether the Finance Minister, in lending that money, exercised that care, caution, judgment and discretion that should be exercised by a gentleman occupying the position he did, as trustee of the public funds. The question is, whether he was justified, on the representation made to him by the managers of the bank, in advancing the large sum of $300,000, and enabling that insolvent bank to continue its business, thereby giving an opportunity to stockholders who were in the "ring" to dispose of their stock, and when the time came to wind up, instead of finding men responsible on the double liability, there were found worthless stockholders. As the name of the hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Gault) has been mentioned, perhaps it would not be improper for me to say something respecting him. We know that he was intimately connected with that bank, that he was a large stockholder of it, that he was a director, and so must have been familiar with all the business transactions of the bank. He was president of the bank, and he resigned. We find, Sir, that he knew, or he must have known at the time he resigned, that the bank was insolvent, and within a few days after his resignation the stock held by him was sold on the Montreal market and bought by his brother-in-law, Mr. Craig—paid for out of the money of the bank by Mr. Craig, who was an officer of the bank. If that was an honorable transaction, one which will be approved by the people of this country, then I have nothing further to say. The hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Macmaster) says that Mr. Gault is not responsible for the money taken to pay his election expenses. Well, Sir, he may try to evade that responsibility, but I do not think he will find an honorable man to justify his conduct. We find that his own brother-in-law, the cashier of the bank, advanced to the Conservative Club the money of the bank to promote his election to this House, and that debt, the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Macmaster) says Mr. Gault was perfectly justified in repudiating. He says further, that the Government holds the security of Mr. Ogilvie. The statement is made here that the Finance Minister could have got the security of Mr. Ogilvie and Mr. Buntin, but he does not say that all the security the Government held was Mr. Ogilvie, for only $100,000, while for the other $200,000 there is no security, and it does not appear that the Finance Minister ever requested either of these gentlemen to give security for the further amount. It is said that the debt he claimed could not be collected. I would remind the hon. gentleman that this contract was made in Ontario, and that in this Province there is no such law as he states exists in Quebec. The Government would have the right immediately to bring an action on that guarantee and recover whatever Mr. Ogilvie would be responsible for. Now I do not see how it is possible for any hon. member to vote against this resolution as it is worded. The resolution regrets that the Finance Minister should have made this advance under the circumstances, and there is no person, except the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), and the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) who pretends to justify it. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), it is true, in his own paper and probably with his own hand and pen, says that the bank was insolvent in April, 1883, and still he attempts to get up here and justify the action of the Government. I believe he would justify anything that the Government could do—that there is nothing that the Government can do that the hon. gentleman would not be found justifying and defending. That has been his course for the last three years, and I have no doubt that he will shortly get that reward which he is so anxiously looking forward to, when the Finance Minister is made Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick. I say that the Finance Minister, in lending this money, is not only taking from the people of this country that which belongs to them, but he has been guilty of a gross breach of trust, for he occupies the position of a trustee, and it was his duty as a trustee to satisfy himself by every means in his power that the money was safely invested. If he had been entrusted with the funds of an estate he would have been responsible in law for the investment, and occupying his present position he is responsible to the country, and is censurable for his conduct in that transaction. The whole question is, whether the Finance Minister is justified in advancing the money as he did; whether, under the circumstances which then existed, he used that caution he should have used as a public servant when he advanced public moneys to an insolvent institution. It is impossible but to feel that there must have been on his part something more than a mere desire to benefit the people of the country. When we find that Mr. Ogilvie was a supporter of the hon. gentleman, that every member of that insolvent bank was his supporter, it does strike one strongly that if they had been opposed to him possibly he would have taken more care of the funds of the country. When we remember that Mr. Gault was intimately connected with him, that he was intimately connected with the affairs of the bank—taking all the circumstances into consideration, it leads one strongly to believe that the motives of the Finance Minister, when he made these advances, were not merely to secure the interests of the public.

Mr. McMULLEN. Hon. gentlemen who are making a noise may as well keep quiet. I have no desire to give a silent vote on this important question. I think it is in the interest of the constituency I represent to offer a few remarks on this subject, which has been discussed by the lawyers of the House, though I do not know that any remarks have been offered by others on this side but lawyers, except the hon. gentleman who made the motion. I regret, in the interests of the ratepayers of this country, that this amount of money should be lost to the people of this Dominion. I may just say that hon. gentlemen are not going to force me to take my seat. If they listen to me quietly, I will not take long; but the more noisy they are, the longer it will take me. I deeply regret I repeat, in the interests of the ratepayers of this Dominion, that this money should have been lost. I think it is worth the while of the representatives of the people here to frankly and fully discuss the whole question which is before the House, and express themselves plainly with regard to advances made in this way to questionable institutions. When we come to consider the fact that this money is gathered out of the pockets of the hard-working and industrious people of this country, and in this way it has, unfortunately, got into the hands of a chartered institution in a very rotten and insolvent position, I say it is sadly to be regretted that the people must submit to the loss. The proper view to be taken of the question is this: Would the Finance Minister have made this advance to the Exchange Bank if the money had been his own? Any man occupying a public position, a position of trust in the discharge of public duty, should discharge that duty with the same care and vigilance and the same anxiety that he would bring to the discharge of a duty for himself. Now, I hold that if the Finance Minister had been possessed of that $300,000 as his own money, he would have made a better and more searching investigation of the affairs of the bank before he deposited money in the institution. I say that he would have taken the trouble at least of having some person sent down, and its position at the time it sought relief carefully investigated. Last year, when this House was assembled for the purpose of transacting the business devolving on us, we can well remember that the Minister of Railways, when he came to the House for the purpose of presenting his railway resolutions, in order to back up the financial status of the Canadian Pacific Railway, stated that he had sent experts from his own office to Montreal, for the purpose of inspecting their accounts; and they were such thorough experts that they managed to get through the whole financial position of that company in an afternoon and come back here and report to the Government that that institution was in a very sound financial position. Now, if we have experts in the Departments who are able to perform such duties in such a very short time, I think he might have sent two or three of them to Montreal to make a real investigation of the affairs of that bank. If he did not do that, I think he might at least have insisted on having, from the entire directorate of the bank, as well as from the inspector, a statutory declaration, setting forth its true and exact position at the time they made the application to the Government for assistance. It does appear to me that no very great effort was made to ascertain the true position of that bank. Now, I think that should have been done; I think the Finance Minister, in the discharge of the duties devolving upon him, should have made some vigorous and determined effort to ascertain whether that institution was in such a position that he could safely trust to the handling of its manager $300,000 of the taxes of the people of this country. We have some reason to believe that some of the other banks approached did exact security for money they advanced to that bank; and if they exacted collaterals from it, would it not have been reasonable and right, would it not have been prudent, for the hon. Minister to have taken what was left at the time, and hand it over to the Bank of Montreal, as treasurer of the Dominion, and there let it remain in the interest of the Dominion. He should have done something of that kind. I think any ordinary man, going into a transaction of that kind for himself, would have taken that course. I am sorry to notice, in connection with that matter, that an effort has been made by the Finance Minister to put the responsibility on the Deputy Minister.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No; I would contradict that. I did not throw the responsibility on the Deputy Minister. I merely stated that I had communicated with him, and conferred with him with reference to the nature of the security; that he had made enquiries, and that the information received was satisfactory. I did not throw any responsibility on him, only to show that I had taken the precaution to confer.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, Mr. Speaker, I may have misunderstood him. I understood him to say that he had relied largely for the financial affairs of the bank on the statement made by the Deputy Minister. I was going to say that it is not right that responsibility should be shifted that way from the shoulders of those who should be prepared to assume the responsibility of these transactions. Now, I cannot understand how the hon. Finance Minister permitted himself to be led astray in this matter. It is quite evident, that he was anxious to assist this institution. I think it is quite evident that he felt that his friends and himself, to some extent, were indebted to it. I think it is quite evident, from the admissions made by the solicitor of the bank, that it had rendered services in past political contests. I think it is quite evident that the president had a claim for the very able services he had rendered, and the books of the institution show that advances had been made in the interest of the party in the elections. I think this, along with the statement that the Finance Minister had a large amount of money on hand, largely explains why this money has been deposited there. He named a large number of banks in which he had deposited money, as well as in the Exchange Bank. I cannot conceive, looking at the matter from an ordinary common-sense point of view, how he has been misled in this matter, if it has not been by his own prophecy, made in his Budget Speech, delivered a few days before he made this advance. He then stated to the House that he anticipated seven years of prosperity, and in order to support his prediction he had risked his money in this way, and there it has been lost. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe made some remark about the previous Government being flies on the wheel, and said the present Government were endeavoring to uphold and sustain the business of the country and to prove themselves not to be flies on the wheel. Well, Sir, it appears in this case that they actually risked $300,000 of the people's money in order to prevent a disaster happening to this peculiarly cherished institution of theirs. But notwithstanding all that, they proved to be flies on the wheel after all, for it went down and carried $300,000 of the people's money along with it. Now, I do not think the story told by the Finance Minister with regard to the fatted calves exactly suited the present case. The story is a very stale one. So far as he is concerned, he has been evidently financially well fed for the last four or five years. He has been drawing financial strength from more resources than one. He has been drawing financial strength by extra taxation on the people under the operation of his policy; he has been drawing financial strength from the people by the increased deposits in the post office savings banks; and he has been drawing financial strength from the money lenders of England, by placing the debentures of this country on the market. He said that my hon. friend had been fed from two cows, but I think he has been fed from three, and the result is that he has imprudently and injudiciously disposed of $300,000 of the people's money, simply because he had too much of it. This is an illustration of the fact that when the Finance Minister is getting into the coffers of the Dominion more money than he can use properly there is great danger that some of it will be lost. In this case he had drawn from the people more money than was necessary; and as the natural result of having an overflowing Treasury he has risked, in the interest of a few political friends, a large amount of the people's money, and it has been lost. Now, I say it is quite right that every member of this House should fully and frankly express his views on this question. It must be remembered that the action of this House in regard to this question will be quoted as a precedent years after we have left the active stages of life. This act of the followers of the Government in sustaining this unfortunate transaction will be made a precedent in future years for transactions of a similar kind. With regard to the position Mr. Ogilvie occupied, he must take either one or other of the two positions. In the first place, he was a director of this bank, and, as a director, and, I think, president, he should have been thoroughly posted with regard to its affairs—he should have known the exact position in which it stood. If he did not know that he did not efficiently discharge his duties; if he did know it, he made representations whereby he got $300,000 and did a very imprudent and dishonest thing. In either case he was not discharging his duty properly to the bank, or else he was deceiving the Finance Minister. I would say, in this connection, that I am sorry to think that owing to losses of this kind, owing to increased demands upon our Treasury, owing to the fact that money is spent in many ways and frittered away in directions we should avoid, the Finance Minister, a few days ago, when he delivered his Budget Speech, was under the necessity of increasing the duties of some very important articles that enter into the every-day use of the laboring classes. He has added 5 per cent. on winceys, an article which is used by the laboring classes, the farmers and mechanics of this country, very largely, and simply, because it is necessary to provide for losses of this kind. It is unfortunate, when the people's burthens have been increased so largely, that money should be thrown away and literally lost, as it has been by the advances made to this bank. There was some reference made to the letter of President Simpson, by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White). That letter has on many occasions been brought up to do service to the Conservative party. I have no desire to detain the House by referring to some things to which I could refer, and which would not be very creditable to hon. gentlemen opposite. The Pacific Railway scandal was not very creditable to them; and that to which the hon. gentleman referred stands as far back as the Pacific scandal. If they have the right to quote the one we have the right to quote the other. There is nothing in connection with the political history of the country that reflects so severely upon the transactions of hon. gentlemen opposite as that particular affair. I say they should hesitate before going back and referring to those old questions, because I contend that unfortunate and disgraceful transaction, the Pacific scandal, was a thousand times worse, and I say that years after this, when hon. gentlemen opposite shall have left the active stage of life, their memory will not be forgotten, owing to acts of that kind. The hon. member for Cardwell can well afford to defend the Government and the Finance Minister on an occasion of this kind. That hon. gentleman receives annually a very handsome sum, paid to the institution with which he is connected.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, I shall not refer to that matter. I shall not further detain the House. I simply wanted to give expression to my feelings on this subject. I do so honestly and earnestly, and I feel it my duty now and always to condemn the Government—I care not what

Mr. McMULLEN.

Government it be—that will make reckless and unadvised advances of this kind. I will always consider it my duty to condemn acts of this kind, by which the people of this country are called upon to submit to loss that otherwise they would not be called upon to sustain.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not desire to protract the debate, but some things have been said, and very foolishly said, with respect to a matter in which I am personally concerned, and on which I have a few words to say before this question is disposed of. In the first place, I may say that I regret to find that I disturbed to so great an extent the equanimity of the Finance Minister. All I have to say to that hon. gentleman is, that really I have, under the circumstances, treated him as leniently as I could be expected to. If the hon. gentleman only knew all that I could say on this subject, all that I can say is, as Lord Clive, in olden days said, he would be very much astonished at my own moderation. However, my object is not so much to refer to what the Finance Minister said. I am quite ready that what I said and his reply should go together to the country; but my object is to say I fear the hon. gentleman is not going to be much longer with us, and I am sorry to find that I have exercised such a disturbing influence on his mind, and when he goes I may say I wish him well. The other matter I have to refer to is, the unfortunate allusion made by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) to the affairs of the late Commercial Bank of Canada. Now, if the hon. member for Cardwell knew all that I know about the secret history of the Commercial Bank, he would have gone a very long way out of his way to avoid alluding to that matter. A little knowledge is a dangerous thing, particularly about transactions which took place seventeen years ago. I could, if I pleased, make a statement that would not be pleasant about the secret history of the downfall of the Commercial Bank; but I may tell the House at once that I fully recognise that there are obligations laid on men who have occupied the position I have occupied, and I would not be justified in using knowledge I then acquired, at any rate in reply to attacks made by the hon. member for Cardwell. If gentlemen who sat on the board of the Commercial Bank with me, have any charge to make against me; if my own brother director who sits opposite where I stand has any charge to make against me, then I shall be prepared here or elsewhere—and I think the House knows I am able and willing generally to defend myself—to go from first to last into the history of the Commercial Bank, to state the immediate cause, the remote cause, and the more proximate causes of its downfall. It is not my intention to do that, unless he first should desire it or call upon me to do so. He has never, knowing the facts, ventured to bring any charge against me. I do not think he will venture to bring any charge to-night. He was for a long time connected with that bank. He had good opportunities for knowing. The relations between myself and that gentleman have been, to say the least of it, a little strained for a few years past, and I do not think that the First Minister—never that I have seen, never that I have heard in this House—has ventured to say anything as to my connection with the Commercial Bank of Canada. Now, he, knowing the facts, has not ventured to make any of the insinuations which the member for Cardwell has ventured to make. I will simply say this to the House; seventeen years have gone, many persons, who, as well as myself, were intimately acquainted with these affairs, are dead; I do not like, even in my own defence, to bring up things which might affect the memories of those dead men, or might be unpleasant to their children; but I will tell the hon. member for Cardwell this, first of all, I took the chair thrice after the suspension of the Commercial Bank, in the bank parlor of the Commercial Bank, with the shareholders angry and disappointed before me. Not one single soul there ever dared to question my conduct, and for the best of all reasons, that not one single soul among them had any charge to prefer or any evidence to bring against me. More than that, the Commercial Bank of Canada cost no man a penny. Its depositors, its note holders, everyone who had a claim upon it, was paid in full to the last farthing, and if it be true that Mr. King, the then president of the Bank of Montreal, declared, in a letter which the hon. gentleman read, that that bank was insolvent, Mr. King's act was strongly contradictory of Mr. King's letter, because I was present when Mr. King offered an exceedingly large sum for the assets of the Commercial Bank, and undertook to pay all its liabilities besides. The affairs of the Commercial Bank really came to grief, not from the cause that Mr. King, who did not know so much about them after all, assigned, but from this very simple cause that, unfortunately, and in opposition to my direct instructions and to the instructions of the board, too, one of the gentlemen who was charged with the management of the bank, not for several years, but for a few weeks before its downfall, weakened the reserves and resources which had been brought together, as the bank returns in yonder library would show, by my express direction and order, acting in conjunction with the other members of the board, and foreseeing that there would be a run in consequence of the reduction of our capital. I think the First Minister's memory is good enough to enable him, if he chooses, to recollect that fact. At all events, whether he does or does not, I could prove it even from the Gazette returns, and I have plenty of other modes of proof. I do not, as I said, choose or intend, on any challenge from the member for Cardwell, who knows nothing about the facts of the case, to go into the secret history of the Commercial Bank of Canada; but, if I am challenged by any one who knows, I will be always prepared to justify my conduct, at any rate, to the fullest possible extent. I am going to say no more to-night than this, that I think that every action that was taken by the First Minister at that time in his capacity of First Minister only goes to show clearly and distinctly how perfectly correct was that advice of his which I read but lately from the Hansard of a few days ago, laying down and defining what a wise and prudent Finance Minister should do under the circumstances, and precisely what he did himself in conjunction with his former Finance Minister, Sir Alexander Galt, and precisely what the present Finance Minister did not attend to in one particular in this unfortunate transaction.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not intend to take any part in this debate, because, in the first place, early in it my colleague, the Finance Minister, had, in my opinion, fully stated the case of the Government, the case of himself as Finance Minister, and of the Government who supported him in everything he has done, and I only rise now in consequence of the gentleman's having alluded to the Commercial Bank. I have brought no charge against him, but he seems to throw out the suggestion that I would be afraid to bring a charge against him. I absolve him, on my account, from any secrecy, as far as I am concerned.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you bring any charge?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I bring no charge, but, if he wishes to bring any charge or to insinuate any against me, I give him full permission to bring it. Mr. Speaker, I am highly complimented in having my words of wisdom, apparently, quoted with such approbation by hon. gentlemen opposite. It is not often that they honor me in that way, but, though perhaps my self-conceit has been raised by the smiles of approbation I have got from the other side, I honestly think that, if they read my speeches oftener and took advice more readily from me, they would not make such continual mistakes as they are doing, they would have remained in office longer, and they would get back to office sooner. But they will not take it. Like the old American democracy—they have succeeded at last, after twenty years exclusion from office, and perhaps after twenty years the hon. gentlemen may learn wisdom from experience; but the old democracy failed by making mistakes, and the republicans remained in office, not so much by their own strength as by the mistakes of their opponents—as long as the Grit democracy makes the same mistakes we will remain in office, much, I believe, to the satisfaction and benefit of this great Dominion of ours. The hon. gentleman in his speech, in which he enlivened a very dry subject, a matter of account, a matter of financial relations with a bank, with certain jokes, carefully prepared and well delivered, as he always does, stated among other things that we were bound to support the Finance Minister, that the majority in this House were bound to support the Finance Minister, and if an angel from heaven came it would not alter the opinions of the majority in this House. Well, I do not know what might be done if an angel from Heaven came, but if a fallen angel comes, he cannot expect that we should accept his views—fallen from the high estate he held before, and weltering in the Grit slough. But the hon. gentleman and his leader both said, and especially the leader, with respect to my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Ives)—the leader of the Opposition said, in rather discourteous and unparliamentary phrase, that he acted servilely and subserviently, that he was looking for office, and that it was in order to be Minister of Railways or to fill some other office of that kind that he made that speech. Now, that was out of order, and in strictness you, Sir, should have called him to order, though he is the leader of the Opposition. He has no right to impute motives or to make such charges. It was unparliamentary, and the hon. gentleman is inexcusable for doing so. He should show an example to the House, as the leader of a great party, and hoping one day to be the leader of the majority of this House, instead of descending to personal attack, which is too much his habit. When he has not the courage to assert, he has always the malice to insinuate. Supposing the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe had taken the same course. The hon. gentleman says that my hon. friend from Richmond is anxious to get into the Government. Who is more anxious to get into the Government than the hon. gentleman himself, caring not whether he rides over friend or foe in order to get there. Whether it is the Minister of Finance or the First Minister, or the member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), he cares not whom he rides over or tramples down, so that he rattles his unscythed car over the body of anyone and everyone in order to get the most coveted position which I hold at this moment. And he is the man to get up here and sneer at my hon. friend when he gave a clear and logical argument addressed to the subject before the House, without one irrelevant word. He is not the man to charge motives to anybody, especially when he charges my hon. friend from Cardwell (Mr. White) and my hon. friend from Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) with an over-anxiety to get office. He is the last man in this country who ought to attempt to make any such allusion, or assertion, or insinuation against any member of Parliament. The hon. member who moved this motion said, when he spoke, that not even an angel from Heaven could convert the majority of this House. Oh, says he, I make a mistake; perhaps the House might be converted, or the Government might be converted if an angel came from No. 8. There is no man in this House who was more anxious to get into No. 8 than the hon. gentleman. There is no man, being a guardian angel or a fallen angel, who would try harder to get into confidence of the gentlemen who assemble in No. 8. But they know when they are well off,

The little Garden of Eden is not going to allow any serpent to creep in among them, and the hon. gentleman must be satisfied to take the Mount Pisgah view of the beautiful plains that lie before them on this side of the House.

Mr. BLAKE. They have a tempter of their own in that Garden of Eden.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A tempter; yes, I dare say they have a tempter, but they do not try to seduce the hon. gentleman. I do not think the blandishment of any hon. member on this side will be put forth in the vain attempt of making the hon. gentleman a Conservative in principle, a Conservative in standing, a Conservative in object. We must leave him out in utter darkness, and there, Mr. Speaker, he will stay. Now, Sir, I have only one thing more to say, and it is, that this motion ought not, in my opinion, in fairness or in common propriety, to have been made. The hon. gentleman had moved it last Session, he had moved it for the purpose of eliciting a direct vote of want of confidence in the Government, a direct censure on the Finance Minister. He ought to have been satisfied with that. This is a second motion, and is simply a proof of faction. That is not the kind of warfare which is conducted in England; that is not the kind of way in which the two parties fight each other there. We had this matter discussed last Session. The whole circumstances connected with the loan to the Exchange Bank were ventilated, and a vote was taken. The hon. gentleman could not hope to get a reversal of that vote this Session. It is a waste of time to attempt it, and Parliament and the country will feel that it is a waste of time in bringing up this motion a second time.

FRIDAY, 6th March, 1885.

PRAYERS.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Order, House again in Committee of Ways and Means, (Sir Leonard Tilley.)

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). In rising, Sir, to continue the debate upon the motion that you do leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, I desire to say that I think the debate might very fairly, if both sides would agree to it, be left precisely where it stands at this moment. We have had from the hon. Finance Minister a speech as able as it was exhaustive, a speech than which, I believe, no better has ever been delivered from the Ministerial benches on a similar occasion in Canada, and which embodied as complete a statement of the financial and industrial position of this country as could very well be embodied in any statement of the kind. We have had as a reply to that a speech from the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), who speaks for the Opposition, in matters of this kind, with some degree of authority, which, I think, even his own friends will admit, was hardly equal to the reputation which he deservedly possesses as an able debater. If one may judge of the speech—if one may use, in fact, the concluding sentence of the speech as a commentary on the speech itself—the hon. gentleman unfortunately indulged in those extravagances of statement which, I think, impair very greatly, the effect of what otherwise might be useful statements in relation to public affairs, and which certainly, so far as we are concerned on this side of the House, do not make his speeches, as a rule, very dangerous to us. Sir, let me ask you what will be thought, what can be thought, of an hon. gentleman with the responsibility that rests on that hon. gentleman as an ex-Finance Minister, who, after three hours of discussion of the affairs of the country, concluded in these words:

"I say this in conclusion, and I say it, not as a matter of rhetorical statement, but as a simple matter of fact, capable of mathematical demonstration, that I believe to-day, if we sat down and counted the cost, we would find that this country has lost more in six years of evil Government relatively to its population and its resources than the people of the United States did in the four years of desperate civil war which immediately preceded the formation of our Confederation."

It does seem to me, Sir, that an hon. gentleman who approaches a discussion of the affairs of this country, of its financial and industrial position, holding the view which is embodied in the words which I have just quoted, puts himself out of court altogether as a reasonable authority upon the questions with which we have to deal in a discussion of this kind. The hon. gentleman commenced by telling us that he proposed to deal in some disagreeable truths. He commenced by telling us that he anticipated that possibly from this side of the House he would be charged as unpatriotic because of the statements he was about to make; but influenced, like one of Gilbert's creations, with that terrible sense of duty, being in fact the slave of duty, he thought it necessary to tell the truth, whatever might be the result to the country, or, in fact, to himself. Well, so far as I am concerned, I do not think this country has anything to fear from the truth. I believe that the truth fairly told, I believe that the truth fully told, told without mitigation, without concealment of any fact, will not injure but benefit the country. But the hon. gentlemen, under the guise of truth commence their statements by the declaration that they are overwhelmed with a sense of the duty attaching to them to tell the truth, and then deliberately proceed to make statements which, to say the least of them, would not, in any other place but Parliament, be entitled to be called truth. We may fairly conclude that the hon. gentleman who makes such statements to the prejudice of his country is not entitled to any great consideration, and is certainly not in a position to set himself up as being influenced simply by his sense of duty to the country. The hon. gentleman on this, as on former occasions, dealt with the question of the population of Canada, and it does seem to me that it is very greatly to be regretted that we should find ourselves, on almost every occasion when this debate arises, or similar debates arise, compelled to defend the country against statements, which, if they were true, even in part, it would not be necessary at any rate to parade on every possible occasion; but which, as I shall show in a moment, are not only not correct even in part, but are so absurdly incorrect that the hon. gentleman who presents them to the House can hardly be credited in courtesy with believing them himself. The hon. gentleman reiterated here the statement which he made with regard to the loss of population to Canada in a memorable speech in Montreal. On that occasion he elaborated his figures more than he ventured to do yesterday; but as he took the full responsibility for them, I shall take occasion to refer to them, and I think I will be able to convince even the hon. gentleman opposite that they are not entitled to the credit which he would desire they should obtain. The hon. gentleman admits that from 1840 to 1861, the country made considerable progress. He gave the figures of the census in 1840 as 987,000; those by the census of 1851 as 1,842,000, and of 1861, 2,507,000, which figures, he admitted, showed a very rapid increase indeed. And having made that admission, he started for the purposes of his discussion with the census of 1861. The population of the old Provinces in 1861, he said, was 3,200,000; the net increase of births over deaths, or the natural increase, he said, ought to have been 2,000,000; that is, that the population, without the addition of any immigration, should have been 5,200,000, or an increase of $62\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. How he obtained that $62\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. as the basis of his calculation I shall show in a moment or two, but that is the basis—and I want hon. gentlemen to remember it—of the increase which he has taken in all of his calculations, and upon which he has ventured to say that this country, so far from progressing, has steadily lost in population. He went on to say that the immigrants settled in Canada during those 20 years numbered 499,562, that the natural increase of the immigrants would be 210,000, or a little over 42 per cent.; and the curious thing is that in order to make that increase he assumes that the whole 499,562 immigrants were here at the commencement of the 20 years, and that that increase has been going on ever since. Why, those immigrants have been coming in during those twenty years, year by year, the larger part of them practically during recent years, and to talk therefore of an increase of 42 per cent., the natural increase over a period of 20 years on those 499,000 persons, as if they had all been here at the commencement of that period, will, I think, show the carelessness at any rate with which he has made up his calculations. Upon those calculations, however, he comes to this conclusion, that the population in 1861 was 3,200,000, that the natural increase in 20 years should be 2,000,000, that the immigrants who came into the country were 499,562, that the natural increase in relation to them should be 210,000—making a total of 5,909,562. Then the census, as stated by the hon. gentleman, gave 4,242,000, and he finds therefore that there has been a decrease in the population of this country, or rather that the population of this country is in fact 1,667,562 less than it should have been if we had not lost greatly from our population by immigration from the country. Now let us look at the figures in the light of the census of the United States. The Canadians in the United States, and I think I may fairly say our friends on the other side of the line are not apt to understate the case, the Canadians in the United States in 1860 were 249,970; in 1870 they had increased to 476,572; and in 1880 they had increased to 710,585. Now, the latter two periods are, for the purposes of this discussion, the only important ones, as the people represented by the first figures were in the United States, at the time the hon. gentleman selected as the starting point in his calculation. You deduct, therefore, this 249,970, or, in round figures, 250,000 people from the population, and then if you add the natural increment to the remainder, by the ratio used in the United States census, which, I think, is not an unfair calculation, you will find that the Canadians in the United States, going there since 1861, and by the natural increase to them since that time, would number 758,637. Now how would the case stand? The comparison would stand thus: According to the hon. gentleman's calculation the loss to Canada is 1,667,562, but the actual loss, as shown by the American census of Canadians in the United States, giving the natural increase to those persons according to the scale established by the American census, was 758,637. So that there is an exaggeration at the very outset of the hon. gentleman's statement, against this, his own country, of 908,925; that is to say that, in order to establish the statement which he made, there ought to be no less than 900,000 more Canadians in the United States than the census of the United States assumes to be there. I leave it to the hon. gentleman to discover where these 900,000 people have gone. Then there is another thing which ought to be taken into account. Although I suppose these persons would be regarded as part of the general immigration, it is well just at this point to state the fact that there have been persons coming from the United States to Canada as well as persons going from Canada to the United States. According to the census of 1880 in the United States and the census of 1881 here, while there were 14 Canadians to each 1,000 in the United States, there were 18 Americans to each 1,000 in Canada, so that after all there has been a fair interchange of the courtesies of visitation between the peoples of the two countries during that period. But the hon. gentleman carried his calculation still further. When he was speaking in Montreal, in November, 1884, he said that Canada had at the outside, exclusive of Indians, a population of barely 4,400,000, while it ought to have had 6,700,000, making a loss, according to the hon. gentleman, of 2,300,000 persons, or an additional loss in the last four years of no less than 700,000. That is, that our loss had increased, according to the hon. gentleman's statement, between 1880 and 1884, by no less than 700,000 persons. Now, on the same basis of calculation, which I presented before, we have the loss calculated by the hon. gentleman, 2,300,000; the loss according to the United States census, 836,404, so that we have an exaggeration on the part of the hon. gentleman, according to that method of calculation, the correctness of which I venture to say cannot be successfully impugned, of 1,463,596, or in round numbers an exaggeration of a million and a half. We have an opportunity of knowing something, during the last few years at any rate, from statistics that cannot be very well questioned, as to what has been the movement of the population between the United States and Canada. The Department of Agriculture, I believe, have obtained from the Grand Trunk Railway audit office a statement of the actual number of passengers going out and coming in at the different points at which the line crosses the frontier. So that, so far as that railway is concerned at any rate, we have in these figures a tolerably accurate statement of the difference between the income and the outgo of the people between the United States and Canada. What do we find? For the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1883, the net total number of passengers from Canada to the United States, excluding through passengers, by the Grand Trunk Railway system was 187,935; the total number of passengers from the United States to Canada, excluding again European immigrants simply passing through the United States to Canada, was 192,627, or a net gain to Canada, according to the official statement of the audit office of the Grand Trunk Railway, of 4,692 persons. Then, if you take the last fiscal year ending June 30th, 1884, you will find that from Canada to the United States the number of persons, again excluding European passengers, was 201,931, while the net total number of passengers from the United States to Canada, excluding in the same way those who came through from Europe, was 204,838, or a net gain to Canada of 2,907 persons, or in round numbers 3,000. Now, these figures may or may not be absolutely accurate. We have possibly as good a test in regard to their accuracy as it is possible to get, from the fact that they have come from the audit office of a railway corporation which has not, I am bound to say, shown itself much interested in building up either this Government or this country during recent years; and we have a statement from that audit office which shows, at least, that there has been no such loss of population by persons going from Canada into the United States as would at all justify the statements made by the hon. gentleman. Then we may take another way. We may take the immigrants from the United States, some of them returned Canadians, some of them Americans coming to settle in Canada—and you will find Americans in every town in Canada, in all the manufacturing centres in Canada you will find American workmen who have come to find employment here just as you will find Canadian workmen who have gone to find employment there—and if we take the entries of settlers' effects, we shall find that in 1879 the settlers who entered their effects at the Custom house, and so registered themselves as people coming to settle in Canada, were 9,775; in 1880, they were 10,961; in 1881, 15,404; in 1882, 30,554; in 1883, 34,987; and in 1884, 35,891. I think that will show that there has been a steady increase in the number of persons coming from the United States to Canada to settle, and yet, in spite of those figures, which the hon. gentleman could have got without any trouble if he had been anxious simply to tell the exact truth in relation to this matter, he has ventured to base his whole argument upon the supposition that a much larger and a continuing larger outflow is going from Canada into the United States. There is no doubt whatever that during the last 30 years a good many Canadians have gone to the United States. Nobody doubts it; nobody denies it; nobody can question it. There have been reasons for it, and reasons are of a very simple character. If you go, for instance, to the great lumber regions of Michigan, you find a number of Canadians who have gone there to work in the lumber shanties and the saw mills. That is an industry with which they have been acquainted here, and they have gone in great numbers, to find employment which they could not find here. Then, in the industries of New England, an incentive has been offered to a great many Canadians to find employment in those manufactories, and there have been still greater inducements in the great prairie lands of the American north-west which were opened long before our prairie lands, in our North-West, were open to settlement, and which annually attracted large numbers of persons not only from Canada but from the old States of the Union as well, who have gone there to settle. All these inducements proved attractive to the people of the Eastern States, and those States have suffered in quite as great a degree as Canada. Now, Sir, I come to what seems to be a crucial test of the unfairness of the hon. gentleman's mode of calculation upon this subject. He has assumed 62½ per cent. as what should be the natural increase for 20 years, irrespective of immigration altogether, and he has based his entire calculation as to the loss of population to Canada upon that figure. Now, what is the fact? We find, for instance, that the decennial increase in the United States was as follows:—

From 1830 to 1840.....	32·67
“ 1840 to 1850.....	35·87
“ 1850 to 1860.....	35·58
“ 1860 to 1870.....	22·63
“ 1870 to 1880.....	30·07

Making an average decennial increase of 31·36, or, for 20 years, 62·72. The hon. gentleman takes 62½, but he did not take the trouble to remember that this increase in the United States was not the natural increase of the people.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why don't you take 1790 to 1810, when the population was the same?

Mr. WHITE. Well, if the hon. gentleman chooses to go back to those dates he is at liberty to do so, but I think he will find that the argument in relation to the natural increase will be precisely the same as the argument here. Now, when I find that the United States show an increase of the population, during twenty years, of 62·72, and that the hon. gentleman has taken as a reasonable basis for the natural increase of Canada, and as the basis of his entire calculation, an increase of 62·50, I have a right to assume, at any rate, that it is upon that he has made his calculation. But he has ignored altogether the fact that that increase of 62·72 in the United States for the twenty years actually included the immigration as well as the natural increase, and therefore was not a fair test to apply to this matter at all. The United States have increased during that time from various causes, from the annexation of territory, and in other ways, but whatever the increase was, the figures I have given cover the whole increase and not the natural increase alone. Now, Sir, another way of testing the absurdly exaggerated character of the hon. gentleman's figures is to take the increases in the United States as they are stated. From 1860 to 1870 the increase in the United States was 22·63, and of that 15·38 was put down as the natural increase, and 7·25 as the increase from immigration. From 1870 to 1880 the whole increase was 30·07; the natural increase being put down as 22·78, and the increase from immigration at 7·29. Now, Sir, apply these figures to the population of Canada, and what do we find? The population in 1861 was 3,200,000 and the natural increase from 1871 would be 492,160 and the increase from immigration would be 242,000, making a population in 1871 of 3,934,160. Then take the actual increase in 1881, of 896,202 and from immigration of 286,801, and taking the figures of the United States and applying them to Canada, the population of this country in 1881 would be 5,117,163.

But the actual population by the census was 4,324,810, or a loss by the calculation of this standard of 793,353. But the hon. gentleman states that the loss during that period was 1,667,563, showing a mistake in the direction of exaggeration of 874,209. Now, Sir, how do we stand—for I think after all that is a fair way to look at this question—in relation to the tolerably prosperous eastern States of the Union? I take the State of Massachusetts which, I think, the hon. gentleman will admit is a tolerably prosperous State, probably the most prosperous of the New England States, in which is found a very large number of French Canadians, for a great many French Canadians who have gone from Canada have gone into Massachusetts. We find that the increase in population of that State between 1860 and 1880 was 18 per cent. We find that some other of the New England States as well as Canada, are subject to the same process of emigration to the Western States, particularly into newer fields. We find in some of them, as in New Hampshire, Maine, and Vermont that there was scarcely any increase whatever, and I believe in one of those States during one decennial period there was an actual decrease. Now, the increase of population in Canada in the same period was 36·3. On the other hand, in the same period, Dakota showed a gain of 193 per cent., Kansas, 239 per cent., Minnesota, 155 per cent., and Illinois, 48 per cent. Then Sir, if I take the State of New York, which is called the Empire State of the Union, with its large urban population, with the enormous growth of population in the cities of Brooklyn, New York and other great cities of that State, what do we find? If you take the State of New York according to the principle laid down by the hon. gentleman, and when he asked me to go back to 1790 I point him to the State of New York, which, standing alone, at any rate, offers a fair comparison—if you take that State, and apply the hon. gentleman's method of calculation, adding for 20 years 62½ per cent. as the natural increase, the population should be 6,306,625; but the actual population by the census was only 5,083,000, or a loss in population to the State of New York, according to the method he has applied to Canada, of no less than 1,223,625. If to that is added the immigration and its increases, as the hon. gentleman did in the case of Canada, we have 750,000 more, and the loss in that case would be in the State of New York, applying the same method of calculation that the hon. gentleman has applied to Canada, 1,973,625. Now, Sir, that is 300,000 more than the hon. gentleman, in his wildest flight of imagination, says was the loss to Canada. The actual facts of the comparison are these, as ascertained by the census, which we may fairly assume to be correct: that the State of New York increased in 20 years 1,202,000, or 30·97, while Canada increased 36·03, or one-fifth more than the State of New York. I do not think it is unsatisfactory when you come to remember that down to 1881 we scarcely had a North-West in the sense of an attractive territory to which settlers could go, when we were only beginning to open it up, to offer inducements to people to go there by means of the construction of railways through that territory, that Canada, with all the attractions which the Western States had to offer, with all the attractions which the industrial policy of the United States had to offer, taking our people from this country to the other side, still increased one-fifth more than the great State of New York. Yet the hon. gentlemen, for the purpose of injuring this Government—although how this Government is going to be injured by the fact that we have lost population since 1861, I cannot very well see—undertook to state that there has been a loss to Canada. The hon. gentleman, however, went on to another process of argument. He took the school population, and he asked us to believe that the population as there stated is absolutely correct. I hold in my hands the report of the Minister of Education of the Province of Ontario for 1884, and as the hon.

gentleman made his statement in November, 1884, I have a right to assume that this is the book from which he took his figures. Yet on the very threshold of his enquiry, if he had chosen to read it, in the very first report of an inspector published in this book, what do we find?

"The average number of days the schools have been kept open is 207·8, or one-fourth less than for 1881. The number of pupils 5 to 16 years of age enrolled is 5,215, or 24 less than the previous year. It is to be noticed that trustees' returns made the number of pupils resident December, 1882, 423 less than at the same date the previous year. Considering that the number of students enrolled in 1881 was 581 less than the number returned as resident, and that for 1882 the number enrolled approaches within 182 of those resident, I cannot but think that the census has been defective, and that there are more than 5,397 children residents in the county."

That is the statement from the very first report of the inspector in the very volume which the hon. gentleman has taken for the purpose of using the figures, declared by that inspector to be inaccurate, to be notoriously inaccurate; that is the report of the inspector which the hon. gentleman met at the very threshold of his enquiry; and yet he was bound by his sense of duty, by that overwhelming disposition to tell the truth and nothing but the truth, to ignore that statement and take those figures as if they were absolutely correct, although I may fairly say that they bear evidence in the very character of the figures themselves of being anything but correct. Taking those school figures, what do we find? The school population between five and sixteen years in 1874 was 511,603, in 1878, 492,360, or a decrease from 1874 to 1878 of 19,243. In 1883 the number was 478,791, or a decrease of 13,565. So that the average yearly decrease from 1874 to 1878, according to the figures which the hon. gentleman relies upon, was 4,811, while the average yearly decrease from 1878 to 1883 was 2,714, showing a smaller annual average decrease during the latter period than during the former. The hon. gentleman was in office during the whole of the former period. Whoever then thought of taking up the school statistics for the purpose of injuring the hon. gentleman even at the risk of injuring the country, or whoever attached any importance to those statistics, as showing that this country was not reasonably progressing?

Mr. MILLS. What figures were appealed to?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Certainly not these school figures. We knew they were inaccurate—they bore inaccuracy on the face of them. No one could look at the figures without knowing they were inaccurate. Look at the figures and see how they stand. Take the town of Belleville. We have the number returned for four years as 2,610 each year, not one more and not one less. That one fact, together with the report of the inspector, ought to have taught the hon. gentleman that this was not a very safe weapon for him to use in order to show that our population is diminishing. Take the city of London. I find that for three years, 1881-82-83, 4,900 was the exact figure, neither one more nor one less. Then I find St. Catharines had a little bit of an increase, a slight change. In 1880-81-82 there were 2,500 for each of those years, neither one more nor one less; but in 1883 there was an increase of 60—exactly 60. But I will not detain the House with going through this list of figures. If you take towns that are familiar to all of us, you find similar inaccuracies. Take Peterborough, which has been growing rapidly and is an important railway and industrial centre, and what do we find by these figures? We find that they show 1,950 in 1880, 1,800 in 1881; the number went up to 2,000 in 1882; and in 1883 the number was 2,000 still, exactly the same figure, neither one more nor one less. I might go through the whole of the figures and show that on the face of them they bear the evidence of being utterly unreliable as a basis on which a fair calculation could be made as to the movement of population in Canada. Then I take another point with respect to them. If you take the municipal statistics, to which the hon. gentleman attaches some importance, what do we find? Take the municipal statistics and the school statistics for 1878-79-80-81-82-83—I will not trouble the House with reading them—and what do we find? According to the municipal statistics the population of the Province increased during those years 64,341, while, according to the Minister of Education, the school population decreased 13,596 during the same period. It is certainly remarkable that so far as the school statistics are concerned the same fact is apparent in the United States as here. In nearly every State of the Union you find that while the population has increased there has been a decrease, apparently, in the school population. For instance, in Connecticut there has been an increase in the population in six years of 51,000, and a decrease in the school population of 8,000. In Illinois there has been an increase in population of 161,400, and a decrease in pupils of 9,238. In Tennessee there was an increase in population in two years of 56,800, and an apparent decrease in the school children, according to the school returns, of 25,785. Take the great State of New York; there has been an increase in the population during those ten years of 700,000, according to the census, while there has been an actual decrease, so far as school returns are concerned, during the same period, of 6,820. The whole of the statistics, both in the United States and Ontario, show that the school returns—and I do not say that as attaching any fraudulent blame to any person connected with them—almost from the incident connected with the collection of these statistics, are utterly unreliable as a basis of calculation in connection with the population of the country. The hon. gentleman assumes that we have lost population. It is rather a remarkable thing that in certain portions of the country—I take Ontario and Quebec particularly—there has been a remarkable increase in the population. I think we may lay it down as almost an axiom, in dealing with the movements of population, that in the rural districts, in the agricultural parts of the country, as the country gets pretty well settled, the population becomes practically stationary. The increase will be found in the urban and suburban populations within those districts, but so far as the agricultural portion is concerned the population does not show any great increase. But where you will find the increase is in the newer districts of the country, to which the young people and even the old people remove themselves, to find in them an opportunity to devote their enterprise and industry to building up homes for themselves. We have had that going on at all times in Canada in the newer districts of the country—in the county of Huron, in the county of Bruce and now it is going on in Muskoka, and Algoma, and in many places in the Province of Quebec I am happy to say the same kind of thing has begun to go on. Take, for instance, the district of Saguenay and Chicoutimi; according to the censuses of 1871 and 1881 the increase in that district was 68 per cent., and I believe that if the people of Quebec are successful in the enterprise they have in hand, the Lake St. John Railway, the population will show a much larger increase at the next census than it did at the last. There is in that country at the head of the Saguenay, as it is said by those who know it, almost a new—North-West, I was going to say—but, at any rate, a great north, almost equal to the great North-West for agricultural and other purposes. Take the county of Ottawa; I find that the increase there has been far in excess of the general increase of the country. Twenty-nine per cent. was the increase, and there, too, as these new railways go on, as those settlements increase, which are happily going in at this moment under the direction of the Rev. Curé Labelle and other persons, we will find that a large number of people will go and settle in those newer parts of the country, which before were looked upon as uninhabitable and utterly useless, except perhaps for raising timber. Take again Muskoka, in the Province of Ontario; I find that from 1871 to 1881 the population of Muskoka increased 400 per cent. I find that in North Renfrew, where there is a large district opening up for settlement, the increase was 51 per cent. I find that in South Renfrew the increase was 36 per cent.; North Simcoe, 46 per cent.; Algoma, 189 per cent. And, Mr. Speaker, it is rather a remarkable thing that while we have here hon. gentlemen telling us that the population is not increasing, their friends in the Legislature at Toronto—so convinced are they of the enormous movement of population to the Algoma district—have actually introduced a Bill for the purpose of giving an additional member to Algoma, and they have made use of that fact to effect a Gerrymander system—

Mr. MILLS. No.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Who says no?

Mr. CHARLTON. No.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). All I can say is, that in my own constituency of Cardwell nobody will recognise it as it is fixed up now, with the simple object, and none other, of giving Mr. Chisholm a safe seat in Peel, which he would certainly have lost if the conditions had remained the same as they now are. For the object of possibly securing one safe seat in Simcoe we find that we are given for the Local—and I am not sorry that Cardwell is to be made a good constituency—a majority of some 400 and odd, when before we had only 40, after very hard fighting. But I say that these gentlemen have in Ontario, for the mere purpose—because that is the pretence—of giving an additional member to Algoma, indicated the fact of their belief in the enormous growth of population in that district, and for the purpose of giving this additional member they have introduced this remarkable Gerrymandering Bill, which, I am bound to say, utterly puts to shame any efforts made in this House in the way of a redistribution of seats, and which, Mr. Speaker, will entitle—not the hon. gentleman in this House, of course—but the Liberal party, to continue to deserve the name which was given to them some years ago by one who knew them well—of the party of organized hypocrisy. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman objected very much to immigration. He told us immigration should, practically be stopped. He said, in fact, that to invite immigrants into this country was simply to bring people here who could only get food by depriving some native-born Canadian of his means of livelihood. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am a native-born Canadian, and I am proud of it; but I am bound to say this: my father was not a native-born Canadian, and I am not going to say here, that because he was not a native of this country he was not just as good as if he had been born here. This country has been made by people who came from the old world; it is being made now by the sons of those who came from the old world, and this attempt to organise a know-nothing club in Canada, and to declare that no man shall have a position in this country unless he happens to be a native-born Canadian, no matter how long he may have resided here, and to do so in the interests of persons who have largely come to the country within a comparatively few years, is a policy which I venture to think will not meet with much sympathy outside. Now, what has been the conduct of the hon. gentleman's friends and himself when he was in office? I think we may fairly say that in those days the condition of the labor market was certainly as depressed, to say the least, as it is at the present moment. In 1877 the number who came into Canada, the number who were encouraged to come to Canada by the efforts of hon. gentlemen opposite, through their agencies on the other side, was 27,076; in 1878 it was 29,080, and a remarkable feature with regard to that immigration is as to its character. Only at Quebec was there a classification of immigrants, according to occupation and nationality, but I think we may fairly assume that that classification at Quebec will apply pretty well over the whole volume of the immigration. Now in 1877, as I have said, 27,076 immigrants came into the country. Of the number of those who were registered at Quebec, a large proportion were laborers, and I do not think the condition of the labor market in Canada in 1877 was any better than it is to-day. Of the total registered number in that year, 1,118 were mechanics, and I am quite sure that there was not a greater amount of employment for mechanics in that year than there exists at present; and of these two classes of the immigrants which came into Canada, under the auspices of hon. gentlemen opposite, no less than 91½ per cent. were of the very classes as to which last year they were moving resolutions objecting to their immigration, and as to which they are now asking questions, in the direction of excluding them from Canada altogether. Then if you take the year 1878, I find that there were 2,839 laborers and 879 mechanics, or, of the classes objected to by hon. gentlemen now, there were 92 per cent. of the entire classified immigration that came into the country. Well, Sir, I think in the face of that, these hon. gentlemen are hardly in a position to say that this Government has dealt in any sense unfairly with the great working classes of the country in their efforts to encourage immigration into Canada. Sir, we have some illustrations of what the condition of this matter was in these two periods, as indicating, at any rate, that there has been no special reason why an immigration policy which was considered good in 1877 and 1878, should be considered so very bad in 1884. Here, for instance, is a statement of the average rate of wages paid in the Dominion in 1878 and in 1884; and these returns, I may say, are obtained from the agents of the Department of Agriculture in all the cities of Canada where there are agents: Farm laborers, in 1878, got from $10 to $20 a month with board; in 1884 they got from $15 to $22 per month with board. Common laborers, in 1878, had from 80 cents to $1 a day; in 1884 they have been getting from $1 to $1.75 per day. Female domestics, in 1878, were getting from $5 to $6 a month; in 1884 they have been getting from $6 to $12 a month; and so far as mechanics are concerned, although there is no statement made, I think we may fairly assume that the rate of wages for mechanics will run substantially upon the same lines as the rate for laborers. We have, Sir, another fact which gives a very strong indication of what the rate of wages at these two periods was—I mean the rate of wages paid in the lumber woods. That is a matter which anyone can test for himself. In 1878, according to the returns, the rate of wages in the woods was $12 a month, in 1879 $14, in 1880 $15.50, in 1881 $18, in 1882 $22, in 1883 $23, and in 1884 it had got back again to $18 a month; but as between 1878, and 1884 the rate was $12 a month in the former period, and $18 a month in the latter, indicating, I think, pretty clearly, that there has been no such plethora of labor in the country as the hon. gentlemen opposite would desire us to believe, in the efforts they are making to show that the country is losing its population and has no room for any others who may wish to come here. Now, Sir, so much for this general question of population; and I have ventured to detain the House thus long upon it, because I notice that it is one of the special arguments which are being used, and I believe it is one of the arguments which, in England, has most effect, in deterring persons not only from coming to Canada but from taking an interest in Canada. I can remember, Sir—I do not know whether I have mentioned it in Parliament before—when in England, in 1870, as a commissioner from the Province of Ontario, as they did me the honor to call me—I remember being in the House of Commons when Mr. McCullough Torrens brought up a motion on the subject of State aid to emigration; and I remember Sir Charles Dilke, as an effective and conclusive answer to the proposition to aid emigration to Canada, stated that we were losing more population than we were getting into the country by immigration—that is to say, that the population of the country was absolutely decreasing instead of increasing. I know that his argument was regarded as most effective. I do think it is most important in the interests of the country that the simple truth should be told, in order that it should be shown that these statements—and the hon. gentleman gave us the advantage of seeing upon what he based them—are utterly unreliable and are grossly exaggerated, in relation to the actual position of the movement of population in Canada. Now, Sir, I come to another point upon which the hon. gentleman dwelt with some earnestness, and that is as to the expenditure and debt of the country. I do not intend going into this subject at any great length, for the reason that I think the statement made by the hon. Finance Minister on that subject is in itself thoroughly complete. He took, as he had an opportunity of taking, two periods of five years, and he averaged the expenditure during those two periods, for purposes of comparison. Now, I do not propose to do that, but I propose to take two years; I take 1875-76, which may be said to have been a year of plenty in one sense if not in another; because, I suppose, at that time hon. gentlemen opposite thought themselves firmly fixed in their seats, and believed that they were there, at any rate, for a great number of years, if not for all time—I take 1875-76 and the year 1883-84, for purposes of comparison. The expenditure for the first year was $24,483,372, and the expenditure in the second year was $31,107,706; so that the excess of expenditure in the latter year over that in the former was $6,619,334. Now that, on the face of it, is a large increase; nobody can doubt that. As to whether it is a wise increase or not depends entirely on an examination of the figures by which it is made up. The increase is made up by increases in the interest, sinking fund and charges of management of the public debt, amounting to $1,901,945; increases of ordinary expenditure, amounting to $2,624,540; and increases in the collection of revenues, amounting to $2,079,488. Now, Sir, as to the first of these payments: the increase in the net debt since 1878, taking the increases as they appear in the Public Accounts, amounts to $57,610,336, or 46 per cent. But, Sir, the expenditure upon capital account in connection with the great works upon which the future of this country largely depends, has increased during that period, $31,822,923, or $24,211,587 in excess of the addition to the public debt. Then, in this increase to the public debt, we have, included on the Canadian Pacific Railway alone, no less than $44,353,705; and we have, as debts to the Provinces assumed by the Dominion, that is, simply giving back so much money to the Provinces, $7,172,297. But, Sir, while the debt has increased 46 per cent., what it is important to remember is, that the burden of the debt—the interest and other charges, the payments which we have to make from year to year, and which may be said to be the measure of the burden of the debt, has only increased 25 per cent.; so that we have an increase of debt of 46 per cent. and an increase of charges connected with the debt of only 25 per cent. Now, Sir, I take the ordinary expenditure, which has increased $2,624,540—and practically the whole of this increase is included in five items, namely: Public works, $959,910; mail subsidies and steamboat subventions, a new item, $238,054; railway subsidies voted by Parliament—and I believe the different sums which go to make up this amount were voted without division—$204,090; Indian grants, $839,831; and the Mounted Police, $116,465; or in all, in these five items, $2,558,350, or within $65,190 of the total increase that has taken place between the year 1876 and the year 1884. Now as to these items, I think there is no difficulty, not only in explaining them, but in justifying them. The expenditure on public works has all gone to the country. When a country is well off, when there are surpluses in the Treasury, it is a wise policy, and it was the policy announced by this Government, that during such time there should be a generous system of dealing with public works, that new buildings should go up where required; and the money was voted by Parliament, if I mistake not, without any one objecting to a single item—nay, if I mistake not, the only complaint made was, that there was not enough voted, that there were not more buildings to be put up than were proposed to be erected according to the estimates. Then there is the item of mail subsidies and steamship subventions, an expenditure entirely in the interest of building up the trade of the country. The railway subsidies were voted without opposition in Parliament, both sides agreeing to the grants. The estimates with regard to Indians and Mounted Police have relation to maintaining the peace and welfare of the great North-West. In the olden days, when the Hudson Bay Company wore a monopoly in the North-West, they looked after the Indians; true, they paid less for the furs and got more for their goods, but they paid considerable sums in a direct way for the maintenance of the Indians and the preservation of peace. Since that time the buffalo, which is the natural food of the Indians, has practically disappeared from the North-West, and the question which we have to deal with is, whether we will feed or fight the red man. Our friends across the line have tried the fighting process, and the history of their western country, is a history we would not desire to see repeated on Canadian soil. The expense, therefore, on the Indians for the purpose of maintaining peace and order among them and giving security to the settlers, is one that cannot be cavilled at, and the same argument applies equally to the grant for the Mounted Police. As I have said, on these items we have, within $65,000, the entire increase of our expenditure from 1876 to 1884. Take the cost of collecting the revenue. The increase of that is $2,079,488, but the revenue itself has increased in that same period to $9,274,373. Of the items mentioned in the cost of collecting the revenue, the post office shows an increase of $690,138, railways, canals and public works, $1,258,293, or together, $1,948,431. But the increased revenue from these sources shows $281,261 in excess of the increase of the cost of collecting, so that after all, with regard to these two items, which are the largest in connection with the collection of the revenue, we have, as the result of that larger expenditure, an increased revenue of over $250,000 in the public Treasury. Outside of these two items the increase in the cost of collecting the revenue during that period was only $131,056, and the increased revenue collected by that $131,000 was $8,993,111; or, in round figures, we collected $9,000,000 increased revenue by an increased expenditure of $131,000. I do not think that fact indicates that wanton extravagance, that disposition to play the spendthrift in connection with public moneys, which hon. gentlemen would lead us to suppose has characterised the administration of public affairs by the present Government. The statement is very often made, and it was made in this debate by the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), that the debt has enormously increased, and we hear hon. gentlemen opposite frequently referring back to 1867, in order to show how serious has been that increase. Well, since 1867 the debt has increased by $106,433,209, but the capital expenditure during that period has been $35,841,378 in excess of that increase. What were the causes of the increase. Why, here are four items alone: The debts allowed to the other Provinces $27,624,638—surely that is not an increase of the burdens of the people; it is a transfer of the burdens from the people in their character of members of the Provinces to the same people in their character as members of the Dominion. Then there is the Canadian Pacific Railway, $47,291,564; the Intercolonial Railway, which was the work of both parties, undoubtedly, whatever may be said of the Canadian Pacific Railway, $29,486,027; public works canals etc., $31,404,938—or on these four items alone we have had an expenditure, since Confederation, of $135,807,209, or, as I have said, $29,374,000 in excess of the entire addition to the public debt. Surely, when we are able to show as assets great public works for that increase of debt, we may say that the country is not chargeable with loss under the management of its affairs in this respect. If we take the credit of the country which, after all, is a very fair indication of what is the estimation of our position of people outside, who study our affairs to some extent, if you take the condition of the credit of the country during the two periods, 1867 and 1884, I think you will see that it stands in tolerably good credit. In 1867 the average interest on our debt was 5.41; to-day it is 4.06, or, in other words, while the aggregate debt has increased 145 per cent. the interest charged has only increased 79 per cent. Now, if we take the increase of debt during the last and the present administration, we find the increase from 1874 to 1879 was $34,665,223, averaging $6,933,045 a year; from 1879 to 1884 it was $39,171,663, or, deducting the amounts paid to the Provinces, which we have fairly a right to deduct, of $7,172,297, this leaves an increase, during the period the present Administration have been in office, of $31,999,366, making an average annual increase of $6,399,873, or $544,172 less than the average annual increase during the preceding five years. Then the net interest shows a still further decrease. The increase in the annual average net interest during the period of office of hon. gentlemen opposite was $222,345, from 1879 to 1884, under the present Administration, it has been $124,047, showing that while the debt has increased almost in as great a ratio during the one period as during the other, the increase in charges for interest has been nearly $100,000 less. Extravagance or economy are, after all, relative terms. If, for instance, you take a farmer, and that is the principle on which hon. gentlemen opposite argue this matter, who starts out with 100 acres of land and who shows, by his books, that to cultivate that land costs so much; and if, after ten or fifteen years, you return and find he has 600 acres of land under cultivation, and that in consequence his expenses are five or six times greater than it was at the outset, what would be said if you were to say to him: Sir, fifteen years ago you only spent $1,000 a year; to-day you spend $6,000 a year; therefore you are a spendthrift. Yet, that is precisely the argument hon. gentlemen use in dealing with this country. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman undertakes to tell us that we have increased the debt and that we have increased our expenditure not only very seriously in itself, but that, relatively to the United States, this country is losing the advantage it used to possess of being a less heavily taxed country, with less debt and less annual expenditure. The statement he made at his Montreal meeting was this:

"I am sorry to say that the taxation and expenditure of the people of Canada per head are nearly double those of the United States. Instead of being a lightly taxed country, it is fast becoming one of the most heavily taxed countries in the world."

It is unnecessary to repeat the statements made by the hon. the Finance Minister in his speech upon this subject. Those statements are taken from official records.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE. Does the hon. gentleman doubt that they are taken from official records?

Mr. MILLS. I am not disputing it.

Mr. BOWELL. Then you are approving, I suppose.

Mr. WHITE. Then I shall assume, in future, that when the hon. gentleman says "hear, hear" in an ironical tone of voice, he is approving of the statement made. That is a very useful thing to know in regard to the hon. gentleman's utterances. Whatever may be the disputes as to certain items of expenditure, there are two items that cannot be fairly included in any comparison between Canada and the United States. One of these items is subsidies to Provinces, $3,603,714. The other is the expenditure for the operating of railways and canals. We have simply constituted ourselves a railway company in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, and that ought not to be charged, as we get the receipts from it in the same way as any other railway company. That amounts to $3,302,791; or together these two items amount to nearly $7,000,000, or about one-fourth of our total expenditure, and they have no relation whatever to any expenditure of the Federal Government of the United States.

Mr. MILLS. There is the war debt on the other side.

Mr. WHITE. Of course they have the war debt, and that is precisely where we have the advantage of them. They have a large debt incurred for destructive purposes. The hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) wound up his speech by telling us that that war was less destructive than the public works in Canada.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As administered by this Government.

Mr. WHITE. But it is not necessary, for purposes of comparison, to exclude their war debt. That would be a folly even beyond what I can imagine the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) could be guilty of. What I want to point out is, that the hon. member for South Huron, in his reply, did not successfully, did not venture, I may say, almost at all, with any reasonable attempt at accuracy of statement, to meet the statements made by the Minister of Finance in regard to the comparative expenditure and comparative debt of the two countries. But, after all, there is a way of comparing this matter of expenditure which may be worth while referring to. The hon. gentleman assumes that there ought to be no increase of expenditure in Canada; that we ought to have no public works, no expansion of our railway system; that we ought to leave the Indians in the North-West to do the best they can; that, in fact, anything like an increase of expenditure is, in itself, a blameable act. Well, I will take their favorite Province and mine, for I lived twenty years in it, and I happen to represent a constituency in it to-day—the Province of Ontario. They take the Government of the Province of Ontario as their special model, though I do not think it would be mine. I will take that Province which, according to the hon. member for South Huron, has been actually decreasing in population, which has been losing its population and has not been adding to its territory, a Province where, if anywhere, you ought to have a condition of things, where the expenditure might practically be stationary. But what has been the condition of things? Under the head of consolidated fund, the Dominion increased its total expenditure, from 1876 to 1884, $6,619,434, or 27 per cent.; and in the Province of Ontario for the same period, the increase was $905,632, or 46 per cent. Hon. gentlemen may say that we do not include in that the open accounts, and that the expenditure in the Province of Ontario has not been so great if the open accounts are included; but I will take certain details of expenditure; take, for instance, civil government. The cost of civil government in Canada must, in the nature of things, as everyone knows, have largely increased. The statutory increases alone amount to about $120,000 since the Government came into office. The enormous increase in the North West, the demands upon the Post Office, the Interior, the Indian Office, the large increases which are necessarily coming upon our Department of Railways and Canals for the construction of railways—all these things naturally necessitate an increase in the cost of civil government. There were none of these things practically in the Province of Ontario. There were no such expansions as required that increase, and yet in Ontario, between 1876 and 1884, the cost of civil government has increased 16 per cent., while, with all our extensions, with all our enlargement of work, it had increased in the Dominion less than double—only 28 per cent. The administration of justice in the Dominion increased 13 per cent., and in the Province of Ontario 15 per cent. The cost of legislation, which is a tolerably good test, increased in the Dominion only $35,536, or 5½ per cent., while in the Province of Ontario it increased $34,499, or 32 per cent. And that is a very fair test, and shows that while in that period we have only increased the cost of our legislation by 5½ per cent., that model Government of Ontario has increased it by 32 per cent. The cost of collecting the revenue of all kinds in the Dominion increased 43 per cent.; and the cost of collecting the Crown land revenue, which is the special revenue in Ontario, which involves the maintenance of a machinery for its collection, increased 45½ per cent., or 2½ per cent. more than the increase in the cost of collecting for the whole Dominion. But the revenue in the Dominion increased 41 per cent., while the revenue in Ontario increased only 9 per cent. In other words, it cost the Dominion $2,079,000 to collect an additional revenue of $9,247,000, and it cost the Province of Ontario $32,236 to collect an additional revenue of $50,052. Practically, every additional dollar of revenue in Ontario cost an additional dollar to collect it. I take the expenditure upon public institutions in the Province of Ontario, and I want you to bear in mind that this is a Province which hon. gentlemen opposite say is stationary in its population, or, at all events, is not growing. I find that the expenditure on public buildings in Ontario has increased, from 1876 to 1884, by 118 per cent., while in colonization roads, which may be said to have some relation to our public works—except that they varied more during election years and non-election years in the Province of Ontario—the increased cost was 116 per cent. Now, Sir, I think that that comparison between the Province of Ontario, the favorite of hon. gentlemen opposite, and the Dominion of Canada, is not at all unfavorable to the present Administration. I think we may fairly say, at any rate, that the mere representation of a charge of more on one side and less on the other, a smaller sum at one period and an increased sum at another, does not in itself indicate that there has been any extravagance in the public expenditure—or at least, the hon. gentlemen, with their knowledge of the conduct of the Government of Ontario, their own friends, are not in a position to take that ground. I referred, a few minutes ago, to the question of the credit of Canada. Now, as indicating what degree of confidence the administration of the affairs of this Government has inspired in that most sensitive of all classes, the investors in public securities, we might fairly take the relation which the securities of Canada bear to those in other countries. The Minister of Finance dealt with that question and gave the figures. If you take the loan of 1876, which the hon. member for South Huron negotiated, and the loan which was put on the market by the hon. Minister of Finance, I think you will find that the credit of the country has so increased as to show, at any rate, that there has been no falling off of confidence in the administration of the affairs of this young Dominion by the gentlemen who are now entrusted with that administration. There are two ways of determining the comparative credit of countries, the price obtained for loans at different periods and the relation that price bears to securities of other countries. The "Cartwright Loan," negotiated in November, 1876, was placed at 91. Now, Sir, on the 27th of February, 1877, Canadian 4's in the English market stood at 93½ to 94½; South Australian 4 per cents. at 98 to 99; Victoria 4 per cents., 98½ to 99, or an average of nearly 5 per cent. in excess of the price at which Canadian 4 per cents. stood. If you take, on the other hand, the relative of Canadian credit, as shown by the 4 per cent. bonds in London last month, you will find this: that Canadian 4 per cents. stand to-day at 105 to 107; New South Wales, 104½ to 105½; South Australian, 102 to 102½; Queensland, 100 to 102½; Victoria, 103. So that while, in 1877, the relation which Dominion securities bore to those of these Australian colonies was 5 per cent. lower, during the month of February last the relation they stood in was from 2 to 3 per cent. higher, so that to-day no securities stand higher in the English markets than Canadian securities. But, Sir, there is another fact, and although it was stated by the hon. Minister of Finance, I may briefly refer to it, and that is the relations which our securities bear to American securities. Our 4 per cents. have increased since 1878 by 17 per cent., and the value of American 4 per cents. have only increased 19 per cent. The hon. member for South Huron stated, in reference to the last loan, that the Finance Minister had a peculiarly favorable time at which to put it on the market, and he intimated that it was more favorable than the time when he put his loan on the market. Now, the hon. gentleman put his loan on the market in 1876, in November of that year, and we find that the Bank of England rate of discount from May, 1876, to May, 1877, stood at 2 per cent., which was a longer period than it has remained in that position at any time since 1867; so that if there ever was a favorable time for putting a loan on the market it was when the hon. gentleman put his loan on the market in 1876. I do not say that he did not get as much for that loan as he could have got; I do not say that the loan was not well placed; I do not say that he could have adopted another plan and got more for it; I am not going to revive in any way the discussions which have taken place in this House in regard to that subject, but I do say that it is an extraordinary commentary upon the statement which the hon. gentleman has been making, both in Parliament and in the country, that the credit of Canada, in spite of these comments, has gone on so steadily increasing that to-day our securities stand so high that the hon. Minister of Finance was able to put a loan upon the market at such an excess of price over that which the hon. member for South Huron obtained, that the difference in the interest charge in fifty years will wipe out the loan altogether. A stronger illustration of the increased credit and confidence in our financial soundness it would be difficult to find. Now, in regard to the relative merits of the two Governments, the hon. member for South Huron took occasion to read from the Economist, of 1874, a very startling statement. He does not give the name of the writer and, of course, he is not called upon to do it; but he says it is a gentleman with whom he is well acquainted, and he wrote to the Economist at that time as follows, with reference to the condition of Canada:—

"Thus," he says, "a splendid position has been changed into one of danger, if not of imminent danger. At the beginning, there is a moderate surplus upon moderate totals of receipts and expenditures. Then these totals on both sides increase, with a very large surplus. Finally, there is an enormous increase of the total on the expenditure side, with a deficit of nearly half a million pounds sterling. It is not difficult to see how all this has been brought about. First of all, the great expenditure on new works has gradually increased the direct charge for debt interest. The second cause of increased expenditure has been the maintenance and working of certain undertakings which were intended to be reproductive, but so far from having that character are a direct source of loss. The third source of increased expenditure has been the political extension of the Canadian Dominion. The incorporation of outlying Provinces, like Manitoba, is immediately a source of expense, just as Central Asia costs money to the Russian Government, and many of our Indian Provinces yield less than the cost of governing them. So Canada has added to itself a territory which is a burdensome charge. The older and richer Provinces of Canada are, in fact, paying heavily for the accomplishment of certain political objects, and, now that the penalty must be paid for all these extravagances, the history may be left to tell its own tale. There is no kind of expenditure which requires more careful study beforehand and more rigorous restriction by Governments than expenditure on new public works. Territorial expansion is also a luxury, the cost of which should be carefully counted beforehand. Canada has committed the most serious blunders in both respects, and the result is the large deficit and the disagreeable outlook we have described."

Now, Sir, I did not quite understand from the hon. gentleman whether he approved of that statement, and whether, at the time it was written, he thought it fairly and properly described the position of this country. Why should he have presented it and read it unless he intended that to be the case? Yet what do we find? That the hon. gentleman was in England, a short time afterwards; that he being in England issued a circular to the people of the United Kingdom, and I find that circular, which has relation to those very matters which are referred to here, contains some very valuable statements which certainly are not in accord with the extract he read to us from the Economist. This statement, I find, is signed by "Richard J. Cartwright, Minister of Finance for the Dominion of Canada." I find it is dated 19th October, 1875, and that the statement in the Economist read to us, and which I presume he believed to be a correct statement, was dated 1874. The hon. gentleman being in England—I will not read all the circular—made certain statements, I say, which are certainly interesting. He says:

"The net public debt of Canada of all kinds, after deduction of bankers balances, sinking fund investments, and other cash assets, is at the present day nearly £24,000,000, being about £6 per head of the population on the 1st July last (estimated at the rate of increase established by the census of 1871)."

I notice the hon. gentleman, when issuing that circular, did not object to assume the rate of increase as established by the census of 1871 when dealing with the population of Canada in statements to the English public. Then he gives the particulars of that debt, and he goes on to say:

"The annual interest charged on the external or bonded debt is about £1,000,000, and on the whole remainder, £300,000—in all, about £1,300,000, or about 6s. 8d. per head."

That 6s. 8d. is rather a remarkable statement. The hon. gentleman was in England for the purpose of obtaining a loan; he was there for the purpose of presenting the affairs of this country in their most attractive form, and he thought that the statement that the debt of Canada was 6s. and 8d. per head was such a statement as would not, at all events, alarm investors on the other side. Yet what do we find? While that was the gross interest, we find that at this moment the net interest is only $1.46, or, in round figures, 6s. per head, instead of 6s. 8d. And yet with that fact, that the net interest to-day is only 6s. per head,—and the hon. gentleman considered 6s. 8d. a fair and reasonable sum to present to the people of England as proof that this country was not in an unsound financial position in 1876—we have the wonderful statement made by him here as to the miserable condition of this country that it is, in fact, worse than if we had gone through a four years' war. What does he say further?

"The whole of this debt has been incurred for legitimate objects of public utility."

If those were legitimate objects of public expenditure, surely the expenditure since made has been made for legitimate objects of public utility as well. They are largely the same objects. For instance:

"Canals, about £5,500,000."

But there has been an increase since that time, and a very large increase, in the expenditure made, first by hon. gentlemen opposite and then made by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, in continuation of their contracts, and on new contracts which they entered into themselves.

"Railways, including advances to and the cost of those actually owned by Canada, about £12,000,000."

That was considered an object of public utility; it was so considered by that hon. gentleman when he referred to this matter in the circular to English investors:

"Lighthouses, river improvements, harbors, roads and public buildings, £2,000,000."

If it was legitimate before 1875 to spend money on lighthouses, river improvements, harbors, roads and public buildings, it cannot have been unwise or extravagant to have made similar expenditures upon similar works since.

"Compensation to the various Provinces for property and revenue surrendered to the Dominion, the purchase and organisation of territories, and the freeing of land in the Province of Quebec from the feudal tenure, etc., £5,000,000."

That again is the same compensation as is paid to the various Provinces. The hon. gentleman has objected ever since to any increase of the debt which has practically for the same object, compensation to the various Provinces; yet this circular was written after the first arrangement for better terms, which he denounced from his place the other night. He goes on to say:

"Though many of the public works have so far yielded but a small revenue in comparison with the interest on their cost, much of the expenditure has been regarded, both by the Imperial and Dominion Governments, as necessary, not in the interest of Canada exclusively, but also on national grounds; so much so, that the Imperial Parliament has, at various times, sanctioned guarantees in aid of their construction to the extent of £8,400,000. The engagements of Canada in connection with all these guarantees have been punctually met without any advance whatever from the Imperial Treasury."

The hon. gentleman tells us of another important attraction which Canada had to present to the people of England when he went to get from them a loan of money. That was the deposits in the savings bank. He said:

"The deposits in the savings bank and societies have increased from £1,240,069 sterling, in 1867, to £3,754,820 sterling in 1875."

For what purpose did the hon. gentleman get his loan? Surely, when he asked for a loan in England and issued this circular, it was not for objects on which it was improper to spend money? We have the statement here of the purposes for which the hon. gentleman wanted the money:

"The objects of the Government of Canada in contracting the present loan are threefold:

"(1). For the construction of several great works of internal improvement—

So he was quite prepared at that time to go in for a policy of constructing works of internal improvement. He continues:

"chiefly in connection with the enlargement of the existing canal system, by which it is proposed to improve the communication between Lake Superior and the ocean to such an extent as to permit the passage of vessels of 1,500 tons burden, carrying from 50,000 to 60,000 bushels of grain, the largest size heretofore admitted having been about 500 tons, carrying less than 20,000 bushels.

"(2). To defray expenditure incurred on works of communication with the North-West Territories and the Pacific Railway.

"(3). To recoup the exchequer for bonds actually paid, bearing a higher rate of interest, and to provide for others falling due."

And then we have a very proper and very well written eulogy of the advantages of trade by the St. Lawrence, and reference is made to the great good which would accrue to this country if those expenditures were made. Says the hon. gentleman:

"It need hardly be observed that Canada, possesses many important branches of revenue still untouched, and that the population, though exceedingly well-to-do in the mass, contribute a comparatively small amount per head as compared with most other countries."

It is worth while to point out that when the hon. gentleman told the people of England that Canada had other sources of revenue still untouched, he must have meant that Canada was to go forward in a course of material development and construction of public works, and in those matters connected with the public improvement of the country, to which, since that time, he has seriously objected, and which, the other night, he undertook to tell us, were equivalent, as regards expenditure, to a four years civil war, such as prevailed in the United States. And, Sir, the hon. gentleman when he came to deal with the business of the country, went further, and he objected to our taking periods of five years. He said:

"Besides, when we have a series of good harvests the manufacturers reap the benefit, to a large extent, and the hon. gentleman is not entitled to take credit for his policy for the fact that there were three successive good harvests in 1881-82-83, and three poor harvests in 1876-77-78. Such an argument merely requires to be stated to be exposed."

In another part of his speech he declared that the Mackenzie Government had been so unfortunate and had been so frowned upon by Providence, while they were in office, they had had five years of bad harvests. Now, what is the fact? The hon. gentleman was a Minister at the time; he had to advise in the preparation of the Governor General's speech, on his sworn responsibility as a Minister of the Crown, and in relation to the condition of the country perhaps he was more directly and personally responsible than any other Minister. And yet what do we find in the Governor General's speech of 1876? The Governor General is made to say:

"At the same time we have reason to be grateful for an abundant harvest."

In 1878, which is certainly included as one of the years mentioned in the extract I have read, the Governor General was made to say:

"I am happy to be able to congratulate you on the abundant harvest reaped in all quarters of the Dominion."

So here we find the hon. gentleman who, on his responsibility as a sworn adviser of the Crown, recommends the speech of His Excellency to be delivered in Parliament, congratulating the country on the abundant harvest reaped in all parts of the country, and then we have him a few years afterwards declaring that that period is not to be judged in comparison with the later period, because during his period the harvests were all bad. Was he right when he made his first statement and advised His Excellency the Governor General to use those words? Did he mean—did he believe what he said? And if he did, how does he venture to stand up in this House, in the face of that statement, which is practically a sworn statement of the Minister at that time, and try now to escape from the results of his own maladministration during the period he was in office, by declaring that during that very period there were bad harvests? Now, Sir, as a matter of fact, we all know that the harvest of 1883 was not an abundant harvest. We all know that in Western Ontario particularly, the harvest of 1883 was a most deficient harvest. We all know that the compiler of statistics in the Bureau of Industries for Ontario, estimated, in his reports, a loss in the grain crop alone, because of the failure of the harvest of 1883, of some 20,000,000 bushels. We know that in Manitoba, during that year, there was a most unfortunate failure in the harvest because of those early frosts overtaking the crops which were sown too late, perhaps owing to the inexperience of the new settlers in that country—a mistake they will, from their experience, be able to avoid in future. Why, Sir, in neither one case nor the other, neither as to the harvests prevailing during his own time of office, nor as to the harvests of the last three years, is the hon. gentleman accurate, and his statement in the first instance is shown to be inaccurate by what is equivalent to his own sworn testimony at the time that condition of things existed. The hon. gentleman went on to say, referring to the condition of the country and referring to the report which has recently been laid on the Table of Parliament by a commissioner appointed to enquire into the condition of the industries of the country—that that report was utterly unreliable, because in one or two places which he mentioned—one being the town of Chatham—he says only four industries were referred to, when, as a matter of fact, there were fifty, and where the hon. gentleman, according to his own statement, intimated that the industries, so far from prospering in that place, had actually gone back. I am not here to defend the commissioners' report. We have not all the report before us, and I am sorry for it. I regret it very much; and when the statement was made on the floor of Parliament, I went to Mr. Hartney to get him to press the printers to put the report through as rapidly as possible, so that it would be in the hands of members in the course of this debate. I have seen Mr. Hartney three or four times since; I have strongly urged him to press on the printing of that report; and I cannot understand why—at the moment the printers were complaining that they had no work, and were asking us to send documents to be printed without taking the responsibility of getting the assent of the committee—we have not been able to get printed documents of that kind, which would be of value to us in this discussion. I can only say, Sir, that no one in this House is responsible for that difficulty. But, Sir, there are thirty-four of these fifty industries which the hon. gentleman refers to that are not referred to anywhere, or in relation to any place visited by the commissioners. For instance, there are two malt houses, one brewery, three saw mills, four planing mills, four brick-makers—although I do not see how brick-making establishments can be called factories—two soap factories, two pop factories—and I suppose they will be increasingly important since the adoption of the Scott Act in that country—three marble works, four printing offices—and I do not think printing offices have been referred to anywhere; and nine flour mills, that have not been referred to in any case. Those make thirty-four out of the fifty which are not referred to anywhere, and which lessen, to that extent, the statement of the hon. gentleman. But I find that a local paper in Chatham, has in reply to the other local paper which furnished the hon. gentleman with the statement he made here the other day, gives us some information on this point:

“Of these sixteen namely, nine foundries, two furniture establishments, one biscuit factory, one coast factory (small), one tannery, one cigar factory (small), one woollen factory—do not occur in the report at all, and if we deduct from these all the industries employing less than ten hands—and that is the rule that the commissioner adopted—we reduce the number to a figure which shows that the commissioner was not far astray.”

I find this statement in the paper:

“Of these, the biscuit factory and the tannery (which do not figure in the commissioner's report) have come into existence since 1878. Two of the small foundries are gone, but another, which in 1878 was a small concern, has developed into a large and prosperous business. Another has built new and large workshops, and still another has been merged into one of the most prosperous joint stock companies in the west.”

That is the condition of things with reference to that town. If anyone has reason to complain of the report it is the Ministerial party, because the commissioner has not done full justice to the rapid development of the industries in Chatham. Then the local gives the industries which are not mentioned, and which I have just referred to, and adds:

“If these had all been taken in, the report would have been equally favorable, as there is now four times the amount of milling done than was in 1878. One planing mill has dropped out and two have taken its place.”

That is the position with regard to Chatham, and I do not think, therefore, that it is necessary to go further on that point. I have no doubt that later in the Session there will be a more thorough discussion in regard to the commissioners' report. But, Sir, there is another way in which you can estimate, to some extent, the development of the manufacturing industries of the country. Perhaps one of the most striking ways is to take the imports of coal into a country—the consumption of coal indicating the character of the manufacturing industries of a country. I find, Sir, that of coal—which is an especially good test—the importations were as follows: Of anthracite coal there was imported, in 1878, 420,110 tons, and in 1884, 868,000 tons; of bituminous, there was imported, in 1878, 513,970 tons, and in 1884, 1,118,615 tons, or altogether there was imported in 1878, 933,980 tons, and in 1884, 1,986,615 tons; or an increased importation of coal of 1,053,635 tons; and I find that the increased output of Canadian coal during that time, according to the statement of the Minister of Finance the other night, was 900,000 tons; so that we have an increased consumption of coal in the country, between 1878 and 1884, of 1,952,635 tons. I think, Mr. Speaker, that this is a tolerably good indication of the growth of industries in this country during that time. Then, Sir, another indication which may be taken is the increased importation of raw material, which, if hon. gentlemen will take the trouble to examine the figures, they will find has increased about the extent of $13,000,000. Our cotton mills, for instance, it has been said, have been standing still; and yet, curiously enough, we have imported, of raw cotton, in 1884, between 19,000,000 and 20,000,000 pounds, against about 7,000,000 pounds in 1878. That certainly does not indicate that the cotton mills have been standing still. They have not been running as constantly as they were before; they have not been running full time, and some of them have been stopped altogether for a few weeks or months, although business is now reviving and they are beginning to run again. But in the facts of the importation of raw material and the consumption of coal, we have an indication of the growth of industrial enterprise in the country which shows that the statements made in the commissioners' report are what one might expect would be established from the figures furnished by the Trade and Navigation returns. Now, Sir, times have been less active perhaps—that would be the proper way to put it—less active recently than in 1882 and 1883, and there are reasons for it altogether apart from the question of the Government policy or any policy that might be adopted. We had first a large withdrawal of capital from legitimate enterprises to put into speculative enterprises in the North-West. In Toronto, for instance, when the North-West Land Company, which had bought a large quantity of land from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, opened their books, I am told there was almost a riot in the effort to get into the room to subscribe for the stock of that company, so valuable was it supposed to be. People were anxious to go into all these new enterprises. The tendency of the age, I am sorry to say, is a gambling tendency, in commercial as well as in other matters. There is an eager disposition to make fortunes rapidly. We know that there was an idea that in the North-West there was a remarkable opportunity for making rapid fortunes, and people took money from their ordinary legitimate business and put it into North-West enterprises, and lost it, to the great injury of the credit and business of the country at large. Then we have had, as a result of the boom thus produced, over-importation. That is an event that comes, as we all know, at regular periods. Fortunately, in this case, I believe the merchants of Canada discovered early the mistake they were making, and they began to pull in sail much earlier than they did in 1874 and 1875. They saw, for instance, that manufactories were springing up in the country; they saw that the place of imported goods was being taken by goods manufactured in the country; they sat down and calculated what the effect of this would be; and they commenced lessening their importations at an earlier period than they otherwise would have done. In the meantime, however, there was some depression in consequence of over-importation; but I think the cotton industry may be said to be, after all, almost the only great industry in which there has been any serious or continued depression; and is it to be very much wondered at? We had hon. gentlemen opposite rising in Parliament and declaring what great profits the cotton lords, as they called them, were getting. We had them telling us that the cotton manufacturers were making their 60 or 70 per cent.; and many people, anxious to make money rapidly, and believing these hon. gentlemen, went into this enterprise. New mills sprang up; and some of the hon. gentlemen themselves, if I mistake not, were so confident of the success of the policy they were condemning, that they actually put money into these cotton mills. If I mistake not, the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) had an interest in a cotton mill in the city of Kingston. I know another gentleman who is a very pronounced opponent of this Government, who was on two occasions the opponent of the hon. First Minister in Kingston, Mr. Carruthers, invested money in it, and I think my hon. friend, the present member for Kingston (Mr. Gunn) put money in. These hon. gentlemen, although declaring that the policy was going to ruin the country and everybody connected with it, actually themselves aided in this inflation and this over-production by putting money into these industries. At the start, the cotton mills all went largely into the manufacture of grey goods, because that was a kind of cotton they thought they could get an early market for, and could turn out easily. The result followed which everybody regrets. But there is this fact to be borne in mind with satisfaction, that the cotton industry, as every other industry in the country, is getting down to a business basis; that people are now more careful; that they are multiplying the varieties of their products, and are studying the market very carefully; and I venture to suggest, that if each mill had been its own merchant, a great deal of the difficulties that have arisen would not have arisen in connection with the cotton industry of the country. All these things had their effect. Then another circumstance was the depreciation of values. Every one knows that that was a very serious circumstance; it happened in England as well as in this country. I find, in the London Economist of the 31st of January last, an article on the condition of trade, which I have reason to know is from the pen of Mr. Stephen Bourne, who will be remembered as having read a very valuable paper on Imperial Confederation before the British Association last year in Canada, and who is the chief of the Statistical Branch of the Department of Customs in England. He quotes a number of figures, all going to show that there has been a very serious depreciation in the value of goods in England as well as elsewhere. For instance, he takes four classes of goods—textile manufactures, minerals and metals, articles of food, and miscellaneous—and he finds that there was a larger quantity of these goods exported in 1884, by £2,733,000, estimated by the price of the year before, than in the year before, and an absolute decrease in price of £9,605,000. I think that is a remarkable statement in relation to the depreciation in values. Then he comes to these conclusions:

"First. During the year just ended our whole exports were valued at £10,000,000 less than last year, for, although our increased sales are represented by nearly £2,000,000 for quantity, the fall in prices have occasioned them to bring in less by £12,000,000. In other words, our export trade has expanded a little beyond 6 per cent. in volume. This larger volume has shrunk by just about 4 per cent. in value.

"Second." That of British produce and manufacture alone, the increased quantity figures for not far from £3,000,000, or at the rate of 1½ per cent. for addition to volume, accompanied by a decreased value of nearly £10,000,000, or 4½ per cent."

And he makes the general statement that, taking the aggregate trade of Great Britain, the depreciation of values alone represents the large sum of £46,000,000 sterling. That depreciation had its effect. The merchants in Canada had bought goods at figures on which they could not realise a profit. Take, for instance, the case of the sugar refiners. The sugar refiners, many of whom are merchants as well, imported the sugar at prices which they supposed were certain to bring them a profit, because the prices were lower than any known for years, yet the refiners found the prices going down lower and lower, and they had to stand a loss; but the loss suffered by them during the past year could not, in consequence, be charged in any way to the effect of the National Policy. Owing to the enormous depreciation of the value of the raw material, which they had imported at higher prices than they could sell it at, they had to stand heavy loss. These facts have tended very considerably to reduce the volume of business in the country, and to bring about in that way the comparative depression that has existed. The same thing has occurred in the United States. In Bradstreet's circular we find an estimate of the prices in the United States of certain articles in July, 1878, and December, 1884. The remarkable thing with regard to that estimate, and it applies equally I believe to Canada is, that while the articles which the farmer uses have gone down enormously in value, the article which he produces, leaving out wheat, or, at any rate, many of them, have actually increased in value during that period. The following are the figures:—

	July 1878.	Dec. 1884.
FOOD PRODUCTS :
Wheat, No. 2 red, bushel.....	1·05	·87

Those depreciations in the values of the articles which enter into the ordinary business of the country have had the effect to which I referred. Another thing which has had a depressing effect is, that the settlement in the North-West has not been as large as we reasonably expected it would be.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). When the House rose I was about proceeding to refer to another of the incidents which led to some check in the flow of business in this country, and that was the disappointment in relation to the extent of settlement in our Canadian North-West. I think we may fairly say that under all reasonable circumstances we had a right to anticipate a larger settlement than took place in that part of the country, but there is a remarkable fact in connection with it, and that is, that although the settlement in the Canadian North-West was not quite up to what was expected, the deficiency in the settlement was about the same in the United States as well. In Dakota and Minnesota I find that the proportion of the falling off in the previous year was just about as great as that in the North-West. For instance, in 1883 there were taken up of homesteads, in the Canadian North-West, 970,719 acres; and in 1884, 582,280 acres. Of pre-emptions there were taken up in 1883, 659,120; and in 1884, 364,060. Of sales there were 202,143 acres, in 1883, and 213,172 acres, in 1884; or a total, in 1883, of 1,831,982 acres; and in 1884, 1,110,512 acres. We find that in Dakota and Minnesota the falling off was as follows: From 15,196,594, in 1883, to 9,222,757, in 1884. That is to say, the decrease in the settlement of the American Territories was 39.56 per cent., and in the Canadian North-West, 39.92 per cent., so that the decrease in each country was, in comparison, almost precisely the same. The most serious regret in connection with that is that the falling off is to be traced to circumstances which I believe were largely within our own control. In the opening up of that country, in incurring large obligations for the purpose of putting a railway through it, to supply railway facilities to the people who might go in there, we had a right to expect, whatever differences of opinion might exist as to the policy of the Government or as to the manner of constructing that railway, that, in relation to the effects of that railway upon the country and as to the country itself, there would be no difference of opinion. We had a right to hope, and I think everyone will say that it was not an unreasonable hope, that, while we might have our conflicts and our controversies on the floor of Parliament as to which was the better way of developing that country and constructing a railway through it, at any rate, as to the country itself, there would be a unity of sentiment in the House and out of it. But we found that in almost every debate in this House hon. gentlemen opposite were doing whatever they could to discourage immigration to that country, to create an impression that it was not a desirable country to emigrate to, and to depreciate its value in this way as a desirable field for emigration. We had a member of that party, no less distinguished than the leader of the Opposition, at a meeting in Bowmanville, declaring that, although he had not theretofore said very much in relation to that country, although he had been cautious not to express any opinion of his own, yet, having made thorough enquiry from a number of persons who had seen the country and whose opinions were therefore of value, he was in a position to state, and he did state, on his responsibility, that 300 or 400 miles of the country were utterly unfit for settlement.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. WHITE. Well, it was so near that, that if the hon. gentleman will state what he did say, I venture to say it will be found to be practically that, that the road ran through a country practically unfit for settlement. On the floor of this House, what had we in regard to the route of the Canadian Pacific Railway? We had statements that it ran through a country, for the large part of it, several hundreds of miles of it, simply fit for the growth of the cactus and unfit for ordinary cultivation and for successful settlement; and yet we have had evidence since, from a quarter that I think will be received in this House as worthy of all possible acceptance, that is the testimony of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), who, after going through the country, after travelling over that railway, after examining for himself, in his own practical way, the character of the country through which the railway passed, came back to Winnipeg, and in a speech there, declared that he was himself surprised, gratifyingly disappointed, at what he had seen, and condemned his own press and his own colleagues in public life, members of his own party, for the exaggerations they had been guilty of in regard to that country. That was one of the reasons why the settlement of that country was not as great as it might otherwise have been. Then we had the agitations in the North-West itself. We had those agitations, largely promoted, I believe, by political motives. I should be sorry to say that all those who engaged in the meetings of the Farmers' Union, that all those who believed honestly that they had grievances that might be remedied by meeting together and having concerted action, were influenced by partly political feeling. But, I have no hesitation in saying that the motive and inspiration of those who took the leading part in the organisation was political and only political, that it was designed for the purpose of creating a feeling against the country, in that way lessening the immigration to the country, in that way lessening the value of the policy which this Government had adopted, and to the extent of the failure of that policy resulting from these causes, discrediting the Government itself. Thus we had these attacks made upon that country. I can quite understand that last year, or rather the year before, owing to the early frosts that occurred, the exceptionally early frosts, such as had not been known for years before, and may not be known, I trust, for many years to come, judging the future by the past, many of the farmers there felt they had come to a country where they were liable to these disadvantages; but, when this organisation met together in Winnipeg, and deliberately passed a resolution—a more insane proceeding one could hardly imagine—warning people against coming to the country at all, one could readily understand that under the influence of an agitation of that kind and action of that kind there would be a less gratifying flow of immigration to the North-West. I am glad to see by the papers of this evening that the Farmers' Union, at any rate, whatever they may have to say about their local grievances, are no longer disposed to attack the country itself. I am glad to see, if the statement is true, that when it was supposed that a secession movement was on foot, and when some loyalists went to put it down, they found only one man a secessionist. I am glad to see that this is the fact, and that the Farmers' Union are not disposed to be made the tools of political agitators to injure the future of the country. If they will fight their own political battle, with which we have nothing to do here, if they will conduct their own local controversies with respect to their own Local Legislature, with which we have no concern, and will do it as men anxious each to promote in the best possible way the advantage of the country, nobody can possibly object to controversy of that kind, and I think we may very fairly look forward, in view of what has occurred last year in Manitoba and the North-West, to a better condition of things in that regard and a larger immigration into that country in the early future. The hon. gentleman from South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), spoke of the conduct of this Government as having retarded settlement in the North-West; he described it as having prevented people from going in; he even referred to the Canadian Pacific Railway and its construction as one of the causes which had prevented settlement from going in. What do we see this year, with all this huge monopoly, this grinding monopoly of which we have heard—the Canadian Pacific Railway? We see these two remarkable facts, that while in the American States of Minnesota and Dakota the railway companies and the millers are practically one combination, the one playing into the hands of the other, so that no man is permitted to buy wheat unless he buys

it through the elevator, which is the property of the miller as well as of the railway company, and while, as the result of that, the millers have been able to control the price of grain in that American North-West, to the great disadvantage of the farmers, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, in their operations in our Canadian North-West, have refused to yield to any such influences as that, and have declared that every man shall have the opportunity of going into the market as a free man and getting the highest prices for wheat, and shall have the best facilities for the shipping of it at every practicable point; and, Sir, what has been the practical result of this? The statement has been made, upon the responsibility of gentlemen who are themselves interested, and who have paid money in connection with the wheat products of that country, that the average price of wheat in Manitoba and the Canadian North-West this year has been 12 cents a bushel more than it has been on the American side. And more than that, we have seen farmers on the American side actually teaming their wheat across into the Canadian territory, paying the 15 cents duty, and then going back with 4 cents a bushel more in their pocket than they would have had if they had sold their wheat on their own side. These are evidences that the policy of the Government in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway has not been an injury to the farmers of that country; and it is a proof that the farmers are beginning to realize the advantages which they possess in the Canadian North-West over the farmers of Dakota and Minnesota. There is no doubt that there will be, in the near future—in fact, I believe the movement has already begun—a migration of Canadians hitherto settled in Minnesota and Dakota—largely because of the agitation in this country against our own territory, the statements as to the greater advantages offered by the Americans, who will take up their residence in the Canadian North-West, becoming loyal British subjects, and live under the old flag which, I am sure, in spite of the fact that they have gone to Minnesota and Dakota, they still revere and honor. I think, therefore, we may fairly expect that this cause which has tended to place a momentary check on the commercial prosperity of that country will soon pass away. We have, as one of the evidences often referred to, of the fact that there has been some depression in Canada, a reference to the failures that have taken place; and let me, for a moment, state the facts briefly, in order to complete this part of the argument. Everyone who knows anything of England will admit that the depression has been more severe there during the past year than it has been at any time during the last quarter of a century. Ask any commercial traveller who has been in England buying goods what condition of things he found there; ask anyone who has an opportunity of testing the feeling of the commercial circles in Great Britain; look at the records of people out of employment, and at the record of failures, and you will find the statement is absolutely accurate, that for a quarter of a century no such depression has existed in England as was that which has existed during this last year. In the United States the depression has been about as severe as the depression of 1877-78. I find that the failures in Canada this last year have been 1,327, with liabilities of $19,191,306; while in 1879 the failures were 1,902, with liabilities of $29,347,937. Then, Sir, the trades have increased in number from 56,000 to 69,994, an increase of 13,994; so that while in 1884 we had one failure to every 53 persons in trade, in 1879 we had one failure to every 29 persons in trade; while in the United States there was one failure to every 82 persons in trade in 1884, and one failure to every 62 persons in 1878. This shows that while there has been a depression in Canada in some particular lines, and while all have felt the effect of a depreciation in values, the number of failures, relatively to the number in 1879, has been very much less in Canada than in the United States. Now, Sir, I daresay that hon. gentlemen opposite will say that there ought to have been no failures, and that at the time of the adoption of the National Policy the country was promised that there would be no depression; they will no doubt contend that we ought to have avoided the evil results of a depreciation in values. I have no doubt that my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson), who is going to follow me, will take that line of argument, and will probably quote a number of extracts from speeches made by Conservatives in 1877, when this question began to be agitated, for the purpose of showing that there should be no failures whatever. Sir, what was urged in 1877-78 was this: That in view of the conditions of this country and its relations to the neighboring Republic particularly, there were means which might be adopted by the Parliament of Canada that would do much towards mitigating the depression which at that time existed. The question of the National Policy, allow me to say, has never been a question of 20 per cent., or 25 per cent., or 30 per cent.; the question of the National Policy has been simply this: What arrangement of our tariff, what arrangement of our commercial system, will reasonably give to men of capital an opportunity to carry on their business with a prospect of success against the competition of our neighbors on the other side. At that time we pointed out two or three ways in which injury was being done by the absence of legislation, and when we urged legislation to remedy it, these hon. gentlemen folded their arms and took the ground that it was no part of the business of Parliament to consider how, by legislation, our commercial interests could be promoted, but that on the contrary it was a matter which must be left to the ordinary laws of supply and demand, and that in relation to a commercial policy Parliament should have regard simply to the question of raising so much revenue to meet the expenses of the Government. Sir, we pointed to the West India trade—gone. We urged that a change should be made in the sugar duties, not altogether for the purpose of promoting refining in Canada, but of promoting the West India trade through refining in Canada. That was the policy we urged and that policy was adopted. Did it produce the effect?

Mr. VAIL. No.

Mr. WHITE. Let the hon. gentleman look at our import trade from the West Indies to-day, compared with our import trade from the West Indies in 1878, and will he tell me that the result of the policy that has been adopted has not been to bring in raw sugars instead of the refined sugar, which formerly came from the refineries of Great Britain and the United States, by that means to promote trade with the country of production instead of with the country where the sugar was refined? Sir, I know that the people of Halifax have an idea that a rearrangement of the method of collecting the duty might have the effect of promoting still further trade with the West India islands to the prejudice of trade with other foreign countries. I know they have an idea down there—I am not going to say whether it is correct one or not; that is a matter, I fancy, that the people will have to arrange with the Government—I know they have an idea that if people could be prevented from introducing raw beet root sugar, they would have a larger quantity of sugar brought in from the West Indies. That may be true, and it may be wise to adopt that policy. I am not discussing that question; but what I am discussing is this, that the policy which was adopted has had the effect of bringing enormous quantities of raw sugar from the West Indies, and creating in that way a trade with those countries of sugar production which, at that particular time, had practically ceased to exist. Then, Sir, we pointed out to them, with respect to the tea trade, that their policy was destroying the distributing trade in Canada, that the large tea merchants were being deprived of the business which legitimately and fairly belonged to them, and that American merchants were becoming distributors, not to the advantage of Canadian consumers, but to the disadvantage of Canadian merchants. We pointed out how that might be remedied. But the hon. gentlemen said: No, we will do nothing of the kind; that is a matter we have not care of, that affects us not in the least. Well, Sir, that policy was changed, and what has been the result? Let the hon. gentleman look at the figures of the direct importations from China and Japan, as compared with what they were in 1878, and let him look at the distributing trade in the hands of Canadian merchants, results which have been secured since the National Policy has come into play. If he will look at other industries he will find similar results. That men who, before, could have little chance, and less chance in view of the steadily growing condition of things in the United States, than they had before to continue business in Canada successfully under the competition of the manufacturers of that country, have been able to carry on business since. In 1873, in 1872 and still further back, during the period of and succeeding the American war, when there was an inflated currency on the other side, when values were exceedingly high there, when, as the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) admitted in his speech the other night, the smuggling was from this side into that country, there was no necessity for protection, no necessity for a high duty. We had, as a matter of fact, in the conditions which existed in the two countries at that time, even a higher protection in our favor than the protection we have had since, in view of the relative conditions which existed between the two countries. But as those conditions changed, as, according to the statement of the hon. gentleman, the smuggling is from that country into this, instead of from this country into that, then came into play the policy which has been and is now adopted, and without which the vast majorities of the industries of this country would have ceased to exist and the capital invested therein would have been absolutely destroyed. No policy can compensate for the want of capital; no policy can compensate for the want of skill, because in these days we have keen competition, we have improved machinery, and when the appliances are so great as they are the competition is necessarily keener than it was before. And all we propose to do, all the Government policy proposes to do, is to give to the skilled, industrious, competent manufacturer, the opportunity of carrying on business in fair competition with his American neighbors who are engaged in the same occupation. I believe that at this moment there are indications that trade is getting into a better condition. We have been enjoying for some time past the free traders paradise—a cheap country to live in. The real trouble has been that articles have been too cheap, and that very thing which hon. gentlemen opposite have been arguing we should endeavor to bring about is the very thing which has produced the difficulty from which to some extent, we have been suffering during the last twelve months. Go to a merchant and ask on what his hopes rest for a revival of business. He will tell you, in the fact that prices are beginning to stiffen, as he expresses it, and there are likely, therefore, to be better times. I say there are indications of that at this moment, indications that give hope to the commercial community that things are going to be better than they have been recently. Then we have an indication in the revenue for the last two months, as compared with the corresponding two months of last year, that there is a probability of a revival of trade. I shall be sorry, I have no hesitation in saying it, if merchants imagine that all possible difficulty has passed away. But I am satisfied of this, that business in this country is at this moment in a condition of great promise than has prevailed for the two years past, and that by reasonable precaution on the part of the commercial community we are likely to enter upon a period of substantial prosperity.

similar to that which we enjoyed a year or a year and a half ago. We have some evidences of this in what is said by the people. Take the city of Montreal, which may be said to be in some sense a barometer showing the commercial condition of the country. The Star, which is certainly not a conservative newspaper, and it is certainly not a liberal one in the party sense, sent a reporter to find out from the different merchants and manufacturers of Montreal what was the present condition of trade. He found that vast differences of opinion existed. He heard in some quarters statements that there were a large number of people out of employment; in other quarters that times were tolerably dull; but he found in other quarters, and the curious fact is, that in those quarters where they had the means of making a substantial test, the condition of things was reported to be a great deal better even than the editor of the Star had imagined them to be. For instance, Mr. McMillan, superintendent of the Protestant House of Industry and Refuge, reports that there were in the institution during the first three weeks of January, 1884, 2,840 inmates, and during the same month of 1885, 1,956, a decrease of about 900. The number of meals distributed, because that institution distributes meals, taking the same months, was, in 1884, 8,467; in 1885, 6,033, or a decrease of about 2,500. That does not look like a serious condition of things in a great manufacturing city like Montreal. On the contrary, it shows that the destitution among the working class is just about the normal destitution prevailing at the same season in other years. We have in Montreal, as they have in Toronto and other cities, institutions for taking care of the poor and helpless who will always be with us; we have those institutions to which wealthy men, recognising the responsibilities of wealth, contribute of their money in order that persons may not suffer want or starvation; and we find in Montreal that the condition of things is, as I have stated, at that leading institution, as between that period of 1885 and 1884. We find Mr. Gilbert, of the Canada Engine Works, saying:

"The men are working full time. The firm has discontinued altogether the manufacture of steamboat engines, and the employes are engaged solely upon work for the establishment, repairing dredges, etc. There have been a large number of applications for work from workmen, sometimes as many as twelve a day, and tales of distress are frequently heard. They had no personal knowledge of any cases of absolute want, but had heard rumors of instances in which the men hardly knew how to get a living. Mr. Gilbert is of the opinion that there will shortly be an improvement in the state of trade, as matters have begun to assume a more favorable aspect in the States.

"The railway car wheel manufactory of Messrs. John McDougall & Co. is running full blast, and has a full complement of men employed. It was learned here that there had been a great many applications for work, but in nine cases out of ten the unemployed were either men of unsteady habits or men who could not take such work as he offered them."

There is no one who knows anything about large cities who does not know that this is unfortunately a class to be found in them at all times, and unfortunately there are numbers of them who appeal to the charity of those who are disposed to be charitable.

"A responsible employe of the foundry said that in his opinion there was lots of work for all men who are of good character and men who wanted work.

Then I find that:

"About four hundred hands are employed at the mills of Messrs. Belding, Paul & Co., silk manufacturers. Of these, about one-fifth are men. There has been no decrease in the number of employes as compared with this time last year," said an official. "There have been no more applications for work than formerly, and there is no more distress among the bread winners." The official who tendered this information stated that business is not as much demoralised here as in the States. They have had some employes who went to the other side for work, return to them after a short time with the intelligence that in the face of the high rate of living and other similar circumstances, they were unable to secure as good a living as in Canada."

Then I find that both of the sugar refineries were practically working at full time. Then I have the statement of a gentleman whose opinion will be received by hon. gentlemen on the other side as of some value—Mr. J.K. Ward, the gentleman who was the Liberal candidate in West Montreal at last election, and who, if report speaks truly, will be the Liberal candidate there at the next election. He says: "So far as the cotton trade"—and he is largely interested in that trade:

"So far as the cotton trade was concerned, the mills were not employing their full number of hands; the Merchants Company were running about two-thirds of their machinery; the St. Ann's about one-third or a half, and the Hudon about two-thirds. Of course in all cases the best hands has been kept on, and the inferior or unsteady ones have been dismissed. In the timber trade —

In which Mr. Ward is also largely engaged,

"there was the usual slackness, but married men often refused to go out in the lumber camps where they would get good wages, and preferred to remain at home in idleness. He did not think that there was very much more than the usual number of unemployed work people."

Then Mr. P. W. St. George, who is city surveyor, and is in a peculiarly favorable position to know something of the labor market in Montreal, says:

"That he was of the opinion that there are no more laboring men out of employment now than there have been during the past few winters. He remarked that after the recent heavy snow storm his foremen had been unable to procure the required number of men to clear the streets, and when the ice roads were made, considerable difficulty was experienced in procuring laborers."

Now, that does not look as if people were seriously—there are always a number of them—as if an unusual or abnormal number of people were out of employment. Mr. King, of Rogers & King, founders, said:

"He believed that the want said to be existing in Montreal was not greater than that usually found at this period every year. Investigation would show that the majority of those out of employment were laborers who worked along the docks in summer. The works of his firm are running full time, and employing over 110 men. They have not discharged a hand, nor have the wages suffered any reduction. A greater boom in business is anticipated at an early date."

Mr. A. F. Gault, the well known director of the Hochelaga cotton mills, said:

"We have not discharged one hand on the score of retrenchment during the season, but, on the contrary, want more weavers; our staff now numbers about 900 operatives at Hochelaga, all told, and 400 at St. Ann's, all working on full time and at current wages; any rumor of distress through discharge of hands from our mills is without the slightest foundation."

Now, Sir, it will be seen, with regard to that, that the condition of things in that large manufacturing and commercial centre is about the same as the year before, and certainly no one will pretend to say that the condition of things the year before was a condition of distress or depression in connection with the business of the country. The hon. gentleman made complaint as to the future policy of the Government. Referring to their failure in the past, as he described it, he said there were no references whatever to the question of a treaty with the United States, and he evidently thought that was, on the part of the Finance Minister, a serious omission in a Budget Speech in a time like the present. The hon. gentleman is quite right in saying that this year we shall enter on a new condition of things; that the lapsing of the Washington treaty will close the markets of the United States to the fish of the Maritime Provinces and Quebec. But, what I am bound to say, is rather remarkable, is to hear these hon. gentlemen who denounced, as we all remember they did denounce, the Washington treaty when it was adopted; who charged the First Minister with having been a recreant to his trust as a Canadian, in consenting to that Washington treaty at all, now conjuring up enormous evils as certain to result from the lapsing of the very treaty whose enactment in the first instance they so strongly condemned. In the elections of 1872, as I remember very well, their strong card was "the Washington capitulation," as they were pleased to call it, and we were told that the Government committed an act of arrant folly in entering upon the treaty at all. Well, if that was true, if the treaty was a bad one; if it was one which should not have been negotiated; it seems to me that we should not be seriously alarmed now, when the time has come when we are to be rid of a bad bargain. But I did agree with the hon. gentleman then; this country did not agree with him then, and I am satisfied the people of this country, not agreeing with him then, realise that it would be to the advantage of Canada, and to the advantage of the United States as well, if we had fair reciprocal relations, both as to fish and the other natural products of the country, between those two great peoples. But when the hon. gentleman says that there has been no reference to treaties, he does not quite state the fact as it exists. We find that this Government, in the very first Session in which they met Parliament as a Government, placed on the Statute Book, an enactment which was practically an invitation to the people of the United States to enter into reciprocal relations with them. They took the power from Parliament, that whenever the United States chose to remove the duty, chose to enter into reciprocal relations with them, they would have authority to enter into those relations. The Finance Minister is charged with having made no reference to treaties in his speech; but we find that he has, in a much more formal manner than by a mere speech, by resolutions which he has submitted to Parliament and which will be embodied in an Act of this Parliament—taken power to arrange for such a treaty, if the United States are disposed to enter into it. We have imposed duties on fish, and I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite will not say that that is not a wise thing to do with them, in view of the fact that the American market has been closed to us. We have adopted, in regard to fish, practically the same policy which has been the policy of this Government in relation to other matters. Not having reciprocity of trade, we are going to have reciprocity of duties; and those duties are imposed so that the Canadian market may, to its extent, be supplied by our own fishermen—the Canadian market is to be kept for the Canadian fishermen. But while doing that the hon. gentleman has put into his resolution this proviso:

"Provided, that the whole or part of the said duties hereby imposed may be remitted upon proclamation of the Governor in Council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that the Governments of the United States and the island of Newfoundland, or either of them, have made changes in their tariffs of duties imposed upon articles imported from Canada, in reduction or repeal of the duties in force in said countries."

Now, Sir, there is a distinct statement, made in the most formal manner in which a statement can be made—a statement in an Act of Parliament, that the people of Canada are ready to enter into reciprocal relations with our friends on the other side or with our fellow-colonists of Newfoundland, the very moment the one or the other is prepared to enter into arrangements with us. No more formal declaration of the opinion of Parliament could possibly be made; and I think it is a much more dignified way, in view of what has occurred in the past, of dealing with this question, than would be the plan of sending commissioners once more to Washington, to be received as unfortunately as our commissioners have been received in the past. Sir, I had the privilege—I regard it as a very great privilege—during six years, I think, of attending the meetings of the National Board of Trade of the United States. I went there, along with other gentlemen from Canada, as representatives of the Dominion Board of Trade, which was then in existence, for the purpose, not of urging, but of discussing this question of reciprocal trade relations between the two countries. At every one of those meetings we had reasonable and fair discussion; but if hon. gentlemen will look at the records of the National Board of Trade during those years, if they will look at the record of its last meeting, as the expression of the opinion of the merchants of the United States, they will find that that body, in view of what Canada has done in the past, in the way of sending commissioners to the United States, recognise that all that Canada is called upon to do is to indicate its willingness to enter into negotiations, but that, in view of the past, the first advances in that direction should come from the United States. I do not think for a moment that the Government of Canada should stand upon any punctilious form in regard to a matter of this kind. No doubt a suggestion from the British Minister at Washington, for instance, that there was a prospect of fair relations between the two countries, would at once lead to such negotiations as might result in bringing about reciprocity between the two countries. But for the Government of Canada to do as hon. gentlemen opposite indicate they should do, as the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) indicated in his speech, by his reference to this question, was his desire they should do—send down to Washington, without invitation, without suggestion, verbally made or received, another commissioner, to meet with the same humiliation which was meted out to the late Hon. George Brown, when he went there, and when he constructed a draft treaty, which practically gave up everything and got comparatively little in return, and then found that it was not even discussed in the Senate of the United States—that this Government should be asked to do that, is that they should be asked to do what I venture to say the people of Canada, having regard for their own self-respect, would not ask them to do. Now, Sir, we have had in this debate from the hon. gentleman, and we have seen in other quarters as well, extraordinary appeals, both direct and by way of suggestion, to the workmen of Canada. We had in the know-nothing proclamation of the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), a suggestion that we were to have, hereafter, nothing but native Canadians in Canada; that, practically, it was an offence for any man who was not a native Canadian to come into the country or to remain in it. We had the suggestion that the policy of the Government in relation to workmen, and especially with regard to immigration, has not been a favorable policy; and we have had statements by hon. gentlemen on the platform outside of Parliament, and by some of them in Parliament, calculated to excite the feelings of workmen against the Government of the day. For instance, as to the question of the terrible burden which has been imposed on the working men of Canada, the leader of the Opposition, in one of his speeches, in Toronto, I think, made the statement that the direct burden of taxation which workmen have to bear under the present tariff is about $50 per family. Now, Mr. Speaker, one does not know quite how these figures have been arrived at; but if you look at the census of 1881 you will find that at that time there were 812,136 families in Canada. Taking the accepted increase at 2 per cent. a year since that time, there will be an addition of about 50,000 families; so that to-day there ought to be 862,136 families in the Dominion. What were the total Customs duties?—and after all, as a matter of the incidence of taxation, that is all a man has to pay in Canada, because he does not need to pay any Excise duty. If he drinks whiskey, it is his own lookout; it is a luxury; he takes it and he pays for it. If he smokes tobacco, that is a luxury; he is not bound to smoke tobacco.

Mr. BLAKE. Is he bound to take sugar, too?

Mr. WHITE. Is there an Excise duty on sugar?

Mr. BLAKE. No; there is a Customs duty on it.

Mr. WHITE. I am discussing the question of Customs duties, and I have just stated that the Customs duties are what the workmen have to pay.

Mr. BLAKE. Very well.

Mr. WHITE. Does the hon. gentleman agree with me, then?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

Mr. BLAKE. No; what I said was, that the hon. gentleman said the workingman was not bound to take whiskey, and therefore the Excise should not be charged. I ask, was he bound to take sugar, and should the Customs be charged? Does he take sugar in his?

Mr. WHITE. There is a model temperance man for you. There is the hon. gentleman who is going to lead the temperance cohorts in Canada, who is pleading to-day for the support of the temperance people, and who insinuates that whiskey and sugar are equally unnecessary, are one and the same thing, and that because a workingman is not bound to use whiskey, the same argument applies to sugar. Well, I think sugar may be regarded as a necessary of life. I do not think whiskey is a necessary of life. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman thinks so or not.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not.

Mr. WHITE. I do not think so; but I do think sugar is a necessary of life; and when the hon. gentleman endeavors to draw a parallel between the workmen's ability to give up the use of sugar and their ability to give up the use of whiskey, he simply insults the intelligence of the workmen, whose intelligence, let me tell him, he very greatly underrates. I was saying that the Customs duties, and they include sugar, are, after all, what the workmen may be said to have to pay; and the Customs duties in that year amounted to $20,023,890. or at the rate of $23.22 instead of $50 per family, as the hon. gentleman put it.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. WHITE. No? Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that $20,000,000 of Customs duties to 862,000 families is more?

Mr. BLAKE. Does the hon. gentleman want to know the basis of my calculation?

Mr. WHITE. Yes, I do; most decidedly.

Mr. BLAKE. What I stated was reported in the newspapers. I did not exclude the Excise. I took the Customs and the Excise duties, and I pointed out that the consumer paid something approaching 50 per cent. in excess of what went into the Treasury. I took the Customs and Excise duties and I added something approaching 50 per cent., and that made $50 a head.

Mr. WHITE. I see that hon. gentlemen behind the leader of the Opposition are satisfied with that statement.

Mr. BLAKE. It was the statement I made.

Mr. WHITE. What then has become of all the arguments we have had during this debate, as to the relative taxation of the United States and Canada? Are we to be told that because we charge an average here of somewhere about 20 per cent. on our importations—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Nearer 40.

Mr. WHITE—that the man who buys, pays that fine on the article that is produced in the country, and that in the United States, where nearly double is charged, the man who buys does not pay it? Let the hon. gentleman take one ground or the other; but let him not, in this House, as in everything else, take one measure for the people of Canada and a different measure for the people of the United States, in order that he may prove to people outside that the people of Canada are much more burdened with taxation, much less advantageously situated, than the people of the United States. The hon. gentleman should take one position or the other, and I care not which he chooses to take. If he chooses to take his last position, and will apply it all around, to the United States as well as to Canada, he will have to revise the figures he has been giving us and I am sure the Finance Minister will be glad to revise the figures he gave, and will show, upon that basis, that the condition of things in Canada is infinitely more advantageous to the people of Canada than is the condition of things in the United States to the Americans. Every loyal man, every man in Canada who loves his country, will decline to adopt one basis of calculation for Canada and a different basis of calculation for the United States. I will give the hon. gentleman the benefit of the Excise; nay, more than that, I will give him the benefit of the entire revenue, and I find that if he takes the whole revenue, including the revenues from post office and railways, he will find that instead of \$50 per family it is only \$36 per family. Why should the hon. gentleman, with his responsibility as a public man, looking in the future, I suppose he thinks the near future, to be the leader of the Government, and therefore to control the public affairs of this Dominion, why should he go on to a public platform, and, addressing an audience of fellow Canadians, venture to make a statement of that kind, a statement which is false in fact, which is false in inference, which is false in every relation in which you can possibly look at it—a statement which has simply one result, that of creating the impression outside that the people of this country are less advantageously situated than are the people of the United States. These hon. gentlemen have been making their appeal to the workingmen and they talk to us about immigration. Well, in the earlier part of what I had to say, I referred to the condition of immigration during the time they were in office, and I do not feel disposed to repeat what I then said. But what is the position of the Government, as regards the workingmen? In the first place, we have had the announcement from the Minister of Agriculture, in answer to a question put to him by an hon. member of this House, that the Government not only is not going to assist but is actually going to discourage the introduction of ordinary laborers and of ordinary mechanics into Canada; as, in view of the fact that the Pacific Railway will shortly be completed and that there will not be much prospect of any great railway work being constructed then or in the immediate future, it may not be necessary or advisable that these people should come to Canada. We have that statement from the hon. the Minister of Agriculture. Then we have an important statement in the Tariff resolutions which are now brought down. When I was in Gananogue the other day I had an opportunity of visiting a large industry there, and found that industry to be suffering very severely—from what? Not from the honest competition of honest labor paid for at honest prices, but from the competition of prison labor in the United States, hired by manufacturers at 30 cents a day, the products of which were sent into this country to compete against the honest mechanic in Canada, who receives his \$2 a day. What did the Government determine to do in view of this fact? The Government determined to prohibit the products of prison labor coming into this country. That is an act worth dozens of the kind words which, as the proverb tells us, "butter no parsnips," of the hon. gentleman opposite. I am glad to see that Act has been put into force, and that the importers of prison labor have already been made to understand that, hereafter, prison labor will not be allowed to come into competition with the fair labor of the honest mechanic of this country. What more do we find? We find a large part of the hon. gentleman's speech devoted to a denunciation of the policy of the Government with reference to our savings banks; and hon. gentlemen opposite are urging that the interest on the savings of the laboringmen and mechanics should be reduced $\frac{1}{2}$, or 1 per cent, for the benefit of the banks. When these hon. gentlemen were on the stump in Ontario, or addressing a large audience of workingmen in the city of Montreal or the city of Toronto, they had nothing but kind words to say to them; but when they come to Parliament, and they think they can excite against the Government the larger interest, as, for the moment, they choose to consider it, of the banking institutions of the country, then they forget the workingmen and they denounce the Government for that measure of encouragement to thrift and saving which the Government have adopted, by giving a fair liberal interest to those who put their money into the savings banks. It has been said these savings banks are injuring the banks of the country; that they are taking deposits which otherwise would go into the banks of the country. A gentleman, one of the best officers in the services, Mr. Cunningham Stewart, who is at the head of the savings banks, in the Post Office Department, read a very interesting paper before the British Association last year, and I take my figures from that paper. I find, taking the classes of persons who are depositing their money in the savings banks, that, in the first place, they comprise 14,000 farmers who had deposits when the paper was written to the extent of \$4,722,000 in the post office savings bank, or an average per farmer of \$337. Now, these hon. gentlemen would be very glad indeed if these farmers who are getting 4 per cent, for their money, and who, when they unfortunately have to borrow, are compelled to pay a great deal more than 4 per cent.—these hon. gentlemen would be very glad to have these farmers deprived of $\frac{1}{2}$ or 1 per cent, on their savings. I would like to see some of those gentlemen before an agricultural constituency in Ontario say to the farmers: 'Gentlemen, this country is being ruined, because you are getting 4 per cent. on your savings instead of 3 per cent., the banks do not like it, and therefore you must give up 1 per cent. Then we find that there are 7,850 mechanics who have deposited their savings to the extent of \$1,422,000 in those banks, or an average of \$181 each. Now surely these mechanics who have deposited, these, on an average, small sums, sums which certainly would not ordinarily go into a bank by way of deposit, surely it is an advantage, an act of kindness and consideration towards them, much more valuable than the statements and praises which are bestowed upon them by hon. gentlemen opposite, to allow them this 4 per cent. interest upon their savings. Then I find that there are trust accounts and young children's accounts to the number of 5,500 and \$170,000, or \$31 each. It does seem to me that it is an advantage, and I know the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) will agree with me in that, because the other day he urged, in a very admirable speech, the importance of encouraging these children still further, encouraging them to collect postage stamps and to put a shilling's worth of them on paper and deposit that. Well, here is an opportunity for these children to take advantage of, with the encouragement of their parents, to collect their pennies and half-pennies and put them into the savings banks, a dollar at a time, under the encouragement of their parents, who become their trustees. It is, I venture to say, a way of encouraging thrift among children which is more valuable than that which the hon. gentleman suggests. And for this reason, that the child may learn not only the benefit of saving but that he may gather those savings at a time when he can get at his little bank and take them out, and it is a great advantage if you can get a little child to understand that, if he puts a penny into a bank, it is better to save it though if he likes he can take it out—that it is better to leave it there until a dollar has accumulated and then to go to the bank and deposit it. But they get their 4 per cent., and the hon. gentleman wants to give them only 3. Then there are 3,000 clerks with \$174 each; 1,600 tradesmen, with \$293 each. Probably these are almost the only ones, if they are tradesmen in the sense of small shopkeepers, who might perhaps keep their money in the ordinary banks. There are 1,470 farm and other male servants, with \$188 each, 1,572 professional men, with \$249 each. Miscellaneous, 1,680, with \$128 each. 12,000 married women, with \$196 each—women who probably have made that deposit against a rainy day, if any misfortune should overtake the bread-winners; 10,500 single women, with \$120 each, and 3,240 widows, with \$214 each. That is the way in which that \$13,000,000 is distributed in the post office savings banks. It shows that these banks in no serious way interfere with the ordinary banking institutions of the country, and I venture to say that the hon. gentleman, when he undertakes to urge that the Government should reduce the interest upon these deposits, is not speaking in the interest of those workingmen, whose good opinion and whose votes at this moment he is so anxious to cultivate. I do not wish to detain the House longer, but, before I sit down, I desire simply to refer to one statement made by the hon. gentleman. After recapitulating all the iniquities of this Government, all the enormous expenditures which it had made, he made up his mind to go to an imaginary statist and find out what he would say upon the question. And he said:

"If I were to take those figures and place them in the hands of any statist of reputation, and if I were to say to him that, in a period of eleven years, or a period of six years, as the case might be, these figures exhibited the progress, the increase in population, the increase in exports, the increase in the total volume of trade, the increase in debt, and in the expenditure of a young country, having large fertile territories not occupied, why, Sir, that statistician would say to me: It is clear, on the face of it from those figures, though I do not know to what country you allude, that some great calamity must have swept over it; either there has been a fearful pestilence, or there has been a fearful war, or there has been a famine in the land; no ordinary causes would account for such an exceedingly slow progress in a young country having large resources yet untouched; there must have been some great misfortune. And, if I came to explain to him that for twelve years not a shot had been fired in Canada, that we had as good harvests and better than our neighbors—"

That is including five years of bad harvests that they had—

"that we had been free from earthquake and pestilence, then the statistician would have been perfectly unable to account for the fact of this extraordinary and unprecedented stationary condition of a country like ours, until I had further explained to him that, although Providence had spared us man had not, and that for the last six years this unhappy country had had a protective tariff, administered by a Government of practical politicians, presided over by a philanthropic Minister of Finance, who desires to increase the greatest happiness of the greatest number—and I do not doubt the hon. gentleman's desire to increase their happiness—by giving to a few hundred persons, influential political partisans, who had access to him, unlimited right to tax the millions of consumers who were not equally fortunate."

That is the picture of this country as stated by the hon. gentleman. Now what is the picture of this country as it really exists, as every gentleman in this House knows that it exists? What has been the progress of this country during the time that the hon. gentleman is pleased to refer to? If I were to go to the statist, to the same statist, Mr. Speaker, and if I were to tell him that here were four small Provinces, with hostile tariffs, with little or no prosperity among them, united together in a Confederation; that during the period to which the hon. gentleman referred, had succeeded in adding to that Confederation illimitable fields, the finest wheat field belts on this great continent; that they had secured an outlet on the Pacific coast, adding there a Province which, although formerly called a sea of inhospitable mountains, is fast developing into the condition which its friends believed it would occupy, that is, one of the most valuable and most prosperous of the Provinces of this great Dominion; that we had during that time bound these Provinces together by a railway, for the purpose of developing the trade of these several Provinces; that we had built up an interprovincial trade, which compensated for the loss of trade which had passed away because of altered conditions in foreign countries, in relation to the class of shipping, more particularly, which is used in the foreign trade of those countries; that we had managed to build a railway which we were just now completing, some 3,000 miles long, which would develop that enormous territory of ours, and united by one great band the two extremities of this Dominion; that we had a system of internal navigation, the like of which the world does not possess, in our canals; that we had built through our great St. Lawrence, light houses and fog-signals until, from the time of entrance at Belle Isle until you got to the western end at Lake Ontario, it was almost like going through a street lighted by lamps at night; that we had adopted a system of marine telegraphy by which intelligence could be received in the commercial centres of any accident to a vessel entering that great St. Lawrence; that we had built up industries in the country which were prosperous, which were employing people, giving them a fair day's wage for a fair day's work; that we had great centres of population, enjoying all the advantages of old world cities—social, educational, commercial; that we had the freest institutions that are to be found on the face of the globe; that we had done all this without adding perceptibly one dollar to the burden of taxation per capita of the people—then, Sir, I would not be afraid to submit the facts as they exist to the statist of the hon. gentleman, and I venture to say the answer would be this: How can it be that, in a country so favored, there are men occupying positions in public life, pretending to be statesmen, who will undertake to deny the advancement, who will undertake, in the interests of a foreign country, because that is the actual fact, to belittle the land which gives them bread and affords them subsistence? Sir, I venture to say that the condition of this country fairly stated, as I said in my opening remark, the full truth told, all the truth told, will leave us, in the estimation of those who may choose to take an interest in our country, in a position of which every Canadian, every true-hearted Canadian, may well be proud.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Mr. Speaker, I will endeavor, in making a few remarks on the subject before the House, and on the statement made by the Finance Minister in reviewing the situation of the country, to do so within a limit that will not weary the House. I think my strength will compel me to be somewhat shorter, at any rate, than the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House, or the Finance Minister when he made his statement the other day. The hon. member for Cardwell has gone over a good deal of ground and gone over it at great length. He has shown himself capable of making two speeches on the same day, and he has also been able to do that after making a speech on the preceding day, which I noticed the correspondent of the Montreal Gazette has termed one of the greatest efforts ever made in this House, and one that effectually silenced the hon. leader of the Opposition.

An hon. MEMBER. And it is true.

Mr. PATERSON. I am not saying it is not true. I only regret I was not here to hear it; it is so seldom we see the leader of the Opposition in that situation, it would have been something worth seeing. But what alarmed me most was, that the article finally wound up by saying that, in fact, the speech left the Opposition without any possible answer. Well, I feel it is a little dangerous for me to follow a gentleman who makes his arguments so completely unanswerable; and yet it may be because I lack somewhat in appreciating the force of his arguments, and the accuracy of his statements, that I think perchance I might touch upon some of the subjects that he has touched upon, and arrive at a different conclusion. I was not surprised that the Finance Minister, in making his statement, colored it somewhat, and gave to it a rosy hue; because I have entertained a belief that the rumor we have heard from time to time that he may soon be elevated to a higher position in the service of his country, as the head of one of the Provinces, would lead him, in making his last Budget deliverance to this House, to take to himself, in his one last effort, all the credit that he had been claiming for himself for years past, though in the estimation of most people this last year has played sad havoc with his reputation. But, if the hon. gentleman who succeeded him is to have his mantle fall upon his shoulders, he assumes a more difficult position and may, perhaps, in the future, be more embarrassed than the present Finance Minister. I do not know, however, that the Finance Minister even could afford to let some of the statements that he gave to the House go out to the people of the country, or go out to the people of England. No doubt his utterances will be read in England by the men who handle, we may say, almost the wealth of the world, who know the affairs of most Governments, who know how their affairs are conducted, their financial position and their strength. I hardly thought that he would have ventured to give us a table and endorse it, by which he pointed out that the Customs and Excise revenue—for that was the drift of his argument—the amount paid in that way by the inhabitants of the Australian colonies is from $30 to $40 per head per annum. I do not wish to enlarge upon that subject. We will endeavor to divide the work somewhat on this side, so that we may not unnecessarily weary the House. No doubt it will be dealt with more fully; and I just mention it as one of the tables he gave us that will bear a little investigation, and that, when properly investigated, and the real state of the case and the difference in the book-keeping are explained, will make him regret that he gave the people of the country to understand that the inhabitants of the Australian colonies were taxed by way of Customs and Excise from six to eight times as much per head as are the people of Canada.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I did not say so. I said five times the taxes. I did not say it was the taxes for Customs and Excise.

Mr. PATERSON. But it was the drift of the hon. gentleman's whole argument. He had just laid down the position in this House that the principle of taxation was what was paid in Customs and Excise, and it was in that connection the statement was made, and I believe it is on that very basis that he computes the amount of taxation that is levied upon the Canadian people. His utterance, of course, is before us, and while I was reading it over I understood him as conveying that meaning through his argument. There were some other statements of the hon. Minister, and the course he pursued was one that I think, perhaps, he would not have adopted had he expected ever to deliver another Budget Speech. He pursued the novel course of placing two or three good years along with the year 1884, which now they reluctantly admit to be a year of depression and of trouble; and by averaging his three or four good years with this one, he says: After all, you are not so very bad off; you have come out pretty well. But I do not understand that system to be a safe or a good one to adopt for a merchant at his usual stock-taking, nor do I consider it a good one for the Finance Minister to adopt at his annual stock-taking. Fancy a merchant who has had three or four prosperous years in business, who had accumulated a surplus, but who, elated with his success, should lavish on the right hand and on the left his savings, till he had nothing left. When he came to the end of the next year, which proved a disastrous one to him, he found he was not making ends meet, and lulled himself into security by putting the profits he had made the three or four years before in with the deficiency of this year, and said: Though it has been a bad year, yet, by putting in the profits of the last three or four years, I am worth so much—although he had not one dollar of that in his pocket, but had given it all away. Where is the difference between the two individuals? The twenty million dollars surplus the Minister boasted about, has he got it in the Dominion Treasury? Has it not been given to the Canadian Pacific Railway, as he told us himself? And have they not put it into an enterprise that is their own?

Have they not put it into an enterprise which, if we may take the tone of the organs of hon. gentlemen opposite at the present time as an indication, is an enterprise that perhaps may not redound to the benefit of Canada as much as at one time they thought it would. I will not allude at any length to the novel statement he made, that he had taken twenty million dollars surplus out of the pockets of the people of Canada by way of taxation, and that he had spent it, as I have said, in giving it to a corporation; and then he turns around and says: Because I gave that to the Canadian Pacific Railway, because I did not pay your Civil Service with it, because I did not use it in some other way in the public service, but gave it to that corporation, you did not pay it all; it never came out of you; it was no taxation. But he has done this, and it has opened up a suggestion to my mind. He has told us that by taking $20,000,000 of surplus from the people of Canada and giving it to the Canadian Pacific Railway, he has by virtue of that lowered the interest that Canada had to pay on the loans in Britain by 1 per cent. I believe that the rate of interest on bonds and securities of other Governments, as well as of Canada, have fallen 1 per cent. on the London money market, and therefore a general cause has been operating. So the Finance Minister of Canada, by taking $20,000,000 of extra taxation out of the pockets of the people and giving it to the Canadian Pacific Railway, has, according to hon. gentlemen opposite, lowered the rate of interest that all nations have to pay when they go on the London market. That is a sample of the rosy statements made by the Finance Minister. Upon those I do not desire to enlarge. There are a few points, however, which I desire to touch upon, and I will in doing so deal with most of the statements made by the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House. I will allude very briefly to expenditure, as a gentleman will follow me who will go into that subject very thoroughly. The Finance Minister at his annual stock taking finds the resources of the country not what they once were, and he finds that the surplus, although he did not lower the rate of taxation, is small, showing that the people have not been able to pay the taxation—$150,000 he thinks it may be, though the present figures would not justify us in anticipating even that sum. A prudent business man would, on finding his business in that position, seek to retrench and economise, and he would lower his expenditure. Is that the course pursued by the Finance Minister? Is there any evidence of economy in framing the Estimates? No. The Estimates for the coming year, 1885-6, are framed on a basis even more extravagant than the expenditure for the year 1883-4; and we are proceeding with our resources diminishing and our expenditure increasing, till, instead of the surplus which the hon. gentleman anticipates at the end of 1885-6—unless there should be a change that he cannot at present predict—we shall stand in the position which those hon. gentlemen formerly affected to look upon with great alarm, that of being unable to make both ends meet. There have been comparisons made by the Finance Minister with respect to the expenditure under the Mackenzie administration and under the present administration. I look at it in a hurried manner, and I simply point to this fact, that those hon. gentlemen, since they have been in office, have increased the expenditure $7,604,548 since 1878. Taking that part which is the ordinary expenditure, which those hon. gentlemen told us was controllable, and which Ministers could control, as well as they could control their own expenditures, there has been an increase during those years under their management of $5,751,804. How has the increase taken place? The Finance Minister has alluded to it. The member for Cardwell (Mr. White) has alluded to it, and they have given explanations with regard to it, some of which hold good: nevertheless, the fact remains that such increase has taken place, and reasons might be pleaded by the Finance Minister for an increase, were the increase twice as great as it is. But is it an excuse for the Finance Minister, who declared that twenty-two and a half millions was a sufficiently large sum with which to conduct the affairs of the country, and who denounced us for being extravagant when the Reform Administration took twenty-four millions with which to carry on the public business, to say that the public service has increased and he is therefore justified in taking seven millions more? How has this ordinary expenditure been increased? Take civil government. There you find an increase in the staff of 229, or an increase of 57 per cent. in the staff of the civil service since hon. gentlemen opposite came into power; and an increase in salaries of $254,837, or 57 per cent. Grant increased population, grant increased work, will anyone tell me that there has been anything like 57 per cent. more work required to be done now as compared with 1878? Will anyone say that 57 per cent. more hands are required in the public departments than were required in 1878, when this Chamber rang with the denunciations of hon. gentlemen opposite with respect to the extravagance of the Mackenzie administration, and in having so many clerks that they were said to be running over one another in the corridors of the buildings. The hon. member for Cardwell has resurrected an old saying and applies it to the Opposition, and termed us an organised hypocrisy. What is the hypocrisy of those hon. gentlemen who found fault with the Mackenzie Administration for increasing the number of employes and increasing their salaries, and now stand up to justify an increase of 57 per cent. in the staff and 57 per cent. in the amount paid to it? I will now take up the subject on the discussion of which the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) spent so much time, namely, the statistics with respect to the population of the country, with special reference to the increase of the population. First, as to the question of immigration. While I admit that under the Mackenzie Administration there was an expenditure for immigration purposes, I hold, as I held last year, that under the circumstances in which the people found themselves, there was no necessity, nay, more, that it was absolutely wrong to take money from the people of this country and expend it in bringing immigrants of the laboring and mechanical class to this country. We have, since the advent of the present Administration, spent $2,000,000 on this work. What has been the result? That leads me to look at the present state of our population. I will not enter into disputed territory, but I will take the statistics of hon. gentlemen opposite, the census returns. I find, in 1881, in the four Provinces that originally made up the Confederation, there were 4,044,060 people, and in 1871, 3,485,761 people, or an increase in the ten years of 558,299. I take a very low estimate for the natural increase of the country. I take an estimate that the hon. member for Cardwell himself adopted, an estimate below one I would be justified in taking. I take the estimate of the natural increase at 2 per cent. or 20 per cent. in 10 years. But the increase of our population did not amount to 2 per cent., it only amounted to 1.61, according to the figure I have given. Had there been a natural increase of 2 per cent per annum it would have given a population of 697,152 more in 1881 than in 1871. The fact remains that we were short of our natural increase—taking the low basis of 2 per cent. per annum of 138,853, besides losing all the immigrants which an expenditure of $2,000,000 brought into the country. Now, when this fact stares us in the face, what is our justification for spending, as we did last year, over half a million of dollars, in endeavoring to promote immigration? The immigrants that have come into the country, as they claim they have, if they remained in the country, remained in it, according to our own census returns, by the displacement of an equal number of our own Canadian people. These are not American figures, for I am taking our own census returns. Then again, if you take the figures given to us by American statistics of the Canadians entering into the United States, and compare them with the figures of our own Minister of Agriculture, as to the number of immigrants brought into this country, you will find it tending to prove the unpleasant statement which our own census gives forth to the world. If you take the statistics of school population, as the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) has done in Ontario—as I myself did last year for the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, they all point in the same direction, that we had not only not kept the immigrants that came into the country, but that we have actually lost 4 per cent. of our natural increase in ten years; and in this time we have been spending millions and millions of the people's money to promote immigration. It is quite time that the hon. Minister of Agriculture made the announcement that he has made in response to a question the other day, that one class of immigrants at any rate were to be discouraged, were not to be assisted in coming into this country, though he, in company with his colleagues last year, voted down the proposition offered from this side of the House that that should be the rule which should prevail. Now I wish to say a few words with reference to the rules which were laid down by hon. gentlemen opposite in days gone by, as to the means by which a nation should promote its prosperity; and to examine whether these rules have been complied with, and if they have, whether that has been the cause of the prosperity we enjoy. Now I remember very distinctly that the Finance Minister laid down as a proposition, firm and unalterable, as something which would follow as naturally as effect follows cause, that if the imports of the country exceeded its exports, that was a state that evidenced that the country was not in a prosperous condition; but that on the other hand, the nearer we could get the exports to approach the imports, a surer and more inevitable a sign was it that the country was prosperous. In case I should not represent him correctly, I will quote what the hon. gentleman said on this subject in his own words. In 1881, speaking in Toronto, and reported by the Toronto Mail, he said:

"During the last two years we find that we are equalising our exports with our imports. (Cheers). Whatever Free Traders may say, our people cannot understand the theory that the larger the excess of our imports over our exports the more prosperous is the country. We say that as with an individual, so with a nation, and that if he expends more than he receives, poverty stares him in the face. If, on the other hand, his receipts exceed his expenditures, his condition is hopeful. The latter is the condition of the Dominion, if we take into account our receipts for freight."

That was uttered during a year when there was poverty, when the people were unable to import as much as they had in days gone by. The hon. gentleman may say I have read that extract already. True, I have. I have no desire to read this old literature again, but I am forced to do so—Why? Because the Finance Minister laid that down as a rule which would work like cause and effect. And he has not rescinded it; he has not receded from it; he has never said he was wrong in that particular, and therefore he stands to-day in the same position, and that is the rule by which he is to be judged to-day. Now I will test the prosperity of the country under the hon. gentleman, and contrast it with its prosperity under Mr. Mackenzie, by the rule he gives to us himself. And in this matter we are not dealing with guess work at all; we have the accounts given to us by hon. gentlemen themselves, which reveal the facts in reference to this matter which I now read to the House. I take the last four years of the Mackenzie Administration and the last four years of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Why not take them all?

Mr. PATERSON. Why? Because you have been in power a little longer. And is it not, Mr. Speaker, a very modest request for the Finance Minister to ask me to take certain years to please him, when he has tossed his figures about in every possible way in order to make out a case for himself. Am I not taking a fair way, because we are talking of things as they are at present; we must then take the present year and ascertain where we are now, and I do not want to leap over two or three years; and so I take this year, and I must take the three years preceding, and the last four years of the Mackenzie Administration. And what do they show? Surely according to the rule laid down by the Finance Minister, if when our imports exceed our exports poverty stares us in the face, four years is long enough to face that stern and gaunt poverty. Now, in 1876, the balance of trade, according to the Trade and Navigation returns, was against us $12,243,911; in 1877, $23,452,569; in 1878, $13,758,120, and in 1879, $10,473,172, or in the four years the balance against us was $59,927,772. Compare with that the last four years of hon. gentlemen opposite. In 1881 the balance against us was $7,040,017; in 1882, $17,282,297; in 1883, $34,168,218, and in 1884, $24,990,547, or in these four years an adverse balance of $83,481,079, against an adverse balance during the four years of the Mackenzie Administration of $59,927,772. And will you believe it, during the last four years we were absolutely and relatively worse off than we were under the Mackenzie Government by $23,553,307, and yet the hon. gentleman says we have been prosperous all the way through. Now, the hon. gentleman must either say that he was wholly and totally wrong when he laid that down as a rule, as he did in Toronto; or if he will maintain it, as he does maintain it, then out of his own mouth I convince him that the country is in a worse position, and is brought nearer to poverty under his management than under the management of hon. gentlemen on this side, when, according to the Finance Minister and his friends, the country was in such an unprosperous condition. I desire now to ask the Finance Minister what he thinks with reference to what he predicted a year or two ago, as to the length of prosperity this country would enjoy. The hon. gentleman said first, you know, that we were to have ten years of prosperity, and a year or two afterwards he modified his statement, though he stood to it that we would have seven years. Sir, at the very time he was making the prediction the banks were pursuing a conservative course; men who were authorities on this matter were beginning to curtail and draw in sail; and now the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) has told us that by the conservative course which has been pursued by importers and others, greater depression than at present exists has been averted. What a commentary on the foresight, on the sagacity, on the financial intelligence of a gentleman entrusted with the finances of this country, that the only way the country was saved from greater depression than exists, was by flying in the face of the Finance Minister and doing the direct opposite of what he told us. And yet the ship of state is under the guidance of that hon. gentleman whose supporter has told us that only by disregarding his advice to put on sail, only by reefing the sail, have we escaped greater depression than the country suffers. Another matter that I have a little curiosity about is, to find some of the millions of dollars of capital that the Finance Minister said was going to come into the country immediately after the elections of 1882. Now, I think he has a right to take the House into his confidence, and to tell us just where that money has been expended—where those millions are to be found—where the happy employees who were coming are employed; because I notice that his commissioners who were sent to scour the country have failed to report that they have found any, and they would have reported had there been any. Now, what did the hon. gentleman tell us in May, 1882, in addressing a mass meeting in this city? I am quoting the Ottawa Citizen, which I am sure reports exactly what he said:

"Gentlemen, if the people do as we have no doubt they will, as Ottawa will, record their votes in favor of the present Government, then we will find capital pouring in. When I have been in other parts of the country, in the United States and elsewhere, and have come in contact with capitalists in all directions, there is an uncertainty as to the course which this country will pursue. There are many industries that will be established the moment the question is settled."

Then he told us that he had been waited upon by two gentlemen within the last three months prior to the time of his making those remarks, one representing a capital of $2,000,000 and the other a capital of $5,000,000, and they wanted to invest in this country. We know, they said, that the thing is all right, and we are ready to put in our money, but we do not know whether this policy will last or not; we are not certain about that. The Finance Minister assured them that it would be permanent. He said, look at the bye elections; there have been a great many bye elections, and we have been sustained. He said to the people of Ottawa: That is the reason we have dissolved Parliament a year ahead of time, so that we could settle this question, and if this Government were returned to power, the millions would at once come into this country. I will give you his words:

"Another gentleman who came since Parliament opened, who represents a capital of $5,000,000, is, I think, satisfied that this policy is going to be sustained, because the gentlemen whom he represents are purchasing property in this country to-day, and investing capital in erecting buildings; so that after the 20th June, next, they are prepared to put over a million of dollars in here to develop the country."

That was the 20th of June, 1882, when there was to be the general election. The day after they were going to put in a million. And the people cheered. I know that the people of Ottawa like to hear about millions coming into the country. Then, he said:

"Gentlemen, it is because we want this affirmed, and believe it will be affirmed, that we are ready and prepared to appeal to the people and ask them for their endorsement. If they do not endorse it, then I believe a public calamity will befall the country—that the millions of dollars about being invested in this country would be withdrawn, and that there would be a retrograde movement."

I want to know where the millions are. Will the member for Cardwell tell me? We have paid some hundreds of dollars—I do not know whether it will not run into thousands—for commissioners to go through the country to find evidences of prosperity. They have not found these men; they have not found these millions. And years have gone by since the Finance Minister told us that they would come in the day after the 20th of June, 1882. Well, I am little curious about another matter—about his declarations with reference to the grand effect of the National Policy, in his speech delivered in this House in 1882. I want to know whether the statement he made to this House then, standing in his place, with the responsibility upon him of leading, in a measure, this House, of controlling one of the most important departments of the Government, has been fulfilled. He made this statement:

"The hon. gentleman opposite (Sir Richard Cartwright) imposed burdens on the people, but gave them no food to supply them with strength to carry them. We asked Parliament to give us such changes in the tariff as would not only protect the industries of the country, but give us an increased revenue. Was there a response? I stated at the outset that the response was ample, provided the money had been paid in for the year 1879 that belonged to that year. And the year that followed, what was the response? They gave us a surplus of $4,000,000 and upwards, because we found employment for the people, because, by obtaining for them employment and higher wages, they were able to buy more than formerly. Men who were formerly working at half time and on low wages received higher wages and were working overtime. Farmers who had low prices and found sales difficult received high prices and prompt cash sales."

Well, the Finance Minister said that he did this. If he did it once, he is able to do it again. It is not for me to doubt the word of the Finance Minister; no, I must believe him; but believing him, I must arraign him for now being recreant to the trust placed in his hands. He claimed that he had power to give men full time work and to increase their wages. He has not given them work, for idle men are crying for work. He has not given them higher wages, but has allowed some employers to cut down their wages 10 per cent. He claimed that he had power to bring the farmers higher prices for their grain. If I believe him, I must arraign him for being recreant to his trust, in that he has allowed the receipts of our farmers to dwindle down to a comparatively small sum, because he allowed the price of wheat to drop to 70 or 75 cents a bushel. No, I do not impugn the veracity of the Finance Minister; that would be wrong; but accepting his statement as true, I must arraign him for proving recreant to his trust. I call upon him to get the idle men the employment he promised, to get the working men the increased wages he promised, and to get the farmers the higher prices he promised. Why, he has failed most lamentably in everything. He told us, among other things, that he would secure to our farmers the home market for their perishable stuff, or the little articles that might be consumed on the spot, instead of allowing so much of it to be shipped away to foreign countries, where they could not get so much for it. We had not then received the Trade and Navigation returns for 1882, to ascertain what correctness there was in the statement he gave us, but we have since; and what is the fact? Has his promise to give the farmers a home market, avoiding the necessity of sending their produce out of the country been fulfilled? Let the returns speak. Instead of having this home market for all the butter and cheese that is made here, they had to export 2,000,000 lbs. 1,000,000 lbs. more than they did in the last year of the Mackenzie Administration; in cheese they had to export 12,000,000 more than they did under the Mackenzie Government; in eggs they had to export about $1,000,000 worth more in 1882, when the Finance Minister was boasting of having given a home market to the farmers of the country, than they did in 1873; in potatoes, that ought to have been eaten at home by the operatives whom the Finance Minister was to have set at work, nearly $2,000,000 worth more had to find a foreign market in 1882, when he claimed to have a home market, than during the last year of the previous Administration; and so on through all the list. Now the question may be asked what position did the Finance Minister, what position did the Government, take in the year 1882, that has not been overthrown, that has not had to be abandoned by them? The hon. gentleman may claim that he said he would benefit the manufacturers of this country; he may stand on that. Well, in order to establish that, he had commissioners appointed last summer to go through the country and prepare statistics relative to the various industries in the country and report to Parliament. I desire to comment on those statistics for a short time, but before doing so I will tell you, Sir, that I approach the investigation, or partial investigation, not prepared to place very implicit reliance in what I should find there; and I will tell you why. Because, in 1881, the Finance Minister took occasion to collect statistics, as he informed the House. What they were, we do not know; we never saw them; the source from which he obtained them, I do not know; but he gave to the House statistics to show that there had been a very great increase in the manufacturing industries of the country. He dealt in generalities, but in one or two items he came to particulars, and one of the branches he particularised was that of boots and shoes, and the statement of the hon. gentleman, in 1881, was that there was 25 per cent. more men employed in that industry and 25 per cent. more goods produced in 1881 than in 1878. Well, I had the curiosity to look up the census of 1871, because if we were making a certain amount of those articles in this country in 1871, we must, by the actual growth of the country, have been making more in 1878; but when I compared the statistics which the Finance Minister gave, in 1881, with the census returns that his own officials took in 1881, I found that, instead of there having been an increase of 25 per cent. in the hands employed and 25 per cent in the quantity of goods produced, there were actually 125 men less employed in manufacturing boots and shoes in 1881 than in 1871. He may say the census returns were inaccurate, but if he does he is casting odium upon the administration of a Department of this Government. It is from his own census returns that I judge the statement he made, and as the statements he then made were extravagant, I claim that the report of the commissioners laid before this House is utterly misleading in character, and that the Finance Minister in giving them to the House in bulk as he did, in endorsing them as he did from his place here, is whether by design or not, misleading the country on a very important matter. Let us examine a little the statistics and see what they show, that we may ascertain if we can see whether there is any internal evidence of accuracy on the part of the statistics they contain, whether there is much reliance to be placed on them. They were gathered, I venture to say, for the purpose of enabling the Finance Minister to cover somewhat the position in which he stands before the people and the country to-day, that of having failed to implement the promise he made in 1882 to the people, when he asked them for a renewal of their confidence. The hon. gentleman appointed two commissioners. The commissioner he appointed for New Brunswick is a gentleman I do not know.

Mr. BOWELL. A very good man.

Mr. PATERSON. I believe he is a very good man. I understand he was a very good supporter of the Mackenzie Government all the time it was in power, and I believe he lost confidence in them shortly after they lost the confidence of the people of the country.

Mr. BOWELL. He was like a good many others.

Mr. PATERSON. And that in order to benefit the people of the country and maintain the interests of the country, and the prosperity of the country, he supported the present Government.

Mr. BOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. PATERSON. And got some patronage, did he not?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON. His newspaper continued in existence, so long as the former Government was in power, did it not?

Mr. BOWELL. We did not give him so much.

Mr. PATERSON. There appears to have been a disaster to an industry in that case, at any rate, under the hon. gentleman's own rule. It may have been a struggling industry under Mr. Mackenzie, but it did struggle and live; but when hon. gentlemen opposite came into power it was too much for them, and the Morning News, I think that was the name of the paper, succumbed. I only heard this, but the hon. gentleman, the Minister of Customs, vouches for its accuracy. Now that is saying nothing against the gentleman himself, because there are very good men who have failed in business and have been unsuccessful. But I am more pleased with him as a writer than as a statistician, though I believe, to do him credit, that when he started out on his work, and before he received subsequent instructions—for I fancy he got instructions after he got partly through his work, because he was doing it a little too thorough—that thorough work most effectually disproves the balance of his report as well as the whole of the report of the commissioners for Ontario and Quebec. He indulges in some general remarks. He tells us:

"With a view to thoroughness, I made my investigations in St. John and Portland embrace everything, large and small, that could be fairly considered industrial, except farming."

I want the House to remember that, because it is the only case in which the work was done thoroughly; and presently I will look at this portion which was done thoroughly and see whether it gives the extra production in that year claimed by the hon. Minister. He continues:

"I think I have gained not only accurate information as to the number of persons employed in connection with industrial pursuits during the two periods and the amount of the earnings of the class, but a pretty accurate idea of the general condition and of the industries at the present time and an insight into their perplexities and resources of encouragement. The information I submit in connection with this report and without embellishment and in the order and form in which it was gathered."

Then he says:

"The bad crops of the past two years, over-production, the diminished purchasing power of the industrial classes from this cause, the locking up of capital by investments in non-productive enterprises, over-production in certain industries, depression in the lumber trade, and the revolution which the substitution of steamers for sailing craft has brought about in the carrying trade of the world, are among the leading causes variously assigned for the troubles which have clustered around the year 1884."

There is their own commissioner admitting that troubles have clustered round the industries of the year, and he points out the causes which have led to it; and I want the House to remember that, in the Order in Council appointing these gentlemen, it is definitely stated that they are appointed to gather information to enable the Government to mould legislation in the proper direction to find out if there are any causes at work that are not working properly, if there are any defects that require to be remedied, so that they may apply the remedy. Well, he gives the cause. It is "the bad crops of the past two years."

Where is the legislation introduced to remedy that? Do I ask a foolish question? To say so would be to impute foolishness to the Finance Minister, for he has claimed credit for good crops and for the prosperity that flows from them. "Over-production" he gives as another cause. Has the Finance Minister taken any steps to stop over-production? I do not see anything in the tariff to lead us in that direction. He points out "the diminished purchasing power of the laboring classes." Has any legislation been introduced to increase their purchasing power. He points out "the locking up of capital by investments in non-productive enterprises." Has any scheme been devised or any legislation proposed to release this capital locked up? The Finance Minister might perhaps reply: How can I do that? It is not for me to answer. He claimed he could do almost everything; he claimed that he could give you prosperity, whether other countries were prosperous or not. His utterance are on record. I tell him to release the locked up capital. He points out "over-production in certain industries." Why does he not stop that over-production? Does he say that then these men would lose their capital? Then let him give it back to them in a more direct way. Let him give them a bounty out of the public funds. It would not be much more than he has done to some classes, not much more than he proposed in some cases when he introduced and carried through his tariff. These are pointed out as the causes which are operating to produce distress. These gentlemen were appointed—so their appointment shows—in order to find this out, so that proper legislation might be introduced. We ought to have had it. If we do not have legislation to remove these causes, then the labors of these men have gone for nothing; they have been appointed, they have been set to work, the information they have gathered has been set at naught, and no action has been taken in regard to it. Now we come to the city and county of St. John and Portland, and I ask you to bear in mind again the remark of this gentleman, that his work there was thorough work, that he did not go into a few industries, but that he went into and examined large and small—the only thorough way in which this could be done. But, before giving us the table, he gives us a nicely written description of St. John and how it is situated. I do not know whether he thought the members of this House—and the information was gathered for the members of this House—did not know where the good city of St. John was situated, but he tells us:

"With reference to the city of St. John, the starting point of this investigation, it may be needful to say that for the benefit of some under whose eye this report may fall, that it is the commercial capital of New Brunswick, and stands at the mouth of the St. John river—that it has a fine harbor open at all seasons, and connection by the Intercolonial Railway east and west, and by the New Brunswick Railway and branches, and the Grand Southern Railway, with the interior and the west and that the districts known as St. John and Portland, although under two corporate systems, are really one in business and industrial life and unitedly form an important commercial and manufacturing centre. The chief staples of this community in a long period of years were ships and lumber. The competition of iron ships with wooden craft in the carrying trade of the world revolutionised the ship-building interests and destroyed the magnificent business which had made for many citizens of this place comfortable competencies, if not colossal fortunes. The demand for vessels of large tonnage is no longer what it once was, and the shipyards do not resound with the busy hum of industrial life."

Is there any proposition in the legislation introduced to this House to get up this hum in the shipyards? If there is nothing of this kind introduced, I declare that the appointment of this gentleman to ascertain facts in order that we may have legislation is a farce and has been set at naught.

"An occasional large vessel finds her way from the blocks in one or another of the almost silent shipyards to supply some special trade requirement of the builder or his friends rather than to find an eager purchaser. The prostration of this trade in wooden ships—how important can best be appreciated by those engaged in shipping ventures—had naturally a detrimental effect upon the prosperity and progress of the peoples of the two cities."

Then I consider that, according to the theories of the hon. the Finance Minister, he utters some doctrine that is very unsound.

"Commercial policies could not bring back the lost trade, Government edicts could not be made to shackle the wheels of progress, legislative enactments were unsuited to revivify waning industries, though capable of stimulating substitute employments."

Then he says, alluding to the fire that laid St. John in ashes:

"Prior to that time industries of various kinds had been struggling into life. A small cotton warp factory has been cautiously worked. Shoe factories are cropping up. Rolling mills, foundries, machine shops, rope walks, and what not, were fighting hard for position in the busy life of the place. But the fight with the competition from the United States superadded to the ordinary competition from Dominion communities, was too much for them. Striving hard they managed in most cases to maintain a fair position, but they did not move onward with the degree of celerity which their promoters and friends expected. They worked hard, but merely for an existence and without heart. The struggle was one of desperation, but there came a chance at last. The National Policy dawned in 1878, and, though not meeting with a cordial endorsement from the trading people of St. John, was not without a goodly host of ardent admirers and warm friends. The sturdy mechanic rejoiced at its adoption, and the struggling manufacturer bade its hearty welcome. The enforcement of the policy gave new life, new energy, new heart, to a people suffering from a trinity of calamities. New industries were started, and old industries were strengthened. The busy life of the place improved, and the prosperity, which seemed likely to last for years, loomed grandly up. In the rush of the time short-sighted people counted too much upon the helpful character of a policy which was only intended and could only be expected to furnish 'reasonable refreshments,' and they allowed themselves, partly by the stimulating influences of the policy and largely by the unnatural and transitory stimulation which business of every kind experienced during the hurried rebuilding of the fire-crushed city, to be carried to the verge of folly in many instances. This is not a new, nor yet an unnatural condition of things; it has been common, too, and is linked in with, the history of communities and peoples everywhere. Over-production in special lines was the result in the St. John community, and, to make the matter worse, the world's business got into confusion."

What right had the world's business to get into confusion; just at that particular time, too; and with the hon. gentleman at the head of the Finance Department, controlling the world's business? It was very unfortunate.

"To make matters worse, the world's business got into confusion and general business prostration was added to the injury and the agony thus caused. The St. John people, just gathering a little strength from the succession of calamities, felt the pressure, but they stood the shock, remarkably well, though, of course, not without many business trials and some disasters. Yet withal, the industrial life of St. John still stands in fair condition compared with its state a quarter of century ago."

He is somewhat like the Finance Minister. It suits him better to take one year sometimes than to take another, but he had to go a long way back, from the year 1878, the year he was sent to enquire about, in order to find what he says he found:

"The shipbuilding interest excepted, it contrasts as does the giant oak with the sapling juniper."

Then I can imagine with what a majestic wave of the hand he uttered ere he penned this sentence—"But a truce to mere words for the present; let facts and figures engage attention for a time." Now, then, we will look at the facts and figures. We are now considering the county and city of St. John and Portland that, he tells us, he investigated, in order to be accurate, and it is the only place that was thoroughly gone into. Now what does he find? He finds in the facts and figures that he wants to speak for themselves, that the total number of persons employed all over the city and county of St. John at the various industries was 8,855 in 1878, and 8,862 in 1884. There were seven men more employed in St. John. His work was thorough. He went into the matter, and there were absolutely seven men added to the 8,555 who were at work there in 1878. Who will say that the Finance Minister is not a success? Who will say he has not carried out all he agreed to? I give the Finance Minister credit, as he claims, for what he has done. Let us give him credit for adding seven men to the total number employed in the city and county of St. John in 1878. But I have a serious charge against him. He allowed the weekly wages of these men to fall $1,769.16. We give him credit for adding seven men to the eight thousand odd, but to let their weekly wages fall $1,769, I think, is rather too bad. "A truce to mere words, let facts speak for themselves." Now, I desire to say this, because, I think, in dealing with these matters we should be fair. He goes on to explain this fact, that in 1877 the city of St. John was, unfortunately, destroyed by fire. It was a calamity that, I am happy to say, was not without one compensating advantage, if I may use that expression. It is under calamities great as that that we are led to feel that we are one people. We are not drawn together as closely as we desire to be, yet when the telegraph wires flashed from one end of this Dominion to the other the fact that one of our cities, though its inhabitants were unknown to us personally, had suffered as St. John had suffered, meetings were at once called, resolutions were passed, money was poured in from the cities and towns of Ontario, to help our sister city repair the devastation caused by the fire. It had that compensating advantage. By the enterprise and energy of the men of St. John—and I say there is energy and enterprise in the city of St. John; it stands out prominently, as one must see, as I saw it myself this past summer for the first time—the enterprise of these men led them to go on and rebuild the city, and make it as beautiful as I have no doubt it was before. But, he says there were, in rebuilding that city, some more laborers and builders set to work than otherwise there would have been; they have not all gone away since 1878, and that raised the total number that were to be found in 1878 something above what it would have been under other circumstances. But I think you will find, if you look through the figures, that there was not so very many. We have no means of ascertaining how many of them left the city for other countries after the city was rebuilt, and how many remained; but I think, even if you take that into account, that you will find, from what he says, that there would be over a thousand brought into the city through that cause. Now a thought occurred to me here with reference to the remarks this gentleman makes as to the destruction of the city of St. John, and I commend the Finance Minister's attention to it. On the face of it, short-sighted people would say it was an advantage to the city of St. John to be laid in ashes. Why, you would ask? Because it has given employment to extra men in rebuilding the city. But he would be a short-sighted man who would say that the capital that had to be used in this rebuilding had not been lost through the fire, and the people of St. John and the country that much poorer. The output of this capital and the locking of it up in real estate, capital that should have gone into commerce, though it gave a temporary impetus to some kind of business in 1877, nevertheless proved a loss to them because the capital had been sunk and was not productive. Has not the Finance Minister, by his policy, as effectually sunk and destroyed millions of the capital of this country? In 1882-83 he sees extra men at work, but were they not in the position of men employed at St. John who were building up that which, if it had remained, and had not to be rebuilt, would have left greater wealth to the country. The very fact that those men were employed during two or three years in making machinery and erecting factories that are now lying idle, gave the apparent prosperity that we had. The result of it is, that thousands of mechanics have since been out of work, and we are experiencing the depression that is mentioned here. Now, then, having finished with the city and county of St. John, I wish to look at what he says with reference to some other of the towns. He has told us that he worked more thoroughly in St. John than elsewhere. It was just after he got through with the city and county of St. John he, perhaps, received a hint that it was not necessary to go into particulars with respect to every place. He curtails his report. He says he has not time to go through every town; and I suppose we must accept that statement. So when he goes to Prince Edward Island he credits it, in 1884 as compared with 1878, with an increase of 255 hands and a yearly aggregate of products of $44,102. And yet the fact remains that the yearly wages per hand in Charlottetown, in 1884, was only $315, while in 1878 it was $419, a decrease of $104. In Halifax and Dartmouth the yearly wages per hand was, in 1884, $330, as compared with $327, an increase of $3. At the Londonderry iron works he brings before us a very remarkable state of things, which, perhaps, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will kindly explain to us. He gives us the following figures—they may be correct, I do not understand them if they are correct.

Mr. BOWELL. It is not surprising.

Mr. PATERSON. I hear the Minister of Customs say it is not surprising. We will see if he can explain them, and if they are consistent with his ideas. Londonderry iron works are works I should like to see progress. I was very much pleased indeed to see such large works in our midst. I take the same ground that every hon. member on this side takes: that no men in this country desire or are more pleased than we are to see industries growing up and thriving, if they are doing so in a legitimate manner. The figures in regard to the Londonderry iron works are these: In 1878, 500 hands; yearly wages, $171,600; capital invested, $330,020; yearly product, $440,150. 1884, 625 hands; $234,325 yearly wages; $1,460,000 capital; $550,200 products. What I want the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to explain is this: How it occurs that there is an increase in capital equivalent to 442 per cent, while the increase in the number of hands and value of products is only 25 per cent. Such a state of things means sinking capital rapidly. I ask this House if the capital invested in 1878 was not more profitably employed than the capital in 1884. I ask if it is worth while to invest increased capital to the extent of 442 per cent. when the increase in the number of employees and the value of the products is only 25 per cent., and if the country will not rapidly grow poorer under such a condition of things. I think hon. gentlemen opposite will agree with me in regard to this matter. I will now contrast the statements of the two commissioners in order to ascertain how the Provinces are prospering relatively under the tariff. I find that Mr. Blackeby, the Ontario and Quebec commissioner, places the increased number of hands, in 1884, over 1878, at 100 per cent.; yearly wages, 107; product, 126; capital invested, 85; while in the Lower Provinces the increase in the number of hands is put at only 46 per cent.; yearly wages, 32 per cent.; products, 62 per cent.; capital, 62 per cent. These are facts for the Finance Minister to consider, facts furnished by his own commissioners, appointed for the purpose of ascertaining facts, in order to guide him in legislation. Has there been any legislation proposed to increase the number of hands in the same proportion in the Maritime Provinces as in Ontario and Quebec? Why should the tariff be so arranged by that hon. gentleman—and as every blessing comes through the tariff, and so every ill must be ascribed to it—that the increase in the number of hands in Ontario and Quebec is 100 per cent., while it is only 46 in the Maritime Provinces; that the increase of yearly wages in the two Province is 107 per cent as against 32 per cent. in the Maritime Provinces; that the increase of product is 126 per cent. as against 62 per cent.; while the capital increase is 85 per cent. as against 62 per cent. These are matters to which the hon. Finance Minister should direct his attention. He appointed the commissioners for the purpose of ascertaining how the National Policy was working, in order that legislation might be introduced, and he has these facts before him. He has accepted them; I do not accept them. Not only do I consider the information and statistics furnished as worth nothing, but I consider them as absolutely worse than nothing, because I hold they are misleading in their character; and if the Finance Minister were to pay any attention to them and be guided by them, he would land the country in still worse difficulties than those which at present encompass it. Let us look at some of the figures given by the Ontario commissioner. He gives us as the increase in the agricultural implement business: Factories, 46 per cent.; number of hands, 87 per cent.; yearly wages, 90 per cent.; product, 106 per cent.; capital invested, 90 per cent., in 1884, as compared with 1878. I will not dispute the accuracy of this statement, but I have chosen that table for this reason: It is claimed by the Finance Minister that in regard to boots and shoes, ready-made clothing and other articles of that kind, the increased consumption is on account of the increased number of operatives in other factories who require those articles. I call attention to the fact that operatives in factories do not buy reaping and mowing machines and agricultural implements, yet here is an increase in agricultural implements as great as in any other branch of industry. The hon. gentlemen has never yet claimed that he has brought in agriculturists through the operation of his tariff; if he did so it would be stupid, for he has been unable to benefit the agriculturists in the slightest degree. Yet, as I have pointed out, there has been as great a degree of progress in the agricultural implement manufacture as in any other industry, which shows that the claim that there is this extra consumption of manufactured goods, from the fact that articles manufactured in certain branches are purchased by operatives engaged in other lines of manufacture. We come now to a branch of manufacturing of which I know a little about myself, which fact will enable me to furnish the hon. gentleman with some ideas. The hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) has already shown, from information obtained directly from different towns, that the accounts here given of their business are wholly misleading. A certain few factories were visited. I suppose the commissioner went in and asked what number of hands is now employed, what wages are paid, what is the value of the product, what is the capital employed, and how do these compare with 1878. As the statement was given, so it was put down. But the member for South Huron pointed out that while 15 factories were visited in Chatham there are 50 there. Thus, an erroneous idea was given respecting the industry. So it is in respect to other towns and cities. Yet in these statistics, furnished by the hon. gentleman's commissioners, endorsed by the Finance Minister, we are actually forty-four millions better off under his National Policy than we were before. Take confectionery and biscuit manufacturers—which I know something about—and I find that they have increased 12 per cent. in the number of factories, 55 per cent. in the number of hands, 58 per cent. in the amount of wages, 56 per cent. in the value of product, and 54 per cent. in capital invested. The increased factories he gives as 2. In looking over the manuscript I saw the names of these two, and one of the two he mentioned is, according to information I had, to be sold under the sheriff's hammer to the highest bidder, the proprietor making an offer of 25 per cent. on the dollar. The other is not a large one, and then he says:

"In 1877 two or three firms, which were largely engaged in this business, succumbed to the pressure of the hard times then prevailing, and as no one, at that time, felt inclined to invest money in manufacturing pursuits, the trade of these firms became divided amongst those that remained."

I think he is wrong in that—I think this took place in the year 1879, after the National Policy came into operation—though I speak subject to correction. Now then I come to a test which the Finance Minister must accept, which the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) must accept, because they have used it in this House as a test to prove the positions they have taken in previous years, that the industries of the country have thriven, and therefore I say they cannot fairly take exception to it. They have been in the habit of proving, from the increased imports of raw material, that there has been an increase, as they claimed, in the manufactured goods in the country. Let us look at some of the lines. One of the lines which they have been found comparing is hides and pelts. Of hides and pelts imported in 1884, $1,431,848 worth, and in 1878, $1,207,300, or an increase in the importation of hides and pelts, in 1884, over 1878, of only $224,548. I want you to remember the figures, and yet the statistics furnished by this commissioner to the Finance Minister, and which he has himself endorsed, show that there has been $3,835,000 worth more of boots and shoes alone made in 1884 than in 1878, though we only imported $224,000 worth of hides more. But that does not represent it at all, because they did not visit all the factories, and you must add, the Finance Minister said, 50 per cent., and therefore you have of that article of leather alone over $5,000,000 worth of goods made out of $224,000 of raw material.

Mr. SPROULE. The supply is found at home.

Mr. PATERSON. My hon. friend from East Grey says that the supply is found at home. Well, I think that we have exported of live cattle—and I believe live cattle have their hides on—a greater number of late years than before. We come now to woollen factories, and as the Finance Minister told us of that fairness which he said was part of his nature, that desire to be so accurate, I am bound to suppose that he entirely overlooked the importation of wool this year, that he did not designedly do it, but that he just accidentally missed it. In previous years he did not overlook it. I remember him talking about the imports of wool and pointing to them as a proof positive, as something that could not be denied; that there must be a greatly increased manufacture of woollen goods from that fact. He cannot recede from that position. What do these statistics give us, with reference to woollen factories? There was an increase of 54 per cent. in the factories, of 91 per cent. in the number of hands, of 94 per cent. in the yearly wages, of 104 per cent. in the value of the product. There was an increase of 19 factories, of 1,623 hands, or $404,050 extra wages, and of $2,108,900 in the increased value of the product. As I said before, you must add 50 per cent., as they only visited two-thirds of the factories, and thus the statistics presented to the Finance Minister and endorsed by him state that over $3,000,000 worth of extra product came out of the woollen mills of Canada in 1884 than came out of them in 1878. It seems to me that it must have required the importation of a good deal more wool in order to have accomplished that. What were the imports of wool relatively? In 1878 we imported 6,230,034 pounds; in 1884, 6,189,096; in other words we imported absolutely less in 1884 by 40,998 pounds than we did in 1878, and yet we produced $3,000,000 worth more goods with 40,998 pounds less wool. Now that is certainly enough to convince anyone as to the value, as to the accuracy, of the figures we have here. Now I hear my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) trying to find out from his neighbor some solution of this problem, and he wants to know if there is not a duty on wool. Evidently the same idea is running through his head with regard to sheep as he gave utterance to with regard to cattle. I know he will find that the home-grown wool exports in 1878 were greater than in 1884 by $397,259, but even that amount would be very well invested if the woollen factories had taken it and turned out $3,000,000 worth more product, especially as all these mills are said to be selling their goods from 10 to 20 per cent. lower than in 1878, but it is a fact that in 1878 the average export price of wool, according to the Trade and Navigation returns, was 29 cents per pound, while the average export price in 1884 is only 20 cents per pound. I tell the hon. gentleman what he will not deny, that under the fact that wool has averaged lower under this Administration than it did before, men have gone out of the business of raising sheep and growing wool, because it would not pay. But that is not all, because we have another table here with reference to knitting factories, and I think knitting factories use wool, if I am not mistaken—not wholly, but largely. Let us see what they have done. They are credited with an extra product of $1,174,000 worth, and adding 50 per cent. to that, and we have a product of woollen and knitted goods of nearly $5,000,000 extra, with a less importation of wool.

Mr. SPROULE. They got supplied at home.

Mr. PATERSON. I think I answered that by alluding to the export, and if the hon. gentleman will find from the census or any other means that there are more sheep produced, I think it would be well if he would ascertain that point. The Finance Minister himself has paid no attention to the report of the commissioners, further than to use it for a purpose, which I hold is wrong, because it is misleading. He has not used it for the purpose of moulding his legislation; why? Because, as near as I can remember, after looking through the manuscripts, his commissioner from the Maritime Provinces pointed out that what the manufacturers in the Lower Provinces want, in order to enable them to do a more successful business and to compete, is that the Government shall take off the duty on flour; and the Finance Minister has not proposed to do that and he is thus disregarding the information given to him and which he sent the commissioners to get in order to enable him to act. There are other interests that might be taken. In 1881 there was an industry in the country called flour and grist milling. I remember that the mills numbered about 2,000, employed over 6,000 hands, had over $13,000,000 of capital invested, and showed a product of over $40,000,000 a year—the largest industry, I believe—regarding the capital invested and the value of the product—in this country, next to the saw mills; and yet the commissioner who went through the Province of Quebec, apparently by his report, never saw a grist mill, never saw a flour mill, did not know that there was any such thing, and therefore we are bound, according to his report, to assume that there can be no desire or necessity to look after them. The only representation the Finance Minister has with reference to the article of flour, from his own commissioners, sent to make enquiries in order to enable him to bring about legislation, is that certain manufacturers desire that the duty may be taken off flour in order that their business may succeed. Has he given his attention to that representation? Now I come to the charge made against the Mackenzie Administration, that manufactures were languishing under their policy, and were in danger of being wiped out. Let us apply this test of the importation of raw material to these enterprises, and see what is the result. Take the article of cotton. These gentlemen gave a very graphic account of the increased production of cotton. One would think that it was owing to their tariff that we have cotton mills in the country at all. We are not indebted to the present Administration for having cotton mills in this country; we are not indebted to them for that at all; but we are indebted to them for this: that we have cotton mills in this country, in which millions of dollars of capital have been invested, to-day lying idle. I will prove it conclusively. If the cotton mills in this country had been languishing and dying under the Mackenzie Administration, the importations of the raw cotton would have been growing less year by year; but what are the facts? In 1874 we imported 3,514,287 pounds of raw cotton; in 1875, 3,778,109 pounds; in 1876, 5,527,428 pounds; in 1877, 5,578,222, and in 1878, 7,243,413 pounds. Every year of the Mackenzie Administration was increasing the importations of raw cotton, proving that we had cotton mills in the country, and that these cotton mills were doing well and increasing their output year by year. The difference between the importations in 1878 and 1874 was 3,729,126 pounds, or 106 per cent.; and yet these hon. gentlemen talk as if we were indebted to them for the cotton mills we have in the country. I repeat that cotton mills in this country were brought into existence under the Mackenzie Administration; that they were thriving, which the Finance Minister cannot deny, and that the cotton mills are indebted to the present Administration, not for bringing them into existence, but for bringing more mills and more machinery into the country than the country required, causing millions of dollars of capital to be idle, and which may lead to a combination, so that the consumer will have to pay more for his cotton than he would pay in the open market, in order that these men may get some return for the money they have invested. The Finance Minister, touching on this question, said: No man who believes in the National Policy but would like to see these men get a fair return. I can tell him that there is no man who does not believe in the National Policy but desires every man to get a fair return in a fair way; but the Finance Minister knows that these cotton men are not getting a fair return on the money invested to-day in mills which are lying idle. Now, let us apply the same test to the importations of woollen materials. To hear these gentlemen talk, you would think we had no woollen mills in the country prior to their advent. What are the facts as to the imports of wool? In 1874 we imported 3,756,558 pounds of wool; in 1875, 7,947,879 pounds; in 1876, 3,621,296 pounds; in 1877, 4,608,325 pounds, and in 1878, 6,230,084 pounds, an increase in the imports of wool in 1878 over 1874 of 2,473,496 pounds, or 66 per cent. Does that not prove that woollen mills were in existence and were thriving under the Mackenzie Administration long before these gentlemen came into office at all? What then are the woollen mills indebted to hon. gentlemen for? Not for their being brought into existence, not that they were a new industry established in this country; but they are indebted to them for this, and this alone, that they have multiplied mills that there was no room for in this country, and have caused millions of capital to be sunk in enterprises that do not pay. They are not indebted to them for establishing the woollen industry in this country, but for bringing misfortune to that industry and to the men who put their capital into it. Now, with regard to the subject of cheapening goods to the consumer, I wish the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) was here, because he was unable to understand why the leader of the Opposition added 50 per cent. to the Customs and Excise duties which he said did not go into the Treasury in fixing the burdens on the people. The hon. gentleman made the statement that sugar was as cheap under the present tariff as it would be under the Cartwright tariff. He made the broad statement about cottons and woollens and sugar, that they could be bought as cheaply now under the National Policy as they could be bought under the Mackenzie tariff. And now I want to go into that sugar question; and if any hon. gentleman here, if you, yourself, Mr. Speaker, should desire to follow me in it, I think you will agree that it is not as difficult a question to understand, and to arrive at a definite conclusion upon, as some of the hon. gentlemen opposite would have us believe. I think I can make the matter sufficiently plain and can give figures that any hon. gentleman can work out for himself, and ascertain the accuracy of the statements of the Finance Minister, that under this tariff of his the people are getting it as cheaply as under the Mackenzie tariff. Hon. gentlemen opposite have a favorite way on the public platform, though they do not adopt it in this House, of putting the question in such a shape before their audience as to lead them to imagine that the imposition of the duty had actually lessened, instead of increasing, the price; and, as a proof of this, they say: Look at your sugar of to-day; it is cheaper than before the tariff was imposed—seeking, in fact, to make the people believe that sugar has actually been cheapened in value by the imposition of extra taxation. I will say this, and I may be pardoned if I illustrate it by a statement which I made a short time ago, when addressing an audience at Belleville, and which has since been taken up by the press and commented on. I was alluding to the fact that Government supporters put the case in such a way as to endeavor to lead the people to believe that by the increase of duty the price of sugar had been lessened, and I told them what had occurred at a meeting which I had addressed at a place not far from Kingston, a night or two previous, when I had also occasion to touch upon this sugar question. A friend of ours, who occupies a seat in another place, had been there the night before, and I was told he had used, with some force, this sugar statement. There happened to be a large sugar dealer from Kingston present, whom I knew very well and with whom I had been discussing the subject of sugar and other material as we drove to the meeting. I had pointed out to him that good bright yellow sugar, about No. 13 Dutch standard, a sample of which I had in my hands a few days before, had been bought at the rate of 9s. 3d. sterling per 112 lbs. in England, or as near as might be, 2 cents per lb. He said: I have sugar, about No. 9 Dutch standard, that I bought for 8s. 3d. sterling per 112 lbs. I then suggested we should make a calculation of the cost. We sat down and made a calculation; we added the freight, and all charges incurred before the sugar could be placed in bonded warehouse, and the result was, that we found the sugar cost him, laid down in his bonded warehouse, about $2.15 per 100 lbs. You can sell that, I said, for 2½ cents per lb. and do well. He answered: Yes, I wish I could sell all the sugar I can shovel out at that profit for a year, and then I would soon retire. At the meeting, in the course of my speech, and after referring to the way in which this sugar question had been placed before the people the previous night by a Conservative speaker, I asked the audience, At what price can you get your sugar to-day? A gentleman in the audience—whom, I presume, was a friend of the Government, because as he replied there was a ring of triumph in his tone—said, I can get 20 lbs. good yellow sugar to-day for $1. Yes, I answered, sugar is very cheap; I believe you can, but all I have to tell you is this, that here, on this platform, is a gentleman, well known in Kingston, with whom many of you have traded, and he is prepared to-morrow, if you will go to Kingston, to give you 40 lbs. of brown sugar for $1, provided you will pay the duty. Is that correct? I asked the merchant. He answered: You can have all you want at that rate. Some of you, I said to the audience, have been indoctrinated by some of your Conservative friends with the belief that it is not the man who buys the article who pays the duty, but the man who sells it. If you have faith in that, and if it be true, you will find that you can get 40 lbs. for $1, but I fancy before you can get it out of the bonded warehouse Her Majesty's officers will demand from you a very large sum per lb. Now you can see how the case stands. That statement was published in a Belleville paper. The Mail, a day or two later, said this—

Mr. BOWELL. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he accepts the report of his speech in the Reform paper at Belleville as correct?

Mr. PATERSON. Well, I will say this to the hon. gentleman, which he will understand, that substantially, as a condensed report—

Mr. BOWELL. Figuratively speaking, I would say—

Mr. PATERSON. It cannot necessarily report all the explanations I gave.

Mr. BOWELL. I accept that.

Mr. PATERSON. The Mail newspaper, and I allude to this, because sometimes our friends wonder how it is that their Conservative friends in the country cannot really see things in the same light as we do. Yet, when you remember the fact that the great bulk of them take but the one newspaper, and that a newspaper of their own political stripe, and that it gives to them, not only its own version of the affair, but actually at times misrepresents what is said on the other side of the question, their blindness is not to be wondered at. Now, the Mail newspaper said this:

"Mr. Paterson told a Belleville audience the other day that if it were not for the high tariff he could import granulated sugar from Great Britain, and sell it here at 2½ cents per pound."

I have told you, Sir, what I did say, and here is the Mail newspaper deliberately misrepresenting what I did say. Then the writer goes on to argue on that statement, which I never made, and which is wholly and absolutely false. The fact I mentioned is to be found in the Belleville paper, and the Minister of Customs can see whether I was not speaking of yellow sugar or not.

Mr. BOWELL. I read the speech carefully.

Mr. PATERSON. Is it not yellow sugar I mentioned?

Mr. BOWELL. I will tell you some other time.

Mr. PATERSON. If you have read the speech carefully you must know, and I ask and demand of you to state whether I am not correct in saying that it was yellow sugar of which I spoke?

Mr. BOWELL. I am not in your confessional just now.

Mr. PATERSON. After making this false statement the writer goes on to base an argument upon it. The very statement to any business man carries with it an evidence that the writer must have known better, because, if we import granulated sugar, we do not import it from Great Britain but from the United States. He goes on to say that the lowest price in Glasgow was $3\frac{1}{2}$ cents a pound. We have then the confession of the editor of the Mail, that sugar which was $6\frac{1}{2}$ cents here was $3\frac{1}{2}$ cents in England. It is almost worth while to have an untruth put about you in a paper in order to get out that much. Then the article goes on to show how wrong I was, after quoting this statement which, as I have said, was wholly without foundation. Now, Sir, there is a Conservative paper published in Belleville, called the Intelligencer, which was owned for years by the hon. Minister of Customs, and it is supposed that he still has a sleeping interest in it.

Mr. BOWELL. Do not make insinuations.

Mr. PATERSON. No; I will not say that; but he knows the editor of the paper, and would not desire, I am sure, to have that paper do anything but what was right and proper.

Mr. BOWELL. Hear, hear.

Mr. PATERSON. The editor of that paper was in the meeting. He heard my speech. He says, in his article, that he was there and heard part of my speech. If I remember correctly, he remained in until I reached that portion of my speech where I was laying down what the essential principles of Toryism were: that if you find thirteen Ministers striving to get from Parliament the power which the people placed in their hands and to centre it in themselves—that is Toryism. Could the king take from Parliament, from commoner as well as from noble, the power and centre it in himself, you would have Toryism in its essence. I had spoken so far—

Mr. BOWELL. And he left then?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes; then he went out.

Mr. BOWELL. I think it was time.

Mr. PATERSON. I am not sure whether it was after or before I spoke in reference to the sugar that he left. At any rate, he was in the meeting, and he saw the Belleville Ontario in his office, and saw what I said. The next day in an editorial he stated that Mr. Paterson had addressed some sixty or seventy young men of the Liberal club in Belleville, and added: "We may have occasion to refer to some of his remarks in a day or two, perhaps." He let some four days pass, and never alluded to any of my arguments or attempted anything of the kind; and when the Mail newspaper published its article, that editor, who was in the meeting, who heard what I said, who knew that what was in the Mail article was untrue, positively untrue, would not write it down himself in his own paper, but copied bodily the lie from the Mail and gave it to his readers for their benefit. That is the way in which the thing was done, and after copying the Mail article, knowing it was not true, he said, editorially:

"We had the pleasure of listening to a portion of the address delivered by Mr. Paterson on the occasion referred to. Mr. Paterson enjoys—and we believe deservedly—the reputation of being one of the fairest men of his party, but whether, from inadvertence, or in order to win the applause of his hearers, he tried to leave the impression that were his party in power such sugar as he made reference to—

He will not write granulated sugar. He was bold enough to publish the Mail article, which said granulated, but he would not say it himself—

"would be sold in Canada for $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound. Had he desired to tell the truth he would have stated the price at which the article could have been sold under the old tariff. As he did not try to make any such comparison we can come to no other conclusion than that stated above."

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

I was talking on one point, and showing what the price of yellow sugar would be were there no duty on it, and it was no part of my duty to do in that connection what he asks. But I have alluded to this in order that in Parliament the Minister of Customs, or anyone else, may controvert the statement I made to the audience. I do not attempt to deceive an audience when there is no one to answer me any more than I do here, and I am claiming nothing for myself that I would not give credit for to other members of the House. I have repeated the statement here; let them answer it if they can. Now, I will consider what granulated sugar, which I was not speaking of, could be laid down for here now under the Cartwright tariff, and will see if the Finance Minister stated correctly that it had been as cheap under his tax as under the Cartwright tariff. It is not such a difficult matter for people to understand. You can figure it out yourselves; you need not take the word I say, or the word that anybody else does. The New York Herald, of 27th February, gives the price of granulated sugar in New York at $6\frac{1}{2}$ cents; the Monetary Times, of 27th February, gives the cost here at $6\frac{5}{8}$ cents; the Journal of Commerce, of 27th February, gives it as $6\frac{5}{8}$ cents; the Montreal Gazette, of 5th March, gives it as $6\frac{5}{8}$ cents to $6\frac{3}{4}$ cents. I have given you authorities there as to the Canadian price that hon. gentlemen cannot question? The New York Herald quotations for New York will not be questioned, and there is a half cent per pound that the Canadian consumer has to pay more for his granulated sugar than the American consumer does; and the fact, I think, is known to the Minister of Customs, that the New York refiner has to pay about $\frac{1}{2}$ cent more per pound duty for his raw material than the Canadian refiner. Add that to the $\frac{1}{2}$ cent less that he sells his sugar at, and you find a difference of 1 cent a pound between the price in New York and the price in Canada. Under the Cartwright tariff, if we were buying at $6\frac{1}{2}$, \$2.82, less 1 per cent. of a drawback, would be allowed to the Canadian consumer, or a net drawback of \$2.79. The net price to the consumer would, therefore, be \$3.34 per 100 lbs. for sugar from New York. To that would have to be added, under the Cartwright tariff, a duty of 1 cent a pound and 25 per cent. ad valorem, amounting to \$1.83 $\frac{1}{2}$. The question of freight is left out of consideration, because the freight on sugar to nearly all points in Canada from New York is about the same as from Montreal. Thus granulated sugar from New York under the Cartwright tariff could now be laid down for \$5.17 $\frac{1}{2}$ without freight, while the Montreal sugar without freight was \$6.62, less $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. cash discount, which I take off in order to give them the benefit of all, and that leaves their price without freight \$6.45 $\frac{1}{2}$ per 100 pounds. Thus, the price of granulated sugar under the Cartwright tariff, by the quotations of last week would be \$1.28 per 100 pounds less than it is under the tariff of the hon. gentleman opposite. I have desired to give these figures. They challenge investigation. This is not a mere statement, such as the Finance Minister has made, staking his reputation upon the fact that sugar could be bought as cheap now as then. These are the data upon which this can be worked out, and no other conclusion can be arrived at than that you are paying \$1.28 per 100 pounds, or $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents a pound more for granulated sugar than you would do if the Cartwright tariff were in force and the same prices prevailed. Let us see what that figures up to. We had more than a 170,000,000 pounds in all imported last year. About one-eighth is wasted in turning that into granulated sugar, and we have to take granulated sugar, because that is a standard sugar, and all the others are nondescript sugars. The 170,000,000, allowing for the waste, would make about 150,000,000 pounds of sugar; 150,000,000 pounds at \$1.28 cents per 100 pounds would be just \$1,920,000, the extra price for a year's consumption, if it were all granulated sugar; and that one fact bears out the statement of the leader of the Opposition, that it is not the taxes only that go into Her Majesty's coffers, by way of customs, that the customer pays, but that he pays a large amount indirectly that does not go into the Treasury, and is a loss to the consumer. Now, then, some people will say: then there is so much extra money that has gone into the Treasury. Not at all. On that same quantity of sugar, under the Cartwright tariff, you would have got a revenue of \$2,752,500 for it, but under the present tariff we only get a revenue of \$2,581,549. You absolutely get \$171,351 less duty, though you pay nearly \$2,000,000 extra for your sugar. There are several tests you can apply to this, in order to prove its correctness. You may take the extra duty that the New York refiner pays and you can take the lower price at which it is quoted, and you find that it amounts to 1 cent a pound. Now, I just wish to call attention to one other point. I have pointed out that the Finance Minister has totally misapprehended and misunderstood the causes of the prosperity that this country enjoyed during the first two or three years of this Administration. It is my duty, having stated that he has misapprehended and misunderstood it, to give you what I think to be the secret of the prosperity that was enjoyed by this country during the past two or three years, except this year, of course, the depression of which we have now entered upon; and in doing that, I ask the attention of the House for a moment. There are certain things that I hold no man would care to risk his reputation by seriously affirming, and one of them is that the National Policy in any way helped the fishing interests. I say no man who cares for his reputation would dare to affirm that the National Policy had benefited the fishermen, had enabled the fishermen to make larger catches, or had enabled them to get larger prices in the United States. I hold no reasonable man would risk his reputation on the statement that the National Policy raised the price of lumber in the United States market or the English market. I do not think that any man who cares for his reputation would care seriously to affirm that the National Policy gave us Heaven's rain or Heaven's sun, and the bountiful harvest that we have had. I do not believe any man who would care for his reputation would seriously affirm that our tariff, enacted in the Canadian Parliament, raised the price of wheat in Liverpool. I do not believe any man who cares for his reputation would affirm that the National Policy had enabled us to raise more cattle, had enabled us to produce more butter and cheese, or had raised the price of our cattle or the price of our butter and cheese in the English markets. I say there are four great interests that no man would care to risk his reputation by seriously affirming that the National Policy in the slightest degree could help. Sir, I want to speak for a moment or two with reference to these four industries. In doing so I take the period of five years as challenged by the Finance Minister; I take the five years that the Mackenzie Administration were in power, and leaving out the year 1878-79 as a neutral year, and taking the five years from that period until now, what do we find? I find that our total exports during the five years from 1874, to 1878, were \$342,884,506; and the total exports during the last five years that the hon. gentlemen opposite have been in power have been \$402,478,067. During the latter five years Canada exported \$59,593,561 worth more goods than she did in the five years of the Mackenzie Administration. There were \$60,000,000, in round numbers, extra brought into the country and circulated in the country during the latter period of five years. Any hon. gentleman can see what a vast benefit this would be. Now, to what extent is the National Policy to be credited for this extra export of \$60,000,000 worth? We have all agreed, I think, that with reference to the fisheries, and the forests, and agricultural products, and animals and their produce, the National Policy can claim no credit, and yet in these four lines there was an extra export of \$65,009,711 during the five years these hon. gentlemen have been in power, over and above that of the five years of the Mackenzie Administration. There is the secret of the prosperity and the success that Canada had in the years 1881-82-83, and it can be easily seen, by any man who examines for himself, that this period gave us increased export in goods that the National Policy was powerless in the slightest degree to affect. But, while we had \$65,000,000 extra wealth brought into the country as a result of increased exports of those lines over which their National Policy could have no beneficial influence, there are two lines of exports that the National Policy can operate upon, and that is the mine and manufactured goods. We had legislation in order to promote the mining, and in order to promote the manufacturing industry, and our friends, the Government now content themselves with claiming power alone to benefit these two industries, and these they claim they have benefited. Well now, there is this strange fact in reference to the two industries that they can benefit by legislation, as they said. The industries that they could not help brought in \$65,000,000 extra wealth during the past five years, and in reference to the two industries they could help, we absolutely exported \$6,262,056 less of them than we did before during the five years of the Mackenzie Administration. Of the two lines that their policy can increase, we have had \$6,000,000 less come into the country, as the result of their export, than we had in the five years of the Mackenzie Administration. In these four other great lines which their policy could not affect, we have benefited by \$65,000,000 worth, which Providence gave to the country, and which these gentlemen could not give. The industries that these gentlemen can operate upon gave us \$6,000,000 less in decreased exports of the mine and manufactures. I wonder how much the mines have been developed under this policy, judged by the increased output of coal. The fact has been ignored that, from 1874 to 1878, wood was largely used as fuel, whereas coal is now consumed, and the increased output and increased consumption of coal are the result. The railways in those years were largely using wood, while they are now using coal almost wholly. But it will take a large increase of the output and consumption of coal to make up for a decrease of \$3,170,000 in the exports during the five years as compared with the exports during the administration of the late Government. I have pointed out what I consider the causes of the prosperity which the country has enjoyed and the sources from which it came, and I have shown, I think conclusively, that it is not to any legislation that has been initiated or carried out that we are indebted for it. I come now to speak of the condition of the country, a subject on which the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) touched. I wish he were present; but it is not my fault that he is not present.

An hon. MEMBER. You have scared him away.

Mr. PATERSON. An hon. member says I have scared him away; he is not so easily frightened. I suppose that that hon. gentleman, who is able to extinguish the leader of the Opposition and defeat him in single combat, and rout the whole Opposition, so that it is impossible for it to get up even a combined answer to his unanswerable arguments, would not be frightened by one humble member of the Opposition. But I think an hon. member who makes such a charge on the Opposition, should, if it is all convenient, be in his place to get his answer in regard to it. He admitted that the situation in the North-West was not as prosperous as he would desire. He stated there were causes operating, and he boldly charged upon the Opposition that one of the great factors which brought about the destruction of their hopes of a greatly increased population in the North-West was that the Opposition had decried the country and endeavored to stop emigrants from going into that country. That was his statement, I believe. I wanted him in his place, so that I might hurl back to him the statement. I deny it. The hon. gentleman having made the statement should have given some proof as to its truth. The charge is too serious for an hon. gentleman to make, in regard to any body of men, even if they are in the Opposition in the Commons, without being prepared to substantiate it. No proof was attempted. We have heard at other times allusions to remarks made by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), to remarks made by the leader of the Opposition, who, in speaking on the Canadian Pacific Railway, when the Government came forward with their airy schemes and statements, that bore on their face evidence of the actions of men who were building castles in the air instead of doing business in a business-like way and making prudent calculations, told them they must not overlook certain difficulties that were connected with the opening up and development of that country; reminded them that emigrants from the old country were not forced to go to our North-West, there being other lands to receive them; pointed out to them that some of the American States were still offering free homesteads and free lands to settlers, as we are doing in the North-West; told them they must not calculate upon getting all the immigration that was coming to this continent, and not to ignore the fact that they had formidable competitors for the incoming immigration in many of the States of the Union. That we have heard hon. members on this side of the House say. More than that we have not heard them say. It was a wise and a prudent statement for them to make, and it would have been wise and prudent if the Government had recognised that fact and pursued a course in harmony with it, whereby they would have done more for the benefit of the country. They have failed in their North-West policy as they have failed in their National Policy, and they are not manly enough to acknowledge it, but seek to cover their own shame in the matter, speaking in a parliamentary sense—

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Speaking figuratively.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, speaking figuratively; but it is not a nice figure for the people. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been endeavoring to throw the blame on the Opposition for what they themselves have done. Do hon. gentlemen not see that when they make that misstatement—and outside of the House it would be put in the form of falsehood—when they bring that charge against the Opposition they are not writing dishonor on our brows but upon their own brows. And why? Because it does not take five years for the people to understand if statements are lies, and had their statements been true and those of the Opposition false, we would have been discredited by the country. We hold that the North-West is a good country, but we recognise the fact that there are other lands and other countries as well as this. I am glad to say, notwithstanding what has been stated by the hon. member for Cardwell, that there is beginning to dawn upon the organs of the party the fact that it will no longer do to deny that the statements made by the Opposition in regard to this matter were true. And it would have been a good thing for the country if those statements were given heed to. The Toronto Mail, the chief organ of the Government, in its issue of February 27, 1885, just a few days ago, contained an article on this subject; and I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, I ask the hon. member for Cardwell, to point to utterances made by hon. members on this side of the House, containing as strong language, language that might be construed to be so adverse to that country as that language which is printed deliberately in the chief organ of hon. gentlemen opposite. What does that article say. It points out the fact that the sales of land in the North-West during the last year have been rather discouraging. He goes on to say that we have some comfort in the fact that, though the sales have dropped off, there has been a falling off in Dakota and Minnesota as well. Then he adds:

"Thus the decrease in settlement in these American territories was 39.56 per cent., and in the Canadian North-West 39.92 per cent. Considering the start Minnesota and Dakota have had in the race, and the help they have received from the Opposition in the Dominion Parliament and from the anti-immigration patriots in Manitoba, the wonder is not that our North-West should have suffered as much as they, but that it did not suffer more. The effects of the boom—the headache after the debauch—must also be taken into account as a factor operating temporarily against Manitoba. Then again, while the frost of September 7, 1883, did some damage throughout the American North-West, in Manitoba it wrought wholesale destruction."

We all remember well how hon. gentlemen opposite denounced us on this side because there had been an allusion, a necessary allusion, to the fact that some of the wheat had been touched with the frost in Manitoba. But here is the leading organ of hon. gentlemen opposite speaking of wheat being touched with frost in Dakota and Minnesota, while in Manitoba wholesale destruction took place—

"And the panic that followed the cry that early frosts would always menace wheat, inflicted grave injury upon the country, which nothing but a series of good harvests can repair. These, in our opinion, are the true causes of the depression in the North-West. The Government probably did commit mistakes; few men are infallible; but the marvellous energy they have displayed in developing that region, and the care they have taken in securing for the settler fair rates and free competition for his produce, stand out infinitely beyond the sum of their short comings."

Then he uses this language with reference to colonization companies which the Government chartered:

"The Globe says, however, that the Ottawa people encouraged speculation, and instances the formation of hundreds of bubble colonization companies under the Dominion Land Act. No doubt, the colonization companies have suffered. Many of them deserve to suffer. Their projects attempted to make money without working for it—an offence against the economies which is within a measurable distance of stealing. But the Government is in no way responsible for the collapse in that quarter."

We have here an article stating that many of the promoters of these colonization companies, which were chartered by the Dominion Government by the score, were within a measurable distance of stealing, or in other words, that they were within a measurable distance of being thieves. The article concludes:

"It is only fair to add, however, that in all probability the Government now in power has taken too sanguine a view of North-West development. It has been the habit, in making up calculations of future progress, to ignore the fact that Minnesota and Dakota offer to the poorer class of settlers advantages fully equal to those held out by Manitoba; while the western, south-western and southern States present to the well-to-do immigrant who can afford to choose his climate, an infinite and incomparable variety of attractions. Nothing but a loyal and united effort on the part of the Canadian people could, under such circumstances, prevail against the array of American influences in the emigration fields of Europe; and while the Opposition continues in its present frame of mind we may expect to be distanced."

Rank heresy. Listen, Mr. Speaker:

"While the western, south-western and southern States present to the well-to-do immigrant, who can afford to choose his climate, an infinite and incomparable variety of attractions."

That is the language of the Toronto Mail, and I challenge hon. gentlemen to find any statement as strong as that ever uttered by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. Now we have the chief organ of the Government admitting that these facts which were pointed out by leading men on the Opposition side, if they had been heeded at the time, it would have tended to secure the better development of the North-West, and that the Government made a great mistake in ignoring the facts so pointed out to them. Yet the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) has the assurance to rise up in his place and denounce the Opposition as unpatriotic because their leaders gave the warning which, according to the Mail, was requisite, and for not heeding it the Government were recreant to their duty and have brought about the sad results that have followed. Now about the future of the country. I am not one of those who think that the country must necessarily perish and be ruined because the present Administration are in power. I think they can do it a great deal of injury, and I think they have done it a great deal of injury. But we have a good deal of recuperative power, and I think perhaps the country will be enabled, after it has shaken off hon. gentlemen, in a constitutional way, to recover itself under the management of gentlemen who conducted the affairs of the country once before, during a severe financial crisis, and brought it through with a low rate of taxation, by economising expenditure and keeping the interests of the country in as healthy condition as possible. Then we come to speak of the future of the country, and I have some more articles to read. The future of the country, according to the organs of the hon. gentlemen opposite, is intimately bound up with the success of the Canadian Pacific Railway. But what does the Montreal Gazette, of the 20th, say in an article headed "The Canadian Pacific Railway."

"Rumor has been busy for some weeks past with the affairs of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The company is reported to be seeking further assistance from Parliament, to have incurred a floating liability of a considerable amount, and to have failed to raise a loan in the money market, and it is no longer a secret that these reports are substantially correct."

There we have, from the Montreal Gazette, the statement that the Canada Pacific Railway, notwithstanding the loan of last Session, is in an embarrassed position, and the whole tone of the article is in the direction of showing that Parliament is to be appealed to again to add to the millions upon millions which it has already given to the company. Two or three days earlier the Toronto Mail had an article on the same subject, in which it pointed out:

"The rumor that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is about to ask for further aid from the Government has excited the violent wrath of the Reform party. Whether the rumor be true or false we do not know. It is evident, however, that unless Canada is to be involved in financial ruin the road must be completed either by the present company or by the Government."

It goes on to speak of the financial prospects of the company, and compares it with the Northern Pacific, and then makes this statement with reference to it—one which is eminently unpatriotic from the standpoint of those hon. gentlemen. It says:

"If our land subsidy of 25,000,000 acres be worth $2 an acre, the Northern Pacific lands must be worth much more. For while the population of the whole territory through which the Canadian Pacific runs, from Callander to the Pacific, does not at this hour exceed 200,000, the smaller and more compact region traversed by the Northern Pacific is comparatively well settled."

Farther down it says—and I call hon. gentlemen's attention to it as a most unpatriotic utterance:

"If it be said that the mountain section of the Northern Pacific was more costly than the mountain section of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that in the case of the Canadian Pacific the heavy work on the Pacific slope has been assumed by the Government, the answer is that the Northern Pacific had no rock division, 650 miles long, such as that which stretches in unbroken desolation between Port Arthur and Callander."

There is the statement of the Mail newspaper, the leading organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, that on the north shore of Lake Superior, where last year Parliament gave to that company $22,500,000 to enable them to build that line, the whole 650 miles traversed by the road is a country which "stretches in unbroken desolation from Port Arthur to Callander," and I suppose the description they would give to the part between Port Arthur and Winnipeg—or a large portion of it—would be in much the same language had they required to touch upon that point. It goes on further:

"Another demand for help would without doubt involve the gravest consideration. But, as has been said, the completion of the road, either by the present company or by the Government, is a supreme necessity. The collapse of the Northern Pacific in 1873, in the very early stages of its career, shook the United States to the centre. The abandonment of the Canadian Pacific within a year of its completion, involving the sacrifice of the $47,500,000 which the Government has already paid the syndicate, of the $11,000,000 sunk in Onderdonk's contract, of the $17,000,000 spent on the Port Arthur and Winnipeg division, would be a catastrophe upon the far-reaching effects of which it would be idle to dwell. It is too late for Mr. Blake to rise now and oppose the completion of the line. Such a course was possible in 1873, when he took office with Mr. Mackenzie. Some surveying had been done at that time, but the scheme might have been indefinitely shelved without any loss to the country more serious than the secession of British Columbia and the North-West. Now, however, its abandonment would mean not only the disruption of Confederation but the financial ruin of the older partners, unless indeed they preferred suicide by repudiation."

That is the statement of the Toronto Mail with reference to the condition of the Canadian Pacific road, showing how intimately the Government of the country and the prosperity of the country are bound up in that road. The argument is that it is so near its completion that it must be completed or financial ruin and the disruption of Confederation must take place. Who is responsible for the rapid completion of that road? Who urged it? Who put it through in spite of the protests of those who advocated the adoption of a wiser course? If financial ruin and the disruption of Confederation are involved in it, hon. gentlemen opposite will have to answer for it. The Opposition have declared their views; they have declared that the only safe policy with reference to that work was to push it over the prairie as fast as settlement required it. Even in advance of settlement, to open up branch lines everywhere, and by-and-bye, when the interests of trade should require it, and the resources of the country warrant it to build the 650 miles through the unbroken desolation that the Mail speaks of. The responsibility, if there be anything serious involving the financial standing of this company at present, rests upon the Government. The people of this country will recognise that fact, and will deal with these hon. gentlemen accordingly when the proper time comes. Now, I have only to notice one more point touched upon by the hon. member for Cardwell. He intimated that if it was desirable in the interests of the Maritime Provinces that steps should be taken to secure reciprocal trade relations with the United States, the Government did not intend to move in that direction, but would wait until advances were made from the other side, and if the proposition were made, they would entertain it. All I can say is, that it is a matter of great importance to our friends by the sea that a reciprocity treaty should be negotiated, and they desire it; and I say that when they desire it, and when the interests of the country are bound up in it, it would be for the welfare of this country if gentlemen were sitting on the Treasury benches whose policy it would be to make an effort to secure fair trading relations and reciprocal arrangements with the United States. I believe the remedy for our present depression is to enlarge our foreign market, not only for our natural products, but for our manufactured goods, and thus to relieve ourselves of our surplus production. I see that the Government have placed a vote of something like $12,000 in the Estimates for commercial agencies in different countries. I will support them in that. I would desire to see our foreign relations extended and new and important markets opened up to Canadian producers. But I have little faith in foreign markets being opened up by hon. gentlemen opposite. Their whole theory is to limit trade with other countries. I would say this to the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), if he were present, that some of the commercial agents, whom they will appoint and send to other countries in order to promote the foreign trade of Canada, may be gentlemen who entertain views like the hon. member for Cardwell himself—views of their country so vast and so grand that, as he told us the other day, upon the motion made that we should be properly represented at the exhibition about to be held in one of the countries of Europe, and upon the remarks that followed by the hon. leader of the Opposition in reference to a motion of his made some time ago for Canada to secure to herself the right to make her own commercial treaties—the hon. member for Cardwell, said: Make your own commercial treaties. Fancy Canada going to negotiate a treaty with another nation; the first question asked would be. Who are you? That is the sentiment the hon. member for Cardwell holds with reference to his own country—that if we went to negotiate a treaty on our own account with a foreign nation, it might be expected that the question asked by the nation we approached would be, who are you? I say that the interests of this country are not to be promoted, its resources are not to be developed by men being in power who hold such small ideas of their own country as that. Canada is a country that ought to be known among the nations of the world. I was glad an hon. member brought up the question of our being properly represented at the exhibition to be held at Antwerp. I have heard, and I believe I am correctly informed, that at the last exhibition at which Canada was represented, I think it was at Paris, the medals which the Canadian exhibitors received had to come to them through the English representatives, and Canada's individuality was lost in the matter. We want a Government in power that will give to this country a large prominence; we want to be known among the nations of the world; we want the right to negotiate our commercial treaties; we want men in charge of our affairs who will strive to secure for us that right, and having got it, we will go to the nations of the world and ask them to open trade with us. We want a Government that will give this country a start towards her great destiny. But we have not much faith in hon. gentlemen opposite. True, we shall have to put up with them for a time, until there is another appeal to the people; what the result of that appeal will be I cannot tell; there will be an opportunity then for the people to pronounce upon their policy. But I cannot but view it as an unfortunate thing that at this juncture of our affairs we should have at the head of the Government a gentleman whose judgment of constitutional law on almost every important question that has come up lately has been set aside by the highest tribunal of the land—that we should have the misfortune of having, in the control of our financial affairs, a gentleman who has failed in almost every one of his promises and violated nearly every rule laid down by himself. Meantime, we, on this side of the House, will continue to raise our voices in favor of what we conceive to be the best interests of the country, pointing out the course that we think ought to be adopted; and having done that, we shall feel that we have discharged our duty. We shall send forth from this place the sentiment, that we do not believe the power of the present Government is being used aright to administer the affairs or to develop the resources of this country; but that, though our affairs are thus crippled for the time, there is hope for the country, there is a bright prospect ahead. The cry must go out that the destiny of Canada is in the hands of the people of Canada; and the message I send forth is this: Up, men of Canada, and assert your rights! Strike off the bonds they are placing upon you, shake off the shackles with which they are endeavoring to fetter your prosperity, and give our country an opportunity to go forward and fulfil its grand destiny.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. MULOCK, in moving for leave to introduce Bill (No. 90) to amend the Fisheries Act, said: The object of the Bill is to enable the Department of Fisheries to grant permits for fishing in waters that have been set apart for the propagation of fish. The practice has heretofore prevailed of placing permits in the hands of the fishery overseers in the neighborhood of these waters, and the overseers have, I suppose, using proper discretion, given these permits to people in the vicinity of these waters allowing them to fish for their private use, thus to no material extent interfering with the object of the Order in Council which has set apart these waters. During the last winter, applications were made to the Department of Fisheries by a great many of the people living on the waters of Lake Simcoe for permission to fish through the ice. The permission was not given, the reason assigned being that the point had been referred to the Department of Justice, and the Minister of Justice had given it as his opinion that, where waters were set apart under the Act for the propagation of fish, the Department had no power, so long as the Act was in force, to allow fishing of any kind in those waters. If that opinion is adhered to by the Department, it prevents fishing in the winter, and it will prevent fishing in the summer as well, even in the restricted way allowed under a permit. I hope the Government will see its way to allow this Bill to become law, or to rescind the Orders in Council or to some extent if possible to modify them, in order to get over the difficulties in question. The Bill at present is to give the Government power to grant permits to fish in waters set apart substantially for the propagation of fish.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

UNAUTHORIZED COLLECTION OF DUTIES.

Mr. BLAKE. I desire to call the attention of the Government to a statement which has been made to me, and which I think requires some information at their hands. Our custom, and as I understand the custom of the Imperial Parliament, has been to recognise the right of the Executive Government, after a change in the tariff has got to such a stage that the proposals of the Administration have been reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, to act upon them in a temporary manner; and instructions, I believe, are customarily given to the Collectors of Customs, from the time the report of the committee has been made to the House, even although no further action has been taken by the House, to enforce the new tariff provisionally, the understanding being that, if the duty should not be ultimately agreed to by the House, there should be a refund of the excess. In that view, which I understand to have been the common and ordinary view, the hon. gentleman opposite asked us the other evening to allow that portion of the proposals of the Government which they thought important to go into immediate effect, to pass through the Committee of Ways and Means; and they did pass through the committee—I refer to the duty on cigars. We understood the reason for the hon. gentleman's proposal; but, although no other proposals of the Government have been submitted to the House otherwise than by the speech of the Minister, although they have not been discussed by the Committee of Ways and Means or reported upon, I am informed that others of the resolutions have been ordered to be enforced at the Custom House. That is a departure from the practice, and demands some explanation.

Mr. BOWELL. The practice referred to by the hon. the leader of the Opposition I believe to be quite correct, but it has not been acted upon on the last two or three occasions when changes have been made in the tariff. The object of the House, when the leader of the Government asked that the resolutions relating to cigars, tobacco and snuff should pass through committee on the first night of their introduction, was to enable the Department to issue orders for the collection of the increased duties imposed upon those articles. The commissioner at the time, instead of confining his orders exclusively to the collection of duties upon those particular articles, issued a general order for the collection of duties upon all articles which would be affected by the proposed resolutions.

Mr. BLAKE. They had not been proposed.

Mr. BOWELL. They had been, because they were laid upon the Table. Well, I will withdraw that word if it is any advantage to the hon. gentleman. As soon as the attention of the Government was called to the fact that we had issued that order, it was withdrawn, and the duty now is only collected upon that portion of the resolutions which affects cigars, and not upon any other article contained in the resolutions which were laid before the House.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Mr. MILLS. I would ask the Government when we may expect the correspondence relating to the question of Indian titles in Ontario. It is desirable that we should have that correspondence at a very early period. Several weeks have elapsed since it was ordered and it is not yet laid on the Table. I would also like to ask the hon. gentleman when we may look for the correspondence relating to the northern boundary that the hon. gentleman promised to bring down. A considerable part of the Session has gone by and it has not yet been brought before the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will bring it down as soon as I can.

Mr. CASEY. I would like to call the attention of the hon. Secretary of State (I suppose it should be) to the fact that the return brought down on Thursday last, in answer to an Order of the House for a copy of the case submitted by the Governor in Council and the opinions given by the counsel consulted by the Government as to the amount of damage awarded to the contractors of Section B, Canadian Pacific Railway, is incomplete. The return, as brought down, consists of a letter from the Department of Justice to the counsel consulted, stating that they enclosed certain documents for their consideration; also the opinion given by the counsel on those documents; also a letter from the Department of Justice to the Department of Railways stating the opinion given by the counsel; but it does not contain the documents submitted by the Department of Justice to the Governor in Council which were asked for by the Order of the House. I will make a memorandum of the documents which are wanting and will hand it over to the Minister, and I hope that he will bring them down at an early date.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. If the hon. gentleman will send me a note by one of the clerks I will attend to it.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not know whether the returns in reference to the Short Line have been brought down.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There are two Short Lines.

Mr. BLAKE. It is a long time to bring down a return about a Short Line.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There are two lines commonly called the Short Line. One is the shortest and best line, and the other is the snow line.

Mr. POPE. I think that return is not ready. As soon as it is I will bring it down.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I made a motion on the 5th of February last for a return of the number of employes, and their salaries, under the Liquor License Act, and the amount of money received by the Board of Commissioners, and how the money was disposed of. I am anxious to know when the return will be brought down. I would also call the attention of the First Minister to the fact that I have given notice of a resolution which I propose moving in regard to that subject. It is a very important motion, in which a good many members would like to discuss. Perhaps the First Minister would fix some date, so that we may definitely know when we can discuss it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We cannot well do that.

Mr. COSTIGAN. In reference to the return asked for by the hon. gentleman, I may say it involves a great deal of work. It is now in course of preparation and will be brought down as soon as possible.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I would also call the attention of the Government to the fact that on the 15th of February last I introduced a Bill concerning Elections of Members to this House, and it has not yet been printed in French. The same thing happened last year. I introduced the Bill at an early date last Session, and my recollection is that it was not printed in French at all; therefore, I could not move the second reading of the Bill. It is an important Bill, and I have no doubt the Ministry will likely assist me in carrying it through the House. I would like to have it printed in the French language. The hon. gentleman will find that fifteen Bills introduced after this Election Bill of mine, have been printed in both languages, and some of them have been moved in the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As far as I am concerned I never enquire about those matters. I think the officers of the House will see that the parliamentary contractors perform their work.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I think the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) stated the other day that the printing contractors had not anything to do in their Department—I understood him to say so. This Bill was introduced on the 15th of February last, and I would like to know why the printing is delayed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is great neglect on the part of the contractors, and they should be called to account. It may be the translation.

EVIDENCE IN DIVORCE CASES.

Mr. JACKSON. When members of this House are expected to vote on Divorce Bills I think we should have the evidence before us so that we may know what we are voting upon. As far as I am concerned I want to see the evidence, and I think the members of this House should be supplied with the evidence in regard to every Bill that comes before us.

Mr. SPEAKER. The evidence is on the Table of the House, and any hon. member can see it who wishes to. It is not customary to have it printed, and after the second reading of Divorce Bills they are referred to a Select Committee who examine the evidence.

Mr. IVES. I would ask if the exhibits are also to be laid on the Table.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 10) to reduce the capital stock of the Federal Bank of Canada, and for other purposes.—(Mr. Small.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 69) respecting the Huron and Ontario Ship Canal Company.—(Mr. Tyrwhitt.)

Bill (No. 80) to incorporate the Fort McLeod Rancho Telegraph Company.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

Bill (No. 81) respecting the Canada Co-operative Supply Association, Limited.—(Mr. Curran.)

WINNIPEG AND PRINCE ALBERT RAILWAY.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria) moved second reading of Bill (No. 82) to incorporate the Winnipeg and Prince Albert Railway Company.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

Mr. BLAKE. It does not seem to me that the Bill should be read the second time. Section 7 contains this clause:

"The company, in aid of the construction, equipment and maintenance of the said railway, shall receive from the Government of Canada a grant of six thousand four hundred acres of agricultural land for each mile of railway constructed, along the line of railway, such land to be laid out in alternate sections on each side of the railway; and if sufficient area cannot be obtained in such manner, then the complement shall be made up in sections within the district of Saskatchewan, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, together with such additional lands as may be granted or leased from the Provincial Government of Manitoba, or other Provincial Governments."

This is not an enabling clause, but an absolute, positive parliamentary declaration, alienating 6,400 acres of the public domain for each mile of railway constructed. This cannot be done by the proviso in question. There must be a committee and the assent of the Crown must be given.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In this case the assent of the Crown has not been given. My attention has just been called by one of the officers of the House to the fact that this section is beyond the power of a private member, and the assent of the Crown must be given. The Bill might be sent to the Railway Committee, and this circumstance would, of course, be borne in mind.

Mr. BLAKE. I cannot agree to the proposal of the hon. gentleman. I understand two things are required in such a case—the assent of the Crown and a preliminary committee. It is a very dangerous practice to allow Bills to pass through two stages without these preliminaries having been complied with. This Bill should be treated as a Bill out of Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Suppose the objectionable clause should not be expunged by the Committee, in what position would we be placed.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps it would be well if the mover were to withdraw the motion, and if the Bill were allowed to remain on the notice paper, so that the mover might consider what course he would adopt.

Mr. BLAKE. I think the Order should be discharged and the Bill withdrawn.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I was not aware that the Bill contained the provision to which the leader of the Opposition has referred; but if the motion is allowed to stand I will look into the matter and consider what course I should pursue.

Mr. SPEAKER. I suggest that the Order be discharged, and the hon. member can then introduce another Bill, with the objectionable clause omitted.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria) moved that the Order be discharged and the Bill withdrawn.

Motion agreed to and Bill withdrawn.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 91) to incorporate the Winnipeg and Prince Albert Railway Company.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—EARNINGS AND WORKING EXPENSES.

Mr. BLAKE asked, What were the earnings and working expenses of the Intercolonial Railway for the month of January, 1885?

Mr. POPE. The earnings of the Intercolonial Railway for the month of January, 1885, were $159,848; working expenses, $175,760; deficiency for that month, $15,912. For January of last year the working expenses were $159,000; earnings, $166,000, or a deficiency of $22,000.

LONGUEUIL AND LEVIS RAILWAY.

Mr. VANASSE (Translation). Enquired, Have the Government issued orders, or do they purpose issuing orders, for the making of an instrumental survey of the line starting from the town of Longueuil and passing along the south shore of the River St. Lawrence through the counties of Chambly and Verchères, to the town of Sorel, and thence through the counties of Yamaska, Nicolet, Lotbinière and Lévis to the town of Lévis, with a view to selecting that line for the extension of the Pacific Railway to the Canadian ports on the Atlantic?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (Translation.) In answer to the hon. member, I have the honor to state that the Government have not caused that survey to be made, because the line of which the hon. gentleman speaks goes through a country which is perfectly known and the distance could be easily obtained without making that instrumental survey.

WOOD SUPPLIES FOR DEPARTMENTAL AND PARLIAMENTARY BUILDINGS.

Mr. McCRAVEY asked, Is the wood used in the Departmental and Parliamentary Buildings supplied by contract or otherwise? If by contract, who is the contractor, and how much is he paid per cord? If not by contract, from whom is it purchased, and at what price per cord, and how is it measured?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The wood for these buildings is always supplied by contract. The present contractor is Mr. McEachren. The prices are $5.50 per cord for maple, and $5.25 for mixed hardwood. The contract calls for 128 cubic feet per cord. The measurement is made as the wood is delivered at the buildings, and in every instance by two officers, in the presence of the contractor. The present contract is about finished and new tenders will be called for without delay.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE LICENSE ACT.

Mr. BLAKE asked, Has the Government taken any, and if so, what steps to secure a reference to the Privy Council of the question of the constitutionality of the License Act of 1883; and if so, when? Has the Government communicated to the commissioners or inspectors its action or intentions in the matter; and if so, when?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. On the decision being certified to the Government it was referred to the Minister of Justice, and on his report he has been instructed to prepare a case and to apply to the Colonial Secretary for a reference to the Privy Council. The action or intention of the Government has not been communicated to the commissioners or inspectors.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—PROGRESS ESTIMATES FOR FEBRUARY.

Mr. BLAKE asked, What is the amount of the progress estimates of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the month of February, transmitted to the Government? Was any sum paid in respect thereof up to the time of answering the question? If so, how much and when?

Mr. POPE. On the eastern section, central division, subsidy, $38,256; loan, $57,500; total $95,756; western section, central division, subsidy, $73,646; loan, $110,500, total $184,146; eastern section, eastern division, subsidy, $96,394; loan $132,700, total $229,094.

Mr. BLAKE. This is the whole progress estimate?

Mr. POPE. Not the whole, there is one certificate which is not made yet.

ENGINEERS' REPORTS—SHORT LINE RAILWAY.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked, When will reports of the engineers respecting the Short Line be laid on the Table of this House?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They are now being prepared and will be brought down as soon as possible.

MR. J. A. CHENEVERT.

Mr. LAURIER asked whether Mr. J. A. Chenevert, managing director of Le Sorelois, is employed by the Department of Public Works? If so, since when and at what salary.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is a gentleman of the name of Chenevert employed in the public buildings at Sorel. I do not know whether he is managing director of the paper mentioned by the hon. gentleman or not, but I am informed by officers that he is a man of about 60 years of age and is a joiner by trade. I understand that his salary is $2.50 a day. He has been employed since some time last summer when the buildings began.

APPLICATION FOR WATER LOTS IN NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. TUPPER asked, Have applications for water lots in Nova Scotia been made to the Dominion Government? Has any action been taken by the Government upon such applications, if any made? Have any of the applications been granted? If not, why not?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There have been some applications made to the Dominion Government for water lots in Nova Scotia. In one case—I think it is at River John—the case was decided and the application granted. I understand that there are one or two other applications and they are now being considered.

MR. ALPIN GRANT.

Mr. FORBES asked, What position does Mr. Alpin Grant, of the City of Halifax, hold under the Government or in the Department of Railways? What are his duties, and what salary or allowance does he receive for the duties he performs?

Mr. POPE. Mr. Alpin Grant is the gentleman in charge of the elevators and other matters connected with the terminus. His salary is about $160 a month.

CHIEF JUSTICESHIP OF SUPERIOR COURT OF QUEBEC.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked, Can the Government inform the House when the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec will be provided with a Chief Justice?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; the Government can inform the hon. gentleman, and we will. The chief justice has been appointed.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH JAMAICA.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) asked, Have any steps been taken to procure free trade relations between Canada and the Island of Jamaica and with what result? Has any correspondence taken place regarding the same and with whom?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Steps have been taken with respect to trade relations between Canada and the British West Indies, and there has been some correspondence on the subject with Her Majesty's Government. It is not in the interests of the public to bring down that correspondence just now.

WESTERLY BOUNDARY OF ONTARIO.

Mr. RYKERT moved for :

Copy of the short hand notes of the argument before the Privy Council in the late dispute between Manitoba and the Province of Ontario, as to the westerly boundary of the Province of Ontario; also copy of the claim as presented by the Attorney General of Ontario before the Privy Council; also a statement of the reasons given by the Attorney General of Ontario for abandoning his claim to that part of the territory lying between the Lake of the Woods and the Rocky Mountains; also a copy of all correspondence between the Government of the Dominion and the Government of Ontario in reference to the arbitration and award, and also in reference to the decision of the Privy Council not already moved for or brought down.

He said: I am desirous, Sir, that this House shall be possessed of that information relating to the argument before the Privy Council in this case, which will enable it to judge whether or not the attitude assumed by the Parliament of Canada has been the correct one, and whether or not this Parliament has shown any hostility to the Local Legislature. It is necessary, in order that this House may arrive at a full understanding of what has taken place, that I should refer briefly to some of the actions of the Local Legislature and also to the course which has been adopted by this Government on that important question. The attitude of hostility which the Parliament of Ontario has assumed towards the Dominion Parliament, and towards the representatives of the people in this Parliament, has been such that I for one, as a member for the Province of Ontario, do not feel justified in allowing the remarks which are constantly made in the Local Legislature to pass by without entering my protest against them. Before 1882, Sir, before the motion was passed in this Parliament in favor of referring the whole question to the Privy Council, charges were hurled against the Ontario portion of the members of this Parliament, that we were traitors to Ontario, and that we were in alliance with the Blues of the Province of Quebec for the purpose of injuring Ontario and depriving her of her rights. The position assumed by the Local Government before 1882 is still assumed by them. They are continuously and systematically attacking this Parliament for its course upon that question, and as a representative from the Province of Ontario, I do not feel justified in allowing those attacks to be made daily in another Parliament without showing to the people of this country that they are unfounded. Previous to the last general election we were told in this House by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that unless this Parliament ratified the award, we were the enemies of Ontario, and as such would be punished at the polls. We were told, Sir, in a certain memorandum which was sent by the Hon. Mr. Mowat and his Government in answer to one from the Secretary of State of this Government, that unless we adopted some other course than the one we proposed to adopt, namely, to refer the question to the Privy Council, that we should receive the condemnation of the people at the polls. Well, Sir, if we look at what has taken place in the last election we will find that the course we pursued met with the approbation of the people. We shall find that the position we then assumed, namely, that the whole question should be referred to the Privy Council, was fully and fairly discussed by the people—in fact, that was the great and important question discussed during the general election by hon. gentlemen opposite, in order, if possible, to draw the attention of the country away from the question of the National Policy. It was hoped by the representatives of the people in the Province of Ontario, who are in alliance with our friends on the Opposition side of this House, that they would make the people of Ontario believe that their representatives in this House were traitors to the Province. The people were told in almost every school-section in the Province of Ontario that we did everything we could do, to spoliolate Ontario of her just rights and to rob her of her territory; and yet the great majority, in fact nine-tenths of those who voted in favor of the resolution to refer the question to the Privy Council, were returned at the polls. The Hon. Mr. Mowat, in answer to the memorandum of the Secretary of State, stated that the resolution of this House did not reflect the opinions of the majority of the people of Ontario. He assumed that we, representing the Province of Ontario in this House, did not speak for the Province of Ontario, and therefore had no right to act as we had done, but declared that our duty was to at once confirm the award. But, as I say, the people fully and fairly discussed that question, and by a large majority said that we were right; and now again we are told, Sir, that we are traitors to our own Province. The course pursued by those gentlemen previous to 1882 is now being pursued by them in the Local Legislature. No later than the 29th of January last we were told by Mr. Mowat and his friends of the Ministerial party in the Province of Ontario that this Government and this House were acting in deep-seated hostility towards the Province of Ontario, and that we were determined to form an alliance with the Blues of the Province of Quebec, and with the members from the Maritime Provinces, in order to rob the Province of Ontario by delaying the settlement of that question. To draw away the attention of the general public of the Province of Ontario from the reckless and extravagant conduct of the Mowat Government, they are now endeavoring to draw a red-herring across the trail, to make the people of the Province feel that there is a more important question than the financial question to be considered, namely, the question of the spoliation of the Province of Ontario. Now, Sir, as I said before, our action in this Parliament was justified by the electors at the polls. We were told that we were then right in the course we pursued, and that it was right and proper that the whole question should be settled by the Privy Council. The people of the Province of Ontario by a large majority declared that we were right in the course we then pursued, and that the Mowat Administration was wrong. The position in which this Parliament found this question in 1882 was simply this. They found that an award had been made by certain gentlemen, which award was held by the highest legal authorities to be illegal and not binding. They found that the question referred to that arbitration was, where was the true legal boundary? When this Parliament discovered that the true legal boundary had not been found, that the award was not a true and binding award, that the whole course pursued by the Ontario Government was an inconsistent one; when we discovered that the Premier of Ontario had openly declared that the award had not done justice to Ontario, we felt the question had not been legally and properly decided and that our only recourse was to have it decided by the highest tribunal in the land. A resolution was moved by the late member for Niagara (Senator Plumb) asking that the question be referred to the Privy Council. That resolution was sent to the Ontario Government who refused to consider it. We contended, as representing the Province of Ontario, that the award was not legal and binding, that justice had not been done to Ontario, that, according to the authoritative statements made over and over again by the Premier of Ontario and by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) the boundaries of the Province of Ontario went to the Rocky Mountains and that the arbitrators had only given to Ontario one tenth of the land claimed by her; and we felt therefore that the question should be finally set at rest. We were told then that the award was not legal and binding, and at the same time were told that the late Government, had it been in power, would have recognised the award; we also discovered that the Ontario Government had passed an Act of Parliament ratifying that award in advance, and that it was then understood between Mr. Mowat and his Government and the Mackenzie Administration, that the latter would also pass an Act of Parliament ratifying the award in advance. This Parliament being possessed of that information, and seeing that the award could not possibly be maintained, decided the better course would be to pass a resolution, referring it for final adjudication to the Privy Council. This Parliament found that they were the trustees for the general public; they found that this question had not been settled and that it was their duty to find some solution of the difficulty; they found why the question was kept open,—and I think I will be able to show, before I sit down, why it was kept open for many years and why it is now being revived, I think I will be able to show that the object was merely to obtain an electioneering cry. We found also that Mr. Mowat and his Government had rejected proposals made by this Government to refer the award to the Privy Council; we found that they rejected a fair and reasonable proposition for the final settlement of the question; we found, not only that this reasonable and fair proposition made by the First Minister in 1872 and afterwards repeated by him in 1882, was rejected on both occasions, but that Mr. Mowat in the end was compelled to accept terms not so favorable at the hands of the Attorney-General of Manitoba; we find that while Mr. Mowat contended that there should be no joint authority in the disputed territory, as proposed by this Government, he when cornered by Mr. Miller, the Attorney-General of Manitoba, yielded and went before the Privy Council on less favorable terms than those proposed by this Government, and consented to a joint authority. Knowing all these facts, it is our duty to place them on record, in order that intelligent people may be able to decide whether we were right or wrong in the course we took. I propose not to quote anything except from the official records of the Mowat Administration; I propose to quote from certain documents which I find in the Sessional Papers of 1882, from the speeches of Mr. Mowat himself also from his organ, the Globe, in which certainly I have no confidence, in order to show that these gentlemen have been acting inconsistently, that they never intended to ratify the award, that when Parliament passed an Act in 1874, agreeing to ratify the award, in advance, the Government had no intention to carry it out. On a former occasion I quoted from the Globe of 1882, to show that the Mackenzie Administration never intended that the award should be ratified unless it were favorable to the Dominion, and that Mr. Mackenzie had reserved to himself the right to accept or reject the award as he might think proper. I want to show the House that the course of the Mowat Government has been vacillating, inconsistent and hostile to the interests of the country, and I hope the House will pardon me while, in order to do so, I read from the official documents of the Local Legislature, so that an intelligent public may understand the position taken by this Parliament and that which was taken by the Local Government, and decide which was the right one. I stated a few minutes ago, and I shall refer to this again, that this Government and its supporters were charged with being controlled by the Province of Quebec. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was particularly vicious towards his Lower Canadian friends in this House, and we find that his organ and Mr. Mowat with the leading lights of that party were certainly not very stinted in their strictures as regards the allegiance of the Bleus of Quebec to the present Government. In order that our friends from Lower Canada may know in what light they are regarded by the hon. gentlemen opposite and their supporters in Ontario, I shall quote from several of these authorities. I propose to show from papers and documents not favorable to my own party, how hon. gentlemen opposite are endeavoring to set up sectional feelings and sectional cries against our friends from the Province of Quebec. I find one quotation from the Globe of February 14, 1882,—I had reference to the earlier portion of this article a few moments ago, and on a former occasion in this House I read it. The Globe says:

"As a matter of fact the other Provinces were not protesting. We know not what private pressure the Bleus of Quebec, ever the enemies of Ontario and of progress, may have sought to bear on the Premier, knowing themselves to be the right arm of his power, but no public objection has been made, no open, manly protest uttered by any Province in this Dominion."

Then we find on February the 16th, this language:

"The report concerning Ontario boundaries which were published yesterday is very fully accredited to the Hon. J. A. Mousseau, a conspicuous representative of Blue interests, in the Ottawa Cabinet. It contains all that the animosity to Mr. Mousseau, aided by the ingenuity of Sir John can find against the rights of this Province. Sir John wishes to please the Blues by robbing Ontario for their benefit and insulting her for the gratification of his own and their spite."

Then we have another choice bit from a prominent gentleman in the Ontario Government, that is, the Hon. Mr. Pardee. We find in the Globe of January 21st, 1882, this choice language:

"Everything pointed to this conclusion, that the Dominion Government, influenced by animosity to Ontario, and pressed by a feeling of jealousy which prevailed in another Province, had determined to shirk the responsibility by changing the venue, making the quarrel between Ontario and Manitoba."

And, during the debate on the Address in the Local Legislature, one of the distinguished gentlemen in that House, a prominent member of the Reform party, spoke also in very strong terms. Mr. McLaughlan is reported to have said:

"He ventured to say that the member for Glengarry was the only member of the Opposition who had been sent pledged to stand up for the rights of Ontario. He imagined the people of Glengarry addressing their member as a native of Glengarry to the manner born, but reminding him that he was a long time out of Ontario and under the influence of the Mousseaus, the Chapleaus, the Carons, the Langevins of Quebec, who had not the kindest feelings towards the Province of Ontario. They recollected when Upper Canada paid the taxes and Lower Canada spent them."

Then we have another choice article from the Globe newspaper. As I said, I only intend to quote from the organs of the hon. gentlemen and their official documents. We find in the Globe of February 1st, 1882, this language:

"To the everlasting disgrace of the Dominion Government and their slavish majority in both Houses of Parliament, no similar Act was passed at Ottawa."

Again, on 4th February, 1882, we find this language:

"Do they mean simply that Sir John Macdonald, having for a long time been obliged to find the chief source of his power in the spirit of reaction which is still unfortunately so strong in Quebec, is determined to make use of that power to the utmost? Is he playing the double but dangerous game of pandering to the prejudices and the dread of progress of our French fellow citizens, at the same time that he is using them to check and punish the Opposition? It would be not only discouraging but exasperating to Ontario in particular to find the politician, whom she had herself repeatedly repudiated, and who holds his seat in Parliament by the grace of a purchased constituency at the Pacific, converting the heavy inertia of French Conservatism into a force for the punishment and humiliation of his own Province."

Then we find again another choice article in the Globe of February 14th:

"He (Sir John) disregarded the call of honor at the dictation of the French Bleus, and by way of punishing Ontario for supporting Mr. Mowat." In case Mr. Meredith were successful, "then, in that case, the Bleus would of course direct the policy of a Tory Government at Toronto as they direct the policy of the Tory Government at Ottawa."

It must be very flattering to these gentlemen to know what power they really have. I think it important to let them know what the opinion of the leading men of the Reform party in Ontario really is on this question. Then we find that a certain gentleman now in this House, but who got the go-by at the polls, on April 3rd, 1882,—I refer to the hon. member for Bothwell.

Mr. MILLS. I did not get the go-by.

Mr. RYKERT. Oh! yes, you did.

Mr. MILLS. No.

Mr. RYKERT. If the hon. gentleman did not get the go-by, he had a very narrow escape, for his enormous majority of several hundred was reduced to a small majority of 16.

Mr. MILLS. Not at all. A majority of 295 the other way was converted to—

Mr. RYKERT. I hope I am not making him uneasy. He said, according to Hansard of that year, page 690:

"There is not a man from one end of the Province to the other who does not know that the Prime Minister has been driven on in this policy of spoliation by his Quebec colleagues."

I heard him say "No, no," a little while ago, but if he consults that page of Hansard he will find that language. He goes on to say:

"They refuse to recognise that we are one Dominion, and that the growth and prosperity of any Province is an advantage to every other part of the Dominion. They envy us our rights, and they would filch from us a portion of our heritage."

That is the language which the hon. gentleman used towards his friends from Lower Canada. So you will see that, as far as the Grit orators in this House are concerned, as far as the Grit members in the Province of Ontario are concerned, they have shown a deep seated hatred to the Province of Quebec; on every occasion which has been afforded them they have shown the same hostility to that Province, and have pointed out the fact that the hon. the Premier controls this Dominion by the support of his Lower Canadian friends. Further even than that, they have pointed out over and over again that this Government is dependent upon, and controlled by, the members of the several Provinces irrespective of the Province of Ontario. It is my purpose to show that the real traitors to Ontario are the men now holding the reins of power in that Province. In order that these gentlemen may be able at their leisure to study the real history of this case, and that the people of the Province may know who are really acting in their interests, I shall occupy the attention of the House as briefly as possible in referring to what has been done in this case since 1872, when the question of the western boundary of Ontario was first mooted by the present Government. The House will recollect—it has been referred to upon more than one occasion—that the right hon. the leader of the Government in the year 1872, expressed a strong desire for the settlement of this question upon a legal basis, for its settlement by a satisfactory tribunal, one which would meet with the approval of this country. On the 1st May, 1872, the hon. gentleman recommended that a certain course of procedure should be adopted. He recommended that the question should be referred to the Privy Council, and that, in the meantime, a commission should be appointed in order that the Government of the disputed territory might be properly carried on. Then, in his report of the 16th May, 1872, I find, at page 232 of the Sessional Papers of 1872, this communication from the Hon. Joseph Howe:

"I am, at the same time, for reasons set forth in the memorandum, to invite the Government of Ontario to concur with the Government of Canada in a statement of the case now in dispute between the said Governments respecting such boundaries, for immediate reference to the judicial committee of the Privy Council, with the view to a settlement, by a judgment or a decision of that tribunal, of the western and northern boundaries of Ontario. I am also to urge upon the Government of Ontario the necessity, in view of the facts stated in the last paragraph of the accompanying memorandum, of arranging with the Government of the Dominion for some joint course of action as to the granting of land and of mining licenses, reservation of royalties, etc., in the portion of territory in controversy, and for this purpose I have to request you to move your Government to appoint a commissioner to meet the Hon. J. C. Aikins to arrange such joint system on the understanding that any such arrangement, when ratified by the two Governments, shall be held to bind both, and shall be subject to the decision of the judicial committee of the Privy Council upon the question of the boundaries, and that, after such decision, titles to lands or mining rights shall be confirmed by the Government, whether of Canada or of Ontario, as shall, under the decision of the Privy Council, be the proper party to legalise the sale."

Mr. RYKERT.

That was signed "Joseph Howe, Secretary of State for the Provinces." So, from the very outset, the present leader of the Government was desirous to have the question settled, and settled forever, by a proper tribunal recognised by everyone, and, in the meantime, in order that that disputed territory might be properly governed, he urged that a commission should be appointed to arrive at a decision satisfactory to the Dominion and to the Province of Ontario, and he placed that proposal before the Government of Ontario. Now, instead of accepting that proposition, you will see at once that Mr. Mowat went off in a different direction. No, I beg his pardon; it was then the present leader of the Opposition; because I think, if I recollect rightly, that he only resigned on the 21st August of the same year, although his hon. colleague I find was paid to the 1st October. I find on the 31st of May, 1872, at page 233 of the documents to which I have referred, this communication from the clerk of the Executive Council of the Province of Ontario, addressed to the Dominion Government:

"EXECUTIVE COUNCIL CHAMBER, 31st May, 1872.

"With reference to the proposed submission to the judicial committee of the Privy Council, this committee begs to observe that the solution of the boundary question depends upon numerous facts, the evidence as to many of which is procurable only in America, and the collection of which would involve the expenditure of much time; and upon the whole, the committee is of opinion that the more satisfactory way of settling the question, should the Government of Canada still decline to negotiate for a conventional boundary, would be by reference to a commission sitting on this side of the Atlantic, and the committee recommends that, without for the present dealing definitely with the proposal of the Government of Canada for a reference to the judicial committee, this counter suggestion should be made to that Government. The committee of Council entertains a strong conviction that it is the duty of the Government of Ontario to retain, in the meantime, the control of the lands within the boundaries claimed by it; but as it is anxious that the policy of the Government with reference to the disposition of these lands should, so far as practicable, conform to the views of the Government of Canada, the committee agrees that an effort should be made to avoid the possible difficulties arising from the claims put forward by that Government, and with this view the Committee recommends that the Hon. R. W. Scott should be requested to confer with the Hon. J. C. Aikins, as proposed by the dispatch of the 16th of May.

(Certified,) J. G. SCOTT,
Clerk E. C."

Now, Sir, I wish particularly to refer to the communication from the Dominion Government, because Mr. Mowat has repeatedly declared on the floor of the Legislature and published in his organ, that up to 1852 he had never heard of a reference to the Privy Council. I want to show that he knew of it from the very commencement, and that at first he appeared to be favorable to it, provided he would not be obliged to search through the papers referred to in the extract I have just read; he was at the time favorable to leaving it to the Privy Council or some other tribunal. I wish the House to keep this in mind, because I intend to show how he deceived the members of the Ontario House and endeavored to deceive the people of the Province of Ontario, by saying that up to 1882 he had never heard of a reference to the Privy Council. Well, Sir, the Government, then led by the right hon. gentleman at the head of the present Government, went out of office in October, 1873; and we find that even the Mackenzie Government was in favor of a reference of the matter to the Privy Council, and so much were they in favor of it that the very first act of that Government was to direct their Secretary of State to demand from the Ontario Government why they had not answered the communication I have referred to, of the 16th of May, 1872, that is, from the Hon. Joseph Howe, Secretary of State, to the Hon. W. P. Howland.

Mr. MILLS. That was not the Mackenzie Government? Joseph Howe was not a member of the Mackenzie Government.

Mr. RYKERT. I did not say he was. I stated that when the Mackenzie Government came into power their very first act—and a very hurried one it was—was to compel their Secretary of State to ask for the answer of the Ontario Government to Mr. Howe's communication of the 16th May, 1872, which is based upon the report of a gentleman whom I see here called "J. A. Macdonald," and I assume he is now the present gifted and honored leader of this House. On the 26th of December, 1873, I find, at page 242 of this same document—I do not know whether the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) will deny its authenticity; perhaps he will—I find this letter:

"OTTAWA, 26th December, 1873.

"SIR,—I have the honor to invite your attention to the letter addressed to your predecessor on the 12th November, 1872, covering a copy of a report of His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the subject of the northern and western boundaries of the Province of Ontario. May I request that you will have the goodness to bring the matter under the early notice of your Government, with a view to their coming to a decision on the proposition contained in the Order in Council in question, to submit the question of the boundary to the decision of the judicial committee of the Privy Council.

"(Signed), D. CHRISTIE,
"Secretary of State."

So you see, Mr. Speaker, I was right when I said that the members of the Mackenzie Government were favorable to referring that matter to the Privy Council. They asked for an answer, they urged an answer, but that answer was not given, as you will see; it was entirely evaded. I think I shall be able to show what caused the delay and what has been the cause of all the difficulty in settling this important and vexed question. I find the next act of the Ontario Government was to place in the hands of the Lieutenant-Governor certain language to be used in opening the Legislature of Ontario, on the 8th of January, 1874, which I find at page 242:

"The collection of evidence with respect to our North-West boundary is still going on; and the evidence for and against our claims will soon be in a position to be referred to some tribunal for adjudication. I have no apprehension as to the result. Meanwhile, informal negotiations have taken place for the adoption of a provisional line, so that the settlement of the important territory in dispute may not be delayed for a decision as to the true and permanent boundary. Resolutions on the subject will probably be submitted for your consideration."

Now, as I said a few minutes ago, we find the statement repeated in the Local Legislature, by the members of the Government that the question of reference to the Privy Council was never decided, never broached to them, never thought of. Let me show how truthful that statement is by referring to the resolution moved by Mr. Mowat on the 24th of March, 1874. He is evidently either at fault in his memory, or rather economical of the truth. I find, at page 242, this resolution:

"Resolved, That this House approves of the reference of the question of the western boundary of this Province to arbitration, or to the Privy Council, according as the Lieutenant Governor in Council shall see fit and approves, likewise, of the adoption of a provisional boundary line in the meantime; on such terms as may be agreed upon between the Government of the Dominion and the Government of this Province."

You will see that up to 1874 Mr. Mowat was in accord with the right hon. leader of the present Government, as regards the importance of having the question settled by an important tribunal, and that one of the important tribunals that he recognised was the Privy Council. Then we go on further and we find, in 1874, an extract from the speech delivered by the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, in which he looks forward hopefully to a settlement of the question in a very short time. I shall presently show where the delay has been and what has been the cause of the delay. Instead of its being the fault of the present Dominion Government, I shall show that it has been caused entirely by the Ontario Government, and is entirely a difficulty of their own creation. On 12th November, 1874, I find the Lieutenant-Governor used the following language:—

"In accordance with a resolution passed at your last Session, with respect to the westerly and northerly boundaries of the Province, my Government and the Government of the Dominion have agreed on a provisional line—"

I wish the House to bear in mind that fact—that they had agreed upon a provisional line—in order that I may further show the misstatements made by the Premier of Ontario:

"to be assumed as correct for the purpose of land grants by each Government, until the true and permanent boundary shall be ascertained and determined, and have agreed to leave to arbitration the question as to the permanent boundary. Two distinguished gentlemen have been selected for the office of arbitrators, and they are soon to enter upon their duties, and will probably finish their work in the early part of next year."

That states that they had come to some agreement, and you will find that the Province of Ontario had agreed to refer the matter to an arbitration, and at the same time recommended that the Legislatures of Ontario and the Dominion should take joint action upon that question and pass Acts by means of which the territorial award should be recognised whenever it was made. I find, on the 10th of November, 1874, at page 246 of this document, that Hon. Adam Crooks, then one of the Ministers of the Province of Ontario, referred to the resolution passed in the Local Legislature, as follows:—He said:

"By a resolution of the Legislative Assembly, passed on the 3rd day of March last, the House approved of the reference of the question of the western boundary of this Province to arbitration or to the Privy Council, according as the Lieutenant-Governor in Council should see fit. It is considered by Your Excellency's Council to be expedient that the question of the northern boundary of this Province should be determined at the same time as the western boundary, though the determination of the northern boundary is not of so pressing importance as the other. In view of these objects, the undersigned, before his late visit to Ottawa, on other public business, was authorised by the other members of Your Excellency's Council to propose (subject to Your Excellency's approval) to the Government of the Dominion that the question concerning the northern and western boundaries of the Province of Ontario should be determined by a reference to arbitrators to be mutually agreed upon, and whose standing and ability might readily be expected to secure for their decision the confidence alike of the people of Ontario and the people of the Dominion."

I wish to direct the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to this passage:

"The undersigned recommends that the Province agree to concurrent action with the Dominion in obtaining such legislation as may be necessary for giving binding effect to the conclusion which may be arrived at."

I wish the House to notice the words "may be arrived at," because I shall show what kind of Order in Council was passed, and that they left a loophole through which they could crawl.

"And for establishing the northern and western boundaries of the Province of Ontario in accordance therewith."

That communication was sent to the Dominion Government, and I point this out particularly, because I find that the Globe and Mr. Mowat have both stated publicly that Mr. Mackenzie never intended to pass an Act of Parliament ratifying and confirming the award before it was made. I find that on 12th November, 1874, the following memorandum was sent by the Dominion Privy Council:—

"On a memorandum, dated 12th November, 1874, from the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, stating that he recommends concurrence in the proposition of the Government of Ontario to determine, by means of a reference, the northern and western boundaries of that Province relatively to the rest of the Dominion.

"That the Ontario Government having named the Hon. Wm. Buell Richards, Chief Justice of Ontario, as one of the referees, he submits the name of the Hon. Lemuel Allan Wilmot, formerly Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of New Brunswick, to act in conjunction with him, and advises that authority be given them to agree upon a third person, not being a resident of Canada, and that the determination of a majority of such three referees be final and conclusive upon the limits to be taken as and for such boundaries respectively.

"He further recommends that the Dominion agree to concurrent action with the Province of Ontario in obtaining such legislation as may be necessary for giving binding effect to the conclusions arrived at, and for establishing the northern and western limits of the Province of Ontario in accordance therewith."

That memorandum was signed by Mr. Himsforth, clerk of the Privy Council. Hon. members will see that while the words used by the Ontario Government were, "conclusion which may be arrived at," Mr. Mackenzie used the words

"conclusions arrived at." So hon. members will see that by playing with words the Mackenzie Government escaped the responsibility of passing an Act of Parliament, which they solemnly declared they would do, and which Mr. Mowat declared over and over again it was the intention of the Dominion Government to pass. The Lieutenant-Governor stated that the arbitrators would complete the award in 1875. We do not, however, hear anything more of the matter, until action is taken by the Local Legislature. On 21st December, 1874, the Local Legislature passed an Act in accordance with the recommendation of Mr. Crooks, and with the agreement made with the Mackenzie Government, which Act recites:

"And whereas, subject to the approval of the Parliament of Canada and the Legislature of Ontario, it has been agreed by the Governments of the Dominion of Canada and the Province of Ontario, that the questions which have arisen concerning the said boundaries should be determined by reference to arbitration."

It goes on to say:

"The Legislature of the Province of Ontario consents that the Parliament of Canada may declare that the boundaries, which, by the award of the arbitrators aforesaid, or of any two of the arbitrators aforesaid, may be decided to be the northerly and westerly boundaries respectively of this Province, shall be declared to be the northerly and westerly boundaries thereof; or, in case the award shall be as to the westerly boundary alone, the same may be in like manner declared by the Parliament of Canada as aforesaid, and that the Parliament of Canada may thereby increase, diminish or otherwise alter the northerly and westerly limits of the Province of Ontario, so that the same may be in accordance with the award."

So the Mowat Government, by passing that Act, determined to ratify the award, no matter what it might be, whether it gave 1,000,000 square miles to Ontario or 100,000 square miles; and Mr. Mowat told the Legislature, in his speech, that they had agreed with the Dominion Government to secure concurrent action of the Dominion Parliament; but nothing was done by the Dominion Government, although the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was a leading spirit in it, until sometime in 1878. I will point out presently the reasons why such a course was adopted, and show there never was any intention on the part of the Mackenzie Government to ratify the award, unless they found it to be very favorable to the Dominion. We find that an agreement was entered into by the Dominion Government and the Ontario Government in regard to the government of that territory. A line was agreed upon. A provisional arrangement was made between Mr. Laird and Mr. Pardee, the former representing the Dominion and the latter the Ontario Government. That agreement was approved by Order in Council, so that in the event of the question not being decided for any considerable length of time, the Government of the country should still go on, lands should be sold, and everything, except leases, should be granted; and the agreement as regards the last named was afterwards amended, on the recommendation of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), so that leases were actually made a portion of the agreement as well as grants of land. We find that in 1875 the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario again refers to the question in a communication to the Legislature, in which he says:

"Since the dissolution of the last House the question of the northerly and westerly boundaries of the Province has continued to receive the attention of the Government. Informal negotiations have taken place, with respect to both a compromise line and the arbitration which the Legislature authorised, but no final result has been arrived at; meanwhile, steps have been taken for obtaining some additional evidence, expected to be of value."

Nothing was done except the passing of the Act of Parliament, and the reference to the question in the Governor's speech, until some time in 1877. Then the Lieutenant-Governor announced that everything was ready for the final settlement to be made in a few months. That was in January, 1877, but no decision was arrived at until a year and a-half after that time. Again the Lieutenant-Governor makes an excuse for not having the arbitration carried out, and we hear nothing more till after August, 1878, when the award was made. In December of that year the Mowat Government were very anxious to have the award ratified. During the four years nothing was said in regard to the Mackenzie Government passing an Act of Parliament, nothing was said about that Government ratifying the award and carrying out, in good faith, the agreement; but so soon as Sir John A. Macdonald came into power, hon. gentlemen opposite wanted the question settled and the award confirmed. We find that on 20th January, 1880, a communication was sent by this Government, in reference to an Act disallowing a certain Bill. To this communication Mr. Mowat made reply, and on the 3rd March, 1880, he induced his majority in the Local Legislature to pass a resolution, agreeing that the award should be sustained, and that the matter should neither be compromised nor carried further. This the Government of the Dominion refused to do, on the ground that, as they set out in a communication of the Minister of Justice, the award was not a legal and binding award; that the arbitrators had not found as they were ordered to find, namely, to ascertain the true legal boundary. In answer to that despatch Mr. Mowat sent a communication demanding that the award should be ratified, and stating that he would accept nothing else. Then we find that on the 27th of January, 1882, the Secretary of State, Mr. Mousseau, acting on behalf of this Government, sent a communication to Mr. Mowat, offering to refer the matter to the Privy Council, and offering at the same time to make a provisional agreement for the government of the disputed territory, and he endeavored to have the question settled in a satisfactory and legal manner. I find that at page 468 of these same Sessional Papers we have the communication of Mr. Mousseau. He refers to the fact that an understanding had been made to refer the matter to the Privy Council; that he offers still to refer it, and he points out, in reply to the objection, that if it went to the Privy Council there was no provisional arrangement between the two Governments, that the provisional agreement between them was still in existence. He asks to have the same joint authority maintained; he asks that the country shall be governed in the meantime in a certain specified manner, and he simplifies the whole question, so that there would be no difficulty here while the matter is pending before the Privy Council. In paragraph 24 I find this:

"They heartily wish that the proposal urged by the Dominion Government in 1872, for a submission to the judicial committee of the Privy Council, had been accepted by Ontario, and they cannot but attribute much of the inconvenience and delay alleged in your despatch to have occurred to the refusal of Ontario to unite in such a submission."

Every word of this was true. Then he says in paragraph 25:

"To the arbitration of 1874 His Excellency's Government was unable, for the reasons assigned, to give their adhesion; but, with Ontario, they believed it to be of the greatest importance that the dispute should be settled, and they will be anxious to further in every way in their power the submission of the question either to the Supreme Court of Canada or to an eminent legal functionary, to be mutually agreed upon; or, if it be preferred by the two Provinces of Ontario and Manitoba, to the judicial committee of the Privy Council, although His Excellency's advisers would prefer that it should be decided in Canada, either by the high legal functionary, as suggested, or by the Supreme Court, with the right of applying to the judicial committee of the Privy Council for an appeal to the Queen from any decision which may be arrived at, should either Province desire it."

So you see that they still continued to desire to have the question settled by the Privy Council. Then, in paragraph 29 of this report, we have this:

"The assumption, in your despatch, that the conventional boundary terminated on the 3rd August, 1878, the date of the award referred to, seems to be without foundation: but if the conventional line is to be considered as having been then abrogated, it must be considered as at an end for all purposes, leaving both parties to assert their own rights in reference to all the questions involved."

So, you see that this Government, through its Secretary of State, offered to continue to enforce the agreement between Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Mowat in all its details, and they further desired that the country should be governed by the appointment of certain judicial officers, so that the excuse which Mr. Mowat made, that they could not agree on any arrangements, was a flimsy answer to a document which showed clearly what this Government desired to do on that question. It finally winds up in this way :]

"As regards the government of the country and the enforcement of law and order in the mean time, it was intimated to Mr. Mowat, at the interview above referred to, that the Government of the Dominion would be ready to agree to such measures as were necessary to prevent confusion in these important respects. The suggestion was then made, that all justices of the peace residing in the disputed territory should receive commissions from both Ontario and Manitoba, and that all the judges of Ontario and all the judges of Manitoba should be put in a joint commission as regards the disputed territory. The laws of Ontario and Manitoba being alike in most respects, no confusion would probably arise. That in criminal cases the Act 43 Vic., chap. 36, had made, it was thought, satisfactory provision; or if there was anything deficient the Government of the Dominion would be ready to ask Parliament to supply it. That where there was found to be a practical difference between the laws of Ontario and those of Manitoba, the Government of the Dominion would use its good offices with the Government of Manitoba to induce them to consent that the law to be administered should be that of Ontario, as regards all matters of provincial jurisdiction, until the legal limits of both Provinces should be finally ascertained."

I have shown that the Government of this Dominion, the present Government, not only desired to bring the matter before the Privy Council, but met Mr. Mowat on fair and reasonable terms, in order to have that question settled finally and forever. What answer was given to that proposal? The answer was given by Mr. Mowat in a very petulant manner. The concluding portion of the report which was sent to this Government on the 18th of February, 1882, contains the following language, which goes to show that the course which the Ontario Government wished to pursue was, only to have the award ratified. They would agree to nothing, except to take the award, bad as it was, and bad as it was pronounced to be by the leader of the opposition in 1882. Mr. Mowat says :

"But I am advised that no provisional arrangement would be so satisfactory, or so beneficial to the development or settlement of the territory, the maintenance of order, and the due administration of justice therein, as the just course of obtaining, without further delay, by proper legislation from the Federal Parliament and the Legislature of Manitoba, the recognition of the award as the final adjustment of the boundaries of this Province. The evils already endured are beyond recall, but the continuance or aggravation of them from this time forward is in the hands of your Government."

That, Sir, was the answer made by Mr. Mowat; he was determined to take the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government by the throat, and to say: Unless you agree to my terms and ratify the award unconditionally, I will have nothing to do with you. This Parliament, in 1882, as I have already said, passed a resolution agreeing to refer the whole matter, and to make conditional arrangements in the meantime. On the 4th of April, 1882, Mr. Plumb moved the following resolution:—

"That in the opinion of this House it is expedient that the western and northern boundaries of Ontario should be finally settled by reference to, and an authoritative decision by either the Supreme Court of Canada, or the judicial committee of the Privy Council in Great Britain, or by the Supreme Court in the first place, subject to a final submission to the judicial committee, as the Province of Ontario may choose; that such decision should be obtained either on appeal in a friendly action brought for the purpose, or by reference to the said courts, or either or both of them, by Her Majesty, under the powers conferred upon Her by the Imperial and Canadian Parliaments, as the Government of Ontario may prefer; and that the said reference should be based on the evidence collected and printed, with any additional documentary evidence, if such there is, and that, pending the reference, the administration of the lands shall be entrusted to a joint commission, appointed by the Governments of Canada and Ontario."

So you will see that having ascertained that Mr. Mowat's Government refused to accept the proposition contained in the document of the Secretary of State, of the 27th January, 1882, that Government having refused to accept the proposition to establish the conventional agreement made between Mr. Mowat and Mr. Mackenzie, having refused to entertain any proposition whatever, this House, knowing that the award was illegal, knowing from so high an authority as the leader of the Opposition, that the award was not a legal and binding award, and having heard from all who knew anything about the question that the award was not a legal and binding award, this House, in the exercise of its discretion, in the exercise of its rights and privileges as the trustee and guardian of the people of the Dominion, passed a resolution declaring that they were desirous of having the question settled finally and forever by a tribunal, and in the mean time that the disputed territory should be left untrammelled and unencumbered. But to that proposition Mr. Mowat turned a deaf ear. Then, we find that a communication was sent on the 2nd September, 1882, from the Hon. Hector L. Langevin, for the Secretary of State, to the Government of Ontario, in which he encloses the resolution passed by this House, and points out that it was carried by a large majority of the House, 116 yeas against 44 nays, and goes on to say :

"His Excellency desires me to invite the attention of your Government to this unmistakable expression of opinion of the representatives of the people of the Dominion, and further to state that his Ministers are not only prepared but anxious to make all necessary arrangements in connection with the Government of Ontario, for giving effect to such resolutions with all convenient speed."

So, I think the House must be satisfied, so far as this Government are concerned, that from 1878 down to 1882 they were desirous of having the matter fairly settled by the Privy Council. The Government of Ontario were asked to give an answer to this communication. Well, what do we find? On the 2nd of September, 1882, Mr. Mowat replies, and in a very petulant manner, says: What do I care about your resolution? It was passed by a majority from the different Provinces; you had not a majority of those who alone should properly vote on that resolution. In that communication he held by the statement made by him on the floor of Parliament, that Ontario had not got her just deserts, and that the boundary ought to extend to the Rocky Mountains. He says :

"The despatch further mentions, that the resolution was passed by a large majority of the members of the House of Commons (116 to 44); and the despatch invites the attention of this Government to this unmistakable expression of opinion on the part of the House of Commons."

"The undersigned would respectfully recommend that the attention of the Federal Government be in turn invited to the fact, that resolutions on the same subject were passed by the Ontario Assembly in the Legislative Sessions of 1880 and 1881, with but one dissentient voice on either occasion, and in the Session of 1882, by a majority of two to one; and that the attention of the Federal Government be called to the 'unmistakable expression of opinion' on the part of the representatives of the people of the Province which is shown by the votes on these resolutions. The resolutions were promptly communicated to the Dominion Government, and have received no attention from that Government."

Why, Sir, who voted for that resolution in this Parliament? We find that 47 from Ontario voted in favor of it, and 23 against it. Surely, Sir, those gentlemen representing Ontario constituencies in this Parliament must have known that they had just as much right to look after the interests of the Province of Ontario as the members of the Provincial Legislature. Mr. Mowat pointed to the fact that his resolution was carried by a vote of 50 against 25, and he says: Unless you accept my proposition to ratify that award, I shall advise my Government to resist and to take possession of that territory. These, Sir, are the documents to which I wish to refer, showing the course pursued by the Ontario Government upon this question—documents which, when they are perused by the people of Ontario, will show that the Dominion Government have acted consistently throughout. Now, we find that in 1879, Mr. Mowat ratified that award by an Act of Parliament. Mr. Mowat first claimed that the Province of Ontario had not got her just deserts, that she was in fact robbed by the arbitration, but he next asked the House to ratify the award. The preamble of that Act says :

"And whereas the effect of the said award is to give to this Province less territory than had been claimed on behalf of the Province, and more territory than the Government of Canada had consented to be within the limits of the Province or than was contained within the provisional boundary line aforesaid; and whereas by chapter 28 of the Acts of Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, passed in the Session held in the 34th and the 35th years of Her Majesty's reign, and intitled 'An Act respecting the establishment of Provinces in the Dominion of Canada,' it is enacted that the Parliament of Canada may, from time to time, with the consent of the Legislature of any Province in the Dominion, increase, diminish, or otherwise alter the limits of such Province, upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed to by the said Legislature, and may, with the like consent, make provisions respecting the effect and operation of any such increase or diminutions or alteration of territory in relation to any Province affected thereby; and whereas it is proper that the boundaries determined by the said award be adopted and confirmed—"

The Bill then enacts that the boundaries as declared by the award shall be accepted by the Province of Ontario as the true boundaries of the Province. That, Sir, concludes the documentary evidence which we have before us in reference to this question. Now, Sir, I have shown what was the position of the Dominion Parliament by the records of the Ontario Legislature, and I think that hon. gentlemen, after a careful perusal of what I have brought forward, will come to the conclusion that this Government acted in the best interest of the Province of Ontario. Now, Sir, it was contended, in 1882, by myself and other members of the Province of Ontario, as one reason why the award should not be ratified, that that award had not done justice to the Province of Ontario. We based the conclusion we arrived at, not only on the Act of Parliament, in which Mr. Mowat declared that justice had not been done to Ontario, but on statements made by him throughout the Province on different occasions, in the Local Legislature, and in his manifestoes sent to this Government, all showing clearly and conclusively that the Province of Ontario had not been fairly dealt with; and, knowing that to be the fact, we, representing the Province of Ontario, in this Legislature, felt it to be our duty, if that award was not a legal and binding award, to see that justice should be done to Ontario, and that it should be ascertained clearly and conclusively whether or not her western boundary did not extend to the Rocky Mountains, or how far west it did extend beyond the point found by the arbitrators. Now, we find that Mr. Mowat, in 1873, declared in his place in Parliament that the westerly boundary of the Province extended still farther west than what was found subsequently by the award; and Mr. Caldwell, in moving the address in answer to the speech of the Lieutenant-Governor, used this language:

"The north-western boundary question was of the highest importance, it being whether our western boundary was at Thunder Bay or somewhere between the Lake of the Woods or Lake Winnipeg, or even farther west, perhaps as far as the Rocky Mountains. He thought that anyone who looked into this question could not fail to see the arguments for the farther lines were correct."

I point this out in justification of the course we pursued, and in order to show that Mr. Mowat placed in the mouth of the mover of the address his opinion that the westerly boundary extended as far west as the Rocky Mountains. Mr. Mowat followed that up by the same contention before the arbitrators. He pointed out that the previous Minister of Crown lands, the Hon. Mr. Cauchon, the Hon. Mr. Draper, and other eminent authorities, had concluded that the western boundary of the Province extended to the Rocky Mountains; and in the case before the arbitrators, as published by himself, at page 267, he says:

"In the present dispute, the claim of Ontario is to the boundaries which were officially insisted upon by the Province of Canada before Confederation, and by the Dominion afterwards. It is submitted that the demand so made was just and well-founded."

Therefore, you will see, running through all his communications and his state documents, his declaration is that the western boundary of the Province of Ontario extended to the Rocky Mountains; and one object I have in making this motion, is to see what position Mr. Mowat took in his argument before the Privy Council; because I am prepared, from his own documents, to show that he was in favor of a boundary farther west than the Lake of the Woods.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. RYKERT. When the House adjourned I was endeavoring to show one reason why this Legislature was justified in not accepting the award of 1878. I was endeavoring to show that Mr. Mowat and the Ontario Government had always contended that the boundaries of Ontario extended to the Rocky Mountains; I pointed out that, throughout all documents submitted by Mr. Mowat to the arbitrators, according to every official document submitted by the Ontario Government to this Government and the resolutions passed by the Ontario Legislature in 1880, 1881, 1882, 1883, the fact is clearly pointed out that the western boundary of Ontario extends to the Rocky Mountains. If such be the case, if Mr. Mowat and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) were justified in their contention, in 1882; if the hon. member for Bothwell took the right view of the case in the reports submitted by him to the Mowat Administration, and in the pamphlet he published—if they were correct, this House was amply justified in refusing to accept an award which they knew to be illegal. I quoted from a paragraph in the speech made by Mr. Caldwell, in moving the address, in 1873, in which he pointed out the fact that the boundaries of Ontario extended west of the Rocky Mountains. I find also that in the case submitted to the arbitrators, as published in these official documents, that Mr. Mowat used the following language:

"In the present dispute the claim of Ontario is to the boundaries which were officially insisted upon by the Province of Canada before Confederation and by the Dominion afterwards. It is submitted that the demand so made was just and well-founded."

I find also in a report of the proceedings before the arbitrators, in 1878, as reported in the Globe, that Mr. Mowat used the following language:

"He argued that Ontario had the same limits as Upper Canada, and the same limits as, west of the division line between Upper and Lower Canada. The Province of Canada had and the Dominion of Canada had before its purchase of the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company. In the present dispute the claim of Ontario is to the boundaries which were officially insisted upon by the Province of Canada before Confederation and by the Dominion afterwards. It is submitted that the demand so made was just and well-founded."

Then he quoted from an official paper of the Hon. Mr. Cauchon, Commissioner of Crown Lands, in the year 1857, in which he claimed:

"That the westerly boundary of the Province extended as far as the British territory, not otherwise organized, would carry it, which would be to the Pacific."

Then we find that in the speech he made in the town of Woodstock, in addressing his constituency, Mr. Mowat there contended for the same boundary. On 18th December, 1878, he used this language:

"Little progress has been made towards the solution of the problem (the western boundary) before the Blake Government came into power, but immediately upon his assuming the reins of office (1874) he took steps for the settlement. I succeeded him in the work. Some of the questions involved in controversy had been in dispute for centuries. * * * Among the important questions which the Government of Ontario had to deal with since Confederation, none was of greater moment, to us, as regards our future welfare, than this question of the boundary between the Provinces."

Mr. Mowat, having expressed those views in 1878, still adhered to them throughout all the official documents he sent this Government. At page 307 of the official documents which contains the argument before the arbitrators, he said:

"But I shall show, that if I had no presumption in my favor, the conclusion, which I desire the arbitrators to arrive at are the conclusions which they cannot but arrive at in view of all the facts."

That shows that Mr. Mowat still continued to be influenced by the opinion that the western boundary of Ontario extended to the Rocky Mountains; and in every one of his official despatches you will find, in one clause or another, reference to this fact. You will find, in an official despatch of 23rd September, 1879 :

"Further, the territory so awarded to Ontario is less than was comprised in Upper Canada, according to the true intent and meaning of the Quebec Act (1774), as shown by its recitals, and by its known objects and its history, including the proceedings thereon in the House of Commons, as reported in Cavendish's debates, and as set forth in the letter of the Right Hon. Edmund Burke, dated 2nd August, 1774, to his constituents, the Province of New York, whose agent he was at the time. All these documents are to be found among the printed documents already mentioned."

Then we find, in a resolution moved by himself, moved in the Local Legislature, 3rd March, 1880, and among the recitals of that resolution are the following :

"That on the 16th January, 1869, the Government of the Dominion, through its representatives, contended before Her Majesty's Imperial Government, that the western boundary 'extended to, and included the country between the Lake of the Woods and the Red River,' and that the northern boundary included 'the whole region of Hudson's Bay;' that the boundaries then claimed by the Government of the Dominion, on behalf of Canada, as against the pretensions of the Hudson's Bay Company, would, on the same grounds, be the boundaries of the Province of Ontario, and would give to Ontario a territory vastly in excess of that embraced in the award of the arbitrators."

In 1882 we find also one of his resolutions declaring :

"That the award has assigned to Ontario less territory than His Excellency's present advisers as well as previous Canadian Governments, had, in other contentions, invariably claimed to lie within this Province."

Every thing points to the fact that Mr. Mowat, from the commencement, was of the opinion that the western boundary would extend to the Rocky Mountains. Now, I propose to discuss very briefly the question as to who is responsible for all this delay. It has been frequently charged in this House, and more frequently in the Ontario Legislature, that the Dominion Government, under the leadership of the right hon. member for Carleton (Sir John A. Macdonald) has been and is responsible for all the delays which have occurred. I think those hon. gentlemen who recollect the quotations I made before recess will come to the conclusion, after a careful analysis of them, that the delays were due to Mr. Mowat's Administration. I think I can show, by a recapitulation of what I have placed before the House, that Mr. Mowat alone is responsible for the delay. The first official document between the two Governments was on the recommendation of the right hon. gentleman, the Premier, in May, 1872. That document was formulated by an Order in Council of 16th May, 1872, which urged strongly upon the Ontario Government the advisability of referring the question to the Privy Council; in December, 1873, as I have shown, the Government of Mr. Mackenzie asked Mr. Mowat's Government for an answer to the question submitted by the preceding Dominion Government, as to whether the Ontario Government would consent to a reference to the Privy Council, but no answer was obtained; in January, 1874, the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, in a speech from the Throne, promised to give the matter his careful consideration, and during the Session of 1874 a resolution of Mr. Mowat's was passed by the Ontario Legislature agreeing to refer the whole matter to the Privy Council or to an arbitration, as the Governor in Council might think best; in June, 1874, an agreement was made between the two Governments, providing for proper government of the disputed territory pending the decision. In November, 1874, Mr. Crooks offered to refer the matter to arbitration. Mr. Mackenzie agreed to this, and an Order in Council was passed, also agreeing that there should be concurrent legislation. I have shown the difference between the two Orders in Council, the one agreeing to ratify the award to be made, the other to ratify an award when made. In 1874 the Government promised the Legislature that the whole matter should be settled by 1875; in 1875 nothing was done. Who was responsible? The Government of Ontario was in accord with the Government of the Dominion. In 1876 the same two Governments were in power, but still nothing was done. In 1877 a change of arbitrators was made, and the Lieutenant-Governor tells us the whole matter will be settled in a few months. In August, 1878, the award was made—so that between September, 1873, and August, 1878, nothing of consequence towards settling the question of the western boundary was done either by the Mackenzie Administration or the Mowat Government. Thus, for a delay of nearly five years, the Mackenzie Government and the Mowat Administration are responsible, while this Government is charged for the delay in enforcing the award, because they chose, in 1880, to enquire into the whole case and ascertain whether the award was legal or not. Now, if Mr. Mowat had been sincere in the agreement which he made with the Mackenzie Administration, he would have insisted upon an Act being passed here simultaneously with his own Act of Parliament, in accordance with the provisions of the Orders in Council. If he had been sincere he would have told the House why the Mackenzie Government did not sanction that award in advance. Mr. Mowat invariably kept that from the Legislature; he kept them in ignorance, and very few persons except those who were in Parliament knew anything about it. Almost every one else believed that concurrent legislation had taken place, but we now know why it did not take place. We know that Mr. Mowat, in 1882, refused to accept a proposition made by the right hon. the leader of the Government. That proposition, as I have pointed out to the House, was a most reasonable one. It not only endorsed and ratified the agreement made with the Mowat Government by the Mackenzie Government, while the question was being decided, but in every way the Dominion Premier offered to meet Mr. Mowat half way. But that the latter refused to do. He passed resolution after resolution, affirming the decision of his Government, that the award should be ratified and nothing more. He would not consent to any reference, and upon flimsy pretexts of one kind and the other, he tells Parliament that it is humiliating to the Province of Ontario to agree to a second reference, because it would be giving to the leader of this Government an opportunity of crawling out of it. But I think the whole question is answered by a dispatch from Mr. Mowat, which we find at page 464 of this official document. This also is in keeping with and accords with the views expressed by the hon. member for Bothwell, in which he declared that we were acting as the enemies of Ontario, and that we would get the enemies' reward. He anticipated the general election. He looked to that tribunal of the people which was to destroy the present leader of the Government. And Mr. Mowat, anticipating, of course, the same result, got a little bold in one of his documents, and refused, after various pretexts of one kind or the other, to be bound by any proposition made by the Dominion Government, and he finally lets the cat out of the bag by showing that he anticipated a change of Government. Referring to the provisional agreement, he says :

"A reference to the judicial committee of the Privy Council, or to any other tribunal, would involve much loss of time; and meanwhile the advices received from the territory indicate that the timber therein is being destroyed; that enormous quantities of it are being practically lost to the Province; and that the development of the territory is arrested, to the permanent injury of this Province, by the continued absence of undisputed authority to enforce order, administer justice, and grant titles."

Now, when he penned that document, he showed how economical he was of the truth. He knew right well that the leader of this Government had officially declared that they considered the agreement then in force which Mr. Mackenzie had made with Mr. Mowat, and Mr. Mousseau's dispatch points out that the Government desires that agreement to be still enforced, and in the meantime to give to the Government of the Province some joint authority satisfactory to the Governments of both Provinces. He goes on further :

"Without such provisional arrangements, this Province may as well wait for the confirmation of the award, which (so far as concerns the rights and powers still remaining to the Dominion), my Government confidently expect from another Parliament, as go to the expense and have the unavoidable delay of a second litigation."

There he anticipated a defeat of the present Government. That was predicted by the present leader of the Opposition. He was anxious to appeal to the tribunal of the people; he did appeal to the tribunal of the people, and there is the result. Anyone who will carefully peruse these official documents must come to the conclusion that the delay has been occasioned by Mr. Mowat himself. Mr. Mowat, upon several occasions, as I said, made statements in the Legislature which are not corroborated by his own official documents. Whether they were made designedly to deceive the people, or in ignorance of the true state of the facts, I am not prepared to say; but I may safely say that he forgot what his official documents contained, what the true record, as laid before the people, was. On the 27th January, 1882, the Globe gives Mr. Mowat's speech, and I have the Globe itself in my desk, if anyone doubts the truth of what I assert, for I have come charged and primed with official documents. Mr. Mowat, in his speech in the Legislature, says :—

"A reference to the Privy Council has not been proposed to us yet. It is true Ministers have expressed opinions in favor of that mode of settlement, but a reference to the Privy Council cannot be had without a consent as to the facts and the material on which they would decide the question."

He says that no reference was ever yet proposed to him. I have read the official document of the leader of the Government, of the 16th of May, 1872, and I have also read—and perhaps it will do no harm to read it again—a resolution moved by Mr. Mowat himself, to see if it is true that no proposition had ever been made to them. On the 23rd March, 1874, Mr. Mowat moved :

"That this House approves of the reference of the question of the western boundary of this Province to arbitration, or to the Privy Council, according as the Lieutenant-Governor in Council shall see fit."

So you will see that Mr. Mowat states, in reference to the proposed reference to the Privy Council, what is, in my opinion, quite at variance with the fact. He also puts in the mouth of the mover of the Address language which shows conclusively that Mr. Mowat was mistaken when he said that no proposal of the kind had been made to him. Mr. Caldwell, in moving the Address, on the 10th January, 1873, said :

"He felt satisfied that, when the question was further ventilated by a perusal of the archives in Paris and London, we could not fail to succeed before the Privy Council, before which the case would, he hoped, soon come."

It is generally understood that the mover of an Address, in speaking in Parliament upon the Address, speaks authoritatively, and Mr. Caldwell said this would shortly go before the Privy Council. He must have spoken by the authority of Mr. Mowat. I am justified in that statement, because, on the 23rd March following, Mr. Mowat moved a resolution to refer it to the Privy Council, and yet he tells us that the question had not been submitted to him. I do not know if this House wants more evidence upon that point to satisfy it that Mr. Mowat knew that the Dominion Government was in favor of going to the Privy Council, before he was forced at last by Mr. Miller to come to terms. We have also some other references which will go to show in what an extraordinary manner these gentlemen have acted. We find, in January, 1883, the Globe made use of these words :

"Mr. Mowat, long ago, consented to have the boundary question submitted to the judicial committee of the Privy Council."

And yet Mr. Mowat said that he never heard of it, and that no such proposition was made to him. On 3rd January, 1883, according to the Globe, Mr. Mowat, at the Reform convention in Toronto, made use of this extraordinary language, which shows that his memory was at fault :

"The suggestion has been made that the matter should be left to the Privy Council. That proposition has, to some persons, a look of equity and reason which is on the surface only. If I were to accede to a proposal to leave the matter to the Privy Council, not only would I be acceding to that which it was unjust to demand, not only would I be putting this Province to an expense to which it ought not to be subjected, but I would really be enabling the Dominion Government to delay indefinitely any settlement at all."

So you will see that he always refers to the Privy Council, notwithstanding his plea made upon the floor or Parliament. Those who know anything at all about the affairs of the Province of Ontario will recollect that in the Session of 1880 Mr. Mowat voted the sum of $10,000 for the purpose of paying the expenses of a trial before the Privy Council. Then, Sir, no later than the 29th January, 1885, Mr. Mowat delivered one of those beautiful diatribes of his against this Government, endeavoring to stir up a feeling of Province against Province, and raising the animosity of the people of Ontario against the people of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces, in his anxiety to create capital for his party at the next general election, and he made another violent speech, an extract from which I will read :

"The question of arbitration was accepted by the people's representatives and they were never called upon to express an opinion in regard to leaving that to the Privy Council."

Now, Sir, this speech was made no later than six weeks ago, wherein he affirms that no proposition was ever made to leave it to the Privy Council, that Parliament never considered it, and that, too, in the face of his own resolution that I have read. Yet I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite will applaud that kind of thing; I suppose they will say that it is all right, but I say it is consistent with Mr. Mowat's whole course of vacillation throughout, a determination to throw the odium upon the present Government, to stir up a feeling of antagonism against the Province of Ontario, in order by that means to affect the seats of members from that Province in this Legislature. That is his whole desire and hope, and I think any impartial mind will come to the conclusion that Mr. Mowat has displayed an unusual amount of hypocrisy upon this whole question. Now, I will ask, did Mr. Mowat or Mr. Mackenzie ever intend to ratify the award? We have seen, in the quotation from the Globe, which I read before recess, and which I read two years ago in this Parliament, that Mr. Mackenzie reserved to himself the right to accept or reject the award, as he thought fit. Mr. Mowat had himself contended that legislation of a concurrent character should be passed, and that both Governments should be bound to accept the award, no matter what it was. Mr. Mowat led Parliament to believe that both Legislatures were agreed upon that point. They went through the miserable formula of passing Orders in Council, they procured an Act of Parliament ratifying an award to be made, and yet Mr. Mackenzie quietly sits by and allows the arbitration to go on. For what reason, Sir? Because he felt the importance of being able to accept or reject the award. I quoted a short time ago what they had agreed to do, and pointed to the Order in Council by which there should be concurrent legislation. Now, I find, as I pointed out to the House, that there is a discrepancy between the two Orders in Council; the one refers to the award that may be made, and the other to the award when made. If any person wants to be satisfied as regards the position which those gentlemen occupied, they have only to refer to the debates in the Local Legislature, and also to an editorial in their own organ. In a speech made by Mr. Meredith, on the 27th January, 1882, he made this statement:

"An important admission had been made by the member for North Brant (Mr. Young) who was in the confidence of the Government at Ottawa. This member had said the Government (Mackenzie) were either afraid of being embarrassed by the votes of the representatives of Quebec, or that they did not think it was proper to bind a subsequent Parliament by the ratification in advance of that award."

That is the statement made by the leader of the Opposition, in the presence of the leader of the Government, and not a single word was said in opposition to it. The Globe of 10th July, 1883, says:

"Mr. Mackenzie, however, decided to wait until he knew what the award was before it was confirmed."

And yet, in the face of that opinion of their own Government, these gentlemen contend that this Government should ratify the award immediately, no matter what the award was. And again, on the 8th March, 1882:

"Mr. Meredith charged Mr. Mowat and his party with delay, and openly told them that he (Mr. Mowat) had admitted that he requested Mr. Mackenzie, when in power, to pass an Act in advance of the ratification of that decision, and Mr. Mackenzie had refused to do so."

But, Sir, Mr. Mowat never submitted that fact to the Parliament of Ontario. He never told them that he asked Mr. Mackenzie to pass an Act ratifying the award in accordance with the proposition of the Order in Council. Now we have a report of the speech made by Mr. Mowat upon that occasion, which, I think, will satisfy any unprejudiced mind—and which, I hope, will satisfy some of the prejudiced minds opposite—that Mr. Mowat never intended that Mr. Mackenzie should pass an Act of Parliament ratifying the award; that his passing that Order in Council was a mere empty sham, and that he was shamming when he passed an Act of Parliament confirming the award, because he knew Mr. Mackenzie never intended to do so. Now, I have here a speech of Mr. Mowat. I think it is important that we should know exactly what Mr. Mowat's opinions were upon this question, how fairly he acted towards the Province of Ontario, and how he treats this Government and this Parliament. He said:

"My hon. friend (Mr. Meredith) is willing to lose half of our Province rather than resist the illegal acts of the Dominion. The hon. member (Meredith) had said that Mr. Mackenzie was to blame for not passing an Act confirming the award prior to the conclusion. He had also said that the award when made was subject to the sanction of Parliament. He thought he was reduced to hard straits when he took such ground as that. Governments did not pass Acts to confirm awards yet to be made, but they always did immediately after the award was reached."

It seems rather novel that Mr. Mowat should make such a speech, in the face of his own Act of Parliament, of 1879, which confirmed the award. The Act of Parliament of December, 1874, conclusively shows that Mr. Mowat did ratify the award in advance. Yet he says, in his speech, that "No Government ever does pass an Act of Parliament confirming an award to be made." He goes on to say:

"In point of fact, it was submitted for the sanction of Parliament, but good faith and all precedent required that awards should be submitted for the sanction of Parliament. No one would for one moment say that a great question of this kind, involving 100,000 square miles, should depend upon the willingness of one of the parties to accept it or reject it at pleasure."

And yet he passes an Act of Parliament which accepts it. He does not propose to reject it, but he allows Mr. Mackenzie a loophole out of which he can crawl. He says again:

"Had there been any ground whatever for suspecting that the award was in the slightest degree too favorable to Ontario, the Dominion Government might have been justified in delaying or refusing to be bound by it. Not Mackenzie, with his usual caution, reserved the right to do so for cause."

I do not see why it was a more unusual course for the Dominion Parliament to take, than it would be for the Local Legislature, in which he did pass an Act of Parliament confirming it in advance. Mr. Meredith interrupted Mr. Mowat in the course of his speech to ask him the question:

"Did not the hon. gentleman ask the Dominion Government to pass a confirmatory Act?"

"Mr. Mowat said that there had been some conversation about it, and no doubt there were reasons given for not passing a Bill at that time."

There you see how deceitfully he was acting. He was asked a question about concurrent legislation; both Governments had passed Orders in Council; Mr. Mowat knew that and kept it in the dark. If he had told Parliament that order had been passed, Parliament would have said: Why did you not have an Act passed? But no; it pleased Mr. Mowat and his friends to keep that in the background. He goes on to say:

"It must be remembered that it was not 100,000 square miles that Ontario claimed, but 1,000,000. The Province of Manitoba was afterwards established and that Legislature (Ontario) made no objection to it, though they did not feel at liberty to withdraw any portion of their claim previously set up."

He goes on to say further:

"If Mr. Mackenzie had proposed to pass an Act confirming the result of the arbitration, which might give this Province one million square miles of land, it would have been binding."

If so, why was not the Act passed. He continues:

"But the friends of the hon. gentleman complained of a difficulty when the amount was only 100,000 square miles. The hon. member for London said that the reason for the Government of the Dominion withholding its assent to the award was the jealousy of the other Provinces. But if they found that objection insuperable what would have been other objections before the award was made, and when an Act would have committed the Parliament to the sanctioning of Ontario's free claim for 100,000 square miles? Therefore, that unusual procedure of ratifying the award prior to its declaration would have involved the Dominion Government in ten times the difficulty which the present Government thought insuperable."

Sir, if it was difficult for Mr. Mackenzie to ratify an award of this kind, it was equally difficult for this Government to ratify it, especially as it was not a legal and binding award, especially when Ontario always contended that the western boundary of the Province extended to the Rocky Mountains, and especially when that question was not finally decided by the arbitrators. I will give one more proof to show that the Mackenzie Government never intended to ratify the award, but intended simply to keep it afloat for political and party purposes. We have been told over and over again that the Mackenzie Government were in favor of ratifying the award. But we find, from the declarations of Mr. Mowat and those of the organ of the party, that there was no such intention. We find in the Globe of 17th February, 1872, the following passage in an editorial:—

"It is true that the House did not sanction the award in advance, and true also that he could not have reasonably asked Parliament to ratify it by anticipation. There was a reasonable possibility, and more, that Manitoba, or a large portion of it, might be brought into Ontario by the determination of the western boundary. Obviously there would have been practical necessity for compromise between the Dominion Government and Ontario in that case. Hence it would have been folly on the part of the House to ask Parliament to ratify the award in advance. The consent of the Dominion Parliament to accept the award, in case Ontario were not so extended as to make it necessary for her to cede it some of her territory, was implied by recognising the impropriety of the arbitration by asking money for it. The Dominion was therefore in honor bound to accept the award if it were found practicable to yield to Ontario all defined as legally hers."

This Government felt it could not ratify, in the face of the evidence of Mr. Mowat himself and in the face of these public utterances, an award which they knew was not legal or binding. We find that Mr. Mowat repeatedly made all kinds of excuses for not going to the Privy Council. He repeatedly declared that unless Ontario had full possession of all that territory it could not possibly go to the Privy Council. Mr. Mowat had, however, previously entered into an agreement by which all difficulties that could possibly occur would be settled; but when Mr. Mowat's attention was called to the fact, he said that that agreement was not legal and binding, and that unless Ontario was at once placed in a more favorable position he would not go to the Privy Council. Mr. Mowat even declared what his idea of a reasonably favorable position was. He said that if the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald would make a reasonable agreement, they, the Ontario Government, would go to the Privy Council. Mr. Mowat, speaking in the Legislature, on 8th February, 1882, said :

"Whether or not they could agree to go to the Privy Council he could not say (January 27, 1882, said it had not been proposed) but he believed it could be done if the Dominion Government would consent to a reasonable arrangement. What would be a reasonable arrangement would be that the same materials should be laid before the Privy Council which were before the arbitrators, with any additional documents which it might seem material to add. If both parties are anxious to go to the Privy Council, there was nothing in the constitution of that Council that would prevent a case of this kind going before them on such material as would be reasonable for both parties to agree to lay before them for that purpose."

So that Mr. Mowat showed that his desire was that the case should be heard on the official documents as printed, and that they should be laid before the Privy Council, together with any later facts that might be necessary. Yet in the official documents he refused to enter into an agreement of that kind. In fact, the only reason for the inaction of Mr. Mackenzie's Government was stated in this House in 1882, by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who said :

"And the man from Ontario who upholds the policy of the Government, no matter what his views may be on the question of the Tariff, will be regarded as an enemy of his Province, and when the day of election comes, will receive at the hands of the people an enemy's reward."

That extract shows what his views were—that all they desired was a change of Government—and when that took place they thought they would be able to settle the matter to suit themselves. What position has the arbitration assumed? We find that Mr. Mowat always contended that the western boundary of Ontario was the Rocky Mountains; that Mr. Mowat went to the Privy Council with Mr. Miller, Attorney-General of Manitoba; that Mr. Miller had made Mr. Mowat accept terms which he, Mr. Mowat, would not accept at the hands of the Dominion Government, terms less reasonable than those offered by the Dominion Government; and that Mr. Mowat, before the Privy Council, took the position that the western boundary of the Province was the Rocky Mountains. I think the documents will show that Mr. Mowat urged for a day and a-half that Ontario's boundary was at the Rocky Mountains, and it was only when the Lord Chancellor said that Mr. Mowat was talking nonsense that he abandoned that claim. I should like to know if the Dominion Government, in view of all the facts, was not justified in refusing to ratify the arbitrators' award, especially when so much doubt prevailed as to where the boundary really was. I think I have shown, by documents which this House cannot controvert, and by quotations I have made from hon. gentlemen themselves, and by their own official paper, that it never was the intention of the Mackenzie Government to ratify the award, unless they were satisfied it was in the best interests of the Dominion. I have shown that to be the case by quotations from statements made by Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Mowat. I have been induced to make these lengthy observations and place on record such extracts from the public documents as I deem necessary, in order that there may be a proper elucidation of the whole question by an intelligent public. I have endeavored to show to the House and the country that the leader of the present Government was justified in the course he pursued in not advising this House to pass on that award and make it valid and binding, in view of the fact that he knew what the contention of the Ontario Government always had been, and his knowledge that the award was illegal and not binding, and that the arbitrators had not done what they were instructed to do, viz., find the true legal boundary. Under those circumstances, I say, the right hon. gentleman was justified in endeavoring to have a proper solution of the question obtained, by having it referred to the Privy Council; and the House will sustain him in that course. Those of us from Ontario who support the leader of the Government have already been told by our constituents that the right hon. leader of the Government could have adopted no other course. That declaration was made to us at the last election. It was one of the issues placed before the people, and they justified the course which the Government pursued. This Parliament can justify itself in the estimation of the public, that the course they pursued was the only one open to it, I do not think this Government requires any justification. The leader of the Government has shown himself to be consistent throughout; while I have shown, by documents, that Mr. Mowat's course has been inconsistent. The leader of the present Government (Sir John A. Macdonald) desired to have the question referred to a proper tribunal; he endeavored to have Ontario placed in a right position, and have her rights fully protected. The whole public career of the right hon. gentleman has been one in the interest of the country, and if he required any further testimony he can point to the opinion of the Marquis of Lorne, who had so ample an opportunity of judging of his great qualifications and his devotion to Canadian interests. A few weeks ago the Marquis of Lorne, who presided at a banquet to the hon. gentleman, concluded a speech in these terms :

"In conclusion, the chairman expressed a hope that for many years Sir John Macdonald would be able to give advice, not only to his own countrymen, but to the mother country also, in all matters relating to their common interests, and that he would long continue to take that part in public life which for forty years he had led, illustrated and adorned."

I think he can have no better justification for his course than that he should have received such a tribute at the hands of a nobleman who knew his worth so thoroughly. And yet, we find he is depreciated by men of the stamp of Mr. Mowat, and others who follow in his wake, and insult the intelligence of this Parliament, men who are Lilliputians compared with the leader of the Government; and when I find them stirring up feelings of animosity and antagonism between one Province and another—coming as I do from the Province of Ontario, and knowing the course this Government have pursued in the past, I have felt, as a representative from that Province, and having its interests at heart, as one who is here as a trustee of the Dominion, that it was my duty to place before this Parliament the true facts of the case.

Mr. DAWSON. I have no intention of making any lengthened remarks on this occasion. I may say that I am glad the hon. gentleman has made this motion, because I am sure it will be very satisfactory to this House, and above all satisfactory to the counsel who appeared for the Province of Manitoba and the Dominion respectively, before the Privy Council; and for this reason, that the reports of the pleadings before that body, as given by the newspapers of both parties at that time, are certainly not such as we could have wished them to be. In fact, it is impossible to conceive that these learned counsel argued the case before the tribunal at which they appeared as they are reported in the newspapers to have argued it. Of the two counsel who appeared for Manitoba, one took one position and another took another position. Mr. McCarthy took the ground that the entire Hudson Bay watershed—at least so he was reported in the papers—was covered by the Hudson Bay Company's territories, but in doing that he ignored the French occupation. He claimed that the French occupation had not existed in fact previous to the advent of the Hudson Bay Company, and if he did that, it is certainly not surprising that one of the Lords of the Privy Council should have said that he was endeavoring to prove a negative. In fact, if the report of his pleadings, as given in the newspapers, be correct, he certainly gave the whole case away at the very outset. He said, in setting out that the line along the Mississippi, according to the Act of 1774, extended northward beyond the source of that river to the territory of the Hudson Bay Company at the very moment that he was claiming that the Hudson Bay territory covered the whole watershed of Hudson's Bay, and the opposite counsel, of course, immediately took him up. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who was there, saw the point, and took hold of it, and said approvingly that the commission to Sir Guy Carleton declared that the western boundary followed the Mississippi River to its source, and then extended northward to the possessions of the Hudson Bay Company. The commission did nothing of the kind; but the Privy Council are very careful to say that they decided the case on the evidence submitted to them. If evidence of that kind was submitted, as it appears to have been, it was incorrect evidence, and that is a very important point as regards the question of the Hudson Bay Co.'s territories occupying the whole water-shed of Hudson's Bay. Mr. Robinson took for his argument the due north line from the confluence of the Ohio and the Mississippi, and I must say that that gentleman showed some little knowledge of the question; but it is a matter in regard to which the most able lawyers, no matter how eminent, can gain but little knowledge by reading it up in a trip across the Atlantic. Mr. Robinson, I repeat, made the most of the due north line, but when he came to speak about commissions to governors, maps, and things of that sort, he was completely at sea. At the close of last Session I made a few remarks on that subject, which I hoped would convey some useful hints about leading points that would keep these gentlemen from going very far astray. I said at the time:

"The high tribunal—the very highest in the Empire—to which the question is to be submitted can, I apprehend, only decide on the case as submitted, and it behoves the Government of the Dominion to see that it is properly submitted. The Government of Ontario has, for the last eight years, had the ablest counsel to be found engaged in getting up a case for their Province. Volume after volume has been produced, until now they have no less than five volumes of arguments and documents upholding their views, together with the most elaborate and carefully prepared maps, in readiness to submit, while the Government of the Dominion, in so far as I know, have nothing of any consequence to meet these documents with, except the report of the select committee of this House, appointed in the Session of 1880 to enquire into all matters connected with the disputed boundaries. That report contains a great deal of valuable information, no doubt, but it is not in a form to render it easily understood, for it was sent to the printers in rather a disconnected shape, at the very close of the Session, when the committee had no opportunity of supervising its publication, and the documents in the appendix—many of them very valuable—are huddled together in rather a disconnected way, without even so much as an index. Moreover, maps are quite as necessary as written documents, to elucidate and explain the different phases of the dispute, and of these there is not so much as one accompanying the report; so that, as matters now stand, Ontario will have a great advantage. In view of all the circumstances, I think it would be well that the reference should be postponed, to allow time to arrange documents and meet Ontario on equal terms."

Now, Sir, there is one very important point in this discussion which has never been brought very prominently forward, and which the counsel whom we sent to England, seem to have lost sight of altogether—that is, the position of the Indian territories. Those Indian territories are declared by two Acts of the Imperial Parliament to be beyond the boundaries of the Provinces, and there was a separate jurisdiction provided for them. It has been claimed by those supporting the Hudson Bay Company's contention at one time, and by those supporting Ontario's contention at another time, that there was a doubt as to the locality of those territories. But the instructions of 1816, to the then Governor General, the proclamation very carefully prepared by the Imperial Government in England, and sent out to this country to be proclaimed by the Governor General, and the subsequent action under that proclamation, in sending commissioners to the territories and in trying cases that arose under that proclamation, leave no doubt as to where these Indian Territories were. They were neither in Upper nor in Lower Canada, but are described as adjoining the Provinces, and they unquestionably came up to the height of land. All those who have studied this question agree that this question of the Indian Territories was the very strongest point in the Dominion case. In the pleadings, as they appeared in the newspapers, those Indian territories were not once alluded to; and therefore I think it is highly necessary for us to have the pleadings, so that we may see whether a matter of so much importance was utterly lost sight of before the Lords of the Privy Council. There is no person who can rejoice more than I at any good fortune that befalls Ontario. I could wish, of course, that the Province in which I live, and in which my lot is cast, should grow and flourish. At the same time, I must say that I believe it is a great misfortune to Ontario that this great territory should have fallen to her, because she has not the means of properly developing it. It is claimed to be 100,000 square miles in extent; it is nearer 130,000 square miles, so far as I can judge from an examination of the maps. If this vast territory were administered by the Dominion Government, and railroads constructed and settlements opened up throughout its extent, it would be worth far more to Ontario than it could possibly be under her jurisdiction. Ontario's limited revenue is absorbed in the various works in which she is engaged, in the administration of justice, in providing for her prisons and asylums, and in opening up the roads required; so that the Province has really no spare revenue to expend on this territory, and for a great many years it will not furnish revenue in itself. It has been the custom to cry down that territory as a region of rock and swamp and general desolation; but let me tell hon. members of this House that that territory possesses a great deal of excellent agricultural land; that it is traversed by rivers navigable for hundreds of miles, and that along the banks of those rivers there is as fertile and as level land as is to be found along the shores of Lake Erie, and with a climate where cereals will grow. To talk of such a country as a desolate wilderness is a great mistake. It is true, there are rocks and mountains in it; but there are rocks and mountains in England, Scotland and Ireland, and it is a country in great part susceptible of settlement, and it will in course of time support a great population. As part of Ontario, it would, when it became peopled, destroy the balance of this Confederation. You would have one Province overshadowing the rest, and I do not think that would be to the advantage either of the Dominion or of Ontario itself. There is no danger of that occurring, however, for many years to come, for so long as the North-West remains to be settled, we cannot of course expect many settlers in that region. But, Sir, I will detain the House for a few moments while I make a few remarks on the decision of the first tribunal in the realm on this question. I am afraid, Sir, that when you come to analyse that decision you will find that it has left the matter worse muddled than it ever was before. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but I will show them presently that it is contradictory in itself, and I believe it cannot be made right without a reference back to the high tribunal from which it emanated. Now, I will just read it over, and you will see whether I am correct or not. It sets out by describing the western boundary of Ontario as extending along the international boundary to the Lake of the Woods, and from the north-west angle of the Lake of the Woods, by a line drawn due north until it strikes the Winnipeg River, or as the case may be, the English River, thence eastward, along the English River, Lonely Lake and Lake St. Joseph, and the river which discharges the waters of Lake St. Joseph, until it meets—what? Why the terrible line which has so long exercised the hon. member for Bothwell, a line drawn due north from the confluence of the Ohio and the Mississippi, which forms the boundary eastward of the Province of Manitoba. The line from the confluence of the Ohio and the Mississippi is there described as the eastern boundary of the Province of Manitoba. In this decision of the Privy Council the line running from Lake Superior by the chain of lakes to the Lake of the Woods, and thence due north to the English River, is described as the western boundary of Ontario; the due north line from the confluence of the Ohio and the Mississippi is described as the eastern boundary of Manitoba—so that the descriptions overlap each other, and this disputed territory, which lies between those two lines, is given, by the decision of the Privy Council, with great impartiality, both to the Dominion and to the Province of Ontario. It may be said it is very easily amended, but there are the words as they occur in the document. Now, why was this due north line from the confluence of the Ohio and the Mississippi brought into the description at all? It was not mentioned in forming the Province of Keewatin; it is not mentioned in the Act describing the boundaries of Manitoba as enlarged, and why is it brought into this? Why is it made a factor in the case at all? But it is there, and it forms the boundary eastward. There is no qualification of the term. The prolongation of the line from the confluence of the Ohio and the Mississippi is, without the slightest qualification, described as the boundary eastward of the Province of Manitoba; and, with equal certainty, the line running due north from the Lake of the Woods and the chain of lakes between that lake and Lake Superior are described as the western boundary of Ontario. The western boundary of Ontario is declared to be at the Lake of the Woods, and the eastern boundary of Manitoba the prolongation of the line drawn due north from the confluence of the Ohio and the Mississippi. The description overlaps, and how are you going to amend it? Of course, it may appear in a different light to some hon. gentlemen, who may try to explain away its meaning. The House will remember a very extraordinary work which appeared while this question was in discussion, some years ago, perhaps the most wonderful work of modern times—the Ontario Book of Documents. I believe the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) had a good deal to do with the production of that work, and in it there are no less than eleven boundary lines suggested for Ontario. This decision of the Privy Council, to judge from its wording, bears the impress of the genius to which that great work is due, and I should say it looks very like as if it had been drafted by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). These two boundaries, given in a decision of the Privy Council, with the other eleven suggested by the hon. member for Bothwell, make thirteen boundaries in all for the Province of Ontario. Perhaps I had better read the description as given by the Privy Council:

“That upon the evidence their Lordships find the true boundary —”

Mark you, they are very careful to say upon the evidence submitted to them—

“between the western part of the Province of Ontario and the south-eastern part of the Province of Manitoba to be so much of a line drawn to the Lake of the Woods, through the waters eastward of that lake and west of Long Lake, which divide British North America from the territory of the United States, and thence through the Lake of the Woods to the most north-western point of that lake as runs northward from the United States boundary—”

That is a little ambiguous; it would seem actually as if it left a portion of the territory which formerly was ours in the possession of the United States, though that is a matter of small consequence as compared with what follows:

“and from the most north-western point of the Lake of the Woods, a line drawn due north until it strikes the middle line of the course of the river discharging the waters of the lake, called Lake Seul, or the Lonely Lake, whether above or below its confluence with the stream flowing from the Lake of the Woods towards Lake Winnipeg, and their Lordships find the true boundary between the same two Provinces to the north of Ontario and to the south of Manitoba, proceeding eastward from the point at which the before-mentioned line strikes the middle line of the course of the river last aforesaid, to be along the middle line of the course of the same river (whether called by the name of the English River or, as to the part below the confluence, by the name of the River Winnipeg), up to Lake Seul or the Lonely Lake, and thence along the middle line of Lake Seul, or the Lonely Lake, to the head of that lake, and thence by a straight line to the nearest point of the middle line of the waters of Lake St. Joseph, and thence along that middle line until it reaches the foot or outlet of that lake, and thence along the middle line of the river by which the waters of Lake St. Joseph discharge themselves, until it reaches a line drawn due north from the confluence of the Rivers Mississippi and Ohio, which forms the boundary eastward of the Province of Manitoba.”

The hon. gentleman—the member for Bothwell—looks exceedingly amused with the view I take, but I can read an extract written by an expert on the matter, a gentleman who has made the study of boundaries the study of his life, Mr. W. McD. Dawson, and I will ask the House to allow me to quote it:

“Here we have the due north line from the confluence of the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers established in the most definite terms as alike—for the two things are coterminous and synonymous—the eastern boundary of Manitoba and the western boundary of Ontario in direct contradiction of the first part of the description, by which we have a due north line from the north-west angle of the Lake of the Woods established in the most definite terms as alike—for the two things are coterminous and synonymous—the western boundary of Ontario and the eastern boundary of Manitoba. The disputed territory lies to the east of due north line from the north-west angle of the Lake of the Woods, which is declared to be the westerly boundary of Ontario, and is therefore given to that Province. The disputed territory lies to the west of the due north line from the confluence of the Mississippi and Ohio, which is still more emphatically declared to be the eastern boundary of Manitoba, and is therefore given to that Province also. The disputed territory—as between these two Provinces—is thus emphatically given to each Province alike.

“If something else than this was intended or meant, as regards the eastern boundary of Manitoba, then how does the due north line from the confluence of the Mississippi and Ohio become a factor in the case at all? It forms no part in the legislation constituting that Province, unless it be, in its entirety, the western boundary of Ontario! Manitoba is bounded on the east by a line ‘beginning at the western boundary of Ontario on the international boundary line dividing Canada from the United States of America,’ that being the description of the starting point of the District of Keewatin as established by the Act 39 Vic., cap. 21, before the enlargement of Manitoba. The description of Keewatin then (and legal definition as regards that part of its boundary which became the divisional line between it and Ontario, being identical with the divisional line between Manitoba and Ontario now) is described as running ‘westerly following upon the said international boundary to the easterly boundary of Manitoba’ (as then constituted before its enlargement.) The description of Keewatin is then continued first northerly and then easterly, until it reaches a point due north of its point of beginning—(that point of beginning being at the western boundary of Ontario, on the international boundary)—a due north and south line from that point then forming its easterly boundary. Thus it will be seen that in constituting the District of Keewatin it was left wholly undecided by the McKenzie Government, in 1876, as to what was the western boundary of Ontario, but whatever it was, it was made by that Act the easterly boundary of Keewatin. If the due north line from the confluence of the Mississippi and Ohio was the westerly boundary of Ontario, then also and not otherwise it became the easterly boundary of the District, Keewatin throughout its entire length, which could at no point terminate to the west nor extend to the east of the line due north from its point of beginning at the westerly boundary of the Province of Ontario on the international boundary line dividing Canada from the United States of America.

“If, in like manner, the point of beginning at the westerly boundary of the Province of Ontario on the international boundary line dividing Canada from the United States of America, is at the north-west angle of the Lake of the Woods, then also the district of Keewatin commenced there and had for its easterly boundary, throughout, a due north line from that point, and could at no point terminate to the west nor extend to the east of that due north line.

“In like manner the Province of Manitoba was ‘increased’ by the Act 44 Vic., chap. 14, so that its easterly boundary throughout its entire length became precisely the same as the foregoing definition of the easterly boundary of the District of Keewatin. The definition of its boundary by the Act, instead of beginning at the south-east angle of the province, ‘at the western boundary of the Province of Ontario, on the international boundary line,’ commences at the south-west angle of the Province (of Manitoba), describes its westerly boundary first, then its northern boundary ‘to its intersection by the easterly limit of the district of Keewatin, as defined by the Act 39 Vic., chap. 21, that is to say to a point where it would be intersected by a line drawn due north from where the westerly boundary of the Province of Ontario intersects the aforesaid international boundary line dividing Canada from the United States of America, thence due south, following upon the said line to the international boundary aforesaid.’

“The description of the boundary of Manitoba, in this respect, merely differs then from that of Keewatin in the fact that its westerly boundary is described first, then its northerly and then its easterly boundary, to its intersection with the international boundary—the only difference as regards its easterly boundary being in the order of description.

"Here, then, we have the eastern boundary of the enlarged Province of Manitoba, throughout its entire length, made to consist of a line due north from where the westerly boundary of Ontario intersects the international boundary line. If that point is where the due north line from the confluence of the Mississippi and Ohio rivers intersects the international boundary, then a continuation of that due north line is, throughout its entire length, the eastern boundary of Manitoba. If, on the contrary, the point where the westerly boundary of Ontario intersects the international boundary line, is to be found at the north-west angle of the Lake of the Woods, then, in like manner, a due north line from that point is, throughout its entire length, the eastern boundary of the Province of Manitoba. If the first of these propositions be true, then the due north line from the confluence of the Mississippi and the Ohio is alike the true western boundary of Ontario, and, as declared by the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and the order of the Queen in Council following thereon, 'forms the boundary eastward of the Province of Manitoba,' and, if so, it cannot be in part, but from one end of the Province north and south to the other, and can at no point terminate to the west nor extend to the east of that line; and if, on the other hand, the latter of these propositions be true, and the north-west angle of the Lake of the Woods is the point at which the westerly boundary of Ontario intersects the international boundary, as also declared by the Lords of the judicial committee of the Privy Council, and the order of the Queen in Council following thereon, then a due north line from that point is the eastern boundary of Manitoba, and, if so, it cannot be in part, but from one end of the Province due north and south to the other, and can at no point terminate to the west nor extend to the east of that line."

Now, I think there can be no doubt, from the reading of the Act, that the prolongation of a due north and south line from the confluence of the Ohio and Mississippi is the boundary eastward of the Province of Manitoba, according to the decision of the highest court in the land, and that a line drawn due north from the north-west angle of the Lake of the Woods is the western boundary of the Province of Ontario. These two things cannot be reconciled. The description overlaps, and the only way it can be remedied is by a reference to the high authority from which it emanated. If this case is to be reopened at all, I suggest that it should be reopened from first to last, that the Imperial Government should be requested to allow the case to be reopened completely, that counsel should be sent over, that it should be thoroughly studied, that maps should be prepared, and that it should be fairly and clearly set before the Lords of the Privy Council. In the late reference one side was most elaborately got up, through years of study and labor, and I admit, with a great deal of talent and ability, and it was laid before the Privy Council, and we sent home two gentlemen, no doubt very eminent, very able and very clever; but how, in a few months, could they become familiar with a historical question of great importance which it has required years for men of great ability to become acquainted with. It took Mr. Mowat, and anyone will give him credit at least for being a man of great talent and ability, a year to become acquainted with the question. I do not desire to detain the House. That is my view—that some steps should be taken to have the whole case reopened and reheard from first to last, and then a decision given upon it would be satisfactory. I should have mentioned that the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is in error, too, in placing a part of Manitoba to the north of Ontario. By the Act enlarging Manitoba, the two Provinces are divided by a line running due north, from some point on the international boundary. Consequently, wherever that point may be, the one cannot lie north or south of the other.

OBSTRUCTIONS IN RIVERS.

Mr. IRVINE moved for:

Copies of all despatches or correspondence between the Government of Canada and that of the United States, or between the Government of Canada and the British Minister at Washington, or of any other documents in possession of the Government, having reference to alleged obstruction of the Maduxnakik River, in Carleton County, New Brunswick,

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There are no papers.

DUTIES ON HAY.

Mr. IRVINE moved for:

Copies of all despatches or correspondence between the Government of Canada and that of the United States, or between the Government of Canada and the British Minister at Washington, or of any other documents in possession of the Government not already brought down, having reference to excessive Customs duties on hay grown in and exported from Canada to the United States, and the refunding of the same."

He said: It is unnecessary for me to recapitulate what I said on this motion a year ago. I have no doubt the Government have done all they can do in the matter. Without reading the correspondence that has been brought down, I may mention the prominent facts upon which this motion is based. The Government of the United States have acknowledged that they have collected unlawfully from Canadians a certain amount of money, which they still retain; that is, they acknowledge that they have exacted from Canadian shippers of hay a duty of 20 per cent. when they had only the right by law to exact 10 per cent., but by a technicality which, among ordinary men, would pass for a quibble, the Government of the United States have so far refused to make restitution. They say there is a provision in their law which requires exporters of hay to enter a protest within thirty days of paying the duties, and that as the Canadian exporters did not do this, they have no right to have the excess refunded. We hold, on the other hand, that it was not incumbent upon our shippers—or, at all events they should not be expected to understand the law of the United States, and that the United States Government and officials misinterpret their own statute to the prejudice of the rights of Canadians. The United States officials passed the hay as a manufactured article, whereas it was decided in the courts that it was not a manufactured article; but, under their pretention that it was a manufactured article, they have been collecting for a number of years 20 per cent. on hay exported by Canadians. But there is a section of their law which gives to the Government discretionary power, when it is shown by the parties interested that it was not within their power to comply altogether with the requirements of their law. The latter part of the communication from Secretary Folger reads as follows:—

"This Department can only act in paying moneys from the Treasury in accordance with some power conferred upon it by law, and the only law which gives such power in a case of this character, where the requirements of section 2931 are not complied with, is found in section 3013 of the revised statutes. This provides that when it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that more moneys have been paid to the Collector of Customs, or other officer acting as such, than the law requires, and the parties have failed to comply with the requirements of section 2931, the Secretary of the Treasury may direct a refund of the money, provided that he is satisfied that the non-compliance with the formal requirements of the law was owing to circumstances beyond the control of the importer, consignee, or agent making such payment."

Now we say it was not our business to interpret the laws of the United States. We say that the United States officials transgressed their own law when they exacted 20 per cent. instead of 10, and that our shippers could not be expected to know that they must put in their claims within ten days, otherwise they would lose their right to restitution. All I ask on behalf of those who have lost their money in this way is that the Government should ask the United States Government what proof they require in order to obtain repayment of the 10 per cent. which the United States officials thus obtained from our exports. They acknowledge they have obtained the money, and we desire to have it refunded. When they tell us what our people should do in order to secure this repayment, we are willing to comply with the demands.

Mr. SCRIVER. When this matter was under discussion last Session, the attention of the Minister of Customs was called to it, and he stated that his Department had been in correspondence with the Department of the Secretary of State at Washington, with respect to the matter, and he very kindly promised then, if I remember rightly, that further correspondence would take place, and that the Government here would lose no opportunity and spare no pains to impress on the Government of the United States the injustice done towards Canadian exporters arising out of the position they have taken. I think my hon. friend who has just spoken is perhaps mistaken in respect to the matter of proof as to this claim. I do not think the United States Government or the Department of the Secretary of State at all disputes the fact that a very large quantity of hay was sent out of the country by Canadian exporters, and a duty of 20 per cent. was paid on it, when the rate of duty, under the decision afterwards rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States, should have been only 10 per cent. The ground on which they refused to refund the duty was, as the hon. gentleman has stated, that no protest was lodged against the payment of the duty at the time the duty was paid. I fancy, further, that the ground taken by the Secretary of State at Washington is, that the impossibility mentioned in the Act quoted by my hon. friend must be a physical impossibility, and ignorance of the law cannot be pleaded as a ground on which relief can be claimed. I observed, not very long ago, that during the Session of Congress just closed, a Bill was introduced in the House of Representatives by some member, providing for the repayment of certain duty under similar circumstances to those which we are now discussing. The matter was fully debated there, and I remember the position taken by those who opposed the passage of the Bill was, that the statute provided clearly that a certain course must be taken by exporters, that they were supposed to know what the law is, that they are bound to know what it is, and if they fail to comply with the requirements of the law, they really had no legal claim, at all events, on the Government, for a refund of the duty. And the Bill was defeated by a considerable majority. But, after all, as my hon. friend has stated, it seems a very unjust position to take under the circumstances. Of course, men doing business with a foreign country, exporting goods to that country, take it for granted that those who are charged with levying the duties on the goods they export understand the law and are not exacting an improper duty; and it would probably not be one case in a thousand in which an exporter would have sufficient doubt to lead him, either directly or through the medium of a professional adviser, to look into the law. And even if he did so, as in this case, differences of opinion would exist. As my hon. friend has said, the Customs Department in the United States first took the position that hay was a manufactured article and exacted a duty of 20 per cent.; and the courts afterwards decided that hay was not a manufactured article in the sense of the law, and that it was, therefore, subject only to 10 per cent. The position taken is a very unfair one towards citizens of a foreign country, and there is a fair opening for our Government to interfere and press on the United States Government the injustice of the position they have taken and urge upon them to be governed by the terms of the statute which my hon. friend has quoted with respect to this matter.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. This matter is about in the condition stated by the hon. member who has submitted the motion. The claimants for repayment by the United States Government of duty overpaid, or rather for duty that has been paid and which was recognised by the courts afterwards as not to have been properly exacted, made representations to this Government so as to place their claims through Her Majesty's Ambassador at Washington before the United States Government. That was done, and the answer, from a copy of which I presume the hon. gentleman was reading, was to this effect: That no money could be paid unless it was paid according to the provisions of the revised statutes of the United States. One clause provides that to be entitled to secure repayment one of two things must be proved: First, that the man who had made the payment had given notice that he would appeal from the decision of the Collector of Customs within a certain time to the Secretary of the Treasury; and second, that in case such notice of appeal had not been given, evidence would be adduced by the claimants to show why such notice of appeal could not be given. A petition setting forth both the facts and the law as understood by those claiming indemnity was sent to this Government and was forwarded by His Excellency the Governor General to Her Majesty's Ambassador to the United States. One of the parties claiming indemnity sent what he thought was the only good evidence as to why he had not complied with the first section quoted of the revised statutes. It was this: The condition of giving notice of appeal from the decision of the collector to the Secretary of the Treasury certainly could not be exacted from the claimant, for this reason: that the appeal from the collector to the Secretary of the Treasury was to the effect of having a decision from the Secretary of the Treasury, an official decision on the point, ruling the action of the different collectors of the Union. In this case the claimant contended, and I think rightly, that from 1868 or 1869 notice was not given and appeals were not taken from the collector, because a decision had been rendered by the Secretary of the Treasury, saying that the duty was regularly and legally collected, and the decision of the collectors in executing their duty was correct. Then, non-compliance with the law could not be pleaded as a bar to their demands, because really the decision of the Government had been rendered in favor of the Collector of Customs. The Canadian claimants, as I stated, say: We did not appeal, we did not give notice, because that decision was rendered, and the only evidence which we can give, according to the revised statutes of the United States, is evidence that we took the law as it was, and we complied with the decision of the United States Government, by one of its most important Departments. We took it to be the ruling of the Government and the law of the country, and we paid regularly, because we were asked to pay, and our appeal would have been of no avail. What further action this Government should take will be obvious to the hon. members of this House. Let the claimants exhaust the legal means in their power, to get from the tribunals in the United States the payment of their claims, if they are right, as I think they are. And if they are baffled in their exertions; if the courts are prevented, by some technical impediments, to admit of their claims, then will be the time to ask should the Canadian Government interfere diplomatically in the matter. I understand that some of them were disposed to take such proceedings, and en passant, I may state that I have read with a good deal of surprise in a newspaper, which it is true has no great importance in this country, that the law partners of mine in an office where my name is only used pro forma, and in whose profits I have no share, but where I am keeping a foothold—for good as Governments may be, they are not immortal and ministers may have to go back to their professions—had bargained with the claimants that I might be the recipient of 10 or 15 or 20 per cent. of one million of money, which the American Government was to give those claimants. I was greatly surprised to hear that such good luck had befallen me. All I know is that my partners have asked for a summary of the proceedings that had been taken, and that it was given to them. Since that time the firm of which I am pro forma a member, has not heard of the million or of any fraction of it. I believe they have engaged counsel to prosecute those claims in the United States. The question is: Are the means of the law exhausted before the American tribunals? When they are, and when they represent to this Government that they have gone to the American tribunals, and that no remedy can be given to them from the ordinary law of the United States then will come the question for this Government to enquire whether it would be necessary to ask the action, through diplomatic representation, of the American Government in that matter. I understand that the amount which is due is large and covers a long period of time. At all events, the Government has not neglected its duty. All the demands that have been forwarded to us have been transmitted to the American Government, and now there remains the question of knowing what the tribunals of the United States will decide, and then the action of the Government might be asked if necessary. I may say that we have no further correspondence than what has been given, a quotation from which was made by the mover of the resolution.

Mr. SPROULE. I may say that I think the action of the hon. member in advocating the claims of these Canadians is highly commendable, and it is desirable, if they are entitled to the money, that they should get it. I think he has succeeded in making out a good case for their being entitled to the money. But it seems to me rather strange and amusing to notice the position taken by the hon. gentleman to-night, while previous to this, on other questions relating to the tariff, he invariably took opposite ground. Heretofore this hon. member told us that it was not the producer who lost the money, or who paid the tariff for the purpose of getting into a better market than he possessed at home, but that the consumer was always the loser. If his arguments in this respect about the Canadian tariff are logical and correct, these men would not lose the money, but the consumers would suffer the loss; and it is certainly pleasant to know that there are some circumstances in which hon. gentlemen opposite will acknowledge the correct principle. What has been said to-night establishes what many on this side of the House have said before, that there are circumstances under which the foreigner does pay the duty to get into a better market than his own, and that the consumer does not always pay it. It is true that there are many circumstances under which the consumer does pay the duty, but it is equally true, there are others under which the producer pays it, and not the consumer.

Mr. IRVINE. As the Secretary of State has said that there is no correspondence, I ask that the motion be withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

PORT MULGRAVE, GUYSBORO' COUNTY, N.S.

Mr. KIRK moved for:

All papers, letters, correspondence and Minutes of Council relative to making Port Mulgrave, in the county of Guysboro', a sub-port of Port Hawkesbury, in the county of Inverness.

He said: I beg to say that although the alteration made with regard to this port may be of small consequence to the Government or the Minister of Customs here, it is of considerable consequence to the people of Guysboro', which I have the honor to represent in this House. By the manner in which the reports were made in the Public Accounts one could see at a glance, in examining the trade returns, the amount of trade done in any county in the Province of Nova Scotia, because each port made its report to the Department through the chief port in the county. Previous to Confederation there were in Guysboro' county about five or six ports each, not a sub-port of the other, but subordinate only to the chief office at Halifax. After Confederation, however, these ports were made sub-ports to one port in the county, and the chief port reported to the Department of Customs. In looking over the trade returns one could not tell what amount of trade was done in any sub-port, but could see at a glance the amount of the whole trade for the county. There was no instance, I believe, in the Province of Nova Scotia, in which a port for one county was made a sub-port for another until last year, when a port of the county of Guysboro' was made a sub-port for the county of Inverness, and it is impossible now to tell the volume of trade in the county of Guysboro' from the trade returns placed in our hands by the Minister of Customs. This the people of Guysboro' consider an injustice to the county. If this practice were carried out, you might wipe out from the trade returns a county altogether, because every port in one county might be subject to one port in the Province—Halifax, for instance; or to carry it out farther, every port in the Province of Nova Scotia might be made subject to a port in another Province, and you would be unable to tell from the trade returns what was the amount of trade in the Province of Nova Scotia, for the port of Montreal, for instance, might be credited with the whole trade. This we consider would be unfair. It is on the same principle that we complain that Port Mulgrave was made a sub-port of the port of Hawkesbury, in Inverness county, thereby depriving us of the privilege of ascertaining what amount of trade was carried on in the county of Guysboro'. I think it is only necessary to refer the matter to the Minister of Customs in order to have it remedied.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I can assure my hon. friend from Guysboro' that I, at least, have no design of depriving Guysboro' of all the credit of the exports of that county, and I can go further and assure the House that the change was made without my knowledge. I will say too, that I quite concur in what the hon. member says, that the comparative statement in the customs report is very misleading, and I object very strongly to these comparative statements being made by Provinces. I think they are calculated to perpetuate sectionalism in the Dominion. Indeed, those comparative statements are so misleading that they cause an actual injustice to several sections and counties of the Dominion. My hon. friend from Guysboro' has reason to complain, but I submit that unless the change was made, notwithstanding that I had nothing to do with it, the counties of Inverness and Cape Breton, as a whole, would be more unfairly treated. A few weeks ago, with a view of ascertaining the trade on the Eastern Extension Railway, from Port Mulgrave to New Glasgow, from the island of Cape Breton, I communicated with the manager of that road, and received from him an approximate statement of the trade from the various counties of the island. He replied on the 7th February, thus:

"I have made careful enquiry in regard to the proportion of freight for the Eastern Extension received from the county of Inverness, as compared with that from the rest of the island of Cape Breton. I find that about one-fourth of our freight from Cape Breton was received from that county, and about one-third of the freight passed over our road for Cape Breton was for the county of Inverness. If the latter county shipped less by other routes, the business she would give the railway would be very extensive. A suitable boat running in connection with our road from ports Hood, Mabou, Margaree and Cheticamp should prove a big feeder. The Rimouski is of little use for other than passenger traffic. I have always advocated a subsidy being granted for the establishment and maintenance of a proper boat. It would be advantageous to the railway as affording a channel for trade, and it would help to develop the resources of the county of Inverness by opening up a readier market."

I was not satisfied with the quantity of freight which he represented as coming from the county of Inverness as compared with that from the other counties of the island, and I intimated to him that the statement should be corrected. He replied, on the 20th of February, as follows:—

"I have your letter of the 13th inst. In reply, I have to say that the approximation I sent you was correct. I am quite aware that Inverness county exports largely. I should say that county exports, exclusive of coal, as much, if not more, than all the other counties in Cape Breton put together; but these exports do not go over our road in that proportion. The greater portion, go either by the Beaver, from Mabou and Port Hood, the M. A. Starr, from Hastings and Hawkesbury, and by the Boston boats, from Hawkesbury. It is true, that pork, butter, etc., come from Whyoccomah via lake boats, but a great deal of this is delivered at Hawkesbury, and goes by the M. A. Starr and Boston boats. In regard to fish, we received, speaking roughly, about 1,885 barrels of all kinds last season from Inverness, 2,395 from Richmond, and 800 from Cape Breton county, two cars frozen salmon from Inverness county, and three cars canned fish from Victoria county. Of course, I can give no more than an approximation, and even that is somewhat difficult with the data I have to work on; but as far as our railroad is concerned, I think you may consider the information reliable."

Now, my hon. friend from Guysboro' must see at a glance one fact, that the port of Mulgrave, which is on one side of the strait of Canso, on the terminus of the Eastern Extension, being made a sub-port of Hawkesbury, would receive credit for the export of 2,395 barrels from Richmond, 1,885 from Inverness, and 1,000 from Cape Breton county—or for all the fish exported over the Eastern Extension Railway to the United States. My hon. friend from Guysboro' knows that the trade returns only show the exports from the Province of Nova Scotia to the outside market. They have no reference to the export of the interprovincial trade, and therefore but for the fact that Port Mulgrave has been a sub-port of Hawkesbury all the exports of Hawkesbury and the exports from the island of Cape Breton over the Intercolonial Railway to the United States would be credited to Guysboro'.

Mr. BOWELL. Is the hon. gentleman reading from the Trade and Navigation Returns?

Mr. CAMERON. No; not at all. This of course would be a greater injustice to the county of Inverness, and the island of Cape Breton generally, than it would be if the port of Mulgrave generally were left a sub-port of Guysboro'. If it were, the export from the island of Cape Breton over the Eastern Extension Railway would be credited to the port of Guysboro', but this only proves after all the fallacy of making relative statements of this kind.

Mr. BOWELL. There is nothing in the Trade and Navigation Returns that gives the exports and imports of Guysboro' and the different parts of Nova Scotia and Cape Breton, or any other part of the Dominion.

Mr. CAMERON. I will come to that soon. The principle that I apply to counties is equally applicable to the Provinces. I find by the Trade Returns that the imports of Halifax amount to $6,933,253. My hon. friend, the Minister of Customs, knows that the imports into Halifax are distributed and consumed in all the counties of the Province of Nova Scotia, if not in other sections of the Dominion and in Prince Edward Island as well. The exports from Halifax amount to $4,886,264, and my hon. friend the Minister of Customs knows that those are not the exports of Halifax county alone, but of the accumulated trade of all the counties of which the city of Halifax is a distributing point. Any one referring to the comparative statement would be led to believe that the exports from Halifax should be credited to the county of Halifax instead of to all the counties in the Province. Last Session I referred to the misleading character of statements of this kind, and I maintain that the amount of dutiable goods consumed in all the counties in the Province, and in all sections of the Dominion, depended altogether upon the producing power of the several counties or sections; and if that rule be applied, I hold that the purchasing power of the island of Cape Breton being as great as the purchasing power of any portion of Nova Scotia, according to population, the imports entered for home consumption, actually distributed through the island, are as great as the imports of other sections of the Province with a similar population. But if you look at the Trade Returns, you will find only a few thousand dollars credited to the island of Cape Breton, and when a person turns up the trade returns he is misled to believe that the island of Cape Breton cannot be of very much importance. It is known that it is isolated by nature from the Province of Nova Scotia; and the inference is, that these comparative statements show exactly the importance of its trade; but instead of doing that, they are altogether misleading. The same remark applies to the Provinces. I have no hesitation in saying that the amount of duty collected in the Province of Nova Scotia should not be charged to the Province; in other words, every person who knows anything about trade knows that a large quantity of the goods imported into Halifax is distributed in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, and other parts of Canada, and therefore the duty collected in the Province of Nova Scotia is not absolutely a tax upon our own people. I, myself, have given this question some attention. I would much prefer to see the exports and imports by Provinces, if you have sections at all; but what I would prefer to see is, that the collections would not be by Provinces at all. I would prefer to see the Custom house officers send in their returns, directly in such a manner that no invidious distinction could be made on turning up the Trade Returns, and it would disabuse the minds of many people very considerably of the idea that they are enormously taxed. Any person looking at the trade returns of Montreal would be misled to believe that the city of Montreal contributed immensely to the Exchequer of the Dominion, but we all know the duty charged and collected in the port of Montreal is on goods distributed over the Dominion. In reference to the imports and exports of Halifax, which show largely on the Trade Returns, I beg to assure my hon. friend, the Minister of Customs, that the purchasing power of the county of Halifax, including the city, is not any greater than the purchasing power of any other county in the Province of Nova Scotia. Looking upon it as an agricultural county, I find it is far below the average of any county in the Province; and as a fishing county it cannot compare with the Atlantic counties of the Province; and, these being facts, it is manifestly unfair, on the face of the Trade Returns, that they should make it appear that the city of Halifax contributes so largely to the revenue. When we ask for collectors or any other officials for the purpose of securing additional protection to the revenue, we are referred at once to the Trade Returns, and we are convinced, if we are at all easily convinced, that our ports are of so little importance, and so little duty is collected in them, that no preventive officers are required. I think this is a mistake.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no possible objection to bringing down the papers moved for by the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Kirk), but it would be somewhat difficult to understand how those papers can furnish him with the information he is evidently desirous of obtaining; and it is also difficult to understand how he can argue that the fact of a sub-port of Guysboro' being placed under the port of Hawkesbury would interfere with the trade returns of his own county to which he refers. Hawkesbury is a mile or two distant from the sub-port which was removed from the port of Guysboro', which was some 20 or 30 miles distant. It was purely and simply—not only for the accommodation of the port, but for the interest of the service itself—so that communication could be kept up more frequently and rapidly with the collector than it possibly could be if he had to report to Guysboro'. It was purely a departmental matter. The hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) is quite correct when he says he knew nothing of the transfer, nor am I aware that it was necessary, in conducting the Department over which I preside, to consult the representative of any county particularly in a matter so trivial as this. The hon. member for Guysboro' must know that there are no figures in the Trade and Navigation Returns of this country which would give him the information he seeks. He says that if sub-ports are to be taken from one county and connected for statistical purposes, with another county, the return of the exports and imports which legitimately and properly belongs to the other county, cannot be obtained. It matters very little whether it remains with one county or the other; the information could not be obtained except by applying to the port itself for special returns. They are not made to the Department at Ottawa, and the only difference really is that the sub-collector at the port of Mulgrave reports to the port of Hawkesbury instead of to the port at Guysboro'; but, if he will look at the Trade and Navigation returns, which are very full, he will find that the amount collected at each sub-port can be obtained.

Mr. KIRK. Not in the Trade Returns.

Mr. BOWELL. Certainly, in the Trade Returns. He has not given any attention to them, or he would not have made that statement. If he will look at page 18, he will find, under the head of Nova Scotia, the collections made at Guysboro', and the collections made at each of the sub-ports. He will find that the collections at sub-port Mulgrave, up to the time of its transference to the other port, that is up to the 5th July, 1883, amounted to the sum of $50; and for the balance of the year he will find, if he turns to Hawkesbury, that the sum collected was $956.94. If he adds the two together, and adds that to Guysboro', he will have very little difficulty in ascertaining how much was collected in the county he represents. The hon. gentleman says his county is the only one that has been interfered with in this way. He is wrong. Sub-ports in Kent have been attached to ports in Westmoreland for precisely the same reason that I have given for the removal of this sub-port from Guysboro' to Hawkesbury. The hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) has raised an altogether new question, and I am very glad that he has brought that question before the House. It is one I should like to hear discussed and to have the opinions of the different members upon it. He will have observed, upon reference to these Trade and Navigation Returns, that some of the provincial returns, which were formerly given and which were just as misleading, if not more so, as the points to which he calls the attention of the House, have been left out. And, in the present return, I have left out two or three tables which were altogether misleading, from the fact that the importations into one Province, which were credited to that particular Province, divided by the population, would lead you to suppose that that Province paid per capita double the amount it really consumes of the articles imported into the Province. So I have given the table from a Dominion standpoint exclusively, and it is a grave question whether the suggestions thrown out by my hon. friend from Inverness should not be adopted and carried out more fully in future returns. It is quite true that, on reference to these returns, he will find, say, the port of Montreal, will show that that port alone paid to the Dominion Treasury from $7,000,000 to $8,000,000 annually. No one supposes, who knows anything of the trade and commerce of this country, that all these goods are consumed at that port. Those who have paid any attention to the subject know that a large proportion of the goods entered at Montreal are taken to the lower Provinces and sold in the markets there; and it is also the case with goods that are entered at the port of Toronto. Toronto pays into the Dominion Treasury some $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 annually, but no one supposes that Toronto consumes all those goods. The large wholesale dealers in that city send their goods all over the Dominion, and it is just so in reference to other articles which are imported into the country. I agree with my hon. friend that it would be better if these returns showed only the amounts imported into the Dominion. That is the policy pursued in the Trade and Navigation Returns of the United States, with this exception, that they have large areas and they credit each district and not each State. If that were adopted we could give a book quite as large as the present, with a classification quadruple that which we now present to the House and the country, which would enable the trade of the country to form a correct idea of the quantities of the larger number of the goods that are imported as well as the countries to which the variety of exports we have in this country are sent. I am very much obliged to the hon. gentleman for bringing this question before the House, and I hope the members will consider it well and that before Parliament rises there will be a fuller expression of opinion upon this point. If it be the opinion of the House that a change should be made, I promise that, commencing with the next fiscal year, to give them a much more interesting report in a volume no larger than the one we have at present. If the system was continued that was carried out when the present Government came into power, in preparing these Trade and Navigation Returns, we should have had two volumes to-day of this size, instead of one, and they would not be so compact nor so easy to understand.

Mr. VAIL. If I understand him aright, the hon. member for Guysboro' complains that one of the sub-ports of his county has been transferred to the county of Inverness; and I think he has just cause of complaint, inasmuch as the returns from the several counties convey a wrong impression of the amount of duties paid in those counties. If the hon. Minister of Customs will look at the returns in the Public Accounts, he will find that Guysboro' is credited with $2,878 as collected, and also the cost of collection, while Port Hawkesbury returns $7,500 which, I say, conveys a wrong impression, because a certain portion of this $7,500 is collected in the county of Guysboro'; and according to the Public Accounts it would appear that Hawkesbury collects a very much larger amount than the whole county of Guysboro'. I think it is only fair that Guysboro' should have the credit of the whole amount of duties that are collected within the county.

Mr. KIRK. I agree with the Minister of Customs when he says that it is impossible to tell the amount of trade in each Province by the Trade and Navigation Returns. The hon. gentleman knows that frequently in this House long arguments are based upon the fact that certain Provinces have a right to only a certain amount of money because they only do a certain amount of trade. Last Session I heard an hon. gentleman in this House make an unjust comparison between Nova Scotia and other Provinces, on the basis of the return made by these Trade and Navigation Returns. I am aware that the hon. Minister of Customs knows the working of the system too well to base an argument upon any such returns. I said I believed that this was the only exception in the Province of Nova Scotia; as to the case referred to in New Brunswick, I know nothing, because I know nothing of the system pursued in the other Provinces. I do not blame the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) for suggesting or recommending a change. I know he is a fair-minded man, and would not recommend anything unjust to another county if he knew it, but I think he is entirely wrong when he says that the exports last year from the county of Inverness, had this change not been made, would have shown the exports of Port Mulgrave to be much larger than they should be, because Port Mulgrave would get the credit of exports from Inverness county. I do not think it would be so. Although I have not the returns before me, I do not think they show the amount of trade, so far as Guysboro' is concerned, from Port Mulgrave. The credit is all given to Port Hawkesbury for the last year. I do not know what the exports of Port Mulgrave are, but I find in the previous year that Guysboro' reported $179,957 worth, whilst Hawkesbury, in Inverness county, only exported $113,445. In 1884 Guysboro' only exported $196,689, whilst Hawkesbury exported $236,868, showing that Hawkesbury has been largely credited with exports from the county of Guysboro'. The increase was so great that a correspondent from Inverness county wrote a letter to the Halifax Herald, giving credit to the National Policy for this large increase, and the Halifax Herald based an editorial on the assumption that the National Policy was doing great things for the Province of Nova Scotia, inasmuch as the port of Hawkesbury had exported last year so much more than the year before, whereas the fact was that a portion of the exports had gone from the county of Guysboro' to swell the exports from Inverness, and the National Policy had nothing to do with it. I cannot see, Mr. Speaker, what reason the hon. Minister had for making the change. He has not given any reason for it; he has not stated to the House that it was inconvenient in any way to conduct the business as it was conducted before. There is a daily mail between Guysboro' and Port Mulgrave, and there was no difficulty in getting the returns back and forth between these ports. I am under the impression that the collector at Guysboro' is quite as sharp in looking after his sub-collectors as the collector at Port Hawkesbury, and I think the business would be quite as well done under his supervision as under the supervision of the collector at Hawkesbury. When an application was made to the Government for an amount of money to erect buildings for a Custom house and post office, the first thing the Minister did was to look at the returns and see the amount of business done at these ports. He deprived the county of Guysboro' of the credit of doing the business that is really done there, and therefore he deprived that port of the chance of having a building erected to accommodate the Customs and post office business there. In this way I think that by making Port Mulgrave a sub-port to the port of Hawkesbury he has done an injury to the county of Guysboro', an injury of which the people of Guysboro' complain.

PRAYERS.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT.

Mr. JAMIESON for Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 92) further to amend the Canada Temperance Act, 1878.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to explain the object of the Bill.

Mr. JAMIESON. This Bill comprises seven clauses. It has been prepared by the legislative committee of the Mr. KIRK.

Dominion Alliance for the suppression of the liquor traffic. It embodies several amendments which are deemed necessary to the effective working of the Canada Temperance Act of 1878. I do not think it necessary for me to go into a minute explanation of the several clauses. I will say, however, that the first clause proposes to amend section 96 of the Canada Temperance Act by providing that the publication in the Official Gazette of the Order in Council by which the Canada Temperance Act is put in force in any county or city shall be notice to all persons—magistrates and others—enforcing the law; in other words, that it shall not be necessary, as at present, to produce a copy of the Official Gazette in every prosecution instituted under the Canada Temperance Act. It must be obvious that in a very short time now, the Act is likely to be in force in a large number of counties, and there will be a large number of prosecutions under it, and to require the production in every case, of a copy of the Official Gazette, would be an impossibility, and in many cases there would be a failure of justice, in consequence of the absence of the provision embodied in the 1st clause of this Bill. The 2nd section of the Bill proposes to amend section 99 of the Act. At present, under the Act, liquors cannot be sold or prescribed by a medical man in less quantities than a pint, and we propose to leave the quantity in the discretion of the medical man, whose certificate is made necessary under the Act. In addition to that, we propose to insert an amendment imposing a penalty on a medical man who gives a certificate colorably under the law. Although there are not many medical men now who will be guilty of such an offence, still, there have been cases where men have been so dead to principle as to give certificates colorably, to give them for a fee when they were not necessary for medicinal purposes. Section 4 proposes to amend section 107 of the Canada Temperance Act. That section provides that prosecutions shall be conducted under and in accordance with the Act respecting the duties of justices of the peace out of sessions. It has been found that that does not go far enough. We propose to amend it so as to provide for proceedings for the enforcement of the penalty. Section 5 proposes to amend a clerical error in the law, which will be apparent to anyone who carefully reads it. Section 6 proposes to amend section 105 of the Liquor License Act of 1883. This section is introduced for the purpose of obviating the difficulty which has arisen in consequence of a late decision of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick. I have no doubt that it is within the knowledge of almost every member of this House that a difficulty has arisen there. It seems that the court in New Brunswick has held that the enforcing clauses of the Canada Temperance Act have been repealed by the Liquor License Act of 1883, though that was certainly not the intention of Parliament at the time, and the object of this section is to provide that these clauses shall not be repealed as the effect of that decision. It is quite obvious that the intention of Parliament at the time was that this provision was to be auxiliary to the provisions of the Canada Temperance Act. However, unfortunately, it has been held that it repealed some of the provisions of that law. The Bill provides a set of forms for justices of the peace and others, which the promoters of the Bill deem necessary, inasmuch as the ordinary run of magistrates are not men skilled in the law, and require something of that kind for their guidance. These are the whole provisions of the Bill, and we trust we shall have the assent of the House to this measure, and that it will become law before the House rises, because we believe it to be absolutely necessary to the efficient working of a law, which is now very popular with the people of this Dominion and which this Parliament has given to the people, and we further believe it to be the duty of this Parliament to provide sufficient machinery to carry out the views of the people as embodied in that Act.

Mr. BLAKE. I have not had an opportunity of seeing the measure, but I have heard the explanation of the hon. gentleman, and, if I rightly understand it, it is a measure which is designed to remedy some defects which have occurred in the working of the Temperance Act, and which have been partly produced by a diversity of judicial decision in different Provinces, and partly by the operation of the License Act of 1883 as construed by some judicial authorities. I understand that some time ago, the organisation of which the hon. gentleman has spoken, presented this measure for the consideration of the Government of the day, with a request that they would themselves take the responsibility of proposing the legislation. That took place somewhere about a fortnight ago, and a considerable delay has taken place in consequence of the period of time which the Government required before announcing their decision. It seems to me, in view of the late period of the Session at which we have now arrived, and the block in public business which is likely soon to take place, that every effort should be made to expedite the printing of this Bill, and that the Government should give every opportunity for its consideration. I do not pledge myself at all to these views because I have not had an opportunity of considering the clause, but I think, under the circumstances, that it should be understood that this Bill is not to be crowded out, that, whether innocent or guilty, it is not to be slaughtered. It should have a fair opportunity of being reached and disposed of by the House.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition need not be so anxious about this Bill, as no one has any desire to strangle it. As to the printing, that is in the hands of the House, and the necessary orders will be given concerning it. I did not fully understand the explanations given by the mover of the Bill, but I got an impression from what he said that not only does his Bill propose to amend the Canada Temperance Act of 1878, but it also amends the License Act of 1883.

Mr. BLAKE. So he says.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If that be the case its title will have to be changed so that it shall be stated that it affects both laws. I am not in a position to say now what the Government will do about it, but we will consider it as soon as possible.

Mr. IVES. There are two or three other Bills upon the same subject which have already been introduced for a number of days, Bills in which many members of the House feel a considerable interest, and in which a large number of people in the country feel a considerable interest. If there is to be any special effort on the part of the leader of the Opposition with the Government to obtain a favorable consideration for this particular Bill, I think the Government should be urged to facilitate the printing of these other measures that have been introduced for more than a month.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not ask the hon. gentleman to give a favorable consideration to this Bill. I understood the Government decided not to give it a favorable consideration—at any rate decided they would not take the responsibility. What I asked was that inasmuch as the printing of the Bill had been delayed the Government should see that the House had an opportunity of considering it for itself.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

COURT OF CLAIMS FOR CANADA.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 93) to establish a Court of Claims for Canada. He said: The object of this measure is to replace the Dominion Board of Arbitrators that has been in existence for a number of years, by a Court of Claims for the Dominion. I will, on this occasion, give only a synopsis of the Bill. The court will be a court of common law and equity, and shall be called the Court of Claims. It will consist of one judge to be appointed by Her Majesty by letters patent under the Great Seal of Canada. He shall hold office during good behavior, but may be removed by an Address of both Houses. He shall be assisted by three assessors to advise him on questions of fact, and such assessors shall hold office during pleasure. There shall be a clerk of the court who will be appointed by the Governor in Council. Neither the judge nor the assessors shall hold any other office under the Government of Canada, or under the Government of any Province. The judge must have been either a judge of the Superior or County Court in one of the Provinces, or a barrister or advocate of at least one year's standing, and shall take an oath to be administered by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. The judge and assessors shall have both a salary and retiring allowances. Then there is the ordinary clause about the superannuation of the judge, the same as in the case of the other judges. Then as to the jurisdiction of the court, there are seven different items giving the nature of the claims:

"(B) Every claim for alleged or indirect or consequential damage to property arising from or connected with the construction, repair or maintenance of any public work undertaken or performed at the expense of the Government of Canada, or which is now vested in the Government of Canada;

"(C) Every claim arising out of or connected with the performance of any contract entered into with any Minister on behalf of Her Majesty, whether in the name of Her Majesty or otherwise, and every claim arising out of deductions made by any Minister for the non-performance of any such contract;

"(D) Every claim for direct or consequential damage to property, arising out of anything done by the Government of Canada, or arising out of any death or injury to the person or to the property on any public work under the control and management of the Government of Canada;

"(E) Every claim founded upon any statute of Canada or by any regulation made by the Governor in Council;

"(F) Every claim which is referred to it by the head of any Department in pursuance of any statute of Canada;

"(G) Every claim which is referred to it by the order of the Governor in Council;

"(H) Every set-off, counter-claim, claim for damages, whether liquidated or unliquidated, or other demand whatsoever, on the part of Her Majesty against any person making claim against Her Majesty in the court."

As to the procedure in respect to claims, I do not suppose the House wishes me to give all the details. At all events, a claimant who wishes to enter a suit has twelve months to do it in. Then the Government may make a tender—

"Any claim arising out of or connected with the performance, or on account of deductions made for the non-performance of any contract entered into with the head of any Department unless such notice is filed with the Secretary of State within three months of the date of the final estimate made under such contract, if the said contract provides for such final estimate, and if it does not, then within twelve months after the breach of contract complained of."

"Any other claim which might otherwise be transmitted or referred to the court, unless such notice is filed with the Secretary of State within twelve months after the claim first accrues."

There will be an additional clause, which is not yet printed, providing that the Government may do as they do now, that is take the opinion of one of the assessors about the claim, and thus avoid a lawsuit if possible—

"No claim shall be transmitted to or entertained by the court for or in respect to which the claimant has pending in any other court any suit or process against any person who, at the time when the cause of action alleged in such suit or process arose, was, in respect thereto, acting, or professing to act under the authority of Her Majesty."

"Nothing in this Act contained shall make it imperative for any head of a Department to transmit any claim to the court, or shall prevent Her Majesty from at any time resisting any claim, by the exercise of the rights, privileges or prerogatives of Her Majesty."

There will be a clause by which the court may sit anywhere where the Governor in Council may direct them to go; for instance, the Governor may send the judge to Toronto, Hamilton, or Montreal, if they see fit, in order to save the expense—

"The hearing and trial of any claim shall be by and before the judge of the court sitting with at least two of the assessors, and such judge shall decide the case, and his decision shall be the judgment of the court herein."

"If it appears to the court, in any case, that the facts set forth in the claimant's notice do not furnish any ground for relief, it shall not be necessary to take evidence in the matter."

Then with regard to references :

"The court may, for the purpose of taking accounts and making enquiries, refer any claim, or matter connected with a claim, to the assessors or any two of them."

Then rules for adjudicating upon claims :

"The court shall consider the advantage, as well as disadvantage, of taking all the testimony, copies of judgments, documents, etc."

With regard to the travelling expenses of these officers, we intend taking the same clause as in the Civil Service Act. There is a clause providing as follows :—

"When a claim has been referred to the court for examination and report, the court shall have all the powers in reference thereto which it has in case of a claim transmitted to it for trial and adjudication, but the judge in such case shall report to the head of the Department his finding on the questions of fact and upon the amount of damages, if any sustains, and the principle upon which such amount has been computed."

Then there may be a new trial—

"When judgment is rendered against any claimant the court may grant a new trial for any reason which, by the rules of common law, in suits between individuals, would furnish sufficient ground for granting a new trial."

The decision of the court shall not be final. The idea is to give an appeal to the Supreme Court. It provides that :

"The costs incident to the appeal in the Supreme Court of Canada, whether for or against the claimant, or for or against Her Majesty, shall be in the order and discretion of that court and shall be taxed and allowed by its proper officer."

Then there are provisions for enforcing judgments and orders. Then there are provisions respecting process of court, sheriff and other officers, barristers and attorneys of court, report to Minister of Justice, rules of court. The rules of court are to be made by the court with the approval of the Governor in Council :

"The Governor in Council may, from time to time, make regulations respecting court rooms for the use of the court, the travelling and other expenses of the judge and the assessors, in connection with his and their duties, the remuneration of sheriffs and other officers of the court, the reporting of the decisions of the court, the disposal of moneys received for fees by the clerk of the court or for costs allowed to Her Majesty against any claimant, and the mode of payment of any judgment or costs against Her Majesty."

There are repealing clauses respecting such Acts as must necessarily be repealed. We shall take care that matters now pending before the court will not be affected by this Bill. I have given only a general idea of the measure; there are a number of other clauses, and those I will explain more fully afterwards.

Mr. CASGRAIN. (Translation.) Will this Bill abolish the Exchequer Court?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) It does not apply to the Exchequer Court. It merely concerns the four arbitrators which were appointed a long while ago, in 1867, and who were in existence under the law of the old Province of Canada. As soon as this Bill becomes law these arbitrators will cease to exist.

Mr. CASGRAIN. (Translation.) If my memory serves me aright, under the Act of Confederation—and I call the attention of the hon. Minister to this point—the constitution of the various courts in the country is left, as far as I can remember, to the Local Governments. I believe it is under a special clause of the Act of Confederation that we have established the Supreme Court; and I think that by referring to this Act it will be seen that we have no power to create new courts. I simply wish to call the attention of the hon. Minister on this point, especially on the first reading of the Bill, because I think it is a serious question.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) The hon. member is mistaken on that point. If he will once again refer to the Act of Confederation—I cannot, for the moment, quote the clause—he will find that the Dominion Parliament can decline to go before the provincial courts and create courts for the carrying out of their own laws and for all cases which may affect them.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman has given us a synopsis of the contents of the proposed measure, but he has wholly failed to give us any reason for the proposed legislation. He has not pointed out to us what those circumstances are which have induced the Government to believe that the existing arrangements are such as to require the establishment of a new court, and the creation of this somewhat expensive machinery. I well remember when discussions took place in this House with respect to the Supreme and Exchequer Courts, and particularly with respect to the appeal to be given to the Exchequer Court in some cases from the decision of the Dominion arbitrators, that very great pressure was put on the Administration of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) by the hon. gentlemen who were then on this side of the House to abolish the Dominion arbitrators altogether, and to vest in the Exchequer Court jurisdiction which had theretofore existed in the Dominion arbitrators. At that time the Supreme Court had been but just established, and its working had not yet been indicated by practical experience, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) and those who were associated with him, without at all declaring that the suggestion of hon. gentlemen then on this side was unsound, still they were not prepared at that time to take the responsibility of dealing with the question in that way, and they held that it required consideration and determination. A very strong opposition was made to the continuance of a special court for the purpose of dealing with these cases. Well, many years have since elapsed, and no proposal in the sense of that which I mention, as made by those hon. gentlemen when in Opposition, has been proposed since they resumed power; but now without any cause assigned, without any reason of any description given, a proposal is made, not to abolish the provincial arbitrators with a view to vest in the Exchequer Court the jurisdiction which it may be thought proper to vest in some judicial tribunal with respect to Government claims, but to abolish the Court of Dominion Arbitrators with a view to the creation of a new court. It seems to me this is not the time for the creation of a new court, it is not the time for the creation of new offices; and I think it would be much more satisfactory if the jurisdiction proposed to be vested in those officers should be vested in the Court of Exchequer, with such modifications as the powers and functions of that court in dealing with this class of cases may require. You find that the proposal is to have a judge and three assessors. There are at present four Dominion arbitrators, of whom, however, not all sit in all cases. You have for all practical purposes at least the expense of the old Dominion arbitrators plus the salary of the judge. As to the amount of salary we are not yet informed, and I do not wish to press the hon. gentleman beforehand for a revelation of these sacred mysteries. I suppose the information will be given in committee; but whatever it may be, the expense will be what I have stated and perhaps a good deal more. Without entering into any further discussion at this time I wish to say that this measure does not at first sight, without any explanation from the Minister as to the reason of the change, and the reason for the departure from the views expressed on a former occasion, commend itself favorably to my mind, that the Government should set about creating a court with a newly appointed judge to discharge functions, which, so far as I can judge, can be thoroughly and effectually discharged by existing tribunals without increasing expense.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I did not intend, and I do not intend now, to enter into the reasons of the proposed measure, and to debate the matter with the leader of the Opposition. That I shall be prepared to do on the motion for second reading, after the Bill has been printed and distributed. I trust the hon. gentleman when he hears the explanations will be prepared to admit that the proposal of the Government is a sound one, a reasonable one, and is in the interests of the Dominion.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DUNDAS AND WATERLOO ROAD.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to give effect by legislation to an agreement made by the Department of Public Works with Dr. Allen Holford Walker, for the sale and transfer to him of the Dundas and Waterloo Road, and for that purpose to authorise such sale and transfer to him by Order in Council to be published in the Canada Gazette as in the cases provided for in the Public Works Act.

He said: This was a public work belonging to the Dominion, and it was thought that it was in the interests of the public that we should dispose of it by sale, and under these circumstances I was authorised by Order in Council to do so. Public advertisements were published freely announcing that this road would be offered at public competition at a certain time and place. We fixed an upset price which was, I think, something like $:5,000, though I cannot state the exact amount, and it realised over $21,000. The sale was effected, but when we came to give the deed, the Department of Justice, to which the matter was referred, having looked closely into it, thought that we would require authority from Parliament, and therefore I now come to Parliament on behalf of the Government to ask the legalisation of the sale. I think it will be in order for the House to proceed immediately into Committee of the Whole, as the resolution does not involve a burden on the public, but rather the contrary—an accession to the public funds.

Mr. BLAKE. I am not prepared to say how the resolution stands on the point of order. I am sure that if it was a complete cession or grant of the public domain which was proposed the principle would apply. I cannot now say whether it applies or not to sales, but I am rather inclined to think with the hon. gentleman. At the same time I would request him not to go into committee until a future day, but on another ground. It seems to me that our going into committee would be the merest formality unless the hon. gentleman has placed before us the papers necessary in order to enable us to form some judgment about the matter. I, therefore, ask him to defer going into committee, and that in the meantime he should lay the papers before us, including the opinion of the Department of Justice, and any other papers which will aid us in coming to a judgment.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Of course, Mr. Speaker, if you decide that I cannot proceed to go into committee to-day, or if you say there is any doubt about it, I would not wish to imperil the measure by having to begin again, and so I would move simply to go into committee at a future day. However, it seems to me as there is no charge on the people, but, on the contrary, it is bringing money to the public coffers, that the rule should not apply; but if there is any doubt about it, and as the point is an important one, I will not press going into committee to-day.

Mr. MILLS. I think we should have before us some means of forming a judgment before proceeding to committee. It is true the hon. gentleman proposes to put money into the treasury, but we do not know whether he is getting back what was originally paid for the road or not, and I think it is only reasonable that we should have such information as would enable us to do something more than merely to register the wishes of the Government for the time being.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If we had gone into committee, it was my intention at a subsequent stage to supply any information that might be asked for.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have not been able to give the point of order full consideration, but I think the object of the rule is that full time should be given for the consideration of all Bills, motions, or resolutions which may result in a charge on the treasury, or upon any department of the public domain or property. That it seems to me is the reason for the ordinary rule of the House, that it shall not presently go into committee, and under those circumstances I think it would be more advisable not to proceed to committee forthwith, but simply to take the motion to go into committee at a future day.

Motion, amended as suggested, agreed to.

COLONIAL AND INDIAN EXHIBITION OF 1886.

Mr. POPE moved that the House, to-morrow, resolve itself into committee to consider the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the proposed Colonial and Indian Exhibition, to be held in London in the year 1886, under the presidency of H. R. H. the Prince of Wales, will bring prominently under notice the development and progress which have been made in various parts of the British Empire, in products, manufactures and resources, and will afford a widespread opportunity of acquiring a more intimate knowledge of the vast fields for enterprise which exist throughout the British Dominions.

2. Resolved, That it is expedient that Canada should take such part in the said exhibition, as becomes her position amongst the Colonies of the Empire.

3. Resolved, That His Excellency the Governor General in Council be authorised to guarantee, on the part of Canada, against any loss resulting from the exhibition to the extent of £10,000 sterling, being one-fifth of the whole sum which it is proposed to be guaranteed by the Government of India, the Dominion of Canada and the Colonies represented by agents general in England, the money so guaranteed to be held to meet any sum in which the intended exhibition may fall short of being self-supporting.

Mr. BLAKE. I trust that the hon. gentleman, before he asks us to go into committee, will lay on the Table such papers as are necessary to enable the House to consider this matter. We have no information except what appears in the resolutions.

Mr. POPE. I will bring down the papers.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ON THURSDAY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That for the remainder of the Session Government business shall have precedence on Thursday after routine business.

Mr. BLAKE. Having regard to the condition of the Order paper, I hope the hon. gentleman will alter that motion by saying after this week. If he looks at the Order paper he will see that there are several pages of matter in the hands of private members, and it will be utterly impossible to make substantial progress with them unless we are allowed one other day at any rate.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think if we postponed the resolution for another week the list would be quite as long; there is no means of stopping it. We have been in Session more than a month, and the motions in the hands of members not connected with the Government have had a fair opportunity of being presented and discussed, and papers have been called for over and over again. I think it is in the interest of the public that we should adopt this resolution, and give the Government another day.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I have been a member during several Parliaments, and I can speak from experience. Now, my experience is that for the first three or four weeks of the Session we are here, I will not say doing nothing, but not doing the business which the Government is obliged to bring before the House. We have not yet seen several of the measures which the Government promised in the Speech from the Throne. I have already had occasion to refer to this matter. At the end of the Session we always run through the business with such undue haste that we are ashamed of it; for my part, I am. It is very difficult to bring the Conservative members, and especially the leader of the Government, to adopt any kind of reform. He will adopt the reform when it is forced upon him, but he will not introduce one. Now, I am going to propose a little reform to-day. Suppose, instead of spending three or four weeks at the beginning of the Session, debating more or less interesting questions, we had the Speech from the Throne sent a little time before the beginning of the Session, as with the President's Message, so that it would be on the Table and we could discuss it when we met. At present we meet on Thursday, and spend that week without doing anything but going through all the schoolboy performance of hearing the Speech in the Senate. I think in this 19th century, when things are moving rapidly, we might adopt a more expeditious system. During the four or five Parliaments during which I have had the honor of a seat in this House, we have seen a very great loss of time and money to the country, and a loss of time to ourselves as well, because, if we could get through the business a fortnight or three weeks earlier than we do, it would benefit all the individual members of the House. I congratulate the leader of the Government that we have had a little reform at any rate. We have our Sessions earlier than usual, but we might have a regular time of the year appointed for Parliament to meet, and the time that would suit the country best would be the first week after the 6th of January. All the work of the Session might then be done and finished by the opening of navigation, when trade and business begins anew. There is another point to which I desire to call the attention of the House, referring to private Bills. All these private Bills that come before the House ought to be read and examined and passed upon by the Minister of Justice, so that we might have his opinion upon them, and avoid imposing upon the committees the task of saying whether these Bills are ultra vires or not. And why should not banks, railway companies and other corporations be chartered under one general law? Why make a rule for one and exception for another? Some companies are, in fact, chartered under a statute law now. I congratulate my hon. friend on the good motive he has in taking another day. It indicates that we are going to make some progress with the Government business, because up to this time he has not given us much work. The Franchise Bill is a very important one, and some other Bills were promised also. I hope we will be able to help him in the matter, though perhaps not to a very great extent, and perhaps give him a little opposition also.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I trust the hon. gentleman, the First Minister, will not press this motion, the effect of which will be that one-fourth the public orders and one-tenth of the Notices of Motion cannot be possibly disposed of this Session. There are 37 public Bills and 85 notices of motion on the orders, and with one and a-half day for the notices of motion and half a day for the Public Bills and Orders it will be utterly impossible to dispose of a-tenth of the business on the Order paper. We lost last Wednesday and the previous Wednesday, not through the fault of private members, and the hon. gentleman ought to give us next Thursday to make up the loss. As far as I am concerned I have no objection that the Thursdays after this week should be taken by the Government, but I think we should be allowed next Thursday.

Mr. CASGRAIN.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I hope the right hon. gentleman, the First Minister, will press the motion. When do hon. gentlemen opposite expect to get through? On Thursday we will have as many, if not more, motions on the paper than we have now. I do not believe there is a Parliament in the world in which there are so many motions made for returns as here. As far as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron) is concerned, he certainly has had his share of the time of the House, and his friends also have had their share up to the present.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I have not taken as much time as you.

Mr. MILLS. The Government have not occupied the days allowed them during the month and more this House has been in Session. There is no reason why the Government should not be ready with all the legislation they promised in the Speech from the Throne, nor is there any reason why they should not have used the days at their disposal from the beginning of the Session. The Finance Minister has produced his Budget, but if we look back at the parliamentary practice, in which our parliamentary legislation originated, you will see that it was the business of the Government to propose to the House those legislative measures upon which the action of Parliament was sought before the Budget was brought down at all. What does the hon. gentleman propose by this Budget? He proposes to ask from the people a subsidy for the Crown. Upon what condition does he ask it? On the condition that the Crown will redress those wrongs and grievances the people are supposed to have. The Government, as a responsible administration, stand in the position of the ancient council who demanded the correction of abuses and the settlement of grievances. In the Speech from the Throne the policy the Government proposed for the Session is an enunciation of what they considered to be defects of the law they propose to remedy, but before they ask for the supply they should submit to the House the measures they intend to carry through. Up to the present, this has not been done by the Government, their measures are not before the House, and yet the hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald), though he has not produced those measures, proposes that we should go on with the consideration of the question of Supply. We have on the paper a large number of questions, a large number of important subjects in connection with which this House wishes to have redress, and in which they ask the co-operation of the Government; and what do the Government propose? They propose that this House shall go on with Supply without complying with those conditions which our constitutional system recognises and without which the House of Commons itself has practically no power.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentlemen who cry "no, no," are here to register the wishes—

Mr. SPEAKER. I call the hon. gentleman to order.

Mr. MILLS. I yield to your appeal, Sir. I have no means of knowing, except by what I have seen, what those hon. gentlemen are here for; and if I have mistaken their views and motives, of course, I am quite ready to accept their correction.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman, I think, was just as much out of order in stating that hon. gentlemen on this side were here merely to register their votes in favor of the Government—

Mr. MILLS. I did not say that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You did not get quite through the sentence. The hon. gentleman was just as much out of order as if hon. gentlemen on this side were to say that hon. gentlemen opposite were sent here to form a factious opposition to the Government. No hon. gentleman on this side would say such a thing. The hon. gentleman says we ought not to go into Supply at all until all the constitutional grievances are redressed.

Mr. MILLS. I did not say that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think that was what the hon. gentleman said that the debate on Supply should go on after all the grievances were redressed. Why, in England the navy estimates were brought down and gone into the day after the Speech from the Throne was read and replied to. If the hon. gentleman will look at the records of the English Parliament, he will see that the Appropriation Bill was moved for before the adjournment by Mr. Gladstone, and Lord Randolph Churchill took the ground that the Appropriation Bill should not be carried except the last day of the Session, after all the grievances were redressed and all the legislation got through. Mr. Gladstone quoted a number of precedents, which he is always ready to do, to show that he was quite right, admitting, at the same time, that he was perhaps forcing the question a good deal in carrying the Appropriation Bill, and then having in fact a new Session after a long adjournment. As regards this Session, three days in the week are given to general business and two to the Government, which shows that Parliament considers the measures and orders or Bills in the hands of private members are of great importance. The hon. gentleman says the Government have not brought down many Bills. If not it has given more time to hon. members, who have not the misery to be members of the Government, to bring down their measures. They have had a month to do so up to the present. The list has been called over and over again and measures postponed, the majority of them at the instance of the hon. members themselves. I can appeal to the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) to look back, and I think he will find that, notwithstanding the taking of the third week by the Government, there has been no substantial measures in the hands of private members thrown over. Every opportunity has been given to private members, and I think I must press my motion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I might remind the First Minister that he spoke of a motion of mine the other day as being a piece of factious opposition. No doubt he has now reconsidered the matter and considers that I was perfectly in order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What motion was that?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The motion dealing with the Exchange Bank.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, yes, I thought that was an unnecessary motion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman appealed to me.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It was to the hon. gentleman behind you (Mr. Cameron).

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I mistook the hon. gentleman. I thought his appeal was made to me as I have had a good deal of experience in putting through estimates. If the hon. gentleman will look over the records, he will find that during the Administration of my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) the Budget Speech was made on all occasions within a fortnight after we met, instead of waiting five weeks to make it, and the estimates were in the hands of the House at the earliest possible moment. I will merely remark, as a suggestion, that I have often thought that our practice might be conveniently changed in this respect, that in such a special debate as the Budget debate, we might go on de die in diem for a reasonable number of days, instead of taking the usual number per week which unnecessarily prolongs and protracts the debate. And, for my part, in the public interest, I would have been disposed to use what little influence I have to bring about that desirable reform. As to the other matter, however, I think the Minister might very fairly yield to the reasonable requests of my hon. friend from Huron for this particular Thursday, because he knows that, as my hon. friend says, it was not the fault of the private members at all that two Wednesdays were practically lost to them—last Wednesday and the Wednesday before. On each occasion, the House adjourned at half past eight or something like that, and that at the special instance of the First Minister or one of his colleagues. We are not on this side of the House disposed to talk for mere talking's sake. I am sure I am not and my friends are not. If he allows this particular Thursday, it may save time. There are certain motions on the paper which, if we cannot get them moved in the ordinary way, it may be necessary to bring up in the shape of motions in Supply, which will take up a great deal more of the hon. gentleman's time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will accept one portion of the hon. gentleman's suggestion, to go on de die in diem in the discussion of the Budget.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You cannot do it now, you cannot take to-morrow.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not propose it to-morrow, but I propose that on Thursday and Friday we shall go on de die in diem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is what we do not want you to do.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will not ask for Monday, and we will give every opportunity to the hon. gentlemen opposite to bring up their motions.

Mr. DAVIES. I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that there are two classes of motions, one class of motions are made in order to allow the gentlemen who put them there to bring certain grievances before the House, though the secondary object may be to obtain papers. The other class are not for the purpose of raising a debate or a conversation, but simply to move for papers, which is absolutely necessary to move for before we go through Supply. I know that a large number of the motions on the paper are simply with a view to get that sort of information, and, if arrangements were made that those motions on which no debate could arise could be run through as they were last Session, it would greatly facilitate business and would enable us to obtain information, which is now only in the possession of the Government before we get through Supply.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have listened with attention to the remarks made both by the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition, and his assistant, the ex-Minister of Finance. I entirely agree with the position taken by the gentlemen on the Opposition benches to-day. It is not often I do, but in this case I do, and I hold that my action is quite consistent with the course I have pursued in this House for some years past, in fact ever since I ceased to be a member of the Government. When I was a member of the Government, I sympathised with the action of the Premier in wishing to cut down all the private days, and to absorb, at as early a period as possible, the days allowed for private members to bring matters before the House. My hon. friend opposite, whom I had occasion to devote a great deal of attention to when I was in Opposition, will remember that I persistently and consistently claimed that those days ought not to be taken away from private members so early in the Session. I have argued the same thing for the last two Sessions, since I have been here again, against my right hon. friend on this side of the House, and I think so still, and I think it would be wise for the Premier to give way and not take the first Thursday, but let the motion apply to the second Thursday. There will surely be time enough to do the Government business. It is not right that we should not have opportunities for laying the grievances of our constituents—and we have a great many of them—before this Parliament. There is an enormous list of motions on the paper, and numbers of others will still be made, for I am sure the leader of the Opposition will have a great many more motions to make about the Pacific Railway, and I may have some more to make about the Grand Trunk Railway. I cannot let him have the whole. I think the Premier will do a graceful act by giving way on this occasion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MITCHELL. Hon. gentlemen may say "no, no." It is all very well, they may not choose to put forward the claims of their constituents. I do, and I want to have the opportunity to do it. I make the suggestion, but I know the hon. gentleman has the power to override the independent expression of opinion. Still he cannot prevent that expression being made.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am ready to make a compromise with my hon. friend, and to promise not to oppose any motion he may make respecting the Grand Trunk. Will that satisfy him?

Mr. MITCHELL. He may not oppose any motion in respect to the Grand Trunk, but last Session I had to criticise the amount of support which he gave to the Grand Trunk.

Mr. BLAKE. I am not sure that the leader of the Government was as prudent as usual in making that promise, because the hon. member (Mr. Mitchell) may move to abolish the Grand Trunk.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will give him an opportunity.

Mr. MITCHELL. They have nearly abolished themselves.

Mr. BLAKE. However, the hon. gentleman knows as well as anybody how to get rid of promises.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is not parliamentary.

Mr. BLAKE. It is scarcely right to say that private members have had time enough to get on with the legislation in their hands. It is true that there were two days when we were here when the hon. gentlemen who were leading the House in the absence of the First Minister invited us, in view of the thin nature of the benches, to allow certain Bills to stand, and secured an adjournment at about twenty-five minutes past 8 o'clock. But, apart from that, it is necessary that a certain time should elapse after the introduction of these Bills, in order that they may go to the country and be read, and that we may get information from outside, and that they may be considered by members of the House; and, though I agree that it is a proper diligence on the part of private members to bring in their Bills early in the Session, still this part of the Session is as early as several of these measures can possibly be ready. A great many of them are not ready for the second reading now, because they are not printed in both languages. So the case is not such as the hon. gentleman presents. On the other hand, important business on the part of the Government, which might have been brought forward earlier, has not been brought down.

Mr. MITCHELL.

The most important measure mentioned in the speech has not yet been introduced, and the Budget, instead of being brought in at an early period, was brought in at a late period. If my hon. friend took the view of my hon. friend from Bothwell, and said it was constitutional to defer going into Committee of Supply and Committee of Ways and Means until this legislation was brought down, I could understand it, but he does not. He contends that the Budget should be brought in at an early period, and I am disposed to agree with him; but I complain that he does not practice what he preaches, and that he does not bring it down till a late period of the Session.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In medio tutissimus.

Mr. BLAKE. No, the hon. gentleman sometimes gets to the bottom between two stools. That is the medio in which he does not walk tutissimus. I persist that in these circumstances we ought to have this Thursday, but I perceive from the melodious sounds which greeted my hon. friend from Northumberland when he persisted in demanding it, from those harmonious and agreeable intonations of the human voice by which those gentlemen intimated their dissent, that there is not much likelihood of our getting it, because, when the hon. First Minister has such a backing whose views are expressed in such agreeable sounds, he is never deaf to such charmers—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Who charm so wisely—

Mr. BLAKE—as he has heard to-day. I think we should have, at all events, the opportunity, on the first occasion, of going over the paper in the ordinary way, which would no doubt clear the Order paper of more than half the notices, and give the Government more time to get down the papers. I also suggest that we should continue to have the power of having questions answered on Thursday after routine.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. That only involves about a quarter of an hour. I persist in my requisition for Thursday, but, as I perceive the hon. gentleman will not grant it, I offer these other suggestions.

Mr. FARROW. I think the Opposition have no reason for complaint. Any person that will take the paper from day to day, and look at the notices of motion, will come to the conclusion that about nine-tenths of all these notices of motion and items on the Order paper, originate on the other side of the House. I want to impress this fact upon you, Mr. Speaker, and upon this House, that they have called for more returns this Session than have been called for in England during the last six years, where they have three times as many members as we have in Parliament, and about six times as many inhabitants.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that questions should be put on Thursday as if it were not a Government day. Also, I have no objection, on Thursday next, to take the time from the meeting of the House till half-past four to go over the Order paper and grant all the Orders for returns, where there are no speeches upon them.

Mr. McCARTHY. The First Minister has proposed to take Wednesday away, which is partly for notices of motion and partly for Public Bills and Orders, and I do not see why any arrangement should be made that any part of Thursday should be given up to any notices of motion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I mean motions for returns.

Motion, as amended, agreed to on a division.

ENQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. BLAKE. I will not trouble the House with reading them, but I have here a memorandum of over 40 important returns, which the hon. gentleman has just been complaining about, and I will send them across the House and ask the hon. gentleman's diligence towards them, as he seems to be so well disposed.

Mr. VAIL. I would ask when we may expect to have the returns from the engineers with regard to the piers that I asked for in February last.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman was kind enough a few days ago to write me a note about this matter, which I handed to the Secretary of the Department, and he told me they were working at the return, and it would soon be down. I will take note of it again.

Mr. VAIL. I would ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries for returns of copies of accounts for supplies for the Hudson Bay steamers. I trust he will be kind enough to take note of that also, and let me have the papers soon.

Mr. CASEY. I beg to call the attention of the Minister of Railways to the remaining returns ordered by the House in regard to Section B, which have not yet come down. One was the engineer's reports and his classification, ordered the 16th of last month. Then on the 17th we ordered the claim put in by the contractors, the case submitted to the arbitrators, and the evidence taken before them. Can the hon. Minister say when they will be down?

Mr. POPE. With respect to the first part of the question, those returns will be down shortly. With respect to the last part, I do not know whether I will be through with them this year or not. We are going on as fast as we can.

Mr. CASEY. The evidence was all taken, and we paid $3,000 for taking it, and I think it ought to be in shape to bring down to the House.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would like to enquire of the Government with reference to a motion adopted by the House at an early stage of the Session with reference to the return of the number of licenses that were granted under the Liquor License Act of 1883. I think it would take only a short time to prepare the return. There are many Bills now before the House in the discussion of which we need to have the returns, and I would like to know how long it would be before we can expect to have it.

Mr. CASEY. I would say with regard to this evidence that I mentioned a moment ago, that it should have been brought down to the House at any rate without being asked for. There is no necessity for delay. The evidence should have been printed, as many less important things have been printed, and brought down. The claims of the arbitrators and other things which I have asked for are short documents and cannot occupy many pages. They could be prepared in a few days, and I hope the hon. Minister will show the sincerity of his efforts and give us the information on this matter.

Mr. POPE. I have said I would bring down the smaller returns, but I do not agree with the hon. gentleman that we should have brought down this mass of evidence and laid it on the Table. There are over a thousand pages of it, and it will take some time to copy it. We cannot bring down the originals, we must bring down a copy of it.

Mr. CASEY. The original could be laid on the Table.

Mr. BLAKE. May I ask the hon. gentleman when his own report will be down.

Mr. POPE. It is in the printers' hands, and will be down pretty soon.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When will the fourth volume of the census be down?

Mr. POPE. It will be down very soon.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I trust the Government will have the courtesy to answer the very proper request I have made with reference to the motion that was carried at an early stage of the Session. It will only take a short time to make out the return. It is very important that we should have the information asked for in that return, and I trust the Government will have the courtesy to let us know something about it.

Mr. BOWELL. I will say in the absence of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue that I will make a note of it, and hand it to him.

REPORT OF THE FACTORY COMMISSION.

Mr. BLAKE. I would call attention to the fact that the report of the Factory Commission has not yet been distributed, though I understood that advance sheets were in the hands of some hon. members some time ago. It is very important that this document should be distributed before the debate on the Budget proceeds farther. I trust therefore that some effort will be made to have the report distributed at an early date.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed adjourned debate on motion of Sir Leonard Tilley to go again into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, the financial statement made this Session I think most people in this country regard as eminently satisfactory. I think myself that at a time when the over-production throughout the world has brought almost paralysis to trade, the statement which the Finance Minister of this country was able to present was not only remarkable because of the thoroughness with which it was prepared and the satisfactory showing that it makes, but it was remarkable in this, that it has produced through this country a feeling of reassurance, a feeling of confidence; although those feelings were perhaps somewhat shaken by the damaging utterances of the leader of the Liberal party during the recess.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. TUPPER. I hear cries of "no, no." I suppose some hon. gentlemen opposite would gladly deny that damaging speeches were made by their leaders during the recess. I repeat that in my opinion, and it is the opinion of people who have read the utterances of the Liberal leaders, that they were calculated to do the greatest damage possible. I say that those utterances wafted across the ocean do an extraordinary amount of damage to this country. There are business men who will endorse this statement, and who, to their sorrow, have felt the truth of what I say. The Finance Minister's speech, as I have said, was a remarkable one. It was remarkable for the reasons I stated, and it was remarkable too, for this reason, that the position taken by the Finance Minister, stands at this stage of the debate absolutely unassailed. The position he took up at the beginning of the debate has been strengthened by the position which the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) took after him; and we can afford to hear and to read and to allow to go abroad the utterances of the ex-Finance Minister and of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), because they are simply conspicuous for the inaccuracies they contain in regard to this country, and of the jaundiced impression they would produce on the mind of any one who should read them. In this Dominion we can afford to allow to be made public such utterances as those, and the only reason why damage is done is because those speeches are sent across the ocean to the markets of the world and are given a certain amount of weight which they really do not possess, simply because they were spoken by men who at a time, unfortunately for the welfare of Canada, occupied official positions in this country. We could well afford to allow their speeches to go abroad if the political characters of the hon. gentlemen who uttered them were as thoroughly understood elsewhere as they are understood here. We could afford to have the streets of London filled with the speeches of the ex-Finance Minister if he was known politically as he is known in this country, as the king of deficits, as the mixer and muddler of figures, as one of the greatest failures as a Finance Minister that the Dominion has ever seen. If the people of England knew him as we know him, we could well afford to have his speeches sent throughout the United Kingdom. They would do as little harm as they do in the constituency of Lennox or in that of Queen's, P. E. I. We have learned to understand, and we have learned to our cost, the value of the financial opinions of the ex-Finance Minister. He is a unique character in the history of our country. He stands forth as the only high-flying Tory the Liberal-Conservative party ever produced. The high-flying Tory has been so well described by Moore that I will venture to drop into poetry for a few seconds in order that the House may understand what a high-flying Tory really is:

"Keep him always reversed in your minds night and day,
Like an Irish barometer turned the wrong way,
If he's up you may swear foul weather is nigh;
If he's down you may look for a bit of blue sky.
Never mind what debaters or journalists say,
Only ask what he thinks, then think t'other way."

As a Canadian I take courage in this fact, that in this debate he has been eminently "down." From his own standpoint he has not been able to hold his own; overwhelmed as he was by the statistics produced by the Finance Minister, he could not, under the circumstances, with the role he had to play, do justice to the ability which even I admit he possesses. I take comfort from the fact that, having regard to the arguments he addressed to the House, he was "down" simply because the bit of blue sky had been brought home to him by the Finance Minister's statement. We find later on in the debate that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson), who is known in this House for his eloquence and on the stump for his pleasing manner in discussing the public questions of the day, was also "down." The hon. member for South Brant was not himself. He had to fall back on those utterances—all except his reference to the Commissioners' report, which has been published since—to which he gave expression in Lennox, the effect of which on a former occasion was to turn a Grit majority of four into a Conservative majority of forty. With that experience, knowing how the country appreciates the hon. gentleman's arguments, we could have afforded, with the utterances which have been made from this side of the House to let the debate close; but I take it that there are speeches to be made. We were told that the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) and the ex-Finance Minister, not having been able to cope with the Finance Minister in regard to the subject of expenditure, another gentleman had been busily preparing himself, and he would soon enter the lists with his opponents on this side of the House, and endeavor to meet the position taken, and so ably taken, by the Finance Minister, and so ably entrenched by the hon. member for Cardwell. So it is only reasonable that I, a humble member of this House, should express the views I entertain. The hon. member for South Brant, who was comparatively humorous in his remarks, and dealt in jaunty style with this subject—a subject once so serious to him, as I will show later on—held the Finance Minister to account for having unfairly presented his case to the people of this country: that in making his Finance statement the hon. Minister had no right to take three good years and 1884, and claim a good showing on the whole, and he said such conduct was similar to the act of a merchant, who, having lost every dollar refers to years ago when he made something. The hollowness of that argument was exposed last Session by, I think, the hon. member for King's N.B. (Mr. Foster), and was satisfactorily disposed of. I was surprised to hear the hon. gentleman make use of such an argument again, because it was conclusively answered at that time. Sir, the position of a merchant who has lost everything is not the position of a country which has gained everything. And we are not restricted to a period of one year. The Government of the day is not accountable to the people of this country, merely for the results of one year's administration. They go to the country on the showing of their whole term of office. If that position were not correct, I have no doubt that the Reform party, if they had gone to the people, after holding office one year, would have occupied a different position from what they did; if they had confined their case to the first year they came into office, when they had considerable money left to them, they would have had the only surplus they could boast of. The people of this country are not bound down to a month or a year in putting a Government on its trial; they criticise the whole term of a Government, and they wish to know if, on the whole, they have been just and faithful stewards of the people's affairs. On that position the Finance Minister made his speech, just as the Chancellor of the Exchequer of England would make his statement, as any man in such a position would make his statement, and the statement he made on the whole was eminently satisfactory, was indeed far beyond the anticipations of hon. gentlemen opposite when first this Government took office. He could further say the position we are in is not that which the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) tried to make out where everything had been lost; it is not the case of a merchant who loses every dollar he has. The hon. gentleman complained most indignantly of the shameful waste of money spent for immigration purposes, and before him the ex-Finance Minister characterised the whole system as a fraud and a sham, as a waste of the public money. Well, Sir, I was surprised—I was amazed, that for the sake—it would be unparliamentary to say, I suppose, for the sake of currying favor with the trades unions of Toronto, and therefore I shall not say it—but I will say that I was surprised to hear language of that kind coming from the mouths of men who had not only known the responsibilities of office, but had themselves come down to Parliament and asked in the year 1875, a very different year from 1884, for a vote of half a million of dollars for this very purpose. I was surprised to hear a statement of that kind coming from men who, to induce the small number of 19,243 souls to settle in this country, spent $14 per head in inducing them to come here and in bringing them here; I was surprised to hear that charge brought against a Government which at the small expenditure of $5.28 per head brought into the country 68,133 settlers. But my surprise was only temporary, because I recollected that at all times the Reform party is the party of surprises. It is surprising to hear them laying down certain principles as fundamental principles of Government, when they are in Opposition, and to notice the sudden manner in which those principles are scattered to the winds the moment they come into office. For that reason my surprise was only of short duration. In the speeches of the ex-Finance Minister and the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), we notice the greatest inconsistency when they arraign the National Policy, whether these speeches are delivered in this House or in the country, they blow hot and then blow cold. At one period they denounce monopolies and decry a policy which makes the rich richer and the poor poorer, and when they thoroughly deal with that subject they, revenue tariff men as they are, employ the arguments of free traders, and then they drop into another part of their subject and employ a totally different set of arguments and abuse the policy because the manufacturers have not made large profits and because capital has been sunk. I say that the country understands the hon. gentlemen thoroughly, and I tell them that they must resort to other arguments than those to injure a policy which, in this crisis of the country's history, has stood out so well. The hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) can afford to be humorous, for he to-day is a manufacturer, and like many other manufacturers he still clings to his political feelings and is bound by his political ties; but they have been enabled either to make or to save a great deal of money and they have been prevented from losing money under the operation of a policy, which under party pressure, and for party's sake, they often feel themselves bound to denounce. He, I say, then can afford to be humorous in arraiguing that policy at the call of his party, but there was a day when the hon. gentleman's tone was serious, when he was not only very eloquent, but when every sentence he urged in the course of the debate, to which I refer, came from his heart. In those days, the hon. gentleman, not only implored the ex-Finance Minister, the Finance Minister of that day, to adopt a policy similar to the one now in force, but he stood up as a living witness, as to the effect that that policy would produce. He claimed that protection given to the industry in which he was engaged, had not only brought thousands of people from Germany, but that while injuring no one, it gave all the benefit of that production and the employment of that labor to this country. There was no jaunty air at that time; there was no tearing to pieces the different reports circulated in the country in regard to the statistics of the country. He said it would be folly to speak of the losing manufactures of the Dominion; the thing they had to do was to act, and he stood out much longer in his petition to the Finance Minister of the day than the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) did. The latter was a protectionist up to six o'clock during the debate, and after that he went solidly for the policy of the day, but the member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson)—as any hon. gentleman will see if he looks up the Debates of that day, and they are interesting in this respect—continued loyal to protection through the whole Session, not only in the Budget debate but in the discussion on the agricultural interests of the country. He showed that he was pledged to the farmers of his riding to obtain protection, that he wished protection not only for the cigar industry in which he was interested but for all industries alike. He was willing that the millers should be protected, and in fact he was an out and out protectionist. Now, in the course of the little banter in which the hon. gentleman indulged the other evening, in reference to the present Finance Minister, he said that "he had no desire to read old literature again, but he was forced to do so." That is my excuse for reading to the House, in order to strengthen my position, some very old literature which is often read to the House. It is read when the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) sits down to find out what were his views when he was serious, when he was speaking from a common sense standpoint, when discussing the effects of this policy upon his own industry. In 1876 the hon. gentleman who now arraigns the policy of protection, when imploring the ex-Finance Minister to raise the Customs duty, contended that the prices would be brought down, that the consumers would get the benefit of cheaper goods than they then had. I ask him if his prediction has not been verified. He said:

"It would simply remove the competition from the American manufacturers to our own, the consumers receiving the benefit all the same, but the country being enriched by the industries."

He discussed the tariff, he sounded every part of it, and he brushed away all fears of the exodus in these words:

"I believe that by a defensive tariff you would not have to pay to bring those men here. Adopt it and you will find the steam whistles of our factories will be the call for them to come."

That is the language of an hon. gentleman who to-day holds up to ridicule those who cannot agree with him, a gentleman who, in 1876, spoke of steam whistles and tall chimneys. We could only draw the deduction the other evening that those remarks only came from hon. gentlemen on this side of the House; but we find that they originated with a better authority than myself on trade matters at that time. The hon. gentleman was interrupted by the hon. member for West Elgin, one of the whips of the party, who endeavored to bring the lash to bear upon him for his tremendous storm for a protective tariff; but he asked: "If free trade be better than protection, why have any duties at all?" Could we have a sounder argument for the National Policy than that to-day? That is our position, and we could not have it better defined than it was by the hon. gentleman who now advocates a revenue tariff only, and who in doing so, endeavors to use the arguments of free traders. His position, to my mind, is illogical; it is worse than illogical; it is absurd that the hon. member, in advocating a revenue tariff, should attempt to bring to his aid the arguments of free traders. But I must read something more from this interesting old literature:

"The other year, the Finance Minister, in revising the tariff, gave some encouragement to our industry which it never had before. The result was that a thousand men who were engaged in that industry in Germany were literally transported, by the change in the tariff, to Canada, and set to work here. The cost of the article was not increased one iota, and Canada got all the benefit. The middlemen suffered a diminution of profits; but for them nobody seems to care much, the producer and consumer received all the sympathy. It is inevitable that a like result would flow to other manufacturers under the same policy. If the Finance Minister finds such is the case, I trust that the wisdom which led him to yield that point will induce him to grant the same to other industries, and that no sectionalism will tie his hands."

That is the policy we wished to adopt, and that is the policy we obtained. The hon. member has changed his views—no doubt he has the privilege to do so; but I say he has never answered those arguments, fortified by his own experience in the very business to which he alluded. There has been no sectionalism displayed by the Government of the day. They never confined their National Policy to the tobacco industry of South Brant or to the oil wells of Ontario; but, consistently with the policy propounded, they have given to every industry that could possibly live in this country some fostering protection. Now, if all that the hon. member for South Brant, and all that the First Minister anticipate as the result of the National Policy, has not come to pass, why had he not the candor to say that neither he nor the First Minister, nor any Finance Minister in the world, ever anticipated or could anticipate the extraordinary over-production which this world has seen in the last two or three years? Everyone knows that economical theories and practical views have all had a serious check in consequence of the extraordinary manner in which the world has been brought together, so to speak, of late. There has been an extraordinary development of railroad enterprise the world over, and electricity has done so much that to-day it is difficult to find what used to be considered a "far-off" land. The world has been brought closer together to-day, I venture to say, than any man in this Chamber believed even three years ago was possible. Competition is now at its height; and the question of over-production has attracted considerable attention in England, as well as a considerable amount of painful foreboding. But in this country the Finance Minister was able to make a statement, warranted by the facts, that no other Minister could make, in regard to the condition of the people. Now, we are told, by the curious method of reasoning adopted by the hon. member for South Brant as a proof, that the farming industry of this country has not been benefitted by the National Policy, that the value of the exports of butter, eggs, cheese and potatoes had actually increased. Now, it does seem odd that if the exports of that industry have increased, the industry itself has not prospered. Why, is it not perfectly consistent with the development of the home market that at the same time the demand outside, over which we have no control, should have also increased? Sir, was it intentional that the hon. member ignored a most important consideration in this connection? Was it intentional that he ignored the wonderful advance we have made in what the fathers of Confederation wished to promote an inter-provincial trade. How is it that the hon. member ignored the facts, which the public records of his country could have given him, that the coasting trade since 1878 has increased by 4,500,000 tons, and that freight carried on railways has increased since 1878 by nearly 6,000,000 tons? Why was it that the hon. member did not go on to state that that was a benefit to the farmers? Why did he not refer to his own principle, that what benefits the manufacturer benefits the farmer, and that you cannot help one without helping the other? The hon. gentleman was in my constituency last summer on a visit pleasing to himself, I hope, as it was to those who heard him; and surely, while there, he could not fail to see the effects which the National Policy had produced. He could not see the effect in the exports of the country; but did he not see there a trade that depends entirely on the home market? Did he not see that we are sending up to Ontario not only the products of our mines, but from the industries in New Glasgow our manufactures of steel and glass? Why had he not the candor in this connection to mention that he noticed during that trip signs of prosperity and signs of the healthy growth of an interprovincial trade? It did not suit the gentleman's purpose, I have no doubt, to dilate on that view of the question, and so he amused the House and his friends by a very clever and very carefully prepared critique of the work of the commissioners appointed to investigate the condition of industries in this country. He produced a certain amount of merriment by his elaborate and exhaustive critique. Now, I have no intention of making a reply to that; it was, perhaps, too carefully prepared for me thoroughly to criticise it now; but I will venture to take this position, that, on reading the hon. gentleman's speech, it produced a conclusion which I do not think he desired to be drawn from it. It produced the conclusion that, instead of mistakes having been made by these commissioners in exaggerating the resources of the country, many factories had been entirely overlooked. That a thorough examination of the state of trade had not been made, and that the approximate estimate which the commissioners—and the hon. gentleman should have alluded to that—said they had made of some of the industries was entirely below the mark. The hon. gentleman certainly left that impression with me, and I have no doubt he left it with others; but at any rate the force of this remark was that you could not depend absolutely upon that report. I think it was intended to give an approximate idea, so that that part of the hon. gentleman's speech will not influence the country to any appreciable extent. Again the hon. gentlemen blew hot and cold, as all revenue tariff men do, who depend upon free trade theories, when he charged the Finance Minister with not having brought millions into Canada, and then, in the next breath, accused him of bringing more millions into Canada than the country required, causing millions to be sunk in enterprises that do not pay. If that be true, have not the laborer and workman received some benefit? If millions have been brought in and used in developing these different industries—and we do not altogether admit the accuracy of his statement as the hon. gentleman will ascertain in this debate—why does he not admit that that may be one of the causes which have induced the working-men, speaking generally, in this country, to become strong and enthusiastic defenders of the National Policy. I say that the fact that depression exists the world over, the fact that business has received the check to which I have alluded, and the fact which is in the knowledge of every hon. member in this House, that there is so little real distress, so little real poverty, so little misery, above that which always exists at any time, no matter how prosperous the country may be—I say these facts combined, furnish one reason why hon. gentlemen opposite have failed to captivate during the recess the support of any body of laboring men in any of the counties which have been opened. The hon. gentleman referred to the decrease in the export of manufactured goods, and again he did not deal candidly with the subject in hand. He did not explain, and therefore left it necessary for those who follow him to mention the fact, which we all understand, that it is absolutely absurd to suppose we have any direct control over foreign markets; and the fact that the over-production which worries other countries far worse than it does Canada to-day accounts in some measure for decrease in our exports of manufactured goods. I will call the hon. gentleman's attention to the report of a lecture given by Mr. Fairweather, of St. John, a lecture which has not and cannot be successfully attacked, and which has been published and extensively noticed by the press of Canada. If the hon. gentleman had given us a candid and fair criticism of that paper he would have afforded us, not merely a source of amusement, but would have given us a criticism of far greater importance than his attack upon the commissioners' report. Attention has been directed in that lecture to the extraordinary development of the inter provincial trade, and that is what concerns us to-day. The National Policy is simply another term for the policy of Confederation. Confederation was intended to develop interprovincial trade, and it had this effect up to a certain period, when the United States market assumed a different position. Confederation alone having ceased to continue operating the effect desired, we simply added another stone called the National Policy to the fabric of Confederation, and that has produced the same satisfactory results as Confederation alone had produced for several years after the union. If it will not weary the House, I would like to support that position by an authority which will not be questioned by hon. gentlemen opposite; and in doing so I am keeping well within the subject of debate, because among other questions discussed during it is the question of reciprocity. When the late George Brown went to Washington to endeavor to negotiate a treaty of reciprocity with the United States, in 1874—the year when our trade was becoming visibly affected by the growing industries and extraordinary development of the United States and our then tariff did not operate successfully in securing to us our own market—when he went to Washington in April, 1874, he made a certain showing to the people of the United States, and in that statement he brings out the idea I have just mentioned:

"Effect in Canada of the Abrogation Treaty.—The repeal in 1866 of the Reciprocity Treaty, under which so vast a trade had grown up, rendered imperatively necessary prompt measures to open new markets for the sale of Canadian produce. These measures were at once taken. Under the influence of the formal notice given by the United States in 1865 of their intention to terminate the treaty, federation of the provinces, then under discussion, was hurried on and became un fait accompli within fifteen months after its repeal."

He also says:

"The Act of Confederation, too, removed from the category of foreign commerce to that of home consumption, the large interchange of commodities between the several sections of the Dominion; and the aggregate foreign commerce of the provinces consequently fell in the first year after the repeal of the treaty to $139,202,615 from $160,409,455 in the previous year. As will be seen from following statement, however, the trade of the Dominion speedily recovered from the blow, and the volumes of its foreign commerce gradually increased until, in the seventh year from the repeal of the treaty, it reached the great sum (for a people of 4,000,000) of $235,301,203—being $75,000,000 higher than it had reached in any year of the treaty's existence."

Then, in order to show the wonderful growth and expansion of trade in Canada, independent entirely of the United States, he gives the figures of the different years, and to swell the amount he adds the foreign trade of Newfoundland. In 1868 the total exports and imports of Canada and Newfoundland amounted to $138,202,615; and so on to 1873 when they amounted to $235,301,203, making a total foreign commerce in seven years, of Canada and Newfoundland, of $1,207,807,817. My point is this, that that showing was perfectly correct; it was a satisfactory showing, as Mr. Brown admitted of the effect of Confederation up to that date, owing, as I have said, to the circumstances of the United States. Up to that time everything had turned out as the Hon. Mr. Brown himself and the other fathers of Confederation had desired and expected, but from that time our trade began steadily to decrease from $217,000,000 in 1874 down to $172,000,000 in 1878. The late Government failed to obtain reciprocity and they also refused to adopt the National Policy; that is they refused to strengthen the National Policy of 1867 by increasing our Custom duties. The consequence was our trade did not develop itself. Now the figures show that when the present Government came into power they took up this subject boldly, they took it up in the spirit in which I believe the late Mr. George Brown himself would have taken it up, if his remarks give any indication of his opinions in 1867, as reported in the debates on Confederation. The stand he then took, as regarded the United States, was to the effect that: If you will not trade with us on fair terms we will adopt the offensive and protect our own trade. The results have been satisfactory, because we can show that from 1879 to 1884, only six years, we have in Canada alone had almost the same volume of trade as that which the Hon. George Brown was able to show to the United States as the result of seven years trade of Newfoundland and Canada together. From 1879 to 1884 our trade amounted to $1,191,178,618; add Newfoundland, from 1879 to 1883, and you will have a total of $1,248,721,685. Therefore we were consistently carrying out our policy of Confederation and with the most satisfactory and natural results. I think it would not be irrelevant, in order to strengthen the position that the Finance Minister has taken, to point to circumstances somewhat similar, to point to depression far more intensified than it is in this country. No one can successfully contradict the statement that the depression in England during the last few years, aye, even from 1881, has been far more intense, far more injurious to the people than the temporary depression in business which exists in this country to-day. I am able to show that in the English House of Commons and the English House of Lords the Government there met the arraignment exactly in the style of our Finance Minister, except that they could not point to anything like the record which he can point to in Canada to-day. My deduction from that, if I can sustain the point, is that it ought to be a satisfactory answer to those gentlemen here who complain that the free trade Government which they pretend to take as a model for a revenue tariff, when arraigned for a policy of free trade, uses the same kind of defence the Finance Minister has used in this debate. Let me cite the evidence that the commercial position in England is far worse than it is in this country. I will read but few extracts. I will take them from good free trade organs, not when they are dealing with the subject of free trade and protection however, for I find there is the same narrow mind in England in that respect as in Canada, that when discussing free trade they carefully keep these facts in the background, but when they are discussing trade as newspapers, then we are able to understand their position. The Times of 10th December, 1883, says:

"It is now complained by merchants generally that their profits have either disappeared altogether or are extremely small, while great industries are admittedly in distress. Nowhere is there real prosperity." Now that is in England. Then the Times of July, 1884, says:

"It is hardly necessary to say that ship building is for the present dead. The cotton trade is to all appearance stationary, profits being hard to obtain, owing to the intensity of competition both at home and abroad."

And surely free traders will hail with astonishment this statement:

"Probably the revival will come, when it does come, from—"

Where? From their own empire, from the regions of the world in which free trade is working such wonders? No, but—

"from the United States."

I will give another extract. This is from the Statist of January 31st, 1885, in which the whole trade of the year is summed up. It says:

"During the year likewise there has been no recovery from the steady depression which has now lasted about two years. At the end of the year not only were prices much lower than they were at the beginning, but the prospect of recovery seemed further off than ever. The extreme fall in prices appears, in fact, to have taken the heart out of business men. The year 1884 has altogether been much worse for business than its predecessor, and the prospect at the end of the year was, and the prospect now still is, less cheerful than twelve months ago."

"As the result, there have, perhaps, been more complaints of small profits and of want of employment amongst workmen during the past year than there have been for many years previous. The fall of prices, perhaps, has especially affected capitalists by diminishing their profits. But whatever the cause, there has apparently been less surplus capital available for the employment of labor in new works than there has been for many years; while capital has also been idle, because in many directions, particularly in shipbuilding, which is one of the most important modes of investing capital, there was no prospect of profitable employment."

I know these extracts as a rule are not interesting to hon. members in this House, but, in order to strengthen the position I take, I have deemed it necessary to cite them. Under these circumstances, let us turn but for one moment to the manner in which Lord Granville met the indictment that the Government were responsible for the condition of affairs and that the condition of affairs was as bad as these commercial free trade organs had asserted. They explain the position of affairs there, and I think the comparison will hold good here. Lord Granville contended that the appearance of depression arose from the existence of lower prices, but that the volume of trade was still great. Can we not do the same? Have not the hon. gentlemen who preceded me on this side of the House most successfully established that fact? The aggregate trade from 1879 to 1883, Lord Granville claimed, was enormous. He was not charged with having taken all these years together. No one seemed to find fault with him there for taking a range of years in order to give confidence to business men and to the country, and he pointed with pride, as our Finance Minister pointed with pride, to the increased production of coal. And then he dropped down into what hon. gentlemen opposite dislike so much—averages. He took the average production of coal from 1875 to 1880, and compared it with triumph, not with that of 1883 or 1884, in reference to which they were bringing the charges against him, but with 1881 and 1882. That was satisfactory to a majority of that House, and surely we have a right to point with pride to the fact that, in this so-called depression, the production of our coal stands boldly out and shows that manufactures must still be kept going even though profits at this time are small. Lord Granville also instanced the raw cotton consumed from 1875 to 1880 and compared it with 1883. He also alluded to another point which is a matter of importance with us, the increased amount of savings bank deposits and the increased consumption of sugar, tea, coffee and tobacco; and he concluded, as we can with more right and with more reason, that "the present depression of trade to a large extent was only apparent, and that the production and consumption are large and the people well off." If he could say that of the condition of the people in a country in reference to which, if time would permit, I could cite some extraordinary evidence, our position should be, as the Finance Minister has convinced a majority of the people of this country, most reassuring. Lord Granville claimed that there had been simply a curtailment of profits of manufacturers and wholesale merchants, and that, to men who view the matter here apart from party bias, is the state of things with us to-day. In the House of Commons, the Chancellor of the Exchequer compared the exports of 1893 with those of 1869, and surely we can do the same, to show the improvement in trade. We could show that the exports of Canada in 1869 amounted to only $60,000,000, whereas in 1883 they amounted to $98,000,000. Then I say my conclusion is a fair and reasonable one, and the people in this country ought to be satisfied in this which is a time of extraordinary over-production, that the Government can give the same answer with the same force and the same reason and the same style of statistics as the Government at home can do. We have heard a good deal about monopolies. The hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) alluded to them last Session, and, although not much has been said in this debate, we have heard of them. No doubt the people of Lennox heard of them in the first part of the hon. gentleman's speech who preceded me. I put this question to the hon. gentleman, where would you rather have the monopoly in the employment of labor, in the production of saleable articles, and in the development of our natural resources—would you prefer to have these monopolies at home or abroad? They exist, but they exist where our laborers get no benefit from them. Take the case of thread. Every hon. gentleman knows that Coates and Clark had a monopoly of the thread trade. They had gigantic works in Paisley, Scotland, and even controlled the market in the American States, but the Americans, with their keen business knowledge, erected a defensive tariff wall and levied a duty on thread. And what is the consequence? Why, works just as large, but still owned by Coates and Clark, have been established in America; their works have been actually transported to the State of New Jersey, and the United States get not only the thread but they get also the benefit of the thread being manufactured in their own country, and of the wages being paid to their fellow taxpayers. We know that there is to-day a cry of monopoly. But there is no monopoly in this country fostered by the tariff; there are, however, monopolies in England; there are monopolies existing in connection with many industries in England, and I call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that the monopolies in England are such that, though wheat was never lower, bread in England was never dearer. I call attention to the fact that monopolies are existing in that free trade paradise. Perhaps hon. gentlemen will not take my statement for it, and I will give them the evidence of the Saturday Review of September 6th, 1884. The article is headed "Dear bread and cheap wheat," and it reads as follows:—

"At the present moment there is a universal complaint on the part of producers that they are being ruined by the fall of prices and yet consumers do not find that the prices charged to them are proportionately lowered. Just now production is paralysed precisely because consumption is held in check by too high prices. The most striking example of this is furnished by the price of bread. Roughly, it may be said that just now the price of wheat is very little, if at all, over three-farthings per pound. Yet we know from letters to the daily papers that the price of bread in various parts of London has until a week or two ago been as high as 7d. the 4-lb. loaf, and even now is 7d. the loaf. In other words, while the price of wheat is little over three-farthings a pound, the price of bread is not much under 2d. a pound. The consumer is being deprived of the benefit which he ought to derive from the fall in wheat, while the farmer is a great sufferer from that fall. But though the difference between the price of wheat and the price of bread is attracting most attention just now, it is by no means a singular phenomenon. A case has been heard of in which a banker in the city, having set up an old servant in a retail shop, bought for her tea at tenpence a pound, which she sold to her customers at three-and-sixpence a pound. This is, no doubt, an extreme instance. But every one who knows what is going on in Mincing Lane is aware that tea has been for the last couple of years sold there for tenpence a pound, which has been retailed at from two shillings to half-a-crown a pound. Similarly, sugar which costs in Mincing Lane from five farthings to three-halfpence is sold at twopenny-halfpenny and even threepence in the retail shops. It is notorious, for example, that the brewers own the majority of public-houses in London; and it is said that in the same way the millers control the majority of bakeries. There is thus no real competition between the retail dealers, and prices are settled by the ring, a strict combination being kept up to the detriment of the public."

So much for monopolies existing abroad. Now, I have alluded to the state of business generally in England, and challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to produce anything equally authoritative showing such an extraordinary state of things in this country. I challenge them to bring forward any evidence that the workingmen of the laboring classes are in as degrading a position in this country as they are in England. A School Board Commissioner, Mr. T. Marchant Williams, of the City of London, wrote a very remarkable description of the state of things he found existing in that city, and it bears truth upon its face. This comes from a man who is endeavoring to benefit his fellowmen, who has no object in misrepresenting the facts, and who speaks from personal observation. This gentleman says:

"There are at least 60,000 families in London whose homes consist of one room only, and I have statistics in my possession which clearly prove that, so far as the Divisions of Finsbury and Marylebone are concerned, of the children from these homes that attend any efficient elementary school at all, an exceptionally large proportion are in attendance at the Board schools. There are schools in Finsbury Division that are filled with children of whom 60, 70, and even 80 per cent. come from homes consisting of one room only, and such schools are not confined to one particular district. It was only the other day that I discovered in one of these streets a house containing nine rooms, each of which accommodates on an average eight persons! And, be it understood, Board schools have been built in all these districts. In one of the Clerkenwell schools I found, on the day of my annual inspection, that 36 per cent. of the parents of the children were out of employment, that 40 per cent. of the children come to school sometimes without a breakfast, and 28 per cent. come sometimes to afternoon school without having had any dinner. In another district I discovered that the parents of 34 per cent. of the boys in attendance at the Board school were out of employment at the time of my visit to the school; 10.5 per cent. of the boys had no fathers; 17.5 per cent. occasionally came to school dinnerless, and 23 per cent. breakfastless. These facts are not so entirely exceptional that they may not be considered applicable to a considerable proportion of the children attending the Board schools in my district."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I must ask the attention of the House to a table prepared by Mr. Williams, which bears out what I have just quoted, and shows how the people are crowded together in some parts of that city:

Mr. Williams goes on to say:

"Our philosophical theorists are doing well in warning the benevolent against the dangers of pauperising the people; but they would be doing better if they were to supplement their warnings with suggestions as to their own plan of feeding and saving the little children who are now rotting in heaps within sight of the porticoes of their churches. If economic theories are to be applied to the parents only, children cannot thrive upon them."

Canadians found they could not thrive upon them either.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. TUPPER. In order to show that a National Policy underlies the Confederation scheme and that the principles of that policy mainly contributed to bring about the Confederation of the Provinces, I will refer to the Confederation debates. I find that Mr. George Brown, who upheld the scheme, said :

"But the proposal now before us is, to throw down all barriers between the Provinces—to make a citizen of one a citizen of the whole; the proposal is, that our farmers and manufacturers and mechanics shall carry their wares unquestioned into every village of the Maritime Provinces; and that they shall with equal freedom bring their fish and their coal and their West India produce to our 3,000,000 of inhabitants."

He also said :

"I say one of the best features of this union is, that if in our commercial relations with the United States we are compelled by them to meet fire with fire—it will enable us to stop this improvidence and turn the current of our own trade into our own waters."

That language, of course, is fresh in the minds of many hon. gentlemen. I simply wish to call attention to it now in connection with the fact that the successors of George Brown in the Reform party have sadly degenerated. They have taken a position entirely antagonistic to that occupied by him and the hon. member for Lambton in those days; because we find that while the Reform party were in power they gave a protection to one of the natural industries of Ontario, a protection to the development of the petroleum wells, and refused to give a like protection to another industry, alluded to by George Brown as a profitable industry, namely, the coal fields of the Maritime Provinces. The Reform party have pursued an unfair, sectional and illiberal policy. They have departed from the traditions of the party in 1865: they gave protection to an industry of one Province, while they refused it to that of another. It is idle, I contend, for them to talk about the necessity of placing coal on the free list because it is a necessary of life, for one has only to remember that the same argument can be used in regard to the taxes they imposed on tea and coffee, and even on petroleum, because that is not only fuel but light to the rich and poor alike. There is and can be no defence of their inconsistent conduct in that connection. I wish to direct the attention of the House to the narrow-minded view taken of this vast field of profitable industry by the present leader of the Opposition. I was present in Halifax some years ago and heard the hon. gentleman there allude to this enormous industry of Nova Scotia, and now, of course, of British Columbia and the North-West Territories. I heard him give utterances to views which showed to me only too plainly that he had not lost his character of a special pleader on the public platform. He showed too clearly that he was holding a brief and acting essentially in his capacity as one of the profession to which I belong; and it is disclosing no secret, I am sure, when I state that when you hold a particular brief you do not do full justice to your opponents case, and do not attempt to bring out any strong features in connection with it. The hon. gentleman showed he was unable to take a broad statesman-like view of the questions of the day. He should have known, as he was bound to know, that the coal industry was a great industry affecting every hole and corner of the Province, and one which, if developed, would assist every part of the Dominion. He ought to have been willing to have gone that far. Instead of belittling that industry he should have been man enough to have stood up and said that he knew it employed many thousands of people—because he could have ascertained beforehand that 40,000 men, women and children were directly dependent on that industry in the Province where he was speaking—that it provided employment and subsistence not only to those 40,000 individuals in the coal districts of Nova Scotia alone; that it benefitted the shipping interests of the St. Lawrence; that colliers had been built specially for the trade since the National Policy was developed.

Not only so but increased employment in connection with the trade had been given, more stevedores, sailors and train hands being employed; that more factory hands had been employed in order to supply the expensive machinery and gear necessary for the working of the mines; that while this industry was encouraged, it was able to pay in the shape of royalties into the provincial treasury, one-fifth of the total revenue, over $100,000. Not only that, but in order to keep the mines in operation a construction account amounting to $200,000 a year was necessary to be expended. But what do I find the hon. gentleman saying? I have here the report of the language he used, and I desire to place it before the House. He is reported as having said—and I was present at the meeting, which was in 1881:

"Our coal mining had been said to have been benefitted. He denied that it had; but if it had, a benefit conferred on 3,300 men and boys (being the number of persons engaged in coal mining in Nova Scotia), could not be set off against the harm done the Province generally by the tariff."

Why was such a narrow view taken by the hon. gentleman? Even when speaking of the men and boys employed, the number was not correctly given. The number actually employed at that time, as is shown by the mining reports, was 3,967 instead of 3,300; in 1882 the number was 4,225. But, as I have said, he should have recognised the fact that 40,000 people, as he could easily have ascertained, were dependent on that industry for their means of subsistence. We find that the Government of which he was a member in 1875, while not willing to extend protection to the coal industry of the Maritime Provinces, was ready to give protection to the petroleum industry of Ontario. The figures show the following:—

	Value.	Duty.	Per cent.
Protection to oil, 1875.....	$110,995	$102,165 32	93
1884.....	380,082	227,562 60	60

The protection to our coal industry, which I have shown the fathers of Confederation desired to benefit and foster, receives a protection of only 15 per cent. We do not complain. The mines have done well, both in good times and in bad times, under the National Policy; and they are not complaining to-day. But we find that this attack is hurled from the ranks of men who gave the industry 96 per cent. protection, while they complain of an industry which has only a protection of 15 per cent. to-day, for we find that, while the coal imported in 1884 was valued at something like seven million dollars, the duty collected was only one million of dollars, or a duty of about 15 per cent. Now these hon. gentlemen are very inconsistent in regard to the industries of the Maritime Provinces—or rather they are inconsistent in regard to those industries as compared with the rule they would apply to the rest of the Dominion. What is the position of the Reform party to-day in connection with the National Policy? Take the speeches of hon. gentlemen during the recess and what do we find? We find that if anything they are trying to outbid the members sitting on the Treasury benches by a purely sectional cry, that they entirely disregard the laboring men and the manufacturers of Nova Scotia and the Maritime Provinces, in order to make a bid for the Ontario vote. They say we do not attack the industries peculiar to this Province, with 30 to 35 per cent. protection, but we will give you more protection at the expense of the Maritime Provinces. They say they will put coal and iron on the free list, but they say nothing about taking the duty off oil or other articles peculiar to Ontario. They say we will go one better and put these articles on the free list at the expense of the Provinces, which only give a comparatively small number of votes, and you will be so much the better off. That, it seems to me, is not a statesman-like position. I wish to point out the fact that these two great industries coal and iron are in the Lower Provinces found in juxtaposition to our fisheries. I admit that the present Reform party were opposed to the protection given to the fishing industries; they ridiculed the arming of the fleet which was raised for their protection; they opposed the Government in reference to the Washington Treaty; but strange to say, time has taught them that that course would be dangerous to-day and we find Grit and Tory all agreed in the Provinces down by the sea, that they hold meeting after meeting and that both parties alike urge on the Government that some vigorous action be taken to protect the fishing interests of the Maritime Provinces, to impose duties and to arm fleets to protect that industry. There is no free trade argument in that request to this Government, no desire to trade freely with their American competitors. We could understand them if they took the consistent position of declaring that we should allow all our waters to be free to the world, that we should make our fish free to all who chose to come keep out no competitors. But I would be amazed to find at this day that the Opposition would take such a position as that, and I have no doubt that they will not do so. But how can they, while willing to extend this protection to the fishing industry, refuse to extend it to coal? Every one must admit the tremendous value to the Dominion of our coal deposits, not merely in the Maritime Provinces, but all over the Dominion, away to the west on the Pacific coast; and I say it is a hopeful and auspicious sign of the grand career in store for this country—it is no doubt one of the greatest possessions of Canada—that on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts we should have these immense coal fields; and it must be that they were intended by Providence to be developed, and they could not be without a National Policy, for without it they would likely be extinguished. It is important to know that while the total production of coal in the United States in 1860 was only something like six millions of tons, the position in that country has so much changed that to-day it is actually over eighty-seven millions of tons, and this increased production has arisen under a fostering protective tariff. This question of protection is a serious one in connection with the coal trade, for if we had difficulty in competing with a country which produced six millions of tons, our difficulties will be greatly enhanced in endeavoring to compete with a country which produced eighty seven millions of tons a year. My hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson), in referring to this question, finding that he could not show that the prices would be raised, that he could not prove that the evil prophecies which had been uttered in regard to this industry had been verified, stated that he had found that the real cause of the increased output of coal to which the hon. Finance Minister alluded was that before the National Policy was introduced wood was largely consumed on railways. The hon. gentleman has fallen sadly in his position on the question of protection; for does he not know that the leader of the Conservative party stated that all that was to be changed, and that we were to be no longer hewers of wood and drawers of water, and the industries which made us the hewers of wood and the drawers of water have been supplanted and other industries have grown up in their place. But why is it that the hon. gentleman dealt so delicately with this question, for we know that there is no feeling against the duty on coal in Ontario to-day. The people of Ontario have learned that the coal trade in the United States having been vastly developed is now being handled by rings all over the American Union, and that districts are divided, and were it not for the coal duty and for the fact that Toronto has been made a competitive point by the National Policy, that city and other western cities and towns would be brought within the influence of the rings and made subject to their prices, subject to the tariff of rates that is set up in those territories that are to be operated upon. Statistics have been given, and they have never been contradicted, showing who does pay the duty. The Belleville Intelligencer gave figures on the 7th of February, 1883, showing that while coal sold at $3.75 in Cleveland it sold in Canada at from $2.30 to $2.80 per ton. We find also that while the price of coal has been decreasing here under a protective tariff in free trade England it has steadily risen; that while steam coal at Cardiff sold in 1880 at 8s. 9d. it sold this year at 10s. 9d. We know also that English coal is sold in Paris at a lower price than it can be purchased in London. These are facts which should be considered by the hon. gentleman when discussing this question of coal. We find further from Chambers' Journal of Commerce, in London, of December 5th, 1883, the following:

"In the coal trade, no less than in cotton manufactures, the miners and their leaders will find themselves obliged to consider the influence of other countries as producers, and must already feel themselves constrained to acknowledge that we no longer absolutely rule the market."

The New York Sun says:

"Ontario is a nearer market for Pennsylvania coal than it is for the Maritime Provinces. Ontario is now using American coal, but the duty leaves very little profit on the coal, because the dealers have to sell it at a price that keeps out the native product."

Professor Roberts, of the Pennsylvania Railway, quoted in the Toronto Mail, said:

"The rates that are now charged by our company for carrying soft coal are made for the purpose of meeting the competition in the various markets in which coals are introduced."

This shows what has been pointed out by gentlemen who have taken part in this discussion in previous years, that where there are competitive points the duty prevents the price being controlled by American rings and keeps the prices down instead of putting them up. Now, I stated that coal was sold at a lower price on the continent than in England. I find, in a letter addressed a short time ago by Mr. Ellis Lever, to the London Times, the following remarks:

"We are actually selling our coal at a price which leaves no profit to the colliery proprietor for his capital and risk, and which does not admit of adequate wages being paid to the collier, whose labor is in the midst of darkness and danger. At the same time, we are delivering coal at the continent of Europe at a less price than we can deliver it in London. The foreigner has the advantage of procuring our coal free of export duty; not so the population of the metropolitan area."

Now, why do I allude to this? Surely it is a fair argument, if I can show that the increased duty has decreased the price, and that the only increase in price is in a Free Trade country; and I say it is for hon. gentlemen opposite to find some other effect to urge against the duty than that which they urge. Now, I do not think it would be inappropriate for me to mention in this connection since this is a question peculiarly affecting the workingmen, that it has been stated broadcast throughout the land by a lying press that I, on the floor of this House, have sneered at the workingmen. When a press is so lost to decency that for lack of other material it must descend to lying calumnies against a member of my experience and age in this House, it shows what a poor and miserable cause it must have. I defy any man to stand up in this House and say on his honor that in any discussion in which I have engaged I have attempted to sneer at the workingmen or have used the term "the lower orders." I can appeal to Bansard; and if there is anything with reference to which we have reason to feel some comfort that we have reports so accurate, it is on an occasion like this. My speeches are there, uncorrected by me, and I can safely appeal to them to corroborate what I say. Why, how ridiculous for me to sneer at the men who sent me here. The county of Pictou, of course, contains a large number of agriculturists; it is a large, prosperous and splendid county; but the bulk of the voters who sent me here to support the National Policy are par excellence workingmen. They are men whom I never sneered at, but whom I am proud to serve; and I believe I am serving them and fulfilling the mission for which they sent me here in supporting the policy of the Government, the policy which gives them bread to eat. So much for what are very common in this country, that is, misstatements in the Grit press. I have only to state the interest I have taken in this subject as the excuse I have to offer for occupying so much time. I attempt no peroration in closing my remarks on this occasion; but I do hope that some good effect may follow from something I shall give to this House, and particularly to hon. gentlemen opposite. They have denied, and they indignantly deny here, because it is not safe, I suppose, to admit it, that they have done vast injury to this country, both by their policy and by their damaging speeches. They deny that; but they will not deny that they have gloated over the fact there was an exodus—that men did leave this country at times, and they have exposed and magnified before the world every bad spot they could find, as a warning to people that if they come here they will have to stand the terrible effects of misgovernment. Well, Mr. Speaker, I find that the ex-Finance Minister (Sir Richard Cartwright) stated, in 1880:

"We know that the great and alarming emigration that prevailed from 1860 to 1870 is resuming its former proportions."

Now, that is a fitting introduction to the little lecture I would like to read in closing from the files of the Globe, written, I have no doubt, by a man whom the party opposite were once proud to follow. In the year 1868, when that paper was conducted by the Hon. George Brown, and when he was anxious to vindicate the policy of Confederation which he had done so much to consummate, his paper thus dealt with hon. gentlemen who make such speeches as hon. gentlemen opposite. It first abuses the New York papers, which alone at that time made such assertions, happily, for stating:

"That the people in what used to be called Canada, both east and west, are at present in a very impoverished condition, glad to escape by any means from their misery. There is something worse than a mistake in this. There is very gross, and we are almost uncharitable enough to say, intentional misrepresentation. * * * There is suffering and destitution in various parts of our Province, as there always will be in any community, however prosperous; but we are quite safe in saying that rarely since the country was settled has there ever been less, either in extent or degree, than at the present moment. * * * When we look at our position materially, socially, educationally, and religiously likewise, and compare it with that of many others, we have no occasion either to envy or repine. We are so often assured that our country is a poor, contemptible, God-forsaken place, that some may be almost inclined to believe that such is the fact, and to bear themselves as if begging pardon of every one they meet, for the misfortune of being in existence. There is no reason for all this. We have no wish to disparage other lands or to use harsh language about the condition of any people; but we see no reason to go to the opposite extreme, and allow, without contradiction, such representations of our country, when any one in a position to form an enlightened opinion knows that the facts are just the reverse."

And this paper indignantly denies, in 1863, that this "great and alarming emigration" has taken place. I do not wish to add anything to that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am sure, Sir, that we have all listened with pleasure to the speech of my hon. friend the member for Pictou. A few of the points he has made I shall perhaps notice in the course of my remarks to-night. The interest taken in the financial statement made annually by the Finance Minister of this Dominion is for obvious reasons increasing year by year. The importance of his statement as it relates to the interests and prosperity of the country is increasing year by year. That hon. Minister, Sir, on the present occasion, has met Parliament under circumstances perhaps less favorable and less comfortable to himself than on some previous occasions. He meets Parliament with the fact confronting him that the debt of this country is assuming alarming proportions—that it is increasing with great rapidity. He meets Parliament with the fact staring him in the face that the expenses of the country are also increasing. He tells us that the estimates for the coming year will probably reach $33,000,000, an increase of almost $20,000,000 since these Provinces were confederated in 1867. He knows that the taxation is extremely heavy, and that, owing to the depression that exists, although the rate of taxation has not been reduced, the revenue derived from taxation is considerably less than formerly. He also is unable to deny that following the stimulation which has been applied has come over-production and plethora, and that our manufactures to-day are in a stagnant position. He knows that the prospects of the great North-West, to which this country must look for expansion and growth, have been blighted by the policy this Government has adopted; he knows that the tide of immigration which set in in a stream towards that country has, it has not been turned, been reduced until the stream has become a mere dribble; and he knows that this result is due in a large measure to the operation of his fiscal policy. He knows his Government has been guilty of the incredible folly of saying to the people of the North-West that they shall not use their own money to create avenues of traffic for the transportation of their products to market; he knows that, although he met us unctious with plausibility, the case he presents to Parliament is one the reverse of pleasing to himself and the party which backs him, and in fact the conclusion at which he arrives, the one comfort he has for himself, is that matters might have been worse. He draws a comparison between the taxation of this country and the taxation of the old effete monarchies of Europe, in which great standing armies are maintained and the tax-paying capabilities of their populations strained to the utmost, in order that they may maintain an armed neutrality and congratulates himself because the taxation in Canada has not reached the sum it has in those countries. He points to the Australian colonies and their total revenue, and would lead us to suppose that their revenue is derived wholly from taxation, whereas he knows that 65 per cent. of it is derived from other sources and only 35 per cent. from taxation. His statements are all calculated to mislead the country and to give us a false sense of security, a false sense of good government and of proper management on the part of those who have in charge the financial affairs of this country. It is noticeable that the hon. gentleman does not assume the congratulatory tone which on former occasions he was wont to assume. His tone is deprecatory and apologetic, contrasting strongly with his utterances in some of his former Budget Speeches. I will call the hon. gentleman's attention to one or two brief extracts from speeches made by him on former occasions. In his Budget Speech of 1880, he used the following language:—

"I believe, Sir, there is a good time coming. I believe that the policy of this Government has inaugurated a good time, with reference to the encouragement of the industries of this country, giving a home market to our farmers for their produce, giving business for everybody, and filling up the vast territory in the North-West in preparation for the millions that will populate it in the future."

Where is the home market? We will enquire into that more fully in a few moments. Where is the market our farmers were to have for all the produce they could raise? Is the North-West filling up with millions? What is the condition of the North-West? Evidently the rosy picture drawn by the hon. gentleman in his Budget Speech in 1880 was not a prophetic picture; evidently his prognostications have not been realised. In his Budget Speech in 1881 he said:

"It is said the greatest enemy of truth is prejudice, and its greatest friend time. Time is solving this question with reference to the Tariff. The main discussion on the Tariff will be this Session. The result of another year's experience will be such that our friends opposite will be then veering their course for a moderate protective policy, in order that they may meet the desires of the country"

Well, the hon. gentleman spoke truly when he said that the greatest enemy of truth was prejudice, and its greatest friend time; he also spoke truly in saying that time would solve this question. Time is solving it, time has already nearly solved it, and the fallaciousness of the hon. gentleman's views becomes more evident as time lapses. In his Budget Speech, in 1882, the hon. gentleman said :

"I may be permitted to say, Sir, that at no time in the history of Canada has a Government met Parliament with the financial condition of the country in the position it is to-day. At no period in the history of Canada has its credit stood so high as it stands to-day. At no period in the history of Canada, possibly, was the country, generally speaking, as prosperous or more prosperous than it is to-day, and I propose, Sir, in the statement that I am about to submit to the House to establish that that prosperity is, in a great measure, dependent upon the policy of the Government, adopted by Parliament."

He might truly say to-day that at no time in the history of Canada has the Government met Parliament when the financial condition of the country was in the position in which it is now. He might say to-day with perfect truth that at no time in the history of this country has the Government met Parliament with $25,000,000 obligations shortly to fall due unsettled and unprovided for; he might well say that at no time in our history has the Government met Parliament with $13,000,000 of floating debts; he might truly say that at no time in our history has the Government met Parliament when the Government is obliged to confess that it has been compelled to resort to the expedient called, in commercial language, "shinning," on the street, in order to meet its current obligations; or borrowing at all points where it can make a temporary loan, on the promise that the loan will be refunded as soon as the credit of the Government will permit it to make a permanent loan. If we go on to consider the pledges made with reference to this National Policy, we will find that scarcely one of them has been kept. With reference to the pledges made with regard to the employment of labor, I find in the Budget Speech of 1882, made by the hon. gentleman, the following language :

"I would ask hon. gentlemen, when they are referring to this matter, what would have been our position in the Dominion of Canada if we had not adopted a policy that has enabled us to give employment to our industrial classes? They would have had to go abroad for the purpose of seeking employment. It is stated that 23,000 persons have passed over to the United States from Sarnia, but we all know that a large portion of them belong to the United States. But admitting, for argument sake, all that has been said by my hon. friend opposite, we would have had an emigration much larger than we have had had it not been for the adoption of this policy.

When was this statement made? It was made in 1882, and the very year preceding the greatest exodus had taken place from Canada that had ever taken place at any period of its history. In that year 137,000 people had left Canada for the United States, while in the last year of the Administration of Mr. Mackenzie the exodus had not reached a number exceeding 30,000, or the exodus had been more than four-fold as great in the year preceding that in which this statement was made by the hon. gentleman as the exodus in the last year of the Mackenzie Administration; yet the hon. gentleman congratulates himself upon the fact that this policy checks the flow of emigration. He congratulates himself that but for the adoption of the National Policy the emigration would have been much greater. In Heaven's name, if it had been much greater, how much greater would it have been? It would have led to the depopulation of the country. Sir Charles Tupper, in 1878, referring to the employment of labor, said :

"The policy the Government has pursued has had the effect of depopulating the country. It has sent away the most skilled and intelligent labor, the finest sons of Canada to a foreign country, to obtain employment their own country denies them."

And in the speech made in the Amphitheatre in Toronto, in July, 1878, the First Minister used the following language :—

"If you desire this country to prosper, if you desire this country to rise out of the slough of despond into which it has sunk, if you desire to see manufactures arise, if you desire to see labor employed, if you desire to see the emigration of your young men stopped, if you desire to bring those who have emigrated back to this country, if you desire to see the value of your land arise, if you desire prosperity, you will support the National Policy and say : We must have Canada for the Canadians."

Mr. TUPPER,

Well, Sir, we adopted the National Policy. Did our young men cease to leave Canada? Did those who had left Canada return? Has the value of land risen?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. CHARLTON. No, Sir, a greater number of young men have left the country since; comparatively few of those who had left have returned, and the value of farming land in Ontario and other parts of the Dominion is less to-day than it was in 1878. Everyone of these prophecies has proved false; not one of them has been verified by the result. Then we had some promises made with regard to agriculture. It was necessary, of course, when this policy was proposed, to carry it by the aid of the votes of the farmers. Unless the farmers could be persuaded to believe that there was something in this policy to their advantage, their votes could not be had; and, unless their votes were had, the policy could not be carried. One of the schemes resorted to by our hon. friends opposite in the campaign of 1878 was to endeavor to induce the farmer to believe that the Government could afford protection to him, that the agricultural interests of this country would be benefited by imposing burdens on the farmer, because it was held and announced that duties could be imposed which would benefit the farmer; he was to share in the benefits to be derived from this general scheme of taxation, and so he was made to believe that he had a share in the good results to be derived from this National Policy. I shall read one or two extracts in reference to the benefit promised to the farmer. In a speech of Sir Charles Tupper, made in the Budget debate in 1882, he says :

"It has been shown that the prices of farmers' products have been better than ever before, and the hon. gentleman opposite (the ex-Finance Minister) impaled himself on the horns of this dilemma the other night. He said you cannot improve the price of wheat because that is regulated in Mark Lane; and yet the hon. gentleman denounced the tax in bread-stuffs, including wheat, as an odious tax. I want him to establish the assertion that it is an odious tax, and that under the National Policy there is no improvement in the price of the products of the farm. Let me ask him this question: he says we have increased the farmer's burdens, and he has gone before the farmer with tears in his eyes to condemn our policy with this result: that the farmers have simply laughed at him. They have laughed at him because they knew what he had said here before, and would say here again, if in power, as he said the other night, that the laborer's burdens had been increased by the price of living—that everything he used he had to pay more for it. How can you increase the cost of everything consumed by the laborer, mainly consisting of farm products, without benefiting the farmer? It is just such questions we had put to him. We told him we would benefit all classes of industries in the country. We told him we would improve the condition of the farmer by a better home market. But the hon. gentleman could not understand. But now when the farmer laughs at him on account of his theories, he will know that the people hold that his former statements were baseless; that the farmer to-day gets more for every product, that is more for every product of the soil, than he could have got if the policy of the late Government, of making Canadians hewers of wood and drawers of water for any other country, had been carried out as he would still have carried it out."

Well, are the farmers getting more to-day in consequence of this policy? Has this policy raised the price of farm produce? Do the farmers laugh at my hon. friend to-day? Do they realise to-day that the price in grain in Mark Lane has nothing to do with the price in Canada; that the home market has established the price and is quite independent of the markets of the world? I think not. I think the laugh is on the other side of the cheek. I think they laugh at the promises which were then made; they realise how absurd and fallacious were the promises that a duty on grain could afford them any protection when we had a surplus of the article to export to other markets.

Mr. McNEILL. What is the price of oats to-day in Toronto?

Mr. CHARLTON. I will tell you in a short time. We will get to that in due order. Here is another quotation from the Budget Speech of 1880 :

"If you go to the farmer, you will find that he recognises the improvement in prices—"

Does he recognise that to-day?

"that he recognises the improvement in prices for the articles he has for export, or for home consumption in the home market. You may go to our shipping interests, and you will find that during the last five or six months everyone has a more hopeful feeling than they had before. Take the lumber interests of the Ottawa valley and other parts of the Dominion, and mark the change. You will find every man who is engaged in that business in the city of Ottawa, in the west, or down east, doing double work, making sales ahead, and with a different, a more buoyant spirit, than he had twelve months ago."

What is the state of the shipping interest to-day? Is there a more hopeful feeling for the future? What is the state of the lumber interest? Are the lumbermen of Ottawa and of the west and of the east working double time and making sales far ahead? There is a vast accumulation of lumber in the yards at Ottawa, and none of it is sold yet; gloom and despondency prevail in the lumber markets, the shipping interest is low, not a single promise made by the hon. gentleman in regard to any industry in the country has been realised. Then we had some promises made by the leader of the Government himself. Sir John Macdonald, in 1878, is reported in Hansard as saying:

"We say the present tariff is inartistic, unscientific, deficient in some parts; that it helps to depress and crush our manufacturing interests, to allow an undue and improper interference with our agricultural products in our own markets, and that there ought to be a readjustment in a scientific sense. I believe the tariff could be so readjusted that unless the future necessities of this country required additional revenue and an increase of duties for revenue purposes, we can give more protection to our agricultural interests, we can give an encouragement to our manufacturers, not only to enable them to maintain this present position, but to relieve them from the existing depression and give them an opportunity for development, and, at the same time, the whole amount of pressure and volume of taxation would not, on the whole, be increased to the people. That is the doctrine we have always held."

Well, we have had, since this unscientific tariff passed away, a scientific tariff introduced, I suppose, and our hon. friends opposite will earn the cognomen of the tariff-tinker in another Session, I believe. There has not been a Session since this tariff was adopted when the Finance Minister has not come to this House with numerous and important changes. It is an inchoate, incomplete arrangement, constantly requiring tinkering, constantly requiring change, and failing at all times since it was adopted, as it fails to-day, to meet the wishes or satisfy the expectations of the country.

And, with regard to the promises made by the right hon. gentleman, that the burden of taxation should not be increased but that there should be merely a readjustment of duties, a readjustment of burdens in such a way as to afford all the benefits a truly scientific tariff was capable of affording to the country—have these promises been kept? Has there been no increase in the taxation? In 1878 the taxation from Customs was in round numbers twelve and three-quarter millions, or $15.60 per family of five. The taxation from Customs in 1883 was twenty-three millions, a taxation of $25.70 per family; and in 1884 it was twenty millions, or $24.24 per family, in place of $15.60, under the administration of affairs by the ex-Finance Minister—a very large increase indeed.

Mr. HESSON. Are you adding deficits?

Mr. CHARLTON. We will refer to deficits in good time. I am afraid that, in two or three years to come, we shall allude to very alarming deficits. Well, we have had the benefit of a tariff which was not to raise the taxation of the country, which was to be readjusted without increasing the burdens, a tariff which, however, increased the burden of taxation under Customs from $15.60, in 1878, to $25.70, in 1883. We have had a tariff which was to afford the farmers of this country protection, and the very utmost claim the hon. gentleman has ever made with regard to the benefit the farmers derived from that tariff was made two Sessions ago, that possibly the farmers were receiving 3 cents per bushel more for wheat than they would if there had been no duties.

That is the very utmost advantage that they ever claimed from the operations of the grain duties. Now, Sir, I have had occasion to compare American and Canadian quotations repeatedly, in addressing audiences in various parts of this country; I have made those comparisons every year, and at every portion of the year, and I have never found one instance where the relative quotations in the two countries would lead to the supposition that the imposition of duties upon grain had conferred one iota of advantage upon the farmers of Canada, and I defy any man in this House of Commons to point to any day in the history of Canada since this tariff was passed, in 1879, when the grain duties have conferred any advantage upon the producer of grain in this country. What is the condition of things to-day? If the hon. gentleman will take the market quotations he will find to-day that No. 1 spring wheat, worth 82 cents in Toronto, is worth 91 cents in Buffalo, which is the corresponding market, about the same distance from the sea; and yet in Buffalo No. 1 wheat is worth 9 cents more than in Toronto. It does not require a duty of 15 per cent. to prevent the importation of 91-cent wheat from Buffalo selling at 82 cents in Toronto. To-day No. 2 spring wheat is worth 80 cents in Toronto and 88 cents in Buffalo, and 74½ cents in Chicago. Will the 8 cents difference between the two points pay for transportation. Is there danger of slaughtering the Toronto markets where wheat is worth 82 cents with wheat bought in Chicago at 74½ cents? To-day oats are worth 37 cents in Toronto and now the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McNeill) will have his question answered) for 34 pounds; while right across the lake, at either Oswego or Buffalo, 32 pounds of oats are worth 36 cents or oats are worth 1 cent and a fraction per bushel more in Oswego than in Toronto. It requires no duty upon oats to keep 32 pounds of oats worth 36 cents a bushel in Buffalo, from being sold at 37 cents for 34 pounds in Toronto. To-day barley is worth 68 cents in Toronto and 84 cents right across the lake at Oswego, and that great difference has always existed in the price of barley at the two points. What is the use of a duty upon barley if the price in the American market is 14 or 15 cents higher than it is here? To-day rye is worth 59 cents in Toronto and 65 in Oswego in bond, without the duties paid. To-day peas are worth 61 cents in Toronto and 75 in Oswego. To-day creamery butter is worth 24 to 35 cents in New York city and 18 to 21 cents in Montreal, and so through the whole list. As to agricultural productions, it will be found, upon comparison, that never yet since 1879 has the imposition of grain duties conferred upon the farmers of this country any advantage whatever. Now, Sir, a few words with regard to the home market. I find that in 1879 the hon. Finance Minister, in his Budget Speech, used the following language:

"Or whether we will inaugurate a policy that will, by its provisions, say to the industries of the country: We will give you sufficient protection; we will give you a market for what you can produce."

That was the promise of a home market. Now I would like to call attention to the manner in which that promise has been fulfilled. I would like to point out to the hon. gentleman the great diminution that has taken place in the exports of the food products of this country, and how very nearly we have come to affording the farmers of the country a home market under the operations of the National Policy:

Total exports, exclusive of bullion and estimated short returns—
1874 to 1878.....	$342,884,504
Average per annum.....	$ 68,576,900
1879 to 1883.....	385,435,566
Average per annum.....	7,707,113
Each period 5 years.
Total excess, second period over first period	42,551,062
Average annual excess " " " "	8,510,212

That is the total exports, and as we come to the food exports we will find that a greater balance exists in favor of Canada. If we take the exports of animals and their produce, and of the agricultural products, the produce of Canada, we find the following figures:

1874 to 1878.....	$159,824,099
Average per annum.....		$31,964,819
1879 to 1883.....	$210,852,852
Average per annum.....		42,190,570
Total excess, second period over first.....		51,028,753
Average annual excess.....		10,205,750

We find, if we examine the exports of 1874, that they amounted to $77,000,000 and that sum exceeds the annual average of 1874 to 1878 by $8,500,000. Now, Sir, if we want to arrive at an exact condition of things, it requires a careful computation as to the nature of the exports, because our returns before the inauguration of the National Policy, with regard to the exports of grain, were kept in a loose manner. Grain was imported in immense quantities, all entered for consumption; it might be consumed or it might pass through the country, and the only way to arrive at the net export was to take the total exportation from the country and deduct from that the total importation into the country, and then you had the annual export. I have taken pains to compile a table upon that basis, to arrive at the actual net export over a period extending from 1874 to 1884. I find that the net exports of the cereals of malt, hay, grain, green fruit, potatoes, exports of animals and their product, the products of Canada, were as follows, and that statement also includes the exports of fisheries:—

1874 to 1878, 5 years.....	$147,958,000
Annual average.....	29,591,600
1879 to 1884, 6 years.....	268,143,000
Annual average.....	44,690,500
Average annual excess second period over first.....	15,098,900

Now, Sir, the National Policy was to create a home market, was to absorb the whole of the productions of the soil of Canada, but under the operations of the National Policy we have approached the realisation of that promise by receding from it, and by increasing the export of food from this country to an extent of $15,000,000. What is the promise of the hon. gentleman with regard to home market? It is a fallacy, Sir. The exportation of the food products of this country has constantly increased under this tariff. It is greater to-day than it was then, but that increase is due to a good harvest, and due to a foreign demand, and these have been the causes of the prosperity which has been falsely attributed to the operation of the National Policy itself. Well, there were great promises made. There were promises made by the father of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) who spoke last, with regard to the potency of this policy as regards the securing of a reciprocity treaty with the United States.

The National Policy was to procure reciprocity for us, and I will read what the hon. gentleman said with reference to that point in 1877:

"Whether you look at it, Sir, in relation to revenue; whether you look at it as a means of getting a reciprocity treaty; whether you look at it as a means of giving a just, fair and legitimate protection to the great manufacturing industries of, and to the great agricultural interests of this country; look at it from what point you may, a policy the very reverse of that which is pursued by this country is demanded by the interests of Canada."

Yes, it was to give a reciprocity treaty. In 1879 the same gentleman used the following language:—

"I believe within two years of the adoption of the National Policy—not a policy of hostility to the United States, but one of following the system they had adopted to foster their industries—they will give us a free market for coal in the United States."

Yes, it was to give us free coal. And again, on same page, he says:

"When they wipe out the duties altogether we will admit their products free. At no distant day we shall enjoy all the advantage we possessed under the Reciprocity Treaty."

This was to be the effect that the National Policy was to produce. It was to give us reciprocity, free trade in coal free admission for the natural products of Canada. What is the present status of this question? Are we any nearer reciprocity under the operation of this policy than we were before? In fact, did the Government that promised that this policy would procure reciprocity for us show any desire to secure reciprocity from the United States? Would they lift their hands to secure it? Have they not refused to make any overtures, refused to make any effort to secure reciprocal trade with the United States? Has not the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) told us that we do not require reciprocal trade; that unless we can obtain a reciprocity treaty confined to the natural products of the soil, Canada does not require such a treaty, and does not and would not accept it. We know that it is hopeless to expect to obtain a reciprocity treaty like the last one. We know that if we procure from the American Government free admission of the products of the soil, forest and mine, we have to give them something in the shape of reciprocity. We must, if we obtain reciprocal trade with the United States, admit some articles they want to sell, if they admit what we want to sell to them. This party, who promised that the result of the National Policy was to be reciprocal trade with the United States, would not accept reciprocity on fair, equitable and just terms—such terms as we might obtain. They have pronounced against it, and the people of Canada—the farmer, the lumberman, the fisherman—may understand that this Government stands distinctly pledged, not only to refuse to make any overtures to the American Government, but pledged to reject any such reciprocity treaty as is obtainable and is a fair treaty. So much for the status of the reciprocity question at the present time. We have latterly had a change of Administration at Washington. Since the 4th of this month, for the first time during over a quarter of a century, a Democratic President is in office. There is a large majority of Democrats in the House of Representatives. That party will very shortly control the United States Senate. That party has gone into power upon the issue that the absurd trade restriction of the United States should be modified. They are a party pledged to a revision of the tariff and a reduction of the duties. They are a party who would naturally entertain favorably a proposition made by this country with respect to reciprocal trade. Already the Republic of Mexico has negotiated a reciprocity treaty with that country. The Sandwich Islands have done so likewise; and a reciprocity treaty with the Spanish West Indian Islands, is under consideration. The time is propitious. We have every reason to believe that if we approached the American Government with respect to this matter, and sought to obtain a modification of those absurd commercial restrictions that exists between the two countries, the American Government would listen to those proposals favorably. Are the Government prepared to make those propositions, are they prepared to attempt to give to the country the realisation of that boon which they pledged the country would be secured as a consequence of the adoption of the National Policy in 1878?

And then we had some pledges with reference to the exodus. I have referred to the question before. I find in a speech made by the leader of the Government at Toronto, on 30th July, 1878, the hon. gentleman used the following language:

"Is not our population leaving this country? (Cries of yes.) Are not our young men actually going to the United States? (Cries of yes.) Oh, yes; it is said, make this a cheap country to live in. Gentlemen, this will be a cheap country to live in when property becomes valueless—when you can buy land next to nothing—when a man finds himself poorer every year, in consequence of the shrinkage in the value of his property."

I might ask to-night, is not our population leaving the country? Can any man truthfully fail to answer, yes? I might ask, are not our young men actually going to the United States? Who could answer, no? I might remind the people of the country that they are growing poorer every year through the shrinkage of the values of the various properties. Farms can be bought in any part of Ontario cheaper than they could be purchased six years ago.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. CHARLTON. I say the constant tendency has been towards a decline in prices. I speak of what I know. I affirm what I know to be true. An hon. gentleman who is conversant with these matters says there has been a decline of at least 25 per cent., and I believe that estimate to be correct. In fact, you can scarcely place a value on farms, because they are almost unsaleable. In July, 1878, the same hon. gentleman used the following language:—

“Was it not a crying shame that though this country had a fertile soil, a healthy climate, a strong and well educated people and good laws, 500,000 of our own people should have crossed our borders in a few years and taken up their abode in the United States, because they could not find employment here for their skill, energy and enterprise, in consequence of the false policy of our rulers.”

We have as fertile a soil to-day as we had then; we have a good climate; we have a strong and well educated people; we have fairly good laws, although perhaps not so good as they were then; and yet emigration has not been checked. If there were 500,000 native Canadians in the United States, then there are 1,000,000 in the States now. The policy of the hon. gentleman has been totally inoperative, so far as checking this exodus is concerned. I find that Sir Charles Tupper, in a speech delivered in this House, in 1878, used the following language:—

“Sir, the people are willing to be frugal and to work hard, but they ask for a policy from the administration which does not compel them to expatriate themselves in order to get an opportunity of working hard. The hon. gentleman's policy is to send them to Boston, New York and Baltimore, the places which he has made the commercial capitals of Canada.”

If that was the policy then, the policy since only varies in this, that it sends them not to Boston, Baltimore and New York, but to Michigan, Minnesota, Dakota and the western States. With respect to this exodus, with respect to the question as to whether the promises made in regard to the National Policy have been in any degree fulfilled, with respect to the question as to whether the exodus of Canadians from the Dominion to the United States has been checked or lessened in any degree through the operation of the National Policy, as compared with the period of the Mackenzie Administration, I wish to quote some figures. They will be denied. Every statement made by the hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald), in Toronto, was based upon American statistics, and the statements made in this House, lamenting the exodus of Canadians, were statements made on American statistics, statistics which I have in my hand, which are denied to-day, and they were statistics which at that time were accepted as correct; and strictures on the conduct and policy of the Government were based on the accuracy of those statistics. Now, Sir, what are the returns of the American Bureau of Statistics with regard to the emigration from Canada? My hon. friend from Cardwell (Mr. White) laughs in a sneering manner. I think I shall have occasion shortly to refer to the manner in which that hon. gentleman quoted school statistics. According to the American Bureau the emigration from Canada to the United States for the period from 1874 to 1878 was 127,000. This, Sir, is the exodus which was lamented by hon. gentleman opposite; it is the exodus which was to be corrected, which was to be stopped by the operation of the National Policy. Let us see how effective that policy has been in stopping it. The emigration from Canada to the United States, from 1879 to 1884, six years inclusive, has been 490,000 against 127,000 in the five preceding years. Now, I shall take occasion to show in a few moments that in all probability these statistics are reasonably accurate. That shows that under the operation of the National Policy 314,000 more Canadian emigrated to the United States in those six years than emigrated to the United States under the Government of Mr. Mackenzie in the five preceding years. They show that the emigration to the United States from this country was two and a-half times greater per annum under the operation of the National Policy than it was before. I ask is it possible that so stupendous a blunder was made in reference to those statistics, as to show that this emigration is no greater than under the operation of the previous tariff? Now, with regard to the accuracy of these statistics, if we test them by the American census returns—if we take the return of native Canadians in the United States in 1870, we find them to be 498,000; and assuming that to be correct, if we take the return of native Canadians in the United States in 1880, we find them to be 717,000. If we take these statistics year by year, and allow a death rate of two in every thousand for the initial population, and one in every thousand for the emigrant population in every year, and work it out on that basis, as I have worked it out, we will find that the result is surprisingly near to the returns made by the Bureau of Statistics. I find, assuming it on that basis, and taking the population of the United States as shown by the census returns of 1870, and adding to that population year by year the emigration from this country, as reported in these returns, striking off two per thousand as the annual death rate for those in the United States, and one per thousand for those going in, we will find that in 1880 the population, as shown by the census returns of the United States, agrees with these statistics within some seven or eight thousand. That is what you will find, and I say it is impossible that any great mistake with reference to those statistics can have existed. Then if you take the school returns you will find that the school population has decreased. The other day my hon. friend at my right (Sir Richard Cartwright), quoted certain school returns, and the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), quoted certain other school returns. Well, there are two kinds. There is one return made by the assessors, which is very inaccurate, and naturally this was the kind which my hon. friend from Cardwell (Mr. White) took. There is another return made from the school registers, which is strictly accurate, and that is the return which my hon. friend to my right (Sir Richard Cartwright) took, and naturally they arrived at different conclusions, one from the inaccurate bungling and false returns, and the other from the strictly accurate and reliable returns. So much for the exodus question. I do not suppose my hon. friend from Cardwell (Mr. White) knew the character of the statistics he was quoting, for I am quite sure he would not have attempted to mislead the House, only that he did not know what he was doing.

Mr. IVES. Are these officers Ontario officers?

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes; the assessors.

Mr. IVES. They are from a foreigner.

Mr. CHARLTON. I stated that the assessors' returns were the ones used by the hon. gentleman opposite, and which were inaccurate, while the register of the school population, in which the attendance is given from day to day, was the one used by my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright), and that they were accurate and reliable.

A word now with reference to the balance of trade. I really hope that I may have the attention of the Finance Minister with reference to this matter. I want to discuss it for a moment, and I want to call his attention to it, as I am sure it will be of great interest to him and perhaps it may lead him to take a different view of the matter from what he has hitherto taken. I find that in the Budget Speech of 1879, the hon. gentleman is reported in Hansard, page 413, in the following language:—

“There are other difficulties; the volume of imports has not much diminished. Regarding the matter, as I do, I think it is to be regretted that the value of imports have not been materially reduced. I look upon the large imports ever since the Dominion was organised, showing a large balance of trade against it, as one of the causes of the trouble with which we have to contend."

On the next page he says :

"By the last returns I have which cover the year 1877, the balance of trade against her (England) is shown to be £140,000,000 or $700,000,000 per year. The balance of trade against the United States in 1872 was $116,000,000, in 1873 it was reduced to $66,000,000, but the last calendar year shows that balance in favor of the United States had reached $300,000,000 a year. I think then * * * that the prosperity of the one country at this moment is caused in a great measure by the large surplus in its favor and the depression in the other by the large deficiency. Under these circumstances it appears to me we should turn our attention to the best means of reducing our imports from all parts of the world."

Is that accurate, Mr. Speaker? Does the hon. gentleman still hold to these doctrines, that a balance of trade against a country is an indication of poverty, that a balance of trade in favor of a country is an indication of wealth, and that it should be the object of statesmen to reduce the imports—reduce the volume of trade. Does the hon. gentleman still hold by the language to which he gave utterance in 1879, with regard to the balance of trade against England, to which he refers the amount is £140,000,000. Let us look for a moment at the question of the trade balance against England. For the last thirty years, at least, an annual balance of trade has existed against England of an enormous amount; for the last twenty years it has averaged about five hundred millions of dollars a year. Now, if the theory of the hon. gentleman is correct, if a balance of trade against a country means that the country is being impoverished, then long ago England should have reached a state of bankruptcy, where she would have ceased to trade at all. I find that in the ten years, from 1873 to 1882, inclusive, the balance of trade against England was £1,074,851,000, sterling, or an average annual balance of £107,485,000 sterling, or over $500,000,000 a year. But, Sir, when we come to analyse this question and examine into the condition of English trade, and see why it is that this large balance exists against that country, we will find that 11 per cent. should be added to the exports of England to cover the freight earned by her vessels in carrying her exports to foreign ports; that 11 per cent. should be deducted from the value of the imports to make up for the charges and earnings of the vessels which bring the imports into the English markets. The earnings of her vessels out and in comprise 11 per cent of the imports and 11 per cent. of the exports, and if we look at the matter in that light, in the ten years during which £3,857,917,000 sterling were brought into that country and £2,783,805,000 taken out—during those ten years England had to her credit £424,000,000 sterling as the earnings or freights on her imports, and £306,218,000 sterling as her earnings for freight on the exports, and that is to be deducted from the nominal balance against her. Then, England is receiving every year £56,000,000 sterling in interest from her investments in other countries, and that amounts to £560,000,000 in ten years. Add these three items together, and they amount to £1,290,588,000 to be deducted from the nominal balance of trade against England of £1,074,000,000. In addition to this, England has her direct profits from trade. Her commercial houses have their agencies in Africa, South America, China and other countries. Their cargoes are shipped from England and sent to their factors and traded for the natural products of these countries; often the same cargo discharged and returned represents a difference of twofold in value. So that the whole theory of the hon. gentleman with regard to an adverse balance of trade impoverishing a country, is an utter, an absolute fallacy. If we take the exports of gold from England into account, as the hon. gentleman stated, England would be exporting gold to pay the balances against her; and yet, since 1861, England has had a balance of gold against her only in two years.

Mr. CHARLTON.

From 1861 to 1878 her imports of gold exceeded her exports by £92,630,000. In 1861 and 1872, when the export of gold exceeded the imports, the balance of gold against her was only £2,066,000 and £728,000 respectively, a total of £2,794,000. The excess of imports over exports indicates the wealth of a country, but the excess of exports over imports indicates its indebtedness. Some of the richest countries in the world, Germany, Belgium, Sweden, Holland and Norway, have every year nominally large balances of trade against them. If we examine the case of the United States, we shall find that the favorable balance of trade there is nominal rather than real. It is probably made up in this way. The duties in that country are excessive, and a large amount of smuggling is engaged in, which, of course, reduces the favorable balances of trade to whatever extent it may be indulged in. Then there is said to be a systematic system of under-valuation by importers. Occasionally suits are brought by the Government for the recovery of hundreds of thousands, in some instances, millions of dollars of duty, in consequence of undervaluation and false invoices. If we take these two items, smuggling and undervaluation, I have no doubt they will very largely wipe out the balance of trade that exists in favor of the United States. We will find also that during the eight years that the balance of trade is said to have existed in favor of that country, in only two years has there been a balance of specie in favor of the country, while in six years a large amount of specie has been withdrawn to pay actual balances of trade against the country, although nominally the Custom houses showed a large balance of trade in its favor. I find, Sir, that the hon. gentleman also, in his Budget Speech of 1881, used the following language with regard to trade in this country:—

"Last year the excess of exports over imports was $1,451,711—the first instance of the kind in the history of Canada. This is due to two causes. First, because we increased the value of raw material by manufactures by $6,000,000, which diminished the value of the imports by the same sum. Then we increased the exports, due partly, I admit, to a bountiful harvest, for which we have great reason to be thankful."

Well, the hon. gentleman felicitated himself at that time that we were to have a favorable balance of trade, but it does not seem that we have done so. I find that from 1875 to 1879 the total balance of trade against Canada was $105,111,079; and from 1880 to 1884, under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, the total balance of trade against the country was $82,059,370, a difference in favor of the latter period of $23,051,706. The year 1875 was an exceptional year; the balance of trade against Canada at that time was a very heavy one; and if we take the four last years of the Mackenzie Administration and the four last years of this Administration, we shall find, that in the former period the balance of trade was $59,927,772, and in the latter period, $83,481,079, or an excess in favor of the former period against the latter of $23,553,307. Then, if we take the last two years of each Administration we shall find that in 1878 and 1879 the total balance of trade was $24,231,293, and in 1883 and 1884 $59,158,765, or an excess of $24,927,473 in favor of the former against the latter period. So much, Sir, for the question of the balance of trade. I think I have shown to the satisfaction of the House that the hon. gentleman's views on this question are not in accordance with sound political economy. I think I have shown also that even if it were an advantage to Canada to lessen the adverse balance of trade, the hon. gentleman has not been successful in that respect, for it has been much heavier in the four last years under his Administration than in the four last years of the Mackenzie Administration.

Now, one word with regard to the coal duties. The hon. gentleman, in his speech the other night, used the following language:—

"I will not undertake to say that it may not be proved, to some extent, that in some cases the duties are paid by the party selling the coal I am not going to take any doubtful ground. I will admit, for the sake of argument, that the people pay every cent of the duty."

Well, I suppose he will admit that for the sake of argument, because the argument is so overpowering that he cannot deny it. But he used different language with reference to this matter once. I recollect that in 1882 I heard the hon. gentleman make the following statement:—

"On the subject of coal I know there has been a good deal said, but my enquiries have led me to the conclusion that while we receive a very considerable sum from coal imported from the United States, and consumed in Ontario, one-half of that sum is paid by the coal producers in the United States. That is my conviction, and we have evidence of it."

Now, I would like to call the attention of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) to what Sir Charles Tupper said on the same matter; and I recollect, as distinctly as if it had been yesterday, the look of admiration that was on the face of the Finance Minister when he looked up and listened to this statement, very much as one boy would look at another who could climb a tree higher than he could. Sir Charles said:

"I defy any man who will approach this subject in a fair and candid spirit to arrive at any other conclusion than that the coal tax is not paid by the people of Ontario, though paid in Ontario. I venture to state, and have sufficient grounds for the statement, that the imposition of the coal duty has not cost the people of Canada one farthing, either in Ontario or out of it. * * * It is on this point I slightly differ from my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, who seems to think that perhaps half of the duty might be paid in the United States and half in Ontario."

Well, Sir, it is said to-day, on the admission of the Finance Minister, that it is a doubtful question, and he admits, for the sake of argument, because the argument is so strong that he cannot deny it, that the duty is paid by the consumer in Canada. Now I come to the question of taxation, as dealt with by the hon. gentleman, and he has certainly a very ingenious way of dealing with questions of this kind. He is able to manipulate figures with an ability which may fairly be said to stand unrivalled in its particular line and way. He sets out with the purpose of making a comparison between the two periods of taxation—the period of five years under the administration of Mr. Mackenzie, and the period of five years under his own administration. In taking the first period, he adds the deficit to the taxation. Well, Sir, the people did not pay the deficit; the people paid in taxation the amount derived from Customs and Excise. He then comes to the second period, and in as much as he had taken from the people $20,000,000 more than he could spend in ordinary expenditure, he coolly deducts that amount from the taxation. He says: True, you paid that money, but we did not spend it in ordinary expenditure; we got rid of it in some other way; therefore, I will score it off as if not paid by you and will not consider it a tax at all. By adding on the one hand the deficit, and subtracting on the other the unnecessary taxation which he levied, he gets his figures into a shape that enables him to draw the comparison he desires to draw. I propose to adopt a different method. I propose to adopt the honest way of dealing with the question; I propose to take the actual taxation in the one period and the actual taxation in the other, and on that proper and just basis to draw a comparison between the two. It is true there was a deficit under the administration of my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie), amounting to some four and three-quarter million dollars, but it is also true that he paid into the Sinking Fund out of the revenue of the country a sum of money amounting to $4,190,000; and if you deduct the sinking fund from the revenue you have an allowance for the deficit which places the Government in nearly the position in which it would have been had no deficit existed. The actual sum derived from Customs, Excise and bill stamps, from the 1st of July, 1874, to the 1st of July, 1879, was $93,295,770, and if you take the mean population for that period, upon the basis taken by my hon. friend opposite—and his basis is too high—the taxation for that period amounts to an annual average per capita of $4.64 under the administration of my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie). Now we will take the taxation while the hon. gentlemen opposite have been at the head of affairs. The taxation from 1st July, 1879, to 1st July, 1884, derived from Customs and Excise, amounted to $124,723,658, or upon the mean population, estimating the population upon the basis assumed by my hon. friend, which is too high, it gave an average annual taxation per capita of $5.71, being $1.07 higher per head, under the hon. gentleman's administration than under the administration of Mr. Mackenzie. I challenge the hon. gentleman to controvert these figures—$4.64 per capita under Mr. Mackenzie, $5.71 under the hon. gentleman; or a taxation of 23 per cent. higher under his management than under that of the late Finance Minister (Sir Richard Cartwright), and an increase of 23 per cent. in taxation against an increase of population of only 9 per cent.

If we are to estimate the burdens resting upon the people from taxation, it is proper that we should estimate them only in reference to Customs duties, because the Excise duty is a voluntary tax. A man may pay the Excise duty or refrain from paying it as he chooses. He may drink or smoke and pay the duty, or he may, like an honest Christian gentleman, refrain from both these habits and not pay it; but the Customs duty is a tax no man can escape; it is a tax upon the necessaries of life. Every man must contribute to the Customs; no man need contribute to the Excise. Consequently, the Customs duties are the true and proper measure of the taxation imposed upon the people. We will, therefore, make an examination of the question, on the basis of the Customs duties collected under the two Administrations. I find that from 1st July, 1874, to 1st July, 1879, the total sum collected from Customs duties was $66,405,321, or an average annual tax per capita of $3.32, taking the basis of population assumed to be correct by my hon. friend opposite. From 1st July, 1879, to 1st July, 1884, also a period of five years, the Customs duties amounted to $97,092,477, or an annual average taxation per capita of $4.52 under my hon. friend opposite, against $3.33 under the late Finance Minister (Sir Richard Cartwright). This shows an increase of taxation derived from Customs duties of $1.20 under the administration of the present Government as compared with the revenue from Customs taken from the people of Canada by my hon. friend, Mr. Mackenzie, or an increase of 36 per cent. against an increase of population of 9 per cent—a taxation increase nearly four-fold greater than that in population and in the ability of the people of Canada to pay taxes. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say, "hear, hear," but these figures are incontrovertible. They present to you an exact statement of the case; they show precisely the relative burdens imposed by the two Governments; they are open to criticism, and criticism is challenged. We will take the last two years under each Administration for comparison, the years 1878 and 1879 and the years 1883 and 1884. In 1878-79, the Customs duties amounted to $25,683,483, an average per head of $3.09 on an estimated mean population of 4,150,000 people as made by the hon. gentleman opposite. In 1883-84 the Customs taxation amounted to $43,033,472, an annual average per head of $4.78, against $3.09, an increase of $1.69 in taxation per head under this Administration. Now allusion has been made to-night to my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) as a mixer and muddler of figures, as an incompetent Finance Minister, as a Finance Minister whose record was not a creditable one, whose record would not compare favorably with that of the hon. gentleman, the Finance Minister (Sir Leonard Tilley). I hear a response upon the other side. Hon. gentlemen opposite say "hear, hear." I wish that this country had been blessed with the services of a gentleman as capable of grappling with the difficulties of its position as the hon. gentleman on my right (Sir Richard Cartwright); I wish that during the last six years the finances of this country had been administered with that prudence, sagacity and economy that characterised the administration of my hon. friend.

What is his record? It is said he had deficits. He had. And why? Because that hon. gentleman took the position, the sound, economic position, that in a period of depression the revenues derived from Customs duties were not a fair indication or a fair measure of the volume of revenue that would be derived from them under ordinary circumstances. He took the position that though the expense was slightly in excess of the revenue derived from Customs, the deficit would be obliterated when good times returned, by an increase in the revenue the Government would receive under the tariff, without any change whatever. Was his basis a sound one? Did he, in taking that, take a position which the result was not likely to prove correct? Let us see. We have no means of telling, so far as our own experience is concerned, because our own tariff was changed just at the time the depression was passing away but we have an opportunity of establishing a comparison by referring to the United States, which were effected by the same causes, which labored under depression when we labored under depression, and experienced the return of prosperity when prosperity returned to us, and where the Customs tariff was not changed from 1860 to 1882. The tariff of the United States remained the same during the period of depression, and when good times returned, and if, from the returns of that tariff, we find there was a large increase of revenue in 1880 and in 1881, as compared with 1879 and 1878, we may reasonably suppose that a corresponding increase of revenue would have characterised that time in Canada if no change had been made in our tariff. What was the result in the United States? The revenue from Customs in 1879 was $137,250,000. No change was made in the tariff, but the revenue from Customs in the following year was $186,522,000, in the following year it was $198,159,000, and in the following year, $220,410,000; in other words, the revenue of the United States increased, from 1879 to 1880, $49,272,000, or 34 per cent., and it increased in the two years, from 1879 to 1881, $60,909,000, or 44 per cent. A corresponding increase in the revenue of Canada, without a change of any character whatever in the tariff, would have been, from 1879 to 1880, $4,386,000, and from 1879 to 1881, $5,676,000. My honorable friend was right; the experience of the United States proves that the change in times, the return of prosperity in that country led to an increase of 34 per cent. from 1879 to 1880, and of 44 per cent. from 1879 to 1881; and, even if one-half of that ratio had been secured in this country, through the return of good times, the deficits which troubled my honorable friend would have passed away if he had remained in office and he would have had a surplus under the tariff of 1876, without a change of any kind whatever.

I now come to the consideration of some comparisons made by my hon. friend the Finance Minister, between this country and the United States. I wish I could arrive at the same conclusions as the hon. gentleman did.

Mr. RYKERT. No you don't.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, I do. I wish I could arrive at the conclusion that we were as lightly taxed a country as that; I wish I could believe that our financial position is a prosperous one. I know my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) says I do not wish it. He has no right to attribute to me any such wish. If I feel it my duty to expose the recklessness of this Government, if I feel it my duty to show that this Government is rushing this country to ruin, if I feel it my duty to sound the note of alarm, no man in this House has a right to say I rejoice because our position is not as favorable as that of the country to the south of us. It is my duty to show where we are going, to show the recklessness of this Government, to show how inordinately

Mr. CHARLTON.

our expenditure has been increased, to show to what alarming proportions the public debt is swelling, to show what dangers impend over this country and threaten it, and it is the duty of hon. gentlemen opposite to hear these statements, to examine them, and to make up their minds whether these statements are true or not; and, if they are true, it is the duty of every independent member of this House of Commons to check that Government and to see if the course which is being followed and which is likely to result in the ruin of this country cannot be stopped. Now, with regard to the comparisons made by my hon. friend, he first of all makes a comparison of expenditure, a comparison on averages; he speaks of the State taxes, too; he tells us that the State taxes amount to $1.20 per head in the United States. The hon. gentleman is slightly in error there, his basis of calculation upon population is too low. He estimates the population of the United States at 54,000,000. It is estimated by their own statisticians at 57,500,000. If we take 56,000,000 it is certainly below the mark. The State taxation last year amounted to $61,434,095, which would be about $1.09 per head, but a large amount of that taxation is expended for purposes for which we raise municipal taxes, and, if we take out of question the subsidies in Canada, which last year amounted to $3,603,714, and which would, in proportion, amount to $46,848,000 in the United States, they will offset the State taxation in the United States. The hon. gentleman goes on to make a comparison between the two countries as to expenditure, and first of all he places the population too low. Then—I do not know whether he was aware of it or not—he included in the taxation of the United States a sum of seven and one-half millions which does not figure in the taxation of the country. He takes the bank tax, he takes consular fees, he takes patent fees, he takes fees of all kinds, and these items amount to $7,432,333, and he informs the House of Commons that this a part of the taxation of the United States. It is not, Mr. Speaker. He places the taxation nearly eight millions too high and he places the population nearly three millions too low, and he strikes his balance on that basis and makes the taxation of the United States $4.93½. It is not a cent over $4.60. He makes it 33½ cents too high, at least. He starts on that basis. Then he goes on to make a statement with regard to the debt. He states the debt of the United States correctly. I believe he did not inform the House what our debt was. If he did I have forgotten. I will take the pains to supply the omission. On the 30th June last the gross debt of Canada was $242,482,416; and the net debt $182,161,850. On the 31st December the gross debt was $253,739,146, and the net debt $183,914,885. The net debt in six months had increased $8,753,035. On the 31st January the gross debt was $255,966,416, the net debt was $192,123,080. The net debt had increased in one month $3,208,195, and the hon. gentleman admitted that subsequent to that date, the 31st January, the debt had still further increased by at least two millions more. If that is true, the net debt at the time the admission was made—I do not know what it may be now—was $194,123,000, or a charge per capita, if we estimate the mean population of the year at 4,500,000, which is high enough, of $43.13 for every man, woman and child in the Dominion of Canada. But that is not all. We have nominal assets of $63,843,336. These are deducted from the gross debt, and the balance is assumed to be the net debt. Will the Finance Minister assure us that he can realise upon these assets of sixty-three millions without a shrinkage of thirty millions? If he will assure us, I would like to have the assurance that the nominal assets of the Dominion of Canada would realise to-morrow $33,000,000. I do not believe they would. I believe we are entitled to add thirty million more to the net debt stated by the Government for the shrinkage in realising upon the assets. If that is the case, our net debt to-day has reached the enormous amount of $224,123,000, a charge of $49.80 per head if our population is 4,500,000, or $48.72 if it is 4,600,000, as I believe the hon. gentleman asserts it is. We will compare that state of the case with the debt of the United States. The hon. gentleman made the comparison. It is my duty to correct statements which I believe are not warranted by the facts. On the 1st November last the debt of the United States was $1,403,482,948, which, on a population of 56,000,000, is $25.15 per capita, against at least $48.72 in Canada, if our assets would shrink thirty millions in realising. He says we ought to add the State debts, as we have nothing corresponding to them in Canada. We will add them. The State debts amounted last year to $237,511,758 funded debt, and $30,250,317 unfunded debt. We will add these sums and we have $1,676,245,023 as the total debt of the United States State debt and National debt. Well, what does that amount to per capita on a population of 50,000,000? It amounts to $29.93 per head. If we take the State debt and National debt of the United States and make a comparison of the per capita charge between the two countries, we will find that even upon that basis the debt of Canada exceeds the debt of the United States by $18 per head, which is the position of the country to-day. And how has this debt been incurred? What has the Government to show for their debt?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Full value.

Mr. CHARLTON. Public works, paying one fifteenth of 1 per cent.; thirty or forty millions sunk in the Canadian Pacific Railway; assets comparatively valueless; forty millions in the Intercolonial Railway, that we will ultimately have to close—this is the character of our assets; this is the full value that we receive for the money. The United States incurred their debt to save the life of the nation, confronted by a crisis which threatened the dissolution of their Republic, threatened by a crisis which required that country to put forth its utmost exertions, to bury 500,000 of its sons upon the battle field, which required that country to expend thousands of millions of dollars—it was under these circumstances that the debt of that country was incurred, that debt which has been reduced to $1,400,000,000. But we, in a time of profound peace, with no necessity resting upon us, have gone on piling up our debt until it exceeds the debt of the United States by a per capita charge of at least $18 for ever man, woman and child in the Dominion of Canada. And what is the outlook ahead? Can the hon. gentleman assure us that the limit of the accumulation of debt has been reached? Can he assure us that when he makes his next financial statement, if he should make it in this House, he will be able to point to any diminution of our public debt? Will he not, on the contrary, be called upon to inform us, when we meet here again, if Providence spares us, that millions upon millions more have been added to that burthen of debt already so great? Sir, it is inevitable that we will. It is inevitable that when he next makes the financial statement to this country, we will have added to our taxation, added to our expenditure, and enormous as our debt is already, it will have been considerably increased.

Now, Sir, with regard to the interest charge. Did I understand the hon. gentleman, when he made his financial statement, to say that the interest charge in the United States was as heavy as it is in Canada? I think not. He admitted that it was heavier in this country, but he minimised the interest charge here, and he presents a statement with regard to that matter more roseate than the circumstances and the truth will warrant. Now let us all look at that question. Assuming the population of the United States at 56,000,000, and that of Canada at 4,500,000, our interest charge last year of $7,700,000 was at the rate of $1.69 per head; while the interest charge of the United States last year of $54,578,000—amounted to a per capita charge of 95 cents against $1.69 in this country. That was the condition of things last year. What will be the condition of things in 1886, according to the estimates of this Government and the estimates of the United States Government? In 1886 it is estimated by my hon. friend that it will require $9,450,000 to pay the interest on our public debt, and upon the basis of his estimates our population will be 4,660,000, which will be a per capita charge of $2.02. What will it be in the United States? It is estimated that their interest charge will be $48,500,000 for a population of 57,500,000, so that the interest charge in the United States next year will be 84 cents per head, against $2.02 in Canada. In 1887 it is inevitable that the interest charge in Canada will be three times as great as the interest charge in the United States, in proportion to the population.

Mr. CHARLTON. Perhaps hon. gentlemen had better wait till 1887, and then see who will be right. I say that, in all human probability, the year 1837 will show that the interest charge of Canada is threefold as great as the interest charge of the United States—a brilliant record, surely, for the hon. gentlemen opposite; and the disparity will continue to increase. The debt of the United States is being reduced from year to year, the population of that country is swelling to an enormous magnitude, and its wealth is being increased in proportion, while, on the contrary, our debt is continually augmenting, and the interest charge is increasing in proportion. So much for the question of the public debt and the interest charge resting upon the two countries. Now, Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of grave importance to this country. I see my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) laughing. He cannot see anything wrong in this. He cannot realise, Mr. Speaker, that this country, lying alongside the United States, is a competitor with the United States in inviting emigration from the old world to our North-West, lying untilled, and asking for millions of people to settle in it; he cannot realise that the question of which country has the greatest debt, the greatest interest charge and the heaviest taxation, will have anything to do with the settlement of that country in the future, or will have anything to do with its prosperity. Oh, no! He cannot realise that. It is a matter of no consequence whether we owe three times as much per head as the United States or owe five times as much. It is a matter of no consequence whether we squander our resources, whether we accumulate a vast public debt, or whether we imperil the future of this country—all that matters nothing. The hon. gentleman from Lincoln can laugh as Nero fiddled when Rome was burning; he can laugh over the dark future that lies before this country, in consequence of the mismanagement of the hon. gentleman opposite; but I believe it is a matter of very grave consequence to us all. I believe the time has come when we should carefully consider our financial position. I believe the time has come when we should recognise that we have been proceeding in a wrong direction, and when we should retrace, if possible, our steps.

Now, with regard to our expenditure. The expenditure in the year 1884, chargeable to the Consolidated Fund, was \$31,107,000, upon a population of 4,500,000, making a per capita expenditure of \$6.91. The expenditure of the United States in the same year was \$200,916,000, as stated by my hon. friend when he made his financial statement. The per capita charge in that country on a population of 56,000,000 is \$5.19, or \$1.72 less than the per capita charge in Canada. Then, if we deduct the sinking fund from the expenditure in each country, we will find the expenditure in Canada to be \$26,100,000, or \$5.80 per head; while the expenditure in the United States is \$244,000,000, or \$5.35 per head, an excess of \$1.45 per head in Canada as compared with the United States; and if we analyse the expenditure of the United States we will find various items of expenditure there we do not have here. We will find, for instance, an enormous expenditure for pensions, amounting to over \$55,000,000 a year, and a very heavy expenditure for the purpose of maintaining an army and a navy. These are expenditures which we are in a measure free from. Our expenditure for pensions last year was \$95,500. If you multiply that by $12\frac{1}{2}$, the discrepancy of population between the two countries, our expenditure for that purpose would be \$1,194,275, corresponding exactly in magnitude to what the expenditure in the United States would be if its population was at the same proportion as ours. If you take our expenditure for militia at \$1,475,481, and multiply it by $12\frac{1}{2}$, you have \$18,443,512, which is the expenditure we would have incurred upon the same basis if our population were the same as the United States. Multiplying those expenditures by $12\frac{1}{2}$, in order to make them compare with the United States, what do we find? We find the expenses of the United States under those heads, when our corresponding expenditure is multiplied by $12\frac{1}{2}$, exceeds the expenditure in our case by \$83,637,670, and deducting that excess and the sinking fund from the ordinary expenditure, the per capita rate is \$2.86. There is another view to take, and I invite the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to it. The United States have no such thing as a consolidated account and a capital account; all goes to current account. There is no capital account kept. When I state the expenditure of the United States at \$290,000,000 I state the entire expenditure of that country. We had an expenditure last year, deducting sinking fund, of \$26,000,000; we had, in addition, the expenditure on capital account, without counting payments of debts to Provinces, \$16,800,000. We spent last year, to say nothing of debts paid to Provinces, \$42,905,529. To make a fair comparison between this country and the United States, we have to take, on the one hand, the total expenditure, \$42,905,529, and on the other hand the total expenditure in the United States, \$290,916,473. If we make that comparison, and this is a fair basis, we find that the per capita expenditure for all purposes is in Canada \$9.41, and in the United States for all purposes, except payment of public debt, \$5.19. This is a fair comparison to make with respect to the expenditure of the two countries.

A word with respect to the taxation of the two countries. As I said a short time ago, the proper measure of taxation in this country is that derived from Customs. Excise duties are voluntary; you may pay them or not, as you please; Customs duties are involuntary; to them all men must contribute. The United States average annual Customs, from 1st July, 1879, to 1st July, 1884, was $3.82 per capita. The annual average for the same period in this country was $4.52, upon the basis of population as represented by the Finance Minister. If we take the United States Customs taxation for last year, we will find that the per capita amount was $3.64, while our own taxation from Customs was $4.45 per capita. If we take 1883, the Customs taxation in the United States averaged $3.97 per head, as against $5.22 in this Dominion. So much for the rates of taxation imposed in the two countries.

If we compare the expenditure in this country with the expenditure of the United States in different eras, we will find some startling contrasts. It will be remembered that this is a young country. If we go back to the history of the United States, to the time when that country was in a similar condition to our own, when it had not attained the proportions of one of the great powers of the globe, and if we make a comparison between the expenditure in that country then and the expenditure here, now, we will find, I say, some startling contrasts. I invite the attention of the Finance Minister to a few of these contrasts. I will take the years 1790, 1800, 1810, 1820, 1830,

Mr. CHARLTON.

1840, 1850, 1860; and in making these comparisons, I do not include interest paid on public debt on either side. The figures are as follows:

CANADA—ORDINARY EXPENDITURE, 1884.

Excluding interest, $23,407,526.
Population, say 4,500,000; per capita, $5.13.

UNITED STATES.

1790—Population, 3,919,214. Net ordinary expenditure, excluding interest, \$1,919,589. Per capita, 49 cents— $\frac{1}{10}$ our rate. Navy and war, in all cases offset subsidies.
1800—Population, 5,294,390. Expenditure, \$7,411,360, of which \$3,300,000 for war and navy. Per capita, \$1.40— $\frac{2}{3}$ our rate.
1810—Population, 7,230,809. Expenditure, \$5,311,032. Per capita, 73 cents— $\frac{1}{2}$ our rate.
1820—Population, 9,633,822. Expenditure, \$13,134,530, of which war, navy and pensions, \$10,226,758. Total per capita, \$1.36— $\frac{2}{3}$ our rate.
1830—Population, 12,866,020. Expenditure, \$13,229,533. Per capita, \$1.02— $\frac{1}{3}$ our rate.
1840—Population, 17,069,453. Expenditure, \$24,139,920, of which war, navy and pension, \$15,812,525. Total per capita, \$1.41— $\frac{2}{3}$ our rate.
1850—Population, 23,191,876. Expenditure, \$37,165,990, of which war and navy, \$19,458,634. Per capita, \$1.60— $\frac{1}{2}$ our rate.
1860—Population, 31,443,321. Expenditure, \$51,912,634; war, navy and pensions, \$29,037,653; balance, \$25,824,981. Total per capita, \$1.74— $\frac{1}{3}$ our rate.

I suppose these figures do not suit hon. gentlemen opposite, but the Finance Minister instituted a set of comparisons between the expenditures of the United States and Canada, and I want to show what is the real relative position of each of these two countries. I wish to call his attention to it, because he occupies a responsible position in this matter, and it is time for him to put on the brakes.

I wish to make one more comparison only. We launched out as a nation in 1867. I want to take that year and compare the expense or the taxation per head for expenditure in Canada and the United States, and then I want to see how we have travelled together; I want to make the comparison for this year and see whether we have lost or gained ground in the race which we must necessarily and inevitably run with that country. In 1867-68 the taxation of the United States, receipts from Customs and internal revenue, and the direct income tax, was \$357,000,000 on a population of 36,500,000, or a per capita tax of \$9.30. The ordinary expenditures in that year, and the payment of interest on debt was \$370,339,000, or a per capita expenditure of \$11.46. Now, we made a favorable contrast with the United States for that year. Our Custom and Excise taxation for that year was \$11,590,000, or \$3.40 per capita. Our expenditure was \$13,486,000, or \$3.93 per head, and the United States spent that year \$6.40 per head more than we did. Their taxation was $2\frac{2}{10}$ per cent. greater than ours, and their expenditure $2\frac{2}{10}$ per cent. greater, or \$7.53 per head greater. If we come to the year 1883-84 we find that the United States Customs and internal revenue taxation amounted to \$5.65 per head, and ours to \$5.62; or, in other words, while their taxation was nearly three times greater than ours in 1867, there was a difference of only 3 cents per head in 1884. The United States expenditure in 1884 was \$5.19 per head, and ours was \$6.91 per head, so that while theirs was almost three times as great as ours in 1867-63 it was \$1.72 less this year. This comparison is a suggestive one. If, eighteen years ago, the United States, burthened from taxation, had an expenditure nearly three times as great as it was in Canada; if, in 1854, the expenditure of the United States is \$1.72 less than Canada, there is food for thought in that statement; and if we are to continue to travel in that direction what will the contrast be in the next eighteen years? I say that if we are to go on in that direction we will not exist as a people in eighteen years, to institute comparisons between the two countries; we will have reached the goal of ruin before that time, if we are to continue in the course we have been pursuing in the last eighteen years.

Now, I shall be told, I have no doubt, that I am unpatriotic; I shall be told that these statements will be taken up by the American immigration agents; I shall be told that I am prejudicing the interests of Canada—in doing what? In telling the truth? Sir, I am not prejudicing the interests of Canada. I am warning the gentlemen in charge of the interests of Canada as to the condition of this country at this moment. I am warning them as to the dangers which threaten this country, as to the results which will attend persistence in the policy they are now pursuing. Sir, we cannot conceal our position from the United States or from any other intelligent men. It is not necessary to tell them; they know it. But we can inform ourselves, and it is necessary that the people of Canada should know the truth. It is necessary that the people of Canada should know the affairs of this country, and it is nothing short of criminal to conceal from the people of Canada the actual condition of the public affairs of this Dominion. I do not intend to conceal them. And gentlemen may prate about unpatriotic conduct and injuring the country if they choose. We have heard enough of that stuff; it is the business of an Opposition to criticise the policy of the Government, and expose what is wrong, to warn the Government and the people, if the Government is recreant to its trust, recreant to its duty.

Now I have just a word to say, by way of variety, about assisted passages. I have here a little morsel I came across accidentally, in the shape of an extract from a speech made by Sir Charles Tupper in Toronto, on the 11th day of May, 1878. It came to my mind when I heard his son, the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper), speaking with reference to immigration. On that occasion Sir Charles Tupper used the following language:—

SIR CHARLES TUPPER. "I tell you that this Government within four years have spent one million dollars in bringing emigrants into this country. What for—to starve? (Hear, hear). The Finance Minister says his remedy is to tell the people to work harder and to be more frugal. Well, we may be willing to eat and drink less, to spend less on dress and to be more frugal, and we are willing to work hard, but we want work to do."

The arraignment was that the iniquitous Government of Mr. Mackenzie had spent a million of dollars in assisting immigration in the last four years. Well, what is the record of hon. gentlemen opposite? Have they spent anything? I looked at the Public Accounts and I find that they have spent for immigration and quarantine for the last four years $1,516,000. I had not time to subtract the exact sum chargeable to quarantine, but I venture to say that they have spent in the four years for immigration purposes an amount exceeding by $300,000 the sum stated by Sir Charles Tupper in 1878, when he arraigned the Government of that day for spending that money. I am free to admit that I believe the whole system of assisted passages is wrong. I believe we want the class of immigrants for Canada who are able to pay their own way, and that we are in danger, if we assist immigrants, of assisting criminals and jail birds, and the most undesirable classes of immigrants—those who have not the energy to pay their own way. I think we might very properly adopt the policy of the United States, which does not assist immigrants, but on the contrary, taxes its immigrants—taxes the steamship companies for the purpose of providing hospitals, and maintaining Castle Garden, and looking after the welfare of immigrants in going to their destination. I believe that that is a more wise and prudent policy than the one we have been pursuing hitherto.

Now, Sir, I come to the consideration of the question of expenditure, which I shall treat as briefly as may be, and in reference to this matter I ask the attention of the House to an extract from a speech made by the leader of the present Government, regarding the mode in which the finances were managed by his predecessors. The speech was made in Toronto on 11th May, 1883, in response to an address delivered to that hon. gentleman. He says:

"We have endeavored to raise up this country from the incompetent men who unworthily hold the reins of power. Of those men I may say that their reign is to be a short one, and that the people are going to rise in their might at the coming election and sweep jobbery, corruption and incapacity into one common ruin."

Well, Sir, the people arose in their might, and they swept away—what? They swept jobbery, corruption and incapacity into power on the crest of a great tidal wave of folly and fatuity. We will examine the record of these two Governments—and the record will prove what I say; we shall examine the record of the two Governments as to the expenditure and the management of the finances of this country. These are the gentlemen, Sir, charging jobbery, who have been guilty of such little peccadilloes as the Onderdonk contract, who did not dare to allow a Bill introduced by my hon. friend who sits near me, to prohibit contractors from subscribing to election funds, from becoming the law of the land; who have refused, Session after Session, to enact that the contractors of this Government shall not be contributors to its election funds; those gentlemen, who charge corruption on the gentlemen whom they supplanted in power, are gentlemen who at that very time had resting upon them a stain which will be an indelible stain not only on them, but on Canada, so long as Canada has a history—the sale of a great charter, the Pacific Scandal. These men who charge corruption on the men they supplanted are men who have given away vast areas of this country without competition, and in many cases at one hundred times less than its value, to their favorites, in violation of every principle of justice and honesty—who have given away areas large enough for dukedoms and principalities, as pasture land, or as timber or coal leases, on almost nominal terms. No wonder this Government is popular with a certain class. No wonder it is strongly entrenched, when it has made a corrupt use of the influences at its command for the purpose of securing the favor of its friends. The gentleman who leads this Government, and whom I am sorry not to see in his seat, I will do him the justice to say, no doubt, has acted worse than he would have wished, on many occasions. I have no doubt that the heterogeneous elements he has been obliged to reconcile, and the political difficulties he has had to face, have forced him to commit acts that his better nature revolted against. The trouble with him is, that he is a first-class politician and a fifteenth-rate statesman. He can manage public men with the greatest facility, but as for the principles that actuate a statesman, to demand that if his principles are not carried out he will resign, if he was called upon to live up to that standard, he is not there. He reminds me of a story of an African preacher who was warning his congregation against the danger that confronted them in a spiritual sense. He said: "My brethren, the broad road leads to destruction, and the narrow road leads to damnation." Then a hearer in the congregation cried out: "Then this African takes to the woods." It is so with this hon. gentleman. He will take to the woods or to the narrow way, or will take any course in order that he may remain in power; and so, as I have said, on many occasions, he has taken positions and committed acts that his better nature has revolted against. With regard to the charge of incapacity preferred against the gentlemen now on the Opposition benches, that charge is made by the men who made the Pacific Railway contract, and who, when that contract was laid before this House, and it became evident that a better offer was made, refused to retrace their steps, and refused to comply with the law of the land and advertise for tenders in order to secure the construction of that work on terms more favorable to the country. The men who gave, or will give, to that syndicate more money than the road cost, in addition to the 25,000,000 acres of land; the men who have piled up a debt of $225,000,000 upon this country; the men who have adopted a scale of expenditure which, if continued, will inevitably force this Government to resort to direct taxation to raise money, in addition to all they can squeeze out of the country by indirect taxation—these are the men who prefer the charge of incapacity, jobbery and corruption against the men they supplanted. Well, Sir, we will examine the financial record of the two Governments; and, first of all, we will take the general expenditure. I made this comparison partly last Session; but I had not then the complete returns as to the expenditure of 1884. I placed that expenditure too high; it was supposed that it would be higher than it has actually proved to be. I shall make this comparison to-night briefly. I start at the year 1863, with an expenditure of $13,486,092, under hon. gentlemen opposite, who continued in power six years and increased that expenditure to $23,316,316, in 1874. It may be asserted that my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) administered the affairs of the country for eight months of that financial year. It is true he did; but, Sir, he came within the estimate of my hon. friend opposite. My hon. friend opposite asked for $23,685,009, and the expenditure was only $23,316,316. Now, the increase in those six years was $9,830,224, a percentage of 72 per cent., while the increase of population during the same period was only 11 per cent. The increase of the expenditure exceeded the increase of population by six and a-half times. Now, we turn to the record of the corrupt men who were driven out of power on account of incapacity, jobbery and corruption. They commenced in 1874 with an expenditure of $23,316,316, and they went out of office in 1879 with an expenditure, based upon the estimates of my hon. friend, of $23,669,000. It is true, that expenditure was somewhat increased, owing to the fact that the hon. gentleman opposite was in office eight months of that financial year; but the increase over Sir Richard Cartwright's estimates was due to them. This shows an increase, from 1874 to 1879, of $352,684, or an average of $70,536 a year, against an annual average increase of $1,638,370 under their predecessors. Now, Sir, we have commenced on the third term of the hon. gentlemen opposite. Upon my hon. friend's estimate of $23,669,000 they commenced operations. They increased the expenditure of that year. My hon. friend assures us that he would have kept the expenditure within the estimates, and we have reason to believe he would, inasmuch as he reduced the expenditure between 1877 and 1878 by $16,000. If this be the case, those hon. gentlemen, starting with an expenditure of $23,669,000, in 1879, have increased it, to $31,107,706, in 1884. They have increased the expenditure by $7,438,706, or 31 per cent., while the population of the country has increased but 9 per cent. They have increased their expenditure in the last period three and a-half times faster than the population has increased. But for the manipulation in the Dominion lands account, but for the placing to capital account the $723,000 that ought to have been placed on the consolidated fund account, the comparison would have been $723,000 worse than it is.

But there is another basis upon which to institute this comparison, and it is a fairer basis than the one I have adopted. If we take our Public Accounts and look at our balance sheet, we will find that the expenses chargeable to Consolidated Fund is placed under three heads. We find, first, the classification of charges on account of Debt, Subsidies or Sinking Fund, and so forth. These are fixed charges; they cannot be varied; whatever subsidies have to be paid, whatever interest is charged upon the public debt, whatever sum has to be put into the sinking fund, these sums must be paid. The pruning knife cannot be applied here; the Government cannot reduce the appropriation for these expenses. Then we have charges on revenue, the charges for collecting Customs, the charges of carrying on the operations of the Post Office Department, the charges for the Excise Department, the charges for managing Public Works—these are charges that, so far from the Government being able to retrench them, must inevitably increase to a small extent every year. The pruning knife cannot be applied to those. If the pruning knife is to be applied at all, it must be to that class known as controllable expenditure, expenditure on account of Legislation, Administration of Justice, Civil Government, appropriations for Public Works, Militia expenditure, and expenditures of that character. It is to those the pruning knife may be applied, and I propose to institute a comparison between the expenditure of the two Governments as regards controllable expenditure, so that we may see what each Government has accomplished in the matter of retrenchment. We will take the period from 1868 to 1874, when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. Starting with a controllable expenditure, in 1868, of $3,631,000, they had increased that by 1874 to $8,324,075, or an increase of $4,693,000 in six years, or 129 per cent., averaging annually 29½ per cent., or an increase in expenditure 12½ times more rapid than the increase in population. We will take the period when the incompetents came into power—when the jobbers and the corruptionists were put at the head of affairs. They started in 1874 with an expenditure of $8,324,075; in 1879 the expenditure amounted to $6,941,577, showing that they had effected a reduction in controllable expenditure of $1,382,498, or 16 per cent. of a reduction against an advance of 29 per cent. by their predecessors. We then come to 1879, when the Government changed and hon. gentlemen opposite came into office. They started with a controllable expenditure of $6,941,577, and in 1884 they had succeeded in raising it to the amount of $11,294,374, an increase of $4,352,797, or 62 per cent., giving an annual average of 12¼ per cent., or an increase seven times more rapid than the increase in population. If we add to this controllable expenditure the sum improperly placed to capital account, with regard to expenditure on Dominion lands, $723,000, we will find that the increase was $5,000,000, or 72 per cent. So much for the comparison of the expenditures, first, under the head of total expenditure chargeable to the Consolidated Fund, and secondly, under the head of Controllable Expenditure, the latter being the only one in which the Government can exercise its power of retrenchment:

I propose to occupy the attention of the House a few moments in making a comparison of the expenditures in certain Departments of the Government, coming under the head of Controllable Expenditure, made by each Administration; and, in whatever way we institute the comparison between the financial record of my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) and that of the Finance Minister, we will find that in every instance it will redound to the credit of my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright). I will take the Departments of Civil Government, the Department of Public Works chargeable to Consolidated Fund, the Dominion Lands and the Department of Public Works chargeable to revenue, and will institute a comparison in each case. As regards Civil Government, I would like to call the attention of the Finance Minister to this comparison I am about to make, because he may feel disposed to emulate in future the good example set to him in the past by my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright). In 1868 there was expended on Civil Government \$594,441; in 1874, \$883,685, an increase of \$289,244, or 48 per cent., or an average annual increase of 8 per cent., four and a-half times greater than the increase in population. Then my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) came into office; and starting with that expenditure of \$883,685, in 1874, he reduced it, in 1878, to \$823,369, a decrease of \$60,316, or 6¾ per cent. decrease against an increase in the preceding period of 48 per cent. Then the gentlemen who drove these incompetents from power came in, and they started with this expenditure of \$822,369, which, by 1884, they had increased to \$1,084,417, an increase of \$261,048, or 31 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., being an average annual increase of 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., three times that of the population in this, the second period in office of hon. gentlemen opposite, and four and a-half times that of the population during their first period in office, as against a decrease of 6 $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. during the period my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) was in power. Next, take up Public Works chargeable to Consolidated Fund. Here is an opportunity to exercise economy, but also here is an opportunity to launch out into lavish and unjustifiable expenditure, for the purpose of bribing constituencies—making canals, promising to erect, and erecting public works, spending money lavishly by this means in various constituencies, in order to influence public sentiment in favor of the Government nominees. That power may be used; that power has been used. Perhaps it would be unparliamentary to say that power is being used; but it certainly has been used. I will point out a most striking contrast between the records of the Finance Minister and that of my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright). Hon. gentlemen opposite started in 1868 with an expenditure under this head of \$126,269; in 1874, when these gentlemen went out of power, their expenditure had reached \$1,826,000, an increase of \$1,699,722, or 1346 per cent., making an annual average increase of 224 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., 128 times faster than the increase of population. Then the Reform Administration came into power and, starting with an expenditure of \$1,826,000, in 1874, they had succeeded in reducing that, in 1878, to \$998,594, a reduction of \$827,407, a reduction of 45 per cent., an annual reduction of 11 per cent., against an annual increase under their predecessors of 224 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Then the gentlemen opposite came into power, and, starting with this expenditure of \$998,594, in 1878, they ran it up, in 1884, to \$2,908,851, an increase of \$1,910,257, or 191 per cent., an average increase of 32 per cent., an increase eighteen times greater than the increase in the population of this Dominion. That is a pretty nice record. These men are entitled, I think, to talk about jobbery, and corruption, and incapacity, when speaking of gentlemen on this side of the House. And next, with regard to Dominion Lands. In 1868 we spent nothing; in 1874 the expenditure was \$283,163. Starting with that expenditure in 1874, my hon. friend reduced it, in 1878, to \$87,628, a reduction of \$195,535, an annual average decrease of \$48,883, a reduction for the period of 69 per cent., or an average annual decrease of 17 per cent. Then our friends opposite administered the affairs of that Department and, commencing with \$87,628 of an expenditure in 1878, they had, in 1884, an expenditure chargeable to income of \$166,890, and chargeable to capital—a device for cooking the accounts and making the expense seem less than it really is—\$723,658, a total of \$890,548, an increase of \$802,920 in six years, an average annual increase of \$133,821, a total increase of 1016 per cent., or an annual average increase of 169 per cent., or ninety-six times faster than the increase in the population. In Public Works chargeable to Revenue—that is the management of our public works, our railways and canals—we started, in 1868, with an expenditure of \$626,286; gentlemen opposite ran up the expenditure to \$2,359,679 in 1874, an increase of \$1,763,393, or 281 per cent., an average annual increase of \$293,898, or 47 per cent., an increase twenty-seven times faster than the increase in the population of the country. Then the incompetents came in and, starting with the expenditure of \$2,359,679, in 1874, in four years they had increased it to \$2,471,437, an increase of \$81,758, or 3 $\frac{1}{10}$ per cent. for the period. Then the gentlemen opposite took charge of the administration of that Department again, and commencing with an expenditure of \$2,471,437, in 1878, they had increased that expenditure to \$3,302,791 in 1884, an increase of \$831,354, or 33 per cent., an average annual increase of \$138,559, or 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. This is the record. These are the comparisons, these are the contrasts that exist between the management of these Departments by the two Governments, and nothing could be more striking, nothing could be more satisfactory as an evidence of the economy and careful management of these affairs upon the one hand, and the recklessness which characterises the management of these affairs upon the other.

What is the significance to us, as a people, of our increasing expenditure and our diminishing revenue? Is there any cause for alarm in the future? Is there any cause for supposing that my hon. friend will be able to boast of surpluses of $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 a year in the near future? Is there any cause for fear that he, too, may be troubled with deficits, that he may possibly be characterised by some person opposed to him in politics as the "King of Deficits," as my hon. friend was a short time since? With a scale of expenditure this year reaching $33,000,000, with a shrinkage in revenue from Customs and Excise of $3,786,000 in the last year, with these causes in operation, I say that there is reason for grave alarm; I say that there is a danger that our finances may break down; I say that there is reason, good reason, for the inability of the Government to place the $25,000,000 loan about to fall due; I say that there is good reason for their having a floating debt of from $13,000,000 to $15,000,000; I say that there is reason for their being obliged to resort to the desperate shifts which the man in business resorts to whose credit is not good and who goes "shinning" around the streets attempting to raise money to meet a note which is due and is threatened with protest. We have placed ourselves in a position of grave embarrassment, in consequence of reckless extravagance and mismanagement of the affairs of the country. I do not blame my hon. friend, who is the creature, the victim, of circumstances. He undoubtedly has been forced to a great degree into the position in which he is, but, whether forced or not, whether responsible or not, the difficulties which threaten the country are none the less real, and none the less to be lamented.

And, now, a few words in regard to our manufacturing industries, and I am done.

Mr. RYKERT. That is good.

Mr. CHARLTON. I hear the Minister of Customs say "that is good."

Mr. BOWELL. No; you did not.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am afraid he is like the old Scotch elder, who was accused of being hard-headed and not open to conviction, and who denied the accusation, and stated that he was open to conviction, "but," he added, "I would like to see the man who would convince me." That is the characteristic of my hon. friend opposite.

Mr. BOWELL. I did not happen to say anything, so your story does not apply.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am afraid that the warnings I have given have fallen upon that hon. gentleman unheeded, and that they will have no effect upon him or upon the Finance Minister. It troubles me to think that efforts so well meant and truths so palpable should have so little effect upon those to whom they are directed.

Mr. BOWELL. Love's labor lost.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to ask this question: Did our manufacturing interests, when the National Policy was introduced, require additional protection? I answer that they did not. They had attained a great development under a revenue tariff of 15 per cent., raised to 17 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in the last two years. I say that, in 1871, if our census statistics are reliable, we had \$125,000,000 worth of material consumed by our manufactures in Canada that year, that the products of the manufactures were \$221,500,000, that we had \$78,000,000 of capital invested, that \$40,850,000 were paid in wages, that 158,000 people were employed. I say that was a respectable, nay, more than a respectable, that it was a marvellous development of manufacturing industries in a country so young and so poor as Canada was then; and, if the manufacturing industries of Canada had attained that degree of development under a 15 per cent. revenue tariff in 1871, I say that no necessity existed in this country for any additional protection. I say that without fear of contradiction, and I shall point out, before I finish, that the development of the manufacturing industries of this country has been greater and more satisfactory than those of the United States in the last decade under a high protective tariff. What industry have we in prosperous operation in Canada to-day that did not exist before the National Policy came into operation? What branch of manufacturing industry is prosecuted now that was not prosecuted then? We hear people talk of the National Policy—the advocates of the policy—and you would imagine, from their air, from their assertions, from their claims, that the National Policy created the manufacturing industries of Canada, and that before this National Policy was adopted we had nothing of the kind. That is not the case. The National Policy may have accelerated to some extent the development of the manufacturing industries of the country, and it accelerated them, if it has done so, in an unhealthy manner. The stimulation has been unhealthy, and the manufacturing industries of the country are to-day, I believe, in a worse position than they would have been if no such stimulant had been applied. Were not our manufacturing industries prosperous before this National Policy came into operation? A careful comparison of the industries of the United States with those of Canada will prove beyond controversy that the manufactures of Canada, during the entire period of depression, from 1873 to 1878, were more prosperous, were earning better dividends, were more fully employed, than those of the United States. That is an assertion I make broadly; it is one that can be substantiated; it is one that does not admit of denial. Why, then, did we need the protective policy? The very prosperity that came to our manufactures after the passage of the National Policy Tariff was a prosperity due in a great measure to the revival of trade. Not only in Canada, but all over the world, an immense impetus was given to business. It was an impetus that business received, not from the tariff of Canada, not from any tariff, but from the passing away of that long period of commercial depression that sat like a nightmare upon the industries of every civilized nation, from 1874 to 1878, and the prosperity that resulted from natural causes; the prosperity that came from the passing away of that serious depression that weighed upon every industrial occupation, every industrial interest, and every commercial interest in the civilized world—I say the prosperity that was due to the removal of that depression has been falsely attributed to the National Policy; and if the National Policy had not been adopted I firmly believe that the manufacturers of Canada would have made as good progress and would have been in a more healthy condition to-day than they are now under the operation of that policy.

Now, Sir, I have one little fact to present to the House, which I think will convince any candid member that the protection we afford is higher than necessary. One of the arguments of protectionists is that it is necessary to protect the manufacturer because he pays higher wages than are paid in England—it is claimed in the United States that the wages are 60 to 70 per cent. higher than in England. Well, we will admit that it is necessary to afford a degree of protection that will enable the manufacturer to pay double the wages paid in Great Britain—what amount of protection would be required?

Mr. CHARLTON.

What percentage of the cost of the fabrics and wares produced in this country and produced in the United States is chargeable to wages? That is the question. The census returns of the United States show that 17 per cent. of the cost of the products of the manufacturers is the cost of the wages paid to the operatives, and the balance is due to the raw material and other charges. Our census returns show that 19 $\frac{2}{3}$ of the cost of fabrics produced by our manufacturers is chargeable to wages. Well, Sir, if you are going to enable the manufacturer of Canada to pay double the wages paid in England, how much protection does he want to overcome that? Why, he wants one-half of that 19 per cent.; he wants 10 per cent. protection, 10 per cent. higher prices, in order to enable him to pay double the wages paid in England, because the total cost of the wages to him is 19 $\frac{2}{3}$ per cent. In the United States 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. protection is sufficient to enable the manufacturer to pay double the wages paid in Great Britain; and so the people of this country have been deceived as to the degree of protection necessary in order to enable our manufacturers to meet what they claim are the additional burdens imposed upon them as compared with Great Britain.

Now, Sir, I promised a few moments ago to show that the progress of manufactures in this country and the progress of manufactures in the United States had been satisfactory, healthy, and rapid, under a revenue tariff policy. We have seen, in the United States, a period of revenue tariff policy extending from the year 1846 to 1860; and we have seen a period of a protective policy extending from 1861 down to the present date. Now if we take the returns from the United States for the four years between 1846 and 1850, under this revenue tariff policy, and if we take the decade between 1850 and 1860, passed entirely under the operation of a revenue tariff policy, which was well settled and had been in operation four years before the decade commenced, and compare the progress made by the manufacturing industries of that decade with the progress made in the two succeeding decades, we will have the data upon which to form an opinion as to whether manufacturers did really get an advantage under the revenue tariff, and as to whether a protective tariff is essential to their development. Now, I shall not trouble the House with a table I have here, which goes exhaustively into the capital, the material used, the amount of products, the amount paid, the wages, and the number of hands; but I will point out the percentages of increase under these various heads during the three decades:

“ 1870 to 1880.....	31 $\frac{1}{2}$ “
Hands—1850 to 1860.....	37 per cent.
“ 1860 to 1870.....	47 “
“ 1870 to 1880.....	31 “
Wages—1850 to 1860.....	60 per cent.
“ 1870 to 1880.....	22 gold.
Products—1850 to 1860.....	85 per cent.
“ 1870 to 1880.....	26 gold.

Now, what do these figures show? They show that the increase in capital, in hands, in wages, in products, was very little greater under the stimulation of high protective duties from 1860 to 1870, than it was under the revenue tariff from 1850 to 1860, and they show that the increase in these various points was very much less under the protective duties from 1870 to 1880 than from 1850 to 1860. The average increase for twenty years was less than the average annual increase in the ten years under a revenue tariff. That is the record of the United States with regard to protection vs. a revenue tariff. It is worth while mentioning in this connection, that the popular vote in the United States in 1880 was 526,000 in favor of a revenue tariff, and that in 1884 a revenue tariff President has been elected by the popular vote after twenty years' trial of protection.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes; it is worth hearing. It is suggestive. It points to a moral that we would do well to heed.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The language Mr. Cleveland used was just such language as would be used on our side of the House as to this policy.

Mr. CHARLTON. The language he used, the language his party uses, the language his supporters use, is that the tariff of the United States is an unjust and an oppressive tariff, and that duties should be levied for revenue purposes only. That is the plank on which Mr. Cleveland was elected President of the United States. We come now to the growth of manufactures in Canada, and I ask the hon. Minister's attention to the statistics I am about to quote. They are very suggestive also. The more you look into them the more hollow the pretensions of the hon. gentleman seem. I will make a comparison with respect to the growth of manufactures in this country during the last ten years. It may be claimed that a part of this growth is due to the National Policy. I do not know to what extent the hon. gentleman would make that claim. But eight years of the ten years between 1871 and 1881 were under a revenue tariff. The change came in 1879, and you may fairly assume that the influences exercised by the National Policy, whatever they were, were not fairly brought into play until the expiration of a year, at least, and so nine of the ten years were passed under a revenue tariff policy. I assume that, I assert it, that of the decade between 1871 and 1881, nine of the ten years were under a revenue tariff, and whatever progress was made by the manufacturing industries of Canada, it was largely due to the operation of a revenue tariff policy. Let us see what the progress was. Here are the figures:

CANADA.
Capital invested.
1871.....	$77,964,000	1881.....	$165,302,000
	Increase.....		$87,338,000. Per cent. 112.
Material consumed.
1871.....	$124,907,000.	1881.....	$179,918,000
	Increase.....		$55,011,000. Per cent. 44.
Products.
1871.....	$221,617,080.	1881.....	$309,616,000.
	Increase.....		$87,999,000. Per cent. 39.
Hands employed.
1871.....	187,942.	1881.....	254,935.
	Increase.....		66,993. Per cent. 35.
Wages paid.
1871.....	$40,851,000.	1881.....	$59,429,000.
	Increase.....		$18,518,000. Per cent. 45.

" " " " " "	Products 13 p. c.—½ more.
" " " " " "	Hands... 4 p. c.
" " " " " "	Wages... 23 p. c.—or double.

That is the record with respect to the progress made by manufactures in Canada: first, up to 1871 under a clear and distinct revenue tariff policy, and second from 1871 to 1881 under a revenue tariff for nine-tenths of the period at least, which shows a vastly greater development of manufacturing interests in this country than was acquired in the United States under a high protective tariff from 1870 to 1880.

Wherever we may look we cannot fail to be impressed by the fact that a satisfactory and rapid development of the manufacturing interests of this country has been secured under a revenue tariff policy, and that an equally satisfactory and an equally rapid development of the manufacturing interests of the United States has also been secured under a revenue tariff policy. The manufacturing industries of the United States were in a stronger and more healthy condition in 1860 than they were in 1884. The exports of the manufacturers of that country were relatively larger than they are now. The exports of cotton goods in 1860 were larger than they have ever been since, except one or two years; and if the progress made from 1850 to 1860 under the revenue tariff policy had been maintained till 1884, the development of the manufacturing interests of the United States would have been as great as it is to-day. Will the hon. Minister assure me that his policy has benefited any considerable class in this country? Will he tell me it has benefited the lumberman? I know it has not. Will he tell me it has benefited the fisherman of his native Province and of Nova Scotia?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. CHARLTON. No; no man of common sense will say so. Will he tell me it has benefited the laborers of Canada?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. CHARLTON. Will he tell me it has benefited the cotton operative, who is working on short time and at reduced pay, and whose average earnings are $45 less a year than in 1878? The laborers will tell him, no. Will the hon. gentleman tell me it has benefited the farmer?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. CHARLTON. Will he tell me that the National Policy is not, in some measure, responsible for the present depression in prices?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. CHARLTON. I say yes; and I will demonstrate it. It is true that, as a rule, you cannot raise or lower the price of produce by the operation of a tariff; but a policy may be adopted by a country which, in the end, will produce important results, either in advancing or in depressing the prices of produce. England is the great market for Canada and the United States. England buys her food and she produces the fabrics that the world consumes. She exchanges the products of her forges, looms, and mills for the produce of the farmers of the new world. That trade is a trade of mutual exchange, and it can be carried on only as an exchange. England cannot be excluded from the markets of the United States and Canada, and continue to draw from those countries her supplies of food. She must be able to give to those countries the productions of her labor in order to take from those countries the products of their labor. The United States, for twenty years, and Canada for six years, have adopted a fiscal policy of enmity to England, a policy the effect of which is designed to exclude the products of British labor from the markets of these countries. What has England done? Could she continue to buy her supplies of food from this continent and pay us in gold? Could she continue to sail her vessels to our ports in ballast, and charge double freight, because there was a cargo only one way? Has she not looked round to procure food supplies in exchange for the products of her labor? Has she not spent millions in constructing a railway system in India, so that she might reach the wheat fields at the base of the Hymalayas, and exchange with the Hindoos British products for a food supply? Yes, she has done it. She now consumes millions of bushels of Indian wheat a year, and she has been driven to this course by the hostile tariff policy of this country and the United States; and when I assert that this policy has had a direct influence in depressing the price of agricultural produce in Canada, I assert what is patent to any man who examines the facts. Sir, the hon. gentleman has reduced the price of every bushel of wheat the Canadian farmer has to sell, of every bushel of farm produce he has to sell—he has reduced it by the operation of this policy, which has placed us at variance with our natural customers, and driven from the markets of Canada the people who are the consumers of our surplus food products. This has been the operation of the National Policy, a policy which has not only imposed direct taxes on the people of this country, in the shape of Customs duties, but has imposed indirect duties, in the shape of an enhanced cost of the ordinary articles of consumption of the people of this country, and imposed this additional taxation in the shape of a reduction in the price of farm produce. Not for one hundred years has wheat been lower in England than it is to-day, because she has reached countries where that article can be produced cheaply. Not for many years has the price of wheat been lower than it is in Canada to-day, notwithstanding the vaunts and boasts of hon. gentlemen, that they would afford agricultural protection to the farmers of Canada. They offered them benefits and blessings. They have conferred on them curses instead.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I have a couple more extracts to read, and I read them for the purpose of reminding the Government that they boasted that they had certain powers which we now call on them to use. We call on them to redeem the promises they made, and exercise the powers which we were informed they possess. What are those powers? In 1878 Sir Charles Tupper, in a speech in this House, a speech which I heard delivered myself, made use of the following language:—

“The hon. gentleman ought to know that if Governments are good for anything they are good to increase the prosperity of a country by Acts of Parliament, or to meet difficulties in which a country is placed, from time to time, and which require legislative interference.”

And again, in 1878, the same gentleman made use of this language:

“The hon. gentleman may say that the prosperity of the country cannot be obtained and promoted by Acts of Parliament. We deny it. We say that you may make the very taxation necessary to sustain the public credit by meeting the interest on the public debt and discharging the ordinary administration of public affairs, a means of so fostering our industries as to give to the people the money that is required in order to pay the taxes.”

Now, here are two very important powers. The first power is to give prosperity by Act of Parliament, and the second power is to make the taxes of the country a means of giving the people the money required to pay the taxes. Now, we call upon the Government to exercise those beneficent powers. It was said once by a celebrated and pious king, “If I forget thee, oh Jerusalem, may my right hand forget its cunning.” Have these men forgotten their duties? They made promises which the Deity alone could fulfil. Or has their right hand forgot its cunning? or are they like the gods of old, upon whom Elijah called? Have they gone on a journey—have they gone on a journey, or are they asleep? Why, in the present juncture of affairs, with the present difficulties confronting us and surrounding us, and over us—why, with the financial gloom which is settling on this country, are not these gentlemen giving us prosperity by Act of Parliament, as they declared they could? Why are they not making this vast volume of taxation, which presses so heavily on the country, a means by which the prosperity of the country may be increased, by furnishing the money to pay these taxes, as they said it would. Sir, I am afraid we have little hope that these promises will be fulfilled. I fear, Sir, they are like many other promises, that they are, in fact, like all the promises made by the hon. gentleman, with reference to the operation of the National Policy, fallacious, foundationless, false. But, Sir, I think we must turn to the sad reality and face the difficulties that confront us.

Mr. CHARLTON.

I think we must realise that we cannot secure the blessings that their promises offered to us. If we could, all would be well. But in place of these blessings being likely to be ours we look abroad on an immense debt, on an enormous load of taxation; we look abroad on our swelling expenditures; we see the Canadian Pacific Railway syndicate drinking up millions as the thirsty sand drinks up water, and calling for more. We see, in the near future, difficulties which may well appall the stoutest heart. We see a Government, backed by a following that seems ignorant, careless, and unconcerned as to the difficulties and dangers that threaten us; and Mr. Speaker, all we can do here is to protest—all we can do here is to call the attention of the Government to these difficulties and dangers; all we can do is to implore them to retrace in some measure their steps, and endeavor as far as they can, by prudence in future, to avert the calamities which recklessness in the past promises to impose on us.

Mr. McLELAN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11 p. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 11th March, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORT OF THE FACTORY COMMISSION.

Mr. BLAKE. I desire once again to call the attention of the Government, if they are the responsible parties, or of the Printing Committee if it is the responsible party, to the fact that the report of the Factory Commission has not yet been distributed. A very considerable time ago we saw advance sheets of that report in the hands of an hon. member who has taken part in the debate. Therefore there would seem to be no reason why, with due expedition, the report should not have been printed and placed in the hands of members with a view of being used in the debate.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I think the chairman of that committee stated the other day that instructions had been given to have it printed and distributed with the least possible delay.

Mr. BLAKE. That is always done.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I cannot account for it. I thought the hon. member who was speaking on the other side was reading from manuscript; I thought it possible he might have taken the manuscript out of the office and might have delayed in returning it.

Mr. BLAKE. I noticed it from this distance, and saw he was reading printed matter.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We are as much annoyed by the delay as the hon. gentleman.

BROOKLYN BREAKWATER, N. S.

Mr. FORBES asked, Has wharfage been collected at the Brooklyn Breakwater, Queen's County, N.S.? If so, how much has been collected, by what vessels, or by whom paid, and to whom paid, from 1st January, 1881, to 1st January, 1884?

Mr. McLELAN. Wharfage has been collected at Brooklyn Breakwater, Queen's County, N.S. $6.20 paid to wharfinger, Mr. F. T. Gardner, up to 1st January, 1884. Wharfinger does not give names of vessels, nor by whom paid, in his statement of account. Wharfinger appointed by Order in Council of 20th October, 1882. Of the $6.20 mentioned, $4.96 was deposited to the credit of the Receiver-General, and $1.24 retained as commission. Since 1st January, 1884, Mr. Gardner has collected for wharfage $12.87, of which $10.30 has been deposited to credit of the Receiver-General and $2.57 retained as commission.

THE POLARISCOPIC TEST FOR SUGAR.

Mr. VAIL asked, Whether the Government has, as promised last Session, investigated the question of adopting the polariscopic test for sugar? Whether the Government has reached a conclusion as to the propriety of adopting that test? Whether it is intended to propose to Parliament this Session the adoption of that test?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The Government have investigated the question referred to and have reached a conclusion, but it is not the present intention of the Government to ask Parliament to adopt that test.

HOMESTEADS WITHIN THE RAILWAY BELT.

Mr. BLAKE asked, How many homesteads have been entered within the Canadian Pacific Railway belt up to 31st December last, between,—1. The first and second principal meridians. 2. The second and third. 3. The third and fourth. 4. The fourth and fifth.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will call the attention of the Minister of the Interior to this question, and will give the hon. gentleman the statement without any motion.

LIGHTHOUSE ON DISCOVERY ISLAND, B.C.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria) asked, What has occasioned the delay in the construction of the lighthouse on Discovery Island, B.C., as provided for in the estimates 1884-85; at what particular spot is it to be located and upon whose recommendation?

Mr. McLELAN. It was late last Session when it was decided to erect a lighthouse at the point named. It was necessary to obtain the fullest possible information and to prepare the necessary plans. There were a great many other plans on the list ahead of this, and the time of the engineer was fully occupied with them. The plan is now ready, and tenders will be called for in a short time. The site selected is on the south slope of Pandora Hill, and the lighthouse was located by the agent of the Department.

SATUMA ISLAND, B.C.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to erect a lighthouse on the east point of Satuma Island, B.C.? If so, when?

Mr. McLELAN. The Government have not concluded to erect a lighthouse at that point.

BUOYS IN VICTORIA AND NANAIMO HARBORS.

Mr. BAKER, (Victoria) asked, What was the total cost of taking up, laying down and removal of the buoys, respectively, in the harbors of Victoria and Nanaimo and the sand heads of Fraser River?

Mr. McLELAN. The cost of the buoy service at Fraser River was $1,064.49, and Nanaimo, $49.20; Victoria and Esquimalt, $21.66. The cost of taking up and laying down was not obtainable in the Department this morning, as the vouchers are before the Committee of Public Accounts.

CASCUMPEC HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. YEO asked, Is it the intention of the Government to spend the sum of $5,000 voted last Session for the Cascumpec Harbor improvements?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Although the sum of $5,000, voted two years, was not revoked last Session, this matter is now receiving the attention of the Government.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—TIMBER DUES.

Mr. CASEY asked, What amount has become due to the Government by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company as timber dues? How much has been paid of this amount by said company, and at what dates?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government claim $100,000, or thereabouts, from the company. The company dispute the claim, and say they are not liable for it. No payments have been made.

LIVERPOOL HARBOR, N.S.

Mr. FORBES asked, Is it the intention of the Government to replace the automatic buoy off the harbor of Liverpool, Queen's County, Nova Scotia, which either sunk at its moorings or parted them and went adrift in November last, with another automatic buoy or bell buoy, or by a fog whistle on Western Head or Coffin's Island, at the entrance of said harbor?

Mr. McLELAN. The matter is now under the consideration of the Government. It was found difficult to keep the automatic buoy moored. The Government are now considering whether to have an automatic buoy or some other kind.

THE SHORT LINE RAILWAY.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked, When will the plans and reports of the engineers, respecting the Short Line, be laid on the Table of the House?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Ere long.

THE LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR OF QUEBEC.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked, Whether His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec took the same oaths of office as his predecessors; and, if not, what oath did he take?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Lieutenant-Governor took the oath of allegiance and the oath of office; but not the oaths of office.

W. INGLES BRADLEY.

Mr. SOMERVILLE (Brant) moved for:

Return showing the number of days W. Ingles Bradley, clerk in the Department of Railways, has been registered on the departmental attendance book since July 1st, 1884; also showing the number of days attendance for which he has received payment, and the total amount paid, together with the name of the departmental officer certifying the account.

Mr. POPE. There is no objection to this return being brought down. The hon. member will find Bradley's name registered in the book on every day he worked in the Department, but he will not find his name registered there for every day when he worked for the Department outside.

Motion agreed to.

LAND CLAIMS BY BELL AND KAVANAGH.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved for:

1. Copy of all Orders in Council or Departmental Orders respecting S.E. ¼ Section 2, Township 10, Range 19 W. 2. Copies of all claims made to said lands, and the action of the Government thereon. 3. Copies of all petitions, papers and correspondence with the Government by one Joseph Bell and one J. C. Kavanagh, and all other persons, and all replies thereto respecting said lands.

He said: Certain papers have been sent to me by Mr. Bell, of Brandon, Man., or rather by his solicitor. He complains that he has not been justly dealt with by the Department of the Interior, with respect to his claims for this lot. The facts, as I gather from the papers submitted to me, are as follows:—A person, whose name is not disclosed in the papers sent me, located upon the south-east quarter of section two, Township 10, Range 19 W., some three or four years ago. It is alleged that he made certain improvements on the land, built a small shanty upon it, and cultivated the land to some extent, but did not comply fully with the law with regard to homesteaders. It is alleged that a person by the name of J. C. Kavanagh, of the Town of Brandon, having discovered that the original locatee had not complied with the settlement duties jumped the original locatee's claim. He made application to the Crown Land Agent, at Brandon, and on the production of certain evidence he was allowed to make entry for the lot; in other words, as I understand it, Kavanagh—as I suppose he had a perfect right to do at that time—having found the land unoccupied and improved to the extent required by law, took advantage of that fact, and jumped the original homesteader's claim, and thus had the benefit of whatever little improvements he had made, small or great, but not sufficient, as I understand, to comply with the terms of the law. I do not complain of this, nor does, I believe, Mr. Bell or his solicitor, because the land not having been occupied, and the improvements not having been made as they ought to have been made, of course Kavanagh, if he was a settler, had a perfect right to jump the claim, get the entry and take advantage of any improvements made by the previous locatee. I believe it is over two years since Kavanagh jumped the claim of the original homesteader. Now, Kavanagh having jumped the claim of the original homesteader on the ground that he had not been an occupant of the land six months in every year for three years, and had not made the improvements, having taken possession of the land on that technical ground, Kavanagh himself was bound to obey the law. He was bound, if he was an actual settler, to remain on the land six months of every year for three years, and make the improvements required by law. Now, it appears that the law requires that every homesteader shall remain continuously for six months out of every year for three years on the land, that he shall build a house of given dimensions, and shall make a given quantity of improvements each year. It is said that Kavanagh, who got possession of the land in the way I have indicated, never did reside on the land at all, although it was over two years since he made the original entry, that he never built a house on the land of the dimensions required by law, or made any improvement of any kind. Now, this J. C. Kavanagh could not well do that, because, as I am informed, he is postmaster at Brandon, living in Brandon, while the land referred to in this motion is situated some four miles from the city, and Kavanagh never did reside for a single hour on this quarter section, and never made, it is alleged, one dollar's worth of improvements on the land. Now, it is further alleged that on the 18th of August of last year, a person by the name of Joseph Bell, who left the Province of Ontario last fall and went up to Manitoba to settle there, discovered this quarter-section vacant, and having made enquiries amongst his neighbors, was told that it had not been occupied for two years by anybody, he examined the improvements and found that the improvements required by law had not been made on the land. He then made application to the Crown Land Agent in the town of Brandon for the land, doing as Kavanagh before him had done, jumping

the claim of his predecessor. He supplied satisfactory evidence of the facts to the agent—that the land was unoccupied for about two years, and that the improvements had not been made, and the Crown Land Agent, as in duty bound to do, proceeded to make entry for Mr. Bell. It so happened that the post office in Brandon and the Crown Land Agent's office are not far apart, and singularly enough while Mr. Bell was in the act of having his entry made in the Crown Lands Office, Kavanagh's clerk entered the office with papers made out by Kavanagh himself, asking for the cancellation of Kavanagh's entry, and that the entry should be made for Kavanagh's clerk. The clerk produced papers in the office drawn up by Kavanagh asking that his (Kavanagh's) claim might be cancelled, and that the clerk might get an entry for the lot. However, the agent paid no attention to the application, and the entry was made in the name of Mr. Bell. If the matter had stood there Mr. Bell would have had no ground of complaint. The fact I have just mentioned, as far as I know, is established by a letter written by Mr. Todd, solicitor for Mr. Bell, to H. H. Smith, Inspector of Dominion Lands in Winnipeg, Manitoba, in which the following occurs:—

"In writing you on the 25th I forgot to mention the fact that at the same time, or while Mr. Bell was in the Land Office filing his cancellation papers, Mr. Kavanagh, by some means, heard of it, and immediately sent in his own clerk with papers made out to cancel the same quarter section, in his (the clerk's) favor. This fact shows positively that Mr. Kavanagh knew that he had not complied with the terms of the Act and could not legally hold the place."

Now, such are the facts so far as they are detailed to me; and I say that if these facts are correct it is quite clear that the action of Kavanagh in sending his own clerk to cancel his entry in favor of the clerk, is clear evidence that he knew that he had no right to the land, that he was not entitled to hold that quarter section under the law and the regulations of the Department. He was anxious that the entry should be cancelled to himself and be made out to his clerk. Now, this Mr. Bell is evidently not a speculator. That he intended to become an actual bonâ fide settler, I think, is clear enough from the communication of the 25th of September last, sent to the Inspector of Dominion Lands at Winnipeg, in which the following passage occurs:—

"Mr. Bell and his wife came out here from Ontario with a view to taking up land and becoming a bonâ fide settler, and in looking around found this place not occupied, but entered by cancellation of a former entry by Mr. J. C. Kavanagh. On making enquiry, he found that Mr. Kavanagh had never lived on the place or otherwise complied with the terms of the Act for homesteading. He, therefore, at once applied to have the entry cancelled, and filed his papers accordingly."

Now, Sir, the Statute, as I understand it, requires that an actual settler must remain on his land six months in the year and make certain improvements, unless he gets leave of absence. On the 18th day of August, Mr. Bell made his entry in the Crown Lands Office at Brandon, and his entry was received by the Crown Lands Agent. But sixteen days afterwards, Mr. Kavanagh made application for leave of absence; and having produced his medical certificate, he obtained leave of absence. Now, it is quite clear that before the leave of absence was obtained, Mr. Kavanagh had no right at all to this quarter section; and I think the Department should not continue Mr. Kavanagh's rights under a leave of absence granted to him sixteen days after another person had obtained an entry for this same lot. Now, Mr. Bell has been for some time endeavoring to obtain satisfaction from the Department, but so far has not been able to get any. He has written to the Department at Winnipeg, has seen the agent at Brandon, and has communicated with the Department here; and as a last resort he communicated with the First Minister, believing that if he wrote to him, the matter would be attended to. The First Minister, of course, replied to the letter, simply I think referring Mr. Bell to the Department of the Interior, from which, so far, he has been unable to obtain any redress. Now, all these facts have been established by a number of individuals who live in the neighborhood of the land, and who are thoroughly conversant with all the circumstances; and the whole neighborhood, so far as I am informed, are in favor of Mr. Bell getting this quarter section rather than Mr. Kavanagh, for the simple reason that the latter is looked upon as a speculator. He is known to be a Government official, and believed to be an official speculator there, taking advantage of the position the Government has given him as postmaster of Brandon to secure this quarter-section upon which Mr. Bell wishes to settle as a bonâ fide settler. Now, Sir, we have these facts. We have one man who left the Province of Ontario with his family and went to the North-West, and who, finding this lot vacant took possession of it as an actual bonâ fide settler, desiring to become a permanent resident of the country. On the other hand, we have Mr. Kavanagh, a well paid official of the Government, the postmaster of Brandon, who is not engaging in farming operations, whose business is not farming, and who, as long as he remains postmaster of Brandon, can never become a settler on this land. Thus far Mr. Bell has struggled in vain to get satisfaction against this official speculator. These are facts, as they appear from the papers sent to me, some of which have been copied from documents sent to the Government. There are three affidavits made by responsible men in the neighborhood, one a justice of the peace and the other two farmers, detailing these facts. Petitions and remonstrances have been made to the Department of the Interior and to the Government, and so far without success. If these are facts, and I believe they are, this man, Mr. Bell, has not been treated in a way that we would expect settlers going into the North-West with the view of making their future home there ought to be treated. It appears to me that he has been treated with great injustice and harshness. If men from the Province of Ontario or any other Province, or immigrants of any class going into the country, are to meet with obstacles and difficulties such as I have mentioned, we need not be very much surprised if the tide of immigration to that country is not as great as we have reason to expect. Now, the First Minister knows that a man like Joseph Bell, an active, vigorous, persevering fellow, if he does not get what he considers fair play there, will very likely do as others have done, leave the country, and leave not on the best terms with the Department or the Government of the country; and a man who leaves the country because he has received harsh treatment, will do it more harm than half a dozen agents can undo in a year. I trust that the First Minister will examine these papers himself, if he can spare the time from the multiplicity of his engagements, and if he will bring to bear upon them, as I have no doubt he will, a fair judicial mind, I believe he will have no hesitation in awarding the homestead to Mr. Bell. It is intolerable that an official of the Government should be allowed to speculate in lands and keep out an actual bonâ fide settler, as Mr. Bell is described to me to be. I therefore trust that the bringing down of the papers may prove to be unnecessary by reason of the First Minister dealing with the case and doing justice to Mr. Bell, by giving him the land which he is now unable to get.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There can be no objection to this motion passing and the papers being brought down at once. I did not gather from the hon. gentleman that Mr. Bell brought his case before the Land Board.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Yes, he communicated with the inspector. I read the letter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then I suppose the case is before the Land Board. A great many complaints were made, and of necessity made, about delay in the settlement of cases with reference to claims in the North-West, because they had all to be sent down to head-quarters at Ottawa. To avoid that, and to enable such matters to be settled as speedily as possible, a Land Board was formed, of which Mr. Pierce is inspector. This board has done its work steadily and on the whole satisfactorily. They have decided an infinity of cases without coming here, and it is obvious to every hon. member that unless there is an evident case of injustice, it is only unprofitably taking up the time of the House to make it a court of appeal. Complaints of injustice should not be brought here when there is no evidence or authority to show that they were laid before the board, or that the board had rejected a claim improperly, or that there has been unjustifiable delay. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman in his statement that if Mr. Kavanagh has actually forfeited his claim, and that Mr. Bell has thereupon agreed to the terms of the statute and made the entry, no leave of absence to Mr. Kavanagh can restore Mr. Kavanagh's claim. I shall, however, look into this matter.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY RETURNS.

Mr. HESSON moved for :

Statement showing—1st. The number of returns ordered by this House relating in any way to the Canadian Pacific Railway, since the date of the contract with the Government; 2nd. The number granted, and the number refused by the House; 3rd. The cost of preparing such returns, with the names of persons calling for same; and 4th. Said statement to include all returns so called up to the 18th day of February, inst., with the estimated or probable cost of preparing same.

He said: My object in asking for this statement is not to prevent reasonable information being given, as the Government is always and ought always to be ready to give, but if possible to prevent calling for returns, which in many cases are absolutely useless. The matter was brought to my notice in connection with one of those returns. I had the curiosity to go to the Department, and there I found that a great deal of money had been wasted in preparing those returns. 180 orders already have been passed, of which something like 80 have been brought down, and the balance will no doubt come in due time. So far as I can find out, in the British House of Commons, with a population of some 40,000,000 or 50,000,000 of people to care for and provide and enquire for, the returns brought down in one year in this House are equal in number to those brought down in six years in that country. This shows the quickness and ease with which orders are passed by us, and I think it is quite possible we are wasting a great deal of money in that direction. Only last evening we had the pleasure of listening to an hon. gentleman opposite as he dwelt upon the extravagance of the Government.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. HESSON. If I am not to refer to that, I have of course to get around it in some other way. There is no doubt that as a general rule complaint is made against the Government from time to time by hon. gentlemen opposite to the effect that there is gross extravagance in the Departments, and that as the Departments are within the control of the Government their expenses are therefore chargeable directly to the Government. If they were to attempt to refuse these orders, I presume the insinuation would be made that the Government desired to cover up some information that it was proper for the people to have. Therefore the Government dare not raise any objection, and members on this side of the House are generally delicate about making any suggestion on that score, lest it might be said they were endorsing the action of the Government in refusing information. There is not a member on this side of the House who is not delighted to get all the information possible on these subjects, and we do not blame members on the other side for asking for reasonable information, but it ought to be such information as is not only of interest to the gentleman who asks for it, but to the country. A return was asked for on January 30th, 1834, the order was passed by the House, and the work was undertaken during the recess, as it was of such a character that it was impossible to prepare it for that Session. It was brought down on the 19th February, during this Session, and that return has not been examined by one single gentleman, not even by the gentleman who called for the information. For the satisfaction of the House I present to it that return, and I would like to have it placed in the hands of the gentleman who called for it. We have here 4,099 pages of foolscap a good deal of the fool about it, I fancy—and the gentleman who called for it has never seen it, that is the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). It will be in the recollection of the House how much that hon. gentleman complains of the Government for its expenses. I have taken the opinion of competent men in regard to the cost of this return, and I find that it must have been over \$800. The leader of the Opposition smiles in his usual manner, but I venture to say that some poor employé has been ground down to the lowest in order to make the amount so small. Imagine 4,099 pages of foolscap, over $8\frac{1}{2}$ reams of paper. I have sent the return to the hon. member for North Norfolk, who, I am sorry to see, is not in his seat, because, I suppose, he wanted it, and yet he has not thought it worth his while to call and see it. It was under lock and key; I made enquiry and saw it, but the hon. gentleman who moved for it has not thought fit to examine it, and yet he complains of the expenditure. I think, when the sum of \$10,000 a year is spoken of for these returns, that must be under the mark. It is impossible to calculate what they cost over that. Each Department gets out its own returns, and employs extra clerks to do the work, and only the Department itself can know what it costs. I do not wish to prevent the furnishing of information, which is really necessary—I want that to be distinctly understood—but I do want to prevent that sort of useless waste. The House can easily understand what that return may cost, allowing 20 cents a folio, and there are 170 quires of paper into the bargain.

Mr. BLAKE. I have been somewhat amused with the hon. gentleman's motion, and the way he supported it. The hon. gentleman has moved for the returns connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway. He says his reason is to see what the cost has been; he does not want to waste money, and he is going to show there has been a waste of money, and he proves the waste of money by producing an example which has nothing at all to do with the Canadian Pacific Railway, but which I believe has to do with the timber limits in the North-West. According to the hon. gentleman's view there has been a wilful waste in making returns as to timber limits in the North-West, and that is a good reason for sustaining the motion with regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I should be happy to have seconded the hon. gentleman's motion if he had done me the honor to ask me to do so. I am quite willing to bear along with the hon. gentleman and the other 209 members of this House, my share of responsibility for the motions which the House has unanimously called for upon the subject of the Canadian Pacific Railway; but how the hon. gentleman by his motion will be able to ascertain which of these returns, if any, was a useless return, I do not know. After the papers come down we will find the number of returns, and the cost of them, although I hope the cost will not be estimated at 20 cents per folio for copying, as the hon. gentleman has estimated, because that would make somebody very rich, and it will not be the proper cost of this work. I say you will find a number of returns and the cost, but where will you find the occasion upon which the House has erred in ordering the returns, and which particular return is in the interest of the public? The hon.

gentleman has had this motion on the Table a good while. It was on awhile ago, but he was not here when it was called, and it was dropped. He renewed it, and he has been for some time at work to prove instances of extravagance, and after all his exertions he is no nearer the Canadian Pacific Railway than the timber limits in the North-West as to cases of extravagance. The distance which he has reached, however, does not touch the question; he is not even dangerously near it, as the American statesman was once said to be, after speaking an hour and twenty minutes. It is a good thing to know how much these returns have cost upon a proper estimate, but it will not enable us to judge wherein we erred in ordering them. The hon. gentleman has said it is a delicate thing for members of the Government to decline to grant a return. No, Sir, it is not a delicate thing; if the motion be an improper motion, it is the duty of the Government to point out that it is so, and where the House does not choose to say it is an improper motion, they are responsible equally with the other members of this House for the return being granted. The hon. gentleman says it is a delicate thing for the Government to do, and because it is a delicate thing, therefore he does it. But it is not a delicate thing for them at all. Any hon. gentleman who sees that a proposal is being made by this House which is a waste of money and extravagant, has not merely the right, but is also bound, to point it out, and to raise his voice against it—to protest, as the hon. gentleman has to-day protested, against wilful waste and extravagance, and to record his dissent in a proper way by speech if not by motion. The hon. gentleman himself is a party to all these returns; he and I together have agreed that these returns are proper which he now thinks are improper. As far as I myself am concerned, my opinion is that the returns which have been moved for in relation to the Canadian Pacific Railway are not merely proper, but that it was highly in the public interest that the information should be obtained. I do not know that the hon. gentleman has pronounced with reference to any particular one of them, that he and I erred in agreeing that the motion should be made. When he does suggest with reference to any particular return that he and I, in the partnership which we have established in this matter, committed an error, why, then, that partnership may be dissolved, and he and I may be disposed to differ; but up to this time I have not heard any statement as to any one of these returns having been ordered in error.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson), in making this motion, expresses his desire to economise public funds. I think every hon. member in this House entirely concurs with him in that wish. I think, however, he has succeeded in establishing to the House that there has been an unwise expenditure of money, but he has not, perhaps, succeeded in placing that expenditure at the door of those hon. members whom he wishes to inculpate. He states that an hon. gentleman who moved for papers here, which were produced, has not, up to this time, perused them. I should like to know how he could have perused them since they were produced. Because, up to this moment they have not been perused, he infers they are never going to be perused. He finally infers from all this that $800 has been wasted because of the motion made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). All that the hon. member for North Perth has established is that the Government have obeyed the order of this House for producing certain papers at a cost of $800, which is, I think, according to the tariff, $600 more than they ought to have cost.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think it was $750 too much. I can say with regard to the paper produced in answer to the motion of the hon. member for North Norfolk, that I was requested personally by that hon. gentleman, to go through and examine those papers in company with another member of this House, and went through them. I think that is strong evidence that the hon. member for North Norfolk did not order those papers for no purpose. I have ordered some papers myself in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I am sorry that in the estimation of the hon. member for North Perth I should have been guilty of impropriety in doing so. Perhaps it would be well after this, when an hon. member desires to make a motion for returns that the motion should be submitted to the hon. gentleman to decide whether he considers it in the interests of the country that the House should have that return or not. He appears to be willing to sit in judgment on the Opposition members in this matter; he condemns strongly the course they have taken in asking for these papers. I acknowledge that he has had considerably more parliamentary experience than I have had myself, and I would have no objection, for the purpose of saving money, that the House should submit these motions for his personal consideration that he may decide, in the wisdom his greater experience gives him, whether it is in the public interest that the return should be granted. I do not think the hon. gentleman has any right to find fault with us on the score of expenditure. Many people are employed during the Session in preparing these returns; I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has any friend of his employed in that connection—possibly he has, possibly he has not. However, I may state once more that the papers moved for by the hon. member for North Norfolk were examined by myself and another gentleman at his request, and out of those papers he got the information for which he asked.

Mr. TROW. I can corroborate the statements made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. These papers were examined by several members of the House; I, myself, devoted several hours to their examination on behalf of the hon. member for North Norfolk. In our perusal of those papers we found some correspondence of interest to the hon. member for North Perth; we found several documents with reference to a particular friend of his, residing in the city of Toronto, anxious to obtain a timber limit, and that particular friend happens to be his own son-in-law. The hon. gentleman should be the last to call in question documents of that nature when called for by hon. members.

Mr. HESSON. No doubt the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat took a little longer to examine the papers when he found them so interesting. He might have found, also, some information of considerable personal interest to himself if he had looked through them carefully. But apart from that, I leave it to the intelligence of this House if it is possible, for even such clever gentlemen as those who have declared they have been acting as deputies for the hon. member for North Norfolk—and we all know that nature has not been less liberal to them in that respect than to other hon. gentlemen—that it was possible for them to grasp and comprehend what those papers meant during the few moments they lay upon the Table of the House. We have the assurance of the gentlemen in charge that there is but one gentleman in this House besides myself who has examined those returns which were sent up to the room where they are usually kept. My hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, takes me to task for not having come more closely to the question of the Canadian Pacific Railway returns. I went to the room with the view of looking at those returns, to ascertain, if possible, if there was any information on the subject there, but the first thing I met was this Jumbo of a return, which prevented me from looking any further. I was convinced that I had come across a huge elephant, and that, if the first return I reached comprised 4,099 pages, it was beyond my power to examine much further. If the gentleman, in the few minutes the return was on the Table, was able to get at the information it contained, I cannot understand it. I have the assurance that neither that gentleman nor any one else had called at the room where these returns were kept under lock and key, and that only myself and another member of the House had been there. I hope the leader of the Opposition is as sincere as he pretends in his desire to keep down the expenditure when he asks that the question should be referred to some parties in this House who should be the proper persons to judge of the value of these returns.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not say that.

Mr. HESSON. Then the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) did.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps he did.

Mr. HESSON. He said the question should be referred to myself. Did he recollect that he is here, like myself, to watch that unnecessary expenditures are avoided as far as possible. If we can gather the value of a return at all, I think it would be by the gentleman who called for it thinking it worth while to spend some time over it and give the information which it contained to the public. It is stated that my name was included in that return as an applicant for timber limits. That is no greater discovery than might be made in regard to any member of this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. HESSON. There may be some exceptions, but they are very few. A list was published before, and nearly every member was included in that as an applicant either for himself or for a friend. I may say that I have no interest in any limit or in any foot of land the Government possesses. If, however, I can obtain any grant for any of my constituents, I have a right to do so, and I shall feel it a privilege to do that for my constituents or my friends. The wish of the country was that that region should be developed, that the limits should be developed and the land settled, and whatever facility can be given in that direction is perfectly justifiable. The member for North Norfolk must have had some object in moving for this return, and that object ought not to be lost in a year. It is nearly a month since the return was brought down, and, if he could not find time to investigate it, he could not have thought it very valuable. If a gentleman gets a speech in, when he is asking for an order of the House, and that is all he wants, it would be far better to let the order drop than to put the country to this unnecessary expense. I should like to have this information for the benefit of the public. I did not ask for information in regard to all the returns, but, on the question of the Canadian Pacific Railway, I thought it necessary that we should know whether it was desirable to spend almost as much in getting returns as in lending them sums of money.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like to enquire from the hon. member from North Perth (Mr. Hesson), as he seems to have devoted some attention to the subject, whether among those returns as to timber limits is included a certain celebrated correspondence which has lately appeared, known as the Mitchell-Macpherson correspondence, because, if so, he greatly underrated the value of the return which has been brought down. I have not had time to examine the return, but I should like to know whether it includes that correspondence.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Three or four of these motions for returns are going to take up all the afternoon.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I heard some one say that this motion would take all the afternoon. If so, I am not to blame for it, and I am quite sure I do not occupy much of the time of the House. What I have to say I mean to say, and I have no fear of intimidation even from my friends on this side of the House. I do not think the hon. member now interrupting me will gain anything by doing so. If Mr. Speaker cannot keep order, I will take my seat. I am sorry these returns were placed on the Table of the House. Their appearance has certainly had a very depressing effect on the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson), so much so that he was constrained to quote the lines of Watts :

"No foot of land do I possess,
No cottage in the wilderness."

And the hon. member for South Perth, who is usually jolly and pleasant, looked at those returns on the Table and was no longer able to smile. I understand the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has come into the House and sat down right behind them, and he will soon be as solemn as a tombstone. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. McMullen), a genial and smiling gentleman, also looks depressed; he has spent three or four hours on these returns. Now they have been piled before the genial face and countenance of the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Wright) to see if they will not take the smile out of his face. It is very unfortunate that these returns should have been brought in here. I have not had the pleasure or the misfortune to look over them, and so they have had no effect on me. One word about the main question, as to asking for returns. I sympathise, I cannot help sympathising, largely with the Opposition in this House, having been myself in Opposition for seven or eight years, in asking for information on all subjects connected with the welfare, happiness, comfort and business relations of the people of Canada. It is a very wide subject, and one that can be elucidated in many ways; but who is to tell how far one is to go? No doubt those hon. gentlemen experience, as I experienced when in Opposition, difficulty from receiving letters from constituents and from absent friends, even from Government friends, who do not wish to embarrass Government supporters by asking them to take action, asking that certain returns be moved for. Sometimes the practice may be abused, but it is very difficult to determine how far it should be allowed to go. Hon. gentlemen want the most complete information that can be furnished, and in that view it is possible they may ask for returns which, when they come down to this House, are found not to elucidate the subject in hand. It is a matter you can hardly control, and I sympathise with any member who is requested by his constituents or by the humblest citizen of Canada to ask for certain returns; and though they may prove afterwards to be almost useless, yet in the discharge of an important public duty the member has a right to ask for them. I do not think, therefore, we can curtail this expenditure very much, on account of the wide range of subjects with which we have to deal, and the pressure brought by parties outside of this House who ask that grievances be enquired into, and there is no mode by which you can make such enquiry except by asking for the returns, which afford the member making the motion an opportunity of speaking on the question, or if he does not wish to speak he can ask that the information be brought down. While I sympathise with the hon. member for North Perth, who found these returns useless, and who experienced a depressing effect by looking at them, as indeed have all other members who have looked into them, I think this is one of the evils that seems to be attendant on parliamentary procedure, namely, that some returns will prove useless, but on the other hand there is no other way of securing the beneficial results which follow from motions for returns.

Mr. FAIRBANK. I think the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) has done the House a positive service by pointing out this afternoon the enormous bulk of the returns brought down in regard to timber licenses in the North-West. These returns furnish a better proof of the magnitude of the business done in that direction than any which hon. members yet possess. It will be a wonder if there is a bush in the North-West which is not under license.
Mr. WOODWORTH.

Mr. McCRAANEY. I have spent parts of several days looking over these returns, and I consider that no more useful returns have been brought down to the House this Session. I think if some hon. members had known that all this correspondence would have been brought down they would have been more careful in criticising this return in regard to timber licenses. I understood the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Farrow) to state yesterday that nine-tenths of all motions made came from the Opposition side of the House; but I find in looking over the paper to-day that 93 motions are asked for, 34 of which are made by Government supporters. I find that through the Session nearly one-half the motions are made by Government supporters. It is necessary in the public interest that we should procure information on different subjects, and I am satisfied it is in the interest of the country that these returns should have been prepared, although they are said to have cost $800. I think it is money well spent, although I have no hesitation in saying that I could find a man who would have done all the work for $50. I merely wish to make this statement as the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) said the returns have not been examined. I have examined them during parts of several days.

Mr. COCKBURN. I desire to express one thought in connection with this matter. If a proper system of disposing of timber limits by public auction were in operation it would save all this trouble and expense.

Motion agreed to.

THE FIVE PER CENT. CONSOLIDATED LOAN.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved for:

Copies of all Orders in Council, correspondence or papers of any kind in possession of the Government relative to the retirement of the 5 per cent. consolidated loan, maturing upon the 1st January, 1885.

He said: In placing this motion in your hands, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words on a subject of considerable importance. It will be within the recollection of the House that about thirteen months ago, or thereabouts, when we were discussing the question of an advance or loan of $30,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway, I took occasion to call the attention of the House and the Government as strongly as I could to one fact that of itself, I thought ought to have deterred them from making that particular loan, or, at all events, the whole of it, at that particular time. I pointed out then that in view of the large funding operations that were inevitable, and of the fact that the Government of Canada would undoubtedly be obliged to borrow large sums of money, in any case, for the purpose of paying the subsidy due to the railway and for other purposes, it was extremely unfortunate that the Government should have felt compelled to come down last year to ask us to loan that money to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that there was serious danger that they would hamper and impede the action of the Finance Minister in refunding. Now, Sir, I am sorry to say that that warning was neglected, that to a considerable extent the evil consequences dreaded appear likely to come upon us, although I think that the case was plain and clear enough, and that under the circumstances the hon. Finance Minister should have felt called upon to take much greater precautions than ordinary. Lest I should misrepresent the hon. gentleman in any way I desire, Mr. Speaker, with your leave to read the statement recently made by him with respect to the steps he is taking for the purpose of refunding the 5 per cent. debt, and of providing for our further liabilities. The hon. gentleman spoke as follows:—

"I think it very probable that the members of this House would like to know the course that the Government are to pursue with reference to the maturing liabilities bearing 5 per cent. interest, as well as to this floating debt. There are $25,000,000 of the present 5 per cent. loan in the hands of the public. The balance of about $7,000,000 is really held by the Government in the sinking fund, and therefore, of the loan which matures in June next, $25,000,000 must be provided for either by the payment direct to the holders direct or by some other arrangement by which other bonds will be exchanged. I am not in a position to state definitely what course the Government will take, but it has been suggested and it is now under consideration, though it has not been fully decided upon, that the Government should offer to those who hold these 5 per cent. bonds a loan to be paid in 7 or 10 years in redemption of the 5 per cent. debentures that they hold, at such a rate as may be considered in the interest of Canada and such as will induce them to exchange them, and the Government look upon this proposition somewhat favorably because, in 1891, or we hope shortly after that, when the Canadian Pacific Railway has been completed and it is established that there is a profit and a value in that railway, arrangements will be made by which the past mortgage which we hold upon it at present may be relinquished and we may get the money back, and, if we took a long period of debentures, 30 or 50 years, we would have to go into the market and buy back debentures at a very high rate. At any rate, it would put the Government in a position, with a very short time intervening, to make arrangements for these $25,000,000; and then it is suggested that by Treasury bills we should extend the temporary loans made in Canada or in England for six or twelve months, so that in fact the Government will not be required to go into the London market with any debentures in the present calendar year except for the redemption of the $25,000,000 at 5 per cent. interest due on the 1st July next. At all events, we feel that we shall be in a position to provide for this in some shape or form in the interest of the country and without materially depressing the value and character of our securities."

Now, Sir, that is a statement which deserves consideration. I did not feel disposed to enlarge upon it during the Budget debate, because this motion was coming up, and I thought it was much more convenient both for the hon. Finance Minister and myself that it should be discussed apart and upon its own merits. Now there is no use in denying that there is an uneasy feeling in the country at present in business circles, largely produced by the fact that it has appeared since the opening of this House that we have an unusually large floating debt and an unusually large sum maturing at a fixed date on the 1st of July; and further, that there are large liabilities accruing from month to month for which no provision has been made. I cannot say, Mr. Speaker, that that uneasiness is at all likely to be allayed by the statement made the other night which I have just read. Let us consider the proposals which the Finance Minister makes to us. First of all, he says that if he can persuade the holders of our 5 per cent. securities to exchange them for a short loan it is his intention—and the Government are favorably disposed to consider the proposal—to issue a short loan at seven or ten years. Then, Sir, he tells us that as to our floating liabilities of twelve and a-half millions he proposes to renew these for periods of six and twelve months, but he does not say a single syllable as to the other liabilities which are accruing, and which will (and I am open to correction if I overstate the case) which I believe must amount to several millions of dollars, and very probably to ten or twelve millions. According to the hon. gentleman's statement he has not yet paid the whole of the thirty millions of dollars to the Canadian Pacific Railway; I think he still owes them on that loan about four millions or thereabouts. He also owes, or it was so stated in the House, about four millions of dollars more on account of the subsidy, which is distinct from the loan, and there are other liabilities which will undoubtedly considerably swell the sum total for which he will have to provide in all probability in the course of the next few months. Now, Sir, I must say that the expedients which the hon. gentleman proposes appear to me to be very dubious. First of all, I have my doubts—and I think the hon. gentleman must admit that that doubt is not without reason—whether he will be able to carry out the exchange he proposes with the holders of our 5 per cent. securities. As a general rule short loans of seven or ten years are not looked upon with much favor in the English market.

He may be able to do it, but I should think the thing was decidedly doubtful. In the next place, it is well known to those who have studied the stock exchange market in London that they do not like to have many securities of the same country, of whatever class they may be, and they are sure to object to the introduction of a new security, such as the 4 per cent. bonds, running for seven or ten years, when they now have the same bonds running for sixteen or twenty or twenty-five years, and when we have recently introduced a new security in the shape of our 3½ per cent. bonds. Moreover, the House will remember from the papers brought down by the hon. gentleman that this business of issuing new loans is attended by heavy expenditures. I do not think that he himself supposes that he will be able to float his new loan, if he has to float it, without paying commissions, brokerages, and other expenses. Now, Sir, we had to pay £67,000 sterling, or about $330,000, for commissions and brokerages on the five million which he negotiated the other day. There were besides allowances amounting, speaking roughly, to about £30,000, so that in negotiating a loan of about five millions the cost was £100,000 in round numbers, or about $500,000. It would be very inexpedient that we should go to all that expense for a loan running for seven or ten years, and yet, from the circumstances to which I will call attention, I think it is too likely, if the Finance Minister has to issue a short loan, that he will be compelled to pay these heavy charges again, and that whoever succeeds him or whoever may be in office seven or ten years hence, will, when that time comes, have to pay for another loan; because I think the hon. gentleman is assuming rather too much when he assumes that we can rely on the thirty million dollars which were advanced to the Canadian Pacific Railway being punctually paid in 1891 or even in 1894. Of course I am bound to suppose, when the Finance Minister declares that he is going to base an important financial transaction on the assumption that seven, or it may be ten, years hence the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are going to pay these thirty millions back that he is best entitled to represent the expectations or intentions of the Government; but I have observed very recently, in organs which are usually supposed to know something about intentions of the Government, some statements which are wonderfully inconsistent with any proposition pointing to the repayment of those thirty million dollars in 1891. Now, I have also to say to the Minister of Finance that I believe he will find that all those renewals are likely to hurt our credit. It is not a good sign, as my hon. friend beside me very properly remarked, that a merchant is obliged to renew his paper. It is a very bad sign when the Finance Minister of Canada is obliged to borrow money for five, six, or eight months, and then to come and tell us that he is likely to be obliged to renew those bills again. I am afraid, Sir, that from the statements made we can only deduce this conclusion, that the 3½ per cent. loan which was floated has proved in a certain sense a failure. No doubt the hon. gentleman has got his money; but I can only conclude from the statements he has made that he is aware that that loan is still in the hands of the middlemen and is still unabsorbed in the London market; otherwise, I am utterly at a loss to understand the statements he has made, and still more the action he has had recourse to. Now, Sir, I am afraid that a very serious error of judgment indeed has been committed in this matter. I am afraid that the Minister has committed two errors. He knew that this 5 per cent. loan of $25,000,000 as he calls it, was to mature on the 1st of January, 1885. It was for our credit, it was to our interest, that the money should have been paid on the 1st of January. It is unfortunate that it was not done. I think the Minister, if he possibly could, ought to have brought out another loan in October or November, 1884, in order to provide for the payment of that sum when it matured. That would have been the wise course; that would have been the course that would have sustained our credit best; that was the course which he himself intimated he intended to pursue, and it is very unfortunate that he did not pursue it. If the case be, on the other hand, as I suppose, that the Minister of Finance was unable in October, or November, to float a loan which would enable him to retire our bonds maturing on the 1st of January, then I say he has committed a very grave error of judgment indeed, seeing that, finding himself obliged to borrow so large a sum of money as $12,500,000 from banks in England and banks in this country, he should have given notice to pay off this 5 per cent. loan on the 1st of July next. If it was impossible for him to float another loan in October or November, that ought to have been a warning to him not to have all these liabilities maturing together on the country at the same time; and I cannot but regard it as unfortunate, either that he did not provide, as he might, I think, have done, for the payment of our 5 per cents. at the date at which they mature, or if he found that impossible, that he should have complicated the position by giving the notice he did of the payment on the 1st of July next. I quite recognize the desirability of paying off that 5 per cent. loan; but it is very questionable whether it is desirable to pay it off at the expense and to the injury of our credit, which will result from renewing the $12,500,000 which he has borrowed at short dates. Now, I think all this is very much to be regretted for another reason. A most splendid opportunity has been thrown away of refunding our loan on terms exceedingly advantageous to Canada. There can be no doubt whatever in the mind of anybody acquainted with the situation of the finances of Canada, that a very much better bargain could have been made for us if we had not made that advance to the Canadian Pacific Railway—if the Finance Minister had been in a position to go to London a few months ago with nothing to provide for except the refunding of our debt and the raising of a comparatively small sum of money; and as it was a piece of most extraordinary good fortune befell the hon. gentleman which saved him, I suspect, from serious inconvenience, but which might, under other circumstances, have been handled in such a fashion as would have redounded very much to his credit and very much to the profit of the people of Canada. Almost at the moment when he was floating his last loan, the English Chancellor of the Exchequer had declared his intention of reducing English consols from 3 per cent. to 2½ per cent. That declaration gave a great impetus to all other good securities in the London market, and afforded the Finance Minister an opportunity to place our loan on the market on very favorable terms. I think it is not too much to say that if he and the Government had not chosen to hamper themselves by their injudicious advance to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and by the other advances they were obliged to make for the purpose of inducing the House to swallow that measure, he could have made an infinitely better bargain for Canada than he was able to make. Not only has the hon. gentleman lost that opportunity (which in the nature of things can hardly be expected to recur), but it is only too probable that the hon. gentleman for the time being—I hope not for long—has failed to establish our new issue of 3½ per cents. on anything like a firm basis. It is quite clear that he has failed to get rid of the sinking fund. That, I think, also was a serious error. I think our sinking fund is altogether too large for the wants of this country, and it adds unnecessarily to the expenditure and the amount of money we have to raise by way of taxation on the people. Now, Sir, even if the hon. gentleman does succeed in renewing the $13,000,000, it is still only too obvious that he will have to effect a large loan. He admits that he has to provide $25,000,000 on the 1st of July next. He has also, if I understand his position at all, to provide $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 additional for the additional capital expense to which we are pledged, and that without taking into account a large amount of possible liabilities, which are computed, I see, by the Deputy Minister of Finance, in the report of the finances laid on the Table, at something like $6,000,000, exclusive of a payment of $200,000 a year, running for fifteen years. Now, I want to call the attention of the hon. gentleman himself and of the House to this plain fact. He has, as I say, compelled himself to make a large loan in any case. Were he to take up his floating debt, were he to provide for the $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 which I believe will require to be expended on capital account, in addition to the $25,000,000 which he must redeem, it is clear that in order to put himself in a good position he would have to negotiate a very large loan. If he negotiated on the same terms as before he would require to borrow, between this and the 1st of July, about £12,000,000 sterling, very nearly $60,000,000, in the English market. If he renews his temporary loan of $12,000,000, he will still require to borrow a large amount of money. Supposing he places it at 3½ per cent., he will have to borrow from $45,000,000 to $50,000,000, as the case may be. In any case, he will require to borrow a very large sum. Now, he is going to do that under circumstances of the most disadvantageous kind, whereas, by proper management, he might have done it under circumstances of a very favorable nature. First of all, it is not well that he should go into the English market with the knowledge, on the part of English capitalists, that he is obliged to pay a large sum of money on a given day. That, as every business man will see, is a disadvantage to him. In the next place, he has practically exhausted all his other resources. He cannot go on borrowing, either in England or here, to an indefinite extent; he has borrowed already twelve and a-half millions and he will probably in the interval have to borrow more. Thus he has left himself without resources in the event of circumstances occurring which would make it unadvisable to float his loan at a particular day. I must remind the hon. gentleman that it is unfortunate, under the circumstances, that he should have attempted to float a loan in Canada in 1883 and should have failed. That loan should not have been allowed to fail.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. What loan?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Canadian 4 per cent. loan, which the hon. gentleman attempted to float in 1883.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I did not attempt to float any loan in 1883.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I myself was a subscriber to the loan; it was a domestic loan.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I had quite forgotten that; I thought you were speaking of English loans.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As it was a failure, I understand the hon. gentleman has good reason to forget it. I pointed out at the time I thought it was unfortunate. That loan should not have been allowed to fail, because it is not well, when you are going to a foreign market, that it should be known the only attempt you made to float a domestic loan was a failure. Then the hon. gentleman has run another risk. It is well known to the hon. gentleman and to every one who pays the slightest attention to public affairs that Europe to-day is in a disturbed condition, and that there is a probability when the hon. gentleman goes to float a loan its condition may be much more disturbed. I recollect, in 1876, what a serious contingency that was; I recollect in 1876, on the occasion of the last loan I had to float in London, that very great care had to be observed and great precaution taken to obtain a favorable moment to place it on the market. It was but a small loan of two and a-half million pounds sterling, or twelve and a-half million dollars, yet we were obliged to watch with the greatest care for a favorable moment to launch it on the market; and had we not succeeded in taking advantage of a very short lull, had we delayed issuing the loan for a bare forty-eight hours, very considerable loss would have resulted to the people of Canada, from the fact that at the end of that very short period disturbances were renewed. It is further unfortunate that we should have to float a loan, in view of the statement the hon. gentleman recently made, which cannot escape attention, namely, that unless he credits to revenue $500,000 from Dominion lands, which ordinarily belongs to capital account, a serious deficit is pending. I hope he will be right and that I will be wrong, and that the deficit will not be as serious as I am afraid it will be; but there is no doubt that, according to any proper system of book-keeping, instead of the surplus of $150,000 which the hon. gentleman claims, there is really a deficit, on his own showing, of $350,000. There is but too good reason to believe, from looking at the English stock reports, that the hon. gentleman's former loan is not yet absorbed; and he knows, as well as I, that that, in itself, is always a serious obstacle to be encountered in floating a fresh loan. Moreover, he told us, in his place here, that Canada had many enemies in the London market. I am sorry to hear it. I am sorry, too, that the course of the Government has not been such in all respects as to conciliate some of those persons; but I am afraid the hon. gentleman may, in this respect, be speaking the truth. Then what is the inference to be drawn? It is that a man going to the London market where, he says, he has many enemies, should have neglected no precautions, exposed himself to no unnecessary risks, and have done everything he could to prevent possible failure. I am sorry to say that the proceedings of the hon. gentleman are far from appearing to have been taken with a view to guard against misfortune; they appear, on the contrary, to have been taken in such a way as to expose him to a check at almost every turn. I do not suppose he will be unable to get his money, but I fear it will be found that the result of the hon. gentleman's operations will be this, that we will be obliged to pay a much larger rate for the money than we might otherwise have got it at; and as that will go on for a matter of five and twenty or fifty years, unless indeed he effects the short loan of which he speaks—which I doubt very much—it is quite clear there will be a very serious loss inflicted upon the people, from which this generation at least will suffer very considerably. I cannot help expressing my belief that one of the penalties we have to pay for that unfortunate advance made last year to the Canadian Pacific Railway is that by this advance we lost the finest opportunity ever given to any Canadian Finance Minister of affecting a brilliant financial coup in London. Not having been there I speak with reserve, but I believe, had the Finance Minister been able to go to London, and had not gone weighted with the entanglements and embarrassments inflicted on him by the advance to the Canadian Pacific Railway, it was possible, at that particular time, by the use of proper means, to have put a Canadian 3 per cent. loan upon the market on fairly favorable terms. Of course I am aware that that could not be done after what had been done by this House; but let it be remembered that we lost very heavily, indirectly, in consequence of that particular advance. I will not attempt to compute, it would be impossible to compute, the total loss we may sustain in consequence of these operations. I believe, however, that loss will be found to be very heavy. I will be very glad, indeed, if it be proved that I am mistaken, and if it be proved that we escape in this particular instance without much loss; but I say that if we do it will be due to sheer good luck, and in no respect to any foresight or sagacity in the administration of our affairs. It is quite true that, as regards the advance to the Canadian Pacific Railway, the hon. gentleman shares with his colleagues the responsibility of that measure; but as I have pointed out, the subsequent complications are of his making. I repeat, I think he has committed a grave error in judgment in what he has done. He ought either to have provided at the proper time, the 1st of January, for the redemption of the 5 per cent. or not have complicated the matter by giving the notice which he has unfortunately given, and I call the attention of the House to the position in which he now is. From the statement recently made by him and from the published statement in the Gazette, it is quite clear that against our great mass of liabilities in notes and Savings banks deposit, we hold the bare minimum in gold and guaranteed securities provided by law, so that there is nothing to fall back upon in case of necessity. It is quite clear also from the Gazette returns that the Finance Minister has practically at this moment very little on deposit in the banks. You cannot strip yourself entirely of available funds; a country like this, carrying on great works, must have considerable sums on deposit in the various banks; yet I do not believe the hon. gentleman has more in the banks than he requires to keep there to meet the ordinary calls on the Treasury. There is another point which seriously aggravates the awkwardness of the position. On looking at the Gazette returns the House will see that the banks of Canada at present hold $4,000,000 of legal tenders, payable in gold, beyond what the statute requires them to hold. The statute requires that they should have a cash reserve of $20,000,000; of that they are required by law to hold 40 per cent., or $8,000,000 in legal tender notes. As a matter of fact, they hold $12,000,000 in legal tender note, so that there are $4,000,000 of those notes for which they are fully entitled, under the hon. gentleman's own regulation, to demand gold from the Treasury. More than that there is no law, there is no rule, there is nothing in the world to compel them to hold this $20,000,000. They may run down their cash reserve, if they like, and they might like for many reasons to run it down to $12,000,000, or even a smaller amount, and in that case a still larger amount of legal tenders would be set free, and it would be in their power to demand them. I have pointed out that the hon. gentleman has already exhausted his other resources by borrowing very largely at short dates from banks here and from banks in England also, for payments which will have to be made at fixed dates, which will very soon mature, and I may point out to him that, although I do not myself anticipate that any very serious immediate trouble will arise from demands on the part of the Savings Bank depositors, yet it is quite possible, and ought to be guarded against, that should there be a serious stringency in this market, considerable sums might be withdrawn from him for the purpose of investment elsewhere, for all which he would have to provide. Now, I must confess that I listened with considerable astonishment to the statement he made a few days ago; and, on calmly reading it over, it does appear to me that the hon. gentleman has gone out of his way to invite disaster in this particular case. I tell him that he has neglected all those precautions which a man in his position ought to take, and he has neglected them in spite of the clearest and most emphatic warning and, if we do escape serious inconvenience—I will not speak of disaster—it will be simply because the chapter of accidents and sheer good luck has befriended us.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There is no objection to the motion offered by the hon. gentleman. The information that he seeks for will be brought down with great pleasure. The hon. gentleman has pointed out to the House and to myself, as Financial Minister, the great risk we are running, with reference to the credit of the Dominion of Canada and the difficulties that are ahead of us. Well, I might content myself with allowing his speech to go to the country, and simply stating to him that I will place the experience of the last five years and the result of the negotiations of the present Minister of Finance against his operations, and let the public decide in whose hands they think they are more perfectly safe. I think I might do that with safety. I must admit, and I think any candid man will admit, that going into the English market for \$22,500,000 more than you would otherwise require, as was required in the loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway, does not increase the value of our securities. That is, that the price supposed to be obtained for the securities that would be floated for the redemption and for the exchange, or paying off the 5 per cent. securities, would not likely be as favorable as if that loan had not been required. I think I admitted this when the Canadian Pacific Railway proposition was under the consideration of the House, and when the hon. gentleman called attention to the fact that we had \$25,000,000 maturing of 5 per cent. securities, which had to be paid off in January next. I pointed out then, and I think it will be so found, that the worst that could happen to us would be that, as it was in the hands of the Government to say when that would be paid off, we might postpone that for a short time, until a favorable opportunity came for its redemption. The hon. gentleman who spoke last night referred to this as an overdue debt of \$25,000,000. I want to call the attention of the House, in this connection, to the fact, that that was a loan floated, I think, by Sir Alexander Galt, or, at all events, by the Finance Minister of Canada, twenty-five years ago. It was a fifty year loan, and it was optional with the Government to redeem it in twenty-five years, at three months' or six months' notice, and the time has arrived when the Government could give that notice and redeem it if they thought it in the interest of the country to do so. When I was in England, in June last, and floated that loan, notwithstanding that it was known that we were coming in June or July, or January next, or shortly after the loan was floated, for \$25,000,000 more, we got a price equal to 2 per cent. per annum on a 4 per cent. loan of \$25,000,000, or $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. more than we ever got and 11 per cent. better than was obtained on any loan ever floated by the hon. gentleman opposite. I admit that there are responsibilities connected with the liabilities, and great responsibilities on the Finance Minister. In September, I was anxious to give the notice to pay off the loan in January if it were in the interests of the Dominion of Canada to do it, but we know that the bank rate at that time was 5 per cent., and it was not considered desirable by our agents to give the notice then, in the interests of the Dominion, expecting that a higher rate would be obtained when the bank rate was lowered, so the notice was given in the end of December to pay the debt on the 29th June next. I will venture to say that, had the Government given notice in September and put a loan on the market in October or November, when that high rate of interest prevailed, and had not realised as much as we had in June on the $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. loan, the hon. gentleman opposite would have been the first to condemn the Finance Minister and the Government for placing the loan on the market at an unfavorable time, when it was in the option of the Government to say when they should place it, whether they should give three or six months' notice, and might select their own time. We know that the rate of interest was very high at that particular time, and I think the correspondence, when it comes down, will show that the action taken by the Government was taken upon the advice and recommendation of our agents, who are watching with Sir Charles Tupper, the state of the market and what it is in the interest of the Government to do. I admit that the responsibilities are great, but I am not afraid that the credit of the Dominion of Canada does not stand in a position that will enable us to avail ourselves of the most favorable time, either by a temporary loan, a six or a twelve months' loan, if it is considered in the interests of the country to do it. If it should be found in May or early in June that it is better to float a loan to cover the whole of it, the Government will do it. If, on the contrary, it is thought better to tide over six months and wait till January next, when the circumstances of the money market may be more favorable than they are in May or June next, then the Government will take that course. I admit that the additional loan of \$22,500,000 renders it not so easy for us to obtain the money on quite as favorable terms as if we had not gone into the market for that sum, but I have no fear whatever with reference to our being able to raise the money necessary to meet the maturing liabilities in a manner which will be in the interests of the country. If disaster comes, if we should find that the circumstances of the country are such that we have made sacrifices, and lost money by not placing it in the market last year, then it will be time enough for the hon. gentlemen opposite to censure the Government, and then they will have some data upon which to found their charge; but at the present time, I think it is just as well that we should take a fair and reasonable, and if you will, a bright view with reference to this subject, at the same time using, as we are doing, every necessary precaution, in order that we may see that no serious difficulty will arise in meeting our maturing liabilities. There is no objection whatever to this motion, and the information will be furnished at the earliest possible date.

Mr. BLAKE. I quite agree with the hon. Finance Minister that it is proper at this time, and I will go further, and say it is proper at all times, to take a fair and reasonable view of our situation; but to say that a fair and reasonable view will necessarily be a bright view is another question. The hon. gentleman asks us to go a little further, and not only take a fair and reasonable view, but to take a bright view, too. The hon. gentleman has entirely omitted to notice a very important part of the statement of my hon. friend from South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright). The hon. member for South Huron pointed out that the hon. gentleman, when giving us a resumé of the financial state of the country, and as it is to be during the year now commenced, adverted to the circumstance that he had between $12,000,000 and $13,000,000 borrowed on short dates, in different banks here and in the old world. He pointed out that the hon. Minister had stated that his scheme of finance with reference to that $12,000,000 or $13,000,000 was not a settled scheme, but the inclination of his mind was that he would make a short loan to redeem those current obligations, a loan of from seven to ten years, feeling, as he did in his heart, that in the year 1891 he would be encumbered with an embarrassment of riches, that when the golden shower of the Canadian Pacific Railway reimbursements should take place, he would not know what to do with his wealth, and he thought it was expedient to provide a source into which he might pour these millions which he expects to receive from the company in the year 1891. Therefore, provident as he was, provident as he always is, careful to provide for contingencies more or less remote, and which may be in the region of the probable, or even of conjecture, the hon. gentleman, I say, suggested, as amongst the probabilities, a short loan for this $12,000,000 or $13,000,000. The reason why he was to provide for them this year was obvious; they could not be held over in their present condition very much longer, and he stated that Treasury bills might be emitted so as to prevent even a short loan from being proposed during the current year. Well, now, what my hon. friend from South Huron pointed out a moment ago was, that the hon. gentleman did not then, any more than he has done this afternoon, take into account the current liabilities on capital account, the payments which we are making from month to month, the remaining payments in round figures of $8,000,000 to be made to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and the remaining payments, amounting to some millions, to be paid for the Government section of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and the other expenditures upon capital account to be made during the current year—these also have to be provided for upon credit of one kind or another. My hon. friend made a rough estimate of what the amount is. The Finance Minister entirely ignores that, he gives us no information about it, he does not think it worth while to mention it. Perhaps, just as he forgot the domestic loan a little while ago, he has forgotten the existence of those current liabilities. Yet he will be reminded of them in a very disagreeable way, if he does not provide ways and means to meet them. The situation is complicated by the circumstance that every month of this year, or, at any rate, for several months, until September and October next, there are considerable current demands upon the Treasury which are to be met, not out of the current revenue, but by borrowing in some shape or other. It is not a short loan, therefore, of 12,000,000 or 14,000,000 of money, but it is a loan of some kind or other, of a considerably larger number of millions, which is to be made in order to complete the hon. gentleman's scheme of finance. Now the hon. gentleman pointed out that the 5 per cent. loan is not overdue—no, he had an opportunity of allowing the 5 per cent. loan to stand, or of giving notice when it was to be called in. I remember very well, so long ago as the Session of 1883, when the hon. gentleman stated his scheme of finance, finding it was important to prepare for the redemption of the 5 per cent. loan, so long ago as then, he gave us in general terms his notions of finance; so long ago as then he asked for parliamentary authority to act. He thought he would be able to obtain exchange from the present holders of the 5 per cent. loan, or a very large proportion of the loan. He stated to us across the floor that his assurances were that we would be able to exchange at least about one-half, and he asked us two years ago for authority to negotiate in that sense. What he has done since then we do not know; what the arrangements have been with the existing holders of that loan he has not told us; but he was able to assure us two years ago, and to give us more assurances than he is able to give us to-day upon that subject. In the fall of the same year in which he made that statement—no, in the next Session—he came to us with another statement, and in the fall of that year it was stated that the hon. gentleman's domestic loan had fortunately failed on account of the necessity of providing funds to redeem the 5 per cent. loan, which had pressed upon the hon. gentleman's mind in the Session of 1883, having passed away. Why? Because the financial geniuses who preside at present over this country had devised a scheme by which the Canadian Pacific Railway itself was going to provide funds for the payment of the 5 per cent. advance, by which the Canadian Pacific Railway was going to pour into the pockets of the people of this country, into the public treasury, the sum of $22,000,000 or $25,000,000, and thus it was entirely unnecessary for the hon. gentleman to borrow in Canada, it was unnecessary for him to borrow in England, in order to provide for the redemption of the 5 per cent. debt. It was a brilliant and glowing prospect, he says. All his organs made the most of it. From Dan to Beersheba it was pointed out how the wonderful policy of the Finance Minister had succeeded, how wonderful the policy of the Government was; that not merely had they succeeded in making a contract which would secure the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway within its limited terms, and without any further demand being made upon the country, but actually they had it so arranged that that company was going to be a source of financial strength to the Dominion itself, was going to pour almost uncountable treasures into the public purse, out of which our debts were to be redeemed; and there was great glorification and boasting over this result. But that bright prospect which the hon. gentleman called our attention to, and in which he was gratified to delight himself for some time—that prospect failed; and instead of being relieved from the necessity of borrowing here, and there, and everywhere, instead of being relieved from the necessity of making a domestic loan, instead of being relieved from the necessity of providing means for the redemption of the 5's, instead of keeping his Treasury full by means of the Canadian Pacific Railway, he was obliged to come down to Parliament a few short weeks afterwards and propose to empty the Treasury in order to complete the Canadian Pacific Railway; and he did so. He has been obliged to admit, this afternoon, that in consequence of that operation, irrespective of its direct effect, irrespective of the risk assumed in the obligation which was incurred, but also in view of its indirect effects, he was obliged, candid man, which he declared to us he is, to acknowledge that not merely that loan, not merely the loan which was necessary in order to provide for the Canadian Pacific Railway advance, but also other advances which it made necessary to provide for in order to keep up Canada's credit and meet Canadian obligations, were impaired as to the rate at which money could be borrowed, by his being obliged to make such a very large loan. And yet, Sir, we find the hon. gentleman says, in face of all that, in the face of these changes of finance, these changes of policy which succeeded one another almost as rapidly as the shifting scenes of the kaleidoscope—although they are neither so regular nor so brilliant as those which we see in the kaleidoscope—those shifting forms have assumed, at present, a shape. That hon. gentleman having just had to borrow a very great many millions of dollars in order to meet in part the Canadian Pacific Railway debt, that hon. gentleman having made that loan in England, having then been obliged to borrow further sums from the banks here and from the banks in London, has given notice of the redemption of the 5's on 30th June; and he himself, across the floor of the House, declares publicly that it may be necessary, that there is a possibility of his being obliged to make a short loan, as he says, to tide that over for six months more, in case there is an unfavorable condition of the market. Yes, the hon. gentleman used the term, tide over for six months, and I took a note of the phrase. He said the rate of interest may be high, the circumstances may be unfavorable, and we may make some arrangements to tide it over.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No. What I said was this: We were considering a proposition of issuing Treasury bills to tide over; but the market might be in such a condition that we might make another arrangement and float a loan, instead of carrying that over for six months more, until 1st January.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That was only for the $13,000,000.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) has not understood me. The proposition is, that we should offer to holders of the present $25,000,000 loan bonds or inscribed stock at a certain rate of interest for other ten years.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And Treasury bills for $13,000,000.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. But I understood the hon. gentleman to say that, if the market was unfavorable, he proposed to tide over the matter with respect to the $25,000,000 for other six months.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No. The hon. gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. BLAKE. That is what I understood the hon. gentleman to say. Although he commenced operations two years ago with respect to the redemption of the $25,000,000, although he told Parliament two years ago that it was important to get parliamentary authority so long beforehand, in order that this large operation might be conducted in due time and with due deliberation, we have as yet no information from the hon. gentleman that he has made arrangements for the 5's with the existing holders of that loan. All those negotiations which the hon. gentleman told us two years ago he had almost entered into, all those assurances that he said he had obtained from holders of the securities, seem to have gone for nothing, and seem not to have been renewed. What is done is this: With the large sum on call and short date which the hon. gentleman has already taken up, with other sums which will necessarily be taken up some two months hence, and other sums during the course of the year, the hon. gentleman proposed to issue Treasury bills, or adopt some short-time device for the carrying of our call or short due debt, in order that he may issue a loan to redeem the long due debt. What he should have provided for was the debt which was absolutely due, or shortly to become due, with his bank borrowings and borrowings of that description, and then have provided for his long loan. I can understand the difficulty in which he found himself, for he will be told, and properly told, that but for the scarceness of funds, and for the loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway, he could have redeemed those $25,000,000, and have had money at 4 per cent. instead of 5, and have saved 1 per cent. interest in consequence of the operation. It is so; for even during the six months for which the hon. gentleman is providing, from 30th June to 1st January, there is, according to his own statement, a loss of at least the difference between 5 per cent. and 4 per cent., because he tells us that even under disadvantageous circumstances he can issue securities bearing interest under 4 per cent. We are, however, keeping alive a security at 5 per cent., and, therefore, we are losing 1 per cent.; and I can well understand that the hon. gentleman is very anxious to cause this loss to disappear at an early day. But the difficulty is, that he has surrounded us, I will not say overwhelmed us, with so many obligations of such a varied nature, made at such short dates, that it would be proper to provide for the debts payable at such short dates before attempting to deal with a debt not payable for a considerable time.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

ENQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. KIRK. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would call the attention of the Secretary of State to the fact that an Order of the House for a return connected with the operation of the Canada Temperance Act of Nova Scotia has not been complied with in any respect. The Order asked for a return for the year 1884, for the several counties in Nova Scotia. The return brought down is only for one county and is for the year 1881; moreover, it does not give the name of the physician who issued certificates. In no particular does it follow the Order of the House.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I will look into the matter.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to call the attention of the Minister to the fact that two returns in connection with superannuation, ordered the 6th of February, have not yet been brought down.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I have asked for the returns according to the Order of the House, and am waiting for them, and, when I get them, will bring them down.

REPRESENTATION OF THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved second reading of Bill (No. 45) respecting the representation of the Territories in the House of Commons. He said: In moving the second reading of this Bill, I do so in the earnest hope that I will receive the assistance of the Government and the assistance of hon. gentlemen opposite, as well as that of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. As a member of this House, somewhat conversant with a considerable portion of the Territories of the North-West, I may say that I very earnestly desire the progress and prosperity of that great country. As a private citizen, having some interest in various ways in the North-West Territories, I fully believe in the growth, in the progress, and in the prosperity of that portion of the Dominion, unless that progress be checked and that prosperity be stunted by bad management, bad laws, or bad administration of laws; and I may say, that both as a private citizen and as a member of this House, I earnestly desire that the people of the North-West Territories, who have been accustomed in the country from which they emigrated to manage their own affairs in their own way, may be allowed to work out their own destiny in the North-West, by giving them, not only local self-government, but full representation in this Parliament. We know well that the position which our settlers in the North-West now occupy is an anomalous position. It is an unjust position; it is, in my judgement, an unfair and an unreasonable position. We know that to some extent, in the Territories, there are very considerable centres of population, and we know that there is throughout the whole of the North-West Territories a very large population to-day. These settlers, as a general rule, I may say universally, are men of intelligence, men of activity, men of energy and indomitable zeal—men who have been accustomed in the older Provinces, from which most of them came, not only to self-government, but to representation in the fullest sense of the term, men who have been accustomed to representation in the Local Parliament and in this Parliament. Unfortunately, in their new home in the North-West Territories they have not got the rights and privileges nor the advantages they had in the Provinces from which they came. It is known to those who take an interest in Manitoba and the North-West, especially the North-West, that the Territories in the North-West were created by an Order in Council of 8th May, 1882, and it was alleged by the First Minister that the said Territories were so formed for the purpose of encouraging immigration. One cannot but regret that, to some extent, at all events, the anticipations, I may say, perhaps, the reasonable and fair anticipations, of the First Minister, have not been fully realized with respect to the immigration to the North-West Territories. The Minute of Council was submitted to Parliament by a message from His Excellency, and received the assentment of Parliament on the 16th May, 1882. By this Minute of Council or Order in Council, a large portion of the North-West was divided into four territories. The first was called Assiniboia, with an area of 95,000 square miles; the next was the Territory of Saskatchewan, with 114,000 square miles; then there was the Territory of Alberta, with 100,000 square miles; and the Territory of Athabasca, with 122,000 square miles. The First Minister, when submitting this message to Parliament, in the Session of 1882, said that the proposed division was in the public interest, for the convenience of settlers. He also intimated that the divisions were provisional, that he expected a large tide of immigration to flow in there, and that these Territories would subsequently become Provinces, and that Parliament would be asked to assent to that proposal. I say again that we have reason to regret that the tide of immigration has not been as full and as free as we all had reason to expect it would be at the time the First Minister presented this message to Parliament. We can only hope that in the years to come the tide of immigration will rush in there more freely than in the past. Unfortunately, although I have reason to believe that there is a very considerable settlement in each of the Territories to which I have alluded, and in two of them, at least, a very considerable population, the first step has hitherto not been taken for the purpose of giving our settlers in our own North-West either local self-government in the true sense of the term or representation in this Parliament. It is true that, during the last Session of Parliament, one of the senators in another chamber drew the attention of the Government to this all-important and all-absorbing question to the people of the North-West. The hon. senator enquired as to the advisability of granting parliamentary representation to the inhabitants of the territorial districts in the North-West, and also if the Government had taken or intended to take the same into their consideration. The senator who propounded this enquiry to the Government was the senator from Niagara. On that question—for it appears they discuss questions in the other chamber, their rules being different from ours—an important discussion took place, and during the course of that discussion the Minister of the Interior made use of the following language:—

“I am sure it will be gratifying to the people of the North-West Territories to have had their interests and institutions submitted to the House so ably as they were by my hon. friend from Niagara, and discussed in this House so intelligently as they have been. It will show them that they are not, in their remoteness from the capital, forgotten by the legislators who sit in this Parliament, and it will, I am sure, impart a feeling of confidence to them, and increase the assurance which they feel that their interests and their feelings will be earnestly considered by the Government and also by Parliament. That is all that I feel called upon to say with respect to the enquiry of the hon. gentleman.”

You will observe that, in the observations the Minister of the Interior made upon the occasion to which I have just referred, he assures the people of the North-West that their interests and their feelings will be fully considered by Parliament; but, up to this hour, so far, at all events, as I am aware, no practical, no substantial step has been taken by the Government, looking to legislation in that direction, and so far their demands, what I believe to be the fair and reasonable demands of our settlers in the North-West Territories, have been unanswered and unheeded by the Government. True, the Minister of the Interior gives them a sort of vague assurance. He tells them that, although they pay the taxes of the Dominion, still they are under the care, the paternal care, of a paternal Government, and they ought to be satisfied with that; that they are remote from the capital where we carry on the legislation of the country, but their interests are not forgotten by the Parliament of Canada; that their interests and their feelings will be considered by the Government and by the Parliament of Canada; and that is all. Now, I make bold to say that hon. gentlemen are much mistaken if they think that the people in the North-West Territories are going to be satisfied with assurances without having those assurances practically carried out. They have been accustomed, as I stated before, in the Provinces from which they came, to manage their own affairs in their own way. In their new homes in the far North-West they expect at least the same advantages they had in the Provinces from which they came. There they have no such advantages. They have not the rights practically of local self-government in the true sense of the term, and they have no voice in the legislation of this House. These people are there in what may be called a position of pupillage, of servitude. They have not got the rights we have here. By my Bill, I propose to release them from that condition of servitude, I propose to give them all the rights and all the liberties that British subjects, living in a free country and under a free flag, are entitled to; I propose that they shall have representation in this Parliament, and that they shall have that representation at the next Session of this Parliament. Bear in mind that our settlers in our North-West are in an inferior position to the settlers in the Territories of the United States of America. There they have a sort a representation, a sort of hermaphrodite representation in Congress. They send representatives to Congress from the territories, who have an opportunity of discussing public questions affecting the territories and taking part in the legislation there. I propose by my Bill that our settlers in our North-West shall have a better representation and a fuller representation than they have in the United States Congress. If the object of the First Minister, when he placed the message of His Excellency before Parliament and formed a portion of our North-West into districts, was to encourage the tide of immigration to flow in there, surely the hon. gentleman cannot expect that the tide of immigration will flow in as fully and as freely as he would wish it to flow, unless he places the settlers in the North-West in, at all events, as favorable a position as they are in the countries from which they came. In the United States of America they have what is called territorial representation but, if we stop at territorial representation, we stop just where the United States of America stopped, and I think we stop a little short of the end that we should aim at. In the United States of America the general Government can deal with the territories practically as the Congress sees fit. It is not until the territories are merged into States, or are formed into States, that they have the full rights and the full advantages, and the full privileges of government or of representation; and it is when formed into States, and then only, that they are given all the rights of free men living in a free country. By the fourth article of the American Constitution, it is declared that Congress shall have power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territories or other property belonging to the United States. The power of Congress over the Territories has a two-fold character. First, as regards the property, the right to guard and improve the property, to prepare it for sale, and to sell it; and secondly, the power which concerns the government of the people residing within the territories before those Territories are formed into separate and independent States. In the United States, Congress has established the Governments of the territories, or a sort of Government in the Territories, and Congress assumes the full power to govern them until, as I have said, the territories are merged into States. The Federal Government there appoints the executive officers and the judges, but the people have a right to elect members to the General Assembly when the population reaches a certain point. The Assembly has the right to pass laws for the government of the territory, subject always to the veto of the United States Government. Each territory of the United States of America, as soon as it has a population of 5,000 male inhabitants of full age, is entitled to send members to their General Assembly, and the public domain, there as here, is under the control entirely of Congress. Now, these territories, as I have said, have the right to send representatives to Congress, and these representatives have a voice in the public affairs that are brought before Congress. They have all the rights, powers and privileges that belong to a representative from a free and independent State, except the right to vote. On the first Monday of every week it is the bounden duty of the Speaker of Congress to call over the names of the territories in alphabetical order, and then the representative from the territory has a right by law, because he has a seat in Congress, to present petitions; he has a right to present memorials, a right to introduce bills affecting public interest, and his rights as a member of Congress only stops short at voting. Now I say that in the United States that principle, as far as it goes, is a sound one. The moment the territories have a population large enough to entitle them to have a General Assembly of their own, that moment they have a right to send their member to Congress. The principle is a sound one, that the citizens who are expected to pay their share of the taxes, who are expected to yield a willing submission to the laws, who are expected to yield submission to the sovereign power, shall have a voice in making the laws they are bound to submit to, and in the imposition of taxes they are bound to pay. I hold the principle is a perfectly sound one, that taxation without representation is tyranny of the worst kind; and yet that is just exactly the way that we have been dealing with our people in the North-West territories for the last three years. A moment ago an hon. gentleman opposite asked about the population of our Territories; I shall speak of that shortly. I lay down this proposition, however, that I believe the population of two of our territories is larger than the population of any territory in the United States of America when it was allowed to send a representative to Congress. I am not sure that the population of all the territories is not large enough, upon the principle adopted in the United States, to warrant this Parliament in giving the people of the North-West Territorial representation. I find, Sir, that when New Mexico was organised into a territory, on the 9th of September, 1870, it had an area of 124,000 square miles, and a population of 61,000. With the sole exception of New Mexico, I believe our North-West Territories, two of them, at all events, contain now a population far in excess of the population of the territories of the United States when they were given representation in Congress. Colorado was admitted in 1881 with an area of 105,000 square miles, and a population of 34,000, in round numbers. Nebraska was admitted in May, 1854, with an area of 122,000 square miles, and with a population, in 1850, of 10,716, and in 1863 of 12,519. As will be seen, the population in that State in thirteen years, from 1850 to 1863, only increased by some 3,000 souls. Much as we may have to complain of the scarcity of emigration into the North-West, nobody will pretend to say for a moment that the population has not increased at a much more rapid ratio than it did in the Territory of Nebraska, and in many other territories of the United States. Washington was admitted in 1853, with an area of 71,000 square miles, and with a population, in 1850, of only 1,201 souls, and in 1860, ten years after, with 11,000 souls. Utah was organised, in 1850, with an area of 109,000 square miles, and a population of 11,380. Dakota was organised in 1861, with an area of 152,000 square miles, and a population of 14,181. I will not venture to state what the population of Dakota is to-day, but I venture to say it is far up in the hundred thousands. It is not yet formed into a State, with full sovereign powers, but it is proposed shortly, I believe, to organise it into one of the United States. But when it was organised into a territory and entitled to send a representative to Congress, the population of Dakota was only some 14,000. Arizona was organised in 1863 with an area of 130,000 square miles and a population of 9,658. Idaho was organised in 1863, with an area of 310,000 square miles, the largest, I believe, of the territories of the United States, but with a population, in 1870, of only 20,000 souls. Montana was organised in 1864, with an area of 146,000 square miles, and a population, in 1870, of 20,000. Wyoming was organised in 1868, with an area of 97,000 square miles, and a population of 9,000. It will thus be seen that the area of the territories of the United States is just about the area of our own territories in the North-West, with the sole exception of one territory; but I say the population of these territories when they were organised and entitled to send representatives to Congress was much less than the population of our North-West Territories. Now, Sir, not only is this true with respect to the territories of the United States, but it is true with respect to our own Provinces. We know that the population of Prince Edward Island, when admitted into the Confederation, but little, if at all, exceeded 100,000, and it was admitted with all the rights of an independent Province, and with a representation in this Parliament of six members. Now, I ask the First Minister, I ask the Government, I ask this House, if there is any reason why Prince Edward Island, with a population of somewhere about 100,000, should be entitled to send six members to this Parliament, who favor us with their opinion, their advice and their solemn protest occasionally, and who record their votes in Parliament, when we leave our own settlers, exceeding in number the population of Prince Edward Island when received into the Union, without a single representative in this Parliament, who can raise his voice in defence of the rights of the territory or who can record his vote for or against any proposition that may be submitted. When we admitted the Province of Manitoba into this Union, with the full rights of a sovereign Province, it had a population of barely 15,000, with a representation in this Parliament of four members. We admitted British Columbia with a white population of barely 15,000, and with a representation in this Parliament of six members. I ask if there is any reason why the First Minister and the Minister of the Interior, or the Government, should have for years excluded these men from what I believe to be their fair, their just right, to representation in this Parliament, knowing, as the hon. gentlemen must know, that the population of those territories to-day far exceeds the population of the two Provinces I have last mentioned. Public opinion in the North-West is ripe for this change; it has been ripe for the last two years, and public opinion is pronounced. Public men in the North-West of all shades of political thought, men of all classes and in every corner of the four territories carved out of the great North-West, have been pressing, and still are pressing, on the Government this change. The hon. gentleman knows that during last year the council of the North-West, in a minute of council sent to the Government here, pronounced strongly in favor of the representation of the territories. The hon. gentleman knows that the people of the North-West have spoken in the loudest possible way, in the only way they can speak, by petition, by resolution, by memorial and by remonstrance sent to the Government, insisting on the Government doing an act of simple justice by giving them representation in this Parliament. The First Minister knows that during the last fall and early part of this winter, at every centre of population in the provincial districts of Assiniboia and Alberta, public meetings were held, at which resolutions were passed upon this subject. And the hon. gentleman knows that it is not a mere political movement. He knows that the majority of the people who attended these meetings were his own supporters, and they passed the resolutions which have been transmitted to the Government of which the hon. gentleman is the head. A meeting was held at Calgary, on 29th November, 1884. The meeting was a large meeting; it was a purely non-political meeting. The resolution was moved by an official of the Government, appointed by the Government, and paid by the Government—the registrar of the district. At that meeting the following resolution was passed:—

"That settlers in the District of Alberta here assembled, declare this our meeting to be strictly and positively non-political, and that our only desire and intention in holding this meeting is to tender to the Dominion Government the benefit of our opinions and partial experience about matters in which we believe such opinions and experience may be of use and benefit to the Government in dealing with the various matters and subjects about which resolutions are about to be submitted to this meeting."

This resolution, as I have said, was moved by an official of the Government, a paid supporter of the Government, a man occupying an important position there. It was thought desirable, in order that the Government might be made aware of the fact that the movement to secure representation was of a purely non-political character, to recite that fact in the resolution. That resolution was followed by another resolution, of which the following is a copy:—

"Whereas, in the opinion of this meeting, the time has arrived when the North-West Territories, from the rapid increase in population, and the extraordinary development of their vast resources which have taken place in the last few years, are entitled to representation in the Dominion Parliament;

"Therefore, Resolved, That the Dominion Government be respectfully requested to introduce, at the next Session of Parliament, such measures as may be necessary to provide for a fair and just representation of the present provisional districts, into which the North-West Territories are divided in the Federal Parliament; or to obtain from the Imperial Parliament, during its present Session, such amendment of the British North American Act as may be necessary to accomplish that object—should such a course be deemed necessary."

There you see that at this meeting, presided over by a friend of the Government, the resolution which I have read, moved by a friend of the Government, and a large majority of those present, as is alleged, being friends of the Government, and the meeting a purely non-political one, a resolution was passed asking the Government, as a matter of right, to give territorial representation in this Parliament. I find in the Regina Leader, the organ of the Government in the capital of the Province of Assiniboia, edited and owned by a friend of the Government—a tolerably well-paid friend of the Government, too—an account of a meeting held at Wolseley on 20th November, 1884, at which the following resolution was passed:—

"Whereas we, the settlers of the municipality of Wolseley, in the North-West Territories, have learned with pleasure that it is the intention of the Dominion Government, at the coming Session of Parliament, to introduce a measure for the representation of the North-West Territories in the Federal Parliament of Canada, "And whereas we have good reason to believe that the present population of the District of Assiniboia is at least 60,000 souls.

"And whereas, owing to the fertility and richness of the soil, the population is scattered all over the said district, and a representation of two members would be entirely inadequate to the arduous duties to be performed.

"And whereas we believe that we are entitled to just representation and that great good would result from said representation.

"Therefore, be it resolved, That in the opinion of this meeting, we should have not less than four representatives for the District of Assiniboia."

I call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that in Assiniboia alone persons who are able to form an opinion on the subject, and who live among the people there, claim there is a population of 60,000 in that territory alone. It is quite clear, from what was said by the mover of the resolution, Mr. G. L. Dodds, a merchant residing in that charming town of Wolseley, that he must have had some assurance given him by some member of the Government that the Government proposed to introduce a Bill this Session to grant them representation—an assurance from some Minister of the Crown who, during last fall, paid a flying visit to the North-West Territories. I trust the Minister who gave Mr. Dodds the assurance that the Government proposed to deal with this question will see that the assurance so given is carried out. I may say that I waited some time to see what action the Government proposed to take in this matter. No reference was made to the representation of the territories in the Speech from the Throne. No action was taken by the Government, with a view to secure representation, and seeing that no action was taken by the Government, I took it upon myself to introduce this Bill, and to ask the House to assent to the principle of the Bill, that the territories should be represented in this Parliament. Similar resolutions were passed at other meetings held last fall and during the early winter in the territories. I will not trouble the House with reading any more of the resolutions. All I propose to say further is, that it appears to me, from the press published in the territories from one end to the other, that in every nook and corner, wherever settlers are located, there is a universal demand in favor of the representation of the territories. Let me refer to a speech delivered at Ottawa, at one of the festive gatherings that are occasionally held here, by a friend of the Government, and under the nose of the Government, by a supporter of the Government, the editor and proprietor of the Regina Leader. The speech is reported by the correspondent of the Regina Leader at Ottawa, said correspondent is believed to be the editor of the Leader, Mr. Davin. It was delivered at a dinner of the Old Guard Club. I do not know what the Old Guard Club is, or who are the distinguished gentlemen composing it; but this orator of the evening goes on to discuss various matters connected with the North-West; and I say to the hon. gentleman that nobody can give a better or more reliable or more correct opinion of the wants and necessities of the people of the North-West, and especially of the District of Assiniboia, than Mr. Nicholas Flood Davin, and here, at this festive gathering of the Old Guard Club, he spoke with reference to the representation of the North-West. He said:

"He spoke on the question of representation at considerable length, referring to two meetings which had been held in the North-West in favor of representation, one at Wolseley and one at Moosomin. The men, he said, who spoke at those meetings would do credit to any assembly in the world. Mr. Perley, of Wolseley, was an eloquent speaker. He referred to a resolution proposed by Mr. G. L. Dodds in favor of representation, which affirmed that there were 60,000 people in Assiniboia. There were 120,000 in the whole North-West. As to the policy to be pursued, he said he agreed with Mr. Thompson, who spoke at the Wolseley meeting, that it was not desirable to make the whole of the North-West Territories into one Province. Either of two courses should be taken—to give the North-West six representatives representing territory, or else create three Provinces with three local governments, or one might create Assiniboia into a Province and let members go from the Saskatchewan and Alberta for a short time as representing territory. Mr. Robert Bobier, at the meeting at Moosomin, had proposed a resolution in favor of Provinces, which was carried unanimously. But the great thing was to get representation. Did they suppose 120,000 people were going to be held in leading strings? Were they—an immigration d'élite—a select immigration—the flower of the old pioneers of Canada—to remain 'disestablished and disendowed' and outside the pale of the constitution? Did they think it was possible? Or if possible, that it was politic? It was not possible, and if it was possible, it would be most impolitic."

Sir, I agree with the orator of the occasion. I say that the hon. gentlemen cannot resist the claims of the settlers of the North-West, and if they could resist the claims of the settlers, they should not resist the fair demands made by them, in temperate language, to the Government and Parliament of this country. Sir, I suppose from what Mr. Nicholas Flood Davin said on that occasion, that he was not speaking without authority, that he was speaking by the book, because on the same occasion that gentleman stated, with reference to erecting the new buildings at Regina, that he held it in black and white, over the signature of a Minister of the Crown, that these buildings were to be erected in the spring. But, Sir, we have some observations made by a Minister of the Crown: The gallant knight who presides so worthily over the Public Works Department, paid a visit to the North-West during last fall; and, of course, the advent of so distinguished a gentleman created a little excitement in the North-West. He was feasted and he was fed, he was dined and he was wine, and on one of these festive occasions, the hon. gentleman being—I was going to say in good humor, but I will not say that, because I never saw him otherwise—but being present at a festive gathering, he made use of the following language:—

“So far as any complaints made or changes wanted were concerned, he had everywhere said, as he now said: ‘Come to us. Let us know your wants. We are your Government. We have at our backs, and have had for years, a strong majority, and that majority it is our duty to use for the good of the country.’”

Sir, that is a fact; the hon. gentleman stated nothing but the strict truth when he made that statement. They have had—the hon. gentleman has had—at his back for a number of years, a large following in this House; and he invited the people of the North-West to lay their complaints at the foot of the Canadian Throne and they would receive every consideration at the hands of the Government. Well, these people have been so laying their complaints for two or three years. Last Session they did so emphatically and decidedly, clearly and distinctly, and I ask the hon. gentleman now to redeem the pledge he made to the people of Calgary when he delivered the address from which I quoted this extract. He went on:

“Sir Hector, continuing, referred briefly to the questions of representation in Parliament and a representative Local Legislature as amongst the changes asked for. While he, as but one of the fourteen Ministers composing the Government, could not indicate its policy or give any pledges on its behalf, he was understood to concede the justice of our claim to a voice in the Parliament which makes our laws and collects our taxes, and also to favor such an increase in the number of elected members in the North-West Council as would transform it virtually into a representative body. He could only promise that all these matters should have the best consideration of the Government, and, if at all possible, the views and wishes of the people should be met.”

Now, Sir, it is quite clear from the speech—if the hon. gentleman is correctly reported, and I made the extract from a Calgary newspaper—that the most solemn assurances were given by this Minister of the Crown to his followers who met him on that occasion, that all they had to do if they had well founded grounds of complaint was to lay them at the feet of the Government and they would receive every consideration. On the question of representation the hon. gentleman ventured to give his own opinion, and in no unmistakable terms. I call on the hon. gentleman to carry out to the people of the North-West the assurances he gave them on that occasion when he was visiting the North-West Territories. Sir, I tell the hon. gentleman that unless these fair and reasonable demands of the people of the North-West Territories are assented to, they can hardly expect that peace and contentment, progress and prosperity will continue in that country. Now, Sir, at all the meetings held in the North-West Territories there was pointed out very clearly and very correctly the anomalous position that the people of that country occupy—the unfortunate position they occupy—the injustice of the position in which they are placed. Sir, they are taxed by this Parliament, for the purpose of carrying on the Government of this country, for the purpose of carrying on the great public works of this country; they are taxed to pay the national debt of this country, in the creation of which they had no voice, and upon all these matters they have no vote now. They are taxed as a part of this great Dominion, and we expect them to submit quietly without grumbling or complaint. Sir, although we pass laws affecting all the material interests, the progress and prosperity of that country, they have no voice in this Parliament; they cannot advise; they cannot protest; they cannot counsel with us, and they cannot vote for or against any proposition that may be submitted to the House. We, by an Act of Parliament, open the pockets of the people of the North-West Territories, and we keep their mouths closed for the want of an Act of Parliament. I am introducing an Act of Parliament which will open the mouths of the settlers; hon. gentlemen have passed Acts of Parliament opening their pockets. Here in this Parliament, and every Session of this Parliament, we are constantly passing laws which materially affect the progress and prosperity of the country away to the west of us—laws affecting the interests, the ultimate prosperity and the growth of that country; and yet, Sir, we exclude the people who, above all others, are interested in the character of these laws, from a voice in that legislation—we exclude them from having a vote as to whether it shall or shall not pass. We who live, some of us at a distance of 2,000 miles from these territories, assume to know more about the country than the people do themselves. We are here in Ottawa framing laws, passing laws, moulding laws, which effect the material prosperity of the people in the North-West Territories and we expect them tamely and quietly to submit to those laws, and still we tell them in the same breath, You shall not have a voice in the framing of those laws, or a vote in the imposition of the taxes you are called on to pay. We assume that we know more about the country than the people living there. I ask how many members of this Parliament have visited Manitoba? How many have set foot in the prairies of the great North-West? How many Ministers of the Crown have ever visited the North West? How many Ministers of the Interior ever visited the North-West Territories? I am mistaken if a single Minister of the Interior ever visited that country. But if they did visit it, their visits have been like angels visits, few and far between, and they have been very short. It is true, Sir, some members of Parliament and some Ministers of the Crown, in a palace car, surrounded with all the luxuries of modern life, and accompanied by a few choice companions, have sometimes taken a pleasure excursion through the country to the foot of the Rocky Mountains; but they saw nothing of the country and learned nothing of the country, except what they saw from the car windows. They delivered a few speeches from the car platform, in reply to congratulatory addresses presented to them by their followers; but to say that they saw the country by passing over it on the railway I say is not possible. Very few of them have visited the centres of population or have visited the people in their prairie homes. At all events, no Minister of the Crown has been in the country long enough to make himself thoroughly familiar with the wishes and wants of the people there. We know perfectly well that what would be in the interest of the older Provinces would not be in the interest of that magnificent inheritance which we possess in the North-West; what might suit us might not suit them, and what might suit them might not suit us. It is impossible for a Minister of the Crown to legislate intelligently with regard to the North-West Territories without making himself acquainted with the wishes and necessities of the people there. And yet we undertake to do all that. Need we be surprised that in this condition of affairs the people in those territories should grumble and complain, and that during the last fall and the early part of this winter they should have held numerous meetings, protesting against being kept longer in a state of tutelage and servitude, and insisting that the Government shall carry out their assurances that the people of the North-West Territories shall get representation in this Parliament. Let hon. gentlemen reflect for a single moment on the consequences of it. Do hon. gentlemen expect that the people who are called upon to pay the taxes we impose upon them, and to yield obedience to the laws passed in this Parliament, will long remain in a peaceful and contented state? Hon. gentlemen will find themselves mistaken if they think so. They will learn, and the country will learn with sorrow, that until this right is granted to them there will continue to be complaints of a very serious character from the people of the North-West. One can easily understand that. Suppose we undertook to-day to exclude from the House by a simple resolution the six representatives from the island of Prince Edward. This Parliament can do wonders in that respect; we have elected before now a member by resolution, and I suppose by resolution we can exclude one. Suppose by resolution we excluded the six members from that Province from having a voice in this Legislature, what would be the consequence? The consequence would be, first, a solemn protest, and then open rebellion. And yet we treat our people in the North-West Territories just in that way, and we expect them quietly and tamely to submit to this sort of proceeding. Suppose we said to our friends from British Columbia: We have no need of you in this Parliament; we can get on without you; you have been born in the country, or you have lived long in it, and you know more about it than we do; but we can pass our laws without you, and we don't want you; we who are thousands of miles from the country know better its wishes and necessities than you do who live there. What would the people of British Columbia say? Would they tolerate it? Not for an hour. And yet that is what we are doing in the case of our people in the North-West. We are taxing them, and we are compelling them to obey the legislation of this House, and yet we expect them to submit to our taxation and to yield obedience to our laws. The thing won't do. Hon. gentlemen will have to solve, and solve quickly, this question of representation in this Parliament. A question has arisen as to the population of the territories. We cannot tell what the population is, nor shall we be able to tell for years to come, with any absolute certainty. It is a floating and shifting population. It may be doubled or quadrupled in two or three years. I hope it will; but it may be less than it is now. Hon. gentlemen have taken steps to procure a census of those territories; but it will not be taken, in the ordinary course, for a year or two, and if we are to wait until the census returns are published the territories cannot get representation for two or three years. We know not what the population may be at that time. It may be 50,000 and it may be 500,000; yet in the face of the petitions and protests of the settlers, their asking for this representation, we shall no doubt be asked to wait until the census returns are brought down, and until we have some certainty of what the population is. I say to deny the people of the North-West Territories representation, and representation now; is to deny them one of the clearest rights a British subject is entitled to, and I hope the First Minister will not deny them that right. Assiniboia, according to the statement I read a moment ago, is claimed to have a population of 65,000; I honestly believe that it cannot be less than 50,000. The territory of Alberta is said to have a population of 40,000. It is difficult to form an idea of what the population of the other territories is, but it must be very considerable. Now, the two territories I have referred to have a large population—a population four times that of Manitoba when it was admitted into the Union with representatives in Parliament of four members, and nearly four times what British Columbia had when it was admitted into the Union with six members; and the two territories together have a population far exceeding Prince Edward Island when it was admitted into the Union with six members. And yet we deny representation in this Parliament to those people who have made their homes in that country, and intend to spend the remainder of their lives there. Now, I propose in my Bill, that they shall have representation in this Parliament, and representation at once. I give the provincial district Assiniboia, with 65,000, two members; Alberta, with of 40,000, one member, and I give each of the other territories one member—five members in all. I do not think that representation is too large. In my opinion it is too small, and when hon. gentlemen deal with my Bill, and I trust that they will, as I believe they will, from the assurances given by one of the Ministers of the Crown, give Assiniboia three members, Alberta two, and each of the other Provinces one. I propose by my Bill that these people shall be relieved of the disability under which they now suffer, and shall be enabled to send representatives to this Parliament who will, on the floor of this House, declare the wants and wishes of the people of the North-West. I ask the First Minister if, when he is carrying his Bills through this Parliament, having reference to the North-West, he would not be materially assisted if he had the counsel and advice of men who have lived in the country for many years and are thoroughly conversant with its necessities. The hon. gentleman can give me but one answer to that question. I propose in my Bill that there shall be an election before the 1st of December next, in order that the representatives from the North-West Territories may be present at the next Session of this Parliament, and the next Parliament also. I want the Government to give them representation, and to give them representation for the next two Sessions of this Parliament. The details of the Bill I do not propose to enter into. I move the second reading of the Bill, with the earnest hope that it will become the law of the land. I believe that if the Bill passes it will tend very largely to allay a large amount of the discontent and dissatisfaction that exists in the North-West Territories, because one can easily see that if the people have representatives in Parliament, through whom they can make known their wishes and wants, they will not have the same grounds of complaint that they would have if the legislation was passed behind their backs and sometimes against their solemn protest. I move the second reading of the Bill, believing thoroughly that its passage will tend to allay to a large extent the discontent and dissatisfaction which now, to some extent, prevails in the North-West Territories; I move the second reading of the Bill, believing that by giving representation to the territories we are doing a simple measure of justice to the people of the North-West Territories; I move the second reading of the Bill in the earnest hope that it will become law, believing that if it should become law the people of the North-West Territories will be satisfied that this is an earnest, on the part of the Parliament of Canada, of our desire to mete out to them the same justice that we mete out to other portions of the Dominion.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I would have wished that the hon. gentleman, when he introduced this Bill, had favored us with the remarks which he has made this evening, as I would have then been prepared to answer the able argument he has just made. Under these circumstances, this being an important measure, I would desire to postpone my remarks to another day, and beg therefore to move that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion (Sir Hector Langevin) agreed to, and debate adjourned.

MARITIME COURT OF ONTARIO.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 11) to extend the jurisdiction of the Maritime Court of Ontario—(Mr. Allan.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. When this matter was discussed before it seemed to be the general opinion of the House that it should not apply to supplies but only to repairs. I propose that the words "or for necessaries supplied to any such ship" be struck out. I propose also that this Bill should not have a protective effect, that the clause providing that the maritime courts shall have jurisdiction be made to apply to claims arising after the passage of this Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. RYKERT. I move the following amendment, of which I have given notice:—

This Act shall not apply to any claim for building, equipping or repairing of any ship, made or incurred before the passing hereof.

Amendment agreed to.

HOLES IN ICE ON FREQUENTED WATERS.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). I regret that I was not in my place when this Bill—Bill (No. 22) to amend the Criminal Law, and to declare it a misdemeanor to leave unguarded and exposed holes cut in the ice on any navigable or frequented waters—came up for the second reading, as I think I could have explained some objections made to it by hon. members; but since I have heard what has been said and objected to, and upon consulting members of the Government and others in the House, I have considered it would be advisable to move:

That the Order for the House to go into committee be discharged, and that the Bill be referred to a select committee, composed of the following gentlemen: Messrs. Hall, Ives, Landry (Kent), Davis, Wells, Girouard, Beaty, Cameron (Victoria), Fleming, and the mover.

Motion agreed to.

EVIDENCE IN CRIMINAL CASES.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 6) to further amend the law of evidence in criminal cases.—(Mr. Cameron, Huron.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. McCARTHY. I propose to move the amendment of which I have given notice to the fourth clause. I propose to add to the clause the following words:—

Provided, that so far as the cross-examination relates to the credit of the accused, the court may limit such cross-examination to such extent as it thinks proper, although the proposed cross-examination might be permissible in the case of any other witness.

This is to prevent the accused being cross-examined as to character. The witness puts himself in the box, and is liable to be cross-examined as to his past history and character; and, in the case of an accused, he may be condemned, not, perhaps, because he was guilty of the offence with which he is charged, but because his general character may be such as to cause him to be punished for his past offences. I think that is unreasonable and unfair. I further propose to add:

In case an accused person, tried before a jury, does not tender himself or herself a witness, or become a witness on the trial, no observations shall be allowed to be made at the trial by the prosecutor or by the counsel for the prosecution, as to him or her not so tendering himself or herself as a witness, or not being a witness, nor shall any adverse inference be drawn against the innocence of the accused by reason thereof.

It leaves it optional with the accused to go into the witness box or not, with this legislative declaration, so far as it will be of authority, that his not going into the witness box will not be taken against him.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I am sorry to say that I cannot assent to the proposition of my hon. friend. The first Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.

amendment he proposes to make is to limit the cross-examination, that is, as far as I understand it, that when a defendant goes into the box to give evidence on his own behalf the counsel for the Crown is not to be at liberty to cross-examine him, to ascertain whether he is credible or not. His mouth is to be closed on that subject, unless with the assent of the judge. It appears to me that that is hardly a reasonable or fair thing. If a man sees fit, when on trial, to offer himself as a witness, he ought to be precisely in the same position as any other witness. I do not think that, if I spoke for an hour, I could express this in better language than that of Lord Bramwell, in the letter I quoted to the House on the second reading of this Bill. He is no mean authority on a question of this kind, and he says:

"I send you a copy of the Evidence Bill, which passed the Lords this Session. It is the same as they passed last Session. It is, I believe, the same as was brought in by the Government and passed the Commons last Session, with one exception, namely: in that Bill was a provision that the defendant in a criminal case, when called as a witness, should not be cross-examined as to his past career and character."

Now, that is the amendment of the hon. gentleman, except as to the action of the judge—

"This was contested in the Commons, but carried by a small majority. It is clearly wrong, and I believe contrary to the opinion of our Attorney-General. If a man presents himself as a witness, there ought to be a power to see what he is worth as such. There cannot be opposite rules for ascertaining that—one where the proceeding is criminal, another where it is not. If the question is whether the defendant assaulted or libelled the plaintiff or prosecutor, and the defendant tenders himself as a witness, it is manifest that he should be dealt with in the same way, whether the proceedings be by indictment or civil action. No doubt it puts the defendant in an awkward dilemma, if not being called or being subject to such enquiries, but I dare say there may be convictions, not because the man has committed the offence charged, but some other—not many. There is no help for it. And remember that it is hard upon a prosecutor of good character that he should be put on an equality with one of bad character. Remember also, that the prosecuting counsel may always say to the jury: My client has been asked no question to show he is untrustworthy; I could not ask such questions of the defendant."

The effect of that amendment would be to leave it discretionary with the judge how far the cross-examination should go, but a counsel would in that case ask no questions at all, because he might be stopped any moment. It seems to me very unfair, when a man goes into the witness box to pledge his oath to a certain state of facts, that the jury should not have an opportunity of judging what weight they should attach to that man's evidence. They can only do that by a thorough cross-examination. He may be a gaol-bird or a penitentiary-bird, he may have been guilty of the most serious offences, he may have been convicted for perjury twenty times, and yet you cannot ask him a question as to that. That is not fair, or just, or right, and I do not think it would help the administration of justice to add such a provision. The fourth clause of my Bill does, to some extent, give a protection. It says:

"Provided also, that no person so charged, being a witness on any hearing of such charge, shall have the right to refuse to answer any question, on the ground that it would criminate him or her, as to the offence charged, unless the court before whom such hearing shall take place shall think fit."

He has got a certain protection there. I think it is all the protection he is fairly entitled to, and therefore I shall have to oppose the amendment of the hon. member.

Mr. McCARTHY. The amendment which I propose leaves the matter practically for the judge or the court who hears the person cross-examined to say whether the cross-examination is going too far or not. It is well known to many members of the House, and it has been often felt by laymen, that the right of cross-examination is rather excessive, too indefinite, and that parties who go and tender themselves as witnesses are subjected to cross-examination into the history of their whole life, going into matters which have no direct concern with the question before the court, and in point of fact putting the witness through a terrible ordeal. If the unfortunate man who is accused of the offence, and of which he is supposed to be innocent, is to undergo that ordeal, it will nearly always prevent him from coming forward as a witness. Now the court will have a right to say whether the cross-examination has gone far enough, or too far, and the court will allow it to go as far as it thinks proper and necessary for the elucidation of truth and for the purposes of the trial; but the moment he thinks the Crown officer is going too far he can at once interfere and stop him. I think this is a fair principle, because this is all an experiment, an experiment which, I dare say, any person who has been in the habit of defending prisoners, will find it embarrassing to act upon. I dare say my hon. friend, who generally acts for the Crown, and not for the accused, would find it troublesome, if he was acting for a prisoner, to decide whether he would put him into the box or not. Of course, I respect the authority my hon. friend has referred to; but, after all, we are at liberty to follow our own judgment, even against the opinion of so distinguished a lawyer as Lord Bramwell. This amendment is a suggestion of one of the Chief Justices of the Province from which I come, in the very language drawn up by him, and I submit it to the committee as a proper limitation upon the general right of cross-examination.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I think there is a difficulty in applying this law which will be increased by the amendment which is proposed. I believe the evidence of the accused is bad evidence, and that he should not be examined. While I do not think the evidence of the accused should be accepted, still, if he is to be examined, I do not see how the amendment proposed by my hon. friend who last spoke, would tend to the elucidation of the truth. If the accused, or the prisoner, chooses to go into the box as a witness, he should be examined as to his credibility like any other witness. I think it would be a mistake to adopt the amendment. I believe the principle of the Bill itself is bad, but this amendment would make it worse. I see there are two or three amendments to be proposed, and it might be better to refer them back to the select committee from which this Bill comes.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The select committee appointed to examine and report upon the Bill have fairly considered the whole question, and they thought it better to refer the Bill just as it passed the English House of Lords, where the matter had been fully and fairly discussed for several Sessions; in fact, they thought it better to make no change of any kind. The Bill before you is a verbatim copy of the Bill passed by the House of Lords.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Were these amendments now before the Chair discussed in the committee?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). No.

Amendment (Mr. McCarthy) to section 4, negatived.

On proposed amendment (p. 496) as section 5,

Mr. McCARTHY. That clause was reported, I think, by my hon. friend as chairman of the former committee, in these very words. I do not know why he has changed his opinion about it, unless he is so enamored of the opinion of the House of Lords that he thinks we cannot alter or go beyond it. It does appear to me that this is a very fair provision. The accused can be called as a witness if this Bill becomes law, and if he is not called the fact will always be used as a strong argument against him by the Crown prosecutor, and I think it is not fair, this being experimental legislation to a great extent, that he should be subjected to that option.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). If the Bill is to pass at all, that clause ought to be inserted in it. But I have great doubt as to the expediency of passing this Bill, great doubt as to the principle involved in it. But if we are to have the Bill, that clause certainly should be inserted in it, in my opinion.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not agree with the hon. members in that respect. The object of the Bill is to further the cause of justice, to get at the truth, and I cannot see why a man who is competent to testify to the truth or falsity of the facts alleged against him, if he chooses to go upon the stand, that we should shut him out. He has the privilege of going; if he does not choose to take that privilege, then he must take the consequence of it. One would suppose we were legislating entirely in the interests of persons accused. If the man will not go he has no right to complain. The jury will draw their inference, at any rate.

Mr. McCARTHY. The accused may be perfectly innocent of the charge, but he may be subjected to a cross-examination as to other matters, which it would be very inconvenient for him to answer, and that might prejudice his case before the jury. We all know that when a person is a bad character or has been mixed up in discreditable transactions, it would be of great prejudice to him to have these facts brought out in a cross-examination upon another and distinct offence altogether.

Mr. TUPPER. I am opposed to the amendment, simply because, as I pointed out before, it is impossible to enforce it. You may put it upon the statute, but, as a judge in the State of Maine stated, in his charge to the jury, it is absolutely impossible to carry it into effect. That presumption would be drawn against every man who did not do what he was virtually challenged to do by this kind of legislation. He would be called upon to stand a cross-examination, and he would have no choice about it. I think hon. gentlemen who are presenting this Bill should, in order to be consistent, carry out to their conclusion the arguments which have been urged, namely, that there should be no distinction in these cases from civil cases. I disagree with hon. gentlemen who have expressed that opinion; but that opinion is, I think, consistent with the spirit that actuates this kind of legislation. I direct the attention of the House again to the differences of opinion among those hon. gentlemen who support the Bill, in order to show how we ought to hesitate in regard to accepting it. The opinions of Lord Bramwell on this subject have not obtained, as yet, in the House of Commons; he has suggested this course, but other gentlemen who have framed other Bills have drawn them differently. Those Bills are now all receiving calm consideration before the Grand Committee of the House of Commons. We have heard in this discussion additional reasons for hesitating. We have got along very well without this legislation, and we can afford to wait and be guided, not merely by the decision at which the House of Lords has arrived, but by the decision of the whole Parliament of Great Britain, of which we may be able to obtain the benefit next year.

Mr. MILLS. I think the proposition contained in the amendment is a reasonable one. It seems to me that when the House is not prepared to go so far as to compel a prisoner to give evidence, we should not use moral compulsion to place him in a position in which we will not put him by law. He should be protected against animadversions for non-appearance.

Mr. BOSSÉ. I am very much struck at what seems to be the impracticability of this amendment. What law can be passed to prevent an inference being drawn by a jury, and the verdict given as a result of that inference? I am, too, at a loss to know what legislation will prevent such a result. This remark is only as to the amendment under consideration. Other considerations also apply to this amendment. Last year I had occasion to oppose this Bill, and I cannot allow it to pass this year without entering my protest against the whole of its provisions. I had occasion to read the report of the discussions in the House of Lords in England upon the Bill when it was presented, and especially the observations of Lord Bramwell; and with all due respect to so high an authority, I must confess that I am at a loss to see the weight of reasoning which has been brought to sustain his measure. Those reasons are far from convincing, to my mind. They are very few and can be stated briefly. One of the main reasons for the Bill is, that in some cases only one witness is heard and the prisoner's mouth is closed. It is also stated that it would be very wrong to allow the lawyer in the case to make a statement which the prisoner could not make, and that it is wrong also to allow the defence to state that the prisoner's mouth is closed. Each of those three reasons seem to fail. What is the fact when only one witness is heard? If only one witness is heard, surely there will be no conviction, unless his evidence is sufficiently strong to convince the minds of the jury that the prisoner is guilty. If that evidence stood alone, and if it was not corroborated by other evidence or circumstances, and if it was not sufficiently strong to satisfy, without corroboration, the minds of the jury, surely there could not be a conviction. There is, therefore, no harm in allowing the law to remain as it is—that there may be a conviction when there is only one witness heard and the prisoner is not heard, if the evidence of the witness is sufficient to satisfy the minds of reasonable men that there should be a conviction. We are told, it was stated during the debate, that it may be said in the defence that the prisoner's mouth is closed, that the prisoner has not had an opportunity to give his own story. We all know what little effect this kind of defence has upon the minds of jurymen; and if the prisoner himself is not at liberty to make his statement with his own lips, surely his lawyer is there to make it for him, if there is anything to be said, and it will be said better than if the prisoner uttered it. There are two other reasons given, and I have heard them repeated in this House by supporters of the Bill. The first is, that bad convictions will be fewer under the new system than under the old system. But this is begging the question, by assuming the fact that there will be fewer convictions under the new system than under the old. We affirm a fact which is not proved; and we are not giving any reason to show why those convictions will be less under the new than under the old system. Again, we are told that juries ought to know all the facts. Every one knows that the main, and in fact, the only object of a trial, is to arrive at all the facts. It is again begging the question to say that if the prisoner is heard all the facts will be better known than if he is not heard. Let us consider, for a moment, what will be the result of the examination of the prisoner. He must be submitted to cross-examination. It has been attempted to curtail the cross-examination; and how can it possibly be curtailed? The object of cross-examination is to ascertain whether the witness is or is not worthy of credence, and if he can be believed under oath. The test of his credibility is the cross-examination, and if that cross-examination is to be curtailed, how are we to ascertain whether the facts stated in the examination-in-chief have been truly and fairly stated? This will raise in the mind of every one an uncertainty as to the veracity of the witness, so that it will be held that no reliance can be placed on his evidence. If that cross-examination is applied to the prisoner, we have, in order to know what its effect will be, to distinguish between the two classes of prisoners who may be brought to the bar. Is the man timid, and unaccustomed to all the form and pomp of a criminal trial? In such a case there are very many chances against one, not only that the truth will not be elicited, but that the whole of the prisoner's bearing and answers will tell against him. If, on the other hand, a man is a hardened criminal, a jail-bird, a man accustomed to trials, all the chances will be in his favor. He will have more chance to carry to the minds of the jury the conviction that he is in reality what he seems not to be—that he is in reality an innocent man, but a man who is awed by the position in which he stands, by the pomp and form of a trial. One question solves the whole matter. What good is to be derived from this law? None, to my mind. Who is to believe the man who is put between his oath and imprisonment for a longer or shorter period—perhaps imprisonment for life? Who is to believe the man who is placed between his oath and his own existence? Who is the jurymen who is going to rest his own verdict upon evidence given under these deplorable circumstances? I submit that the truth cannot be elicited and that no faith can be attached to evidence given under these circumstances. One result of passing this Bill will be certain—that there will be a terrible augmentation of the crime of perjury; and another result will be to accustom people to believe that by perjuring themselves they can save themselves from conviction. I see evils which will result from this measure, and I can see no good which can possibly result from it; and for these reasons I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). This seems to me to be an unfair and a cowardly way in which to deal with this Bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I am perfectly in order.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I beg that the chairman will ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw his expression; it is insulting.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I say I am perfectly in order.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not see that the hon. gentleman has any right to say that the step taken by the hon. gentleman is cowardly.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Well, Sir, if that is your ruling I submit to it, but I am satisfied I am in order all the same.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I am in perfect order. I say that it is not a fair way—and I suppose that is in order—to deal with a Bill of this kind. After a full discussion the principle of the Bill was affirmed by the House, and now when we are trying to get the Bill into shape, the hon. gentleman moves that the committee rise without reporting the Bill, which would, of course, kill the measure. That is a habit which has crept into this Parliament during the last few years, and not a very creditable one, in my opinion; and if hon. gentlemen are opposed to the principle of the Bill they can move against the Bill, or move an amendment; but Parliament has adopted the Bill, it has decided that in some shape the principle of the Bill should be assented to by the House. The hon. gentleman who spoke last was not here when the Bill was read the second time, but that was not our fault, for he should have been here, and then he would have had an opportunity of discussing the principle of the Bill. At present we are discussing an amendment of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), as to whether there should be any comments made by counsel on a prisoner not giving evidence, and upon that amendment the hon. gentleman moves that the committee rise, and thereby kill the Bill. Now, I do not think that that is a fair way of doing.

Mr. McCARTHY. I trust that the motion made by the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Bossé) will not prevail. I think this Bill is an important one. It has passed its second reading, not only on this occasion, but on another occasion, and it is one which, at all events, according to experience in the Province of Ontario, will not, I think, be fraught with the great dangers which my hon. friend from Quebec (Mr. Bossé) thinks would result. All that has been said by my hon. friend who so ably addressed the House with regard to perjury, was urged before in England; it has been urged in this country, as to the admission of defendants in civil cases to give evidence, and although it might possibly add somewhat to the crime of perjury, nevertheless, I am quite satisfied that the result, on the whole, has been good, and that the object of a trial has been attained, that object being the elucidation of the truth. The object of a trial is to ascertain whether a man is really guilty or innocent, and it does appear to be an extraordinary way to arrive at that result to say that the party accused is not to be at liberty to tell his own story. If he is innocent, certainly that story, under cross-examination, will tend to his acquittal. But, if on the other hand, he is merely committing perjury, the result, I think, in almost every case, is that the fact that he is not telling the truth is ascertained by the jury under cross-examination, and by the appearance, the manner and demeanor of the witness. The principle of the Bill, therefore, I think, is a good one, and I trust it will be allowed to become law. As to matters of detail, of course we may differ; but the House having passed the second reading, I trust that the motion before the committee to rise will not prevail.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I regret to have to differ from the hon. gentleman who last spoke, and I speak, like him, on behalf of the Province of Ontario. I confess that my opinion is that the Bill will be productive of more harm than good. The principle of the Bill seems to me to be an utter contradiction of the well-known principle of English criminal law, that no man shall be required to criminate himself. That principle hitherto has been supposed to be the basis of the administration of criminal justice in England, and to mark the distinction between the manner in which it is conducted there and in France and other continental countries. If the Bill passes, the practical effect is, that a man shall be required to criminate himself. If he tender himself as a witness and is cross-examined, he necessarily can be convicted out of his own mouth, and if he does not tender himself, then his failing to do so is certainly making him criminate himself, and therefore I think that it is an entire contradiction of that salutary maxim of English law, that no man shall be required to criminate himself. I do not understand that my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Cameron) is quite correct in saying that a principle of a Bill is asserted because it is allowed to be read a second time—that, in fact, no question as to the principle of the Bill can be raised if it is read the second time, and that if an hon. gentleman does not happen to be in his place in the House when a Bill is read a second time he is to be precluded from objecting to it thereafter, at any stage, because the principle is admitted. I refuse to accede to any such position. I was not here when the Bill was read the second time, and if I had been present I would have opposed it, for reasons which I could have given; but I do not think I have lost my right or my duty—for I feel I am discharging a duty in opposing the Bill—because I was not present when the Bill was read the second time. I shall, therefore, support the motion of the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Bossé).

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is that the committee do rise.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I am thankful to the hon. member

Some hon. MEMBERS. The question has been put.

The CHAIRMAN. No; I have not put it.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member who preceded me for having answered the assertion of my hon. friend for North Simcoe, that the opposition to this measure only came from the Province of Quebec. I am sure the views expressed by the hon. member for Quebec Centre will find adherents from all parts of the Dominion.

For my part I can say that it is, as a student of English criminal law, that I disapprove of the provisions of the Bill. I know that the House has already expressed its opinion on the measure at its second reading, and if I ask the attention of the House for a moment, it is less in the hope of reversing the vote of the other night than to register my protest against a measure which I believe to be hasty, uncalled for and dangerous.

We are told it has passed the House of Lords in England. So it has. Still I do not know, I do not think it has, nor that it will become the law of England yet. Even if it had, my opinion would not be changed. I have carefully read what has been said in this House on the different occasions when this Bill has been brought before it; I have read what was said in the House of Lords upon the question, and I am still uncompromisingly opposed to this measure; and examining it with the light of a long experience in Crown cases, I cannot refrain from saying that I think it is a bad measure, a very bad measure. The more so, because it will tend to propagate amongst those who, in a great measure, administer the criminal laws, I mean the jurors, that exaggerated, unhealthy sentimentality, that misplaced sympathy, which often brings the most honest people close to complicity with criminals. An exaggerated fear of danger is called pusillanimity; an exaggerated fear of error easily becomes weakness and dangerous leniency, and the original idea of this legislation is to be found in that exaggerated fear of judicial error.

Say what we may, it is not in the austerity of the morals of the people, in the stern reprobation of crime, and the inexorable determination of punishing it, that we find that nervous sensitiveness in favor of imaginary victims of judicial error.

The general tendency is unfortunately in the direction of relaxing the severity of the law, both in the detection and punishment of crime.

You are arguing in favor of the best and most complete evidence in criminal cases, and you forget that, by this legislation, you are attacking in its foundation the principle that has guided the world in the selection of a criterion for truth in matters of evidence; the intelligent declaration of a disinterested witness. "Interest is the measure of actions" says Pothier. That maxim, in its broadest sense, which is not the sense which Pothier gives it, is in a large measure the rule of the acts of men. It has passed into the language, "You cannot well appreciate that question, you are interested in it." "You would not show so much passion in the matter if you were not interested in it." And language is there the true interpret of human belief.

You are introducing, in the process of finding the truth, an element which the verdict of humanity has rejected. I do not speak of exceptional cases; I know that a trifle would lead one to perjury whilst another would not save his own life by means of a false oath.

Laws must take the average of men with their average moral value. The multiplicity of occasions where an affirmation on oath has been declared necessary has been the consequence of a laxity in the moral sense of the people, and in vulgarising the oath, if I might use that expression, you have minimised its solemnity and sanctity.

And strange to say, general as the use of the oath has become, the repression of perjury has not, in any way, increased in the proportion of the number of cases where it is committed.

Unnecessarily multiplying the number of cases where an oath is administered is multiplying the number of opportunities for perjury, and diminishing in the same rate the average value of an oath, and, as a consequence, rendering more difficult the search for truth. The uncertainty of the evidence is far more dangerous than the scarcity of witnesses. To know all is not more important than to know well. You say you want to throw more light on the object you have in view. Take care not to mistake color for light, and render your object less distinct than it was before. The art of dissimulation would play an important part in your process of bringing out the truth, and the less scrupulous would have an unfair advantage over the plain truth talker. Truth is depicted naked. In our days, and with most men, you will find that a well-dressed fiction has more chance of being accepted, and of moving its auditors.

Do not tell me that in the confusion of falsehood and truth, of disinterested evidence and prejudiced declarations, of virtue-cloaked rascality, and clumsy sincerity, the piercing eye of justice shall distinguish the right line between innocence and guilt! I answer you with the impartial judgment of a long experience in those matters: It would be a mistake even with learned and cool-headed judges; how much more would it be with an unguarded, credulous jury. Honesty here adds to the danger in the case of an artful criminal.

As it is, the detection of offences is becoming more and more difficult, owing to that laxity of the moral sense of the people. How much more will you render it by introducing a new and powerful element of delusion in the evidence?

Do not tell me that your law is demanded by public opinion, on account of the number of victims fallen under the irremediable errors of justice. I have been practising for over twelve years in one of the great centres of the judiciary districts for Crown cases. My practice, for the number, variety, and importance of cases, has been considerable. Well, Mr. Speaker, I say without vanity, I have yet to learn that an innocent man was punished in cases above police offences, while I would hesitate before assuming the responsibility of saying that all my clients were innocent who were acquitted.

As long as the unanimity of the jury remains necessary for a verdict, you may be sure that the number of guilty parties who are acquitted will represent an enormous proportion of the number of the accused. Of the twelve men empannelled to try a prisoner, you may rely that, on an average, six will lean towards an acquittal on the natural impulse of sheer sympathy; three of those six will persist in their disposition to acquit, through some bias of mind, spirit of contradiction, and sometimes a partiality for the ability of the counsel; it is not uncommon that, in the end, some friendly connection, some sympathy of association, some old spite against the prosecutor, the Crown counsel, and even against the judge, will carry one or two of the jurors towards an unjustifiable acquittal. Well, of those one or two evil-disposed jurors the courts generally have reason, by the stern proposition, that there is no evidence to justify an acquittal, and that the presumptions raised for the prisoner's defence are devoid of foundation. Very often the absolute impossibility of finding a word in the declaration of the witnesses to support the theory of the innocence of the accused is the last and only argument of the honest against the prejudiced juror. Give the latter the excuse of hiding himself behind the sworn declaration of the prisoner, and you will see the increase of disagreements of jurors.

Unfortunately, in discussing these delicate questions, sentiment is apt to take the place of cold reasoning, and one is disposed to take as a glorious rule the more sentimental than intelligent maxim, that it is better that ninety-nine criminals should escape than that one innocent should be punished. The only good rule is that all criminals should be punished and all innocents acquitted. The perfection of laws and of tribunals would perhaps bring that rule to be a fact. Next to perfection, the laws must be such as to prevent, as much as possible, the escape of criminals as well as to exempt innocents from being unduly punished. And if, through the frailty or wickedness of men, an accident happens and a wrong conviction is obtained, it is no reason for altering the laws; the fault was not in the law, it was in the perversity of human nature.

Let us go further. You are afraid that with a good law and a good judge an accident will happen, and the liberty, the honor, or the life of a good citizen will be lost. And to prevent that accident, which you know is not one in a thousand, you open a door through which hundreds of criminals will pass. Have you thought, in your humanitarian dream, that each of those criminals that your tenderness lets loose is a dangerous enemy to the liberty, the honor, the limbs and the life of good citizens? Have you put in the scale the number of children perverted, of families dishonored, of wounds inflicted, of murders committed, by the hundreds of desperadoes whom your imprudent philanthropy has spared and emboldened?

It has been said that the fear of being found in fault by a strict cross-examination would deter the guilty party from offering false evidence. This is a fallacy too flattering for the lawyer. We must not forget that we are all in search of the best means of finding the truth in the intricacy of conflicting evidence in a criminal case. The worst evil to be feared is the escape, unpunished, of the consummate criminals. We have already said that, as a rule, and we must not legislate for exceptions, as a rule the innocent is well protected. Well, the habitual frequenter of the courts, the clever scoundrel, who has made a study of crime and of the means of evading the law in committing it, will add your law as a special branch of his study, and a most useful addition to his means of escape will it be. He knows that he can give his testimony, that he can give it when all the witnesses have been heard. He can build his criminal machinery with unfinished pieces, to which his own testimony will so naturally fit as to give it the most natural appearances of innocence and truth. Nay, more. The legislator must not forget that the manufacture of evidence by accomplices, by friends, by the paid servants of criminals, is an important factor in the struggle of crime against society. Let me tell you that your law will give, I was going to say, too great a protection to that unenviable kind of industry. The witnesses are not scarce, unfortunately, and the criminals can have their choice of those infamous beings swarming in the moral slums of society. They are not wanting in number; they only want the courage; they are afraid of detection. They can build for their principals the most ingenious contrivances to mislead justice, but their coward rascality fails when the danger of detection begins, because detection means possibility of punishment. But give them the chance of having their story, in the material part of it, completed by the prisoner, and you will see their audacity increasing with the diminution of the fear of danger, their ingenuity reviving with the greater chances of success. Where the witness is frightened the prisoner will not hesitate. Shame for shame, he will choose the shame of perjury to that of the penitentiary. The fear of detection is nothing for him. All the chances are on his side. What is a prosecution for perjury against a conviction for felony. Your statutes, I never understood through what leniency, only terms perjury a misdemeanor. The accused, when on his trial, has the privilege to sit near his counsel, amongst the gentlemen of the long robe. And do you think that the hardened criminal, for the punishment of whom you are equally interested in finding the truth, as for the protection of the good citizen, do you think that that hardened criminal is not aware of all that; and knowing it, do you believe that he will hesitate? No; he will confirm the evidence of his accomplices; he will complete it without any danger for them. Danger for himself, do you say? Does he not know as well as yourself that the Crown seldom prosecutes for perjury, and then only when some private interest is at stake to press the action of the Crown. Does he not know that impunity in those cases would be the rule, prosecution and punishment the exception. He will perjure himself, knowing that if his perjury does not save him, the Crown shall not follow him after his conviction; and that if his perjury saves him, the Crown prosecutor will let him go in disgust, with the remark of that witty Attorney-General, "Oh! let him be discharged, your honor, we will have a chance to convict him next term."

You ask also that the wife may be a witness against her husband. Have those who have framed this law thought of the great evil that it will cause? I do not want to repeat remarks that have already been made in this House in respect to the cruelty of bringing a wife to testify against her husband. I take the lowest class of people, the most numerous of those who appear before the criminal courts. I speak of classes that have been deprived by poverty and vice, vice engendered by intemperance, by poverty. I say that according to the experience of those who have pleaded in those courts, when a man, through drink or poverty, has lowered himself to the commission of crime, you may still find in the mother of the children of that depraved man a sense of honor, a remnant of virtue; and you would bring that unfortunate wife, who has to support all the ignominious conduct of her husband, into the presence of that ruffian, and ask her to expose herself to the danger of being brutally treated by her husband if she gives evidence against him! or else to stifle the sense of honor, the remnant of good reputation that still remains with her, by giving false evidence!

In the most important cases, in those cases where the criminal has put all his ingenuity, the difficulty is to have clear and positive evidence. Circumstantial evidence, in many cases, is the only evidence upon which such criminals are convicted. I speak from experience and with a deep feeling of justice, when I say that circumstantial evidence will be completely destroyed by this legislation. Circumstantial evidence, with jurors weak as they are, will be useless against the clever rascal who will come before the court in the witness box, and will make, on his oath, a plausible declaration that he is not guilty. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I speak with a deep sense of duty towards society when I say that we are not prepared for this legislation; that by its enactment you encourage perjury; you give a premium to it; more than that, you render it necessary. The amendment proposed by my hon. friend (Mr. McCarthy) having been refused, there shall always be a presumption of guilt against the accused who does not proffer his evidence.

I resume my objections: You force upon the jury a depraved source of evidence; you multiply the occasions of perjury; you push the criminal into deeper depravity; you encourage clever rascality and you create a presumption of guilt against bashful innocence; you encourage unscrupulous jurors; you give a premium to the manufacture of false evidence; and all that, in order to protect innocents whose danger is only in your imagination, and who are fully protected by the law as it stands at present.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). I have never been in favor of the principle of this Bill. I know very well that there is a very great diversity of opinion among the judges of Ontario with respect to it. My own idea is, from what I do know, that the majority of the judges are really opposed to the principle of the Bill. As I have stated already, I am not in favor of it myself. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the able speeches that have been made on the floor of this House, both pro and con, and I must say that the more I hear in reference to it the more confirmed I am in the opinion that it would be a very great mistake to make this the law of the land, at the present time. A Bill similar to this has been before the House of Lords, and passed on one or two occasions, but it has never become the law of England, and I think we are safe enough in waiting until we have the experience of it, when it becomes the law of England. It appears to me that this Bill breaks down many guards that are around a person who may be charged with crime. I do not altogether agree with my hon. friend the Secretary of State in the arguments he has brought before the Committee, because I think that the chances are rather that the effect of this Bill would be to militate against the prisoner than in his favor; but that is the way men differ, and we see things through different spectacles, as it were. For instance, although it is the law in Ontario—and I speak for Ontario only—that either party can be put in the box in a civil case, yet we have also another privilege there, that of putting the parties out of the court, so that they cannot hear the evidence given by the opposite party. Of course, in a criminal case, that could not be, because the prisoner must be before the court and the jury while the case is being tried, and therefore, in support of the view of my hon. friend who has just spoken, it might be said that a cunning knave might well understand how he could put himself in the box, and make a point in his own favor. With reference to that, I think the chances are very much that it would be against the prisoner. Then there is another thing. According to present law and practice, if a prisoner has been convicted previously, the prosecutor cannot put that fact before the jury until after the prisoner is convicted, and then evidence may be given that he has already been convicted and the court can take that into account in passing sentence. If this Bill becomes law, the proposed amendment of my hon. friend for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) with reference to cross-examination being rejected, there is nothing to prevent the Crown counsel from asking the witness—as he is a witness then—Have you not already been convicted? Have you not already been accused of other crimes? Now, if it is proper that a prisoner being put into the box can be asked this question, it is just as proper that the Crown should be allowed to prove, before the case is closed, that he has been convicted of another crime. I have therefore come to the conclusion that the Bill ought not to pass.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I hoped we would not have this discussion a second time. The principle of the Bill was amply discussed in this House some days ago, and was affirmed by an overwhelming majority. To-night we find some hon. gentlemen who were not here at that time coming up after the Bill has been fully discussed, and moving that the committee do now rise, and by that means strangle the Bill. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) was called to order because he happened to say that the effect of this motion was to strangle the Bill; and he was quite right. Immediately after he sat down, hon. gentlemen who are interested in this motion got up and boldly affirmed that it was their intention that this Bill should not be law—that the principle of it should not become affirmed. The hon. Secretary of State went into a long, elaborate and eloquent argument against the Bill. He took it on all sides. He was kaleidoscopic; he looked at it though red, white and blue; he left nothing unsaid that could be said, but he did not touch anything that had not been already said with regard to the Bill, and all his objections to which had been fully met here. He took the ground that the Bill gave an undue privilege to the accused, who would be likely to get off by false testimony. He told us that what he wanted was disinterested testimony. Did he ever see that on earth? I wonder what angelic being he ever cross-examined in the box, who gave disinterested testimony. I would like to see the face of that lady or that gentleman. I have been in practice for some years, and have cross-examined a good many witnesses, but I have failed to find one so angelic as to go into the box, free from all mundane influences, ready to march on the road to the celestial country, who would give unbiased and unprejudiced testimony. Why, Sir, it is an Arcadian phantasy, born of the poetic brain of the Secretary of State. He will not find that, here in Canada. Why, Sir, in London, in Liverpool, in Birmingham, in all the cities of Great Britain, the principle of this Bill is law, or is likely very soon to become law. Certainly the House of Lords passed it, and had all this discussion upon it, and as I said the other day, they are conservative enough, the Lord knows. They knew that in all these cities of Great Britain, these unwhipped, unbaptized rascals were floating about, that this combination of witnesses would be bad; that the picture the Secretary of State gave here, of four or five men marching into the box, one after another, with their story all concocted and all planned out, with the finishing touch to be given by the chief conspirator, the accused—the House of Lords knew this picture would be realised, and they knew it would be done on a large scale if done at all. Still, they gave the accused the right of going into the box in a country where they have half a hundred rascals to our one. Therefore, I say to the Secretary of State that everything he has urged against this Bill in our purer atmosphere of Canada, could have been urged with tenfold greater force in the House of Lords, where the Bill passed. The Attorney-General in England did not think it beneath his dignity, nor beneath his great talents and the high official position he occupies, to introduce into the House of Commons every letter, every line, and every sentence of this Bill, and ask that the people of England have this as law. Yet, my hon. friend thinks that in Canada, where we have so many rascals—though we have only four or five millions of people—the Bill will call forth a long line of criminals, marching into the box to deliver their stories concocted outside. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) also used that argument. He was not here when this principle was discussed, but he says: I am against the Bill, and I am with the Secretary of State; I am going to fight this Bill to the doors. He said that the innocent man would be convicted; the Bill would operate against the criminal. He does not agree with the Secretary of State, and if we strike a general average between them, we may, perhaps, get at what is right. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) made out a very strong argument for the Bill, from the Main vs. Beamish case, where, as the law stood, if it had only been a case of assault, all the parties would have been heard; and where, because Beamish happened to strike Main on an artery, and the effect of that was death, the Mains were permitted to go upon the stand. These disinterested gentlemen, these poor, angelic creatures, without any self-interest, went upon the stand and swore away the honor and lives of men who were as innocent as they were. Why, that case alone demands the interference of the House of Commons. It is a wholesome rule that nine guilty men should escape rather than that one innocent man should suffer. I say again that this question having been debated in all its stages in the great country to which we owe allegiance, and which is a conservative country, and having passed the House of Lords with such a large majority, it is hardly the thing for hon. gentlemen in this House to ask us to stultify ourselves by giving a vote different from the one we gave the other day. They cannot strangle this Bill without stultifying themselves by giving a vote diametrically opposite to the one they gave a few days ago. Therefore, although we have heard the speech of the Secretary of State on the same side as the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), notwithstanding the flow of eloquence by the former, to which I listened with the greatest pleasure, yet it will have been a waste of time, unless hon. gentlemen are prepared to stand up and vote different from what they did a few days ago on the principle of this Bill.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The hon. gentleman has been unfair in his appreciation of my remarks and those offered by the hon. member for Hamilton. We have not differed. We have agreed in condemning the Bill, and we have shown it is doubly bad. The hon. member who has last spoken has tried to make a joke. His argument is nothing but a joke. The hon. gentleman said this: "The Secretary of State has spoken of disinterested witnesses, but where can he find them?" If all the witnesses were bad in the cases in which my hon. friend has been engaged, he must have been in very bad company. I have seen, in the administration of justice, disinterested evidence given; and it is because I know that in this honest country there are disinterested witnesses, and that we can get a proper trial and verdict from a jury, that I object to mix good, disinterested witnesses with bad. The hon. gentleman has said that the English legislator had not been deterred by the number of criminals in such cities as London, Liverpool, Glasgow and Dublin, and that legislation has been passed in England, giving those criminals the privilege of testifying in their own case. Legislation has not been passed in England. The Bill has passed the House of Lords, but it is not yet the law; and I hope it will not become the law. I trust the good sense of the House of Commons will prevent that result. The hon. member has dwelt upon the depravity of those large cities; but that fact does not destroy my argument. He knows that I am standing on firm ground and he was obliged to appeal to prejudice. He said that hon. members should not vote against the motion, because they would stultify themselves; that they should not listen to an argument, but look at the Votes and Proceedings; that they voted a certain way at page so and so, and they should not expose themselves to be placed on the hustings in the position of having once supported a measure and then voted against it. I did not make an appeal of that kind to the House. My remarks were offered more for the purpose of registering my dissent from such legislation and for expressing the views which I felt it to be my duty to place before the House, than for any other reason.

Mr. WOODWORTH. The hon. gentleman says my argument is a joke. I did him an injustice. He has been reading some light literature, and that is where he got his disinterested witnesses. It was the case of the Irishman who, after three or four witnesses had gone in to the box, was asked if he had any witnesses. He replied that he had eleven men who would swear that they did not see him do it. They were disinterested witnesses.

Mr. McCARTHY. I rise more for the purpose of reading a quotation than for answering the argument of the Secretary of State. He has gone back to the doctrine, which was exploded many years ago, that interest was sufficient to exclude a witness from giving evidence, because he might commit perjury. He also adduced another argument, which is an equally exploded one, that where a witness of that character went into the box, the jury are unable to discriminate and judge whether he is telling the truth or not. Allow me to read from the recognised authority on the law of evidence, Judge Taylor, the recognised work in England and Ontario and all English-speaking countries:

"In rejecting the evidence of parties to the record and other interested witnesses, the law acted on the presumption, not only that such persons, sooner than make a statement which might prejudice themselves would commit deliberate perjury; but that if they did so, juries would be incapable of detecting the falsehood. A more baseless calumny upon the veracity of witnesses and the intelligence of juries, cannot be imagined."

Let me read a further extract:

"Although at the time when these sections first came into operation learned judges might have been found who, taking the cautious view of the subject, were inclined to regard the examination of parties as a questionable, if not a very dangerous experiment. It is believed that, at present, every eminent lawyer in Westminster Hall will most readily admit that this change in the law has been productive of highly beneficial results."

Of course, that only applies to civil procedure, but what is good there must be equally good for the elucidation of truth in criminal matters. The prisoner probably may be induced more readily to commit perjury; but I venture to say this is the experience of every lawyer—and there are some lawyers here who have practised, even as long as the Secretary of State, although they have not always been Crown prosecutor, and I am afraid if counsel are always on one side they become liable to look at things merely from that standpoint. I have heard and I have known of certain learned judges who, when at the bar, were always defending prisoners. I have known certain other learned judges who, when at the bar, were always prosecuting. I believe that the particular bent which they acquired in practice has followed them on the bench, and I find one judge nearly always in favor of the accused, and another judge just as certain to take a strong view against the accused. I am afraid it is so with the Secretary of State.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. That is contrary to the state of the case. I appeared seven-eighths of the time for criminals.

Mr. McCARTHY. Then the hon. gentleman was in very bad company. In our Province there certainly are innocent men sometimes accused. It is hard that the chain of circumstances which may point to the guilt, and which may yet be perfectly explained by the evidence of the man who must know one way or the other, cannot be explained by the accused. I think the hon. gentleman will find that the introduction of this law will not be calculated to do as he thinks—enable the accused to be acquitted. The hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) agreed with the Secretary of State in opposing the measure, but for exactly a contrary reason. The Secretary of State thinks the accused will get the benefit of this legislation.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I did not say so. I said the criminal, the scoundrel, would get the benefit, while the honest man would be placed in a contrary position.

Mr. McCARTHY. Well, but the accused may be a scoundrel, as the hon. gentleman says, but the accused may be improperly accused. That is the object of a court, and that is what a jury is there to ascertain—whether he is a scoundrel, whether he is a guilty man or an innocent man, and what the hon. gentleman says is that the court and the jury are wholly incompetent to draw that line and to make that determination. Well, I differ from him altogether. I do not propose to occupy the time in discussing the matter at length, although it is a subject which, from the days of Jeremy Bentham, has occupied a great deal of attention in England. As hon. gentlemen know, the ablest jurist of England to-day, Mr. Justice Stephen—and I think I may so call him, without any disrespect to Lord Bramwell and other jurists—are in favor of this change.

Amendment (Mr. Bossé) that Committee rise, negatived.

Mr. McCARTHY. I hope the hon. gentleman will now accept the amendment which appears to be the general sense of the committee—the fifth clause of which I have given notice.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). So far as I am personally concerned, I am disposed to accept that amendment.

Amendment to section 5 agreed to.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). I believe that I may now move the addition to the Bill of which I have given notice. The House is well aware that on two or three occasions a Bill has been introduced by myself, with a view of amending the law of evidence, in order to give persons an opportunity of giving evidence who have an objection to taking an oath. That Bill has been before the House on several occasions, and it appears to me that it is quite unnecessary to introduce a new Bill. This being a Bill on evidence, it appears to me to be a fair proposition that if the House is in favor of my amendment it might be made part of this Bill. I therefore move that the clause of which I have given notice be added to the Bill. It may be that the amendments proposed by me are more lengthy than there is any necessity for. I have had the advantage of a consultation with the Deputy Minister of Justice with reference to them, and he has suggested that there is no necessity to have the clauses quite so long as they are, that they can be very much curtailed, and with the leave of the House I would therefore strike out certain parts and merely propose this:

If any person called as a witness in any court established by the Parliament of Canada, or in any proceeding, civil or criminal, over which the Parliament of Canada has legislative authority, or requiring or desiring to make an affidavit or deposition in the course of any such proceeding, refuses or is unwilling, from alleged conscientious motives to be sworn, or shall declare that an oath is not binding on his conscience, the court or judge or other presiding officer or person qualified to take affidavits or depositions may, upon being satisfied of the sincerity of such objection, permit such person, instead of being sworn, to make a solemn affirmation or declaration in the words following, that is to say:

I, A. B., do solemnly, sincerely and truly affirm and declare, that the taking of an oath is (according to my religious belief, unlawful, or is not binding on my conscience, as the case may be), and I do also solemnly, sincerely and truly affirm and declare that, etc.

Which solemn affirmation and declaration shall be of the same force and effect as if such person had taken an oath in the usual form.
