House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Speaker: The Honourable Alan A. Macnaughton

Monday, April 5, 1965

THIRD SESSION—TWENTY SIXTH PARLIAMENT—OPENING

The parliament which had been prorogued on the third day of April, 1965, met this day at Ottawa for the dispatch of business.

The house met at three o'clock, the Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the secretary to the Governor General, announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate chamber at three o'clock on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the dominion parliament.

And while awaiting the summons to the Senate chamber:

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, out of curiosity may I ask whether, this being the first day of the third session of this parliament, the required notices have been published in the Canada Gazette and all members of the House of Commons and Senate have been so notified.

Mr. Speaker: This obviously raises a very interesting and difficult point which I will have to take into consideration.

• (3:20 p.m.)

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, it is the pleasure of His Excellency the Governor General that this honourable house attend him immediately in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And the house being returned to the Commons chamber:

• (4:10 p.m.)

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-1, respecting the administration of oaths of office.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that when the house did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I welcome you to the third session of the twenty sixth Parliament of Canada.

We recall with pleasure the presence last October of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth. The visit of Her Majesty to Charlottetown, Quebec and Ottawa helped us to celebrate the hundredth anniversary of the interprovincial conferences that led to Confederation. It also reaffirmed in the hearts of Canadians the cherished place of the monarchy in our national development. The gracious presence and the wise words of the Queen of Canada helped to strengthen the unity of our country and to rededicate Canadians to the sense of purpose that joins us in the pursuit of our common goals as Canadians while leaving us free to develop to the full the facets of our life which reflect the duality of our foundation and the variety of our development.

The international situation gives ground for concern. The stability of South-east Asia is threatened by a deepening crisis in Viet Nam and continued pressures on Malaysia. The United Nations is beset by conflicting political pressures which have seriously impaired its capacity for executive action. The continuance of these situations, and of the policies that have given rise to them, would create serious risks of widening conflict.

My Government is resolved that Canada shall make the fullest contribution it can to the lessening of international tensions, including the provision of practical assistance to developing countries. In the forthcoming negotiations on the United Nations crisis, the objective of my Ministers will be to contribute to the work of repairing and strengthening the United Nations in order that it may play its proper role in the preservation of world peace and security. My Government will press forward its efforts to assure effective international action for peace keeping and to move toward general disarmament under effective international control. Canada will continue meantime to play its full part in the strengthening of collective defence and in the close collaboration of NATO members on both sides of the Atlantic.

My Government will continue to contribute to the development of the Commonwealth ties which are of major importance to the free world and to the improvement of relations between the continents. My Prime Minister will attend the forthcoming Conference of Commonwealth Prime Ministers which will discuss, among other things, the expansion of trade and the establishment of a Commonwealth Secretariat.

My Ministers attach great importance to Canada's neighbourly relationship with the United States and to the development of practical, mutually beneficial arrangements within that relationship. You will be asked to approve a resolution concerning the important agreement on the automobile industry recently concluded with the United States.

Members of the House of Commons:

My Ministers believe that it is imperative to reform the procedures of the House of Commons in order that it may accomplish the large volume of work required to meet the needs of the Canadian people in modern times. My Ministers therefore will submit to you proposals for reform, based both on the valuable work of your committee on procedure and organization and on my Government's study of the procedures which, in the Parliaments at Westminster and elsewhere, have enabled effective debate and criticism to be combined with effective dispatch of public business.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

My Ministers will continue their policy of promoting the strength and unity of the Canadian Confederation. This policy has made possible the achievement and reinforcement on a nation wide basis of programs, in pensions and in other fields, which would not have been attainable but for better procedures of consultation and concerted action with due regard for the federal character of our country. My Ministers will continue to improve the procedures and practices involved in the federal relationship so that all Canadians may feel equally served by Confederation.

After the appropriate provincial concurrence has been signified, you will be asked to approve an Address to the Queen to provide that the constitution of Canada may be amended in Canada by the procedures which have been agreed between my Government and the Governments of all the Provinces.

You will be asked to authorize my Government to provide that "O Canada" shall be the National Anthem of Canada and that "God Save the Queen" shall be recognized as the Royal Anthem in Canada.

Our country is achieving a high rate of economic growth. Trade is expanding. With growing industrialization, Canadians are enjoying rapidly increasing employment opportunities; incomes and living standards are rising; the number of people out of work has been reduced to lower levels than for many years.

[Mr. Speaker.]

All the great potentialities of our economy are not, however, being realized. The talents of some of our people are wasted because of poverty, illness, inadequate education and training, inequality in opportunities for work. To combat these problems, to improve the opportunities of people who are now at a disadvantage, is to put new power into economic expansion and to enhance the unity of our country.

My Government therefore is developing a program for the full utilisation of our human resources and the elimination of poverty among our people. It will include improved measures for regional development, the re-employment and training of workers, the redevelopment of rural areas, the assistance of needy people, the renewal of areas now blighted and congested in our cities, and the establishment of new opportunities for young Canadians. Besides strengthening and broadening measures within the federal sphere of responsibility, the plan will be designed to concert them more effectively with provincial programs. Because of the importance of this plan, my Prime Minister will take direct responsibility for its co-ordination, assisted by a special secretariat. My Government will propose the calling of a special federal-provincial conference to seek full co-operation and co-ordination with policies of the Provinces.

As one of the major elements in this plan, my Government's area development program, which has already been of substantial assistance to industrial expansion in areas of high unemployment, will be expanded, in consultation with the Provinces, to other areas where incomes are low. You will be asked to approve measures to aid industrial expansion in these areas and to help people to take full advantage of such improved employment opportunities.

My Government will also propose improved measures to assist the re-employment of workers displaced by automation or affected by other economic changes. These measures to develop our country's human resources will include grants and loans for workers moving to new jobs, improved training programs in industry, extended vocational services particularly for the longer term unemployed, and an expanded program for agricultural manpower. These measures will be taken in co-operation with management and labour and, where appropriate, in conjunction with the Provinces.

You will be asked to approve the creation of a fund for rural economic development and, in order to provide for fuller integration of action for rural development, amendments to the legislation regarding ARDA will be placed before you.

You will be asked to approve the establishment of a Company of Young Canadians, through which the energies and talents of youth can be enlisted in projects for economic and social development both in Canada and abroad.

After further discussions between my Government and the Provinces, you will also be asked to enact a measure to establish a Canada Assistance Plan, providing for federal sharing in the cost of comprehensive programs under which people can be assisted on the basis of their need.

My Government believes that public policy should be directed to improving the quality of health services and to ensuring that all Canadians can obtain needed health care, irrespective of their ability to pay. Accordingly my Government will at an early date meet with the Governments of the Provinces in order to discuss with them the way in which federal and provincial action can most effectively contribute to programs that will provide health services to Canadians on a comprehensive basis.

My Government will propose the re-establishment of a special committee of the House of Commons on food and drugs, and will facilitate its work with the aim of reducing the prices paid by the public for drugs.

My Government is developing new policies to enable farmers generally to achieve larger and more reliable incomes so that their living and working standards will be comparable to those enjoyed in other sectors of our economy. You will be asked to consider measures of special assistance to the family farm in both eastern and western Canada.

My Government's recent action to raise the incomes of dairy farmers will be followed by a comprehensive measure to make possible the development, in co-operation with the Provinces, of new national policies for major farm products, including the establishment of a Canadian Dairy Commission. Action will be taken to improve the movement and marketing of feed grain in eastern Canada and British Columbia.

In order to raise the level of income of Canadian fishermen, a measure will be placed before you to provide for an expanded national fisheries development program.

In order to improve the position of veterans, you will be asked to approve measures to amend the Veterans' Land Act, the Children of War Dead (Education Assistance) Act, the War Veterans' Allowance Act and the Army Benevolent Fund Act.

A measure will be placed before you to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act, particularly in order to ensure full equality of rights for all Canadian citizens wherever they were born.

You will be asked to approve a revision of the Immigration Act in the light of a white paper which will be placed before you, reviewing immigration policy and procedures.

You will be asked to enact legislation to establish an Indian Claims Commission.

A measure to establish an age of retirement from the Senate will be placed before you.

My Government will seek to provide more encouragement to the cultural development of our country. You will be asked to consider a measure to strengthen the position of Canadian publications, amendments to the legislation dealing with broadcasting, and a measure to help the development of a feature film industry in Canada.

In order to encourage the progress of scientific research in Canada you will be asked to enact legislation to establish a Science Council of Canada. You will also be asked to authorize a program for the advancement of industrial technology, designed to make our industry more competitive and efficient.

Arrangements will be made for you to decide the issue of capital punishment. My Government will appoint a special committee to study and make recommendations on a comprehensive policy for the correction and rehabilitation of prisoners.

My Government will appoint a Royal Commission to study the status, form and procedures of adjudicative and regulatory bodies and to investigate the desirability of instituting a parliamentary commissioner or Ombudsman for Canada.

My Government intends to make proposals regarding the limitation and payment of election expenses when it has received and considered the findings of the committee of inquiry.

You will be asked to consider revisions of the Bank Act, the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act; legislation will be proposed to establish a Canada Development Corporation to assist in financing major new industrial developments and in increasing Canadian ownership of business corporations.

My Government will propose a revision of legislation on unemployment insurance; legislation to provide for safety in employment under federal jurisdiction; amendment of the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act to achieve consistency with the labour standards code; legislation to make collective bargaining and arbitration available to the Public Service; and legislation revising federal superannuation and pension plans to integrate them with the Canada Pension Plan.

You will be asked to consider comprehensive legislation to reform public regulation of the railways and to facilitate the adaptation of the railway system to present and future needs; a measure to provide for the recapitalization of the Canadian National Railways; and amendments to the Aeronautics Act.

Other legislative proposals which you will be asked to consider will include: amendments to the Financial Administration Act to establish the Treasury Board under the presidency of a Minister to be named the president of the Treasury Board; legislation regarding Term 29 of the Union with Newfoundland; a measure regarding conservation of oil and gas under federal jurisdiction; amendments to the Post Office Act, the National Housing Act, the Atlantic Development Board Act, the Northwest Territories Act, the Bankruptcy Act and other legislation.

Members of the House of Commons:

You will be asked to appropriate the funds required for the services and payments authorized by Parliament.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

May Divine Providence guide you in your deliberations.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister) moved:

That the speech of His Excellency, delivered this day from the throne to both houses of parliament, be taken into consideration later this day.

Motion agreed to.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. RICHARD CASHIN AND SECONDED BY MR. JEAN CHRÉTIEN

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. Richard Cashin (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to thank hon. members for their applause and to express my deep gratitude to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) for the honour he has bestowed upon my constituency and my province in asking me to move the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I should like also to express the hope that all hon. members are truly rested after their unique recess. It is no doubt a tribute to the onerous task that is ours that so many of us were unable, during this recess, to visit our constituencies.

I could say, in passing, that in 1962 I had the opportunity of taking part in the throne speech debate. Not too many weeks passed before I was informed that I was not only no longer a member of parliament but that, indeed, technically I had never been one in the first place. I know that you will all understand, Mr. Speaker, when I say I hope history will not repeat itself. In view of the circumstances, there has been something of a departure from custom in that all hon. members will not have a 24 hour period to contemplate the speech from the throne prior to the opening of the debate. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this occasion gives me the opportunity to reflect on some of the ideas, the impressions that have occurred to me as a young and new member of parliament about the institutions, about the direction of our country, not only in the immediate future but in the long term, in fulfilment of the destiny of our nation. But first of all I would like to make reference to my constituency and my province.

This old and historic part of North America became part of Canada some 16 years ago. This union has brought benefit to both Canada and Newfoundland. However, as hon. members can appreciate, Newfoundland had some very special problems in 1949 and today, despite the remarkable progress and growth of the past 16 years, some of these problems remain.

While they are of special importance to my province they are, nevertheless, in many respects problems which Newfoundland and Newfoundlanders share with many other regions and other peoples in Canada. Naturally, Mr. Speaker, I am thinking of unemployment, underemployment, and generally the struggle to participate to the maximum in the achievements of our age.

We are living in an era of unprecedented prosperity, productivity, and of scientific and technological progress of vast and often imponderable magnitude. There are, I would respectfully submit, two overriding challenges which are directly related to this type of society and which we share with a few other fortunate nations of the world. These are becoming increasingly the preoccupation of governments and people. Our response as a people to these challenges will determine the quality and the permanency of our society.

First of all, despite our great achievements and the great abundance of wealth that is Canada's and America's, there are today large numbers of people who seem unable to participate in the advantages of our time. They are the unemployed, the underemployed, those with low standards of education, poor physical or mental health. Some of these people live on farms which can no longer support them. Some of these people are fishing by virtually the same methods used in the sea of Galilee at the time of our Lord. Others, Mr. Speaker, are crowded into congested and blighted areas of our cities. Many are young people who have been unable to get a start and fit into our society. All over Canada there are these people who are better off than their fathers, but nevertheless they are pretty much unaffected by the ever increasing gross national productivity and rising standards of living.

Fifteen or so years ago, in the period just after the second world war, it was felt that each year the standard of living would rise, that more and more people would participate in this growth, and that eventually we would eradicate poverty and want from our society.

Thirty years have passed since the theories of Adam Smith were finally and reluctantly buried—the theories if not the attitudes—and the theories of Lord Keynes became operative, and the basis of our present prosperity introduced. The struggle against poverty and privation is as old as man himself, but in this restricted sense it dates back to the thirties, the new deal, Lord Keynes, the King administration and the second world war. The measures brought about as a result of these changes in approach have guaranteed minimum subsistence as a matter of right to the aged, the unemployed, the dependant and the helpless.

The new problems of poverty in the sixties are not so much problems of dire need, but rather problems of opportunity and dignity. The first challenge, I would submit, to the society of the sixties, is to offer to all the opportunity to live in dignity and to participate in the achievements of our time.

We must recognize the causes of this challenge, and approach them with the determination that we would approach an enemy in mortal conflict. We must recognize that there are certain areas of slow economic growth, and consequently in these areas there are more people on the subsistence level. We must recognize too, Mr. Speaker, that increasing productivity may widen this gap, particularly as a result of automation. I think that we know the labour market for unskilled workers is shrinking and that an abnormally high number of our unemployed are young people.

In the past few years, and certainly in the past two, legislation has been introduced which does form the basis for an all-out attack on this problem but I would respectfully submit, Mr. Speaker, that our traditional attitudes and approaches will not of themselves solve this problem. What is really needed is the same kind of drastic action that motivated our effort in the second world war. In addition to employing the fiscal policies which have been used these past few decades, we must also support them by a vastly expanded program of public improvements and by a much greater educational effort. I would also point out that not only has the public sector of the economy a responsibility, but so, too, has the private sector. What is needed is a form of communal action that will establish certain priorities and goals for our society.

It is not my intention here this afternoon to analyse specific proposals about the format for communal action, nor is it my intention to comment on the many suggestions which have been forthcoming to cope with the serious problems of unemployment and underemployment. However, as I remarked earlier, we are all aware we do now guarantee if a man is unemployed that he will have some form of assistance. But having done this much, is it much further beyond that to decide that there are certain public funds which can be made available to undertake certain worthy public projects such as urban renewal, and conservation, which could employ the unemployed and the underemployed? Perhaps the employment opportunities which would be made available by undertaking these projects could also be related to a program of training. Such a program would hopefully equip these people to cope with society and become useful and productive citizens. In passing I might say that this afternoon we heard a reference to the problem of area development, and I would hope this is a matter which the government can act upon as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker, this first challenge of the equalization of opportunities for all is very closely related to the second challenge which, in my opinion, faces not only Canada but in varying degrees all of the so-called "have nations." It concerns the use which we will make of all the magnificent advances in science and technology. It is essential, Mr. Speaker, that we recognize the extraordinary scope of the scientific revolution now taking place in the world. The knowledge we are going to use, and in fact the knowledge we are already using, will increasingly be employed to alter the world in which we live. On this continent, Mr. Speaker, we are going to be able to produce more goods than ever before, and we will have the ability to provide a standard of living comparable with the maintenance of human dignity for all our citizens.

Our concern then in this second challenge becomes the use which we will make of mankind's sum total of knowledge. Expressed in very simple terms, this issue is the quality of life in Canada.

We look about us and we see our forests and our streams, our cities and our villages, and we cannot help but have a feeling of pride. But as we read about unemployment, about juvenile delinquency, about crime, about the lack of beauty in the things we build, about the pollution of our air and our waters, we cannot help but have some doubt about the use we are making of the vast energies of our people and the wealth of our economy. We have, and we will increasingly have in the years to come, the opportunity to use our energies and our assets for the creation of a high civilization, one dedicated to the fulfilment of the individual and the pursuit of human excellence. But, Mr. Speaker, we will have to take stock of our sense of values and the direction in which our society is going, and we will have to establish priorities in our national life. That is to say, we will have to decide the things we want to accomplish in our society.

There is one priority which is fundamentally related to most of the problems which confront us. More and more, Mr. Speaker, education is beginning to replace the welfare state as the basic concern and commitment of our people. The sole criterion for education for all Canadians can only be the ability to learn. And as we resolve the quantitative problem in this field, we will become increasingly concerned with the quality of our learning.

Therefore it seems to me that in the next few years this is going to become a matter of great urgency in Canada. Already in the United States of America there is considerable debate in this field. In both our countries for a long period of time we have had, in a limited sense, federal aid in this area. But if we are to use the full resources of our great nation to cope with this problem, much greater financial commitment will be required and this, to me, inevitably suggests federal aid. Thus we shall need to be concerned about national standards of education. Before we determine the question of national policies we shall have to resolve the issue of national commitment to educational values and purposes, bearing in mind at all times the priority and the interests of the provinces. The improvements which will result are long term in their nature, but surely there are immediate steps which will have to be taken in determining the priority which Canada as a nation should give to this commitment.

This is a major issue in Canadian life and it is of itself complex and difficult to resolve. However, this particular subject is further complicated by the introduction of other issues and other factors, and the resulting complexities and controversies are likely to lead to general paralysis and failure. As a young man I might be expected to be naturally optimistic, and I say that, now we are on the threshold of putting a man on the moon, we can surely resolve this dilemma. To be sure, it will be a major test of our ingenuity, our understanding and our goodwill. It will be necessary for us to resolve this dilemma and to produce an acceptable formula. What are parliaments and politicians all about, if it is not to seek solutions to human problems?

While these past two sessions of parliament have been hectic and turbulent they have nevertheless been among the most productive in the legislative history of our country. I would hope, as I am sure do all hon. members, that the coming session will be even more productive in the legislative sense, if somewhat less turbulent and hectic. I feel certain that when we have had an opportunity to study the address we have just heard we shall conclude that it contains much hope and promise for the future.

In the past two years the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has shown a rare and perceptive talent in dealing with the particular and urgent problems of this nation. Perhaps more than any other man he understands the nature of our country. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, when I think of the challenges which face Canada today I am confident that he is acutely aware of the situation and magnificently equipped to deal with them.

I am very much aware, too, that there may be among Canadians great division of thought as to how we should approach the challenges of the so-called affluent society. The decisions to be made will be complex and awesome in their magnitude. However, all the wealth of technology and scientific information which is at our fingertips surely opens to us new vistas and new horizons, making us dream dreams which can become realities. My concern—and I am sure it is the concern of all hon. members—is that we should utilize these opportunities to the maximum in order to bring a better life to our people, a life of quality and purpose.

Mr. Speaker, we ought not to be unduly concerned about the prospects of great national debate on the direction this country should take in the fulfilment of its destiny. We ought to remember that there are many ways by which to go forward but only one way to stand still.

I move, seconded by my hon. friend from St. Maurice-Lafleche (Mr. Chrétien):

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency General the Right Honourable Georges P. Vanier, Companion of the Distinguished Service Order, upon whom has been conferred the Military Cross and the Canadian Forces' Decoration, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.

May it please Your Excellency:

We, Her Majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean Chrétien (St. Maurice-Laflèche): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank sincerely the members on both sides of the house for the very warm welcome I was given this afternoon. His Excellency the Governor General apprised us this afternoon of the contents of the speech from the throne for the third session of Canada's twenty sixth parliament, and I am sure that all members join with me in expressing, through you, Mr. Speaker, our great pleasure in seeing that he is in better health than ever, and the French speaking members in particular would like to let him know how proud they are to see this compatriot fulfil with so much nobility the duties of governor general.

[Text]

I hope you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of every member of this house to express my sincere congratulations to my hon. friend from St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) on the very good speech he has just delivered. He showed a real interest in the affairs of this country and great hope for its future. The constituents of his great riding can be proud of him. When we have the opportunity to work with men of his capacity coming from Newfoundland we begin to think it was perhaps not such a bad piece of work when Mr. St. Laurent brought this great province into confederation.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) for extending to the constituency of St. Maurice-Laflèche the honour of asking its representative to second the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

The riding of St. Maurice-Laflèche is almost completely urban. It comprises three main cities, including Shawinigan, a greatly industrialized town with its aluminum plant, its manufacturers of chemical products and its pulp mill. Grand'Mère is another industrial centre, with a pulp mill and textile and footwear manufacturers. Eighty miles north is the town of La Tuque with its huge paper mill.

I do not have to dwell upon the beauties of the landscape, because my riding extends for a hundred miles on each side of the important St. Maurice river, which carves its way through the most beautiful of the Laurentian mountains. The journey from Grand'Mère to La Tuque on an October day is surely one of the most magnificent one could make.

Even though the situation has improved in the last 18 months, my riding is still up against the current problems facing the country: some degree of unemployment, automation and insufficient economic development.

Fifteen years ago, Shawinigan, in particular, was a city in the province of Quebec with an extensive labour market for fairly well trained manpower. Industry offered great opportunities and the workers were alert and highly syndicated. However, industrialists were ill prepared for and unaware of labour problems and the workers themselves were sincere but impatient. A series of major labour troubles took place which brought about great changes in the industries and the lay-off of workers; labour was replaced by automation, and with the economic situation of the country deteriorating very rapidly after 1958, our area experienced severe unemployment in 1961-62, and was unable to provide work for even the most skilled new workers. The exodus of our young graduate technicians, well prepared for a technical career, was a tragic thing. May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that in 1961, while I was teaching graduates at the Technological Institute of Shawinigan, 10 students only out of 100 intended to remain on the local labour market.

And this brings me to the heart of the matter, that is, the role of the state in the economy of the country if we wish to remedy situations such as these.

Canada is one of the wealthiest countries in the world. We boast about the resources of our society. It is true that Canadians generally enjoy a high standard of living, but it is also true that 25 per cent of our people do not live yet according to our wealth, but under conditions which should not be tolerated in a modern, honest and generous society.

The days are past when the individual, entirely on his own, without any help and trusting in God alone, had to fight his way to the top. The golden days of the Rockefellers, the Vanderbilts and the Fords is practically over.

Today the situation is quite different and no one should hope for the return of that individualistic society. In the last 50 years our country has turned more and more toward collectivism, and what MacKenzie King advocated in 1918 has become a reality with the passing recently of social security measures such as the labour code and the pension plan, and with the forthcoming medicare plan. All those projects have been translated into legislation, thanks to the party which sits on this side of the house.

It is obvious that the Liberal party, more than any other, has understood the great currents of history, has seen the changes happening throughout the country and has found solutions which have brought about the collectivist society we know today. In its philosophy, its leadership and its policies, the Liberal party has kept in touch with the traditional trends of thought and action, but it has always understood the evolution of our society. That is why today it is advocating the two attitudes necessary to our country's development, namely economic planning within the administration and the establishment of a new way of life for the two groups which constitute our great nation.

Last December the Economic Council of Canada submitted its first report setting out the objectives Canada should try to attain for 1970.

This report did not receive all the publicity it deserved on account of difficulties experienced by parliament at that time, in December last; however, I believe that it was a turning point in our economic and political history. Now, of necessity, the political parties will have to reckon with the report the Economic Council of Canada will submit every year. The annual report will become the basic document for the Canadian electorate inasmuch as it will reflect the economic situation of the nation.

If Canada is to have full employment and achieve the standard of living set by the council, the government will have to tackle resolutely the most serious problem facing this country: the standard of living in rural areas of the east and unemployment in small urban centres far from the big cities.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

The designated area program has surely been helpful to many regions close to the great economic centres of Canada but it has not been successful everywhere. For instance, it did nothing for the town of Shawinigan, even after it was designated but it was beneficial to other communities in the same district.

I am glad to see that the speech from the throne mentions that the government intends to revise its program to improve it and provide assistance for areas where the standard of living is too low and unemployment too widespread. That is most welcome because we have to rid Canada of any form of pauperism. Every corner of this land must provide for its inhabitants a decent standard of living, one which befits our wealth.

Inasmuch as the standard of living depends directly on productivity, the necessary agencies must be established to enable people who lose their jobs to re-establish themselves as an asset in the economy by finding a job as soon as possible. To do that the government will have to set up also a more dynamic program for the re-training of those workers displaced by automation, and a more modern policy as far as the mobility of workers is concerned.

Why not set up a financial assistance program for people who must move to another city in order to take a new job because of automation?

I am convinced that the Liberal party, which was always in the van in the field of social policy in Canada for the past 50 years will tackle with vision and determination, within the scope of the economic objectives set up by the economic council, the retraining of displaced workers, the mobility of manpower, as well as productivity and industrial decentralization so that every area in Canada might become a comfortable oasis for every citizen. I am happy to see that the speech from the throne provides for the study of new programs in this respect.

However, the most prosperous nation would not be happy without the flame of ideals burning in the heart of its youth. We see that young people, especially in the province of Quebec, are not interested in federal politics, and that the climate of tension which prevailed in this house where it took weeks and weeks to settle ordinary problems has simply aroused their indignation.

This is why it is urgent to establish for the young people imaginative programs of action which will stimulate their spirit of dedication and service and their ideals. I am particularly happy to see in the speech from the throne that the Prime Minister, who has always loved and trusted young people, intends to submit to parliament a program designed to fill the vacuum in this field.

Would it not be marvellous if very shortly French and English young men and women who wish to devote a few years of their lives to check poverty, disease and illiteracy, could together, here and abroad, undertake this task, while getting to know one another better? What an asset it would be for our country to see hundreds of members of the future elite spend a few years working toward a common goal and learn to know one another better.

Now, Mr. Speaker, will Canada survive as a country? Will we be able, in the years to come, to establish in Canada a way of life where the two founding language groups of our country will work in harmony toward the establishment of an exceptional society? Being interviewed by the writer Terence Robertson, the Prime Minister stated: "Canada is a federation in which the two founding language groups must be partners. It is only by admitting this fact that Canada will be able to remain united". The Quebeckers are eager to stay within the Canadian confederation. The French fact was established on the shores of the St. Lawrence more than 430 years ago. Until now we have encountered very serious difficulties, but we have made it clear that we are on the American soil to stay and that we shall stay and shall keep on speaking French. We fought too hard a battle to retreat now. There is not a single French Canadian who would disown his past. The last two centuries have been particularly difficult, but now, in 1965, French Canada has regained confidence and would like its partner, English Canada, to recognize its existence and its strength.

It is not because the province of Quebec is now going through a sort of quiet revolution that English speaking Canada should be concerned. On the contrary, they should be delighted about that and try to understand what is going on in the St. Lawrence valley. Those who have been observing the economic, social and political development in the province of Quebec during the last five years have often said that the province is making a tremendous effort to keep abreast of the twentieth century. There is a great deal of truth in that. Most Quebeckers are fully aware of being involved in a genuine and enormous social movement to make up for lost time, make good past mistakes and adapt to the progress which we rejected or ignored for too long.

However, Quebec is not only striving to achieve the average standard of living in Canada. It is striving today to establish itself in the van of social progress throughout the world—it wants to show the way to modern and progressive societies.

To us French Canadians, there is a double challenge involved in such a desire. First, to establish beyond any question the vitality and boldness of the French reality in North America and our capacity to make a positive and unique contribution to Canadian life, to the development of the whole Canada and, second, to justify through our ability and work our claims for a full participation in all major activities in Canada—government, business, arts, science, professions, and that in view to strengthen and make more dynamic the Canadian nation.

In that sense we are trying to make a place for ourselves within confederation. We realize that for too many years we did not play any part in many aspects of our Canadian life—a part which it was our responsibility and our right to play—but for various and complex reasons including surrender on our part of some of our responsibilities and a certain measure of resistance on the part of English speaking Canada.

From now on, things will change. Today we intend to become an equal and responsible partner in this common enterprise. As a matter of fact, a full partnership is the only sound alternative to separation. Only when we are full-fledged members of the Canadian family with all the rights and responsibilities that follow shall we feel really at home in Canada. Only when we have invested our normal share in Canadian life and take upon ourselves the rights and privileges, shall we consider ourselves the true partners in confederation.

With his broad-mindedness and his sense of history the present Prime Minister has recognized, as no one had done before, that Canada will only survive provided that the two founding ethnic groups can live as truly equal partners. History will do him justice in this regard, while French Canadians will be deeply grateful to him.

You can well imagine, Mr. Speaker, that this atmosphere of building a new society in Quebec is tremendously exciting and challenging. It makes Quebec the most dynamic and invigorating part of Canada to live in today. People in the midst of this movement are totally committed to it, and it is very stimulating to work with them.

As you can see, we are in the middle of a revolution, a quiet one, and it is a terrific experience. Consequently Quebeckers are perhaps too much preoccupied with and interested in that business and are not enough interested in the federal government. A small part even look at Ottawa with contempt. But if we in Canada now decide, as I am sure this government will, that it is time to introduce the same fascinating challenge into federal politics, we must devote all our interests to building a country totally different from the United States, totally different from the point of view of mentality, culture, education and social security, a country with much more equality between the rich and the poor, with equal opportunity for the son of a farmer and the son of an executive, for the English speaking Canadian and the Canadian who speaks French, for both white and black. If we work seriously toward these goals you can be sure that the Canadians who speak French will put into federal affairs the same spirit that we find in the quiet revolution, and we will witness in Canada a good and revitalizing experience.

[Translation]

If, during this third session of the twenty sixth parliament each member felt a little less Liberal, Conservative, N.D.P. or Creditiste, and a little more Canadian, we would make large strides toward a united Canada, where the two founding nations could benefit from a higher standard of living. Let us study with composure the magnificent legislative program introduced in the speech from the throne that His Excellency the Governor General of Canada has just delivered.

For these reasons I have the honour of seconding the motion of my hon. friend, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin), for an address in reply to the speech from the throne.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, April 6, 1965

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—TABLING OF REPORT RESPECTING WITHDRAWAL OF TEAMS

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table the text, in French and in English, of the report of February 27 from the international commission for supervision and control in Viet Nam, dealing with the withdrawal of the commission's fixed teams from North Viet Nam at the instance of the government of North Viet Nam.

VIET NAM—SPEECH BY PRIME MINISTER IN U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, but first I want to congratulate him on the honour bestowed upon him on Friday evening by the presentation of the peace award at Temple University.

I wish to ask him whether the enunciation of his views regarding the Viet Nam crisis represented a cabinet decision. I ask this because of the fact that on Friday afternoon the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in his version of the situation and Canada's views, expressed a somewhat dissimilar attitude to that of the Prime Minister in his extramural speech.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): When I spoke, Mr. Speaker, I was of course speaking as the leader of the government, with the knowledge and approval of my colleagues. What I said did not in my view contradict in any way what was said by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but may have gone a little further than he went on Friday afternoon.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the Prime Minister say whether the reaction of the President of the United States indicated that the suggestion of a pause, measured or otherwise, was refreshing to him?

Mr. Pearson: He was very interested in it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Before the Prime Minister made his speech had he discussed the matter in any way with the officials of the Department of External Affairs, and had there been any exchange of views in this respect with the United States administration before the speech was delivered?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, statements on external affairs are normally discussed with the Secretary of State for External Affairs who takes the responsibility for discussions in his department. The particular statement on Friday night was not taken up with the United States government or any United States authority before it was delivered, although our views in general in regard to Viet Nam were well known to them.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): My question is addressed to the Prime Minister, and it has to do with a press conference which he and President Johnson held at Camp David. Reports indicate that Mr. James Minifie asked the Prime Minister to express his views and those of the government, and the Prime Minister is quoted as having said that the Canadian government both supported and approved of United States policy and Viet Nam. I wish to ask the Prime Minister if this is an accurate report of his comments at that press conference.

Mr. Pearson: I will be glad to send the text of what I said to the hon. gentleman. I do not have that text with me, as it was taken down, but subject to correction in detail I said this government had supported the policy of the United States in Viet Nam and wished to be able to continue that support.

TANZANIA—ASSISTANCE IN AIR FORCE EQUIPMENT AND TRAINING PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer a question asked me last week by the member for "Reindeer"—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacEwan: Santa Claus.

An hon. Member: You have been riding reindeer.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Just call him Rudolph.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman just said, I must have been riding reindeers. This is a consequence of suffering from the 'flu. In reply to the question asked me by the hon. member last week I should say that in response to a request from the government of Tanzania, the Canadian government has stated its willingness to co-operate with the government of that country in an air force equipment and training program. The establishment of an air transport wing, by providing increased mobility, will complement the advisory and training assistance Canada is already extending to the Tanzanian army. The assurance of stability, which depends in part on adequately trained and equipped security forces, is a prerequisite to sound economic and social development.

A Canadian survey team will be sent in a fortnight to examine, in consultation with the Tanzanian authorities and in the light of Canadian capabilities, how Canada can best assist in this matter. The detailed program to be agreed between the two governments will be based on the team's findings. The Canadian government welcomes this further development in the friendly relations between our two commonwealth countries.

I think this was an oral question. I do not know whether that makes any difference, but it was an oral question.

Mr. Churchill: I think you are out of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think it is important that at the earliest opportunity we should show our interest in this commonwealth country.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

LUCIEN RIVARD—INQUIRY AS TO WHEREABOUTS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice.

During the long recess did the minister have any contacts with the attorney general of the province of Quebec to find out if Lucien Rivard had been seen somewhere or if he is still at large without anyone knowing his whereabouts?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): I understand, Mr. Speaker, that this follows up a question that was asked recently by the hon. member for Villeneuve.

In reply I must say that, during what the hon. member calls the recess, I had no special contacts with the attorney general of the province of Quebec on that matter, but after the questions which were asked last week as to whether the police was continuing its searches, I inquired from my sources of information, and I wish to tell the house that the police is actively maintaining its activities.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Does the minister know, for instance, that Lucien Rivard is definitely not in the county of Villeneuve?

Mr. Béchard: One can never tell.

[Text]

[Later:]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister of Justice a supplementary question related to the answer he gave the hon. member for Villeneuve. If I understood him correctly I believe he said he had corresponded with the attorney general of the province of Quebec regarding the search for Rivard. If I did not catch the minister's answer correctly, then I would like him to repeat it.

Mr. Favreau: What I said was that during the long interval referred to by the hon. member for Villeneuve I had no occasion to have any special communication with the attorney general of Quebec, but further to questions which had been put last week I had inquired from my own sources of information and ascertained that the investigation by the police is being pursued.

Mr. Douglas: Then the supplementary question I want to ask is, are we to assume from the minister's answer that he considers the responsibility for pressing the search for Rivard lies with the authorities in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Favreau: I made no such answer, Mr. Speaker, and I think my previous answers speak for themselves in this respect. I said that all police forces in the country were pursuing a co-operative effort in this direction.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): As a supplementary question, is the minister satisfied that every possible effort is being put forth to apprehend one Lucien Rivard?

Mr. Favreau: I answered that early last week, Mr. Speaker.

MINISTERS SUBPOENAED TO APPEAR IN QUEBEC SUPERIOR COURT ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Has the minister received a subpoena to appear in the superior court of Quebec today on the hearing of a petition of Autair Helicopters Limited against Atlantic Helicopters Limited as respondent and the Minister of Industry as mis-en-cause?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Yes, sir.

Mr. Nielsen: Does the minister intend to appear today to give testimony in those proceedings?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, the minister and certain other members of the government are represented there by counsel, and as this is a matter before the courts I am sure we would not wish to debate it here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bell: You don't like that subject, eh?

Mr. Nielsen: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the President of the Privy Council received such a subpoena to appear in the same proceedings today in Montreal?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nielsen: Is it the intention of the President of the Privy Council to appear today—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nielsen: —in compliance with the lawful order issued by that court?

Mr. MacEwan: They are above the courts; they have shown that.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I and other members of the government are represented by counsel in that case, and the matter is before the courts and should not be discussed in the house.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister. Is it his intention or the intention of any member of the government to introduce a motion in this house to allow the three ministers concerned to appear; and if he does not wish to take this responsibility, would he prefer the opposition to introduce such a motion?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary for me to take that responsibility. If the opposition wish to do so, that is their responsibility.

[Later:]

Mr. Nielsen: I have a further question for the President of the Privy Council, supplementary to the one I asked of him and the Minister of Transport. Is the President of the Privy Council aware that subpoenas in the same proceedings referred to previously have been served upon George Davidson, secretary of the treasury board, Mr. Brekelmans, director of the contracts division of the treasury board—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely this question is not in order. I will not say it is not a matter of public knowledge, but it is not so pressing, and I do not see how it particularly concerns the chamber at the present time. I do not see the purpose in the hon. member asking that type of question. With regard to ministers it may be in order, but with regard to other people surely it is outside the direct concern of the house.

Mr. Nielsen: The purpose is to establish whether or not the government is co-operating with the courts of Quebec in looking into this matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I now understand the purpose, but it seems to me the purpose as expressed is an allegation, not a question.

Mr. Nielsen: It is no allegation whatsoever.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nielsen: With due deference to Your Honour—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think this matter has been discussed sufficiently this afternoon.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, if you are ruling my question out of order on the grounds of urgency I give notice that I wish to raise the matter at ten o'clock this evening.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO PROCUREMENT OF NEW TACTICAL AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Last week the minister made a statement in Edmonton with regard to the replacement of a major aircraft used by the armed forces of Canada. He indicated at that time that it would be a very few days before a decision would be reached. Has this decision been arrived at, and is the minister able to tell the house what it is?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Not yet, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lambert: Can the hon. gentleman tell us how often we are going to get these "very few days"?

Mr. Hellyer: Often, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY AS TO RECONSTITUTION OF HOUSE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

Does he intend to propose to the house that the special committee on national defence be revived this session so that it may continue its work?

[Text]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker, it would be the intention of the government to reconstitute this committee during the course of the present session.

AIR CANADA

WINNIPEG MAINTENANCE BASE—TRANSFER OF EMPLOYEES TO MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of protests from Winnipeg concerning the continuing transfer of persons in the employ of Air Canada from Winnipeg to Montreal can the minister say whether something might be done to meet the request that these transfers be halted, at least until the report of the Thompson inquiry is made available?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I dare say the hon. gentleman received the same telegram as I did; I gather it was sent to a number of hon. members. I had some immediate inquiries made of Air Canada about this. Perhaps I might be allowed to communicate to the house the information which Air Canada gave my office. It is to the effect that Air Canada has been meeting with the chairman of lodge 714 for western Canada and the chairman of lodge 1751 for eastern Canada of the union in question in the course of the general negotiations which are taking place at the present time, and both chairmen feel that the action taken by Mr. Peterson in his telegram to the minister was neither legal or proper, and that general chairman Smith of lodge 714, who is in Montreal now, is preparing a telegram to Mr. Peterson accordingly, a copy of which is to be sent to me.

I think until I receive that communication it would be unwise for me to make any other comment apart from what I have said many times in the house, namely that Air Canada has undertaken not to make any transfers except those required by the collective agreement.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister find out whether that undertaking has been kept to the letter?

Mr. Pickersgill: The last information I had, sir, was that it was. I am expecting a further report, and if there is any difference I will communicate it to the house.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister check with regard to the number of personnel who have been transferred, because the figure of 90 given in the telegram greatly exceeds the figure in the answer the minister gave to me in the house a few days ago.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am well aware of that, sir, and I will be very glad to check.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PENITENTIARY SERVICE—RECONSIDERATION OF SALARY REVISIONS AND CLASSIFICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. I wonder whether the minister's attention has been drawn to a press release of the civil service association relating to the emergency conference in Ottawa next week to protest inadequate salary revisions and classifications for the penitentiary service. What steps will the government take to solve what the association calls "the severe anomalies"; and second, will the matter of salary scales be reconsidered?

Mr. Speaker: This surely is a question for the order paper. A detailed answer can be given there.

• (2:50 p.m.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON LAST SESSION'S ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister, in view of the answer given by the minister of external affairs to a question asked last week in the other session of parliament, whether the Prime Minister will now arrange to have answers given to the 127 written questions which remained unanswered at the end of that session.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe that according to the rules they should be put on the order paper; then they will be answered.

AGRICULTURE

QUEBEC—ASSISTANCE TO MAPLE SYRUP PRODUCERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I intended to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture, but as he seems to intend to be just about as assiduous during the new session as he was during the last, I will therefore, in his absence, address myself to the Prime Minister.

Considering that maple sugar producers had a poor crop last year in eastern Canada but did not get any subsidy from the federal government and considering that the situation does not seem to be better this year, does the Prime Minister intend to take immediate steps to help the farmers concerned as soon as necessary if present conditions do not improve?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will be glad to look into this matter, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SUGGESTED PROVISION OF FUNDS ON TEN YEAR BASIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Is it the intention of the C.B.C. to send their employees into the constituencies of members who disagree with the views of the president of this corporation over the financial arrangements inherent in the proposed ten year charter, as has occurred in my constituency?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): I will take this question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Coates: A supplementary question. I wonder whether the Secretary of State might also indicate what are the intentions of the government toward the proposal made by the chairman of the board of broadcast governors as to giving the C.B.C. specific directions as to its duties, especially in so far as finances are concerned.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, the intention of the government is to present amendments to the Broadcasting Act during this session, as was announced yesterday.

TRANSPORT

CONSIDERATION OF REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING RAIL LINE ABANDONMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Is it the intention of the government to enable the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines to receive further representations regarding rail line abandonment before the government proceeds with the proposed railway legislation?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I would think, sir, that it would be rather difficult to take that course before the bill was introduced, but I would be quite prepared to receive any representations myself, or to arrange to have them received by my department.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO NEW CANADA-U.K. TAX AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. W. Groos (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance which is of considerable importance to a large number of people in my riding and across the country.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Groos: It is urgent because, as I understand it, the present arrangements concerned come to an end today. Can the Minister of Finance tell the house the point which has been reached in negotiations with the government of the United Kingdom with respect to a new arrangement covering personal income and corporation tax arrangements between our two countries?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gordon: I might say, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend did not give me notice of his question until after today's proceedings had begun.

Mr. Starr: You mean you gave him the question.

Mr. Gordon: I had expected that some member of the opposition might be on to this, so I am ready to reply. Meetings to discuss the new agreement were held in Ottawa in September and October of 1964. At these meetings a draft for a new agreement was prepared by officials, but this draft has not yet been approved.

In negotiating tax agreements Canada has always attempted to have the agreement provide that pensions and annuities of all kinds should be liable for tax only in the country where the recipient of the pension is a resident.

It was understood that the U.K. authorities would inform Canada whether they could agree to the draft prepared in Ottawa, but shortly thereafter the situation was changed by a new government taking office in the U.K. and the new chancellor of the exchequer's announcement that the form of the tax on corporations in the U.K. would be completely changed following the 1965 budget. Canada would not want to conclude a new agreement until it has studied the new taxes to be imposed in the U.K., which were announced this morning, and it is believed that the U.K. authorities have not wanted to continue the negotiation of a new agreement until details of the new U.K. taxes could be made public.

CONSIDERATION OF PROPOSALS RESPECTING EXCHANGE FUND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the interest of numerous mining communities and other groups, and editorial comment in connection with the proposals by General Charles de Gaulle of France for that country, and later in this house by Sergeant Murdo Martin of Timmins, with the sympathy of Staff Sergeant MacLean of Charlotte, with respect to the conversion of a larger percentage of the Canadian exchange fund into gold, would the minister consider referring this very important fiscal matter to the banking and commerce committee for the hearing of evidence, study and a report to this house for the enlightenment of members so they will understand what is actually involved in this very complicated question?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was kind enough to give me notice of this question and I should like to give a full answer, omitting perhaps the reference to Sergeant Murdo Martin. I did not appreciate his interest in this matter.

Canada currently holds close to 40 per cent of her official reserves in the form of gold and the rest in the form of United States dollars, most of which are invested in short term obligations of the United States government. While the proportion of gold in our reserves will alter somewhat as the level of our reserves changes from time to time, the government is fully confident of the ability of the United States to protect the value of its currency in relation to gold and is a willing holder of United States dollars. Indeed, in contrast to gold holdings, which pay no interest, our U.S. dollar investments have earned more than $188 million in foreign exchange over the past five years.

The government is quite satisfied with the composition of our reserves; therefore I can see no advantage in referring the question to the banking and commerce committee, which I hope will soon be fully occupied considering revisions to the banking legislation.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REPORTED INTENTION TO CHANGE UNIFORM

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice asking him whether it is a fact that the old, historic force, first known as the Royal Northwest Mounted Police and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, is now being divested of its stetsons, spurs, riding breeches, riding boots and Sam Browne belts, except for parades; and does he not feel that this historic force which did so much to hold the west for the British crown deserves better than this kind of treatment?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would ask the minister to give us an answer to that question.

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to look into that question and report on it later.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, this is taking place at the present moment, and I should like the minister to indicate the reason this force is being treated in this way. Are they going to do away with the word "royal" in the name as well?

[Later:]

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the Minister of Justice had advised him, prior to today, about the changes to be made in the uniforms and equipment of the R.C.M.P.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I do not recall that the Minister of Justice, among his many duties, has advised me about any possible change in the uniform of the R.C.M.P.

• (3:00 p.m.)

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

CONSIDERATION BY HOUSE COMMITTEE OF AMENDMENT FORMULA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I wanted to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Is the absence of any reference in the speech from the throne to the appointment of a committee of this house to examine any changes that may be desirable in the constitution, and to examine the proposed constitutional amending formula with which the public is concerned, an indication that the government does not intend to move for the appointment of such a committee at this session?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The procedure for dealing with this important matter, when it comes before this house on the assumption that it will have been approved by all the provinces, will be determined later.

[Translation]

Mr. Clément Vincent (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a supplementary question concerning the formula for the repatriation of the constitution.

I understand the minister is not very good at bluffing at poker, so I am sure to get a straight answer.

Could he tell the house whether he agrees with the premier of Quebec when the latter states that the repatriation formula will not be a strait-jacket for Quebec but only for Ottawa?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

SUGGESTED CONFERENCE WITH MUNICIPALITIES RESPECTING AMENDMENT OF ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Public Works.

Could he inform the house whether the government intends to call a conference of the municipal authorities of the national capital area, in order to consider them with the advisability of amending the National Capital Act?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, we propose to call together the mayors of Ottawa and Hull with a view to improving relations between the central government and the municipalities in question.

Mr. Martineau: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Does the government intend to admit the mayors of these two municipalities to the national capital commission?

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Speaker, the objective of the government is to reach greater co-operation and better understanding between the federal government, the municipal authorities and the national capital commission.

The question now is one of finding the best course of action to take in order to get this co-operation, and I wonder whether participation or admittance of the mayors of these two cities to the commission would be the best course.

SHIPPING

INQUIRY AS TO RESUMPTION OF SHIPBUILDING SUBSIDIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Léon Balcer (Three Rivers): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport if he can say how long shipbuilding subsidies are to be suspended, and if he can say the precise date when the program will be resumed.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I think it would be difficult to do that, sir. The matter is under careful review. I think I indicated there was a large backlog of shipbuilding in the shipyards, and of course the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act is still in operation.

[Later:]

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Transport. Is the government considering announcing that any ships that might be built during this waiting period, if the subsidy is reintroduced, would be eligible?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, sir.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ADOPTION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF PROCEDURE AND ORGANIZATION COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Because of the urgency and importance, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he is in a position to inform the house whether a government notice of motion will be placed on the order paper for consideration and, I hope, adoption by this house, accepting the procedural changes that were recommended by the special committee in its report at our most recent session?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): This matter was dealt with in the throne speech and I hope I shall be dealing with it shortly. Perhaps my hon. friend will wait until then.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MARITIME UNION TRUSTEES—REQUEST FOR CONTINUANCE OF COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that the work of the industrial relations committee was not completed when the session ended, would he give consideration to immediately taking steps to reorganize this committee and set it at work again so we can complete our questioning of the maritime union trustees?

[Mr. Balcer.]

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): I would be glad to consider that suggestion.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): May I ask a supplementary question. In view of proceedings now before the courts in the province of Quebec by way of quo warranto, will it be the intention of the government to reintroduce the same terms of reference for that committee as in the previous session?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we have not yet discussed whether the committee will be reconvened, or a motion will be put on the order paper. As soon as I get a chance I will discuss it with my colleagues.

Mr. Starr: Does the Minister of Labour deem it advisable that the work of this committee should be completed in respect of the maritime trustees, as was originally anticipated?

Mr. MacEachen: Well, Mr. Speaker, the advisability of this motion will be considered by the government.

Mr. Nielsen: I have a further supplementary question arising out of the minister's reply to my first question. Is it a correct understanding of his reply that the government is considering not reconstituting that committee for the purpose of continuing its work?

Mr. MacEachen: The matter has not yet been considered by the government. It will be considered at an early date.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNION PARTICIPATION IN DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING SHORTAGE OF MINERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour whether consideration was given to asking the representatives of the union concerned to participate in meetings now being held to discuss the shortage of miners and skilled workmen between the Canadian Metal Mining Association and the government departments concerned, in view of the government's policy on labour-management co-operation in manpower problems.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): I am not aware that the union representatives have asked to present their views. If they do wish to participate and express their views, we will be delighted to co-operate with them.

Mr. Orlikow: I did not ask if they had asked, I asked whether the government gave consideration to asking them to sit in right from the start.

Mr. MacEachen: This was a delegation from the mining industry coming forward to express its views on the manpower question. It was a meeting sought by the industry and treated as an industry meeting.

Mr. Orlikow: The reports are not of a meeting, but that joint working committees have been set up between the mining association and the government departments, an entirely different matter and one in which I think the unions should be involved.

URANIUM

PROGRESS OF DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING SALE TO FRANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Could he tell us what he plans to do about the sale of uranium to France?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister answered that question last week.

[Text]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT—INQUIRY AS TO CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can he say whether a date has been set for the meeting between the federal government and the provinces relating to health care, which was forecast in the throne speech of yesterday?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): All I can say at the moment, Mr. Speaker, is that it will be after Easter. We are negotiating a date which will be suitable to all concerned.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a supplementary question. Will the Prime Minister make known to the house, perhaps by tabling the correspondence, the agenda or terms of reference for that meeting?

Mr. Pearson: I see no reason why that should not be done if the provinces are agreeable.

• (3:10 p.m.)

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

TORONTO—LEASE OF UNUSED SPUR LINE FOR PARKING PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): I have a question I should like to address to the Minister of Transport. Would it be possible for the parking authority of the township of York to lease any of the right of way of the spur line of the Canadian National Railways lying north of the Canada Packers plant in Toronto, which spur line is no longer in use?

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member put this on the order paper?

Mr. Cowan: Ten o'clock.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, April 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cashin for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be of congratulations to the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) for the manner in which he discharged his responsibility in moving the address in reply, and to tell him that one of the things which particularly interest those of us who have long served in the House of Commons is to see young men and women coming along in the service, and the parliament of their country.

During the years I have been here I have heard many addresses, but I betray no confidence when I say that those delivered by the hon. member and the seconder were of high quality and revealed a manner of approach to the House of Commons and a delivery that did honour to them, to this chamber and to each and every one of us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As one who has tried to learn to express himself in French may I say to the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien) that it is certainly most impressive when a young man is able to express himself so clearly, so cogently and so effectively as he did in both languages. Of course, Mr. Speaker, you would not expect me to add that I agreed with the arguments they advanced or with the extent of the enthusiasm which they expressed for the contents of the speech from the throne.

I do not raise this by way of any objection whatsoever, but I think the course which has been followed through the years, with one exception in 1958, is one that deserves to be continued, namely that on the opening day the Governor General gives his speech on behalf of the government and on the day following the mover and seconder deliver their speeches. That enables a full and complete examination to be made of the subject matter of the speech, something which becomes very difficult when only a matter of a few hours is made available. I repeat that I am not raising any objection except to say I think it would have benefited complete and comprehensive discussion of the speech from the throne had that course been followed, even though it would have meant that the debate would not have been completed before the Easter recess.

On this occasion I do not intend to go into great detail regarding the legislative program. Other members will deal with particular subjects. However, I intend to review some portions of it and, if the Prime Minister will allow me to borrow his expression, I shall be taking a measured pause while he replies to me, so that some of the matters in connection with the speech from the throne may be more fully explained than they have been. Then I hope to have the privilege on a subamendment, if one is moved, of dealing with some of the arguments which the Prime Minister will be making.

I wish to say at once that any suggestions the government may advance for the purpose of making parliament more effective will, as always, receive my support. Parliament has suffered a great deal in reputation over the past two years. That is unfortunate, but the reason for it is clear and undoubted; it is that the government has failed to properly arrange the business of the house and has stumbled from fiasco to fiasco. Indeed, when mention is made of the auto parts agreement, there is only one part of it which would appeal to the government, namely the instrument which would provide for automatic reversing of the positions taken by hon. gentlemen opposite; because it is axiomatic that the house can always look forward with anticipation to a withdrawal, amendment or substitution with regard to each and every policy of any importance which is brought before parliament.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

I realize that the government say the reason more was not done during the recent session was because of obstruction. Well, anyone who holds that view has only to read the speech from the throne in which the government places in the mouth of the Governor General its views regarding the effectiveness of the session just ended, the second session of the twenty sixth parliament. From page to page in the course of that speech the Governor General sets out in detail the large amount of legislation which was placed on the statute books and the effective action taken by parliament during that session. I think it is well to read this; I do not intend to quote it in detail. It gives its own answer. Parliament suffers, but the reason for it is the countless follies of a government which has been accident prone from the first day it took over the administration of our country.

We have taken the stand, and we shall continue to take the stand, that when legislation which is beneficial is introduced we shall support it. We shall ask for changes and amendments. We have a responsibility to discharge, as we had on Friday last when as a result of the strong stand taken by Her Majesty's loyal opposition this government was prevented from securing the passage of amendments to statutes through the subtle means of supplementary estimates. We put an end to that, and I hope it is ended for all time to come.

We shall do what we can, each of us having a great responsibility in this regard, to make sure that parliament is made as effective as it is possible to make it without private members having their rights sacrificed or subverted in any way, and without the loss of the parliamentary mission. I know there are many who think that parliament should operate as a business. That is what Hitler thought. That is what Mussolini thought.

I know there are many who feel there should not be an opposition. Mr. Speaker, where there is no opposition, there you have dictatorship. Sometimes you get dictatorship even with an opposition, when a government refuses to give information. We had an example of this today in connection with that great force, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I asked a question in this regard. The responsible minister apparently has not talked to the Prime Minister about it. This is not the first time the Minister of Justice has failed to tell the Prime Minister of anything. If there is no foundation for the reports which have been appearing, then all I can say is that they receive very considerable space in the press of our country.

Strange things are taking place within the mounted police. Some kind of auxiliary force is being set up. Parliament has not heard about this auxiliary force, said to number 800. We have not been told what it is to do and where it is to do it. We have been given no information. Why should parliament not have this information? Is it true that a body of extra mounties who will operate as irregulars has been set up?

I was amazed that the minister should have refused to answer today. He said he would make a statement in due course. Well, it is either true or it is not. If this is not taking place, why did he not answer? It is just in keeping with his attitude toward parliament as a former senior civil servant. That is what it is, disrespect; and disrespect which we as an opposition intend to expose to the glare of publicity.

I should add to what I have said about the changes which may be contemplated in our procedure, that if changes are to be made—and there have always been criticisms of parliament all through the ages—they must be made after full discussion in this house. I repeat what I said earlier, in effect. This institution, which means more to me than any other institution in our land, which is the embodiment of the concept of freedom, must not in any way be hampered by rules which are archaic. But rules should not be removed simply because they have been with us for a long time; they should only be removed or altered where there is reason for doing so.

Coming now to the speech from the throne, let me say this is a remarkable document in many ways. Scattered through the speech are old familiar friends who have been in previous speeches, the ghosts of good intentions in the government's past. Railroad legislation is now promised. It was promised last year and, I think, the year before. In the new session legislation will be brought down regarding Canadian magazines and Canadian publications. It used to be Canadian periodicals; now it is Canadian publications, which includes newspapers. We are promised bank amendment legislation, another old friend. All these things are in the speech from the throne.

I intend to refer in some detail to the various programs which have been here before. Reforming the procedure of the house is a subject that has been spoken of over and over again. Then it is said:

• (3:30 p.m.)

A measure to establish an age of retirement from the Senate will be placed before you.

I do not think anybody in the other place is going to be very frightened because, sir, last year this was on the order paper entitled "A measure to establish an age of retirement from the Senate". Then I mentioned the railways. This year it says:

You will be asked to consider comprehensive legislation to reform public regulation of the railways...recapitalization of the Canadian National Railways; and amendments to the Aeronautics Act.

We were told that last year. Much is made of the fact that a measure will be placed before the house to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act in order to ensure full equality of rights for all Canadian citizens wherever they were born. That was there last year, too.

As far as our farmers are concerned, Mr. Speaker, I notice that the Minister of Agriculture is not here, because after all he does not like parliament. He says he cannot understand this place, but he does think one of the prerequisites of a good education would be to serve in a cabinet for a while, where you would realize what it was to be "buffaloed". This was in a speech he gave the other day. With regard to agriculture it is said:

My government is developing new policies to enable farmers generally to achieve larger and more reliable incomes so that their living and working standards will be comparable to those enjoyed in other sectors of our economy. You will be asked to consider measures of special assistance to the family farm in both eastern and western Canada.

Last year the promise was:

A measure will be placed before you to provide for a minister responsible for rural development, in order that my government may carry further its policy of giving increased attention to the needs of agriculture in both eastern and western Canada. You will be asked to consider other measures to assist in the improvement of farms and of farm income.

It is just a little different wording but the same old promise which is placed in this compendium, which has all the earmarks of election propaganda.

Mr. Nielsen: They have forgotten the $2 wheat.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then with regard to election expenses, this year they are going to make proposals with regard to the limitation and payment of election expenses, provided the findings of the committee of inquiry are received. Last year the committee was set up; this year there is the undertaking to bring about proposals for reform. Last year there was the undertaking to establish a committee on the procedure and organization of parliament. Then as far as trade is concerned there are two long paragraphs:

> Our country is achieving a high rate of economic growth. Trade is expanding.

All of that is true. It is true because of the fact that when the Diefenbaker government was in office—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —we acted in 1960—

Mr. Pearson: Wasn't it a Conservative government?

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and they have added nothing in particular. All they have done is to accept and envelope our policies which they criticized.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nielsen: The Pearson government has done nothing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I look at these panjandrums who sit in the front benches. Lest anybody think that is an unparliamentary expression, sir, it is not; it simply means—

Mr. Nowlan: Stupid and ossified.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —self constituted magnificoes. What did these panjandrums say when we were in office? They said they were going to end the pegged dollar. They said it was wrong to trade with communist China. I could go through the whole picture of things which they criticized and which have become the cornerstone of their policies.

What have they to offer for agriculture? They were going to have two ministers of agriculture, and now we have got one who is never here. That is not quite fair; he is here on a stopover between trips. Sometimes he deigns to come. What about the position of agriculture across the country? What is being done by the government in the face of a fall in the price of wheat? What action are they taking? Where are the promises of $2 wheat, for which every one of those hon. members stood in 1963? It was repudiated in January of 1965 by the Minister of Agriculture? What has been done? What course has been followed by this government to increase the markets for agricultural products? Sir, there can be only one answer. This is a government that has been so busy falling over its own feet that it has not been able to bring any effective measures before the house.

What about this speech from the throne? Something old, something new, something borrowed, something blue. They borrowed from the United States the idea of a youth corps. That is a good idea. They also decided they would borrow an all-comprehensive plan to banish poverty in our country. I will be listening with interest as the Prime Minister reveals how this is going to be achieved, except through the ordinary principles of expanding trade and reducing costs so that Canadian manufacturers may be competitive in the world.

An hon. Member: What about the sales tax?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have looked over this program within the time I have had, Mr. Speaker. It contains a compendium of unfinished business. It reveals a catch-all of promises for the future, policies that cannot be fulfilled and programs that have been left undone. I listened this morning to the editor of the Citizen giving his nepotic views on this subject. He said there was a bombshell dropped on parliament by that speech. Instead of positive, detailed and constructive programs we have vague generalities, except in a certain particular to which I shall refer.

I ask you, sir, have you not looked in vain for anything in these far ranging so-called broad programs that will assure a million and a half new jobs in the next three years? I ask you whether you have not looked in vain for programs and policies aimed at raising the national income of all Canadians through resource development. I ask you whether you have not looked in vain for any new immigration policies designed to encourage those who have the necessary skills who would take up residence in Canada. I ask what has been done to solve the problems of economic blight and rural misery. All that is being done in this speech is to state an objective while being most careful not to indicate how these ephemeral promises can be carried into actual and effective operation.

Then there is something more, and I shall deal with it particularly. Where is there anything to indicate, while maintaining the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces over education, the recognition of the plight of university students hit by new increases in tuition fees? Where are the 10,000 scholarships? Where are they?

Mr. Nielsen: Forgotten.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister said last session, "Wait till the next session". Now we are here, and nothing is said about it. What has happened to those scholarships? They were wonderful vote getters. Those who voted have not had the experience which some of the rest of us have had regarding similar promises made by the Liberal party on other occasions.

Mr. Nielsen: They will put them all in the youth corps.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Where are the plans to bring about new developments in Canada? Where are the policies?

Well, Mr. Speaker, for several months there was an indication that the Minister of Finance, now that he is the supreme stumbler of the cabinet, would be bringing about a reduction in taxation. This was one of the goodies which many anticipated. There is not a suggestion of that in the speech from the throne. He may well say that that matter should be dealt with in the budget, but in the past hon. members opposite have not been that careful. If they had something like that to promise they would have put it in the speech.

What about action to remove the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials and production machinery? Only recently, in so far as the steel companies are concerned, it was stated by the vice president of the Steel Company of Canada that there were two reasons for the increase in steel price, and the first of these was the 11 per cent sales tax. What is the government going to do about that? What action is going to be taken? We have always had from the minister that nonchalant laugh that those who do not understand and have no appreciation of poverty and its effects give in reply to those who do. They ridicule the idea. Yet now it is generally admitted that the 11 per cent sales tax was a serious blunder, irrespective of the fact that it brought in a tremendous amount of taxation. What are hon. gentlemen opposite going to do about this matter?

Well, Mr. Speaker, they just sat down. I can just see that cabinet sitting down and looking around. "Have you got an idea?", the Prime Minister would say. Then someone would say yes. "Well, all right, put it in". And so they went around gathering together the greatest collection and plethora of generalities ever generated and included in a speech from the throne.

I have the list here, extracted from one of the morning papers, the Toronto Globe and Mail. When you go through it, Mr. Speaker, you find there are three or four matters of legislation which are practical, and the rest is simply designed to fill up the speech from the throne to lead the people to believe that if this parliament does not pass all these things, the reason will be obstruction. I was particularly struck, Mr. Speaker, with the first paragraph; and I shall now deal with some of these matters paragraph by paragraph. The speech commences:

> We recall with pleasure the presence...of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth.

All of us will join in that. The speech also reaffirms—

> —in the hearts of Canadians the cherished place of the monarchy in our national development.

Why put that in? Would not the proper idea be to express that sentiment to two or three Liberal members in the house who are already on the rampage to remove the Queen? Would it not be better to make it available to the university young Liberals associations of Canada, who want to abolish the Queen in Canada; or to the young Liberals association, the national meeting of which undertook as part of their policy to have a republic set up? Or to the young Liberals association of Toronto, who also came out with a policy to abolish the monarchy? Here is the Prime Minister putting these words on the lips of the Governor General, reaffirming "in the hearts of Canadians the cherished place of the monarchy". The only Canadians who cherish the monarchy are those who do not belong to the group who would abolish the Queen, including the young Liberals association and the university young Liberals of Canada.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Hon. members opposite should cry shame at those who would abolish the Queen, and to the members who sit here and constantly advocate the abolition of Her Majesty the Queen. But as far as Her Majesty's loyal opposition are concerned, come what may we stand for the monarchy as a necessary element in the parliamentary life of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The next item deals with the international situation:

> The international situation gives ground for concern...The United Nations is beset by conflicting political pressures which have seriously impaired its capacity for executive action.

I think that was a little self admission on the part of the government, because that is what afflicts this government today—conflicting political pressures which seriously impair its capacity for executive action. Then the next paragraph goes on to say:

> My government is resolved that Canada shall make the fullest contribution it can to the lessening of international tensions—

—and so forth. Then it makes reference to repairing and strengthening the United Nations.

Well now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to hear the story of what happened in the United States on Friday and Saturday. I wish the Prime Minister would tell the house and the country what kind of political one-man brinkmanship it was to bring forth a policy in the United States without having discussed the matter with the authorities in the United States. In the past he has often spoken of the necessity for the quiet diplomacy that is most effective and which has been his hallmark. But what happened? Why did he have to alter his proposal a bit after he had made it? First of all he said the time has come for a pause in bombing. Later an interpretation was given by those high in political circles in Ottawa that the Prime Minister did not mean that the pause was to take place now. He did not say when the pause was to take place, but whenever it was deemed appropriate psychologically that the pause should take place. That is another example of a government that makes statements and then backs down and goes into reverse.

The next item under international affairs is:

> You will be asked to approve a resolution concerning the important agreement on the automobile industry recently concluded with the United States.

We want the fullest discussion on that matter. Canada, since the middle of January, has been operating under this agreement. Canadian industry and the small industries are being challenged here in Canada. As the hon. member for Wellington South has said, the small manufacturer in Canada is in danger. He is challenged by this competition from the United States, and when he wants to compete for markets in the United States he is up against the 11 per cent sales tax on production machinery.

We want to get the facts of this situation. This was an agreement that should have been brought before parliament instead of being entered into unilaterally, effective on Canada until such time as the United States passes legislation. We intend to discuss this matter fully, because in our opinion it is passing strange that Canadian people should suffer as the result of an effective payment of $50 million a year to the big manufacturers of automobiles, yet no member of this house or any Canadian is going to obtain his car at a price equivalent to United States prices.

Who reaps the benefit of this agreement? The consumer in Canada loses $50 million in income, and it is the government's hope that some time in the future the automobile companies will deign to reduce the price in order to take up part of the difference between the Canadian and United States prices.

Let us now move on to the next matter, Canadian federation, and this is a large one. We heard the concept of this government as announced by the Prime Minister; two nations and two flags, and now we are to have two anthems in the interests of Canadian unity. He speaks about strength and unity of Canadian confederation through the lips of the Governor General. The ludicrous promise is made that this government will continue their policy of promoting the strength and unity of the Canadian confederation. Sir, during the period they have been in office they have done more to bring about discord, suspicion and division in this country than was ever done before since confederation, with the one exception that took place in 1917.

Except for that, never has there been anything like this. Policies have been followed that have set race against race for pure political expediency. They are going to improve the relationship, they say. I am not going into this except to repeat what I said, that if this plan is accepted they will be placing Canadian federation in a strait-jacket which will deny future amendments, however necessary they may be. They will place the Canadian constitution in a position in which each and every province will have a veto. The premier of Quebec has said there will be a veto, and he says it will be an effective one. Already the voices of reason are taking over.

Because I dared to say this was a bad arrangement, or even dared to utter such words, they said I was anti-Quebec. What are the people of Quebec saying today? What has been said in Le Devoir?

Mr. Pepin: Yes, but for opposite reasons.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was the comment? Mr. Speaker, if I can get the Minister of Justice to speak on this subject I will have achieved the epitome of parliamentary perfection. We believe that the right of veto constitutes a negative device. The letter of March 27 from the Louis Riel committee stated that the right of veto was a negative device, a stick in the wheel of parliament which will hold back the evolution of Canada as well as that of the provinces. Another article describes it as a Trojan horse, while yet another describes the whole formula as a "camisole de force", a strait-jacket. It is stated as well that it constitutes the grave danger of the balkanization of Canada. It then states that the special status of Quebec becomes simply the isolation of Quebec and the setting of Quebec to one side. I suppose that is one of the reasons there has been some deceleration on the part of the premier of Quebec in bringing this matter before the legislature of Quebec.

They then suggest that my stand and the stand of this party is wrong, and that we always argue so in matters such as this. I will place before this house an outline of the views of various constitutional experts across Canada. Professor G. A. McAllister of the University of New Brunswick said:

> The repatriation formula as presently conceived should be rejected categorically.
> The present formula is an arrangement for walking backwards into the future;—

Professor R. D. Gibson of the University of Manitoba said:

> I am violently opposed to the amendment proposal.

Professor B. L. Strayer of the University of Saskatchewan said:

> I believe the new constitutional amendment formula is unsatisfactory because it is unnecessarily rigid.
> It will make future constitutional amendments virtually impossible.

And so go these statements. Dr. Alex Smith of the University of Alberta said:

> A constitution must be at once sufficiently rigid to ensure stability yet sufficiently flexible to accommodate change.

Then he states that if this plan is brought into effect it will render the Canadian constitution the most rigid in the world and important amendments will be at the mercy of a single province's veto. Dean W. R. Lederman of Queen's University said:

> I strongly favour bringing the constitution home—

Then he goes on to say that the formula is very rigid and means that important amendments would be very difficult if not impossible to obtain. Professor E. R. Alexander of the University of Ottawa said:

> I am unalterably opposed to the Favreau formula.

When I was taking this stand it was said that I did so because I was anti-Quebec. If this constitutional amendment formula is accepted, then in so far as any province of Canada is concerned there will be virtually no change—there could be no serious change —in the constitution for generations to come.

What does the premier of Quebec say? He persists in enunciating a view of the amending formula which seems to be at variance with the pious assurances of the Prime Minister. Last night the premier embarked on the television program "Aujourd'hui"—the same program which saw the Minister of Justice not long ago enunciate the theory of associated states—and said that the formula was a strait-jacket, not for Quebec but for Ottawa.

I do not care what this is a strait-jacket for —for one or for the other—but the premier of Quebec has said that if we get this through it will be a strait-jacket for Ottawa, and so it will be. When you remove section 91(1) and deny the parliament of Canada the right to amend its constitution in respect of those things which come within the jurisdiction of the federal government, then you are emasculating the strong central government, and that is what is going to happen.

I want very much to hear what the Prime Minister has to say relating to the words of Premier Lesage. He was asked a question today and Your Honour properly ruled it could not be asked on orders of the day. Therefore, sir, I have to ask it at this time. I will be very interested to know if he accepts that.

Then, what else did Mr. Lesage say on "Aujourd'hui" last night? He said:

> A good bluffer always keeps a card up his sleeve.

I do not know about whom he was speaking. Earlier, he had been mentioning the Prime Minister's views and his views.

> In the course of negotiations, I will have a card up my sleeve—

I can imagine how that card will be located by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau), who has not been able to find Rivard. You can just imagine how that will be noted by the Minister of Justice. Who has the card? I do not care who has the card, but this matter must be examined carefully by parliament, out in the open and not in secret, or through under the table agreements or behind closed doors. We want to know what went on. It was a happy party. The Prime Minister said, I will give you this, far more than you ever expected. We want to know the facts. I ask the Minister of Justice, that believer in the independence of Canada, who explains anti-colonialism, are we not going to be a most colonial country when we are not going to have our own constitution enacted by the parliament of Canada? We are going to have to go to the United Kingdom to provide the basis upon which we, in Canada, can amend our constitution.

I should have liked to hear Mackenzie King on that subject before the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) became one of his trusted lieutenants. What would he have said had he known that we, in 1965, are going to the United Kingdom to say: Please, give us the right to amend our constitution in this way. It will stay over there as a statute. We want it to be a statute of the Parliament of Canada so that we can examine each and every part of it. We have tried everything to get this government to take a new look at the matter, but without result. I think we all owe a great debt of gratitude to the premier of Quebec for his clear statement on that program last evening which revealed who has the joker up his sleeve and which of the two jurisdictions is going to be in the inferior position. Let us make it a Canadian document. Let us make it eligible for amendment in the light of the changing needs that take place.

We in this party have consistently endeavoured to bring about the repatriation, if I can use that expression, of the constitution, but we were unable to secure the consent of two of the provinces. What is our suggestion in this connection? We remain unchanged from the view we expressed on February 4, 1963, that there should be convened a great national conference, not one meeting for a few hours or a couple of days. This conference should study in detail, for whatever period of time is necessary, the means of amending the constitution which would provide for a solution of the problem of adequate representation in the public service for both racial origins in crown corporations, and also examine biculturalism and bilingualism in a comprehensive manner.

We could have obtained votes, Mr. Speaker, by coming out in favour of a commission. They said it would be a wonderful step forward if we were to do that. The attitude then taken by this party, every member of this party in the cabinet, was that such a commission would be destructive to Canada. One has just to read the first report of the commission to know how well founded our views were.

Now, a moment ago I mentioned various professors who have been outstanding leaders in the field of political science who have spoken against the amendment. I see before me an item dated March 31 and which refers to the fact that the constitutional expert, a professor of law at the University of Toronto, Dr. Edward McWhinney says the constitution as it stands is clumsy, too wordy. Then, I quote:

> In my view, anything that a reasonable national consensus desires can be made to work under the B.N.A. Act. Clumsy and full of unnecessary detail as it is, I still think it is flexible enough to be accommodating to what one wants, and that is the most important thing.

He finally ends up taking the view, as I understand his evidence, that the plan of amendment is a plan that will be a denial of the destiny of this land. It will balkanize our country and place the constitution in a position where, regardless of the changes that must be made in the years ahead, those changes cannot be made. I have no argument against the fact that some of the provinces accepted it. Naturally, when securing extra powers or extra authority, they are not going to turn down that which is given to them. But, sir, the Parliament of Canada is the one institution, and the only institution, that can stand for one Canada, for the maintenance of those things that made this nation possible and for the things that, in the years ahead, will assure the continuing strength of our country.

People say to me that taking that stand will be interpreted as being anti-Quebec. I should like to quote the words of at least two members in this house dealing with stands that were taken while I was prime minister, fully approving of those stands and pointing out that our attitude had been one of full recognition of the equal partnership of two races and also of the rights of other people in Canada who come from various racial origins, of which I am one in part, and which are not going to permit themselves to be placed in a secondary position of Canadian citizenship.

I adopt the words of Sir John A. Macdonald as quoted in "Confederation, Its Preparation and Accomplishments", a really quite remarkable work:

> We are a great country and shall become one of the greatest in the universe if we preserve it; we shall sink into insignificance and adversity if we suffer it to be broken. God and nature have made the two Canadas one—let no factious men be allowed to put them asunder.

This is the foundation principle. I adopt the words of another statesman, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, when he said this on March 13, 1900:

If there is anything to which I have given my political life it is to try to promote unity, harmony and amity between the diverse elements of this country. My friends can desert me, they can remove their confidence from me, they can withdraw the trust they have placed in my hands; but never shall I deviate from that line of policy.

Those words I adopt as my own. They represent the consensus that must be established within our land. Then he went on to say this:

Whatever may be the consequences, whether loss of prestige, loss of popularity, or loss of power, I feel that I am in the right and I know that a time will come when every man will render me full justice on that score.

That is the attitude of statesmanship rather than of political expediency designed to obtain votes this year, regardless of the consequences to the nation in the years ahead.

I say again our position is that we will convene that conference. We had already sent out the notices, but with the defeat in the house of the non-confidence motion it became impossible to bring the matter forward.

I turn now for a moment to the question of the economy, and this will be dealt with at length. Look at the speech from the throne —wordy, verbose, redundant. Where is there anything in it to bring about the idea, the concept of the Economic Council of Canada, that we need a 10 per cent increase in the export of manufactured goods each year? Where is there anything to indicate that the government has any plan, imaginative or otherwise?

I come back to the automobile plan, that policy of $50 million to which I referred, that annual subsidy in rebated tariff paid by the Canadian taxpayer? Who is going to get soaked under that in Canada? The poor, the average Canadian and all Canadians. Who is going to be helped?

There is nothing in the throne speech to indicate the government has any recognition of the inflationary trends that are taking place. When we were in office we maintained the price level to a degree that received most favourable comment from the late President of the United States. Prices are rising today. What are the members of the government going to do about that? They are going to have a committee look into the matter. Drug prices are as high as Haman's gallows, but what are they going to do? They are going to set up a committee to look into the question. There is one reason why drug prices are so high, and it is the 11 per cent sales tax. Take that off, and drugs will be a lot cheaper.

What is this padding in the throne speech—words instead of action.

My government will propose the re-establishment of a special committee of the House of Commons on food and drugs, and will facilitate its work with the aim of reducing the prices paid by the public for drugs.

Mere stuffing, but not effective.

Then we come to the next point dealing with the economy:

My government is developing new policies to enable farmers generally to achieve larger and more reliable incomes....

While the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) peregrinates back and forth, now and then he throws out policies. He said to the farmers of Quebec, "The trouble with you people is that you don't know how to look after things." I heard him make a speech in which he said we should go back to the days of the Renaissance and we should go in for more poetry and philosophy. He told the farmers of Quebec the solution was, "six cows, two sows, and you will be on easy street." That was the serious policy of the Minister of Agriculture in respect of that matter.

So far as the dairy farmers are concerned the government says it is going to set up a Canadian Dairy Commission. The announcement the other day in connection with dairy prices does not at all meet the situation and will leave the dairy industry in almost as serious a condition as it is today.

What about our veterans? The government gave a 10 per cent increase in disability pensions. We increased them twice in our period of office, by 20 per cent on each occasion. What about the veterans? Nothing is going to be done for them in that connection except that the Veterans Land Act, the Children of War Dead (Education Assistance) Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Army Benevolent Fund Act are going to be amended. Padding and stuffing.

We were ready for the establishment of an Indian Claims Commission. We had the legislation ready at the time we were defeated. The Indians have been waiting. Promises were made that action would be taken and now we find we "will be asked to enact legislation to establish an Indian Claims Commission." That would not take any time. Bring it in. It could have been brought in last session. Now it is overdue.

Sir, I am not going to go back over the last session of parliament. There were a number of things buried under the debris. Now we have mention again of the Quebec Savings Banks Act and our old friend, a Canada Development Corporation. It was put in a state of suspended animation that was generally regarded as death itself, and now it does not even get a separate paragraph. It is put in among other things and the throne speech says it will:

—assist in financing major new industrial development and in increasing Canadian ownership of business corporations.

What has happened? With all the tinkering the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) has done, the amount of U.S. investment in Canada increased in the last year. While he raises his hand, Canute fashion, and says no, the other member of the family, the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury), says yes.

Finally mention is made that there is going to be legislation on pension plans, and there are some further items, again buried together in an omnibus section. There is nothing in the whole picture to assure economic growth.

I read with interest what the Prime Minister said in Weekend magazine in that "no holds barred" interview on April 3.

I think it is the responsibility of government to assist this process—

That is the process of Canadian ownership, as I understand it.

—by making it attractive for Canadians to own their own country by giving them certain tax and other incentives. This is a better way of doing it than penalizing those foreigners who have established themselves here.

Why didn't the Prime Minister tell the Minister of Finance that two years ago?

Mr. Nowlan: A year ago.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Have they both learned since? Sir, that is what we have been arguing, and in the no holds barred interview the Prime Minister admits this is the way. Then he said:

A carrot is better than a kick in this respect.

Apparently the doctrine of the kicker, the Minister of Finance, is now to be supplanted by the doctrine of the carrot, by the Minister of Industry.

There are many other matters to be dealt with in connection with the subject of the economy but I intend to leave them for other speakers. I am simply pointing out that when one looks at this speech from the throne and sees the lineup of matters to be dealt with, it has the impressiveness of length, volume and diversity of legislative enactments to be, but when analysed it is, as I feel you will agree, simply a document to act as a guide, compass or chart in an election campaign as to what would have been:

For of all sad words of tongue or pen,
The saddest are these: "It might have been!"

• (4:20 p.m.)

That is what they will say—"If only we had had the opportunity". The constitution is important. Unity is important. Economic development in all its phases from industry to agriculture, is important. But, sir, we will not have a great Canada if our nation in its parliament does not stand for high principles in high places and in all places. I look this over. While wars on poverty are essential—I assume the government borrowed that expression from the late President of the United States; look at the legislative program which followed in that country; very little was actually brought about—while wars on poverty are essential, they will be won when we raise economic standards in our nation, when the humblest in the land is not forgotten but has a voice in parliament. Fifty million dollars is going to the big manufacturers of automobiles and parts. But when anybody suggested that $75 was too little for the old age pensioners, the government said wait. Fifty million dollars for the manufacturers but no addition for the old age pensioners.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is conspicuously absent from this speech? Mr. Speaker, the moral things of a nation are greater than the material ones. It defies nature to think that a pure stream can run from a tarnished spring. The most conspicuous absence from the speech from the throne is this—a war on wrongdoing in high places.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not doubt that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) would have taken his sword Excalibur and gone forth. Instead, there has been silence on an issue which has shaken the fabric of this nation. I had expected that even though this government has been fumbling and careless and inept there would have been in clear and definite terms a declaration by the Prime Minister as custodian of the national conscience that they would purge the unfit, the incompetent; that they would raise the standard of high ethics in this land. Nothing of the kind is to be found in this speech. However, when moral principles are undermined, when moral principles are disobeyed, a nation undermines its greatness. I do not say that wrongdoing is confined to any one individual or one party. But I do say that where there have been the revelations which have taken place in this nation it is not in keeping with the greatness of our country to give no attention to a war on wrongdoing with all the strength of parliament behind such a course. I do not want to see Rivard become the new folk hero of the young men and women of this nation. I think it is a wonderful thing to set up this corps of Canadians, this youth corps. But who is going to lead them? Are you sure they will not be led by such as those with respect to whom evidence has been given during the last few weeks? The Prime Minister cannot say to me that I am dealing with something which is before a commission, because he dealt with the same question in the course of an interview.

This is not an academic question. Where is this declaration in the speech from the throne that the administration of justice in Canada within the federal jurisdiction shall be beyond reproach?

An hon. Member: Better get a justice minister, first.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Where is the declaration in this regard? I do not intend to go into the record but I will point out those facts—that one former Liberal member who became a judge is now awaiting an appeal after conviction; that a cabinet minister is before the court; that two cabinet ministers bought furniture in circumstances which demand that this House of Commons find out what is in the record of the Sefkind bankruptcy. We have a right to know. We asked the other day but we were told we could not have this information. Why should it be denied us? I know the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) did not tell the Prime Minister that his own parliamentary secretary was allegedly involved. Why? The other day when we asked to look at the Sefkind file we were told: You cannot see that. We want to see it. We will not be brushed aside by the Minister of Justice or by the government in this regard. Let that be clear.

It has been a record unequalled in Canada. This is an administration which has earned a reputation of being friendly and considerate to unpalatable characters such as Hal Banks, an administration which has had connected with it in responsible places men who were concerned about the welfare of narcotics king Rivard—narcotics, the cruelest and most despicable form of crime which can be committed against the souls of men. What were they interested in? What did they want? What happens to a nation when things like that occur? The Prime Minister mentioned innuendo and insinuation. Was there any innuendo involved in the fact that the parliamentary secretary was forced to resign? Surely he was not asked to resign because of an innuendo or an insinuation.

Then the chairman of the Liberal caucus in parliament resigned because his name cropped up in the investigation of influence peddling, and the accommodation of people allegedly connected with the world-wide crime syndicate of the Mafia—the chairman of a committee resigning from his position because of the condemnation of a provincial commission.

What is the reaction of the government? The Minister of Labour (Mr. McEachen) is not here, so I will not make any observations on the statement he made when speaking the other day before a Liberal gathering at Richmond Hill. He said that unemployment problems no longer dominated parliament's discussions. Then he said that we now indulge in the luxury of talking about the latest prisoner's escape from jail. What a statement of government policy that is, to say that we now indulge in that luxury. How can any plan, any policy or any great concept of national importance succeed in its purpose unless we have re-established in this nation, by parliament, the concept of morality in high places? Profumo was not pushed out because of his activities; Profumo went out because he deceived parliament.

That is how serious this matter is. They were never so busy looking under beds for communists. I would like to have heard a statement such as this, and as a matter of fact I ventured the opinion that it would be a statement that in all parts of Canada "my ministers will take all steps necessary to stamp out corruption or influence peddling in government". If that had been there, it would have been a great declaration. I know the difficulties under which the Prime Minister operates. I occupied that position and I know the difficulties. But I also know this, that I never failed to make clear one thing, harsh as they thought it was, "If there is any suggestion of wrongdoing, you will be—

An hon. Member: In the Senate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —"punished", period.

Again I refer to Profumo. He was not driven out of public life because of his extra-curricular activities. Parliament in the last session was not given the truth.

Mr. Mandziuk: From the Prime Minister, up and down.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It may be said that I have overstated the position, Mr. Speaker, but I have extracts from the press of Canada which are particularly appropriate at this time of the year, spring cleaning. The Winnipeg Tribune says this:

> Mr. Pearson is fortunate that for some mysterious reason he has managed to appear personally aloof from the bumblings, mishaps and even wrong-headed decisions of his government. In his case the traditional principles of cabinet and ministerial responsibility do not seem to apply automatically. His ministers, executive assistants and parliamentary assistants may become involved in almost incredible situations but comparatively few seem ready to blame him personally.

Then it says:

> Time will tell whether this attitude is soft-headed as well as soft-hearted.

Then there is the Winnipeg Free Press, certainly not an enemy of this government. The Winnipeg Tribune from which I quoted was dated March 30. The Winnipeg Free Press says:

> Cabinet changes needed.
> One of the tragedies of the situation is that most of Mr. Pearson's ministers are honest, conscientious, dedicated men.

Then it says this:

> As a result of these shortcomings in the higher echelons the whole government has given the impression of being accident-prone, of being unable to see ahead or to circumvent the pitfalls that strew the way of any administration. And as if this were not enough, there have been instances of a much more serious lack in higher government circles—a lack of honesty and integrity.

Then it says this:

> But until, by one means or another, there is a stronger ministry at the head of the country, a ministry capable of giving firm and vigorous leadership and of commanding the confidence of the nation as a whole, the prospects for an improved parliament and for an effective handling of the nation's affairs seem bleak indeed.

Those are the words of the Winnipeg Free Press. If you disagree with them, as I so often do, at least they follow the course that throughout the years has earned for them the thanks of this nation. Then Charles Lynch of the Southam News Services wrote an article headed:

> An ugly state of affairs.

He is not talking about China. He said:

> After Thursday's events in the House of Commons, it seems clear that a showdown on the question of morality in government must come quickly and that it cannot await the completion of the Dorion inquiry.

Then the Victoria Daily Colonist, to the same effect. The Winnipeg Tribune deals with the explanations given on this matter regarding the information as to whether or not an alleged bribe had been offered which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) advised the Prime Minister of in September and which the Prime Minister forgot until the middle of November and says:

> Mr. Pearson's statement of explanation to the Commons after the memo had been read into the record of the inquiry was quite inadequate.

Then the Peterborough Examiner:

> Thus, like Mr. Favreau before him, Mr. Pearson has been less than frank. Again, there is no suggestion that a man of Mr. Pearson's stature was a party to the bribery attempt. But once more the Liberal government has been guilty of a lack of candour that will be most distressing to the Canadian people.

These are not Conservative papers. Then in the Montreal Star there is an article headed, "What A Muddle." and it says:

> Prime Minister Pearson's humiliating loss of memory, for which he apologized to the House of Commons last Thursday will have more than one consequence. It will reinforce the already widely held conclusion that his administration is one of the most politically inept in the history of Canada. Immediately it will have the effect of going some way to restore the reputation of Justice Minister Favreau.

Then it says:

> It must be left to others to explain why, when this crisis burst upon parliament, Mr. Pearson pursued his plan to do some prairie politicking.

These are not Conservative papers that I am quoting from. The Ottawa Journal said this on December 18:

> His government drags its feet about allowing a judge to inquire freely into the Rivard case.

Then it says:

> These dark evasions may not be dark but they seem dark; they invite the ordinary man to wonder what he is trying to hide.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Then the Toronto Daily Star of December 18 was to the same effect:

> There is no doubt that this business coming on top of the earlier revelations has damaged the government heavily.

Even so, Mr. Speaker, it has been omitted from the speech from the throne, where it should have been underlined. No matter what one's political views may be, this house, this parliament and this government will not condone, conceal or hide such matters. I say through you, sir, to the Minister of Justice that we want to know about the Sefkind bankruptcy. We do not want that matter put into cold storage, because there is something which the country is concerned about. You do not elevate the minds of Canadians when you see concealment of that kind. What about the Sefkinds? They are abroad, out of the country, having robbed the Canadian people of $2 million, the extent of their bankruptcy. They sold furniture on time.

Mr. Starr: Pay as you like.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then they forgot about asking for payment, and no payment was made until after they went into bankruptcy. These are the kind of things that cause me to believe that more was expected, much more, in the speech from the throne, and that the highest priority should have been given to a declaration on the subject of public men and their integrity. Because unless this is accepted, parliament suffers and the Canadian people suffer. It does not matter what happens to us; but it does matter when all across this nation people are asking themselves what has happened.

Therefore, sir, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr):

That the following be added to the address:

"We respectfully regret that Your Excellency's advisers, because of confusion and indecision in dealing with national problems, and the careless indifference and neglect of the Prime Minister in refusing to take action to eradicate wrongdoing in high and low places under federal responsibility and to restore public confidence in the honesty and integrity of government, no longer enjoy the confidence of this house and of the Canadian people".

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin by agreeing with the right hon. gentleman in one respect, and I think it will be the only respect in which I will be able to agree with him this afternoon and this evening, and that is in the tribute which he paid to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne the hon. members for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) and St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien). Knowing these two members, Mr. Speaker, I expected a high standard of performance from them in the discharge of a responsible duty, and I was not disappointed and I am sure the house was not disappointed. They did great credit to themselves and to their provinces in the statements that they made.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what about this amendment and the two and a half hours speech which introduced it? Or am I exaggerating? As I listened to the right hon. gentleman wander from subject to subject, from place to place and from document to document, I could not help but think of words which I have already quoted in this house on previous occasions:

Cold upon the dead volcano,
Sleeps the gleam of dying day.

The volcano, Mr. Speaker, however, did erupt on occasion with great vigour, and while I do not want to spend too much time on the eruptions, there are a few things that cannot be left to go unchallenged; and believe me, Mr. Speaker, most of them are very easy indeed to refute.

Perhaps I should begin, Mr. Speaker, where the right hon. gentleman ended. He made an attack upon the government, which is reflected in the amendment, for its failure in refusing to take action to eradicate wrongdoing in high and low places under federal responsibility. He saw fit, Mr. Speaker, to make a strong attack on immorality—"unmorality", as he has been calling it outside the house—in government, though not mentioning details, which should be taken up and referred to the appropriate committee and the charges investigated. He took upon himself to do this, Mr. Speaker.

I would remind him that when there was what I considered to be conduct by a member of the government which did not reflect credit on that member, and which required his withdrawal from the cabinet, that action was taken at once. When my parliamentary assistant took action which I considered to be indiscreet, especially because of the position which he held as my assistant, within hours of learning of his action and intervention that parliamentary secretary resigned his position. When charges were made in this house which required an inquiry, that inquiry was initiated at once, Mr. Speaker.

While agreeing entirely with the right hon. gentleman, Mr. Speaker, in the necessity for maintaining the highest standards of morality and good conduct in government and in parliament, I deny with all the vigour I can the charge made by the right hon. gentleman that we are indifferent to this, and that we have not taken action in this matter. And if necessary we will take action in this matter in the future.

The right hon. gentleman took a good deal of pleasure, and his followers took even greater pleasure, at his new role of "Mr.

Clean". His credentials for this role, Mr. Speaker, I suggest are not above reproach.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Who used a document which had the front page, marked "confidential", torn off it? Who was the man who praised his right-hand man in the front benches for introducing into this house and in Hansard a forged document which was designed to get us into trouble with our neighbours?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The Prime Minister has not proved that it was a forged document. What he is doing now is smear by innuendo.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend tells me that it is not a forged document or that he did not know that it was a forged document at the time, I will be glad to apologize to him. He has not taken the opportunity to do so, Mr. Speaker.

The right hon. gentleman shows a moral indignation now which was strangely absent in those years from 1958 to 1962. It was strangely absent when a member of his cabinet got into difficulty and was made a senator.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not mind statements like that, Mr. Speaker, but that statement is untrue. The man to whom the right hon. Prime Minister refers was appointed to the Senate, following which a royal commission said that he had taken improper gains, at which time I brought it to his attention and he resigned. The same advice might be given to the Prime Minister in respect of the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Asselin).

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the then secretary of state was appointed to the Senate and shortly after resigned from the Senate. I might ask the right hon. gentleman, as he has asked more than once this afternoon, what was under the carpet which required his appointment to the Senate?

I mention these things because when the right hon. gentleman takes the line he took this afternoon as the defender of morality in this chamber and attacks us on this side for our indifference to morality he should be very careful about his own record.

He also accused the government this afternoon of contempt of parliament because we were not giving the kind of information to which parliament is entitled. He posed, as an example, the question asked this afternoon about the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and took advantage of the fact that it could not be answered at once this afternoon, to suggest that something wrong was happening to that police force, or that something bad is going on in the Department of Justice. He suggested the police were losing their spurs. Let me remind him that the police lost their horses many years ago, perhaps under the regime of my right hon. friend, although I do not know that, and I do not recall anybody in the House of Commons making an issue of that loss of horses by the R.C.M.P.

An hon. Member: What about the one on the payroll?

Mr. Pearson: An hon. member asks about a horse being on the payroll. Hon. gentlemen opposite are some of those who tried to win an election on that issue and they may try again on a similar issue.

It was more serious when the right hon. gentleman suggested that somehow an auxiliary force to police was being set up without even the knowledge of the House of Commons, and contrary to the law, and that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) refused to give information to the house regarding this matter. That is a serious charge.

If my right hon. friend will look at the statutes as revised in 1959 and the R.C.M.P. Act, chapter 54, he will find that in this statute provision is made for the establishment of an R.C.M.P. reserve by the governor in council. This statute, which gives the governor in council that authority, Mr. Speaker, was passed by the government of my right hon. friend. Action was taken in this regard by regulation, under that statute, by the minister of justice of that day, Mr. Davie Fulton, whom I will be mentioning again a little later. These regulations, which were never discussed in parliament and never brought to the attention of parliament, were made again by the government of my right hon. friend. This was the kind of thing, Mr. Speaker, which is destroying parliament and our constitution. We deplored the fact that the right hon. gentleman should have done that kind of thing without informing the House of Commons, but we forgave him.

Before I move on to more important questions, there were some other matters raised by the right hon. gentleman. He was very worried indeed about a paragraph in the speech from the throne, which pays what I believe is deserved tribute to Her Majesty and indicated our loyalty and affection for Her Majesty. He claimed that we had very dubious title to put that in the speech from the throne because, as he said, the young Liberals of Canada passed a resolution to the effect that Canada should become a republic. He must have been referring to a provincial conference of some university Liberals who, this being a free country and the Liberal party being a free party, passed such a resolution by a vote of I believe 42 to 38.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about the national meeting?

Mr. Pearson: There was no national meeting that passed—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, there was.

Mr. Pearson: My right hon. friend should not take these university resolutions too seriously, because university Conservatives not long ago passed a resolution advocating the abolition, not of the monarchy, but of my right hon. friend. I do not think they are going to find it so easy to abolish him.

Then the right hon. gentleman complained that we had not included in the speech from the throne some taxation proposals. This is a new interpretation of what should be included in a speech from the throne. He also, as an indication of the sins of commission on the part of this government, gave an illustration of how last Friday, from nine o'clock on, the country was saved from the tyranny of this government trying to slip through six $1 items in the estimates at the last minute. My right hon. friend must know that in one year of his regime 31 $1 items appeared in the estimates of his government —31 items.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether any legislative items at all appeared. First of all, I should note that the Prime Minister was not here but was down in the United States telling them what they should do about announcing policy.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, there were some legislative items; but the difference is that when my right hon. friend does this it is all right, but when we do it it is all wrong; and that is what is known as party government.

• (5:00 p.m.)

The right hon. gentleman had a good deal to say also about the constitutional question and the formula now being considered for amending our constitution in Canada rather than in Great Britain. I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to deal with this matter at any length but it certainly will be dealt with during the course of this debate and subsequently. I would remind my right hon. friend of something he has tried awfully hard to forget, that he and his minister of justice, Mr. Davie Fulton, tried for years to get agreement with the provinces on the basis of the formula which is, in all essentials, exactly the formula that is now produced.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That statement is untrue.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Fisher: But that does not make it right.

Mr. Pearson: No, that does not make it right: But that does not make it wrong, either. My authority for making that statement is the former minister of justice himself, Mr. Davie Fulton. The formula is now known as the Fulton-Favreau formula. My hon. friend was not even generous enough to his former minister of justice, who is coming back into federal politics, to link his name with this formula.

My right hon. friend should also make up his mind from what flank he is going to attack this formula. He has shot at us from both flanks this afternoon. At one time it was going to balkanize Canada, and at another time it was so inflexible and rigid there could be no change made. He had better decide upon what flank he is going to attack. Let me remind my right hon. friend, when he is so bitterly critical of this formula—that is his right and no doubt he will be able to thresh it out in this House of Commons—that every province in this country except one, including the province of Ontario, has approved of this formula. It has been submitted, in every case except Newfoundland, to the legislatures. Surely it cannot be all bad when the premier of Ontario and the premier of Manitoba think it is good. However, as I say, we will be able to argue this later, and it is a very important matter which deserves the detailed consideration of this house.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to follow the right hon. gentleman any further into his peregrinations, but I do not believe we should take them too seriously. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman thinks anything is grist to his somewhat dilapidated political mill, of which he is now in control of 52 per cent.

I think, Mr. Speaker, when we are looking at the speech from the throne we should look at it not exactly from the point of view of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition but from the point of view of the leader of the government. There are measures in this throne speech which I believe will contribute to the strength and the unity of this great country. A good many of them were not dealt with by my right hon. friend—and I do not complain about that because I will not be able to deal with all of them myself. There is so much in this throne speech it is going to take seven or eight days for those of us on this side who believe in it to put it to the house and to the people, but we propose to do that.

The measures in the throne speech will be brought forward as quickly as the house is ready to deal with them. For this purpose, planning will be essential, planning for the orderly and efficient conduct of the business of this session. This planning, of course, is the primary obligation of the government. It is an obligation, also, on all parties represented in the house. I think there can be that kind of all party planning of the business through the meetings of the house leaders of the various parties. I think this planning can be effective and it will help in getting the business of the house completed.

Planning, of course, cannot exclude changes which may be required as circumstances change or emergencies develop. I think that is understood on all sides of the house. There must, of course, be priorities in legislation. They should be brought before the house from time to time by our house leader or by myself. But they, too, for obvious reasons will have to be flexible. Then, additional measures may be required later to meet new developments. This, I think, is understood in connection with every throne speech that has been put before the House of Commons. I will be prepared myself, from time to time, to indicate the order in which we expect to do our business, having regard to the circumstances of the day. These qualifications, "circumstances of the day", do not affect the essentials of the program placed before you and the desirability, Mr. Speaker, of all-party co-operation in planning their consideration.

The measures before us now for 1965 are ones that the government believes will serve well the interests of all of Canada. They offer to all of us, as parliamentarians, plenty of constructive work. I believe the program in this speech from the throne is a balanced and workmanlike program. It includes all that we can reasonably expect to do in one session; but I believe it is within the competence of a session of this parliament if it carries out its duty to discharge the people's business with care, with efficiency and with reasonable dispatch.

The Leader of the Opposition, by his amendment and even more by his speech, has asked from this House of Commons a vote of non-confidence in the government. He asks for the defeat of the government and the dissolution of this house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: From what is the right hon. gentleman reading?

Mr. Pearson: I am reading from my notes, just as the right hon. gentleman did for the better part of his speech.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I suppose in anticipation of what was going to be said?

Mr. Pearson: It was quite obvious what the hon. gentleman was going to say. The government did not need any intelligence service to draw that conclusion.

The right hon. gentleman has asked for this vote of non-confidence from a house in which the government is in a minority and in which the government can be defeated at any time by a combination of the votes of the opposition parties. The right hon. gentleman has challenged the right of the government to proceed with the program outlined in the speech from the throne. The government, Mr. Speaker, is quite happy to accept this challenge and submit its fate to the house on this amendment. So, we will see what we will see, Mr. Speaker.

As I indicated a few moments ago, I will not be able to deal with all the proposals in the speech from the throne, at least at this time. The right hon. gentleman had something to say about foreign affairs. Perhaps I should just mention that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) will deal with that in greater length later in the debate.

He was very anxious, and I can understand his curiosity, to get this story of what happened last Friday and Saturday. I would remind him in the first place, Mr. Speaker, that I was invited—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: I was invited by the President of the United States to fly over to see him at Camp David, when he heard that I was to speak in Philadelphia on Friday night, to discuss with him some aspects of our bilateral relations and of world affairs. I was delighted to do that. It was a very interesting and, for me, a very useful couple of hours.

The right hon. gentleman seems a little worried about what went on. I find it very difficult to please him in these and in other matters. Perhaps that is an objective which I would never be able to achieve; but if I do not talk about these things in public, in the House of Commons or outside the house, about these matters of immediate international danger and concern—if the government does not express itself on these matters—we are criticized as being a satellite, a mouthpiece of the United States of America.

But if we do speak out publicly, as we should on occasion, and only when the occasion seems to require it, then, Mr. Speaker, we should do that with responsibility and restraint and we should not, I suggest, be accused of interference in the affairs of another country; because what is going on in Viet Nam at this time is the concern and the affair of every country in the world, and particularly of the neighbours and allies of the United States of America.

So that there may not be any misunderstanding of what I did actually say, I will put on the record just a few paragraphs, and I do not think they need any interpretation. I said on Friday night, and I discussed this matter with the President on Saturday:

> The dilemma—

And this is an acute and agonizing dilemma in Viet Nam.

> —is acute and seems intractable. On the one hand, no nation—and particularly no newly-independent nation—could ever feel secure if capitulation in Viet Nam led to the sanctification of aggression through subversion and spurious "wars of national liberation."
> On the other hand, the progressive application of military sanctions can encourage stubborn resistance, rather than a willingness to negotiate. Continued intensification of hostilities in Viet Nam could lead to uncontrollable escalation.

I discussed the conditions, what I thought to be the conditions for a settlement, a discussion which is going on throughout the world at the present time, and in my speech on Friday night I asked the question:

> What are the conditions for such a settlement. First, a cease fire, then negotiation.
> Aggressive action by North Viet Nam to bring about a communist "liberation," (which means communist rule) of the south, must end.

Only then can there be negotiation. I went on to say this:

> There are many factors which I am not in a position to weigh. But there does appear to be at least a possibility that a suspension of such air strikes against North Viet Nam at the right time—

I put those words in my first statement and they did not represent a change in anything I said on Saturday to anybody, to the President or to the press. I said:

> —a suspension of such air strikes against North Viet Nam at the right time might provide the Hanoi authorities with an opportunity, if they wish to take it, to inject some flexibility into their policy without appearing to do so as the direct result of military pressure.
> If such a suspension took place for a limited time, that the rate of incidents in South Viet Nam would provide a fairly accurate way of measuring its usefulness and the desirability of continuing it. I am not, of course, proposing any compromise on points of principle, or any weakening of resistance to aggression in South Viet Nam. I merely suggest that a measured pause—

A phrase which seems to give the right hon. gentleman a certain amount of amusement.

> —a measured pause in one field of military action at the right time might facilitate the development of diplomatic resources which cannot easily be applied to the problem under existing circumstances.

It would at the least expose the intransigence of the North Viet Nam government.

Then, Mr. Speaker, I spent some time developing what I considered to be a positive approach to this whole problem of southeast Asia—what could be done through the United Nations to raise the standard of living of the people, the poor people in that part of the world, what could be done even while the fighting, while the conflict was going on. I reminded my listeners that for some years now the United Nations has had a project in that part of the world, called the Me Kong basin project, which is being very helpful to the people of that area within the limit of its resources, and which has not been interfered with by any government in that area.

I added that if this program could be dramatically increased at this time—and the 21 countries that are involved in it could do more—and it could be pushed forward by a conference in which all the countries of that area would meet under the auspices of the United Nations, and for which the Secretary General could at once make the preparations—if that could be done it might be the best way to create an atmosphere which would make peace possible in that part of the world. Why, Mr. Speaker, the amount of money being spent within a week on military action in Indochina at the present time would be enough for the project for years.

Now, this is not going to be easy, and it may not be possible in present circumstances, but I thought it was worth mentioning and I hoped the authorities at the United Nations would think it worth considering. Having talked about this, I went on to say:

> With this kind of great international development project, with a cease-fire followed by political negotiations, with the countries in the area given an international guarantee of neutrality and assurance of aid for peaceful development, then the danger, destruction and distress of the present hour might be replaced by peace, hope and progress.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that was an appropriate message to take to the United States at this time, and an appropriate proposal to discuss with the President of that country.

In the speech from the throne, after the reference to external affairs, there is a paragraph to which my right hon. friend referred at some length, dealing with the reform of the procedures of the house. In recent years we have made some progress in that direction. I think we could and should make more. I would like to pay my tribute, if I may, sir, to you as the chairman of the committee on procedure for the work of the members of that committee, and of the chairmen and members of the subcommittees. I think they have done all it was possible to do on the basis on which committees operate, on the basis of unanimity and referring proposals back to the House of Commons. I think it is now the duty of the government to ask parliament to move further ahead in this field and we will soon, as a government, for putting forward proposals to the House of Commons for that purpose.

In my view the reform of the procedures of the house is of very great importance to the functioning of parliamentary institutions in the interests of the people, and I acknowledge, and I agree with what the right hon. gentleman said about the vital importance of parliamentary institutions in our history and in our development.

It is the very essence of democracy that there should be debate, parliamentary debate, parliamentary discussion leading to consensus and leading to decision. The focus of this kind of discussion in a democracy must be in the House of Commons. But the discussion goes on continually in the country, in the home, in the workshop, in the corner store and in the luncheon club. Then it should come to a head here and it should lead to a decision here. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that our procedures are no longer adapted as they should be to the expedition and the effectiveness of this process of discussion and decision. I think there are too many subjects which come before us now—subjects of vital importance and of great complexity and upon which decisions have to be made—to allow the luxury of the kind of unlimited discussion which was possible and desirable 50 years ago.

I do not believe our rules today are designed to take care of the existing situation. Our procedures are, I believe, developed from those followed in Westminster to meet the needs of democracy a century ago when issues were fewer and simpler, when those involved in them were fewer and when the element of time was of less importance. It is interesting to note—and I think I am accurate in saying this—that there have been more changes made in recent years in the procedure and rules of the mother of parliaments than have been possible to this particular daughter of the mother which often quotes the mother of parliaments as the reason we should not make changes here. I think it is wrong to cling to old and outworn methods, and that our real respect for parliament will be shown by our willingness to adapt our rules and procedure to today's requirements.

The necessity of managing our business more efficiently means of necessity, in my view, planning time for specific legislation.

Surely, we can make progress in this field as a parliamentary matter and, in the words of the speech from the throne, do something to combine effective debate and criticism with the effective dispatch of business.

Now I wish to deal with some of the economic matters referred to in the speech from the throne. They were referred to by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker). The paragraph on this subject reads:

> Our country is achieving a high rate of economic growth. Trade is expanding. With growing industrialization, Canadians are enjoying rapidly increasing employment opportunities; incomes and living standards are rising; the number of people out of work has been reduced to lower levels than for many years.

I believe those statements are accurate and they should surely give satisfaction to every single member of this house wherever he may sit. I do not stand here to say this is due to the policy of the government, as the right hon. gentleman said it was due to the policy of the previous government. But I do say that the policies of this government have contributed to this satisfactory situation—satisfactory as far as it goes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The United States has the same trend.

Mr. Pearson: That is right, though I should like to think we are a little ahead of them in this trend toward prosperity and stability. I am merely suggesting this is a desirable state of affairs and that we should do our best to continue it and improve on it. The Economic Council, which is the important agency set up on the initiative of this government, has in its first report concluded that it is realistically possible for the standard of living of the average Canadian to improve by more than 20 per cent in seven years. This can be done but only if we face and overcome certain serious problems and obstacles. So there is no occasion for complacency or smugness and there should be none; I assure you, Mr. Speaker, there is none in the ranks of the government.

Among the problems we have to face is the problem of maintaining and increasing our trade. Even while it is mounting—and it is mounting—our prosperity in the field of international trade often depends on forces outside this country which we can never control though, at times, we may influence them. There is the problem of the balance of payments which remains a worrying one. There is the problem of the best utilization and conservation of our national resources which is becoming increasingly important. There is the development of research and technology—a paragraph on this appears in the speech from the throne. There are measures to increase the competitiveness and efficiency of industry in this country; I am glad the right hon. gentleman had something to say about this, because it is from the continued increase in our industrial exports that we have to find the jobs required in the years ahead. The magnitude of this problem is shown by the fact that in 1964 the average employment in this country was 6.6 millions. In 1970 the report of the Economic Council says, with the growth of the labour force—and the growth of the labour force in this country is greater than it is across the line in the United States—and providing for a level of unemployment down to 3 per cent, employment will amount to 7.9 millions. This means that in six years we have to find jobs for one and one-third million Canadians. This is a vitally important factor as we face the economic problems ahead.

The most important factor in our economy, in our economic progress is full employment, and not only full employment, vital though that is, but the full employment of our human resources, which is something additional and which is referred to at some length in the speech from the throne. We must have the scope and the opportunities which are required in this age of technological change—and we in this country are very backward in this field compared with the United States. One quarter of the Canadian labour force is now engaged in work of a skilled nature. This may seem a satisfactory percentage but it is only half as many as are employed in the United States in skilled occupations, and this means we are not making the most of our most important resource, which is people. This is shown not only by the figures I have given but by pockets of poverty and idleness amidst general affluence and activity. There is a persistent minority now lacking the mobility or suitable training to enable them to share in the expanding opportunities of our age. The growth of our gross national product does not automatically cure this situation. Indeed, its growth can underline and expose this particular problem because economic growth as well as economic stagnation has its casualties, and the casualties in our country can be whole regions as was pointed out eloquently yesterday by the seconder of the address (Mr. Chrétien).

The economic foundations of whole communities can be knocked away almost overnight by new industrial processes, by automation, by what we call progress. Wide areas of farmland can become derelict and decaying; urban slum islands can develop in the richest of cities. The affluent society has given a new meaning and a new dimension to poverty; because as technology advances and business and the economy become more complex, the individual finds it harder to get a second chance. It used to be much easier 50, 75, 100 years ago when society was less complex and more mobile, but now he finds it hard to get a second chance when things go wrong or have never gone right for him, for reasons over which he may have no control and of which he might not even have any understanding. Once trapped outside the affluent society, it is hard to get back in without the new skills required, and the worker often has no chance to get these.

It is here that the state must move in more vigorously than we have done in the past few years, in the name of both social justice and economic progress; because economic progress must include the fullest possible utilization of human resources. Poverty now prevents this, and the proof that there is poverty in this affluent country is shown by the statistics of family income. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker,

I may quote from a statement made a few months ago by the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen) in a speech in Hamilton, in which he said:

> According to the latest available official figures the average income of the Canadian non-farm family is $5,000 a year. Taken as an average this is pretty good. But averages are often misleading. Once you start to analyse the figures behind this average you find that out of some 3,600,000 non-farm families in Canada almost 850,000 have cash incomes of less than $3,000 a year. More than 160,000 families have incomes of less than $1,000. That, you will agree, is real poverty.

In a paper presented to the British Columbia Conference on Social Welfare last year by Professor Dixon of the School of Social Work, the University of British Columbia, this paragraph was included:

> When income is related to size of family the following approximate estimates are obtained. In 23 per cent of Canadian families with two or more children the head of the family earns less than $3,000. In 45 per cent of the families he earns less than $4,000.

There is no more direct and important move toward economic expansion than transforming an unemployed slum dweller or a sub-marginal farmer into a skilled worker, a full time producer, a normal spender who thereby creates more work for other people. Economic policies, then, and social policies should move forward together, and they are too often treated as separate and even conflicting. To enlarge opportunities, to improve the ability of people to take advantage of these opportunities is not only to attack poverty; it is to strengthen our whole economy, to increase the prosperity and raise the standards of the whole community.

For a country such as Canada, it also strengthens our unity. The problem of geography has always meant that there have been in Canada great regional differences in economic opportunity and economic interest. This is the main economic factor behind our problems of unity, and sound national policies have always been aimed at lessening them in one way or another. So, Mr. Speaker, to attack today's pockets of poverty is to make a major contribution, in the economic and social field, to national unity. These are the motives for the plan which this government has been developing, with the aim of eliminating poverty and fully utilizing our human resources. It is a plan for greater opportunities. It is not hard to talk about it, Mr. Speaker; the idea behind it is clear enough. But the application is going to be complex and very difficult indeed. Many existing programs will have to be broadened and intensified. New programs will have to be developed. They involve many departments of government and therefore pose problems of federal co-ordination. So there must be, and there will be, set up machinery for this co-ordinating purpose. The responsibility is also federal and provincial, so there is an equal requirement, perhaps an even greater requirement, for co-operation and co-ordination between the two levels of government.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I propose a special federal-provincial conference to examine these problems which I have been outlining, which will, I hope, agree on the lines on which action can be concerted in a common cause. We realize our obligation as a government to make specific proposals to that conference. A program of this kind must be developed in stages. I would like to refer briefly to the early stages for which plans have already been prepared, because the right hon. gentleman—and I do not quarrel with him for this—says we are just talking in vague generalities and asks what are we going to do concretely. It is difficult to put these proposals forward in detail at this particular moment, but I would like to say something about the concrete proposals.

First, there is the area development program. It will be extended to other areas which, although not having heavy unemployment as defined for the existing designated areas, do have generally low levels of income. We will be proposing new methods of assisting industrial development in these areas.

Second, we are developing a series of improved measures to help people to qualify for and secure new jobs, to move when they need to, and to get the training they need.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister allow a question?

Mr. Pearson: A good deal has been done already in this field.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is the Prime Minister in a position to say, in reference to point No. 1, how many cities or urban communities will be included in this plan; because he says the plan is under way?

Mr. Pearson: All I can say is that the existing designated areas, as my right hon. friend knows, include a good many urban communities. The existing number will be extended to include other areas which do not fall under that particular definition but where over the years in large regions there has been persistent underemployment and economic stagnation.

Third, because much of our worst poverty and waste of human resources is rural, the government proposes to extend the work of ARDA by creating a special fund to be available for development projects. Of course, Mr. Speaker, this has been referred to: We propose an organization through which young Canadians will have the opportunity to put their idealism and their talents to work for projects of economic and social development both in Canada and abroad. This Company of Young Canadians—which I suspect, sir, will soon be designated as the eager beavers—will be organized to work closely with, but not to replace, the many excellent voluntary undertakings which are now going forward and which can back up and support it if they wish to continue as voluntary agencies. Therefore I propose to appoint, without delay, an organizing committee to report what most needs to be done so that we can submit proposals to parliament at an early date.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the Prime Minister say how many are envisaged as the initial number?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not know why all the hooting. The plan has been made and I am asking for information. I thought hon. members would be interested.

Mr. Pearson: When we have canvassed the work being done—and there is some very good work being done in this field—and the resources which these voluntary organizations have and what they need to supplement their work, and when they are in a position to decide what can usefully be done by a significant number of Canadians who are not in any voluntary organizations but who might wish to join the company of Canadian youth, then we will be in a position to decide how far we can go. But I do give the right hon. gentleman that assurance, and I hope that these resources will be available to include in this kind of undertaking all the young people who desire to take part in it.

The fifth item in the immediate program is the Canadian assistance plan, which the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) will be presenting this Thursday at a conference with the provincial ministers of welfare. Because that meeting is taking place this week I propose now to give the house a comparatively detailed outline of what we have in mind for submission to the provinces.

The Canada assistance plan is, I believe, an important further step in the development of Canada's social security system. It is a companion measure to the Canada pension plan. The origin of this new plan goes back to the discussions with the provincial governments concerning the Canada pension plan which were held in September of 1963. The need was recognized at that time for an improved public assistance program, and since that time a number of discussions have been carried forward with the provinces.

In developing the new plan the government has taken into consideration the views of the public accounts committee, which in its fourth report to the present parliament recommended the amendment or replacement of the Unemployment Assistance Act and the closer co-ordination of all measures in the field of public assistance. The government has taken note also of the wide support for a comprehensive program of public assistance that has been expressed by welfare organizations and authorities, including the Canadian Welfare Council.

The plan now being proposed will provide a framework for federal-provincial co-operation in helping those who need help the most. The plan will encourage a co-ordinated approach to public assistance, in place of the present patchwork of support under four federal statutes—the Old Age Assistance Act of 1951, the Blind Persons Act of 1951, the Disabled Persons Act of 1954 and the Unemployment Assistance Act of 1956.

A number of provinces, Mr. Speaker, have already expressed their wish to develop a comprehensive general assistance measure which, while recognizing the varying requirements of different groups, would meet these requirements within one program and within one administrative framework. It may be possible that some provinces will want to continue to assist the aged, the blind and the disabled under the existing programs. This is a matter for decision by the provinces, and federal support for those programs will continue at the option of the province. If, however, provinces accept the new plan—and their interest leads us to think that many of them will—then there will be no longer an income limitation on the assistance available to people now covered by old age assistance. As hon. members know, federal sharing under the present program is now limited to half of the $75 a month. Under the proposed Canada assistance plan payments can be based on an assessment of the recipient's needs.

This important change, Mr. Speaker, will be of special benefit to those older people who have had no opportunity to benefit from the Canada pension plan. In cases of need, additional assistance will be available. This applies not only to those aged 65 to 69 but also to the people over 70, who in many provinces have not had access to assistance up to now.

In addition to this major change in the scope of assistance for elderly people, the proposals provide for three major extensions of the federal sharing of assistance costs. These are: assistance to needy mothers; health care services for assistance recipients; and the costs of sharing in the strengthening and expansion of welfare services for assistance recipients.

First of all, a needy mother: It is estimated that the proposed plan will cover close to 200,000 needy mothers and their dependant children who are excluded from the sharing provisions of the Unemployment Assistance Act. The cost of this to the federal government will be more than $25 million a year.

Second, in accordance with the principle that assistance should be adapted to the needs of the individual, the Canada assistance plan will provide that the federal government will pay half the cost of health care needed by people receiving assistance. This, Mr. Speaker, is obviously essential to a truly comprehensive assistance program. It would be illogical to help to meet people's needs for food, clothing and shelter but to exclude health care for people for whom it is equally essential and who cannot afford it on an assistance budget. To what extent, and how, health costs are covered will depend, of course, on provincial programs, but it is estimated that federal sharing will cost us something between $15 million and $20 million a year.

I should make it clear that the assistance proposals do not include federal sharing in the costs of hospital care, because this is already shared under the hospital insurance program. Similarly—and I think that on this point it is important to avoid misunderstanding—the plan will provide for discontinuing the federal share in other health costs, as such costs come to be covered by future federal-provincial medicare programs. I emphasize this point in order to make it clear that this government does not regard assistance with the medical costs of the needy as in any way a substitute for the development of comprehensive medicare programs.

[Mr. Pearson.]

This, Mr. Speaker, is an interim measure, a step which is needed, as part of our assistance policy, where and as long as medicare is not available, but which will fortunately become unnecessary as we develop comprehensive health services.

The third new element in the assistance plan is the support it will provide to the provinces for strengthening public assistance administration and for improving and extending social welfare services for public assistance recipients. This will help provincial and municipal welfare departments to recruit additional trained staff and to provide for more effective service to assistance recipients. In this way, we intend that assistance should be much more effectively linked to other programs, including vocational training, rehabilitation and job placement. The aim is to enable assistance recipients to move on to achieve the greatest possible measure of self-support. This is one of the sound and constructive weapons to be used in combating both rural and urban poverty.

The effect of these proposals, to summarize them, is that the provinces will be receiving new federal contributions to mothers allowances and health care services. Over the next few years they will also realize large savings in assistance costs as old age security becomes available from age 65. These changes will be of substantial help in making it possible for provinces to provide more adequate levels of assistance to persons in need and also to strengthen social welfare services with the advantage of federal sharing of the costs. We hope, Mr. Speaker, that during the discussions of these proposals we will be having with the provinces this week it will be possible to arrive at mutually acceptable standards to be applied in developing adequate levels of assistance.

The Canada pension plan provides retirement pensions, disability pensions and benefits for widows and orphans. The effect of the Canada assistance plan is that assistance will be available in all of these same cases—as a supplement where it is needed, or as an alternative for people who have not been covered by the pension plan. In this way, Mr. Speaker, social insurance and social assistance measures are being co-ordinated. This aspect of the plan will be particularly important in the next few years. When the Canada pension plan has passed its transition period, its contributory benefits will become the main source of protection, and the role of assistance will steadily decline in importance. That, of course, is the proper aim for a well integrated social security system, as we hope and believe the Canadian system will be.

We hope, as I have already said, that at these forthcoming meetings we will be able to achieve a broad measure of agreement between the federal and provincial authorities on this Canada assistance plan. In that case, legislation will be introduced at this session of parliament, so that the plan can have effect at the start of the new fiscal year, 12 months from now.

I have outlined in some detail this Canada assistance plan not only because of the meetings which will take place this week, but because of the great interest hon. members have already shown in this matter. It is of great importance in the social welfare programs, and I would remind you that it is one of five measures which are being developed as the first phase of the general program for combatting poverty and improving opportunities. This first phase is, of course, no more than a first phase. A great many other measures will require to be taken under this comprehensive program. They will be taken step by step after co-ordinated preparation and after appropriate consultation with the provinces.

Perhaps I might return for a moment, Mr. Speaker, to medicare. The speech from the throne, and this paragraph has disappointed one or two of my hon. friends, makes clear this government's commitment to the principle that health services should be available comprehensively, irrespective of the financial position of the person needing care. This is a principle of public policy. Its implementation in our confederation involves both federal and provincial governments. There are, therefore, three main questions which arise and which have to be solved. One is the scale and quality of the services to be provided. The second is the timetable on which they can be made available. The third concerns the respective roles of federal and provincial governments and, intimately related to that, the form in which the services are to be organized and paid for.

We recognize that, under our constitution, the main responsibility for the organization of health services lies with the provinces. The federal government, therefore, is informing itself as fully as possible of all the views and approaches to this matter that have been developed in the various provinces. On that basis we will be ready for full discussion at the federal-provincial conference which we had hoped to have before the end of April but which will not now be possible until toward the end of May.

There are, however, certain aspects of the general problems of health care for which the federal government has direct responsibility, and one of the most important of these concerns the quality and availability of drugs and the prices that have to be paid for them. The speech from the throne indicates that the government will set up a special committee to go into this matter, the work of which committee will be facilitated by the government, with a view to arriving at proposals as to how the prices paid by the public can be reduced.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED UNDER ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock this evening are the following: the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan), Canadian National Railways—Toronto—lease of unused spur line for parking purposes; the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), Administration of Justice—ministers subpoenaed to appear in Quebec Superior Court action.

It being six o'clock I do now leave the Chair.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cashin for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, this afternoon in dealing with the speech from the throne, that fruitcake as the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition was good enough to call it, I was particularly concerned with explaining the economic and social welfare proposals of the government, and what they would do, I hope, for national welfare, as well as what they would do to strengthen national unity. But I am very much aware, as I am sure hon. members are, that the solution of all these problems of welfare, of unity, central to the solution of these problems and indeed of national survival, is the relationship between the federal and provincial governments. This is one aspect, though a very important aspect, of the unity and the strength of the confederation of our country.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that we must strengthen and improve the federal-provincial relationship in our country so that all Canadians may feel that they are equally served and equally benefited by confederation. I believe that the policies and practices to this end must be based on the principle of what we call co-operative federalism, which is the only kind of federalism which will insure progress and maintain unity. In our confederation, by the very nature of federalism itself, the powers and responsibilities of the state are divided between two sets, two levels of authority. In the earlier days of small and relatively uncomplicated government, this division of jurisdiction was reasonably simple and clear-cut. The total role of government in those days was relatively unimportant, unimportant enough at least for its two major parts to be separated and to operate without treading too much on each other's toes or getting into each other's way or even into each other's hair too much. Therefore, this kind of nineteenth century live and let live federalism with which we in Canada began our great national venture, as difficult a one as ever faced a free people. I believe that our federalism was wisely designed for the time and that it has served Canada well. But it has been apparent surely for many years that the growing scope and scale of government was making the old federalism more and more difficult to operate at both levels of government, provincial and federal. As the demands of the electorate, became more and more concerned with and responsible for measures designed to insure the welfare of the individual, toe-treading became inevitably more common, at times accompanied by a little head shaking and even arm twisting.

Depression and war, of course, have obscured the picture for so many years and made it appear—depression and war made it appear—that the natural and perhaps widest adaptation to big government was greater and greater at the centre, where vastly greater revenues had to be raised and much more important decisions had to be taken which involved the very existence of the nation. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, during and after the war, the federal government was, again with some misgivings in certain quarters, given more financial and political responsibility for the new services that the public wanted in areas of overlapping jurisdiction and of mutual concern.

This trend was not one that could or should continue indefinitely. It could not go very far in normal times, under normal conditions, without producing a strong reaction for the very good reason that excessive centralization would cut across the basis of the political consent on which our confederation rests. It is true that economies of large scale operation and mass communication today exercise strong pressures toward unity. But it is equally true that in a country so large as ours, dual in its origin and in its partnership, multiple and diverse in its composition and its development, its interests and in its traditions, governmental authority and responsibility should in large measure be dispersed. A system which would ignore or reject this need for dispersion would destroy and not strengthen confederation. Those, in my view, who preach the overcentralizing doctrine in the interests of unity or in some other interests weaken unity and might even destroy it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You did not hold that view in 1950.

Mr. Pearson: I find it difficult, Mr. Speaker, to recall everything I said in 1950. I have held this view all my life, that in the interests of unity there must be the recognition of the need for avoiding overcentralization. But the resistance to undesirable centralization cannot, in my view, mean a return to the "live and let live" federalism to which I have referred earlier. Federal-provincial responsibilities cannot any longer be divided into two neat and separated compartments so that the people responsible for one can go about their business with little thought for what is being done by people on the other side of the wall. Contemporary government at all levels is now far more concerned with positive measures than before, and in these positive measures, problems are shared and responsibilities for them become mingled and, indeed, overlap. What one level of government does, even if strictly within its own jurisdiction, often has an intimate bearing on the problems with which the other has to deal in its jurisdiction, and which are often parallel to the federal.

A healthy federalism, a co-operative federalism is one in which the two levels of government both fulfil their own responsibilities; and respect each other's, but they do so taking into account their mutual concerns. Where they are responsible for parallel action it should be concerted action and therefore must be built on consultation and co-operation, I believe, Mr. Speaker, to a greater extent than previously, and that is the policy of this government. That is what we mean by co-operative federalism.

It is the policy expressed in, among other things, the formula for making our constitution wholly Canadian by removing the necessity to go to the United Kingdom for amendments. The formula we are proposing—I referred to it this afternoon and am just going to mention it tonight—brings to a culmination many years of patient negotiation on the basis, which all practical Canadians have recognized, that we in Ottawa must have the agreement of all ten provinces on any amending formula. If we cannot get that agreement, and I believe we can—I believe we are getting it now—the alternative is to go back to Westminster and ask the British parliament to take on the responsibility of amending our constitution.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You are still going to have a British statute for a constitution.

Mr. Pearson: This policy involves no abandonment nor weakening of the powers given the federal parliament and the government by the constitution, to act on behalf of all the Canadian people who are represented in this parliament. There are certain powers in the constitution that are reserved to the federal parliament and government, and no government that believes in Canadian strength, progress and unity, and in its duty to all the people of Canada, can give these up.

The point, Mr. Speaker, is that we must exercise these powers effectively, and to do this we must recognize the realities of our history, our geography and our confederation, and the conditions on which our country's unity and progress depend. We must bring the federal-provincial relationship into line with these conditions. That is the basis of co-operation with the provinces which enables us to exercise effectively those powers of national leadership which we must have at the centre, and which it is this government's intention to use, firmly and as wisely as we can, for the benefit of all of Canada, and only in this parliament is all of Canada represented.

Good federal relations are an important part, an essential part of national unity. Equally important, and in a sense connected with them, is a clear understanding of the nature of our confederation, of our country, dual in its origin, with a basic English speaking-French speaking partnership, multicultural and multiracial in its development. We are the stronger and the richer because of the nature of our origin and of our development, although the extremists and the indifferent do not seem to realize it.

It is my view, contrary to what the right hon. gentleman said this afternoon in a very pessimistic statement, that extremism and disunity are weakening, that moderation and good sense, the moderation and good sense of all the Canadian people, are growing, and that difficulties and problems are being faced and that they will be overcome.

Much of our difficulty in strengthening national unity, as I understand it, is due to the ignorance of the character of our confederation, and indeed due in some part at least to confusion and misunderstanding over words. There is no doubt we are one confederation. We are one state, one country before the world. Are we one nation or two? Are we one race, or two, or many? Are we one culture, or two, or many?

There is a special difficulty—and I think we must face up to it and, if we do and solve it, it will remove some of our problems of semantics—over the word "nation"; and this difficulty, which leads to confusion, comes from the identification of nation and state.

France, for instance, is one nation and one state; but not Switzerland, or Belgium, or India, or Malaysia, and a number of other states in the modern world. In this sense many nations do not have, nor do they desire, political sovereignty. The term "nation" as I understand it, belongs to sociology, to history and tradition. It indicates the way of life of a group of human beings, a group with common language, traditions, culture, customs, feelings and, above all, the will to live together as a group. Surely, Mr. Speaker, this justifies and explains the validity of the concept of a French-Canadian nationality.

> When confederation took place, a new nation was created in the partnership of two basic nationalities.

And as Dr. Eugene Forsey put it, I think very well, in the Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science, some time ago:

> Canada is both two nations and one; two nations in the ethnic cultural sociological sense; one nation in the political legal constitutional sense.

I believe we should recognize that in the historical and linguistic and cultural sense our country is basically composed of two nations which must have equal rights and equal opportunity in our land. But that is not enough, Mr. Speaker. May I quote from the brief of McGill University to the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, some words which I think are very pertinent on this point, and very wise:

> The future of Canadian federalism depends upon a series of new relationships in which minority and majority perspectives from the older period become refashioned. This means particularly not only that French speaking Canadians shall feel at home in Quebec, but also that they shall have opportunities for fulfilment without minority feelings in Canada as a whole.

The same applies to the English speaking majority, and this is the basis of partnership. But partnership itself is not enough in this country. The brief goes on to say this:

> Whatever the character of the Canadian future, any suggestion that a two-culture society means a two-race outlook would be totally incompatible with the multi-ethnic character of the present Canadian population. While a partnership between the two founding peoples and cultures may have some historical validity—

I believe it has.

> —such a partnership concept has no meaning today except for the partnership between cultures. There are no second-class Canadians, and the future of a socially healthy Canada depends not merely upon a recognition of the vitality and relevance of both cultures but equally on the vitality and relevance of all the non-French, non-Anglo-Celtic minority groups that comprise the Canadian montage of today.

I believe these words to be profoundly true and the concept embodied in them is the only concept on which we can grow as a united, progressive Canada. But above all—and I should like to end with these words—we must also recognize that a single Canadian state, a federation, also exists which unites as Canadians the two founding groups and those of other races who have joined us. So there is a Canada above its parts to which we owe loyalty and service. This need not conflict with any other loyalty to province or race.

When we no longer talk about Canada and Canadian unity in this country, Canada is on the way to disappearing, and who will gain by that among all the people who have settled and developed this great country? None of us wants this to happen, and it will not happen.

I know, and I have emphasized, that regional, provincial or racial feeling is legitimate and important in itself. As Lord Acton put it in a famous essay, the combination of different nations in one state may be as necessary a condition of civilized life as the combination of men in society. That is true. But Canadian unity cannot be maintained nor the federation whose centennial we shall soon be celebrating survive, if provincial or racial feeling is carried to the point of reducing to a weak abstraction loyalty and love for Canada as a country. There is no more important task before us in this parliament as representatives of all the Canadian people from every province and from every part of Canada than to see that this does not happen. And I believe that in this session of parliament we can make a useful contribution to seeing that it does not happen.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the house has listened attentively to the far-ranging and interesting speech which the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has just delivered. Many of the things he said this afternoon and this evening will, I am sure, be concurred in by members of this party. I could not help but feel, however, when I was listening to the right hon. gentleman, that in his recent trip to Camp David to visit with President Johnson he must have made a deal by which in return for supporting United States policy in Viet Nam, President Johnson allowed him to use some of the left-over slogans from the recent election campaign down there.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Cheap.

Mr. Douglas: I am sure I will be pardoned if I have become somewhat sceptical about the sudden enthusiasm for social and economic reform which the Liberal party always displays when it is in trouble. When the Prime Minister was outlining some of the facts regarding poverty and suffering in this country—facts which some of us have been drawing to the attention of successive governments for more than a quarter of a century—I could not help but recall that we have had a Liberal government in Ottawa for 33 years out of the last 45.

We now find that after 33 years of Liberal administration we have to mobilize a war on poverty. I may be pardoned for being sceptical when I recall that in 1945 the Liberal government brought down the so-called green book proposals which went much further than anything the Prime Minister has suggested today and much further than anything outlined in the speech from the throne. I attended that conference. Probably it was my naïveté, but I went home convinced that we were entering a new era in federal-provincial relations and building a new Canada. Well, every member of this house knows that those green book proposals are still gathering dust. Virtually nothing was done to implement them.

Since my time is limited I intend to devote most of it to a discussion of what is contained in the speech from the throne, and what is not contained, in the speech from the throne. I may say at once that the weakness of the speech does not lie so much in what it says as in what it fails to say; not so much in what it contains as in what it omits. We in this party do not quarrel with the bits and pieces of legislation proposed but rather with the failure to provide a comprehensive program designed to meet the challenging times in which we are living. We don't want slogans: We want programs. We want more than words: We want action.

The major failure of the speech from the throne is its failure to recognize that we have entered a new era in world history—the scientific revolution. Over a century and a half ago the steam engine launched mankind into the industrial revolution. That era brought with it great blessings with the result that the human race has made more technological progress in the last 150 years than it had made in all the thousands of years during which man inhabited this planet. But it should not be forgotten that the industrial revolution also brought with it economic dislocation and human suffering. As Santayana once said, "those who will not learn from history are condemned to repeat its mistakes." We have the responsibility, as members of this house, to remember that the scientific revolution upon which we are now embarked will have an even more dislocating effect upon our economy.

The industrial revolution replaced man's muscle with a machine: the scientific revolution is replacing man as a minder of the machine. Automatic factories operated by electronic computers are already here. The industrial revolution affected unskilled labour: The scientific revolution is going to displace skilled workers. The industrial revolution affected manual workers: The scientific revolution is going to have an adverse effect upon whitecollar workers, bookkeepers, estimators, statisticians, clerks, stenographers. The anomaly of our time is that in a period when our society is capable of producing more of the good things of life than ever before in human history, people have a greater sense of insecurity. There is hardly any form of economic activity that will not be affected by automation and cybernation.

The scientific revolution can be either a curse or a blessing. I want to advance the thesis that it can be a blessing; that it can do three things for our society. First, that it can raise living standards far beyond our fondest dreams. A United States study has just shown that since 1960 productivity per man-hour has risen on an average of 3.5 per cent per year, a rate which is well above the immediate post-war period from 1945 to 1960. It is now estimated that with this increased productivity the United States can increase its gross national product by anywhere from $60 billion to $75 billion a year. The era of scarcity has ended. We in the western industrialized civilization have an almost unlimited capacity to produce all the things we need for our creature comforts. It is now possible to have the two great freedoms that Roosevelt talked about, freedom from fear and freedom from want.

Second, the scientific revolution can improve the quality of life for millions of people in our society. Cybernation will release man from drudgery and set him free to develop the things of the mind and the spirit without which man is little better than the beast of the field. The scientific revolution will allow man to concentrate on providing equality of educational opportunity, of promoting good health, creative leisure, and on a new flowering of the human spirit.

The third thing which the scientific revolution can do is enable Canadians to play their part in waging relentless war against poverty, ignorance and disease in the underdeveloped countries of the world. As Adlai Stevenson pointed out, there is another revolution going on in the world: It is the revolution of rising expectations. Two thirds of the world are not going to live in poverty and misery while we enjoy all the benefits of affluence. World peace depends upon our ability to help the newly emerging nations to enjoy some of the benefits of modern technology, not only in terms of goods but in terms of making personnel available, such as teachers, doctors, nurses, scientists, agronomists, and technicians.

I was glad to hear the Prime Minister speak this afternoon of the Company of Young Canadians that is to be formed. I have great faith in the young people of this country. I believe they will respond to the challenge, and I believe they will make a great contribution toward raising the standard of living and the quality of life in some of the underdeveloped countries of the world.

Mr. Speaker, the scientific revolution can be a blessing, but I point out that it will not come about automatically. Left to itself, cybernation will cause widespread unemployment and economic dislocation. It is no longer sufficient for society to change with the times. The future belongs to the society which anticipates change and plans to meet the adjustments that the scientific revolution demands. A new force is in our hands; we have to channel it and direct it for constructive purposes.

We in the New Democratic party believe that Canada must set goals for the abundant society. It is strange that, despite the fact that we have a higher standard of living than our forefathers, there is a growing feeling of uneasiness in this country. People speak of crisis without defining it. I think they sense that the real crisis in Canada is the lack of leadership; that the government has so far lacked any clear sense of direction, any sense of national purpose; the government has failed to set goals that will challenge the Canadian people to put forth every effort for their attainment. The tragedy of the speech from the throne is that it is aimed at the ideal of the stable government rather than the dynamic government.

In this debate, sir, the members of the New Democratic party will deal with several aspects of the most important goal that we think Canada should be moving toward. That goal was set forth by the Economic Council of Canada. In their first report they suggested that Canada must create one and a half million jobs in the next five years; that our gross national product must grow at the rate of 5½ per cent per year in constant dollars; and that we must reduce unemployment by 1970 to at least 3 per cent; that we must in this five-year period, if we are to get even close to full employment, increase our gross national product by $20 billion. We do not suggest that this is the only goal for Canada —there are many goals—but this is the goal upon which the success of all the other goals will depend. If we fail to attain this goal, then it will be extremely difficult to achieve any of the other goals.

In the course of this debate, sir, we propose to suggest seven programs for the attainment of this objective of creating one and one half million jobs, increasing our G.N.P. by 5½ per cent, in constant dollars, and increasing our total productivity by $20 billion.

First, we propose a program of economic planning, and I intend to deal with that in the course of my remarks this evening.

Second, we shall propose a manpower policy, because we believe that economic growth is meaningless for those who are out of work due to automation or lack of training. These are the men and women who have been thrown on the slag heap of our society. We need a manpower policy which will give them a meaningful role in our society.

Third, we shall make proposals for maintaining the stability of price levels. The Economic Council of Canada says that we must keep price increases down to at least 2 per cent per year or inflation will rob us of all our gains. This is important. There is little value in giving a few more dollars a month in pensions if the increase in the cost of living takes it all back again. We suggest that the government must have something more positive to grapple with this problem than they had when the steel companies increased the price of steel, when the best the government could do was to suggest that the Economic Council of Canada look into the matter. The consumer is defenceless. The government has a responsibility to do something about increased prices and to see whether or not they are justified and warranted. The government cannot afford to hide behind the constitution. The government has the responsibility to work out with the provinces where the responsibility lies, and we shall discuss this in the course of this debate.

Fourth, we will discuss the monetary and fiscal policies which will promote economic growth and direct investment into channels which will develop Canadian resources under Canadian ownership. We support the proposal of the Economic Council of Canada that we must use Canadian savings to give Canadians a greater voice in making the economic decisions that will determine our future economic destiny.

Fifth, one of our members will discuss the social goals which we must establish in this next five-year period by the setting up of social security measures and comprehensive medicare because increased productivity now makes it possible to provide these services in a modern and abundant society.

Sixth, we shall deal with a federal aid to education program which will set out the kind of assistance the federal government can give to the provinces so that they can develop citizens capable of meeting the demands of a modern, technological society.

Seventh, a member of this party in the course of this debate will discuss the constitutional framework within which a dynamic program can live and move and have its being without being restricted by the dead hand of the past.

I was interested, Mr. Speaker, in the Prime Minister's comments this afternoon and this evening to the effect that the matter of the constitution and its amending formula must be decided by parliament. Well, Mr. Speaker, we have never yet been able to get a satisfactory answer as to whether or not this amendment procedure is going to be sent to a committee of parliament, where we may call in constitutional experts and where members from all parties will have an opportunity to familiarize themselves fully with the effect of this amending formula. We are in great danger of having constitutional amendments by federal-provincial conferences. Now, federal-provincial conferences have a place, but it is rather strange that, at a time when the B and B commission are telling us that this country faces a crisis, the one group which is not going to have any real opportunity to discuss and analyse the constitutional amendment are the members of parliament. We are going to be presented with a fait accompli which has been worked out at a federal-provincial conference and approved by ten provincial legislatures. We want to discuss this matter, Mr. Speaker. We are in favour of the repatriation of the constitution. We are not in favour of putting the Canadian constitution in a strait-jacket.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we believe that this country can and should plan for abundance. We start with the positive conviction that change must be managed; it cannot be left to happen automatically. For this economic planning the initiative and responsibility lie primarily with the federal government. Private planning by individuals and corporations for their own welfare does not automatically contribute to the improvement of the general welfare. We cannot leave the adjustments which cybernation demands to the private sector of the economy. Man's destiny cannot be settled in the marketplace. This has been illustrated by the fact that in the United States over one half of the new jobs which were created in that country between 1957 and 1962 were in the public sector, predominantly in the teaching profession. Of the 4,300,000 jobs created during that period, only about 200,000 were provided by private industry through its own efforts; the balance was in the services or in the public sector. This demonstrates that only government planning and government direction can create jobs, promote economic growth, retrain displaced workers and regain control of the Canadian economy.

We must plan for abundance. We must set goals and mobilize our resources to reach those goals. In this day and generation laissez-faire is dead. We cannot sit back and expect that somehow or other economic forces left to themselves will work out the solutions. Change must be managed. New Democrats believe that our economic, social and political institutions exist for the benefit of man, and that man does not exist for the maintenance of a particular economic system. Our belief is based on the conviction that governments are instituted among men for the purpose of making possible life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, and that democratic government is a positive and a creative instrument for attaining those ends. As we see it, democracy means a community of men and women who are able to understand, express and determine their own lives as dignified human beings. Democracy can only have meaning in a political and economic system in which wealth is distributed by and for the people and is used for the benefit of society as a whole.

It is true that economic planning is not as simple in a federal system as it is in a unitary form of government. However, the fact that we are a federation is a gain rather than a hindrance. It means that planning must be decentralized and tackled at all three levels of government, which is all to the good if we are to get more people involved in the planning process. But the responsibility for establishing goals and setting forth the priorities for their attainment lies with the federal government, and so far it has lamentably failed to do so.

The government of Canada is only playing at economic planning. Two years ago it set up the Economic Council of Canada. They have competent staff. But to date they have been used for two purposes—to gather data which will assess potential growth and describe desirable objectives. This is not indicative planning. This is the basis upon which indicative planning may be built, but there are two other steps which need to be taken but which have not been taken. The first is to set out priorities for reaching these desirable objectives, and the second is the establishment of a program of action so that the goals will become realized.

The government in its speech from the throne seems to have completely forgotten about the Economic Council of Canada and the role which it can and should play under indicative planning for this country. I should like to say a few words about the federal government's role in planning for abundance. The Economic Council has pointed out the need for effective demand. Cybernation has solved the problem of production and the government must now pay attention to the problem of consumption in a society where fewer people are required to produce the goods and services which we need. The real question is, how are people going to buy the abundance of things which modern technology has made possible.

It is quite conceivable that at some time in the future every citizen will have to be guaranteed an income in order to enable him to buy the products of our farms and factories. To my mind that day is some time off because there is a tremendous backlog of social capital needs such as housing, schools, hospitals, urban renewal, parks and recreational facilities. These can occupy our surplus resources for a good many years to come. After all, there is little value in living in a scientific era if we have not got water that is fit to drink, air that is fit to breathe, streets in which there is room to drive your car, hospitals into which you can get a member of your family when he is sick, and schools into which you can get your children who want an education.

The federal government has the fiscal and monetary powers to create jobs and stimulate economic growth. Its first task is to increase the purchasing power of those whose present incomes do not permit them to buy the things which we can now produce in such abundance. Over the past five years the Economic Council of Canada has estimated that we have lost $2.8 billion each year in potential production. That is roughly $140 annually for every man, woman and child in Canada. This represents about $700, for a family of five, which has been lost in goods and services that we might have enjoyed, had we mobilized our physical and economic policies to achieve full production.

[Mr. Douglas.]

I would like very briefly to outline some of the things we think the government should do if it is going to increase the buying power in the pockets of the 40 per cent of the population of this country which lives either in a state of poverty or in a state of deprivation.

1. It must step up our programs of social capital projects, particularly in low-cost housing, urban renewal and construction grants to educational institutions at all levels, and have the unemployed put to work on these projects.

I was pleased with what the Prime Minister said about the Canada Assistance Plan in so far as it applies to the disabled, the aged and the blind, but let us never think for a moment that unemployment assistance legislation is the answer to the problem of how to take care of those who are out of work. This answer lies in employment in the economy, and employment in industry and, where that is not possible, employment at regular wages on social capital projects.

2. The government must mobilize all Canadian savings so as to promote industrial development and to enable Canadians to regain control of the Canadian economy. I notice in the speech from the throne the government has once more talked about the Canada Development Corporation. Once before the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) introduced it, and then lost his nerve. I hope he will not lose it this time. We believe he must go much farther than this. We think the day is coming when this government, or some other government, will have to set up a national investment board to direct investment into the development of those resources and those industries which will best create employment and increase Canadian productivity.

3. We advocate cuts in income tax for those in the lower income groups. When the Prime Minister was speaking today about the large number of people who earn less than $2,000 a year and $3,000 a year, it occurred to me that one of the immediate ways the government could help those in the lower income groups is to raise the exemption on personal income tax to at least $1,500 for single persons and at least $3,000 for married persons. This would give them a little more purchasing power to buy the goods and services we want to dispose of.

4. We think the government ought to tackle the cost-price squeeze which is wreaking such havoc on the agricultural economy. The decline in wheat prices presents the government with an excellent opportunity to implement the wheat policy which it was argued into announcing in March of 1963. The two price system and the guarantee of $2 a bushel would maintain the purchasing power of the prairie farmer and would boost his ability to buy the goods of eastern industry. Farmers, other than wheat farmers, need better deficiency payments and assistance in collection, storage, processing and marketing of their products. From 1949 to 1963 net farm income dropped by 9 per cent at the same time that the cost of food to the consumer went up by 12 per cent, and at a time when the food processing and beverage companies of this country more than doubled their profits.

I notice that the speech from the throne says that the government——is developing new policies to enable farmers generally to achieve larger and more reliable incomes—

They do not need to develop new programs; all they need to do is use some of the programs they advocated in the election campaign. They do not need new planks; they can use the planks left over from the 1963 election campaign. They are as good as new —they have never been used.

5. We advocate an increase in pensions. During the previous session we argued very strongly for raising old age security pensions to $100 a month payable at age 65, not only on humanitarian grounds, because we believe that these people who have spent their lives in the service of this country, are entitled to comfort in their declining years, but also because this would be one of the quickest ways of stimulating the purchase of consumer goods. The government has a chance in this way to make a virtue out of necessity.

6. We believe that comprehensive, universal medicare for all Canadians under a government sponsored and government operated health insurance program would not only raise the health standards of the people of this country, but would also help to redistribute income and thereby increase the purchasing power of those in the lower income brackets.

I am going to move an amendment on this, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to make some remarks about it if I still have the time. I would like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher):

That the amendment be amended by inserting therein, immediately after the words "because of confusion and indecision in dealing with national problems," the following words:

"including their failure to present specific proposals for a universal and comprehensive medicare program for all the people of Canada."

The government has no longer any excuse for not providing a comprehensive medicare program. They have had excuses in the past. The Liberal party have been talking about medicare since 1919. We have had the report from a royal commission, a report which in my opinion is probably the most extensive and exhaustive report on this subject that has been printed in the English language. This report says, first, that Canada needs medicare; second, it says that Canada can afford medicare; and third, it says the government should take action immediately within six months of receiving the report to call a federal-provincial conference in order to begin laying plans for its implementation.

Well, this report was tabled last June and nothing has happened. Now, the government says in the speech from the throne that it is going to call the first meeting of the governments of the provinces in order to discuss this matter. In several of the provinces phony medicare plans are being proposed with a view to forestalling a comprehensive national health insurance plan. If the federal government fails to act, and to act promptly, these plans will become established and we will set the clock back 25 years in our march toward national, comprehensive medicare. Action is needed at this session, not just to meet and discuss with the provinces.

The federal government knew for months before the Hall commission reported the views of the provinces because the provinces had submitted briefs to the Hall commission. They could have been ready with proposals. Instead of that they have allowed some nine or ten months to elapse without doing anything. Now, the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) tells us he is going to meet the provinces some time about the end of May. We say the federal government, in the light of the Hall commission report, in the light of the abundance of data and material which they have supplied, should be in a position to put legislation before parliament and place draft legislation before a federal-provincial conference, setting out the respective stages by which a province may move toward a comprehensive, complete health insurance program. We ought not to slow the provinces down to the pace of the slowest province. Provinces should be able to qualify at whatever rate they are willing to move.

There are some provinces who have an adequate number of doctors in ratio to their population and who, very quickly, could qualify for medical care. Then, they could move on to dental care and other health services. Some provinces would take longer to qualify. However, the fastest way in which comprehensive, universal medicare could be established in this country would be for the government to bring legislation before this house to give the provinces a series of objectives toward which they could move. If some provinces move more quickly than others, they will get the benefits more quickly. If other provinces are tardy, then it will take them a greater length of time before they get the full benefit.

This question of health insurance, Mr. Speaker, has been bandied around by the Liberal party for some 46 years. I want to say how disappointed we are that the very best they could tell us now is, if I may quote:

> My government believes that public policy should be directed to improving the quality of health services and to ensuring that all Canadians can obtain needed health care, irrespective of their ability to pay.

There is no commitment here for a universal, comprehensive, all-embracing medicare program; no commitment here for health insurance that will be government sponsored and government operated. The phrases which have been used in the Speech from the Throne could apply equally well to an insurance company operated plan or to a plan which the Hall commission—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, I have to interrupt the hon. member to inform him his time has expired, unless he has unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Douglas: I should like to thank hon. members and I will only take two or three minutes to finish.

Within the terms used in the speech from the throne, it would be quite possible to have a medicare system in which the people of this country would be divided into two categories, those who are able to pay the premiums for an insurance company sponsored plan and those who, under a means test, would have their premiums paid in whole or in part by the government. This kind of plan was examined and rejected, rejected outright, by the Hall commission. However, nowhere in this speech from the throne does the government say it is determined to proceed with the kind of medicare program which the Hall commission outlined for the people of this country.

I should like to conclude by saying that a new era in human history has been ushered in. It brings with it rich benefits for those nations who know how to use it. The failure to make the necessary adjustments is fraught with danger. The tempo of technological change is being speeded up. We have only a few years left in which to meet the challenge of a scientific age. There is nothing in the speech from the throne to indicate that the government is alive either to the opportunity or to the dangers that confront us. If the government fails to create the desirable goals and lead the Canadian people in a crusade for their realization, then we shall be plunged into unemployment, economic stagnation and human misery. This is the time for decision. To use the Prime Minister's own words, when I read the speech from the throne I could find nothing in it that would either excite the daring or test the strong.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to be able to take part in this debate in reply to the speech from the throne. I should like first to congratulate the Mover (Mr. Cashin) and the Seconder (Mr. Chrétien). As young men, capable and dedicated to the work of the House of Commons, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) and the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien), are certainly worthy of the honour the government bestowed upon them. However, I think it might have been more befitting if both of them had been present today to listen to the contributions of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the leaders of the other parties.

In the first place I believe the government is to be commended on the throne speech, for picking up the diligent and constructive work carried on during the last session by the special committee on procedure and organization. As we move farther away from the last session I believe the work that was accomplished during it will come into more clearly defined perspective, and it will be recognized that one of the most constructive pieces of work was that accomplished by the special committee on procedure.

I am sure that during the dying days of the last session all of us were concerned that the results of the committee's work might be lost.

Therefore I am pleased to see the government is picking up that work and I hope we can expect action in this regard very soon this session. Considering the amount of work outlined in the throne speech, unless we reform the rules under which we operate, it will not take 14 months to get through the program; it will take two years. I suggest that the government move quickly to introduce, at least on a trial basis, some of the recommendations placed before the house by that special committee on procedure. It is imperative that the house rules be modernized if we are to cope with the load of work presented to us.

I am also grateful to see the government has seen fit to mention the need for a parliamentary commissioner or ombudsman, but I fail to understand its trying to evade the issue by saying a royal commission is necessary to give further study to the proposal. The committee which studied the role of an ombudsman, and which presented a report to the house, did a very thorough job. I had hoped the government would take that opportunity when the report was presented to indicate it intended setting up the institution of a protector of individual civil rights, which is the role of an ombudsman.

I also commend the government on the stand it has taken with regard to Viet Nam. It is essential that we face facts. I do not think any amount of appeasement will ever bring peace in the world, a peace which must come because the futility of war has been demonstrated in every corner of the earth as something that will not settle arguments but which destroys nations. The submission of an idea or a country into slavery by another idea or other country, is certainly no way to bring about the peaceful settlement of our problems and permit the development of our resources, both human and material, as they must be developed.

I found it interesting to note that just yesterday the Prime Minister of Australia said that "the United States intervention in Viet Nam was the greatest act of moral courage since Britain stood alone during the second world war." He described the United States action on behalf of the free world "as one of the greatest manifestations ever of justice and principle."

This does not mean we must always follow the pattern or echo the words of our great neighbour to the south, but let us understand very clearly that compromise is not necessarily the answer to the problems we face in that part of the world.

As one listens morning by morning and evening by evening to news reports, particularly those of the C.B.C., he wonders whether or not the policy makers of this continent are Walter Lippmann and James M. Minifie, with a few echoes being carried on this side of the border by the leader of the New Democratic party, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas).

Why do we not hear complaints about the persecution of the Jews in Russia? Why do not the peace marchers protest the murder of tens of thousands of Viet Nam villagers by the Viet Cong? Why have we not heard protests through the news media about the tens of thousands of Congolese villagers who have been murdered by rebel forces which receive the encouragement of communist nations?

Through the confusion of the problems which beset us we seem to have lost sight of many of the things which really count. What is our concept of a world? Is it a place where mankind can live in peace, with nations as neighbours, where we respect the divisions that divide us and yet give each of us the dignity which a human being should have? Too many of our leaders are not convinced sufficiently of the things in which they should believe, and because they are not, we have to pick an uneasy way out of the dilemmas in which we find ourselves.

In this regard the suggestion by the government to set up a Company of Young Canadians is a good idea. It can be a tremendous thing for the youth of the country, not only from the point of view of developing some of the finer things of life but also developing a sense of responsibility and discipline. One of the greatest needs today, in an age which is characterized by loose morals, is a secure sense of responsibility, and those things which strengthen discipline on the one hand and provide the opportunity for a responsible effort on the other, will help build our nation. But even beyond that, such a project if it were properly conceived and based on the highest principles which are essential to a free way of life, would help us shoulder our responsibilities to the other parts of the world and give our young people the opportunity to go out and help others less fortunate than themselves.

This has a double barreled effect, as I have observed in many underdeveloped countries. Not only does it accomplish what is necessary in helping those people help themselves, but it is a tremendous help to the country from which the young people set out, particularly when they later return to take up places of responsibility in their own country.

Though we have no idea how the government intends to set up this project, I believe it is one of the greatest things that could ever happen to our young people.

It is also good that mention has been made of the need to bring in new regulations relating to broadcasting, and that finally something will be done to introduce legislation that will assist our publications. What I have often been concerned about is the fact that we seem to have lost our sense of Canadian identity. I have no time for those who say a Canadian does not have any identity. I have lived too long outside this country, working shoulder to shoulder with fellow Canadians, not to know the impact which has been made on the people in the areas in which we have served—not to know that we have a national identity and character which, unfortunately, is recognized more often by foreigners than it is by our own countrymen at home. We hear it said that to a Britisher a Canadian is someone who is not an American, while to an American a Canadian is someone who is not a Britisher. These are platitudes which no longer apply. What we need is a greater sense of purpose and a greater understanding of that identity within Canada itself.

I believe that in the area of broadcasting there is a tremendous need for change. It is essential in this regard that our national broadcasting system—and we need the C.B.C. —must be made responsible to someone and that the set-up should be adjusted accordingly. Power is dangerous whether it lies in the hands of a man, a party or an organization, and absolute power corrupts. In this regard unless a public organization like the C.B.C. has the same sense of responsibility as elected members of this house have toward those who elected them, nothing but mismanagement, shall I say, can be expected in terms of the responsibility which rests upon the shoulders of the corporation. I would hope, therefore, that when the government considers the changes necessary in the broadcasting field the organization of the C.B.C. will be strengthened so that it may better be able to respond to this challenge.

I realize that the Board of Broadcast Governors is making an effort to encourage the inclusion of a larger Canadian content in broadcasting. Many of our radio and television stations would respond if the material were available. Unfortunately many of them do not have the financial resources to produce material, other than that which corresponds to strumming a guitar and the "pop" music we hear all too often from our radio stations. There are tremendous possibilities here if only leadership were given. Perhaps this is an area in which the Canada Council might be the best organization to do this particular job, provided the funds were available.

It is essential, too, that something should be done with regard to publications. Not only the present government but the previous government failed to meet this need. It is now many years since the O'Leary report was given to us, and ever since then it has been gathering dust in a pigeonhole. It may be that not all the recommendations of that royal commission are applicable, but certainly the principles on which they based their recommendations are valid. If we are to have a Canadian publication industry, as is necessary to the Canadian identity of which I have spoken, something must be done to give Canadian publications a chance to survive.

I should like to mention at this point one of the best English language publications, I think, which has come on the market this year. It is a magazine entitled the Canadian Boy, published by the Boy Scouts Association of Canada. This fills one of the big gaps which exists as far as our younger boys are concerned, and I am pleased that a publication of this type should have come on the scene in Canada. We need more like it to reach the other levels of the Canadian people.

It adds up to this: There is an imperative and urgent need to do more about developing a Canadian identity and give us the sense of purpose we must have. If we fail to do this I do not think we can have too much to complain about if we lose the struggle presently being carried on for the minds and hearts of men across the world. What does it matter if we solve all the problems which relate to the material life? Suppose we do find a way of using automation so as to profit by all it can mean in this age of plenty, if we lose the finer things in life and those things which go to give us an assurance that this civilization and the world will continue for a while longer. Sooner or later we shall have to realize that this involves the needs of the entire world. We cannot have an organized world with disorganized men any more than we can have an organized Canada with disorganized Canadians.

There is much to be encouraged about. There is no need for a pessimistic attitude.

We cannot continue to shout the cry of the pessimist. I was interested in an editorial which appeared in the April 3 issue of Maclean's magazine. My attention was drawn to this editorial in this magazine which appeared under the title: "Give those crepe-hangers a holiday". I will not put it all on the record although I think it is all worth doing so, but there are a few thoughts which I think are important enough to mention. It says:

> Canada is a big rich country, with an eventful past, a prosperous present, and a promising future. Its people are among the most fortunate in the world. Almost everyone in the world seems to know this—except a few of us.
> We are getting tired of Canadians who are getting tired of their country. We are weary of citizens who worry so much. We have become impatient with the panicky and the pessimistic, with Canadians who are so preoccupied with our problems, so overwhelmed by our crises, and so upset by our scandals that they want to give up, or run away, or join the United States.
> Of course Canada has its problems: We have always had them. We've had scandals before, and unfortunately will likely have them again. They are serious, but Canadians are a serious people possessed of great strength. Our past failures were not fatal ones; basically sound government did not end. Our institutions remain strong and democratic freedom is still cherished, corruption is the exception in our public life and honesty the rule.
> Canadians are troubled over the apparent ineffectiveness of parliament and obstructionism in the Commons.

The article then proceeds to elaborate on that point. These are words we should think about because we should be proud that we are part of the Canadian scene today shouldering the tremendous challenge we have toward improving it and strengthening it.

I find that the speech from the throne is repetitious, ambiguous and vague in what it says or does not say about the basic economic needs of this country. I do not think it is good enough to say complacently that these are good times and all is well. For the moment things may appear on the surface to be in good shape. But the estimates point in another direction. To say what should be our goals is one thing; we need to define our goals. How to get there is another matter, and the important thing is to point out the path which will lead us to these goals. We must recognize that we have solved the problems of production but that all the economic planning in the world will be of no avail unless it includes the adjustments in our financial system necessary to bring about the just distribution of this potential plenty without driving us further into the controlling arms of the state. When I consider the estimates presented to us, I say this: If in prosperity we cannot balance the budget, what will be the situation in adversity or in times which are less affluent? In fact, in the estimates passed last Friday night there was one item of some $396 million which represented the deficit in the superannuation account that was passed over into the national debt with hardly a murmur or word spoken at all. When more than $1,100 million is required in this next fiscal year to pay the interest on the national debt alone, then something is wrong. That is an increase of more than 10 per cent over last year. Out of every tax dollar collected, nearly 14 cents of it is going to be used to pay off the interest on this debt.

No one can disagree with a declaration of war on poverty. There is no need for poverty in this rich land of Canada. There is no reason except our own inadequacy and our own inability to face up to a few simple facts that we should be able to see clearly. If the affairs of this nation, both private and public, were properly managed there would be no need for anyone living in any other than adequate conditions with a good standard of living. Our own good judgment and willingness to work and develop our national resources should be the only limitation to the good life we should be able to enjoy in Canada; and that includes everyone. I agree with the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) when he says that we are in a new era and the age of scarcity is past. We now live in an age of abundance; but the real problem in this age of abundance is not just planning; it is a problem of distribution where we will be able to distribute the production they themselves as producers are able to produce. Therefore there are some very fundamental things that we must not pass over.

The throne speech refers to the farmers of Canada and new policies which will result in larger and more reliable incomes to bring the agricultural industry up to the level of other parts of the economy. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) has already enunciated a new dairy policy. I believe that in his recent trip "down under" he must have received a good many ideas for his dairy policy from New Zealand, because I recognize most of them. The only difference is that he will subsidize dairy products with money he must first collect from the taxpayers, instead of using the Bank of Canada as the New Zealand government today is using the Reserve Bank of New Zealand to make sure that the two-price system operates not only to the benefit of the farmers but also meets the competition in the world. There is mention in the speech from the throne of an economic development fund for rural Canada, of a general declaration of war on poverty and the establishment of a Canada Development Corporation to assist in the development of Canadian industry. These in themselves are good, but how are they going to reach their objective?

I think the most important issue facing us this session in the immediate weeks ahead is the revisions that must be brought into the Back Act. Fortunately there is a built-in time limit in this particular matter because, if by July 1 those amendments are not made, every bank in the country will close. This brings me to just a few remarks about the services of the Bank of Canada and what they should be. At the present time the Bank of Canada holds approximately 15 per cent of the national debt. This is something that many of us do not realize, but I quote from Hansard of August 7 last when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon), as reported at page 6552, said this:

These holdings—

That is, that part of the national debt held by the Bank of Canada:

—comprise 14.6 per cent of the total government securities outstanding at June 30, 1964.

A little further on he says:

The total income of the bank was $127,851,000, and the net income paid to the consolidated revenue fund was $116,386,000.

So we see that this is true. The proposal I want to put forward here is simply this. If the Bank of Canada can hold 15 per cent of the debt of Canada, why can it not hold all of the debt of Canada except that which is held directly by Canadian citizens themselves? If we did this, we would be eliminating at least $1 billion of this $1,100 million that we are paying in interest on the national debt at the present time. There is no reason at all why the Bank of Canada cannot be used for the benefit of the nation and for the benefit of the Canadian people. It is true that such a program would have to be brought about gradually, but here is the key to one of the most important reforms that must be brought in if we are going in any way to meet the challenge of distribution which is now our basic responsibility.

The function of the Bank of Canada is basic to an effective and sound economy. It can be the tool which can strengthen and stabilize our national economy. It can be the means of solving most of the economic and financial problems that we now face. It is imperative that the Bank of Canada be responsible for the maintenance of an equilibrium between the purchasing power in the hands of the population and the turnover of retail trade and services. The amount of money and credit in circulation must be maintained at a level required to assure a normal turnover and distribution, because our economy is growing and must increase year by year. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would say there is an urgent need for bringing in those necessary adjustments to the Bank Act that will permit this to be done.

I think one of the most urgent needs as far as the farmers of Canada are concerned is a two-price system for the agricultural production of the country, and other primary production. The Canadian agricultural industry cannot now, or in the future, compete with other subsidized agricultural programs such as they have in the United States. Neither can it, because of the high cost of production and operations, compete with agricultural production in countries like Australia, the Argentine or France, where the cost of operation is much less. The agricultural industry in Canada must be insulated from these outside pressures over which it has no control. The only way it can be done is by setting up a two-price system, even though the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) said the other day that he did not think it was the answer. This can be done by making effective use of the Bank of Canada. I would suggest, therefore, the setting up of an import-export branch of that bank in order that the export of our surplus primary products can be financed in such a way that we can maintain a two-price system. As long as there are hungry people in the world we must do our share in meeting their needs. That is why I say there is an imperative need for an upgrading of the whole price structure for the producer of primary goods.

Closely allied in such an arrangement is the necessity for a new basis of international settlements. The gold standard as it now operates on the international scene is just as inadequate and unable to function as was the gold standard on the national scene 30 years ago. I think this is one of the areas in which we must take the lead in convincing the rest of the world that it is only as we set up a new arrangement for international settlements that we are ever going to accomplish what we should in the realm of trade; because it is only through the trading of goods which we have for export that we will meet our international obligations.

I believe this is very important. In this regard we must develop the programs of ARDA. Farm improvement, housing renewal and building up the run-down areas of the country, the building of our schools, hospitals, harbours, our roads—all these things could be financed if we were to make use of our own assets and credit through the proper use of the Bank of Canada.

We have heard a great deal said about welfare today. It is essential that we take care of our welfare needs; but right now we have welfare running out of our ears. I think in this regard it is important that we take a long, hard look at welfare and our obligations in the realm of welfare to make sure we can properly meet the costs which are involved. It is easy to say yes, we can afford it; of course we can. As long as our hospitals train young people to give the services necessary in the health field, we can afford it. But how will it be achieved? What will be the machinery?

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is essential to set up areas of priority. I know as a parent that my responsibility to my children, I believe, is first of all in the field of education. Second, it is essential that we make sure our children are cared for in the eventuality of sickness. Third, we have the responsibility to provide pensions which will take care of those unable to work and for those of us who are past the age of opportunity of being able to earn our own living.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have to interrupt the hon. member whose time has expired, unless he has unanimous consent to continue beyond his allotted time.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Thompson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker; I am grateful for this permission.

May I say that I think it was a good thing for the government to say it will consult with the provincial governments, because the responsibility of setting up any health plan first rests with them. They must determine the areas of priority as far as our welfare needs are concerned.

The Economic Council of Canada has much to say about this in its first report. I agree with the report when it says that we must fill in the gaps which remain at the present time before we project ourselves into new fields. Therefore, in this first responsibility we should carefully define in their proper order of priority the areas for which we will have responsibility. Then I feel that the next step should be to set out the complex problems, such as costs, deciding on priorities, and caring for those who are entirely omitted by the Canada pension plan. This must be worked out through continuing consultation with each other in order to find the correct answer.

We have heard much talk about an amendment to the constitution in order to repatriate it, and it must be repatriated. But we must remember that we in this confederation in Canada first came together as a group of provinces, and there is no body more qualified than the provincial governments to have the first say as to what the amending formula or any changes in the constitution must be. To deprive those provinces of any share in making this decision is to knock one's head against a stone wall, because such a suggestion will not be acceptable. Ten premiers and ten attorneys general, after spending a great many months and weeks in determining what would be the highest common denominator of agreement as far as making a formula for amending the constitution is concerned, could not all have been mistaken. While we in this house are representative of the national needs and realize the need for a strong national government, we must understand that unless we come to agreement with the provinces we can never repatriate the constitution, let alone bring in the changes which may be necessary, or write a new one.

Third in the order of priority I think there must be provision made for the integration of our private pension plans with the Canada pension plan. We must also provide for the portability of private plans which are now in existence. It is not a question of just working on the basis of one year or two years or five years; we must project all of this into the future and step by step move forward to attain those goals which we know are right. Otherwise we will continue to talk about those goals but will not be providing the means or the method of reaching them. It is like attempting to reach the top of a high wall with one jump; it cannot be done. Put a ladder against it and step by step you get there.

I believe that in the speech from the throne there is a great and tragic gap left in the government's program, represented by what was not said. In this world today a battle is raging for the hearts and minds of men.

While we give some material aid to other areas of the world, certainly it is not much in comparison to the wealth which we have. The Communist world today is giving the emerging areas of the world ideas and concepts and a program which they say will work for them, even though we in the free world know that it is a wrong one. Russia and China are spending millions, even billions, in their determined and relentless propaganda war designed to place the universe under their kind of tyranny. I have seen this at work, Mr. Speaker, in Africa. I have seen it in Asia and in Central America, and I have seen the emphasis which is placed on this struggle. I have in my hand here tonight one of their typical magazines which you can find printed in almost any language in any part of the world. It is beautifully done and available at a lower cost than our magazines are priced. You can buy them for seven cents here. The equivalent magazine published by a Canadian firm would cost us $1. In the emerging areas it is given away free. I mention this, Mr. Speaker, simply because they know what they want, and they have a program to get them where they think they want to go.

What is Canada doing today to give the men in the developing nations ideas with meaning which will work? What are we doing to give ourselves those same ideas? I greatly fear that Canada has done little in this regard. We are in danger of losing the world to communism by default, because of our lack of a positive approach. Too many of our businessmen who through the private enterprise way of life have been able to reach the position of power and affluence which they have today, are backing off and saying that socialism is inevitable. Just the other day a university student in this city came home and told her father that one of her professors had said in class that communism was inevitable, and that because it was we may as well begin preparing for it now. Have we no hope? Have we no faith in those things in which we believe and stand for? That is the question which we should be asking ourselves.

Likewise, what are we telling the world? Have we become so confused with those things which have gone wrong in our society, characterized by the cynicism of some segments of the press, the playing up of the seamy side of life in our entertainment both on T.V. and on the stage, to the point that we have lost faith in what we have? If the democratic way of life is to be preserved in Canada, we must not only hold fast to those truths which we cherish but step boldly out to make our voice heard around the world. This is our hour, if we use it. As the poet said, "There is a tide in the affairs of men which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune." What happens if this is denied? "The voyage of their lives is bound in shallows and in misery." What use is there in believing in a great society and losing the world to communism? To me Canada must clarify her own convictions. During the months of this year it has been my privilege to travel almost from coast to coast across the country. As I speak to Canadians who are concerned and to Canadians who care I find that in their thinking there are some very fundamental convictions. I should just like to mention them very briefly in closing.

Underlying our freedom in Canada is a belief in the dignity of man as a creature made in the image of God with inalienable rights and responsibilities. If one does not believe this he can scarcely object to tyranny, or for that matter slavery. We believe in the rule of people by the democratic process. Power can never be wholly given to a man or to a party or to a civil servant, because history has taught us that men can and do misuse power, and has shown us how. We may quarrel among ourselves, we may become confused at times. There will be instances when even freedom may be found hard to manage, or would seem to fall short of complete efficiency. The alternative of giving absolute power to a state or to a party or to a person is infinitely worse. That is why I am convinced that in this House of Commons we are going to have to become accustomed for quite a long time yet to working with the minority situation which we have, making it an instrument and a tool for achieving greater things than if it were otherwise. I believe that the basic needs of all men must be met, and I think all Canadians agree with that. It is our duty and our responsibility to work toward this end. At the present time we have much social legislation. We must co-ordinate our policies, establish priorities and work out a sensible plan for meeting these responsibilities.

There are good and honest people in this country who, through no fault of their own, are struggling to pay rent, buy the bare necessities of food and clothing on $75 per month. There are people in these circumstances right here in Ottawa, not to mention all across Canada. We ought to be ashamed to have this situation exist in this land of prosperity and plenty. Without simple honesty in our dealings in these matters society collapses. Without compassion the leftout person is forgotten. Without concern for the needs of others and respect for ourselves the whole nation's cohesiveness and unity are finished. Perhaps this is one of the greatest contributing factors to the lack of unity which now exists.

We want all nations to have great and good societies where food, clothing and shelter is the common lot of man and where tyranny is dead. Let us stand shoulder to shoulder and give ideas to the new nations which will not only match but far outweigh those promoted by the communists.

But first we have to be convinced of these things ourselves, and convinced of the importance and value of them. If we do that I am sure our work here will be more beneficial than it is now.

We must use every means at our disposal to get across to the people of Russia—yes, even to the people of China—the thought that we have no ill will toward them, but that we only wish to help them build a workable world, a world without fear of war, where hunger, poverty and tyranny have no part. Of course, we must also make it clear to those nations that we cannot countenance any attempt to subvert another nation, and we shall have to fight and resist any attempt to advance ideas which lead to slavery.

It is our very serious duty to make men the world over know that it is our desire to see that all men walk in dignity. If we fail to do this we fail Canada, we fail our children, we fail ourselves and we fail the world. Tyranny could triumph again in this world because you and I in this parliament of Canada do too little too late.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would again refer to this editorial from Maclean's magazine, the issue of April 3, where this is stated:

> This is a great time to be alive in Canada.

I agree with that statement. The article then states:

> We have prosperity; let's enjoy it. We have wealth; let's spread it around. We have two languages, two cultures, and strong traditions; let's preserve them. We have an old and honoured flag; let's continue to honour it. We also have a new flag and our children have begun to wave it; let's wave it too.
> We are having our crises but we can face and overcome them. We have our problems but we can handle them.

I think it is in that spirit that we should face into this session of parliament in order to accomplish what this country needs to have done.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, in view of the circumstances and considering the time I have left to give a thirty minute speech, could we have unanimous consent to call it ten o'clock?

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the wish of the house that I call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—TORONTO—LEASE OF UNUSED SPUR LINE FOR PARKING PURPOSES

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I addressed a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) regarding a problem in the riding of York-Humber. There are many who refer to three levels of government as though the second and third levels were much further away from the voter than the municipal level. I prefer to call it three spheres of government, as the taxpayer has voting rights in all three divisions.

In this case regarding York-Humber there is a problem in the area northwest of St. Clair avenue and Runnymede road where the homes were built before the first war at a time when individual driveways were not thought of and mutual driveways were an unheard of thing in the future. It comes about that today, in 1965, we have scores upon scores of homes in this district that have no garage entrances or garages, nor is there any room in the subdivision for rear lanes. However, running to the north of the Gaffney subdivision, as it is called, is a right-of-way belonging to the Canadian National Railways which used to serve industrial sites such as the Canada Cement yards and the sand and gravel pit of Connie Smythe, of whom many of you may have heard, in respect of other fields of endeavour.

Within the past year the industrial activities along this spur line on Jane street have ceased to exist, as the property has been converted into apartment house sites. I ask the Minister of Transport whether it would not be possible for the Canadian National Railways to lease this unused spur line property, which extends west of the Canada Packers plant to the Jane street area, so that the people in the Gaffney subdivision could use the abandoned spur line property for parking purposes. It is approximately a 66-foot right of way and no train has run over it in the past five years. Grass is growing between the ties and between the rails. The people living right beside the tracks are being ticketed every night by the metropolitan Toronto police force for leaving their cars on a public highway.

A slight move on the part of the Canadian National Railways in offering to lease about three quarters of a mile of the right of way to the parking authority of the township of York would indicate to the federal taxpayers in my riding that the Canadian National Railways and the federal government are not miles removed from them, but understand the situation with which they are faced. I would earnestly ask the Minister of Transport to urge the Canadian National Railways to consider leasing this abandoned spur line west of the Canada Packers plant to the parking authority of the township of York.

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the minister has asked me to say that he is sure the Canadian National Railways would be pleased to receive a direct approach in this regard from the parking authority of the township of York.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—MINISTERS SUBPOENAED TO APPEAR IN QUEBEC SUPERIOR COURT ACTION

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I do not see either the President of the Privy Council (Mr. McIlraith) or the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) in the house tonight, and in view of the fact that the matter I wish to raise involves the two ministers, personally, I do not intend to discuss it this evening. I only regret that the two ministers have seen fit to absent themselves from the house at a time when I wish—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I heard an hon. member say "order", from the opposite side of the house. There is nothing disorderly about my remarks. I have expressed regret that the two ministers concerned have not seen fit to be in the house tonight to answer the questions I put to them today, which they dodged so evasively. That is not an unusual attitude on the part of ministers in respect of questions asked by hon. members on this side of the house.

The questions I asked concern, not proceedings which are before the court but subpoenas, which are more than mere allegations, as the Chair suggested this afternoon, and which have been served on the three ministers concerned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I gathered from what he said a moment ago that he did not propose to take up his seven minutes. I am wondering now whether, under these circumstances, it would not be better if the hon. member were given the opportunity to pose his questions again or to have the matters listed again for an adjournment proceeding. I hold no brief at this time for the ministers, but obviously we adjourned earlier than usual and perhaps that is an explanation for their absence. Perhaps I am out of order in advancing an explanation in respect of why they are not here, but my suggestion to the hon. member is that we simply adjourn the matter, in view of the fact they are not here to reply, unless there is someone here who is prepared to reply.

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): On the point of order raised by Your Honour, I may say this matter was put down as a subject to be considered on the motion for adjournment this evening, and I should think, that having been done, the hon. member should proceed in the normal way.

Mr. Nielsen: I accept your suggestion, Mr. Speaker. I received a note from the President of the Privy Council this afternoon informing me that he was not going to be in the house after nine o'clock. I fully intend to raise the matter again, which I understand is within the rules, tomorrow on the orders of the day. Since the two ministers concerned are not here to answer now, I do not intend to proceed.

Mr. Stewart: The government is prepared to proceed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is nothing to prevent the hon. member from raising the matter again another day, if that is what he wishes to do.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, April 7, 1965

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BALCER—ANNOUNCEMENT OF CHANGE IN PARTY AFFILIATION

[Translation]

Hon. Léon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

I wish to inform the house of my decision to leave the ranks of the Conservative party.

The reasons I am taking that decision are well known to the members of this house and there would be no point in my repeating them here.

Mr. Speaker, I intend to sit as an Independent and I would respectfully ask you to assign me another seat.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member informed me of his decision this morning, and at his request I assigned to him a new seat.

BICULTURALISM AND BILINGUALISM

SURVEY OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT BY ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Is the Prime Minister now in a position to give an answer to the questions which were raised by the hon. Member for Marquette and the hon. Member for Mackenzie in connection with the investigation being carried on by the Royal Commission on Bilculturalism and Bilingualism and the interrogation of Members of Parliament with regard to matters which by no stretch of the imagination come within the ambit of the authority given to the B and B commission?

• (2:40 p.m.)

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I have asked for a report on this matter, Mr. Speaker, which I have not yet received. But I will do my best to see that it is received in time to give a reply to my right hon. friend tomorrow.

INDUSTRY

BENEFITS OF CANADA-U.S. AUTOMOBILE AGREEMENT TO CANADIAN CONSUMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Industry, but in his absence I wonder if I might direct it to the Prime Minister. Press reports indicate that Canadian-made Ford cars are now being sold in the United States at the same price as American cars. I wanted to ask the Prime Minister how soon we may expect that Canadian consumers will get the advantage of the U.S.-Canada automobile agreement, or is this consumer benefit to be confined entirely to American consumers?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry has already answered the latter part of the question and I have nothing to add to what he has previously said. In so far as the first part of the question is concerned, I will look into that report at once.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

IMPROVEMENT OF QUALITY OF FRENCH IN FEDERAL STATUTES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Prime Minister if he could advise us when he intends to set up the special commission to undertake a complete investigation of methods for improving the quality of French used in federal government statutes, as shown by correspondence between him and the Premier of Quebec which was tabled in the Quebec Legislature.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the matter is under consideration, and I will endeavour to get the results of that consideration before the house as soon as possible.

CONSIDERATION OF PROPOSED CHANGES IN PROCEDURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Could the Prime Minister tell us what course the Government intends to pursue with regard to its proposed changes in the procedures of this House? Will its proposals be brought directly to the House for action, and will the Special Committee on Procedure and Organization be re-established so the Government's proposals can be referred to that committee?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that matter is under consideration. It was discussed this morning, and as soon as I can possibly do so I will make a report to the House on the procedures which I suggest should be followed in this important matter.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the Prime Minister would consider consulting with representatives of other parties before a decision is made, in view of the fact that this is a House of Commons matter with which we are all concerned.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think that is a good idea, and we should discuss it with representatives of all the parties.

COMPANY OF YOUNG CANADIANS

INQUIRY AS TO ASSOCIATION WITH EXISTING ORGANIZATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In relation to the government's announced intention of setting up some kind of peace corps for young Canadians, could the Prime Minister tell the house what he envisages as the future role of the Canadian University Students Overseas, CUSO?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the details of this matter have not yet been worked out, but I can say it is the hope of the government to include in the Company of Young Canadians those who are already working in this field overseas. It may be desirable to do this without interfering with the organizations under which they are now working to bring them into association with the other organization and give those university organizations—I can think of one —the support I think they should have.

Mr. Aiken: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would this mean that CUSO might be integrated, then, with this new corps?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Pearson: We would want to discuss that with those who have been responsible for CUSO and have done such fine work in building it up.

AGRICULTURE

QUEBEC—ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

Does he intend to answer soon the request from the Quebec minister of agriculture for assistance to farmers in the Abitibi-Témiscamingue-Lake St. John area whose crops were ruined by bad weather last year?

[Text]

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF FREE TRADE POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address my question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It arises from a statement he made while addressing the Canadian Importers Association in Toronto last evening. He said, very briefly:

> Canada, with its limited population, can evidently not support the entire range of diversified products demanded by its consumers. Nor can it afford the cost of entering into research in design and technological improvement for all product lines.

Is the government intending, with this assumption, to extend the free trade policy that is set out in the Canada-U.S. auto treaty to other industries such as clothing, textiles, appliances and aircraft?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations for further reductions in Canadian tariffs will be made in the multilateral negotiations now proceeding in Geneva under the Kennedy round. I am not in a position, of course, to reveal any negotiations which have taken place, which is the position taken by all participating countries.

Mr. Hales: A supplementary question. Would the Minister like to say whether arrangements have been made with the furniture manufacturers along this same line?

Mr. Sharp: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I do not understand the purport of the question. Perhaps it could be put in a different way.

Mr. Hales: Has the Minister been in conversation with the Canadian furniture manufacturers with respect to a free trade policy similar to that concerning the car dealers?

Mr. Sharp: Not to my knowledge. The furniture industry were invited to make their representations before the opening of the negotiations under the Kennedy round. I gather they did, and I saw some of their representations.

HATE LITERATURE

CONSIDERATION BY COMMITTEE ON EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the standing committee of this House on external affairs in the last session did a considerable amount of work and received a lot of important evidence on the subject of hate literature, and two private members' bills on the subject were referred to that committee, will steps be taken to refer these matters to the Standing Committee on External Affairs in this session as soon as possible?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will be glad to consider that matter, Mr. Speaker.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON MEETING OF ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Has the Minister any information on the important Atlantic Development Board meeting being held in Halifax at the present time?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have anything I can communicate to the House. I have not yet had any official report.

Mr. Bell: A supplementary question. Appreciating that it would not be desirable to report on everything the Atlantic Development Board decide, would the Minister give a report to the House on those matters which have a particular federal interest which may be decided upon? I think the Minister knows what I am particularly referring to.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am always glad at any appropriate time to give a report on the wonderful work being done by the Atlantic Development Board.

Mr. Mandziuk: Set up by the Conservatives.

Mr. Pickersgill: And financed by this government.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

BRIEF OF ASSOCIATION OF OPTOMETRISTS RESPECTING COMMISSION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In her absence perhaps I could direct it to her seatmate the Solicitor General. Could the Minister inform the House whether she has received a brief from the Canadian Association of Optometrists, based on the views of the Hall Commission report, which they interpret as an attack upon the optometrists association? Has the Minister any remarks to give to the house on this matter?

Hon. J. Watson MacNaught (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to take the hon. Member's question as notice and refer it to the attention of the Minister; and I am sure she will make a full report, as she always does.

• (2:50 p.m.)

NATIONAL DEFENCE

BILINGUAL REQUIREMENT WITH RESPECT TO PROMOTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, recently I addressed a question to the President of the Privy Council asking whether he was aware of the fact that certain junior officers in the armed forces had been notified that they could not expect further promotions unless they were completely bilingual. In view of the fact that the Minister of National Defence is now in the house perhaps I should ask him whether he is aware of the circularization of such a policy, either by letter or verbally, amongst the armed forces?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker, I have neither heard nor seen such a circular, and I am sure this is a lot of nonsense.

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I would ask the Minister of National Defence to make a thorough check in his department, and perhaps more preferably an inquiry of his second in command, Mr. Lee, to find out whether such a circularization did in fact take place.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence?

Would it not be quite normal for this circular stating that promotions would be given to bilingual rather than unilingual Candians to have been sent to the armed forces?

[Text]

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, there is an increasing emphasis being placed in the armed forces on the ability to speak two languages. It is well known that in our service colleges we are encouraging young people to acquire greater familiarity with both languages. We also point out to potential recruits the advantages of joining the armed forces in that they will have an opportunity to become more familiar with the two languages. We have also pointed out to all young people that it would be a wonderful idea for them to learn the two languages, particularly if they want to be generals ten or 15 years from now. I am sure we have not circulated any such announcement, as suggested by the hon. Member. If we have I am not aware of it.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question?

[Text]

Mr. Nielsen: I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the Chair should recognize the hon. member for Edmonton East who asked the original question on this subject.

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether his expression regarding two languages necessarily refers to English and French, or does it apply to other languages as well?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, as my friend is aware, the two official languages are English and French. We have a number of people in the armed forces who are trained in other languages for special reasons and positions, such as those individuals who are appointed as military attachés, or to special duties. If some of our young officers have ability in more than two languages—and indeed some of them have learned three or four or five—they have an added advantage which makes them that much more useful in carrying out certain duties.

Mr. Ricard: Identify the one you said is nonsense.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I have a supplementary question I should like to address to the Minister of National Defence. I am sure he did not wish to mislead the house, but is he not aware that—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Caron: You ought to know about misleading.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Hull interjected that I should know what it is to mislead the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ricard: That is why they set up the Dorion Commission, to find out about misleading on the part of the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I do not take exception to that kind of statement, except to suggest that it is the common type of statement made on that side of the house. If the hon. member has any specific incident in mind let him make a charge.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caron: The report that was made to the Dorion Commission was quite different to the report made here in the house by the—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Starr: Does the Minister show you his reports?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The word "misleading" seems to be having a depressing effect this afternoon. May we get on with the regular business?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, the supplementary question I wish to ask is for the purpose of giving the Minister an opportunity to make a full explanation. Is he not aware that several months ago I put a question to the now Minister of Public Works, who at that time was Associate Minister of National Defence, with regard to whether an order had been issued from either the office of the Minister of National Defence or the Associate Minister of National Defence to the Canadian army that with respect to staff officers and up, bilingualism was to be a promotional factor in that force?

Mr. Hellyer: That is a horse of an entirely different colour, Mr. Speaker, if I may say so. Bilingualism is a promotional factor. The more skilful people are and the more talent they have, the more useful they are to the armed forces and the more likely they are to be promoted. Certainly bilingualism is one of those factors which are taken into consideration.

Mr. Nielsen: One last supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wanted to give the Minister that opportunity to explain. At the time I raised the issue several months ago with the Associate Minister—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a question would he please ask it. We are getting into a debate and not asking questions.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I was going to say that at the time I raised the original question with the Associate Minister—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nielsen: —I asked—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. memmer, being a distinguished lawyer, knows as well as I do how to frame his questions without placing argument before the question.

Mr. Nielsen: I was merely laying the groundwork, Mr. Speaker. I want to ask the Minister of National Defence or his colleague, the Associate Minister, a question which was not answered at the time the Minister of Public Works held the office of Associate Minister. Has the same order now been extended to cover the two other armed forces, the Royal Canadian Navy and the Royal Canadian Air Force, on the level of staff officers and above?

Mr. Hellyer: I would have to check the reference to an order. I do not think there is any such thing as an order. I think it has been circulated that amongst promotional factors bilingualism is one, which it should be, and certainly so far as I am concerned this factor would apply to all three of the armed forces. It is an important factor, but whether this has been put on a piece of paper I could not say and I do not think it is really germane.

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Since the Minister has said that bilingualism is a factor in promotion I will put my question to him in French.

[Translation]

Could the Minister of National Defence tell us whether the word "nonsense" he used with regard to bilingualism in the armed forces actually reflects the opinion of the present Liberal government? Does he mean that it is nonsensical to be bilingual in the armed forces?

[Text]

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, the word "nonsense" was carefully applied to the rumour which was being circulated and which was picked up by my friend opposite.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I think the nonsense was supplied by the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. While I enjoy these interesting exchanges, nevertheless it is my duty to point out that questions should be questions and not arguments.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence.

Could he tell us whether—

[Text]

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is it the same question?

Mr. Skoreyko: It is a question of privilege. The Minister of National Defence has charged me with circulating a rumour in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: There go the trained seals.

Mr. Skoreyko: Eventually and at the proper time I am prepared to provide and will provide the evidence necessary to convince the Minister of National Defence that what I am saying is fact. I simply ask is he aware of a recent promotion in Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, namely of the general manager of that corporation in Ottawa; and what are his qualifications? Would he answer that?

Inquiries of the Ministry

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I regret that particular organization does not come within my sphere of jurisdiction, but I am sure the gentleman in question was eminently qualified.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence.

Could he tell us whether the department has any language laboratories where the two official languages are being taught to officers and men in the armed forces of Canada?

[Text]

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, there are language laboratories available for members of the armed forces who wish to take advantage of the language training that is provided.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, can the minister tell us whether there are many who take advantage of the language laboratories available to the Canadian army officers and men?

[Text]

Mr. Hellyer: An increasing number of forward looking people, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: How about you, Paul?

Mr. Hellyer: Including the Minister.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean Chrétien (St. Maurice-Laflèche): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence.

As he is going to speak in Shawinigan tomorrow, could the minister tell us whether he intends to speak in French?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR EARLY CONSIDERATION OF ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is requesting estimates in the neighbourhood of $100 million, and in view of the fact that there is no indication that one dollar of this will be spent on the extension of very necessary services, will the Prime Minister assure the house that these estimates will be brought before Parliament at the very earliest date so this ridiculous situation can be dealt with by Parliament?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we shall be glad to bring them before Parliament as soon as possible so that my hon. friend and others will be able to discuss this matter.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cashin for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Douglas.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, when we listened to the speech from the throne, or rather when we heard the news which preceded the reading of that speech in the other place, at the opening of this third session, we were told that this speech would be very long and thick. Then we found out that its volume was not very thick, but that it was quite thick respecting the proposed measures.

The members in this corner of the house had believed that during the last two sessions the government had taken cognizance of the needs of the people of Canada. We also believed that, after the contracts, discussions and arguments we had with other members of parliament, chiefly Liberal members, the speech from the throne would mention, for instance, that family allowances would be adjusted according to the cost of living index. Such a measure would have benefited everyone. As we all know, family allowances have remained practically unchanged since 1945; only in 1946 did the government raise them by one dollar and even at that only a limited number of recipients benefited from the boost.

We would also have thought that the government had taken into account the numerous requests and claims of older Canadians who complain about the inadequacy of their pension.

Naturally we expected the government to introduce legislation for the payment of a $100 a month pension at age 60 because the Prime Minister and his cabinet know perfectly well that it is impossible to live anywhere in Canada on a pension of $75 a month. Yet that is the hardship we impose upon our older citizens.

The same situation prevails in the field of income tax. Two or three months ago, if not six months ago we were told that the government was prepared to follow the example set by the United States, namely to grant a reduction in income tax. We in the Ralliement Creditiste, had been asking for a total exemption for married people, whose income is less than $5,000 a year, and for a $2,500 exemption for single people.

At this stage I would say that we, as members, benefit from an income tax free allowance of $6,000 a year in addition to the $2,000 exemption granted to the Canadian people as a whole, which means that every married member of parliament benefits from an $8,000 a year exemption. And we find this situation logical in our case. We believe that workers, farmers, contractors and businessmen should have the benefit of the same privileges or, at least, of an income tax reduction.

Another act which should have been amended is the Unemployment Insurance Act. I notice that the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen) just left the house. The Unemployment Insurance Act should be amended to enable our unemployed to be treated better than they are at the present time.

Indeed, when we meet government officials in their offices, they tell us that the drafting of the act is bad, that it does not allow anyone to assist the unemployed. Penalties are inflicted all across Canada. An employee is penalized when he quits his job because he is ill-treated by his employer. He is told: You will get nothing for the next six weeks.

Mr. Speaker, let us try to treat the Canadian people as they deserve. As members of parliament, we want to be treated like human beings. Well, as members of parliament and legislators, let us see to it that our legislation is such that people will be treated as human beings and that the individual will be respected in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, may I offer my sincere congratulations to the mover (Mr. Cashin) and the seconder (Mr. Chrétien) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne—and for the ease—and it was really ease—with which they carried out a very thankless job.

What strikes me particularly in the speech of the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche is the statement he made when he said:

> Since Mackenzie King and under the Liberal party, Canada has turned more and more toward collectivism.

This is the nice statement that our children will perhaps read in Canadian history when it deals with people who did not know too much what to say because they were members of parliament.

Mr. Speaker, when one remembers the social teachings of the Roman Catholic church, one knows that collectivism as advocated by the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche is as worthy of condemnation as the individualism he seems to despise.

Pope Pius XII in his immortal encyclical Quadragesimo Anno stated:

> There is, therefore, a double danger to be avoided. On the one hand, if the social and public aspect of ownership be denied or minimized, the logical consequence is individualism, as it is called; on the other hand, the rejection or diminution of its private and individual character necessarily leads to some form of collectivism.

When the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche takes pride in belonging to a party leading Canada toward collectivism, I am only too happy to state in the House of Commons that I am proud not to belong to that party and glad to belong to the Ralliement Creditiste whose policies aim precisely at freeing the individual from the socialist and collectivist policies applied by the Liberals who intend to enlarge upon the scope of such policies so that Canadians will be servants and slaves of a strong and all-powerful state.

Mr. Speaker, now that the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche has admitted to being a collectivist, let us record for posterity, for our children as well as those of the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche, what has been recognized by the Liberal government in the speech from the throne prepared by the Liberal government and presented Monday by His Excellency the Governor General of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps for the first time since the beginning of confederation 98 years ago, a government in power makes disturbing admissions which it would find shocking if they were made by political opponents, if we were making them ourselves as we already have; then, Liberals would say that this is demagogy and nonsense on the part of Creditistes and of the Ralliement Creditiste.

Listen to this enumeration which I would describe as unpleasant and which presents Canada as a land of desolation, distress and extreme poverty: alarming international situation—it is written in the speech from the throne—crisis in Viet Nam, financial difficulties in the United Nations, poverty, illness, ignorance and lack of training of many Canadian citizens, poverty among the people, inadequate incomes—

What have we said over and over again in the House of Commons during the last three years? Inadequate incomes in Canada. The needy people are given a public assistance plan. Blighted and congested areas in our cities and what not.

Mr. Speaker, this is a gloomy speech, a speech in which the party in office recognizes the distress of Canadians, their poverty and the bad housing conditions.

Yet it is not the Creditistes who have been in office for the last 98 years, but the Liberals or the Conservatives. And when two political parties have made such a mess of things they are no longer worthy of the people's confidence and the latter should get rid of them as quickly as possible. I hope they do.

It is all very well for the Leader of the official Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), to introduce a non-confidence motion against the government, but he deserved the same thing himself when he was in office.

Mr. Speaker, we shall try for a few minutes to follow the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau), who, Monday, before the television cameras, divided into three categories the measures proposed by the government in the speech from the throne.

To begin with, the measures meant to boost our national pride.

Second, economic measures.

Third, social measures.

Among the measures intended to satisfy and stimulate our national pride, the speech from the throne mentioned a bill which would make "O Canada" the national anthem of Canada and an address to the Queen to authorize Canada to amend its own constitution.

Mr. Speaker, the members of the Ralliement Creditiste will entirely agree that "O Canada" should be adopted as the national anthem of this country. In the programs we submitted to the electors of this country we asserted that the Creditistes intended to give Canada a distinctive flag and to officially recognize "O Canada" as our national anthem.

All we ask of the Liberal government is not to make the same error as last year when it asked us to vote in favour of a double motion proposing the adoption of a maple leaf flag and of the union jack.

If the government wishes to avoid another long and bitter debate, it should separate the two proposals concerning the national anthems so that supporters of a single national anthem may be able to vote in the affirmative, a thing they would not be able to do if they are asked to recognize, at the same time, another Canadian official anthem. As far as we, the members of the Créditiste party, are concerned, we will vote for a single Canadian official anthem just as we have voted for a single Canadian official flag.

The other measure meant to arouse our pride, according to the government, concerns the repatriation of our constitution, including what has been called the Fulton-Favreau formula.

Mr. Speaker, until the members of our group put forward the comprehensive views of the Creditiste party, may I give some indications as to what our stand will be on the repatriation of our constitution.

First of all, we feel it is utterly wrong to talk about repatriating the constitution. It would be possible to bring back to Canada something which had once belonged to Canada, something which had once resided in Canada.

Well, the British North America Act never belonging to the people of Canada, never belonged to Canada, and moreover never was approved by the people of Canada.

The British North America Act was born in Great Britain, passed by the government at Westminster, given to us by a foreign government over which we have no control. The British North America Act is a foreign statute created by foreigners and which belongs to foreigners. There is therefore no need to repatriate it.

I think that to accept freely a constitution which was never ours, which is not suitable for Canada and Canadians, which is not proper for the provincial states that we call the provinces of Canada would be to perpetrate a colonial mentality that is being forced upon us.

Let us leave that dusty document in the Westminster colonial office and if we are free people, if we are a free country, if we have on autonomous and free government, let us give Canada a truly Canadian constitution wrought by Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, what we need is not the repatriation of the present constitution. And neither do we need, to use the euphemism contained in the speech from the throne in the following terms:

...to provide that the constitution of Canada may be amended in Canada by the procedures which have been agreed between my government and the government of all the provinces.

What we want and what is needed by Canada and the provincial states is a new constitution on the basis—please note that—of the acknowledgment of an equal partnership de facto and de jure; of two nations having the right to shape their own destiny, to take the decisions concerning them.

But on the other hand, we want no special status. Such an expression implies a concept of dependence of submission. As was explained the other day on television by the president of the Montreal St. Jean Baptiste society, the concept of a special status for Quebec implies that we want to be treated differently from the others or that the others will be treated differently from us. That is not what we want.

For instance, we want what the premier of British Columbia often repeats: equal treatment for all, special treatment for nobody, or no injustice for anyone. What we want is be treated like the others, receiving no more and no less.

We do not want a treatment better or worse than the treatment given to others; we do not want others to be placed on a level inferior or superior to ours; we want a real equality status, equality of rights for all Canadians, equality of rights for all Canadian provinces, equality of rights for everyone living in Canada.

We do not want to take anything away from others, as we have so often said, but we do not want others to take away our wealth, our rights. French Canada, Quebec is a real entity; it is the French-Canadian nation. In order to be true to itself, to develop freely according to its needs and aspirations, Quebec must have certain attributes which are the prerogatives of a free nation which wants to develop freely.

The first of these attributes which Quebec needs and that we members of the Ralliement Creditiste claim, is the control of our credit.

It is the control of our credit in the province of Quebec, and, for that matter, we suggest the other provinces do the same thing for themselves.

Would anything be taken away from Canada if the province of Quebec had the control of its credit in order to be able to proceed to the development of its own natural resources, to the development of what we have in Quebec?

But the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) told us the other day that he would never grant credit control to a province, precisely because this matter comes exclusively under the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, if we had a constitution organized and arranged to grant the provinces their rights on credit control, we would not have complaints on the part of the province of Quebec or of the other provinces, because we could look after making financially possible at home what is materially possible, desirable and morally good.

A nation cannot be free when it has to go abroad and ask for the right to live, for the financial means to develop its natural resources. A nation cannot be free when it has to kowtow to the London, Paris or New York financiers in order to get the credits necessary to its development and survival.

The credit of a nation rests on the ability and the will of its people to produce and deliver goods in sufficient quantities and at the time and place chosen by the prospective consumers. In short, real credit is the resources of a country, of a province expressed in possible goods and services.

One realizes therefore that real credit involves two factors: the production capacity and the needs to be met. Therefore, if real credit rests on producers and consumers, it rests, as it were, on the whole community, on the whole society. The real credit of a country is therefore something in common, something social, it is social credit. That is why we are Social Creditiste.

If real credit is social, financial credit, for its part, should reflect social credit. Financial credit should be created as abundantly and as rapidly as is required by the production of those goods and services wanted by the community, in order to meet all the needs of its members.

If we have natural resources and manufactures, if we have workers to produce goods, brains to manage production, then money and finance should not impede that satisfaction of the needs of all the members of the community.

There are needs; if the material wealth and the capacity of production exist, there should also be enough money—no more but no less—to satisfy those needs.

We ask that the province of Quebec be given the power to control its own credit so it can ensure its economic and social development. We want Quebec to enjoy all its rights, so it can develop according to the needs and aspirations of the French Canadian people of Quebec, as we wish the other provinces to develop according to their needs and aspirations. That is what we call a status of equality.

Respecting a new constitution, the Créditistes also request for the province of Quebec: control over its foreign trade; control over its immigration and finally control over its tax sources.

I do not wish to discuss those claims in detail, but, Mr. Speaker, I find it strange that this government did not suggest, in the speech from the throne, any measure to hand back to the provinces those taxation fields which belong to them. Not 25 or 30 per cent, but a complete handing over of their taxation fields, of those rights which are theirs.

During the period which preceded the second world war, it seemed that the sharing of the fiscal basis among the various governments was more equitable, particularly when the provinces and the municipalities indulged in a policy of laissez-faire.

From 1926 to 1939, Ottawa got 46.2 per cent of all tax revenues; the provinces 17.9 per cent, and the municipalities 35.9 per cent.

During the war, at the request of Ottawa, as stated by Right Hon. Mackenzie King and the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien), the provinces and the municipalities gave up or leased their taxation fields to the federal government.

But with the war and greater activity by the other levels of government in various sectors of the economy, the revenues of all governments registered an increase in the use of the gross national product. For instance, between 1926 and 1939, that is a period of 13 years, total revenue of all three levels of government accounted for 14 to 22 per cent of the gross national product.

This proportion exceeded 28 per cent during the war and reached 30 per cent of the G.N.P. in 1962.

The federal government kept for itself practically all that increased income. While its income was equal to almost 7 per cent of the G.N.P. before the war, it had reached 17 per cent in these last few years. Before the war the percentage of the G.N.P. available to the provinces and the municipalities was equal to that of the federal government; but since 1947 it is less than 5 per cent. The increase in direct and indirect taxes favoured almost solely the federal government to the detriment of the provinces and the municipalities.

[Mr. Caouette.]

This is how during the 1957-62 period the federal government took over 62.7 per cent of all the taxation revenue while the provinces received 20.8 per cent and the municipalities only 16.5 per cent.

Mr. Jean Lesage was, therefore, justified in stating at the 1963 federal-provincial conference that the fiscal arrangements which brought about this situation were supposed to be only temporary and were to be revised.

> In 1963, there is no longer any state of war and the economic problems are different from those facing Canada after 1950. Since then, the needs of the provinces have gained prior claim over those of the federal government.

And what had been the requests of Quebec? Here are the very words of Mr. Lesage:

> We are asking once again as minimum taxing powers: 25 per cent of personal income tax; 25 per cent of corporate income tax, and 100 per cent of the estate duty taxes, since estates come under provincial jurisdiction. Consequently, it is logical that taxes on donations inter vivos should devolve on the provinces, since such donations are of the same nature as estates.

Mr. Lesage asked for little compared to what we are entitled to. If he had acted in the true interests of his province, it is not 25 per cent of what belongs to Quebec that Mr. Lesage would have claimed, but indeed 100 per cent; that is what was claimed by the Creditistes.

Actually, Mr. Lesage claimed $150 million; he got $40 million, with the promise that he would get more in the years ahead.

As François-Albert Angers wrote in L'Action Nationale:

> Mr. Lesage has come back empty-handed from the federal-provincial conference held in Ottawa.

And why did Mr. Lesage come back empty-handed? Simply because he recognized the priority of centralization mechanisms, as Mr. Angers says.

Mr. Lesage, in negotiating with Ottawa, always offers two alternatives. He asks Ottawa to give him more money for his own purposes or to grant him additional powers. Ottawa's reaction is immediate. It gives in on monetary questions but keeps the rest, powers included. Meanwhile, Mr. Lesage places himself in an illogical position right from the start. On the one hand, he asks for more money under the equalization formula and, on the other, he takes away from the federal government the sources of revenue necessary for the equalization payments.

Mr. Lesage had asked that Quebec be allowed to withdraw from certain joint programs and that it receive a fiscal equivalent instead.

In fact, Ottawa granted his request and in January 1965, Quebec was able to opt out of 29 of the 46 joint programs in which it participated. As a compensation, it got an amount of $220 million which included a percentage of the personal income tax, the equalization payments and cash adjustments.

On February 27, 1965 before the Montreal Junior Chamber of Commerce, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) had this to say on the subject:

> To avoid this type of "trusteeship federalism" our government in Ottawa has suggested that the provinces opt out of the joint programs and take over themselves their administration. Quebec, we know, intends to opt out of about 75 per cent of those programs (in terms of dollars)—but without lowering the national standards set by the programs—this constructive and flexible system has been called "co-operative federalism".

What should be our reaction?

What is most ridiculous in this whole situation is the fact that the federal government which called trusteeship federalism this joint program scheme is now prepared to set up some more.

For instance, the speech from the throne mentions such measures as a cost sharing area development program; a cost sharing plan to assist the re-employment of workers; a cost sharing plan for fuller rural development or "rural displacement"; a joint plan under which people can be assisted on the basis of their need; a joint plan for urban renewal; a joint plan for public assistance; a joint plan for health services; a joint plan for improvement of the dairy industry.

The speech from the throne is stuffed with these joint plans which mean a trusteeship over the provinces by Ottawa, the control of provincial expenditures by civil servants from Ottawa and the end of provincial autonomy.

We of the Ralliement Creditiste disagree with this policy of joint plans because they mean a double bureaucracy, one in the provinces and one in Ottawa. The people are fed up with paying for bureaucrats in Canada. What the people need today, is the right to live in peace in their own country, Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cameron, High Park): Order. I have to advise the hon. Member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cameron, High Park): Do hon. Members give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am grateful to the house for these few supplementary minutes I need to conclude my speech.

Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne is crammed with these joint programs. We are opposed to the policy of joint programs for many reasons. I have just given one; here is another.

It is always Ottawa who takes the initiative of legislating in various matters, especially with regard to winter works affecting the municipalities. This is a direct encroachment upon the constitution. Ottawa controls every action taken by the Quebec government within an exclusively provincial jurisdiction. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour are well aware of that.

Ottawa still levies direct taxes in the province of Quebec, contrary to subsection 2 of section 92 of the constitution. It is the same with regard to the other provinces.

This opting out formula does not give the province of Quebec a greater fiscal freedom and increases in no way its taxing powers.

According to the policy of the Ralliement Creditiste, the province should opt out of all these joint plans and regain its full freedom in the field of taxation. Ottawa should give up these joint plans and let our province look after its own management. Ottawa should withdraw and respect the autonomy of the provinces.

Because of those one-sided deals and also of the greater needs of Quebec, the province, which has to look after a whole nation, a whole culture—its priority needs in the field of education, development of its natural resources, compensations to give its labour force which cannot find employment—is now forced to levy greater taxes than the other provinces.

In conclusion, let me quote the statement delivered by the premier of British Columbia, Mr. W. A. C. Bennett, on November 25, 1963, at the federal-provincial conference in Ottawa:

> The Fathers of Confederation wished to create provincial governments that would be independent in the fields concerning their respective responsibilities and able to co-operate effectively to the national growth. To this end, the efforts on the part of the provinces, in time of peace, since 1867, have constantly been directed to the maintenance of their effective taxation powers without double taxation for otherwise, the powers of the provinces to govern independently would no longer exist.

When British Columbia entered confederation in 1871, it accepted the terms and conditions laid down in the British North America Act. Under this act, the provinces had to assume certain responsibilities. A number of those responsibilities, especially those pertaining to education and to the development of natural resources, became more and more important.

However, the constitution has not merely imposed responsibilities upon provincial legislatures, but it has also specified their taxation rights in order to enable them to meet these costs. One of those rights which was supposed to be an exclusive power was direct taxation within the province.

The agreement accepted by the provinces when they joined confederation and gave up their indirect taxation powers representing four fifths of their income in return for a per capita income or fixed subsidies soon compelled them to use their exclusive powers of direct taxation within the province under section 92 of the B.N.A. Act. The exclusive use of income tax by the provinces was respected during the 50 years preceding the first world war.

Federal intrusion in this field, in 1917, was explained as a temporary measure to face an emergency. The recognition of the provinces' right to impose direct taxes was confirmed by Sir Thomas White, who was then federal minister of finance, when he said:

Income taxes come under provincial jurisdiction and are a form of taxation suited to provincial needs. I have not set any deadline for withdrawing from this field of taxation, but I suggest, and I should like this suggestion to be recorded in Hansard, that, at the end of the war, this tax measure be immediately reconsidered.

The emergency created by the second world war compelled the provinces to abandon their powers of taxation and Ottawa entered the field of estate taxes.

However, it has been understood that the provinces would recover their rights in peacetime.

In conclusion, the province of Quebec wants to recover its taxation powers and one of the main tasks, if not the foremost one, of a Creditiste government, will be to request that Ottawa withdraw from the taxation fields that are not within its jurisdiction, such as direct taxation on personal and corporate income, and estate duties.

These are the policies we will follow during this session, Mr. Speaker. These policies are highly different from those introduced in the speech from the throne. Those are the main remarks we want to make with regard to these measures that the government intends to pass during this session.

The fight will begin next week. We are open to agreement. We are ready to accept mutual understanding, yes, but we shall not agree, for instance, to diminish any province for the benefit of Ottawa. And if at that time we are threatened, as was done in certain quarters, with a general election so that the voters may express their views, I say that we are ready to go to the people and ask a public expression of opinion about what is going on in Ottawa at present.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Mrs. Margaret Rideout (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, it is traditional to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, but in addition to that I take great personal pleasure in complimenting both the hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) and the hon. Member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien) on the exceptional high quality of speeches which they made.

I am sure that every Member who rises for the first time in this honourable assembly is moved, as I am moved, by a sense of the occasion. It is perhaps a comment on the real strength of our traditions and on the deeper character and meaning of the Commons that such an emotion should exist.

The occasion has a triple meaning to me. I am not only speaking here for the first time, but rising proudly as the first woman ever to have entered this chamber from the very old Province of New Brunswick, and I am sitting in that place so recently vacated by my husband. I hope that it may not be out of place to say that while I hope my efforts will honour the memory of the former Member for Westmorland and carry on his work, it is my intention to serve and represent my constituents in my own way and to the fullest degree of my competence.

May I through you, Mr. Speaker, thank all my fellow Members for the warm and thoughtful tributes paid last summer to my husband. May I also, Sir, thank you and my colleagues on both sides of the house for your warm welcome to me as a new Member.

In our part of the country where we take politics very seriously a Member is kept in close personal contact with all the issues which disturb constituents. I am learning this very quickly during my visits home. I sometimes wish that those who manage the affairs of the country at a higher level could always see these realities as intimately as private Members do.

The hon. Member for Renfrew South (Mr. Greene), whose constituency has many of the problems of my own area, has had the experience of being with me on some political excursions in my riding. He would agree, I am sure, that some of the high-flown abstractions occasionally heard in Ottawa generate little enthusiasm among some in my area who have real difficulty in achieving even a measure of the affluent life.

My introduction to the Commons came at an exciting time in our Parliamentary life. There must be few who have experienced the harsh baptism of political fire so soon after arrival. It was at the same time an historic moment when this country took a decisive step forward in the future of the nation; a time when a strong democratic majority adopted a flag to fly proudly before the world.

The constituency which I am honoured to represent is a very old part of Canada, but one which has a very new outlook on the new Canada which is developing. It is clear from the Westmorland by-election results that a very substantial majority of its constituents believe the Government which I support is competent and equipped to handle their affairs. The fact that the Liberal majority was doubled from the general election surely indicates that the leadership of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) is thoroughly approved.

It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to devote too much time refuting some negative remarks of the Leader of the New Democratic Party, or to comment to any great degree on the subamendment that he has placed before the house. It is logical though, I suppose, that the hon. Gentleman seized upon medicare as the basis for his subamendment, because it is obvious that in the field of social welfare this Government—the Liberal Government—has once again lived up to its reputation as the party that is concerned about the well-being of the people of this nation; the party that introduced and transferred into legislation every significant piece of social welfare legislation at the disposal of the Canadian people.

The Prime Minister made it abundantly clear that this Government does intend to introduce a public medicare program at the earliest possible moment. What is also obvious, Mr. Speaker, is that we have no intention of running roughshod over the Provinces, as was suggested should be done by the Hon. Leader of the N.D.P. in his speech last evening. Indeed, to suggest, as he suggested, that the Government act in this field without first consulting the Provinces, is to deny the undeniable rights the Provinces have in the area of social welfare. To further suggest that certain Provinces are setting up phony medicare programs, without specifically mentioning which Provinces and without substantiating this charge, is a reflection on them at a time when we need to maintain the full confidence and co-operation of the ten great Provinces that make up this nation.

The record of the Liberal Party in the past in the field of social welfare and our willingness as indicated in the Throne Speech to continue our efforts for the increasing security and welfare of our people are proof of the sincerity of our intention to introduce a comprehensive, public medicare program at the first opportunity after full and free consultation with the Provinces.

The constituency of Westmorland, which I have the honour to represent, is one of the few places in our country where the two founding races have lived together from the beginning. We know the value of mutual understanding and harmony. The Acadian French were in the eastern border area of the riding before 1700 and Yorkshire English families settled there as early as 1720. Descendants of both have spread, and remain throughout the constituency, and their numbers are almost equal today.

The whole Province of New Brunswick is an example of the way Canadians can maintain the best traditions of both founding groups while welcoming others of different origins. We have proven that the two distinct original groups can become a single people while keeping their individual cultures, their languages, religious beliefs and political ideals.

We are old historically in my constituency, but one would not know it from the spirit which has marked the province in the last three or four years. Once we in the Maritimes were known as nagging complainers, and there was some justification both for the complaints and the reputation we had. We have still far to go to reach the employment and economic standards of some other areas, but we have found a way to start catching up. Henceforth, by our own efforts ye shall know us. These efforts will include a continued drive to have our special problems recognized, but we shall not sit idly by in frustrated hope.

The present Canadian Government has taken steps long ignored by previous Governments which go a great distance in permitting us to help ourselves. These measures, chief among them the lifegiving financial blood infused into the Atlantic Development Board, recognize that if we have the chance at all we can make our own way and compete with anyone in any place. More has to be done, of course, and I shall come to this again; but I want to emphasize that we are in a generation which got tired wating for things to come to us; we went out after them, and we are getting them, slowly.

In this House, Mr. Speaker, you may allow me to say it was no coincidence that much of the new attitude in New Brunswick has developed since Louis Robichaud became Premier in 1960. Nor is it a coincidence that our bettering position has raced ahead since the present Prime Minister of Canada became national leader in 1963 and made Federal-Provincial co-operation a vital new fact. His recognition of a change in our country's social and economic structure calling for full co-operation between the Provinces and the Federal Government made possible the new era now upon us in the Atlantic area.

In our Province we had the resources but we were not making the best use of them. Without the ground support of a co-operating national Government and an understanding of our needs and intentions, we could not develop what we had. Furthermore, changing world conditions have given us openings which require action from a higher jurisdiction to exploit fully. We were sick of handouts and headache pills to get us from one economic hangover to another. This Government has given us the first tools to let us help ourselves, tools to build the foundation. With a little more material we can finish the job and build thereafter for ourselves.

The transportation and distribution centre for the Maritimes, the city of Moncton, makes up about half of the constituency of Westmorland. Here we have felt both the beneficial and disruptive impact of modern change. Some are hurt by transitional changes; others benefit. On the over-all scale we are growing at a rate which would not have been imagined 10 years ago. New kinds of industry and business are interested in our area, modern industries such as chemicals; but we must increase the attraction. Iron ore and steel prospects on the Province's Northeast coast will affect my constituency very strongly. It will take a little time for all this to show but it gives us a great new hope.

In our region we have discovered that whereas once geography was our enemy, it is now a friend. With our resources we can produce for a world market at our doors because of our access to the sea. Again, this cannot be fully achieved without the harbour facilities for deep water ports which exist in Westmorland. These things are within Federal jurisdiction. Some of our facilities of all kinds are old and in need of restoration. Others we have never had, but require urgently. Some are now being provided or discussions about their provision are going ahead.

[Mrs. Rideout.]

One natural resource we have developed very much on our own is lobster fishing, packing and shipping. Shediac, in my constituency, is the lobster capital of the world and is in the midst of the most beautiful coastal resort country anywhere. It is attracting more and more tourists to help the Canadian balance of payments.

If I mention lobsters it is not only to invite all of you to come and share this gourmet delight, but to mention that my constituents have found new methods of shipping lobsters which put them on the tables of Europe daily as well as those of California and intervening areas. I say this to show that where we have a traditional resource or commodity which we can develop with self-promoted efforts, we can do so and will do so.

While some of the farming areas of Westmorland are advanced and prosperous, others are in urgent need of the kind of study and assistance which the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Administration is pursuing. I want to compliment the Minister for his aggressive efforts in ARDA and assure him that in no place more than New Brunswick will the Government's measures be of greater help or be more genuinely needed. If a war on poverty is to be fought, there is no better place to start the war than in our hard struck rural areas where people have just not had the chance of those in other places.

Small farmers make up a substantial part of our population in New Brunswick and this applies notably in my constituency. In the past farm policies have largely passed them by, while helping the bigger operators. They need feed grain assistance and cheap fertilizers. They also need a major change in the matter of animal subsidies. Benefits for quality rather than quantity might best serve the small farmer.

In this respect I might also mention rail freight rates because changes in the transportation structure must be made with a view to protecting our special Atlantic area needs. The Premier of Nova Scotia said recently that "railways here are relatively more important still than in the central part of the country". Not only do I concur in this but I must add that the changes which are to be made must get back to the original purpose of the Maritime Freight Rates Act. The City of Moncton, which is such an important part of my constituency, is of course closely concerned with railway matters. Mr. Grayston, the Vice President for the C.N.R.'s Atlantic region, has reported that 1964 was a record year for traffic in that area. Freight traffic was up 13 per cent over the previous year and passenger traffic was up by 10 per cent.

One of the most important developments has been the movement of ore from the mines and concentrator in the Bathurst area. This is but the beginning of massive developments in that part of New Brunswick which will continue to help the whole coast and will be of major importance to our railway centre and to our shipping ports.

I am pleased to compliment the C.N.R. management on its conclusion of an arrangement in Moncton by which a valuable and large commercial complex is to enhance the core of the city. This includes a major shopping centre, and the development of railway property which has been an eyesore to the city. Indeed, the C.N.R.'s downtown development program as a whole has restored to Moncton some of the character it had in earlier days of railroading, when the city owed its life to transportation.

Fortunately our economy is now much more varied, but distribution and retail trade remain our chief local industry.

We are of course much in need of productive industries and more employment opportunities. A chemicals complex is being developed by a Provincial agency within the constituency, at Dorchester Cape, and this is the kind of thing where the Atlantic Developmen Board can help. This is a superb location for Maritime Province distribution by water and land, and it is superbly situated for deep water shipping to Europe, the United States, South America and the newly emerging countries. Already major private chemical industries have completed agreements to establish on the site and construction is well advanced.

Atlantic Development Board assistance has made possible the start of the greatest power development yet undertaken in the Atlantic area. The actual power site is distant from Westmorland, but will serve the east coast area where our greatest resource industries are developing.

Mr. Speaker, I was honoured to be appointed to the House Pension Committee, especially because pensions are highly important to my constituency. We have a substantial proportion of aged, and there are special needs of those in middle age who require the protection of a sound national contributory pension plan.

While we have a large number of Federal and railway employees covered by pension plans, we have a much larger number of people, especially in rural areas, who have little or no coverage of any kind. Unlike the heavily industrialized parts of the country where private plans are more general, we must depend on a national system. As well as helping individuals, the Canada Pension Plan will improve the economy of our region, give a lift to consumer spending and help distribute the wealth of the country. I want to mention also the new Labour Code which will govern standards of wages, hours and holidays for employees within Federal jurisdiction. There are many in Westmorland who will benefit directly from this legislation and others who will do so indirectly as standards rise.

In particular, the emphasis in the code on the importance of technical training means much to our people. The Provincial Government has taken advantage, to a proportionate degree not exceeded anywhere in Canada, of the Federal assistance given for technical education. Five major technical schools are now operating, where one existed three years ago, and trade training schools are also established in appropriate areas. This kind of thing will, in the long run, be of greater value to us in New Brunswick than most projects which have been developed or discussed.

We have always been concerned about education, and the loan policy for university students reaches my part of Canada with special impact. Our young people have in the past been at a serious disadvantage, which is now being partially overcome.

I am proud to say that my constituency has within its boundaries two universities, that of Mount Allison at Sackville, which continues to produce outstanding graduates and to expand its services. Requests for admittance from Central Canada are higher than can be accommodated. The other institution of higher education is the new University of Moncton, which is the first integrated French language university in the province with requisite university facilities. This university is already having its effect on our city which will grow as it develops. Major new construction is under way and more is planned.

Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated that the constituency of Westmorland is a miniature of this country, with similar divisions of national origins, language and religions, and with a mixture of urban and rural population. It has such varied industries as fisheries, farming, lumbering, transportation, manufacturing, and now chemicals.

We have foundaries in Sackville, where stoves and furnaces have been made for more than a century, and which are now competing effectively with the most modern anywhere. I was interested to learn last Fall that they are even making components for United States aircraft companies. We also build boats in Westmorland and we have a major tourist trade which is growing constantly.

We have also a Federal penitentiary, and I am pleased to have noted the Minister's announcement last Fall of new facilities at Dorchester for maximum security prisoners. It will give employment during construction which will be helpful to the immediate area.

While I am in a thanking mood, I want to express also our appreciation for assistance which has been announced for a new crossing of our famous Petitcodiac River at Moncton. This river has a world phenomenon in its tidal bore—and I trust its only bore—which hon. Members would find fascinating on a visit.

Moncton has grown extensively in recent years and its over-the-river suburbs have created serious traffic problems. The river crossing is a direct route to the magnificent Fundy National Park, a major tourist centre. These and other considerations make an additional river crossing a vital economic necessity, so that I hope no delay will result in implementing the scheme.

Mr. Speaker, in recent months there has been an interesting discussion proceeding in the Atlantic Provinces about the subject of Maritime union. The Premier of New Brunswick raised the prospect in an appropriate place and at an appropriate time, upon the centenary of the Charlottetown Confederation meetings.

Discussions will start soon, which may one day lead to the union of the Atlantic Provinces. This is a far-sighted and imaginative scheme which may not be so distant as some believe. It may be more difficult than if it had been done a hundred years ago, when first attempted, but the economy of our day will in the end make it more logical and more feasible.

Already, we have achieved a good deal of co-operation in various ways; some of it economic co-operation and some of it social. This is almost certain to increase, and the very fact the central Government is treating the Atlantic Provinces as a unit through the Atlantic Development Board is an indication of the direction being taken.

Until all the factors concerned are studied deeply and widely, I would not want to take a firm position. I think that is the attitude of the Governments of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, which are now approaching the study.

It may well be that the first step toward complete union would be an economic union of the four Provinces. On the other hand, the first step may prove to be the union of the two largest Provinces, which will lead to a more complete union later.

I would be remiss as the representative of Westmorland if I did not at once claim my home City of Moncton as the capital of the future united Provinces. It is the geographic centre, the transportation and distribution centre, and will soon be the economic centre. Since, Mr. Speaker, there are almost certain to be other claimants, and perhaps some little debate over such a delicate decision, I rest my case at this point with the entry of Moncton as the logical candidate.

As I said in the beginning, we are an old part of Canada which is very much a part of the new Canada this Government is doing so much to build. A lot of this new spirit may be attributed to the Leader of this Government. No man understands this country better; none better knows its place in the world and what it can do in the world. We in this country are in what might well be called a reconstruction area.

There have been strains in our national fabric, but this is no new thing for Canada. As a federated country, we have never been without them, but strains do not need to result in tearing if the fabric is strong. Our basic fabric is strong, because our people are strong, because we have learned the value of weaving quality materials into the fabric—mixed materials which are the stronger for being different.

If ever there was danger of Canada flying apart—a condition to which I would not subscribe—that danger has been minimized by the Right Hon. Prime Minister. No man in our time is better fitted than he is for the diplomatic job of holding this country together and making it a great country. No man has had the courage to move as he has done to act on the convictions which he believes will cement our nationhood. As against those whose ambition is only to divide us—and to divide is to destroy—he has been a force for unity and hope. I am proud to be his follower and supporter. With him, and with his Government, the constituents who have sent me here may know that their future will be better than their past.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Jack A. Irvine (London): I should like to add my congratulations to those which have already been extended to the Mover (Mr. Cashin) and the Seconder (Mr. Chrétien) of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I congratulate them not only on the manner in which they expressed themselves but on their sincerity of purpose. I would be remiss if I did not congratulate, too, the hon. Member for Westmorland (Mrs. Rideout) on her maiden speech. I thought it was an outstanding contribution. I think I echo the sentiments of everyone in this House when I say we all admired and respected her late husband and the great contribution he made to this Parliament.

I understand it is usual for a Speech from the Throne to be couched in vague generalities. It seems to me the particular example we have before us is no exception to the rule. It would be more sensible and a lot easier, I think, if we were to talk not so much about what it contains as about the things which are left out. I realize that these speeches are prepared by the Cabinet. I know, also, that these individuals, who should be among the "Blue Bloods" of our Canadian society, would not stoop so low as to be partisan. However, I am concerned about some of the things which are contained in the Speech and I am wondering whether it does not contain a considerable proportion of election or pre-election propaganda.

I have listed the main points of the Speech, some 31 in all. Out of these 31 major points I failed to find any which had not been mentioned previously, either in the Speech of a year ago or in the Speech of two years ago, with the exception of nine. So I am bound to say that this is a nine-point Speech from the Throne, not a Speech containing 31 points as one might be led to believe by lists published in different places.

About two years ago at this time of year during the Federal election campaign a great deal was said across this country regarding a scheme to offer 10,000 scholarships. I am particularly interested in this undertaking because we have in my riding in the City of London one of the finest universities in the Dominion of Canada. All those connected with the University of Western Ontario are interested in this program. We are wondering what happened to this program. Why was it swept under the rug? Has there been another retreat on the part of hon. Members on the other side of the House? Is this another of the many election promises which have been broken? Was the Student Loan Fund considered sufficient to look after this need. As I say, we are all very interested in knowing exactly what happened to these 10,000 scholarships.

One thing which interested me a good deal in the Speech from the Throne was the paragraph on the formation of a Company of Young Canadians—I am quoting the actual words used. I do not know where this idea came from but I have begun to wonder whether it was not shoved in at the last moment. We know that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) was visiting with the President of the United States over the past week end. Was this the source of the Right Hon. Gentleman's inspiration, or was it merely an afterthought? It may be that the idea is a good one but I believe that Canadians, as befitting the people of a nation which has grown in stature, should surely come up with their own ideas or at least with their own phraseology.

I know we are all proud of the friendship we have with the great nation immediately South of us. We are proud that for 150 years we have lived together in peace and harmony. The border between us, an almost invisible border not guarded by guns or forts, has not separated our two peoples. Rather, we have been drawn close together almost as one great race on the North American continent. This is a record which I know is regarded with envy by many of the free nations throughout the world today and possibly by a number of nations which are not so free.

With regard to the youth movement to which the Speech from the Throne refers, we cannot help but look back 25 or 30 years and think of the great youth movement which Hitler established in Germany as a means of brainwashing children and bringing them up in accordance with the way of life which the people in power at that time wanted them to follow. There was a similar movement in Italy. Let us hope that this will be something on an entirely different plane and in an entirely different league.

I should like to direct the attention of the House to an article which appeared in the London Free Press, one of the largest newspapers in the Province of Ontario. This newspaper has a very large circulation and employs some 700 people. The article to which I refer appeared in that paper on March 13,

1965, a contribution from its Canadian Press service. It reads as follows:

> If Canada's "romance" with United States capital continues, the result could be a "shotgun political marriage," Beland H. Honderich, editor-in-chief of the Toronto Star, said yesterday in an address to U.S. and Canadian members of the International Press Institute here.
> Mr. Honderich said that while Canadians like U.S. people, they are also worried about them.
> "American cultural, economic and political influences so pervade our way of life that we have begun to wonder if our relatively small nation can retain its independence in face of strong pressures generated by our giant neighbour to the south."

I bring this to the attention of Hon. Members because it is of great concern to me and I am sure it must be of concern to every red-blooded Canadian. The report shows that through investment in Canada, Americans control 60 per cent of our petroleum industry, 52 per cent of our mining and smelting, 35 per cent of our pulp and paper, and 45 per cent of our manufacturing. This is a condition that should be of great concern to every Canadian. This is a very serious state of affairs.

Following this up, Mr. Speaker, I did not notice anything in the Throne Speech with regard to any future plans in trade and commerce. I am sure everybody here must be concerned about the imbalance of trade that we have with the United States, which runs into approximately $500 million a year; an unfavourable imbalance, I might say. Then we must take a look at some of the other countries, like Japan, Russia and China, where we have a very favourable trade balance. But some day, perhaps in the not too distant future, these nations are going to want from us a greater share of our import business. We have to now prepare something to correct these little differences and big differences that we have in the imbalance of trade. I think this puts us in a very bad light, unless we are prepared to do something about it now.

Recently we had tabled and delivered to each Member of this House the 1965 spending estimates. Sir, I am going to tell you that I was amazed to think there was such a great amount of money involved. The general amount is $7,400 million; but then we must add to this loans and investments and advances, which amount to another $202 million. We must add to that old age security payments of another $905 million. Then we must add to that the supplementary estimates that will be coming up during the fiscal year, and the total spending we will have during this fiscal year will be something in the neighbourhood of maybe a little more than $9 billion.

I am just wondering how long a small population of something less than 20 million people can stand this kind of spending. This represents $450 for every man, woman and child throughout this country of ours. Let us look back for a moment, Sir, to 1950 and the expenditures we had at that time. In 1950 our expenditures were $2,300 million, less than a quarter of what they are now; in 1955 they were $4,700 million; in 1960, $6,600 million; in 1963, $7,400 million. Sure we are growing; but are we growing that fast? Then in this year, 1965, the figure is approximately $9 billion.

Then, sir, if we look back to the national debt as of March 31, 1964, we find that it was something in excess of $15 billion. Let us just for a moment review the amount of interest on this debt, because we are in the position that we are ballooning our debts; we are paying interest on interest on interest. In 1950 the interest was $427 million; in 1963 it was $867 million, almost twice as much; in 1964 it was over $1 billion; and this year it is $1,101 million. Sir, I would say that this should be considered, not as a debt to be passed on to future generations but as a great, oppressive charge hanging over the heads of our taxpayers at the present time.

The business that we operate in this House is the biggest business in Canada, and as a businessman I ask this: How could any business, large or small, continue to operate and flourish with this type of management? We are now in an era of great prosperity. I am not going to say to anybody here that this prosperity started under the previous Administration, because the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) has made that quite clear. He said here—I cannot give the exact date—in about September or October of last year that the upswing started in 1960. So I will leave it with him. However, sir, I would say that on the basis of the great debt that we have, we should be setting aside so much every year to pay this off during these periods of prosperity, in order that we might come to the aid of the needy in times when perhaps things are not quite as good as they are today. There is no reason for us to have a feeling of confidence in the present Government's handling of our national accounts.

Mr. Speaker, in going over the Speech from the Throne, there is nothing in there to indicate that anything is going to be done about basic exemptions for income tax. I believe this was mentioned yesterday by one hon. Member. I think this is a very important matter because it is of great interest to those people who do not have quite as much as people who have a higher income. I am wondering if there is going to be a change announced in this regard perhaps a little later. Will this be held out and dangled in front of the electorate as a political plum? But this is a most ridiculous tax structure, when you stop to figure that a single girl or a single man pays tax on every cent he or she makes in addition to $21 per week; when you consider that a man may have to look after a family, as a married man, and pay tax on everything that he makes over $41 per week. Surely these people are entitled to an absolute minimum of $60 per week, in order that in this land of plenty they may live with a certain amount of dignity.

I would say, Sir, that these figures are old fashioned; they are antiquated, and were arrived at or accepted at a time when the value of the dollar was a great deal more than it is today. I think this is one of the lowest exemption foundations in the entire world. It is, I say again, unjust; it is unrealistic, and I would like to know when something is going to be done about it. I would also like to suggest that this exemption be raised for single people to $2,000 and for married people to $3,000. This would give them an opportunity to get a little bit ahead, that they might own their own homes and be good, respectable citizens of their respective communities.

I received a letter recently form the City Council of the City of London; the original was sent to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and a copy was sent to me as the Member for that city. For the benefit of those who are not acquainted with it, I would like to inform the House that the City of London is the finest city in the world, and certainly has the finest people in the world—or else I would not be here.

I am going to quote, if I may, just the main, meaty part of this resolution, which goes like this:

> Therefore be it resolved that the Federal Government be petitioned to amend the Income Tax Act to allow all municipal property taxes levied against owner-occupied residential property to be claimed as a deductible expense when filing income tax returns.

That is signed by the City Clerk of the City of London and was moved, seconded and accepted by the City Council. This, to me, Sir, seems to be a very sensible approach. Some years ago even Joseph Stalin said in one of his addresses that individual home ownership and individual enterprise makes it very difficult for Communism to make much headway or to gain much of a foothold on the North American continent.

This brings me back to an old pet subject of mine: What are we doing to assist the small businessman? I see nothing at all in the Throne Speech which will be of very great assistance to him. Certainly I hope there will be something in the Budget. The small operator gets smaller; the big operator gets bigger. As I said a moment ago, these people actually are, or should be, the backbone of our very democratic society.

Then, of course, these people are loaded down with all kinds of administrative duties, and many of them do not have sufficient help to look after these little details. They are things which cost them money and for which they get no compensation at all. First of all they have to make the deduction for unemployment insurance. They have to make the deduction for income tax. In some instances they have to make the deduction for the 11 per cent sales tax. Now starting in January 1966 the deduction will have to be made for the Canada Pension Plan payment. In many cases these firms are small with perhaps only 10, 15 or 20 employees; but out of their own treasury they have to hire an extra man to look after these details. If they are late in filing some of these returns they are fined. If they underpay through an honest error, they are fined for that. If they overpay, then eventually they are repaid, but with no interest. That is one of the strange things about these payments; it seems to me to be a one-way street.

I mentioned, Mr. Speaker, the deductions they will have to make under the Canada Pension Plan. I should like to make it clear, in the first instance, that I am very much in favour of a Canada Pension Plan, and let us say that the one we have set up is a good step in the right direction. But we must think of those not covered by the plan. Let us for a moment take the word "contributor" and analyse it. A contribution, to my way of thinking, is something you give voluntarily. This is not a contribution; this is something you must give, and therefore it becomes a tax. Then farther on in the Bill we find the words "in order that all people might live in dignity". Now, Mr. Speaker, not all people can do that because not all people are covered by the plan. How can a man making $3,000 a year live in dignity when, after paying into the plan until his retirement, all he qualifies for is a pension of $62 or $63? How can a family live in dignity on $62 or $63 per month? I sincerely hope there will be many amendments to this plan, and there must be if it is going to be the kind of comprehensive plan which the people of Canada envisaged, and which some of them still envisage. However, they are gradually becoming acquainted with what are the actual benefits.

I also mentioned deductions which had to be made in regard to the 11 per cent sales tax. I am not going to say too much about this because I spoke on this subject when the Bill was before the House, but I do think that it was a very unfair tax. I think it directly affects a very sensitive part of our general economy, and I hope and trust that this tax will not have a derogatory effect on our future business.

In 1962, Mr. Speaker, at the time when the then Government in power saw fit, in the interests of Canadianism, to devalue the Canadian dollar, there was a great hue and cry all across this country, asking why do such a thing, and imputing that making our dollar into a 92½ cent piece was a terrible thing to do. I fail to find, Mr. Speaker, any indication in the Throne Speech that there is going to be any change in this regard, and I am just wondering what has happened. If the then Opposition thought that that action was so bad and that we were committing such a crime then I say that today by not changing the situation they are simply compounding the felony. But there is no mention of that matter, Sir.

I should also like to mention one other very important item in connection with the Civil Service Commission. I have here a letter from a man—I will be very pleased to give his name and address if so desired—dated 19th September, 1964, which says in part:

> Many Civil Service employment competitions provide, through the Civil Service Act, a statutory preference for veterans. This I am led to believe applies only to those veterans who qualify under Overseas Service. In many cases during a national emergency, volunteers, through no fault of their own, possibly because of specialized skills and by orders of higher authority, were never posted outside of the country; this of course disqualifies them from the previously mentioned Veterans Preference. At the close of World War II these veterans, whose contribution to the war effort was as vital as many of those who served outside of the country, received less recognition through reduced gratuities. Is it fair that this discriminatory policy continue in employment opportunities?

I would say, Sir, that this Commission seems to be in need of a good general overhaul.

[Mr. Irvine.]

There is nothing in the Speech that indicates that the Government are even going to take a good hard look a it.

One other matter concerning which I saw nothing in the main estimates or in the Throne Speech is the plight of the retarded child. I went through the estimates pretty thoroughly and I found under the Department of National Health and Welfare that the Canadian Association for Retarded Children are going to receive a grant of $25,000. I contend, Sir, that this is grossly inadequate. It is just a mere drop in the bucket. Many of these children, with proper training and a little bit of spending on our part, could be brought up to be very useful citizens in our society. I would hope that that Department might take another good look at this question and perhaps do something in the future to help this very important work. Perhaps through the suggested Canada Assistance Plan the Government may take a look at this problem, and I hope they will come up with something which will be very worth while.

I have received, Mr. Speaker, a very heartbreaking letter, the sort of letter that Members of Parliament regularly receive, and I think it raises a very important matter, important to every person who is a Canadian. This gentleman writes to me under date March 10 as follows:

> I took my family to the U.S. Consulate, Windsor, January 26, 1965, to obtain our visas. My wife and daughter were examined together, Barry my son was examined separately from myself. He was asked by the medical officer what age he left school and was told 17 years. The doctor then asked what grade, and my son told him grade 5. The doctor asked Barry what 6 x 8 were and he answered 48. He also asked how many days there were in a year.

And the young lad told him 365. Then there was a delay for a while and the writer of this letter had to go and see the U.S. Consul. He continues:

> I was advised to get a letter from Mr. Mason at the Workshop. I also got a letter from our doctor. Mr. Speare from the Board of Education phoned the doctor at the U.S. Consulate and also wrote a letter. Mr. Speare has interviewed Barry and knows his capabilities.

Then further on in the letter, Sir, he says that he and his family were allowed entry into the United States but that his son, because of this incapacity of his, was not allowed entry into the United States. He was allowed to enter, Sir, but without a visa and he must come back every six months for one day.

I think this is something that we should work out with the United States authorities, perhaps on a reciprocal basis, so these young children, in many cases, can be with their families and enjoy the love to which they are entitled.

In closing I should also like to say that I am very serious about this subject. I am not going to say anything about certain bad odours which might pervade certain sections of this House. These are things that any good Canadian does not want pushed too much. We are all elected here as Members of Parliament and each of us has taken an oath, and each of us has certain responsibilities which we owe to this country and, in particular, to our ridings. However, everyone knows that an obligation is only as good as the man who assumes it, and unless he be honest and sincere, and unless he really places a high value on his word of honour, an obligation means absolutely nothing.

Since the inception of representative Government, it has been the idealistic ambition and general intention of individuals to elect to office men and women of honour who are believed to have a high sense of moral value. But conscience is like intelligence: It is very unequally developed among men and among women. This is an unfortunate thing, because perhaps their true sides can only be known to a few of their most intimate acquaintances.

One of the purposes of democracy, and a duty with which each Member of this House should be charged, is to guard against this naturally easy way out—apathy toward vital matters of national importance. For the first time in the history of man the conflict between pure intelligence and moral values has become a matter of life and death. As citizens of this great country of ours we are faced with the problem that life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness are ours for only as long as we protect them against the dangerous onslaught of a formidable enemy, and I think you all know to what I refer. This is an enemy who is without a conscience, who knows no morals and is fantastically obsessed with the purpose of destroying all men and all nations who do not subscribe to the forces of evil. This is our big challenge now facing us as Members of this House. Let us first be Canadians; and second, let us be politicians. Let us get on with the business of running this country, a country that each of us should be particularly proud to have the privilege of representing.

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commence by adding my words of congratulation to the Mover and Seconder of the Throne Speech.

It sounds platitudinous to say that the New Democratic Party is dedicated to a new national health plan, but one proof of the sincerity of this dedication is the leadership in both hospital and medicare plans introduced by our colleagues from Saskatchewan. The aspiration to a genuine national health arrangement is not unique to the New Democrats. It is clear, however, that alone among political parties we have the conception of a national health plan, Government-sponsored, comprehensive in both items, coverage and those covered.

The terms "medicare", "national health plan", and "Government-sponsored health plan" have been so bandied about by politicians, a royal commission, insurance companies, the Press and medical associations for so long that the health needs of Canadians have been nearly lost in verbiage. It is much like our search for a national identity. We have been so preoccupied with what we are not that we have lost sight of what we are, or what we should be.

In assigning guilt for our medicare confusion, the Liberal Party, the National Liberal Party, merits the largest measure. It is the most guilty of all because it has promised for the longest, has had the most opportunity to act and has done nothing. Again, in this Throne Speech of 1965, the rosy promise —vague, tantalizing and unsupported—has been resurrected. This strikes us as tawdry politics. Has not the government the advantage of the Hall Commission Report showing the need, the urgency and the right kind of medicare? Of course it has; but even so, the Liberal Party has not assumed the responsibility required by the Hall Report. One can imagine medicare as a nettle that the Liberal Party will parade around with on a platter but refuse, for the poorest of reasons, to grasp in hand and carry.

The Liberals have promised a Government-sponsored health plan since 1919. They have been in power 33 of the past 46 years. I have here a copy of the Toronto Star dated April 21, 1948, from which I should like to quote. This Liberal newspaper is so old that it may fall apart, just like the Liberal promises.

The article states:

Health insurance at once said plan of Premier King.

In the body of the article appears the following statement:

> The goal of the national health insurance and the social security scheme is that all Canadians will be covered by it and all Canadians will be contributing toward its cost.

This sounds very modern, much like what we are asking for today, but still we are waiting.

Another pamphlet that I should like to quote from is one that the Liberal Party itself brought out during its campaign in 1963, and which is entitled "The Policies of the Liberal Party". At page 15 appears an article entitled "Caring for Health".

Underneath that heading the following is stated:

> Establish, in co-operation with the Provinces, a medical care plan for all Canada.

It also states:

> The Liberal plan for student scholarships and loans will enable more people to become doctors.

Then it speaks of more people becoming doctors; but the student loan legislation brought out by the Liberal Government, because of its excessive costs and the longevity of the course—and of course there are still no scholarships—does not encourage students to study medicine.

Another 1963 Liberal publication is entitled "Health Care as Needed", and sets out a promise for prepaid care, which is available to everyone, on terms which everyone can afford. It says that all Canadians should be able to get health care at the time they need it, without the anxious fear of bills they cannot afford. Again, this was very modern in its conception and is related to something that has been going on since 1919. But it is still nothing but a promise.

In June of 1964 the Hall Royal Commission Report on Health Services was tabled in the House of Commons. Even its most urgent recommendations have thus far been ignored. There have been many promises, and more thousands of words, but still no action has been taken. The Minister who should be responsible talks a good game on medicare. We suspect she has thought out the course ahead and has had the tactical ability to foul it up, even more adequately than she did the National Pension Plan. From the original promise of 1919 to the "health care at once" of 1948, to the party platform in 1963 and to the words in the House of Commons in 1964 and 1965, how does one go about orientating oneself in these Liberal semantics?

• (4:50 p.m.)

The New Democratic Party has always stood very clearly for an all-inclusive, completely comprehensive, compulsory, Government-sponsored national health plan. The plan includes doctors' care, dental care, drugs, glasses and prosthetic appliances. It postulates increased educational facilities for doctors, nurses and technicians, for preventive medicine and badly needed research facilities. The New Democratic Party stands firmly in support of all these provisions. We stand firmly against high cost partial plans, against deterrent fees and particularly against the indignity of means testing.

I should like to take the Hall Commission Report and quote from the actual charter set out in the Report:

> The achievement of the highest possible health standards for all our people must become a primary objective of national policy and a cohesive factor contributing to national unity, involving individual and community responsibilities and actions. This objective can best be achieved through a comprehensive, universal, health services program for the Canadian people implemented in accordance with Canada's evolving constitutional arrangements, based upon freedom of choice and upon free and self-governing professions and institutions, financed through prepayment arrangements, accomplished through the full co-operation of the general public, the health professions, voluntary agencies, all political parties, and governments, federal, provincial and municipal, directed toward the most effective use of the nation's health resources to attain the highest possible levels of physical and mental well-being.

Within this report, however, there are certain recommendations considered to be urgent enough that the Commission advised their implementation within six months of the tabling of the Report. They are as follows:

1. A Federal-Provincial conference. This is what the Government now suggests in the Speech from the Throne 10 months after the report was tabled, in which it was said that this was something urgent that should be done within the first six months. We should be working on the recommendations of such a conference instead of discussing its inclusion in the Throne Speech.

2. The inclusion of mental and t.b. care under the Hospital and Diagnostic Services Act.

3. A crash program of health personnel training and education.

4. A children's dental program.

5. The provision of services to crippled and mentally retarded children.

6. Expansion of the Medical Research Council into a Health Sciences Research Council.

The urgency of these steps was stressed. It has been underlined again and again by Mr. Justice Hall. Nine and a half months later no action on any of these urgent matters is yet in sight. In its more specific recommendations the Report goes on to stress the following necessities: First, crash programs to provide personnel, hospitals, research into mental illness and retardation, drug addiction and alcoholism; a long list of medical services, including medical, surgical, maternity, preventive, ambulance, etc.; dental personnel, facilities and free care for children and expectant mothers and the fluoridation of municipal water supplies; the removal of the 11 per cent sales tax on drugs and the provision of prescription drugs over $1; free optical services for all, including free glasses for children; greater facilities, scholarships and salary funds for all phases of medical education, and vastly increased medical research funds, which recommendation, incidentally, has been echoed strongly by the Medical Research Council.

The Report recommends strongly against partial, non-compulsory plans, against means testing and against deterrent fees. Yet, Mr. Speaker, in the presence of these urgent recommendations this Government is standing by and watching Province after Province come up with schemes which this report has so strongly recommended against. It is hard to blame the Provinces for this variety, this developing crazy quilt. Why? Because the Federal Government continues to abdicate its responsibilities.

To this date, half the Provinces of Canada have established or announced plans for establishing their own medical care schemes. Under the C.C.F., Saskatchewan set up the first and only universal, comprehensive, medical care scheme, now functioning well and covering 99.8 per cent of its population. This scheme would readily fit into a comprehensive Federal plan. Alberta's plan, better known as "minicare", fails to cover the low income groups which need it most. It employs a form of means test and the benefits supplied are minimal. Both Ontario and British Columbia have given up waiting for Federal action and have outlined plans for coverage similar to Alberta's, again with a means test and a subsidy to those unable to pay premiums. Needless to say, the private insurance companies are delighted. They will now have Government subsidized profits. Most recently Quebec has announced its intention to establish its own health scheme. In at least three Provinces, Alberta, Ontario and British Columbia, the schemes are or will be such as to conflict seriously with a Federal, universal, comprehensive plan. The Government's delaying tactics have only intensified the problem.

What a fantastic anachronism that anyone today should suffer the indignity of a means test. Such a concept extends both indigency and indignity in providing our fellow Canadians with charity. Ask yourself the question: Should there be a means test in education other than the means test of ability? Of course not, and it is even less defensible in health. Our fellow Canadians do not want charity. They simply want the advantages of the best medical treatment.

For now, for the future, is quality medical treatment only for those with the financial means to afford it? This is the present attitude of medical associations in North America. It seems to be, for the want of a clear expression of intent, the present policy of the Government.

What are the barriers which prevent the full institution of the recommended national health services program? I believe there are two. Each is a pressure group, a lobby, an influence against coherent, constructive change.

First there are the private insurance companies. No one in politics nor in the insurance game has ever denied that the two old parties get much of their financial support from them. I should like to quote from statements made by such company spokesmen when the Hall report was tabled. Remember that the predecessors of these men opposed the first old age pension plan, unemployment insurance and government directed hospital insurance. Mr. G. L. Holmes, the manager of the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company, said:

> I don't like anything to be given free to people if they can pay for it or part of it. This is what happened to hospital insurance and now people are using hospitals too much. We will all have to pay increased taxes.

J. T. Bryden, Vice President of the North American Life Assurance Company, said:

> I do not agree with the philosophy of full medical care for all out of the public purse. Each citizen should shoulder his own responsibilities.

Vice President T. E. Gill of the London Life Insurance Company said that a medicare plan would just be another strain on the economy and that private enterprise can do the job cheaper. Vice President W. J. Adams of the Canada Life Assurance Company said that he doubted that the government could finance medical care cheaper than private companies, and that the universal hospital insurance scheme had cost four or five times more than was originally anticipated. It is obvious where the interests of these people lie.

The second and stronger source of opposition to a genuine national health porgram is the doctors themselves and their associations. Doctors arguing against a medicare plan consistently reveal only selfish motives rather than concern for public needs. A Globe and Mail editorial puts it this way:

> Many persons have become suspicious of doctors' opinions in this matter, believing that in some cases their self-interest may outweigh their humanitarian principles.

The most frightening aspect of doctors' intransigence is the blindness of doctors to logical trends within their own profession. And by their blindness they also set themselves apart from and superior to all other professions. For example, is there any greater responsibility for integrity and dedication than that of the teaching profession? Relative to doctors, have teachers failed in a professional sense to adjust their functions and ideals to developing society? I do not think so. Yet teachers have done their work almost universally in Canada under the protective guidance of government administration, both municipal and provincial. There is nothing in this contention of organized medicine, that a Government-sponsored comprehensive plan is innately destructive of their professional ethics. And, of course, Saskatchewan in a short time has proved it is not a blight on their pocketbooks.

Another aspect of doctors' astigmatism is their inability to see how the development of "clinic" medicine and the enlargement of hospital services have been in response to the doctors' own refusal to carry on with the old idea of the all-purpose doctor working alone. In co-operation with the multi-division of responsibility has come advances in research, technique, quality, and much better working conditions for doctors.

The doctors rehash the old argument of quantity rather than quality as a real danger in our projected health program. This is an admission that the needs of the people are greater than we are able to supply at present. How will they meet this ideal? The only answer seems to be by the vagaries of the market's attractiveness to potential doctors and dentists.

Does this mean that only those who can afford it should get the latest and best treatment? Does this mean that we have two classes of citizens, and that second class citizens do not deserve the best of care? This may have been great, believable stuff in the old days of Queen Victoria when the theory was that the poor are always with us. It is indefensible today.

[Mr. Howe (Hamilton South).]

Rather than restrict the care of these people, would it not be more to the point to provide more facilities for the education of doctors, so that we can provide full care for all who need it? Evidently this Government does not think so. Replying to a question on September 16, 1964, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) indicated that, in view of the fact that any new medical school would take eight years to produce doctors, "this matter will have to wait for an announcement on over-all Government policy". How does one follow such negative reasoning?

Doctors speak of potential excessive demand for services. Would the demand really be excessive? Is this not simply an admission that present care is inadequate?

It is my considered opinion that present methods, costs and facilities, do not allow everyone to get the medical care that is necessary. If they were provided as they should be, one could not consider such usage as "excessive demand".

So, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I would like to say that any Government that is genuinely responsible to the people it serves cannot do less than this: to give them the most basic of all services in a way that does not grant charity, that does not destroy human dignity, and provides the best in modern medical care to all who are ill. Surely this is the least that can be done.

This can only be done by a Government-sponsored, universal medical care program, not eight years from now, not four years from now, but immediately. Procrastination, the refusal to care and dare, eternal compromise; these are qualities that have become the fetish of Liberal politicians in the health field. The New Democratic Party insists it is not good enough.

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Beauharnois-Salaberry): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to take part in this debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and I would be remiss if I failed to congratulate the mover (Mr. Cashin) and the seconder (Mr. Chrétien). They carried out their task magnificently and did honour to their constituents.

[Text]

I also wish to congratulate the hon. Member for Westmorland (Mrs. Rideout) on the marvellous maiden speech she made this afternoon.

• (5:10 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in view of the great number of measures proposed to us in the speech from the throne, we cannot but rejoice and also congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and his cabinet for preparing such a wide and far reaching program. We see there an indication that the government does not want to shirk its responsibilities and after two years in office it shows its vigour and determination to tackle all problems. Everyone seems to agree that Parliament has a tremendous amount of work to do and yet all are unanimous in saying that almost all the proposed measures are necessary and urgent.

Once again the present government shows that it is a responsible government and it challenges all hon. members to face up to their responsibilities and, for the general good of the country, to pass without delay this session's program.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) called the speech from the throne an "election manifesto", stating further that it was full of "nebulous promises" taken from previous election platforms and even from other countries. Personally, I do not need to know who are the promoters of some of those measures; I am only interested in seeing them there, included in a program soon to be implemented by an active, even though a minority government, anxious to serve the best interests of the country by carrying out in a responsible way the mandate given to it following the last general election. The press generally had been rather critical of the government in the last few months, accusing it of inaction, backtracking and indecision. But it was comforting last week end to read the comments about the results achieved in the past two years.

It is much to the credit of the Prime Minister, a man who is recognized as an authority on international affairs and who every day shows that he has all the qualities of a great statesman when it comes to solving our domestic problems. Some do not like his method; they would like him to make more noise and indulge in great controversies as some others do. But we, who are close to him, cannot but appreciate the kindness and humanity he brings to the study of great and small problems and rejoice to see the results he achieves.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that the very basis of that heavy legislative program is one of the measures included in it, namely the reform of the parliamentary procedure and the adoption of some recommendations made to the house by the committee on procedure and organization. These changes would certainly result into a more expeditive dispatch of the business of the house, and indirectly they would give us the opportunity to show the people that we are able to carry out the business of government as real administrators, without for all that jeopardizing democracy. I hope that this reform will include a suggestion I made in the house on July 15 last to allow the members who wish to do so, to leave their speeches with the Clerk so that they may be taken as read as it is done in Washington.

It is a custom with which the house is not completely unfamiliar since this occurs regularly when the ministers ask for the unanimous consent of the house to table answers which are too long or in the case of long statements.

This way we would avoid a prolonged debate and a continuous repetition of arguments after a number of speeches.

At the time the right hon. Leader of the Opposition said that my proposal was ridiculous under a British-inspired parliamentary system, but I am entirely at variance with him, especially since we already have a few restrictions and limitations. The debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne is limited and so is the speaking time allocated to each member. Occasionally, we also limit the duration of certain debates on the consensus of all the various parties. Why should we not be free to change our rules? Why balk at evolution? The Leader of the Opposition is considered as a parliamentarian of great experience but he should not, by refusing his consent to a change in the standing orders, run the risk of finding himself practically isolated here some day.

Many young members have come here full of enthusiasm and you can be certain that the long debates of the last session and the complexity of our parliamentary system are such that some of them wonder how long they will continue to belong to a Government organization which is too often more disappointing than satisfactory.

Mr. Speaker, during the forthcoming months we will continue to hear the voice of those who claim that the present government wants to destroy confederation and divide Canada, but I am satisfied that their number is decreasing constantly. The population realizes increasingly that our government has assumed its responsibilities with regard to the problem of Canadian unity and has already asserted unequivocally its intention to do its utmost to develop a better understanding between the two founding nations. The Laurendeau-Dunton commission has not yet found a magic formula, but its recent report is a warning to those who pursue an ostrich-like policy and attach no great importance to the urgency of finding a solution which would bring all Canadians closer together. Following the recent hearings of the commission in Montreal and Toronto, we have noticed an improvement over last year's situation and the various briefs submitted are an indication that the people as a whole are more conscious of bilingual and bicultural problems and of the importance of a dialogue. Let the Laurendeau-Dunton commission pursue its task, let us stop criticizing it, and let us be confident that 1967 will be noted for this sense of unity and understanding which is everyone's wish.

The dialogue is open at the level of the people; it is making great progress at the level of the federal and provincial governments where the responsibilities are scrutinized and where the fiscal problem is being considered thoroughly.

During that time we are all evolving toward a greater Canadianism which takes into account each one's claims. This is the best safeguard against some dangers referred to by opponents of the formula for repatriation of the constitution. I believe it represents a first step which will serve as a basis for the development of this constitutional agreement between the ten Canadian provinces. I do agree that the British North America Act must be rejuvenated, and this as soon as possible, but between this and saying that a new constitution can be written overnight, there is quite a margin, and I am inclined to believe that words are easier than deeds.

I wish to congratulate Mr. Faribault and Mr. Fowler for their recent essay on the constitution entitled "Ten for One". Their proposals may offer a basis on which other constitutional experts could continue the dialogue and finally put forward ideas which will give our governments the way to find a solution. It should, however, be recognized that Canada presently is changing at a dizzy speed and that some ideas expressed today are often made obsolete the day after by events and numerous problems that arise. This is why I am rather inclined to believe we are presently writing the new constitution, that we are in the process of writing it every day and that our rapid evolution will lead us to a position where we may more easily agree on most of the provisions which may define the jurisdictions, the responsibilities, each other's rights and the sharing of taxation powers. I agree with the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska when he says, and I quote:

> An entirely new draft of the 1867 act appears to me, at the moment, when everything is under discussion, where everything is fluid, not only impossible, but dangerous. Even if co-operative federalism does not reject it for the future.

Theorists in constitutional matters do not agree on the formula for repatriation, but I place my trust in our Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) and the experts from the ten provinces who, after lengthy consultations, have agreed upon an amending procedure which will allow us to Canadianize the B.N.A. Act. The dialogue is opened on the evolution of Canada, and it will become livelier as soon as we show our good will by making this first step which is a start toward the adoption of a new constitution or the improvement of the present one.

Those who do not have any responsibility for the affairs of this country may very well advance many theories. The time for intransigence no longer exists; we must trust one another and we must not neglect the advantages of a gradual evolution which will lead us toward better results without upheaval or turmoil.

In his speech, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition tried to ridicule the Government position, he put the emphasis on the differing views of those who do not approve the Fulton-Favreau formula. And yet, he has not given any indication as to whether he supported all the views of those people, and even less, whether he had the confidence of those people on this problem of national unity. Our Prime Minister has proven more than once his concern for this problem of national unity and he has shown his sincerity in bringing about these measures which, in the long run, will strengthen Canada.

I admit that the adoption of a distinctive national flag will not solve all our problems, no more than the adoption of "O Canada" as our national anthem, but, there, we have the recognition of our sovereignty; those are small things that play on our heart strings and prepare us for a better dialogue. Those symbols are factors of unity which Canadians will increasingly endorse while trying in an exchange of views to understand and appreciate each other better.

On April 1, 1965, in the British House of Commons, Prime Minister Harold Wilson said and I quote:

Nobody here has the monopoly of concern—

Those words apply especially well to the members of this house. Some could surely ponder over this sentence, because the opposition seems to feel sometimes that it is the sole depository of the truth, the only one to see things clearly and to be qualified to pass judgment on Canadian as well as on international problems.

Well, on the Government side, we put action before words. Our achievements up to date show it and the speech from the throne is a still more tangible proof. It covers everything, from international affairs to the war against poverty, from the repatriation of the constitution to a public assistance plan, from the creation of a science council to measures intended to increase sharply the income of our farmers, from assistance to depressed areas to increased assistance to workers displaced by automation; I could go on for quite a while.

All these measures are considered realistically; none will be taken on the sly. Some of them, however, call for negotiations with the provinces and the speech from the throne is a clear indication that it is the intention of the Government to keep on improving the methods and practices governing federal-provincial relations, so that all Canadians can feel they get their fair share out of confederation. This means that we want to intensify our talks with the provinces and seek solutions with them.

• (5:20 p.m.)

[Text]

Mr. Speaker, quite disappointing, of course, is that program of action to some of the Members of the Opposition and to their party. The Conservative amendment did not take anyone by surprise. What else could they say? They did not succeed in five years in giving our country any good leadership, and they cannot suffer any action by others which pinpoints more precisely their inaction during those five years.

I was more surprised by the subamendment from the New Democratic Party Leader. He surely has noticed in the Speech from the Throne "the intention of the Government to meet with the Provinces in order to discuss with them the way in which Federal and Provincial action can most effectively contribute to programs that will provide health services to Canadians on a comprehensive basis". Is this not an indication of positive action to be taken afterwards by the Federal Government in view of giving the lead in that field toward a solution that could be approved by the Provinces? We succeeded in making the Pension Plan a national one because of consultation, and it could not be otherwise for any medicare program.

The speech of the Hon. Member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) gave me the definite impression that he does not approve of consultation with the Provinces. This is quite a different attitude from that of the Leader of his party in the Province of Quebec, Mr. Robert Cliche. Mr. Cliche in all his recent speeches takes the attitude that he is promoting a complete dialogue with the Provinces, and he tries very hard to show himself as the great defender of Provincial autonomy. If the National Leader of the New Democratic Party expresses opinions the way he did yesterday toward consultation with the Provinces in regard to the repatriation of the Constitution and concerning the establishment of a national, complete health insurance program, we are inclined to have doubts about his whole attitude toward Federal-Provincial conferences.

Taking these facts into account, I come to the conclusion that his subamendment is not less than a vote of confidence on the whole principle of consultation with the Provinces and also a vote against the positive actions of this Government in that field. Because of the principle involved, Mr. Speaker, this subamendment should be defeated by a roaring majority.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the government is setting steadily to work again and its forward looking policy does not make it forget the present issues. It is endeavouring to co-ordinate all efforts to make Canada a united, strong and prosperous country, where poverty will be enemy number one. It wanted its operations to rest upon a dialogue and we are now faced with a subamendment that condemns, in itself, the principle of true federal provincial relations. We owe it to ourselves to defeat it with an overwhelming majority, in the hope that the members of the party that moved it will realize that they still do not understand the problem of Canadian unity.

The Address—Mr. H. M. Horner

[Text]

Mr. H. M. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, I, too, want to add my congratulations to the hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) and the hon. Member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien) for their contribution in opening the debate on the Speech from the Throne. I want particularly to pick up a segment of the speech of the hon. Member for St. John's West in a minute and dwell on it for a little while. But first of all I want to make a few general remarks with regard to the Speech from the Throne.

It seems to me that this is a Speech which came out of the Liberal Univac machine or computer. It seems to me that they went around with their mandarins and their eggheads, had some questions asked and put the answers into a computer. There is a little bit of doubt as to where the computer is located; whether it is here in Ottawa or in Washington. It would seem that this Speech from the Throne is, sort of, the left-over breakfast from President Johnson's Great Society Campaign. It is a little bit sad to think that the Liberal Party could not devise some sort of platform for Canada that was not based on Americanism, that was not brought up and hatched in our neighbour to the South.

It seems to me that this Speech from the Throne, as others have said before me, is remarkable for what it has left out; it is remarkable in that it has not done anything or has not suggested anything to cure the rampant Liberal inflation that we have at all times with a Liberal Government. The cost of living is rising faster than ever before. There is the intractable position of the Government in refusing to remove the 11 per cent sales tax on the one hand, while on the other we see Ministers trying to encourage production in Canada, and export trade. Yet this Government persists in penalizing our manufacturers and penalizing the producers in Canada with this most atrocious tax. It seems to me that we are providing for low prices to primary producers, and this coupled with rising inflation and the cost of living has left our primary producers in Canada in a sorry state indeed.

Also, Mr. Speaker, they do not say anything in their Throne Speech as to what they are going to do about the economic situation in this country. They seem to be preoccupied with the cultural and welfare aspects and fail to realize that somebody has got to pay for it, somewhere, some time. Our friends in the Social Credit Party have been true to form. The hon. Member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson), who at the Christmas recess said he was going to topple this corrupt Government unless they did something about reorganizing their Cabinet, now comes before us and in his speech on six occasions commends this Government. They were the ones who were going to topple this Liberal machine. Then, of course, we have our friends in the New Democratic Party. I think they are going to go along with the Government, too.

[Mr. Laniel.]

I would like to quote very briefly from the Globe and Mail of this morning, "Looking Into Business", by Fraser Robertson. I think it is rather a good way to start on the criticism of this Throne Speech, this Univac attempt to gather votes. He starts out like this:

> Any businessmen who had maintained until yesterday a conviction that business could be carried on as usual in Canada, or even businessmen who had lingering hopes that the entrepreneurial system based upon a market economy could survive in this country, surely must know better now that the Government has presented its legislative program to Parliament...
> The wording is slightly different, but the measures are lifted almost intact from the manifesto of the New Democratic Party.

Then he goes on to make reference—and this is important—to the changes in rules and the procedural improvements which might be brought in, and I think all of us should keep in mind what he has to say in this regard:

> Cynics might interpret that as a declaration that debate and criticism of Government measures is tolerable only if it does not impede passage of what the Government proposes.
> The moral of this so far has largely been missed by business. It is that opposition to Government proposals, no matter how soundly based upon experience, largely is a waste of time.

Is that what we are coming to in our new rules changes? Is it going to be a waste of time to bother even opposing what a Government is going to insist upon? So we have this "Univac" Throne Speech, thrown out not to help the country but to try and improve the political image of the Government. We have a welfare approach to an attack upon poverty, but this welfare approach to poverty cannot be anything more than a stopgap. Production in Canada must pay for the welfare. There is precious little in this Speech for the people who are paying the bills.

I am going to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the Government has been wrong in its approach to this problem, not only now but perhaps for a long time. For years we have been trying the welfare approach. This is fine, and it meets immediate needs and ameliorates suffering. But it does not do anything about the basic problem. What about the one million jobs we are going to require? What about the jobs we need now? What about our productive capacity? What about medicare?—and I will have something more to say about that in a minute. What about ARDA? Whatever happened to the words the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) often used two or three years ago—"boldness", "imagination"? They are strangely lacking in this Speech.

I am convinced there is another answer to the problem. There is another position which the Government should take with regard to these problems. I do not believe that a "Big Daddy" type of Governmental system, in which the Government has to sit on the people like a setting hen on her chicks, will ever produce a great Government or make a great country out of us. We are so far behind in research and development in Canada that this minor item in the Speech from the Throne about a Scientific Council is like a drop in a pool of water. I do not mean we need any larger bureaucracy; Heaven's above, we have enough now. We have too many bureaucrats and we have precious little action. The Economic Council which this Government set up has cost a lot of money in order to provide some advice which the Government has largely ignored. We are losing right now, as mentioned by the hon. Member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas), $2.8 billion a year in lost production.

What do we need in Canada? What should the Government's approach be? In my opinion we have to go back to what was said by the hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) in his opening address. What is really needed is some kind of drastic action like that which motivated us during wartime. There is no drastic action in this Speech. I am suggesting that we should think about having a $2 billion research fund which could be spent over the next five years to help business to pay for this welfare program. We need research and development.

The hon. Member for Hamilton South (Mr. Howe) talked about a medicare program. I want to remind him that the major difficulty with the teaching profession is that they are all like square pegs in round holes. The difficulty with our educational system is that merit pays and individual initiative is forgotten. If we are going to have quality medical care let us not forget about individual initiative, because as both you and I know, Mr. Speaker, so well, we will not have quality medical care without it.

What do we need before we achieve all this? We need a tremendous amount of regulation in Canada. We need a tremendous amount of money put into educational facilities to make available the medical personnel and technicians who are going to give this kind of care to all Canadians. Apparently the Government have no recognition of some of the problems which have to be looked into before we can achieve our objectives.

We in this Party have always stood for a national medicare plan based on freedom —freedom of the people who are providing the service and freedom of the patient to go to whom he pleases to get the service. We need tremendous amounts of funds to be made available to our universities and private enterprise for research into medical fields. This will do two things right away. It will provide the jobs which we need now and it will keep more of our best brains at home in Canada where they can do this type of research.

We also need research into our national resources. We need research into the matter of production, into the matter of marketing, into the matter of land use. We have had a Committee study land use, yet we know very little about the productive capacity in Canada of any of our soils. People talk about a population explosion, yet we are ignorant of what this really means in Canada. So this Government comes along with another welfare approach, instead of putting some money into a program of development and research which could stir up the country and do something to provide the one million jobs we are going to require very shortly. This research would provide some jobs immediately and would set the pattern to give us the one million jobs we are going to need in the next few years.

Coupled with this research we need development. I know the Liberal Party has been a stagnant party and does not like development. Their Members voted against a railway in Northern Alberta. They do not seem to think that this type of development is worth while. This is where government should be involved in initiating development and research, in getting private companies to go to work—because they are the people the Government is asking to pay the bills. We cannot keep taking a welfare approach to the question of poverty, because in the long term this will solve nothing. You can pay pensions and you can provide medical services, but unless you are going to provide the initiative for the great majority of Canadians to get out and develop the country then you are not going to have the money or the material wealth to undertake all of these welfare programs which everyone would like to see.

Very briefly, Sir, we need development along other lines in this country, and this Speech from the Throne is totally lacking in any of these directions. We need development of our human resources. We need some studies made with regard to leisure time and other social problems. We need development of our transportation system and research into transportation. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) has gone part way in this connection with his announcement the other day about airports. But we need more than that in Canada. We need landing rights for Canadian Pacific Air Lines in other cities in Canada, particularly Calgary and Edmonton. If we are to continue to be able to afford some of these welfare measures we need further development of our trade and marketing apparatus. We will have to get up off our fannies again and produce and package, market and sell. I do not see anything in this Speech from the Throne which will help us to do this.

The Speech from the Throne deals with international affairs. The best way that Canada can contribute to international affairs, in my opinion, is by setting an example here at home. Before we go rushing off into spheres into which we should not be, we should clean up our own backyard.

We need development in immigration. We need people in this country if we are going to develop our resources and have an adequate standard of living for all. We cannot do that through welfare projects. We cannot do that by adopting the superficial Univac political approach which this government has taken.

There is no doubt in my mind that we will support the subamendment because we have lost all confidence in this Government. They have bungled, they have led us up the garden path and they are completely inept as far as developing the country is concerned. We have no room in Canada for the Socialism of the Liberal Party; because with that Socialism we will have stagnation, and instead of raising the standard of living of the people of this country it will go down, because we will not be able to afford all these delightful welfare services which this Government would like to promise.

[Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson).]

We need responsibility in Government and we should like to think that this Government would provide some leadership, but I am afraid there is no leadership there. There has not been any leadership provided by this Government for the great majority of the people in Canada who are paying the bills. This Government has not even suggested that it is going to do something about these problems. If we are not going to have production, if we cannot have employment and if we cannot have development, then we are not going to go very far, and we would be far better to take the $2 million and set up a research program.

The Department of Industry is not doing anything at this time. It could take over this research program and put it into effect through private establishments and we would then have a real start toward the development of this country. We must have this research and we must have it immediately, not only in respect of medical sciences but in respect of agricultural development and many other things. Let us stop putting the cart before the horse and return to some basic reasoning in this country, because we cannot continue to adopt welfare projects as a solution to poverty. Such a course will stagnate this country and will in the long run increase poverty.

Mr. Speaker, as you can see, I have lost any feeling that there is any semblance whatsoever of responsibility on the part of this Government. We therefore have no alternative but to kick them out and get back on the right road for the development of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being 5.45 p.m. it is my duty pursuant to section 3 of Standing Order 38 to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put the question on the subamendment now before the house.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, April 8, 1965

The House met at 11 a.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF PUBLIC BILLS ON ORDER PAPER

Mr. Speaker: As hon. members will have noticed, there are on today's order paper almost 100 public bills listed for introduction by private members. It would be difficult if not impossible for the Chair to review the provisions of these bills at this time. In view of that fact, may I suggest to the House that we adopt the procedure which was agreed upon by the House in the past two sessions, namely that we proceed to the introduction and first reading of these bills so that each may be scrutinized between now and the time appointed for second reading in order to determine whether there be any defect therein with respect to the practices and usages of the House.

Therefore, in order to save the time of the House, taking into consideration that perhaps more than two hours would be required to introduce each of these measures separately, it is suggested that, by unanimous consent, all the bills listed for introduction on today's order paper be deemed to have been introduced, given first reading and ordered for second reading at the next sitting of the house, subject of course to a subsequent examination as to the regularity of each bill.

Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BICULTURALISM AND BILINGUALISM

SURVEY OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT BY ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister now be in a position to make a reply to the questions which were asked by the hon. Member for Mackenzie and the hon. Member for Marquette regarding the questionnaire of the B and B Commission, containing as it does a variety of questions which are none of the business of the B and B Commission?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, immediately after the orders of the day yesterday, when I left the House I got in touch through my office with the Commission and asked them, as indeed I had before, for information on which to base a reply to this question. I was assured this morning when I phoned them just before coming into the House that a reply was being forwarded, but I have not received it yet. However, I will do so, and I apologize to my hon. friend for the delay.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I understand, Mr. Speaker, that these things happen, but I do hope the Prime Minister will be in a position to answer tomorrow, because what has taken place in this questionnaire challenges the entire jurisdiction of the B and B Commission.

GRAIN

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF PRICING POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, a week ago today, during the previous session, I asked the Prime Minister whether he would be able to make any announcement regarding the Government's wheat pricing policy before the farmers began their seeding operations. At that time the Prime Minister indicated that he hoped he would be able to make a statement during the course of the next few days, and I am wondering whether the Prime Minister is now ready to make that statement.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have discussed this matter with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and perhaps he is now in a position to make a short statement on the matter.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have looked up the dates on which the announcement of an initial price has been made in the past, and I have found that it is not usual for such statement to be made so early in the year. Last year it was made on June 17. The previous year it was made on July 24, and the year previous to that on August 7; for 1961-62 on July 6, and for 1960-61 on July 19.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question. Am I to take it from the Minister's statement that there is no change in policy for the coming crop year, and that the Minister will merely be announcing an initial payment and will not be announcing any guaranteed final payment?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, this is a most improper question on orders of the day. When government policy is formulated it will be announced. I do not accept the implications of the question.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF COMMISSION ON TAXATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I wonder whether the Prime Minister has any word for the House as to the expected date of the report of the Royal Commission on Taxation, particularly in view of the fact that we can expect the Budget shortly after Easter?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): I am not able to be specific on this, Mr. Speaker. I am hoping that the report will be ready some time this summer.

PROVINCIAL OWNERSHIP OF SHARES IN CHARTERED BANKS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance a question.

Can he tell us if the provinces were prohibited from acquiring shares in chartered banks as a result of protests from the present chartered banks against the Bank of British Columbia?

Can the minister tell us if some provinces protested against the federal government prohibiting the provinces from acquiring shares in chartered banks?

• (11:10 a.m.)

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is a long and complicated subject. I am hoping that legislation to revise the Bank Act will be introduced very early in this session and that there will be an opportunity to examine and discuss this particular matter in detail to the full satisfaction of my hon. friend.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance.

Can he tell us how many provinces protested against this decision of the federal Department of Finance?

[Text]

Mr. Gordon: The correspondence I have had with one province has been tabled, and to my knowledge that is the only correspondence we have received.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I should like to ask the Minister, in view of his statement that this is a long and complicated subject, whether he has given any consideration to the introduction of an interim bill which would extend the charters of chartered banks for another year.

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, I think if we are able to proceed with the revision of the Bank Act soon that will not be necessary. If, on the other hand, it appeared that it would take longer than one might hope to deal with that legislation, then of course it would be necessary to ask the house to approve a bill extending the bank charters for another year or for some other period of time. I am sure all hon. members will agree that we do not want the banking system in the country to come to a stop.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SPEECH BY U.S. PRESIDENT RESPECTING SOUTHEAST ASIA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs asking him when he, as the responsible Minister, first became aware of the plan that was placed before the people of the United States and Canada last evening by President Johnson. Was the information that a so-called Marshall plan was going to be enunciated by the President in the possession of the Government of Canada last Friday or prior to last Friday?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, that information was not before the Government last Friday.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, when did the Government of Canada first become aware that the President was going to announce this policy, and, since it became aware of it, has there been any discussion between the Canadian and United States governments as to Canada sharing in it?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, we were made aware of this shortly before the speech was delivered. I did not actually see the text of the speech, but I knew one was available and I had been advised of its contents.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, when was it that the Minister was advised?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was advised at some time between six and eight o'clock; I would say around seven o'clock.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, does the Minister subscribe to the suggestion that the plan announced by the President of the United States in respect of this aid scheme for the Far East is a product of the mind of the Prime Minister of Canada, as suggested by the C.B.C. last night?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, in respect of a matter of this importance I am not going to indulge in idle comment. I think my right hon. friend and the House generally will agree that the discussion which the Prime Minister had with the President last Saturday was a useful one. I believe that the President's speech last night took into account important suggestions that had been made to him from many quarters, and it is clear from some of the proposals that the conversation of the Prime Minister of Canada with the President was indeed a very useful and fortunate one at that particular moment.

While I am on my feet I should like to say that the Canadian government welcomes President Johnson's proposal for a greatly expanded co-operative effort for economic development in Southeast Asia to be initiated under the United Nations. Some weeks ago there was mention made of a development scheme for the Mekong. Because of Canada's initial interest in this program we have been thinking along much the same lines as the President and are prepared to play our full part in contributing to the success of this plan.

It will be recalled that on Friday night the Prime Minister, speaking at Temple University, made specific suggestions for such an expanded co-operative effort. The Canadian government stands ready to designate a special representative to join with the Secretary General of the United Nations and representatives of other industrialized countries to help in the preparation of the plan and in mobilizing the necessary additional resources. I am happy to note that the President is establishing a special United States team to be headed by Mr. Eugene Black, the distinguished former President of the World Bank. The government shares the hope that all other industrialized countries, including the Soviet Union and, I might add, eventually China, will contribute to this common endeavour and that, as soon as peaceful co-operation is possible, North Viet Nam could take its place in the co-operative effort.

Canada is particularly fitted to play a role because of our long association with many of the countries of Southeast Asia, our participation in co-operative peace and development efforts in the area. Because of the character of the Indochina countries our bicultural heritage will be of considerable advantage. I should like to say that we have asked our Ambassador at the United Nations to come to Ottawa—he came last night—to discuss with us certain proposals that we will make to the Secretary General in connection with the proposal made by the President with regard to this scheme for co-operative development in Southeast Asia.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, with reference to my question I would point out that the Mekong development was agreed to and undertaken while we were in office, so naturally we support any effort of that kind in Southeast Asia. I would ask the minister this question. Were the views that were expressed by the Prime Minister in his speech at Temple University known to the President of the United States before they were delivered? I ask that because of the apparent annoyance of the President over the conduct of the Prime Minister as revealed in the American press although, of course, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has brought into play its whole massive propaganda machine, both visual and verbal, to justify what took place.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the text of the Prime Minister's speech had not been given to the President beforehand, but I hope I may say we all agree that the suggestions made by the Prime Minister with regard to a situation of great importance not only to our two countries but to the peace of the whole world incorporated ideas that will be and have been weighed very carefully by the government of the United States and I hope by other governments concerned.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The British government had the same view a week ago.

Mr. Churchill: Was the Prime Minister reprimanded by the President?

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, in putting a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs perhaps I might be pardoned for saying that we welcome the statement of Canada's willingness to take part in this commitment in Southeast Asia. I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if the Canadian government is planning to follow up another aspect of the President's speech in which he said that the United States was ready for unconditional discussions leading to a final settlement. I was wondering if Canada proposed to take any specific steps with regard to this aspect of the President's speech.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Government is available for discussions at any time. Indeed, we have discussions with the United States in one form or another almost daily. What is now required is that the other side should be prepared to enter into discussions. There was a notable statement in the President's speech when he said that the United States was prepared to enter into discussions without any preconditions.

I am now in a position to say, having sought clarification of that speech, that a cease fire would not be a condition precedent to the initiation of discussions which, as the President said, were being offered unconditionally. On the other hand, the President said any settlement would have to meet certain requirements involving the independence of South Viet Nam. In other words there do seem to be conditions for a settlement, but not for the beginning of discussions.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Brewin: Does this position of the President apparently represent a change of view, that is the reference to unconditional peace negotiations? Can the Minister tell us if this, in turn, reflects an apparent change of view by the authorities in Hanoi?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, Mr. Speaker, I cannot comment on policy in the United States. My hon. friend asks if this represents a change of policy, but I cannot be expected to comment on that. Likewise I cannot say what the policy of Hanoi is unless it is given clearly, and it has not been given. With regard to pre-conditions, when we were presented with the Belgrade appeal of the 17 nations, I said, on behalf of the Government, there was much in that appeal we could support. One element was the absence of pre-conditions with regard to the holding of peace talks.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister following up the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Did the Prime Minister receive a delegation of five Canadian university professors yesterday, who presented a letter signed by 313 Canadian university professors of all political persuasions which urged Canada as a Sovereign nation to seek an end to the war in Viet Nam by calling for immediate negotiations to be undertaken without pre-conditions? Would the Prime Minister inform the House of his response to this propulsive appeal?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I did receive these professors informally, and received from them the statement to which my hon. friend has referred on behalf of those signatories to that statement. I informed the deputation I shared the concern which they had expressed about the situation in Viet Nam. I shared also their desire, as I am sure all hon. members do, that negotiations for a peaceful and honourable settlement should begin immediately if possible. I did not, I must add, see eye to eye with them in their entire assessment of the responsibilities and reasons for the present situation.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of all these very promising plans we heard from the President of the United States, and which receive general support in this House, can the Minister now tell us, since all these plans are predicated on the existence of the United Nations, if we can take it from the announcement of the President of the United States that the impassé in the United Nations is likely to be broken in the near future; and can the Minister tell us how negotiations are getting along in connection with the opening of the new Assembly in respect of a vote taking place?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I fail to see any relationship between the facts stated and the suggestion of the President, supported by the Canadian Prime Minister, that the Secretary General of the United Nations should use his good offices to further the development of this co-operative economic aid program under the auspices of the United Nations. This plan has nothing to do with the deadlock in the United Nations. The Secretary General is to give consideration now, in the absence of a meeting of the General Assembly, to whether he will take this proposal to the Security Council for authority to act. This is one of the reasons I have asked Mr. Tremblay, our Ambassador to the United Nations, to come to Ottawa in order that we can discuss our ideas as to what course the Secretary General might wish to take.

Mr. Nesbitt: The Secretary of State for External Affairs said this plan had nothing to do with the United Nations—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Oh, no.

Mr. Nesbitt: Does he not agree that it would be extraordinarily difficult to carry out such a plan on a long range basis unless the present difficulties are settled in the General Assembly? Again I ask whether any progress has been made toward a settlement of this serious problem by the General Assembly.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure the hon. Member, who is a supporter of the United Nations, would not wish to give a wrong impression. I did not say this question had nothing to do with the United Nations. This plan will, we hope, be put forward through the United Nations. With regard to the last part of the question, the committee of 33 nations has been meeting to seek ways and means of resolving, if possible, the financial dilemma. Beyond that I cannot report any progress.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): A supplementary question to the Prime Minister. I wonder if he could tell us how many attempts were made before President Johnson finally agreed to meet with the Prime Minister.

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question to which the answer will be as simple as the "No" to a previous question. I ask the Prime Minister whether at the time he made his speech on Friday last in Philadelphia he had any knowledge that the United States had in mind a massive aid plan for Southeast Asia or that they were working on such a plan.

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker, I had no knowledge of any massive aid plan being worked on by the United States at that time. The President had, I think a week before in a speech on Viet Nam generally, made a reference to the desirability of economic and social development in that area. I had also made a reference to that a month ago in New York.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not what the New York Herald-Tribune said.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This is a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, either to the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs, with regard to the announced proposals for extensive economic aid to Southeast Asia. In announcing its willingness to participate in this program, has the Canadian Government given any indication as to the amount of money it would be prepared to put into this effort?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the amount that would be appropriate for Canada to contribute would depend, of course, on the extent and the cost of the total program. Canada has already been contributing to this project through the Government of my right hon. friend, when in office, and since then through this Government. If this program is extended, as we hope it will be, we will have to increase our contribution to it.

PUBLIC WORKS

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING AWARD OF CONTRACTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): My question is for the Prime Minister. Has there been any change in government policy with regard to the award of contracts to low bidders?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, subject to the qualifications and exceptions which have been traditional over the years and which have been followed by previous governments.

Mr. Aiken: Has any directive gone out from the Prime Minister's office setting out a code of ethics to be followed in awarding contracts? I would appreciate an answer. Could the Prime Minister tell us whether there has been such a directive?

Mr. Pearson: These are Treasury Board matters and, as the hon. Member knows, they are dealt with in Treasury Board in the customary way.

TRADE

PROPOSED U.S. EMBARGO ON SHIPMENTS OF CANADIAN CATTLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture or to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is either of those two gentlemen aware that the American National Cattlemen's Association has asked the United States government for an immediate embargo on the import of all Canadian cattle into the United States? If so, is the Canadian Government taking appropriate steps to protect our beef producers?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, I was not aware of this information. Now that it has been given I will take the matter under consideration.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POINT EDWARD NAVAL BASE—CONTINUATION OF RESPONSIBILITY OF DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): May I ask the Associate Minister of National Defence whether he is yet in a position to reply to the questions I addressed to him on April 2 and previously.

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): I have not yet gathered all the pertinent information on this subject. As soon as I have done so I will be glad to answer the hon. Member.

INQUIRY AS TO RECONSTITUTION OF HOUSE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Will the Minister press for the early reappointment of the Special House of Commons Committee on Defence, bearing in mind that certain studies were not completed during the Committee's two previous meetings? I think this is an important question, because certain information has reached me in the last two days that unnecessary and stupid expenditures are being made by the hon. gentleman's Department contrary to his declaration that efficiency and economy would be insisted upon.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): I have already indicated that it is the intention of the Government to establish a Committee on Defence this session. I understand that the actual nature of such a Committee, whether it is to be a Special Committee or whether it is to be set up under the new standing orders to be put into effect for the session, is still under consideration. I am unable to give the hon. member a more definite answer until discussions have taken place in this connection.

Mr. Winch: May I ask the Prime Minister what position the Government is taking as a matter of policy? Are we to proceed to the appointment of Committees in accordance with standing orders or will there be a delay until a Government proposal is introduced in the light of the representations made by the Special Committee last Session?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, there will not be any need for such a delay. I think the Committees will be set up very shortly.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CONSIDERATION OF COMMITTEE REPORT ON REPRODUCTION OF "HANSARD" INDEX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to address a question to the President of the Privy Council in his capacity as Leader of the House. Is it the intention of the Government to take the initiative and introduce a notice of motion to consider at this Session—I understand this is the correct procedural way of doing it—a report made during the previous session of this Parliament, namely the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections relating to the reproduction of the front page of the Hansard Index by the Political Action Committee of the Hamilton Area Council of the Steelworkers Union?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): That matter has not received consideration, but I will be very glad to take the question as notice.

LETTER RESPECTING ALLEGED FRAUDULENT VOTING IN B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport a question, not in his capacity as Minister of Transport but relating to electoral matters and particularly the responsibility he had in 1964. This question relates to the case of electoral voting irregularities in British Columbia, brought to the attention of the public by Moreland Brown. I would ask the Minister whether last year—and I am speaking specifically of the spring—Mr. Castonguay or anyone else brought to his attention the fact that Mr. Moreland Brown had sent him a letter complaining about certain voting irregularities, and whether the Minister is aware of the contents of that letter.

• (11:40 a.m.)

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I ceased to be the Secretary of State for Canada on February 3 of last year. Any time after that date it would not have been appropriate for this matter to be brought to my attention. To the best of my knowledge and recollection, speaking without looking at any files, it was not, but I cannot be absolutely sure; I do not know.

Mr. Fisher: I am not satisfied with the answer, and I should like to debate it tonight at the adjournment.

Mr. Pickersgill: In that case, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the question could be directed to the appropriate minister.

NATIONAL PARKS

NEW BRUNSWICK—INQUIRY AS TO SECOND PARK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I have a question for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Having in mind the provision of a second National Park in Nova Scotia, may I ask the Minister if discussions have taken place recently with New Brunswick about a second National Park in that Province and/or an extension to the existing National Park there?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I did not follow the last part of the hon. Member's question. Was he asking about another area?

Mr. Bell: I am asking whether any discussions have taken place regarding a second National Park in New Brunswick and/or an extension to the existing park.

Mr. Laing: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bell: May I ask the minister whether the same favourable consideration will be given to a proposal from New Brunswick, bearing in mind the fact that New Brunswick is lagging seriously behind Nova Scotia in the expenditures of his Department?

Mr. Laing: I would say that every consideration would be given to an application from the Province of New Brunswick or, indeed, from any other Province regarding the establishment of an additional National Park. Our thinking is that Canada in its entirety requires more National Parks.

Mr. Bell: In other words the initiative lies wholly within the particular Province concerned?

Mr. Laing: Usually we work with the Provinces following discussions which arise between our parks people and their counterparts in the Provinces.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON MATTER BEFORE QUEBEC COURT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I wish to ask the Prime Minister a question arising from the concern which members of the House feel, I think, because of the news stories respecting the evidence coming out in court in relation to the Autair contract, particularly as it may reflect on one of his ministers and the High Commissioner in London. Can the Prime Minister give us any indication as to what the Government may plan in order to give the public a statement or some clarification on this matter, aside from what may be involved in the courts?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I think it is highly desirable to make a statement on this matter and we propose to do this, but only after the court has made a decision.

• (11:50 a.m.)

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. Would he take into consideration the fact that when certain evidence came before the Dorion inquiry he did not hesitate, or his Minister of Justice did not hesitate, to make a clarifying statement?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely the hon. Member does not wish to go on a fishing expedition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lambert: What a statement to make.

INQUIRY AS TO COMMITTEE ON CORRECTIONAL POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice and ask him whether the Special Committee to study and make recommendations on a comprehensive policy in the field of correction, mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, refers to the Parliamentary Committee which he announced last session or to a committee of experts, or both; and if to both, will he tell us when they are likely to be set up?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I propose to deal with that in my speech tomorrow.

TRANSPORT

APPLICATION BY RUSSIAN SHIP TO USE ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question either to the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Minister of Transport. It is good to have the attention of both of them. Has an application recently been made by a Montreal firm, on behalf of a Russian ship, for permission to come into the interior of Canada through the St. Lawrence Seaway?

An hon. Member: Order paper.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, if so, I believe it is the first time such an application has been made; and in view of considerations in relation to Canadian-Soviet trade, can the Minister tell us whether the application is being granted?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have been advised since I came into the House that such an application has been made and is under consideration. It may be that I can give some definite information tomorrow in response to the question.

[Mr. Fisher.]

EDUCATION

INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL SCHOLARSHIP PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, the urgency of this question is based on many representations made to me by the young people of this country. It is directed to the Minister of Finance. Although not mentioned in the Throne Speech, will the Federal Government soon be announcing the federal scheme for university scholarships, as promised many times in the last election campaign?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows that Government policy is announced at the appropriate time, in the appropriate way.

Mr. Grafftey: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. These young people would like to know if it is the intention of the Government to live up to this election promise, yes or no?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The answer is no.

INDUSTRY

ASSISTANCE TO WORKERS AND INDUSTRIES AFFECTED BY AUTOMOBILE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Industry, but in his absence perhaps I could direct it to the Minister of Labour. In view of the action of President Johnson in submitting to the United States Congress a Canadian-U.S. auto trade agreement containing a broad plan of financial assistance to U.S. companies and workers adversely affected by the plan, and in view of the striking contrast this represents to the Canadian situation where no such assistance is available, can the Minister assure the House that the Government is prepared to amend the Canadian agreement so it is at least comparable to the advantages offered by the U.S. legislation?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept, of course, the argument that my hon. friend introduced into his question, alleging a contrast between the availability of assistance to Canadian workers from displacement factors. We are at present engaging in discussions with the union. Tomorrow we shall have a meeting with the company presidents to discuss what appropriate adjustment measures may be required as a result of this particular arrangement.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): A supplementary question to the Minister of Labour, Mr. Speaker. What steps does the Minister propose to take to find employment for those Canadians who will be put out of work by the transfer of the purchasing and accounting departments of auto manufacturers in Canada to the head offices in the United States?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, any problems of adjustment that may arise will be in a context of expanding employment in this particular industry arising from this agreement. Whatever adjustment problems may occur will, we trust, be worked out by arrangements in the first place between the companies and the unions with appropriate government consultation and, where necessary, assistance.

Mr. Scott: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can we take it from what the Minister has said that where dislocations take place as a result of the agreement, the Government is prepared to make available sufficient financing so the income of the dislocated workers will be maintained while they are being retrained and relocated?

Mr. Bell: They are socialistic enough.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, and perhaps I should direct it to the Minister of Finance rather than the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that it is admitted that there will be dislocations in the automobile parts industry because of this treaty, are any arrangements under consideration by the Government to assist the owners of plants who will now find themselves without any orders as a result of the agreement?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think we are getting this problem of readjustment out of perspective. In the first place, as a result of this agreement there will be $250 million worth of more work in Canada every year by the end of the next three years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gordon: Obviously that will provide more jobs than there have been in this particular industry. It will also provide very great opportunities for the businessmen in this industry to readjust their operations and take advantage of a very large and increasing market. I think if this is appreciated we will all be able to see the picture in a little better perspective.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Since the automobile companies are getting a rebate of $50 million a year, will they or the Government contribute anything toward the cost of retooling the plants which this rationalization of the automobile industry will make necessary?

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, I do not think we can pursue this kind of detailed question effectively on the orders of the day.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gordon: It has been announced that there will be an opportunity to debate this agreement—

Mr. Douglas: When?

Mr. Gordon: —which, I must say, is one of the great achievements of the last year.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about the first budget that the hon. gentleman introduced? That was supposed to be a great achievement too.

Mr. Fred F. Stenson (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Are they going to be Canadian-owned companies that will increase this employment?

Mr. Gordon: Some of them, I hope, Sir.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It does seem to me that we have discussed this matter at quite some length.

• (12:00 p.m.)

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, April 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cashin for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Marcoux (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, as we were reminded by the reading of the speech from the throne, we are now beginning a new session. May I offer my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Cashin) and the seconder (Mr. Chrétien) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne for having highlighted, according to the views of their party, the main points that will come up for discussion during this new period in the life of the twenty sixth parliament.

The proposals brought before us by the government are far-reaching and we may well wonder whether it is realistic to imagine that we could go through such of heavy program during the next few months, especially when the government is in a minority position.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments on this twenty sixth parliament which, while it did not give us a majority government, has just the same provided a stable administration. In the first place, let us not forget that the present representation in the House of Commons obviously reflects the state of mind of Canadians from coast to coast. The democratic system allowing for a free vote, it seems that the Canadian electors did not see enough outstanding qualities in any party to give them an absolute majority. And I think that such a situation will continue for several years to come.

Governments will have to get used to such a way of life. Like a person suffering from diabetes or from a heart condition who has to make the best of his illness, our government will have to recognize that the days of all-powerful administrations are definitely past. However, we must admit that in spite of defects and infirmities, the life expectancy is not necessarily shorter, quite the contrary. But that is a far cry from saying that no cooperation is necessary.

Many take pleasure in saying that others—not them indeed—have tarnished the image of the House of Commons. Newspapermen from coast to coast have been saying that parliament is on the downgrade. Despite all the reservations I often make in regard to newspapermen, I must nevertheless admit that it is here indeed that they form an opinion about parliament, and not outside the house. When they charge the opposition with filibustering, it is certainly because idle discussions go on and on, that we mark time and that no new ideas are brought forward. Even if a party blames another for doing everything to achieve its purpose, it will become as guilty when it also resorts to such tactics.

And, Mr. Speaker, this brings me to discuss the conception that certain politicians have of public as well as personal morality. It seems that the basic principles of natural law are more and more ignored. Instead of being guided by those principles, those politicians readily come to take an everybody-is-doing-it attitude. While yesterday fraud and theft were considered as sins against natural law, the trend today is to greater tolerance because many people commit such wrongdoings. In the past, people used to say adulterers, but today they say "common law spouse"; formerly, respect for justice was the order of the day, but today freedom not to abide by it is claimed. And I could go on.

How is it that individuals attempt to exert pressures on public men for the sole purpose of lining their own pockets? Is it conceivable that alleged guilty persons would try to buy their innocence? Why is it that many persons are under the impression that politicians can tamper with the administration of justice? Are there any reasons why one should think that there is one law for the rich and another for the poor? Is it because some individuals have uncovered some secret dealings and want to be treated like certain privileged persons?

Why is the member of parliament consulted as if he were a lawyer and why is he expected to espouse the cause of his so-called client? Apparently some people thought the climate was favourable to such dealings and resolved to try to benefit therefrom, no wonder that there are so many partisans and parasites around. Is it any wonder then that the underworld, seeking protection against the administration of justice, the law and the authorities, joins hands with political hangers-on—particularly those who gravitate around the party in office—hoping to influence them.

Public administration is usually considered as the art of governing and the latter as the art of making things come true. His Worship Mayor Jean Drapeau, of Montreal, even said that it was the art of bringing into being the things that are necessary. That is all very well. But from a partisan point of view, politics can be quite a different proposition. And I fully agree with this statement I have heard: Politics is the art of getting into office and remaining there. The large number of parties we now have and the powerful opposition will have at least served to bring the government to pay more attention to its role as administrator and forget about partisanship.

However, the speech from the throne shows the eagerness of the Liberal party to cater to the electorate. They bow to the pressures exerted, they yield to the demands of intermediate groups. They no longer care whether the principles of Christian democracy are safeguarded; they no longer seek the objective criteria which should continue to guide our actions. No, they try to compromise on a middle-of-the-road policy—which is not always the right one—between the age-long interests of financiers and swindlers, while endeavouring to soothe the people with phoney presents.

As a former Liberal prime minister said, "Not necessarily conscription but conscription if necessary", today they say "Not necessarily socialism but socialism if necessary". I do not imply by this that social measures are not useful. On the contrary, our party has been advocating this imperative necessity for more than 30 years. What we fear is the increasingly larger place our governments are taking in the life of the individuals. We believe in maintaining the freedom of individuals and businesses, not the freedom of gangsters, outlaws, monopolizers, trusts, tyrants or dishonest people. Unfortunately, when persons speak along these lines, they are readily called reactionaries. Attempts are made to picture them as people who oppose progress and experiments.

Nothing is farther from the truth or more malicious. But I believe that it is the part of wisdom to warn against making any change in our system without scrutinizing it beforehand. Otherwise, we might become unable to back out of such changes without difficulty. When we see how painfully the government makes a show of letting the provinces opt out of joint programs, especially on account of the huge organization of civil servants necessitated by centralization, we immediately realize how it is almost impossible to reverse the trend in the social field, even if we are conscious of being in a false position. Let us remember that the former labour prime minister of Great Britain, Lord Attlee, said in February 1947 that there was a basic difference between totalitarian planning and suggestive economic planning. Like everyone else, he did not dare go forward blindly into dictatorial state control. Well, less than six months after that statement, the Labour government had to recommend labour conscription.

In saying that, I do not accuse all socialists of deliberately trying to set up a totalitarian regime; however, I should like to point out that socialist planning bears within itself a germ which will lead to serious but inevitable consequences.

The government has stated that it will consider the establishment of health services for Canadian citizens. Does it mean that our compatriots are unable to look after their own health needs? No, Mr. Speaker, it simply means that they do not have the financial means to do so. Would it be that no mutual insurance company has specialized in that field? Here again, it is a question of lack of means. The structures are there but the Canadian people cannot take advantage thereof.

The way hospital insurance is being administered at present gives an idea of the iniquitous rules which health insurance would impose upon both the professionals and the public.

The proponents of socialism claim that private enterprise has been subjected to the whims and fantasies of a few irresponsible people. According to them, planning is essential to general welfare. To achieve such a high standard of perfection in the establishment of various health services, private enterprise must have undertaken intensive planning and multiply consultations with the various bodies concerned.

It must not be forgotten that the general interest of a people, the common good, cannot be measured on a scale. It is imperative that the common needs and interest be examined at various levels by the proper agencies of intermediate organizations where each need of each human person must be placed in its own context. Totalitarian and executory state planning seems therefore inconsistent with the adequate working of true democracy.

It should also be noted that an undue state control really affects the people in the end. It is most important to bring about a psychological change, to alter the character of the population. This is done gradually and brings forth new attitudes toward authority. When complete planning has firmly taken hold of each member of the community it moulds them at will, albeit with the best intention in the world. It catches society as a whole in a huge net of minute complicated and standard rules which practically prevent the people from acting intelligently.

After sincerely claiming to be the people's protector, one eventually becomes a tyrant. Will-power is not destroyed or crushed, but it is softened, moulded and controlled. It cannot be said that man is forced to act, but he is constantly prevented from acting and reacting. Such a power of the state does not suppress life, but it prevents it. It does not really tyrannize, but it compresses, emasculates, stifles, stupefies a people, until the nation becomes a herd of scared pack-animals. We can stop wondering why so few voices are raised behind the iron curtain. Those people have reached a state of bestial submission that makes them behave like trained animals without the power to protest.

Mr. Côté (Chicoutimi): Exactly.

Mr. Marcoux: Perhaps some will say that I should not take things so tragically, but I suggest it is normal, fitting and wise to stop and think, review the situation and contemplate what any change in our way of life could bring us in the long run. Since the Soviet Union has reached the summit of communism, that is the socialist state, it is perfectly natural to study the conditions that exist in countries behind the iron curtain. I feel it is foolish not to consider all avenues while pretending to wish to take people out of their misery and poverty.

And let us not forget that totalitarianism can come by different ways, even if it all amounts to the same results. It is of no importance to me whether we have a nazi, fascist or communist dictatorship. I do not want any of them. Regimes such as Japan, Italy and Germany used to have are of no more appeal to me than those found today in Russia, East Germany, Cuba and elsewhere. In my opinion, they all end up by creating a great big herd of slaves. And it can only be a good thing to try and find the reasons why state interventions will produce results that perhaps one did not seek.

What is wrong, is the well organized, arranged, and indeed, extremely well planned movement to allow our economic life to be controlled by the state which would eventually and inevitably become the main owner of production means. This is true socialism.

I do not mean to imply that our present system is perfect. On the contrary, and for over 30 years, our party has been thundering against the abuses of capitalism, objecting against its materialism. As a matter of fact, I consider our present system as an economic dictatorship, as hateful as any other. It surely does not reflect much credit on our system that segregation and discrimination could still exist in America and that poverty is still rampant.

But we must at all costs guard against the danger of being so impatient to obtain quick results as to select means, as useful as they might be in the near or distant future, which are inconsistent with the preservation of a truly free society.

Before concluding, Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal with a point that has been systematically overlooked since 1958: family allowances. At that time, before the election, as it happened, during the consideration of the 1957-58 supplementary estimates, a provision was included as a clause in the supply bill, so as to increase by $1 the allowances paid at the time. What an improvement.

When they were established under chapter 40, 1944-45, so-called responsible people jeered at large families and even made so bold as to suggest that such allowances would encourage the bestiality of parents. As if those allowances would be enough to support a child, even a baby. Well, Mr. Speaker, it seems that many people still hold this view, because no one can bring the government to comply with the rightful demands of the fathers and mothers of large or small families.

And here is why we ask that the Bank of Canada be used to increase those allowances. Allow me to repeat some points of law since some hon. members seem unconvinced still. If you refer to the Bank of Canada Act, chapter 43, 1934, you will find that it is not granted any power to issue bank credit. But section 21 gives it the exclusive right to issue bank notes which constitute legal tender. Section 24 stipulated that chartered banks had to maintain a reserve but it was abrogated by section 11 of the act amending the Bank of Canada Act, chapter 33, 1954. Therefore, it is necessary to refer to the Bank Act, chapter 48, 1954, to find out what liquidities the chartered banks have to maintain, that is what amounts in bank notes of the Bank of Canada, in addition to the money deposited with the Bank of Canada, chartered banks must keep on hand to create a $100 credit. Under section 71 of the Bank Act, that cash reserve must not be lower than $8, which means that each $100 loan granted by a chartered bank must be covered by $8 in cash. That provision means, therefore, that under the act chartered banks are authorized to loan 12½ times more money than they have on hand.

I ask this question. Why should not the Bank of Canada be authorized also to loan to the Canadian government 12½ times the amount of the deposits it has on hand? It is not a matter of preventing chartered banks from helping the small people as well as the big companies; it is only a matter of applying to the Bank of Canada those principles which are good for the chartered banks. It would encourage the general development of our country instead of benefiting only a small group of privileged people. To solve in this way social problems, Mr. Speaker, that is not socialism but simply the application to the common good of a system that has always well served particular interests.

So as to show you that this is really a fault of capitalism in general, may I quote from a pamphlet entitled "Money Facts" and published on September 21, 1964 by the United States government for the committee on banking and money of the House of Representatives.

[Text]

On page 1 we find question No. 3:

Why is the money-creating power important?

This is the answer:

Because, by creating money, banks provide the exchange media which the economy needs to prosper and grow. Since the growth and proper functioning of the U.S. economy require increasing amounts of money over the years, those who control the amount of money exercise great power over business activity, the incomes people earn, and our economic strength.

What problems are raised by an "independent" Federal Reserve?

The answer is:

There are two major problems. One is the problem of political responsibility for the country's economic policies. The other is the problem of final control over the government's actions in the economic sphere.

What is money?

The answer is:

Money is anything that people will accept in exchange for goods or services, in the belief that they may, in turn, exchange it, now or later, for other goods or services. Any number of different materials—including paper i.o.u.'s—may serve as money. How money functions, and what money represents are its important aspects and not simply what it is made of.

If the government can issue bonds, why can't it issue money and save the interest?

This is the answer:

A few clear headed and firm individuals, such as Abraham Lincoln, have insisted that the government should. The late Thomas A. Edison stated the matter this way:

"If our nation can issue a dollar bond it can issue a dollar bill. The element that makes the bond good makes the bill good also. It is absurd to say that our country can issue $30 million in bonds and not $30 million in currency. Both are promises to pay: but one promise fattens the usurer and the other helps the people."

However, it has long been one of the political facts of life that private banks must be allowed to create the lion's share of the money, even if not all of the money. Thus there is little opposition to the government's printing bonds and then permitting the banks to create the money with which to buy those bonds; but proposals that the government itself create the money instead of the bonds have always set off tremendous political upheavals. For example, Abraham Lincoln set off a political furor when he insisted upon having the government issue $346 million in money, the so-called "greenbacks", instead of issuing interest bearing bonds and paying interest on the money.

Isn't the suggestion of improving the money system both impudent and a call for needless tinkering with the economy?

This is the answer:

Not at all. The monetary system of today, improved as it has been over the past 200 or so years, is still man made. There is no reason to conclude that the system is perfect. The process of improving the money system is not complete any more than is the process of improving our national life generally.

Further, in every period of our history, people, especially bankers, have resisted any change in our money system with the cry, "leave well enough alone." Then some disaster would strike and the monetary system would be changed in panic and haste. The system always looks solid or at least adequate until the moment it becomes inadequate. The fact that the system is now functioning more or less satisfactorily is no reason to shun inspection. Economic health and progress is the result of continual care and attention.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read question No. 157:

In practical terms, what is meant by Federal Reserve "independence"?

This is the answer:

There are two sides to independence—one is economic, the other political. On the economic side, independence means that the Federal Reserve formulates and executes economic policy, using its monetary controls, without any necessary reference or co-ordination with the policies being followed by the other branches of the government. This, of course, invites clashes between the Federal Reserve and other parts of the government.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, following these extremely brilliant explanations, I cannot but recommend to all the hon. members of the house the reading of this remarkable document issued by the U.S.A. government and which bears publication No. 37-240.

The disclosures contained in that document allow me to go on wondering how the masterminds of the high international finance have succeeded so far in maintaining the myth of money scarcity during depressions and of easy credit in the so-called periods of prosperity.

For me, this is insulting human reason and holding in perfect contempt the sovereign power of the people in a democracy.

In the light of such principles, and as the Liberal party has already taken position in favour of debt-free money, we do censure it for not having increased the family allowances according to the cost of living, and we move the following subamendment.

I move, seconded by the hon. Member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson):

That the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition be amended by inserting, after the word "advisers", the following:

"having failed to carry out an economic and financial program such as would have been possible through the facilities of the Bank of Canada; having thereby failed to raise family allowances in keeping with the cost of living and been unsuccessful in establishing a balanced economy and in lightening the burden of the public debt and the interests thereon so as to provide every Canadian with a standard of living consistent with the value of this country's natural resources; not having considered it advisable to invest a huge amount of debt-free social capital through the Bank of Canada, with a view to financing the training of an adequate staff to deal with medical and hospital care, do not enjoy the confidence of this house."

Mr. Speaker: I have had an opportunity of reviewing the subamendment, and at first glance it does seem to me it enlarges considerably on the amendment. If there is no objection in the House I would propose to put the subamendment.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder, so we can understand it thoroughly and if it would not be irregular, perhaps Your Honour could just read the amendment as amended so the House could see just exactly what was before it. It does strike out certain words and substitute others.

Mr. Knowles: In effect it strikes out all of it.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): May I also point out to Your Honour that it seems to me a subamendment must modify an amendment and not replace it, which is precisely what this does. It has no reference at all to the amendment. I would put it to Your Honour, therefore, that a subamendment must amend an amendment and must be related thereto. The present amendment as proposed is not related to the amendment in any way, and does not modify it. As a matter of fact it merely seeks to replace it. I am subject to correction here, since I have only had a glance at the subamendment, but I would draw to Your Honour's attention the need for a careful study to ascertain whether or not it is in order.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I wonder if I could say a word on the point raised by the hon. Member for Edmonton West, whose opinion I always respect. In this particular case the substance of the amendment is the word "regret". It is an expression of regret that the right hon. gentleman seeks to make in his amendment, and it is an expression of regret that the hon. member seeks to make in his subamendment. It does seem to me that to substitute one set of reasons for regret for another would be the kind of subamendment which has been allowed on the Address in order that, in the kind of Parliament we have been having in recent years, every party represented in Parliament could put forward its own point of view and have it voted upon.

I would draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that in practice we do not circumscribe the debate strictly to the subject of the subamendment, but we have always ranged over both amendment and subamendment. From my experience in the House, which is rather more limited than that of other hon. members though it is beginning to grow a little, it does seem to me that the rights of the right hon. gentleman would not be in any way abridged if the House were permitted to vote upon the hon. Member's amendment. I am not suggesting for one minute that I would be prepared to support it, but I feel that so far as we are concerned we would not wish, on a technicality, to have the hon. Member and his party deprived of putting forward their point of view.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think one has to look at this subamendment in the same way one would look at a subamendment that sought to strike out all the words after the word "that". I think that merely to go a little bit further and strike out the substance does not differentiate it from that kind of subamendment. I believe the practice in recent years at any rate has been to frown upon any amendment to strike out all the words after "that" except in two cases, namely on Supply Motions and on the Budget.

With respect to the point made by the Minister of Transport, which I think he made with some validity, that our aim in the Throne Speech debate is to permit all parties to have a chance to present their point of view, it should be said that is one of the reasons for the change in the rules which clears the decks by the end of the fourth day. By tomorrow at six o'clock, whatever is before the House will have been voted upon and we will be back on the main motion. Any party that has not had an opportunity of presenting its point of view by means of a subamendment presumably would have an opportunity by way of a main amendment. I believe that is the answer to the point made by the Minister of Transport. Basically, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that you would have to rule on this subamendment in the same way you would rule on any amendment that proposed to strike out all the words after "that".

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I should like to support what the hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre has said. When we modified the rules to have votes on the second, fourth and sixth days, my recollection of the discussion in the Committee when the proposal was made was that it would preclude having to deal with this type of amendment as a subamendment interposed before the fourth day. This might more properly be raised following the vote on the fourth day of the debate.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I should like to say that the wording of this amendment is similar to the practice that has been followed in the past on a number of occasions, as has been so well pointed out by the hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre. I believe we have to take into consideration also this word "regret". As the Minister of Transport pointed out, this is really the operative word in this amendment. We go on, as he said, to point out a number of reasons why we regret the action taken by Her Excellency's advisers. These reasons, if I may say so, are substantially different from the reasons offered in the amendment.

This still does not change the operative word in the original amendment. I would draw to Your Honour's attention the fact that what is now proposed by the hon. Member for Quebec-Montmorency is on the same lines as other amendments moved in the past. An amendment to the amendment has been moved to strike out all the words after "that", so there is a possibility of a completely new idea being interjected. I do not think this is a departure from our practice; a number of similar cases in the past could be cited.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add a few comments with regard to the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Marcoux), following the remarks made by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), who had the opportunity to occupy the Chair for the complete duration of a parliament. He will agree with me that, in early February 1963, our party had moved a subamendment which actually struck out almost all the words contained in the amendment moved by the Liberal party at the time and kept only the word "government" at the very beginning.

At that time, after a few moments' hesitation, he had allowed the subamendment and all will remember that this amendment caused the defeat of the Conservative party.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: I wish to thank all hon. Members who have endeavoured to assist the Chair. Their views have been most helpful. At the beginning I was considering the applicability of Beauchesne, citation 202(3), but in view of what has been said in the House today and the procedure followed in the recent past it does seem to me that we can consider the subamendment as being in order.

Mr. D. W. Groos (Victoria, B.C.): I do not wish to take up too much time in commenting directly on the Speech from the Throne, since I have a few other matters to bring to the attention of the House. I should like to stress that to my mind one of the most far reaching features it contains is the indication that the rules of Parliament will be altered to permit the allocation of time on legislation by agreement among the house leaders.

This procedure is already being followed in Westminster, the mother of parliaments, and it is long overdue in this House. The change that is proposed should introduce a measure of efficiency into this House which at the moment I feel is sadly lacking. It will cut down on the number and length of dreary speeches which are the curse of the present arrangements. I think most Hon. Members of the House and all members of the Press Gallery will welcome the change. Too long has the country been forced to accept length of debate as a measure of the sincerity and intensity of investigation into proposed legislation. We in this House know this is at best a very unreliable yardstick.

Surely the change will put new life into Parliamentary debate. I look for not just shorter but sharper comment and wit in this House as a result, and I hope this proposal will be introduced by the Government and agreed to at the earliest possible date.

We hear a lot in this House and elsewhere these days, Mr. Speaker, about what is going on in Quebec. We hear about biculturalism and bilingualism; we hear of French Canadian rights under the British North America Act; we hear of the quiet revolution, and so on. Representatives such as myself from the western part of Canada are fortunate in being close to the action, since we can see probably more clearly than those who are not so close just what is going on. However, our position carries with it the responsibility for interpreting to our constituents what it is we do see. It is our clear and, I think, pleasant duty to report back to them, and on this subject we can in truth say that an old era is passing and with it is going a great deal that should have long since departed.

When the hasty words and wild actions of the fanatics and men of ill will have been rewarded with the public contempt they so fully deserve, and when in the calm atmosphere of tolerance we take a good look at the activities of the genuine Quebecker, we can see very clearly what he is working for. What he is building is surely his share, his rightful share, of something we have all been giving lip service to in word and song for many a long year, a land strong and freed, a land with a future that will be proud and respected.

Few of us can have any argument with this objective, and I know that most Westerners will wish Quebeckers the best of good luck. All Canada will be the stronger when this quiet revolution gets up a really good head of steam. It is a very poor imitation Canadian whose heart does not beat just a little bit faster when he visits la belle Province and its great city of Montreal. He sees for himself what his fellow countrymen are achieving down there these days. What the French Canadians are doing for themselves in the Province of Quebec will unquestionably stimulate lively discussion in the rest of Canada. It already has, and what is wrong with that? I am sure that with imagination and good sense, fortunately present in such abundance on both sides, we will all survive and be the better for it.

I wish now to speak on two other matters to which I regretfully found no reference in the Throne Speech. The first concerns inflation and the second the up-dating of pensions for retired Federal Government civil employees and military personnel.

I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that no one group in our society is more aware of the dangers and effects of inflation than pensioners. No group is more ill equipped to fight the continuous day to day battles of inflation than retired public servants and their widows. I think it is because of our mild climate in Victoria and our generally civilized outlook on life—if you will forgive me, Mr. Speaker, for referring to it in those terms—that we have living in Victoria a large percentage of retired persons, including large numbers of retired military personnel and civil servants.

I wish to make a special appeal for consideration of their problems. With so many on the front benches who have been employees of the Federal Government themselves at one time or another before entering this House, I cannot help but feel that my plea will not fall on deaf ears. I doubt that anyone would dare claim that Government employees generally, be they civil or military, have been overpaid in the past for the work they have done. The military and the federal civil service have been and still are among our nation's most loyal and trusted servants. They have an international reputation for their ability which is second to none, and it grieves me to see how they fare at the hands of the nation after their retirement. With pensions wedded or welded—call it what you will—to the rates of pay they were receiving at the time of their retirement, there is no—I repeat, no—provision for the implacable, gnawing away effects of inflation, an inflation which the Government is apparently unable to prevent.

This being the case, Mr. Speaker—and I do not argue this point; I am not one of those who believe that the Government can control inflation without at the same time imposing a host of other wholly unacceptable and undesirable controls—I think the Federal Government has a responsibility toward their faithful and on this point largely helpless, servants to provide decent pensions as a matter of right—having been honestly earned —at a rate, I suggest, that is at least in step with the up to date salaries or wages paid by the Government for the same work today.

Surely this is not too much to ask. It is not even striking into new ground, because the same principle has been followed for years by the government in the land to the south of us, and to a certain extent it is also being followed across the sea today in the United Kingdom. If we cannot strike out on our own with a new, improved formula, can we not at least follow in their footsteps? We might even want to tie federal pensions to the cost of living index; and this is another approach which would be quite all right with me.

I am very encouraged to see in the Canada Pension Plan that the Government for the first time has done something along this line, and has provided automatic increases in pension payments with increases in the cost of living index. I commend the Government wholeheartedly for this. If the Government does not want to take the course of action that I recommended just now to provide fair, up to date pensions, then by all means let us regard the Canada Pension Plan as a precedent and tie our federal pensions in with the cost of living index. I do not mind which course we follow; but we must, in my view, do something. What I wish to impress upon the Government is that the time is far past when we should have made this move. Successive governments have fumbled, waffled and ignored their pensioners long enough, and Provincial Governments and private employers have not been slow, as we all know, to follow suit.

If I may make an observation at this point, Mr. Speaker, I think federal pensioners generally have been much too quiet on the subject of their inflation-caused pension troubles. This is perhaps natural. With years of public service ingrained in their lives, after retirement they have for the most part sat patiently by and watched their hard earned pensions slowly but surely being eaten away by inflation, hoping the Government in its role of Great White Father will do the right thing by them.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that bitter experience has shown them that their confidence has been misplaced. This is a lesson that should not be lost on the federal civil service of today, particularly when they approach the bargaining table for the first time this year, as I am happy to see was promised in the Throne Speech. Nothing can be more frustrating than to see salaries increase year by year across the land, taking care of rising costs for those fortunate enough and young enough to be still employed, while at the same time pensioners experience those same rising costs but are caught in the vise-like grip of a fixed pension.

At present there is no way out for them, Mr. Speaker. Retirement sentences the public servant to a gradual lowering of living standards, and the spectre of an eventual appeal to welfare or charity of one sort or another is a distinct possibility in all too many cases. Members should ask themselves the question, is this fair and is this right? These people do not require alms or handouts; they do need help, and help to them is most justly due. As a Federal Government it is both our moral responsibility and in our own best interests to provide it; for if we are going to attract good people into the service of our country—and, looking ahead, I suggest this is as important today as ever before in our history—we must show that at the end of such service there is a fair retirement.

Surely this fits in with Liberal thinking—spell it as you wish, with a large or a small letter "L"—for the Federal Government to show the way, to provide the lead for provincial and private employers in protecting the purchasing power and the retirement way of life of its faithful servants. I hope, therefore, that the Government will remember its responsibility, will look closely into this problem without delay and will take action very shortly during this Parliament to bring an end to this sorry situation.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. Member permit a question? In view of the fact that the Minister of Finance was not able to be here to hear this important speech, this very excellent speech, I wonder whether the hon. Member would personally see to it that his speech is brought to the attention of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Groos: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to send him a copy, signed by my own hand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, as is traditional in this House on this occasion, I also wish to join with others who have preceded me in this debate and extend my congratulations to the mover and the seconder on their speeches in reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) and the hon. Member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien). They certainly put forward their best efforts. This is what all of us in the House of Commons are very proud of, namely the high calibre of the speeches of Members who are assigned these very important functions of moving and seconding the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Their speeches are always on a high plane, and we are all proud of these people each and every time this is done.

I was rather impressed with the hon. Member for Westmorland (Mrs. Rideout), the hon. Lady who made her maiden speech yesterday. I am sure she is somewhat relieved now that this chore is over, because I remember vividly back in 1952 when I had to deliver my maiden speech and know that a person goes through a lot of nervousness; but the atmosphere of the House helps a great deal. I think the hon. Lady has used this atmosphere very effectively, because her presence in the House is very noticeable; and I notice, also, that she seems to enjoy being a Member of Parliament. I want to congratulate her on her maiden speech, and we look forward to many more contributions from her during the life of this session and the sessions to follow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Starr: The Speech from the Throne is a tremendous and voluminous speech filled with words of platitude. One has to examine this speech very carefully to find what new legislation the Government intends to bring forward during this Session of Parliament. This Speech reminds me of the speech made by President Johnson, because it has been dubbed as the speech of war on poverty, and I think this has been done purposely.

This Speech also reminds me of the 60 days of decision used by this Government as its slogan when it first came into office, which slogan was modelled on the late President Kennedy's motto of 90 days of decision. The only variation is the difference of 30 days. This Speech is nothing but a manifesto of words, when we come to look at it very closely. To my mind this Government has copied the actions, the words and the platforms of the Democratic Party of the United States now on two occasions; first, those of the late President Kennedy, and now those of President Johnson. I am wondering when this Government is going to come forward with some of its own ideas, and when it is going to tell the people of Canada that it is prepared to stand on its own two feet rather than mimic the actions of the Government of the United States.

I am also wondering, Mr. Speaker, whether any action is going to result from the listing of some of the things which are embodied in this Speech, because very few of the matters listed in the last Speech from the Throne which we debated in this House came about. It is true that the Government make a practice of adding words to present legislation. When they talked about certain aspects of legislation which is now on the books of the country in the last Speech they said this was to be "improved", a word which meant nothing at all. They now apply a different adjective to legislation which is presently on the books and already in existence. The 60 days of decision was a complete fraud and a flop during the last session of parliament, and we now expect that the pious platitudes which have been set out in this Throne Speech will experience the same fate.

The war on poverty is a very interesting title for this Speech from the Throne because, as we have noticed in the past session of parliament, cabinet minister after cabinet minister in this Government, particularly outside of the House of Commons on public platforms, has declared that things were very much better, that the Government had solved the economic problems, and that things were on the move. It is strange that now in the Speech from the Throne we find the admission by this Government that there is poverty in Canada, and that they are going to wage a war on that poverty. I will deal with the various items the Government propose in order to eliminate poverty as I go through the Speech. I am wondering whether the war on poverty, as I say, is an admission that nothing has been done since this Government came into office two years ago to rectify the situation.

Let us see, Mr. Speaker, what the Throne Speech contains. First of all there is a reference in one paragraph of the Speech to the automobile agreement which was signed by the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada. Let us look at the situation created by this agreement. First of all, it was agreed that Canada would forgo on new parts and new automobiles coming into Canada duties ranging anywhere from 17½ per cent to 25 per cent. Under this agreement the United States also agreed to forgo up to 8¼ per cent duty on all parts and automobiles being shipped into the United States.

As I understand it, 50 per cent of the power to forgo this duty lies in the initiative of the President of the United States; the balance, the other 50 per cent, lies in the Congress of the United States. It was decided that the President of the United States would not exercise his part of the power to reduce the duty on these automobiles and parts going into the United States, but rather would wait until Congress had approved the agreement so the whole remission could be made at once. On the other hand, Canada immediately implemented her part of that agreement without coming to Parliament for approval of any kind. This was done either by Order in Council or by decision of the Cabinet. The Government were anxious to get into this agreement, but up until now it has been a one way agreement which has been implemented by Canada but not by the United States.

The Government now proposes that a resolution be introduced into the House of Commons to ratify the agreement which is already in existence. This is the method which this Government has employed throughout all its legislation during the period of time it has been in office. It has put the cart before the horse. Parliament has been the last to ratify or learn what this Government intends to do or what this Government is doing.

Mr. Moreau: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Would not the hon. Member agree that there is a second part to this arrangement, namely an agreement between the automobile manufacturers and this Government to increase Canadian production, and should that not be considered when discussing this automobile trade agreement?

Mr. Starr: I agree entirely with the hon. Member that we should have access to the letters that were signed and written which gave an undertaking to the Government on the part of the automobile companies. But this correspondence has been kept secret and none of us can find out the ground rules laid down in these letters signed by the presidents of these automobile companies. I think the hon. Member is right. I think the whole thing should have been brought to Parliament and that we should have been told the basis upon which we entered into this agreement with the United States.

I say that because I feel that not only does this agreement affect the automobile industry in the manufacture or assembly of motor cars, but it has also already affected the small parts manufacturers in various areas in this country, and it will affect them as days go by in the lay-offs which are taking place among their workers, with no provision on the part of the Government for care of these displaced people. Each and every day when questions are asked about this matter there is only a shrug of the shoulders, because the Government has no plan ready now to take care of those who will be displaced.

May I call it one o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, when the recess was called at one o'clock I had just completed dealing with the automobile agreement between the United States and Canada. I had made some comments to the effect that the Government had placed the cart before the horse. That has been a traditional practice on the part of this government, at least over a period of two years, applicable to that particular agreement and other legislative items brought by this government before this House.

At this time I should like to point out some factors regarding the so-called war on poverty as outlined by the Speech from the Throne, which states in part that the Government intends to eliminate poverty among our people. It then goes on to list proposed federal legislation which will rectify the situation.

What are the steps outlined in the Throne Speech to be taken by this Government in its attack on poverty? First of all, there is a suggestion that provincial conferences will be held. Second, it suggests that there will be regional development, and then qualifies this step by saying this will take a good deal of time, possibly years, to bring about. Let me remind hon. Members that regional development programs have been in existence for a number of years. The party to which I belong put these programs into effect when it was in office. When the Liberal Government came into office a few years ago it was quick to take up these programs, modify them, and claim the credit for them. I wonder what else will be done in this regard by Government.

The Speech from the Throne contains several references to employment and the training of workers for new jobs. That type of program was, of course, put into effect, or at least accelerated by the former Government in 1960, and has been continued by the present Government. What else will be done in this regard? I suppose we will have to wait to find out the answer to that question.

Also included in the Throne Speech is a reference to a program for the redevelopment of rural areas. Our Government put such a program into effect in the form of ARDA legislation, so this is nothing new. There is also reference to blighted areas in cities, and this problem of course was attacked by the previous Government in the form of changes in the Central Mortgage and Housing policy which have made possible an increase in housing and in the construction of schools. I see nothing new in that policy or anything which will create an acceleration in this area.

One thing that does surprise me about the contents of this Throne Speech is that portion which suggests there will be new opportunities for young Canadians, because nothing is set out as to what sort of opportunities will be extended to this segment of our population. There is just a usage of words, ended by a period. I doubt whether any advantage will be forthcoming in this regard. I am sure the young people of this generation will become old, 60 or 70 years of age, before this Government takes any action which will be of assistance in this field. The Hospital and Medical Insurance Plan was promised for many years, and legislation in this regard has been brought in piecemeal.

It seems to me the Prime Minister has less faith than almost anyone else, in the ability of his Ministers to carry out effectively some of these programs, as indicated by his new role as co-ordinator. He intends to take these programs under his wing and co-ordinate them through a special secretariat. This fact indicates, at least to me, that the Prime Minister feels that at least some of his Ministers, and possibly all of them, need guidance in order to co-ordinate these efforts. I am afraid I cannot blame him for taking that position, because certainly the past performances of his Ministers both in and out of this House have indicated a need for someone to help them co-ordinate some of these programs. Obviously they need guidance in this regard.

Another subject referred to in the Throne Speech is a new and activated farm policy. It is about time this Government launched a program in respect of farm policy. I represent a riding which is not only an industrial area but also encompasses one of the finest mixed farming areas in the country. A number of responsible individuals engaged in agriculture in my area have informed me that the prices now being paid for agricultural products are as low as they have ever been, and can be compared with prices paid in the 1930's. Consequently they feel something should be done about the inertia on the part of the government, particularly on the part of the Minister of Agriculture. Agriculture is one of the mainstays of our economy, and the people involved in this industry should be looked after. These prices should be increased so as to provide this important segment of our population with at least an opportunity to earn a decent living. The Minister of Agriculture did announce a new dairy policy a short time ago, and perhaps it is too early to criticize or approve this policy because its effects will not be known for approximately 11 months. We must wait to see how favourable this policy will be.

The Speech from the Throne also contains the suggestion that there will be an increase in assistance for the construction of vocational schools. Similar legislation was introduced by the former Government in 1960, which was followed in two and a half years by a tremendous acceleration in the construction of schools of all types in this country. Since the present government came into office that program has almost reached a standstill. There is an obvious need for accommodation for the training and retraining of our young Canadians, and I suggest that this program should be accelerated.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. Member permit a question? Has the hon. Member forgotten the number of schools that have been built in one of the largest provinces of Canada, and the very large expansion in this regard in that province since the present Government came into office?

Mr. Starr: I realize that the Minister is referring to the Province of Quebec, but let me remind him that that province has had the same opportunity in this regard as other provinces have had; and when he refers to the acceleration which has taken place since his Government came into office, I think if he will consider the facts he will realize that no such thing has occurred in Quebec. Perhaps he will obtain some facts and figures from the Minister of Labour in respect of that province. He has suggested that there has been great expansion in this field in that province, but there are no figures which will prove that contention.

There is another reference in the Throne Speech to the effect that the Citizenship and Immigration Acts are to be amended. I suggest that steps in this direction must be taken in this country, and in this regard I would remind the Minister of Transport that when he was the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration some reference was made to second class babies. That hon. Member had no use for second class babies at that time, but I think the Minister should now consider this situation seriously and support any amendment to the citizenship act which will allow people coming into this country to become citizens on the same basis as anyone else.

The whole Throne Speech is an attempt by the Government to enunciate policies, most of which are not new. It is my belief that the Government has in this way enabled itself to sit back and enjoy the result of policies that were brought into being by the former Government. They were fortunate enough to come to power at a time when these policies were really taking hold and bringing results. They themselves have done nothing new to accelerate a decrease in unemployment and to accelerate an increase in vocational training.

There is no mention of any increase in income tax exemptions, and this is a matter that is worrying a great many people. Reference is made to improvements to be brought about in the conduct of the business of the House. We are certainly glad to hear this. I do not entirely believe that we should conduct our business in the House in the same way the board of directors of a big corporation would conduct their business, but I think there should be an improvement over what has taken place in the past two years. The responsibility in this respect lies entirely upon the Government.

I say there has been an admission by the Government that the way in which the business of the House has been conducted has been their fault. This is confirmed by the fact that in two years the Government has named three different House Leaders. First we had the Minister of Transport, but he did not do such a good job. He was pulled out of the job and replaced by the Minister of Justice, who was a complete flop. Now we have the President of the Privy Council, as House Leader, and we will have to wait and see how he makes out. But the responsibility rests on the Government so far as the orderly conduct of the business of the House is concerned, and I am glad to see some indication that the Government is prepared to mend its ways; because the House of Commons cannot carry on with the incompetence, the bungling, the bargaining, the threats and the blackmail to which the House has been subjected so far as its business is concerned. The situation that has existed reflects on all of us, wherever we may sit, and on Parliament as a whole. Therefore I hope the Government will mend its ways so we can deal with the business of the country in a more orderly fashion.

The Prime Minister made some reference to the two cultures and to bilingualism and biculturalism in Canada. He said that basically Canada is a nation of two founding races, and that these two founding races should be the cornerstone of our existence. No one has any quarrel at all with such a statement. During the flag debate we in our party stood firm and fast for the view that the two traditional races should be depicted in some way on our flag. However, we were not successful in that regard.

We agree that there are the two basic cultures, but what about the five million other Canadians who have come to this country, have become good citizens and want to participate as Canadians, as well as their sons and daughters who have been born here in the second and third generations. What role are they left to play, and which side are they going to take? They have been told time and time again that they have brought to this country rich cultures and traditions, and that Canada is prepared to adopt much of these cultures and traditions not on the basis of a melting pot but through integrating them into a Canadian way of life. Nothing has been spelled out with regard to this third group of Canadians, who comprise almost a third of the population of the country and who will increase far more rapidly than the other two groups in the years ahead. No role is set out for these people, and they are left in a quandary and wonderment with regard to how their cultures and traditions will be integrated and play a role.

Speaking in Kitchener on April 7 the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration said very rightly to a group of those Canadians who have received citizenship:

> In the past Canada has sometimes been referred to as a great "melting pot", a place where scores of divergent nationalities met and fused. I sincerely believe, however, that our ideas have changed considerably in the past decade or so, and now it is hardly possible to submerge all divergent characteristics into a totality called "Canada". I like to think that the melting pot ideal has gone and that a new image has taken its place, a new image which can perhaps be more aptly termed a "mixing pot" rather than a melting pot, a combining, yes, but not a fusing at the expense of individuality.

An hon. Member: What kind of pot?

Mr. Starr: A mixing pot. This is the new policy that the government has for five million Canadians.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It would describe the Government, too.

Mr. Starr: I think we are not paying enough attention of this third large group of Canadians. In my view we have left them out on a limb. At first they felt that their cultures and traditions were going to be integrated, thus adding something to Canada, but now they are at a loss to know where they stand because the emphasis is going to be on two cultures and two languages in this country. We agree with this, but there should also be an avenue whereby this third group can be integrated and have their place as well. I do not believe they will want to be left out. They do not want to be classed as second class citizens any longer. They want to play a full part in this country in the light of their ability, their knowledge, their culture and their tradition.

I think it is important that Canadians should be Canadians and not hyphenated Canadians, but in the past year or two more and more hyphenated Canadianism has come into being. There are English speaking Canadians and there are French speaking Canadians and there are other Canadians who do not want to be hyphenated but will now possibly have to be hyphenated. This situation has brought about great strife, and I think the Government should deal with it very forcefully, effectively and quickly. They should not employ emotional policies to deal with this matter but should bring about economic policies that will create satisfaction in every part of the country and in every province.

One of the main omissions in the Speech from the Throne is the matter of relief for the municipal taxpayer who is overburdened with municipal taxes. On an average home he is now paying $700 to $1,000 a year in taxes. There is no mention of relief for these people. Sixty cents of every municipal tax dollar, and in some cases more, now goes for education. There is no relief in this respect. Relief could be provided without infringing upon provincial jurisdiction over education, but the Government is not concerned about this matter.

[Mr. Starr.]

There is another matter I should like the Government to consider. I refer to the salaries of letter carriers and postal clerks. The policy now in effect and implemented by the Civil Service Commission is that across the board from coast to coast the same salary shall prevail. In my opinion this is not right, because there are areas in the country where letter carriers and postal clerks can live fairly comfortably on their present salaries, whereas in large urban metropolitan areas letter carriers and postal clerks are nearly starving on the salaries they are receiving. Many of them are leaving the service for better jobs with better pay.

I place the thought before the Government for their consideration that they should consider establishing these salaries on a regional rather than an across the board basis, so the cost of living can be kept in mind when salaries are set for those who work in urban areas such as metropolitan Toronto and the immediate vicinity, in comparison with those who work in Northern Ontario or in other parts of Canada.

This Speech from the Throne, when it was prepared by the Government and read by the Governor General, was dubbed "a war on poverty". However, after close scrutiny one finds that this war on poverty is nothing but a camouflage; this war on poverty is nothing but a rehash of existing legislation. We will watch with a great deal of interest to see what will be done about the other legislation and the opportunities for young Canadians in the days to come.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take the opportunity afforded me by the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne to point out to the government the main needs of my riding and express my views on politics in general.

I must congratulate the mover of the address, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) for his wonderful speech, and the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien) who seconded it. Evidently, they had to admit that the government of Canada needs to take drastic steps to raise the living standards of the working classes. They also accepted and approved without discussion the measures proposed by the government which, in my opinion, are but aspiring to soothe the pains of a suffering population whose cries are becoming ever louder.

Mr. Speaker, the area I represent is relatively new; it is important that it should be developed rapidly as regards industry and agriculture as well as services in general. In the last few years the vast area of Abitibi has suffered from a decline in agriculture and a slowing down in practically every other field. Farm revenue is inadequate to allow farming families to live decently. While most of our farmers must work in the woods, on construction sites or in mines to get enough money to keep their families and retain their land, it is necessary to import from Ontario and elsewhere every week thousands of pounds of pork and beef, thousands of dozens of eggs and tons of all kinds of vegetables. And yet all those things could be produced in abundance in Abitibi, at least in sufficient quantity to meet our own needs.

Some increase has been made in the grants to dairy farmers, but a ceiling has been set. Farmers are not asking for a ceiling but for a reinforced floor so that they may earn a decent livelihood, overcome indigence and poverty, and enjoy the full benefits of the wealth which they can produce.

In the industrial field, mining companies have started operation in Matagami in recent months and others will also begin operation in Joutel. At lake Quévillon, construction of a paper mill got underway recently and small towns may be expected to sprout around those industries which will require all kinds of service.

Among the services which ought to be established are, first of all, air transport services and radio-television services.

The authorities of Chibougamau and Chapais have repeatedly requested government assistance for the construction, in the case of the former, and the improvement, in the case of the latter, of airports to allow the landing of medium size aircraft. In view of the results obtained and considering that such requests are fully justified, I think the Department concerned should take immediate action in this regard. Along these lines, I think the department should already be considering the construction or improvement of medium size airports in the vicinity of the places I have mentioned, as well as near the towns of Amos, La Sarre, Senneterre and Matagami. Lebel, on lake Quévillon, should also be considered.

Radio-television services at Chibougamau and Chapais should also be looked into immediately.

The citizens of those communities are entitled to a radio and television service just as much as the citizens of any other city in Canada. Incidentally, I may point out that those who want television must pay $81 per year, plus an initial payment of $200 to be connected to a cable system. They can pick up only one channel and the reception is often very poor.

The municipal councils of Chibougamau and Chapais, the chambers of commerce of those two communities, the Chibougamau League of Home Owners, the Chibougamau St. Jean Baptiste Society and Kiwanis Club, the mine workers union of Chibougamau and Chapais made numerous representations on behalf of their fellow citizens, asking for free radio and television.

At this stage, I should like to point out that those two towns alone have a population of over 12,000 people.

I made several representations myself on that matter and every time, the reply was: the estimates do not provide for this, and we do not have any money.

The Secretary of State (Mr. Lamontagne) said: We will have to wait for the report of the Fowler commission.

But I wonder whether he waited for the report of the Fowler commission with reference to the news item concerning the world fair. In fact, this is a report carried in the publication Expo Digest of April 7, which said:

> The project is to build another permanent building on the site of the fair. It would be a building provided with all the equipment required to broadcast throughout the world television and radio programs concerning Expo 67.

Radio and T.V. programs will be broadcast throughout the world, except to Chapais and Chibougamau.

I quote:

> This building will be erected by the C.B.C. at a cost of ten million dollars.

For the world fair, everything is possible; but when it comes to services for people who have settled several years ago in isolated centres, far from communication centres, then there is not enough money.

The miners, the taxpayers are the forgotten men. That reminds me of the depression before the war. In peacetime there is no money; but in wartime, there is no shortage of money. For the fair, no financial problem must stand in the way; every project no matter how fanciful must be achieved; money is no object; let future generations pay for our extravagances.

Mr. Speaker, the improvements I have just claimed are essential and physically possible. People are asking for them. The only obstacle, at the present time, is lack of funds. The needs are there. They could be met, and Social Credit would remove the financial obstacle.

The Speech from the Throne is no better nor worse than those we are accustomed to hear, except that it contains disturbing admissions which point to the weakness of an administration that failed to anticipate or settle the problems of an expanding nation. Government by the old-line parties has been an obstacle to this country's development and the welfare of its population, in that it has left too many people in dire poverty. The government has just realized it as evidenced by the speech from the throne; however, there are two rather contradictory paragraphs which I will quote. First:

> Our country is achieving a high rate of economic growth. Trade is expanding. With the growing industrialization, Canadians are enjoying rapidly increasing employment opportunities; incomes and living standards are rising; the number of people out of work has been reduced to lower levels than for many years.

And the next paragraph continues:

> All the great potentialities of our economy are not, however, being realized. The talents of some of our people are wasted because of poverty, illness, inadequate education and training, inequality in opportunities for work.

While the economic growth of some favoured classes of society is praised, it is recognized that a great mass of the population are becoming poorer and poorer; fortunately the government has just realized it. But what does it propose in this connection? For some, the situation has improved; for others, it has considerably deteriorated. The number of poor, poverty stricken and needy people has kept on increasing, and what does the government propose? Long term measures: to study the situation of the poor man, find out why he is poor.

In Health and Welfare of January 1965, published under the authority of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh), there is an article entitled:

> Fight against indigence.

It is subtitled:

> Canada attacks one of the great social evils of today.

I would like to quote the beginning of this article.

> In Ottawa, on a day in November of last year, about 50 people met to launch an attack against poverty, which is probably today's greatest social evil. The group was made up of experts from the federal civil service, universities, labour unions and social welfare agencies; they were all deeply worried about continuing poverty in Canada. They all knew that poverty exists. Many of them had seen appalling evidence of it; several were engaged in studies and research to find out the reasons for it; others were working to alleviate it. But they all agreed that a more thorough investigation was needed to gather all information available and discover what information was still needed.

It was felt that not enough information was available to determine what is poverty and want.

Among this group of people who met in November last, nobody was found to be sufficiently informed or intelligent enough, nor could such people be found elsewhere in Canada. That is why it was found necessary to ask another country, England, to come to our rescue. Therefore, the council brought in as a consultant, Professor Richard M. Titmuss, of the London School of Economics. There was no one in this country intelligent enough to find out what is poverty and how to fight it in Canada! It was necessary to go outside the country to find someone who could show us what had to be done and how to do it.

Here is what the same Mr. Titmuss suggested:

> Mr. Titmuss advised against a comprehensive study of poverty; instead, he recommended an extensive investigation on certain groups of low income families and individuals. He stated: "Proceed immediately by realistic stages like, for instance, the taking of photographs."

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that is going quite far, perhaps a bit too far, to determine the extent of poverty in our midst. If the board appointed to study hardship had left its large, comfortable air-conditioned offices and taken the trouble of going down into the working class sections of our towns, into our villages and everywhere in the country, it would not have had to send for a Londoner to determine the extent of poverty in Canada. You can be sure that if it had sought hardship where it exists, in its actual surroundings, it would not have been long in finding solutions.

I do say, Mr. Speaker, that if the members of that board and the members of the government traded places, not for a year but only for a week, with the unemployed—or even the people with jobs but who have inadequate incomes, who suffer hardship and insecurity, they would soon realize that it is not a speech from the throne that is required to remedy the situation of the needy in Canada, but rather a bill providing for immediate steps, rather than long term policies, as is proposed in the speech from the throne.

And here is what that board will do about those recommendations and others:

In the first place, it will collect and thoroughly examine available statistics to grasp their significance;—

Because they do not seem to understand their significance at the present time.

—next, it will select, in view of a comprehensive survey, a certain segment of the population, a lower bracket group which, as David Woodsworth said "reflects the absence of structures of improvement."

Well, Mr. Speaker, we found that article in a publication issued in January 1965, thus a few months before the Speech from the Throne.

Now, the only things we find in the Speech from the Throne are long-term measures, and the proposal for inquiring into the problem of poverty among our people, as if it were a recent development. This problem has been with us for years. When certain solutions were brought in, they had been overdue for a long time. And we are still at the same point.

Here is what the government suggests in the Speech from the Throne:

It will include improved measures for regional development...

This is rather vague and non-committal.

...the re-employment and training of workers...

It seems to me the Department of Labour has made such an experiment with unemployed persons 45 years of age or over. Or it may be that the advertising agences benefited far more from this program that the workers themselves.

Here is another thing we find in the Speech from the Throne:

...the re-development of rural areas.

This program has been in existence for a few years already. Millions of dollars have been spent to study it, but what, I ask you, has it really meant for our rural citizens?

We can see also:

"assistance of needy people"

It seems to me we already have a program of unemployment assistance, distributing money sparingly and of no real help to the poverty-stricken.

...the renewal of areas now blighted and congested in our cities...

Does the government see slums only in our cities? There are plenty of slums in our villages and our rural areas where large families have to crowd together and live in houses which are much too small and not built for our severe climate.

What the people want, Mr. Speaker, is the right and the opportunity to determine their own future, to decide where they are going to live, what they are going to wear and to eat, the education and the medical care they are going to get, what to do in their spare time. In short, people want freedom in security.

Mr. Speaker, we Créditistes are convinced that Canada, with its great natural resources developed by Canadians and through scientific and technical know-how, can provide each and every one with decent living conditions where all would be able to develop fully in the pursuit of their natural ideal.

The speech from the throne should have announced an increase in family allowances proportionate to that of the cost of living index since 1945. That would have been of immediate benefit to large families, the ones most affected by poverty.

It should have been announced in the speech from the throne that old age security pensions would be increased to $100 at the age of 60 and that blind and disabled persons pensions would take into account in the future the number of dependants.

It should have been suggested in the speech from the throne that a tax cut will be granted in the budget by increasing deductions to $5,000 for married people and to $2,500 for single persons. When we ask for those tax reductions, we are inevitably told: Where shall we find the money required to administer the country? Take it where it is to be found. Stop taxing workers with low incomes and turn to the Bank of Canada. It is as simple as that.

We are convinced that with an economic system reflecting the actual wealth of our country and banking on the will and industry of Canadians, everyone might live decently in our present and future abundance.

That is why we are asking for a reform of our monetary system through the Bank of Canada so that money can be made to serve man. Let us stop trying to solve production problems; they should be tackled by the producers; let us rather concentrate on solving the goods and services distribution problem.

But if the government included in the speech from the throne things which would provide immediate solution to the problems of the day, you can rest assured that the Ralliement Creditiste would have fully endorsed its policies. But the speech from the throne only contains long-term measures which, if and when they are carried out, will have become obsolete.

That is why, during this session, we shall examine thoroughly every bill and introduce all the amendments we may deem necessary, so that parliament may pass legislation which the Canadian people require for their own welfare.

For the time being, Mr. Speaker, we are considering a subamendment which I think all members of the Ralliement Creditiste will strongly support at the proper time.

[Text]

Mr. Jack Roxburgh (Norfolk): May I, Mr. Speaker, associate myself with the things which have been said in complimenting the mover, the hon. Member for St. John's West, and the seconder the hon. Member for St. Maurice-Laflèche for their addresses in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I sincerely want to congratulate these two Members for the very fine presentations they made. I would be very remiss indeed, Mr. Speaker, if I were not to also congratulate our fair and lovely lady, the hon. Member for Westmorland (Mrs. Rideout) on her maiden speech in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Roxburgh: She is a real asset to the Government and to the House of Commons.

The Speech from the Throne at the beginning of each session of Parliament is an important indication of the direction the Government intends to take, and I am very pleased to note the strong stand that is being taken toward war on poverty, a very definite intention of doing something for agriculture, and the promise of a better immigration policy —and my goodness, we certainly need one; there is no doubt about that.

I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that it was not my intention to speak in the debate on the Speech from the Throne, but circumstances have changed this. My real reason for taking part in this debate concerns a matter of vital importance to my constituency of Norfolk County and to me, their representative at Ottawa. As their spokesman I intend to deal with a matter today that I, as a member of the Government—

Mr. Lambert: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Laprise.]

Mr. Roxburgh: —certainly do not relish. I have no alternative but to deal with the statements made recently by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, because I must be fair to myself and to those whom I represent. I am very sorry to see that the Minister is not here this afternoon. I phoned the office this morning and understand that she is busy on committee work; but I certainly would have appreciated it very much indeed if the Minister could have been here this afternoon.

Recently there has been a great deal of publicity directed toward tobacco, cigarettes and lung cancer, and because of that situation the Department of National Health and Welfare, with the sanction of the Government, decided that a program of education should be carried on throughout the schools of Canada and that a certain amount of money should be spent for experimental purposes.

I would like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the tobacco industry has given its fullest support and co-operation in this program, and rightly so. However, the Minister has not been satisfied with carrying out the Government program—and I stress, the Government program—but has at times gone out of her way to make unnecessary, unjustified suggestions; suggestions that in no way—and, Mr. Speaker, I mean in no way—represent Government policy.

Mr. Knowles: Good for her.

Mr. Roxburgh: In her address here at Ottawa on March 12 last the Minister made the following statement:

> A ban on television advertising of cigarettes will have to be considered if other anti-smoking campaigns do not prove effective.

This statement brought such headlines in the London Free Press as "May Ban T.V. Cigarette Commercials, LaMarsh said" and similar headlines in other papers from coast to coast.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Roxburgh: All I know, Mr. Speaker, is that whether we like it or whether we don't like it, a large majority—a very large majority—of Canadians watch and listen to United States television and radio stations, and until such time as the Government of the United States takes the same action, any efforts along this line by Canadian television would be puny and meaningless. I would also point out—and I stress this as well—that before such a step could be taken—and get this—that step would first have to be approved by the Cabinet of this Government and not by the Department of National Health and Welfare alone.

• (3:20 p.m.)

During the question period in the House of Commons on March 31, the likeable Member of Parliament for Simcoe East asked the Minister this, as reported at page 12998:

> —is the hon. lady giving any consideration to asking the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, a public agency, to set a national example by removing all cigarette advertising from its programs?

To which the Minister replied:

> Yes, Mr. Speaker; I am considering that.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, but I suppose there is nothing we can do to stop the Minister asking the C.B.C. to consider something. However, I should like to point out that the C.B.C. is the body that decides such programs, not the Department of the Minister in the present Government. Actually the Minister could have, and should have as far as I am concerned, referred the question to the Secretary of State for reply; but I suppose that headlines are headlines, whether practical or not.

Mr. Starr: All the Cabinet Ministers have been looking for headlines.

Mr. Roxburgh: Again I stress, Mr. Speaker, that until this Government makes this a policy, such statements and suggestions by the Minister of National Health and Welfare should be regarded as only meaningless insinuations. Unfortunately, however, they are not so regarded by the general public, many of whom, like a lot of us, just read the headlines.

Before I go any further, Mr. Speaker, I want to make sure that everybody understands that nobody—and I mean nobody—is criticizing the Minister for carrying out Government policy regarding education and experimentation. In fact I read with interest the speech which the Minister gave on March 12, and outside of the one statement to which I have referred the speech was excellent.

I should like to point out that from the time the debate on tobacco and cancer commenced, the tobacco industry of Canada has given its full consideration to the subject of television advertising by programming late at night and by making changes in advertising methods—for example, by not using sporting activities or sporting personalities as the media in television programs. The same cannot be said, Mr. Speaker, of another industry whose product, by the way, is not only dangerous to health but also saps the very moral heart of our nation; yes, a product which is programmed from morning until night. Every day, at some time during the 24 hours, we hear that that old fellow John Barleycorn and gasoline just do not mix; but during the Saturday night hockey broadcasts they do mix quite freely, and at a time when the youth of our country, the boys and girls of Canada, Mr. Speaker, are watching the program. Even to some of us who enjoy beverages this kind of advertising has become rather sickening.

Speaking personally, I should like to see the advertisers take more responsibility for the type of advertising they use and the times at which they use it. It is not my intention—and I want to make it very plain that I mean this sincerely—to ostracize any product, as each plays its own particular role, some very important ones, in the economy of our nation. But if the Minister and her Department are really sincere in their effort to better the health and welfare of the Canadian people, I suggest that she take a really good look at this type of advertising. Because, Mr. Speaker, if it continues it will not be too long before the children's hour programs will be signing off with such quotes as "Be sure boys and girls, that Mommy and Daddy have their drink of that exhilarating, full-bodied beverage before they tuck you in your little bed. Good night, boys and girls".

This may sound sarcastic and out of place but, Mr. Speaker, let me tell you it is not so far out of place as we may think. There are many—and I stress the word "many"—products detrimental to the health and welfare of our nation being advertised over T.V. and radio to which the Minister could and should give, consideration, instead of just giving consideration to the one product.

While on the subject of T.V. advertising I should like to deal briefly with the C.B.C. program "This Hour has 7 Days", as it dealt with tobacco and cigarettes some weeks ago. The programming itself was good, but some of the facts which were the heart of the program—because facts are the heart of any program—were very far from correct. For example, this question was posed: "Would the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Government be prepared to buck the powerful tobacco growers' lobby?" Mr. Speaker, if it were not for the seriousness of this question it would be downright laughable. The tobacco growers, like the wheat growers, the corn growers, the milk producers, the hog producers, the strawberry growers, etc., bring their problems before the Provincial and Federal Governments in a regular manner and they are dealt with in the same manner as any other growers' organization.

The second statement made on this program with which I should like to deal—I should like everyone to listen to this—was that the Government of Italy had prohibited T.V. advertising of cigarettes, and that in three years the consumption of cigarettes had dropped more than 30 per cent. Nothing, Mr. Speaker, could be further from the truth. In fact it is a downright prevarication. The facts are that from 1961 to 1964 the consumption of cigarettes in Italy—the over-all consumption, that is—increased by well over 13 per cent and did not decrease at all. I can give you the figures for each year, Mr. Speaker, if necessary or if anybody wants them. I am taking these facts from the official report by the Foreign Agricultural Service of the United States Department of Agriculture which I received on Tuesday morning, so they are right up to date.

Do you know, Mr. Speaker, why the Italian Government banned cigarette advertising? The Italian Government did not ban T.V. advertising of cigarettes to help to control cigarette smoking, as the public was led to believe. The ban was placed on advertising only because cigarettes are a Government monopoly, and the Italian Government wished to shift a greater share of the cigarette market from the more frequently advertised imported brands to those of the Government monopoly. That was the reason it was done, Mr. Speaker, and the suggestion it was otherwise is an innuendo.

I am sure we will have to agree there is little doubt that innuendoes seem to be the fashion of the day, but the only thing that really upsets and worries me is that a public agency like the C.B.C., with the millions of dollars which this Government has granted them for operational purposes, have not a decent research branch. I suggest they had better use some of this money recently granted to them to do a little better research in their programs, and when they make such statements to the public of Canada they should see to it that they are factual, not innuendoes.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Until I started to look into this question I did not realize that smoking has been going on in this old world of ours for more than 400 years. It has been a source of pleasure and relaxation to millions of smokers. I did not know whether I should broach this subject at this time, but I think I will carry through and quote something which has been said by an eminent research specialist in this regard. This subject brings to mind a recent statement made by Dr. W. B. Ober of the Knickerbocker Hospital Laboratories in New York, one of the most famous laboratories in the world. Dr. Ober stated:

[Mr. Roxburgh.]

> They tell us that smoking causes lung cancer; that sexual intercourse causes cancer of the cervix, and that drinking causes cancer of the throat.

Lord help us all.

I have spoken on a number of occasions about the dollars and cents value of the tobacco industry to the nation and to the Government. I have no intention of dealing with this again, except to point out that this multimillion dollar business is providing work for thousands of Canadians and plays a large part in helping to balance the economic structure of this nation. However I cannot help bringing to your attention the fact that the tobacco industry is the most heavily taxed industry in Canada, to the extent of something like 7 per cent of the federal budgetary tax revenue, contrasting sharply, by the way, with the situation in the United States where tobacco taxes provide only 2 per cent of that country's revenue. Very few Canadian industries could survive if they were taxed as heavily as the tobacco industry.

May I make a few brief comparisons at this time. Cigarettes, the highest taxed product in Canada, represent 124 per cent of retail price net taxes. Distilled spirits, and I use this example simply because it is one of the highest taxed products in Canada, represents only 59 per cent of retail price net taxes, including Provincial mark-ups. There might be a slight increase in this regard since Ontario has decided to add a little more in the way of taxes on distilled spirits, but undoubtedly this second highest taxed product is taxed to an extent less than half that which applies to cigarettes. If automobiles were taxed at the same rates as cigarettes a family car costing approximately $2,500 would sell close to $6,000. I have given these figures to point up the fact that if one looks at the tax imposed on tobacco from a straight business angle, even the most anti-tobacco individual will have to admit that tobacco is subjected to more than its share of taxes.

We all know from experience—prohibition—that we cannot legislate any product out of existence. So rather than attempt to carry on a campaign of that kind, it would be much more practical, and only good common sense, for the Government to increase grants for study and research. I wish to suggest to the Government that they make money available in this regard from revenue collected through tax on cigarettes.

The first amount which entered my mind was one cent per package, but I did not realize how much that would amount to. Do you realize how much one cent per package would involve? It would amount to $20 million. In view of this, I would suggest that one quarter of one cent per package should be set aside for research. This would amount to $5 million. You may feel that this is a large sum of money, and so it is, but not when one considers the importance of this suggested program to the health and welfare of our people and to the economy of our nation. Mr. Speaker, I am sure we would agree that such an investment, derived from cigarette tax revenue, would be based on downright common sense. This money would be collected from those individuals in Canada who enjoy this product, and would not be taken from general funds.

If such a suggestion were acted upon, it would be more in line with the multimillion dollar crash program undertaken by the United States Department of Agriculture, and there is little doubt that such a move on the part of this Government would go a long way towards solving the present problem in relation to tobacco, and would do so without the bitterness which is being created by the present attitude adopted by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh). It could even eventually mean the survival of an industry that plays a mighty big role in the economy of our nation.

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, I join with all previous speakers in extending my congratulations to the Mover and Seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) and the hon. Member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien).

This is the third session of the twenty sixth Parliament, and as the old adage goes, the third is the charm. After all the fumbling and bungling in the first two sessions of this Parliament, it is about time this Government came up with a charmer. In the Throne Speech the lure that is being used on the end of the line is bright, colourful and attractive, but nevertheless deceiving.

Eloquent words and phrases with cosy promises have been used freely in the hope of reconciling the Canadian people who were subjected to many distressing experiences by this wayward Government—a Government that has continually embarrassed its own supporters.

If we are to believe that all these things mentioned in this Throne Speech will be acted upon and brought into fruition by this government, the results would leave this country a virtual Utopia. No one would have a worry. However, one must consider the whole program with much reservation and considerable doubt. One need only reflect on the promises made in the past by the disappointing galaxy in the Government seats of authority. Much of that attractive legislation went down the drain with their 60 days of decision. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, they have turned over a new leaf, and in this session things will be different. Almost everybody in Canada is hoping and praying that this may be so.

We hear on every hand of Canada's wealth, her bright future and of new vistas, horizons and unlimited resources. We do have all these things, and a virile and energetic population which places Canada in one of the most envied positions of any country in the world. Why then do we find ourselves in so many difficulties? Is it not because of Government inefficiency? We need and must have the positive and vigorous leadership which has been so sadly lacking in the first two sessions of this Parliament. If the Government cannot supply it in this session, they cannot expect the Canadian people to tolerate them any longer. Justice must prevail.

The most pressing problems facing the country are constantly brought to the attention of the Government not only by Opposition members but also by their own backbenchers. There should be no hesitation in facing up to these matters. The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) speaks of a war on poverty. There is not a Member in this House who would not support him in this respect. The same support would be forthcoming with regard to any of the difficult situations facing our people such as unemployment, low farm incomes and, in fact, inadequate incomes anywhere. It is entirely up to the Government to take the initiative and give the required leadership. A better and more sincere effort must come from high places and without delay.

My riding, and in fact the whole Georgian Bay area, could benefit greatly from more industry. We have much to offer such development, but apparently not enough to interest the Government. When the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) was selecting the designated areas last year I appealed to him to give the Georgian Bay area at least a second look because the Government could and should help us to direct more industry to that area. Finally I was advised that the figures supplied by the National Employment Service did not warrant any assistance by way of an incentive program for our area, even though nearly a thousand people could not find work in midsummer.

My argument, Mr. Speaker, is that the N.E.S. figures are not a true basis on which decisions on such matters should be made. I am thinking of our youth, the most valuable asset of any community. We have two large high schools in Owen Sound from which several hundred students graduate each year and, of course, many more from other high schools in our area. What happens to these talented young people? I can tell you that very few of them apply at our employment office for positions because they know it would be futile. There is an annual migration of these would-be community builders to the larger centres to the south and even into the United States. My point is that all these graduates should be totalled and added to the N.E.S. figures to get a true picture of our situation. It would be much different from the one that the Minister of Industry has been looking at. To give the viewpoints of some of the students I will put on the record the observations of some of them as expressed to our daily paper, the Owen Sound Sun-Times of March 26. Here is one by a young man:

> I don't plan on working in Owen Sound after I finish high school because there is little opportunity for promotion. The pay is too low here when compared to the relatively high cost of living.

Another young man states:

> I would definitely not work in Owen Sound after completing high school. There is no future in this city for a young person and the wages are too low.

A young lady states:

> After completing high school I would not work in Owen Sound. There is no chance for improvement here.

[Mr. Noble.]

Another young man states:

> I wouldn't come back to Owen Sound to work because there is not much chance of promotion here or a good pay rate unless you are in a Government job.

Another young lady states:

> I do not plan to go to university but I am going to continue my education and become a medical recordist. I wouldn't return to Owen Sound to work.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the spontaneous views of these young people, and hundreds of others would answer likewise. To have these young people leave for greener pastures is a tragic loss to our community, and surely the Government will not continue to turn its head but will face up to this situation and make some effort to arrest this migration of our best community and nation builders, not only from their communities but from the country. We will be looking forward to the fulfilment of some of the promises in the Speech from the Throne which must surely be designed to help areas such as I represent.

The tourist industry is bringing millions of dollars to Canada but should and could be exploited more extensively. The Georgian Bay district is perhaps one of the best resort areas in the country. Not only does it excel in magnificent scenery, plenty of unpolluted water, clean sandy beaches, but it also has thousands of the finest summer homes to be found anywhere. Our rolling hills and abundance of snow in winter have made us famous as the possessors of the finest skiing accommodation to be found anywhere. However, Mr. Speaker, tourism in Western Ontario could increase one hundredfold if a national park was established somewhere in the confines of this great tourist country. We have non-productive areas available which would be ideal for park development. Such a park would provide recreation and camping facilities for thousands of people in the large centres to the south who cannot afford summer homes. This would certainly fit into the promise of a better standard of living for all our people. There should be no delay in such a worthy development.

I move now, Mr. Speaker, to a topic that is close to my heart. I speak of the production of mink in captivity, an industry that had Canada as its birthplace. Perhaps as an introduction you will allow me to quote an excerpt from a speech I made to our mink fraternity in August of 1964 which was reproduced in the Fur Trade Journal of Canada:

The story of the mink is a fabulous tale and one would have no difficulty writing an interesting book with the wealth of material that could be put together about this little prince of the fur empire.

My experience with mink began in 1929, and perhaps in this year of 1964 I might rate as one of the pioneers. Nevertheless, in that period of 35 years there has been a tremendous transformation from a very primitive kind of enterprise to one of the most scientific livestock operations in the world.

It is almost beyond the realm of our imagination to visualize the fur industry without the mink and the magnificent contribution he has made toward warming the hearts of the elite as well as bringing comfort and style to women of lesser means.

The mink has put many a man on easy street; he has built an empire that embraces many countries; he has spread his wealth into many facets of our economy, and has turned thousands of tons of what was once considered waste into pure gold. He is a wonderful little animal. Now can we preserve him for posterity? I do not hesitate to answer this in the affirmative.

It has been stated in these pages many, many times that the mink industry would sag and perish under the weight of numbers. On this score I fully agree—provided the industry continues to produce mediocre to poor quality in the present astronomical figures. But there is a way for the survival of this worthy industry. It is to steer a course that will get a large majority of our production into the upper brackets of our quality line.

There is no easy formula by which this can be accomplished—it is a matter of personal application. In first place I would put hard work; second, keen observation; third, intelligent management. These three requirements embrace a myriad of details, none of which can be neglected from the time a young mink is born until he has been delivered to the auction house.

In my opinion the days ahead hold much promise if we put our house in order. Competition will be keen, and when it gets real tough there will be a levelling-off process, which each time it occurs will tend to solidify the industry. Canadian mink breeders are not handicapped—we have a plentiful source of food, our climate is right; our home market is ever improving, and we have enough of the finest mink in the world to build better for the future. So, by and large, our fate and our future are in the hands of the man each of us sees in the mirror. It is the love of the game, with its challenge, that really supplies the extra incentive that leads to the top of the ladder.

This industry is not confined to Canada's boundaries. Many countries are now extensively engaged in the business, especially the United States, the Scandinavian countries and Russia. World production was approximately 18 million pelts for 1964. The 1,500 ranches in Canada produced about 1½ million pelts valued at $25 million at retail.

It can be fully realized from what I have said that we do have the fear of world overproduction and of competition that may make our export trade difficult. Canada exported $16 million worth of ranch mink pelts in 1964.

The mink industry has all the problems of any other livestock operation, as well as some others, because of its short history and the fact that mink may never become completely domesticated. Some of us find ourselves in unexpected dilemma because our source of food supply has been contaminated by the unlawful use of a drug. I bring this matter to the attention of the House because it is of great significance and becomes more so as our investigation progresses. All indications point to the fact that diethylstilbestrol has been used in the production of poultry from which the by-products were sold to a group of mink ranchers in Grey and Bruce Counties and used over a period of time to feed their mink.

The results, to say the least, have been disastrous. I can speak with some authority on the matter because our own herd of 2,800 females and 650 males was severely affected. After sperm checking live males and post mortem work on dead animals by qualified veterinarians, we found that most of our males were completely sterilized. There is no way of checking the live females, but females which died showed no ovary development. Our only chance of any reproduction was to bring in unaffected males from other ranches and hope that some of our females might be capable of bearing a litter. However, 1,000 females were not mated. The full extent of the loss will not be known until after the whelping season next month. One authority who has made a survey—this has been an independent survey—of the ranches affected estimates that the loss will be at least one quarter of a million dollars. Furthermore, veterinarians claim ranches may suffer from poor production for a three or four year period after being exposed to diethylstilbestrol.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am deeply concerned about the welfare of the mink industry. I am concerned also about the health of our people who may be exposed to diethylstilbestrol contamination. This drug is being used for the production of beef cattle, hogs and sheep, but is not permitted in the production of poultry. However, I find it can be procured by anyone, with no strings attached. Diethylstilbestrol may be a wonder drug in the hands of a scientist or a doctor, but in the hands of a layman the results can be devastating, as has been demonstrated in the mink herds. Some control over the source of supply should be exercised immediately, and sales should be confined to licensed people competent in the administration. Furthermore I would recommend that much more research be done on all sprays, pesticides and drugs used so freely and promiscuously these days with regard to their relationship to the health of humans and animals.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne delivered on April 5 included many items of varying importance, but it was not as all-inclusive as some Members have claimed. There were significant omissions, and I propose to deal with one of the most important omissions briefly. I shall speak about the subject of the Canadian consumer and the complete absence of any mention of him in the Speech from the Throne.

First, just how important is the consumer in today's economy? At the present time the total value of goods and services produced in Canada is approximately $46 billion a year. Canadians have at their disposal for private spending about $27 billion a year. In addition to that they spend, through their Governments at all levels, several billion dollars a year. It is traditional to complain about taxes and Government spending, but I suggest that we may well receive better value for our money spent by Governments—in this sense I am speaking of Canadian citizens as public consumers—than we receive from our private spending or as individual consumers.

At least, at the level of Government, we have elected representatives who are in a position to scrutinize expenditures and bring the light of publicity on public spending. Further, it is generally true that Governments and other public bodies are sufficiently strong so that they have some power when they are making purchases for us. This is not so in our capacity as private consumers. In so many cases, it is the individual against the manufacturer or seller. Frequently, the contest is an unequal one, to say the least.

In the past, it was believed, according to conventional economic theory, that the consumer went into the marketplace to buy his goods and that sales and manufacturing were regulated by his choices. There was a companion doctrine which said: Let the buyer beware. I do not know if this ideal economic world ever existed, but it certainly does not exist today. It does not exist in this day of monopoly enterprise where a few giant firms can gang up on the consumer, not in this day when the extensive use of advertising and public relations techniques, reinforced by the application of modern psychology, has tended to make the producer depend, not on the real qualities of his product but rather on the skills of advertising specialists to present a favourable impression of his goods; not in this day when producers are wary of price competition.

It is not difficult to enumerate many examples of the problems of the modern consumer. Any housewife knows examples of false and tricky packaging, and the difficulty of determining the price per ounce or per pound of a product. I speak of the soap manufacturer who markets a box of his product weighing one pound three and a half ounces for 41 cents; a two pound eight ounce package for 82 cents; and a four pound six and a half ounce package for $1.40. Then, there is the toothpaste which sells for 39 cents for a tube of 44 grams; 61 cents for 82 grams and 94 cents for 162 grams. Different manufacturers use different sizes of boxes and tubes so that the purchaser has a difficult time determining which is the best bargain. We simply don't have enough mathematicians in this country to accompany each housewife as she wends her way through the supermarkets, trying to determine the price per ounce or per pound.

Then there are other complaints. There is the complaint we have heard for many years relating to the lack of standardization in clothes sizes. I noticed another was mentioned today. All Members receive the Western Producer, and in the copy for April 8 I noticed that Mrs. Plumptre, President of the Consumers Association of Canada was speaking in Calgary. I am going to quote these two paragraphs from the news report of her speech:

> She instanced garments and yard goods without labels to tell customers the type of fabric used in their manufacture and without instructions as to how to care for hem.

Later, in the same article I find this:

> Another project of C.A.C. concerned accurate labelling of "drip-dry" fabrics; some garments so labelled had been found quite unsatisfactory, and had not met the qualifications claimed on the labels. A set of symbols has been drawn up which will tell consumers how to care for these garments.

So we have these examples of the confusion which exists in the marketplace, confusion which the consumer faces every day. How do we know we are getting the best products a company can give us. Today there are for sale in North America steel razor blades which are much better than we have been able to buy in the past. It is important to note that these blades only came on the North America market after a British company entered the field. How many dollars did we spend for how many years on inferior products when we could have had these better products? We don't know; and that is the point. We don't know how many manufacturers are not giving us the best products possible because it is not in their interests to do so.

The purchases of household appliances by Canadian families account for hundreds of millions of dollars every year. The term "built-in obsolescence"—that is, the practice of making products to last just so long and no longer—has become part of our vocabulary. Automatic washing machines today all have sealed mechanisms. If the unit stops operating it must be removed and, in most cases, a new unit is sold. I am told by persons who know these appliances that if a small hole were left so that the main bearing could be oiled periodically, they would last forever. As it is today, an automatic washer in constant use is expected to last about seven or eight years. If it lasts longer, you are lucky.

Again, on the same subject, I am informed that it costs some manufacturers money not to put a safety switch in their lower price models. They do this so that they can advertise the safety switch as a feature of their higher priced lines. Refrigerators, for example, used to have motors with compressors. These units would last indefinitely if the belt on the motor were replaced periodically. But this type of mechanism has not been made since the late 1940's. Today vibrator and diaphragm units are made. They are quieter than compressor type but they do not last as long. Generally repairs are not made; you must get a new unit.

The old doctrine of "Let the buyer beware" is no longer acceptable. The idea that the Government should protect the consumer has been accepted by the Western democracies at least to some extent. At this point I want to interject a definition of government which I have always liked, and it goes something like this: The act of people doing collectively that which they cannot do alone. In a real sense it is the co-operation of people in their own interest, not something imposed by a disinterested third party.

When this situation is examined, we find that the Federal Government does act to protect the consumer in a number of ways. The Food and Drug Act comes to mind immediately. We have a Weights and Measures Division. There are the laws concerning monopolies and restrictive trade practices. There is inspection of meat and eggs by the Department of Agriculture. The Departments of Fisheries and Agriculture each have Consumer Sections. Agriculture has fruit and vegetable inspectors. There are postal laws concerning false and fraudulent advertising. The Board of Broadcast Governors regulates advertising on radio and television. There are Federal acts to regulate interest rates. Last summer an Advisory Council of Consumers, reporting to the Minister of National Health and Welfare was appointed.

But we can do better than this. I realize that much of the power and responsibility in consumer affairs rests with the Provinces. In British Columbia trading stamps are not permitted. They were outlawed by the Legislature several years ago, an action supported by consumer organizations. Several Provinces are now studying the subject of the disclosure of true interest rates. In the British Columbia Legislature this session a Bill has been introduced by a private Member requiring standard measures in packaging so as to make comparative pricing easier in supermarkets. Although the Provinces have a considerable responsibility in this whole field of consumer protection, the Federal Government has a role to play—a greater role than it plays now.

In 1962 the late President John F. Kennedy sent a special message to the United States Congress on consumer problems. He made a number of recommendations for consumer protection to the Congress. He requested that more of the information already in the hands of Federal Government agencies be made available to the public. He pointed out that the research done for Government procurement purposes had already assembled a wide range of information which would be of immense use to consumers. In Canada there is the Department of Defence Production which purchases large quantities of goods for government Departments and the armed forces. Presumably this Department carries out quality tests on some of the products which it purchases. This information could be made available to the public by means of regular bulletins.

I am sure most of us are familiar with the bulletin issued by the Consumers Association of Canada. This is a very small magazine entitled The Canadian Consumer—a bilingual magazine. The organization carries out tests of many kinds of products and recent reports have included the results of tests on thermometers, life-jackets, electric razors, steam irons, facial tissues and children's toys, to mention just a few examples. However, the Consumers Association has stated that it lacks testing facilities. It is obvious that they could render a greater service to Canadian consumers if increased facilities and technical services were available.

I note that in the budget of the Department of Finance there is an item of a $30,000 grant to the Association. I suggest that a healthy increase in this grant would enable this organization to do a more complete job of testing products and providing information to consumers. I do not know whether any of the Provincial Governments contribute or not. Certainly it would be in the interests of their citizens, were they to do so. In addition there are, of course, the United States magazines, Consumer Report and Consumers Bulletin. However, many of the products which they review are not sold in Canada, or the variety of the product in this country is different. So we do need the Canadian Consumer. I should like to see it enlarged and I suggest this is one way in which the Government could help the Canadian consumer, that is, by making a larger grant for this purpose. Speaking of the United States magazine Consumer Report I should like to mention that in the March, 1965, issue there appears an article concerning a bill introduced in the United States Senate by Senator Philip A. Hart of Michigan. It has to do with truth in packaging and the article mentions the problems the Senator is having with the food producing organizations—the lobby which they have been building up against the Bill which he has brought in.

Last year, on July 27, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) announced the appointment of an Advisory Council of Consumers. At that time I made the following statement on motions. It appears on page 5987 of Hansard and I should like to quote it on this occasion.

> This move to establish a consumers advisory council is a step, albeit a very small step, in the right direction. The minister must be aware that the Consumers Association of Canada and the Co-operative Union of Canada have both asked for a government department to handle the increased activity in this direction. It is interesting to note that we have a government department to look after practically every economic group in the country such as agriculture, forestry, fishing, mining and so on. However, consumers, who spend about $25 billion a year on personal goods in this country, do not receive the same sort of attention from the government as the other economic groups do.
> I think in time, as a result of pressure from the Consumers Associations, the Government will come to the point where a full scale department will be required to assist consumers in assessing the great variety of goods on the market at the present time. This is a step in the right direction, but it is a very faltering one, a very small step.

I want to emphasize again today the need to establish a Department of Consumer Affairs. We are very status conscious in this country. The fact that we have a Department of Fisheries is a recognition of the importance of the fishing industry. The creation a few years ago of the Department of Forestry was a demonstration that the Federal Government considered that this important Canadian industry required a Federal Department and Minister. The present Government saw fit two years ago to create a Department of Industry. I suggest that now is the time for recognition to be given to the Canadian consumer and that a Department of Consumer Affairs should be formed. The Federal Government should collect together all its present consumer services, plus any additional ones it undertakes, under a single Department responsible to Parliament through a Minister of Consumer Affairs. As I envisage it, this department could include the Food and Drug Directorate and much of the work of the consumer sections of the Agriculture and Fisheries Departments. Much of the work of the Standards Branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce would also be more appropriate in the new Department. Inter-departmental Committees should be established with other Departments to co-ordinate matters of mutual concern. One of the main reasons for removing food and drugs from the National Health and Welfare Department is the prospect of vastly increased work for the latter Department with the Canada Pension Plan, and the hope for a National Medical Insurance Scheme. Perhaps a more important, or more logical reason, is to remove the notion that the Government's interest in consumer affairs is so narrow as to be just interested in health and safety.

The Consumers Advisory Council appointed to advise the Minister of National Health and Welfare last year should be maintained but would, under the proposed re-organization aid the Minister of Consumer Affairs rather than the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In addition to its current functions, this Council should be given wider authority to take the initiative in advising the Minister on current consumer problems and suggesting possible Government actions in respect thereto.

All of our economic activities are directed to one end—consumption. It is time that this important fact was recognized by the creation of a Federal Department and the naming of a Minister.

• (4:10 p.m.)

There is one other aspect of consumer affairs I should like to deal with. This has to do with the whole question of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission and the Anti-Combines Act. We have been waiting for a very long time to see some change in this legislation; in fact, ever since the present Government took office. I kept quite a file on this subject. The first clipping that I have here is dated December 16, 1963. The headline reads, "Tougher Combines Measures Promised", and I will quote the first paragraph:

> Justice Minister Lionel Chevrier has promised to consider putting "teeth" into federal anti-combines legislation to strike at companies guilty of collusion, mergers or monopolies.

Again, in January of 1964, another heading, "Combines Change Looms". Nearly a year later, October 3, 1964, the heading reads, "Favreau Favors Law Change on Mergers". Then the following month, in November, "Seek Changes in Combines Legislation".

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) has made a number of speeches on this subject, and some of them were quite good. I have read them carefully and there is some very good content in them. He made some of them last year and I had expected there would be legislation by this year. In one of his speeches the Minister mentioned the difficulties of operating under the Criminal Code only; the need to prove conspiracy and how difficult that is. He mentioned the fact that his Department is exploring the possibility of non-criminal actions along the lines used by the Federal Trade Commission in the United States. That is all to the good. I have studied something of the operations of the Federal Trade Commission and agree that we could usefully follow some of the procedures which they use. It seems to me that that part of section 91 of the British North America Act which gives the Federal Government the authority to act to regulate trade and commerce should provide the scope for this kind of activity suggested by the Minister.

But even if the Federal Authority does find that it can act in the non-criminal field with respect to monopolistic practices, it is important to continue investigation of those cases which are of a criminal nature. It seems to me that conspiracies to maintain prices must always be of this type. Persons who engage in this type of activity are in fact robbing the public for their own profit, and they should be punished. Fines are not enough. Most of us recall the case in the United States about two years ago when officials of some of the largest electrical manufacturers were not only fined but imprisoned for conspiracy to fix prices. Then there are examples in the United States of civil cases to get damages from these companies. I do not think we have had that sort of thing in this country.

There is one other aspect of combines administration that I would like to mention. Ever since this Government came into office in April, 1963, I and one of my colleagues, the Hon. Member for New Westminster (Mr. Mather), have been asking questions about one particular report of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. This has to do with the question of tied sales, the practice of the oil companies forcing service station owners to buy their tires, batteries and accessories from designated suppliers. The Commission made a recommendation—this is over three years ago now—that the legislation should be changed. We have asked this question I think at least eight times in the last two years and the answer has always been "Under Consideration", "Under review", "An interdepartmental committee is looking at it". We asked this question again just last month. It seems very strange to me that with the help that must be available or can be obtained in the Department of Justice they cannot come up in three years with suggested changes to the legislation. It has been a very great disappointment that there has been no change at all; because the present Minister of Justice was a Member of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission several years ago and is a man who should know this field very well.

Mr. Speaker, I would again express my disappointment that in the Speech from the Throne this very important subject of consumer protection generally has not been recognized by the Government. This is a subject which is of very great importance and will be of increasing importance in the type of economy which we have in the Western countries. The Government should give close attention to this subject. As I have mentioned before, it pays attention to all the different producer groups of the country; each has a Department of Government—they have that recognition. It is time the Canadian consumer received the recognition that he deserves.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Forest (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I also wish to congratulate the mover (Mr. Cashin) and the seconder (Mr. Chrétien) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne who magnificently performed their duties and proved that they are worthy of the trust which was bestowed upon them. A brilliant political future certainly awaits those two young members, and it is encouraging that our party can attract and rely upon young persons of such ability to plan and promote its innovating policy.

I also wish to pay a tribute to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) who retains and will always retain the firm confidence of all the members of our party. Our people are certainly fortunate in being led, through these trying times of a crucial importance for the future of our country, by a statesman who, apart from enjoying the confidence, the esteem and the admiration of the whole world, understood better than anyone else the problems which arose and are still arising at the national level.

Mr. Speaker, before discussing briefly certain proposals contained in the speech from the throne, I should like to refer to the area which I have the honour to represent in this parliament of the nation. The riding of Stanstead is located in the heart of the eastern townships, one of the most picturesque regions in Canada and the third largest centre in the province, after Montreal and Quebec.

My riding is becoming increasingly urban although agriculture still plays an important part, while yielding to industrialization which should be given a new impetus by the recent improvements in the road system, the efficient operation of our industries, the leadership provided by our municipalities in making available industrial funds to facilitate the establishment of new industries, and also by the regional economic boards which can render tremendous services if they co-operate to carry out planned objectives.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, a problem is becoming more and more acute in my riding. The new activities continuously created are not adequate to meet the needs of our population and our region is losing through emigration, directly or indirectly, a good percentage of its population, especially members of the younger generation. The problem of creating jobs for our young people is very difficult to solve, and I note with gratification that the government is fully conscious of the problem we are facing to facilitate the re-employment of workers displaced by automation or affected by other economic changes and that it intends to encourage regional development and contribute to the industrial development of regions that are not developing adequately.

The eastern townships constitute an industrial, agricultural and forest region.

Our chief industry, especially in the two main centres of my riding, namely the city of Magog and the town of Coaticook, is the textile industry and the area has developed in step with that basic industry. It employs about 35,000 people in the eastern townships and today it operates again at practically full capacity and its production can be estimated at about $500 million per year. That goes to show how important is that industry, and I am confident that the Canadian government will always keep in mind the protection of that industry whose future lies upon well defined tariffs and realistic trade policies rigidly enforced by government authorities, in order to protect that important industry which ranks first in many towns in the province and the country and which, too often, suffered as a result of international trade deficits.

Granite quarries, among the most important in the country, qualitatively as well as quantitatively, are also operated in my riding.

A prosperous agriculture, national forest management will remain for a long time to come the foundations of the economy of our region.

All that cannot solve the unemployment problem but any recession in these sectors would complicate matters even more. A serious effort at regional planning would greatly help our farmers in the long run and responsible committees are now studying that matter under ARDA and they have already made recommendations.

The new measures to develop the economy of rural areas and the proposed amendments to the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act are welcome and impatiently awaited.

The dairy industry, which is our farmers' main source of revenue, will derive benefits from the new dairy policy of the government, recently announced by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays), which should guarantee farmers a higher price for manufactured milk used in this country.

The Liberal government does not merely pay lip service to agricultural problems but it is carrying out its election program so as to assist the farmers in this country, particularly eastern farmers, who have long felt neglected by the federal administration.

I should like, at this stage, to stress the importance of the Lennoxville experimental farm which was established in my riding as far back as 1914. It has gone a long way to solve the general agricultural problems and it is now directing every effort toward specialization, especially through the study of problems pertaining chiefly to our area. It has rendered great services and still does; and I hope the Department of Agriculture will earmark larger sums to allow it to play its part more efficiently since it serves a very large area.

There is also Bishop University at Lennoxville, a universally recognized institution founded in 1843, which has greatly expanded, particularly in recent years.

Another institution of higher learning is the University of Sherbrooke located at the boundaries of Stanstead and Sherbrooke counties. On June 6 last, it celebrated the tenth anniversary of its founding; it has grown tremendously; no less than 1,600 full time students are enrolled. The founders of this university had justly and wisely foressen the need for this institution whose good influence is felt throughout the area and even throughout the province.

Tourism plays an important part in our area with such attractions as Mount Orford park, renowned lakes, such as lake Memphremagog and mountains suited to the development of increasingly popular ski trails.

In Stanstead county nearly a third of the population is English speaking; the good feelings and mutual understanding that prevail there and everywhere in the eastern townships were often held up as an example for the whole country. This leads me to say that closer and more frequent contacts between the main ethnic groups would contribute considerably to lessen prejudice still existing, unfortunately, in various parts of our country.

Mr. Speaker, since it came into office less than two years ago, the Liberal party has carried out a good part of the program it presented to the people early in 1963. The atmosphere of confidence which replaced the inaction and indecision of the previous government, and the great number of long and short term measures passed by the government have revived the economy, reduced unemployment to its lowest level since 1957 and are getting Canada moving again as had been promised. However, there are, as in other prosperous countries, areas where the same impetus has not been felt. And the speech from the throne contemplates stronger action to provide for a more general economic development and further improve the social security system.

The report of the economic council of Canada has shown that within a few years, the main problem will be to find employment for an ever increasing labour force and that the present economic growth, although remarkable, will soon be inadequate to meet the needs.

The government has resolutely tackled those problems and, as stressed on several occasions in the speech from the throne, it will need the full co-operation of the provinces, which will be consulted in the new spirit of co-operative federalism. What was already included in our party's platform, which looked forward to a close co-operation between Ottawa and the provinces for the good administration of the country and the respect of their rights, in their own fields, in order to safeguard and promote national unity.

At a time when confederation is in danger, when dominion-provincial relations run the risk of growing acrimonious, this new federalism, based on interdependence of both levels of government, on consultation and co-ordination in the fields of joint jurisdiction, has proved its efficiency and has certainly preserved Canadian unity.

The agreements concluded between the central power and the provincial authorities do not constitute defeats or victories for either level of government, but increase the flexibility and strength of our Canadian federalism. There should be a fair balance of rights and powers to ensure the survival of our country, and this new formula will achieve it if all our leaders continue to apply it with fairness, patience and good will. A strong and prosperous province of Quebec needs a powerful and dynamic Canada.

As the Prime Minister was saying in his masterly speech of Tuesday last:

> A healthy federalism, a co-operative federalism is one in which the two levels of governments both fulfil their own responsibilities; and respect each other's, but they do so taking into account their mutual concerns.

The voice of reason and common sense has indeed found its echo among us. In spite of the outcries of a very small minority, the vast majority of the Quebec population only want unity and progress for the whole of Canada, as well as order and respect for the rights of everyone throughout Canada.

In the Speech from the Throne, the government also announced other plans for strengthening Canadian identity, in order to develop further a real national consciousness, a legitimate and natural pride in our country.

Following the adoption during last session of a distinctive national flag, a symbol now flying all over the country and throughout the world, which identifies our country as an independent and sovereign state, we shall soon have a national anthem, "O Canada", which, I hope will be adopted without a long and acrimonious debate, the text being modified to some extent perhaps, in order that the same feeling be expressed in both languages.

The Speech from the Throne provides also for an address to the queen in order that the constitution may be amended here in Canada, according to the formula finally agreed upon unanimously by the central government and the provinces, last October. The formula adopted following long discussions which started in 1927, is evidently a compromise, and as such cannot give satisfaction to everybody.

I do not have the time now to discuss this question thoroughly, but it seems to me that it should be debated realistically, without partisanship, bearing in mind that even though the formula may not be perfect for everybody, it represents at the present time the best solution to the problems of constitutional changes and is only a basis or a first step toward the possible drafting of a new constitution.

As Premier Robarts of Ontario said recently:

This is where you must start; you cannot do anything until you make that start.

[Translation]

The white paper clearly indicates that, during the various conferences, there never was any doubt as to the main objective, which was to find a way of submitting all aspects of the constitution to the Canadian legislative authorities, so it could be amended, repealed or replaced. Therefore, there is no barrier or obstacle here that would prevent any changes from ever being made to the constitution. In any case, such changes are seldom the result of a formal amendment, as we are taught by the constitutional history of the other federal states.

It is interesting to note that constitutional law is flexible to the point where court orders can have, on statutory provisions, a declaratory effect equal to that of an amendment. A case in point, the judgment of the privy council in 1937, on a federal social measure, where it was decreed that all legislation dealing with unemployment insurance, a weekly industrial day of rest and hours of work, came under provincial jurisdiction.

The constitution was also amended in the past by customs or conventions which have become binding or accepted with time. Measures passed by parliament have often had the effect of amending the constitution when not disallowed by courts of justice. I also point out that the formula confirms in writing what had moreover become a practice established and followed for several years respecting amendments which might affect the federal balance. The new climate prevailing in Canada in the federal-provincial relations and the spirit of justice and good faith which will surely actuate the Canadian parliaments or legislatures should ensure in the near future a move toward a constitutional reform adopted in Canada and for Canada, in accordance with present needs.

Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to note in the speech from the throne that the government intends to amend the Bankruptcy Act. I hope that major amendments will be made to provide for more stringent controls on the administration of bankruptcies.

The number of bankruptcies has been continually increasing since 1950 and, in 1963, they numbered 3,678 with a total liability of nearly $194 million. This shows the seriousness of that problem in the economic life of our country. To my mind it seems obvious and fair that this act and related acts should be revised in keeping with the needs of our times. In December 1963, during consideration of his estimates, the then minister of justice stated without hesitation that that act should be amended, that as it stood, it was in some cases inefficient to say the least; he assured the House that it was indeed being considered by his department's officials. Members of the bar and a great number of businessmen, associations, unions, etc., passed resolutions to that effect or sent briefs with recommendations along this line.

Actually, the Bankruptcy Act goes back to 1920. It was amended at various times before being completely overhauled in 1949.

No change was made to it for the past 16 years. Time and experience have now shown that major amendments are required so as to prevent fraudulent bankruptcies. Unfortunately, the act sometimes falls short of its main objectives, which are to remove part of the burden borne by honest but unlucky or ill-fated debtors and to protect creditors by providing for the best distribution of the bankrupt's assets. It will be argued that creditors fail to take advantage of the means put at their disposal by the law but, in most bankruptcies, available assets are not large enough to justify the long and difficult investigations and the costly and complicated proceedings which are required in cases of suspected unlawful acts and irregularities.

Out of the bankrupt's estate, trustees have to pay fees to the government for the administration of this act and a special department, under the supervision and direction of the superintendent of bankruptcies, should be set up to make the necessary investigations and, if necessary, take legal action every time a violation of the law is suspected; furthermore, special counsel thoroughly familiar with all the problems arising out of the administration of this act should be appointed. I think the most important thing to do would be to appoint one or several qualified and specialized employees in each bankruptcy or judiciary district, as required, to replace present trustees, and these should be their sole duties. They should be well paid and have no other interest or concern but to settle, as quickly as possible and in the best possible way, bankruptcies or liquidations under their jurisdiction; I believe this would put an end to practically all the abuses which often occur under the present system.

In spite of the heavy and important Liberal government legislative program, I hope priority will be given to this legislation which constitutes an integral part of our economic activities. We are most anxious to find out, when the bill is introduced, what exactly the government has in mind.

Mr. Speaker, parliament will be considering a program which shows that the government intends to carry out its welfare policies for the benefit of the various segments of our population.

With flexible regulations more adapted to our times, it will now be up to parliament to consider and approve, if necessary, anything which will pave the way for our beloved country to continue on the road to progress, our country that we love so much and that gives us so much in return, considering its immense resources and its promising future.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, before entering into the debate on the subject matter now before us, I should like to extend my congratulations to the Mover and Seconder to the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne to which I listened with interest. They made very able contributions to the debate in this Chamber.

At the same time I should like to congratulate the hon. Member for Westmorland (Mrs. Rideout) who, in making her maiden speech yesterday, successfully surmounted a most difficult hurdle that faces a new Member of Parliament. I thought it was a very good speech which added a considerable contribution to this debate.

I am afraid I will not be able to continue in this pleasant vein, Mr. Speaker, because my purpose in rising this afternoon is not to congratulate the Government, as I should like to do if it had been more effective, but I speak at this time because of certain statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) on Tuesday. I regret very much that he is not able to be here this afternoon because I do not like to speak of individuals in their absence. However, I have no control over the attendance of Members of the Cabinet, which is now represented by only one Member in this Chamber, and because I cannot defer my remarks until such time as the Right Hon. Gentleman is present I shall proceed.

The Prime Minister when speaking on Tuesday made an attack upon the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), during the course of which he drew my name into the arena. At that time I had formed no intention of taking part in the Throne Speech debate, but now I find that I must do so.

To indicate what took place on Tuesday I should like to read from the Minister's statement as it is recorded on page 32 of Hansard for April 6, 1965. The Prime Minister is reported as having said:

> Who was the man who praised his right-hand man in the front benches for introducing into this House and in Hansard a forged document which was designed to get us into trouble with our neighbours?

• (4:40 p.m.)

I considered that was a very serious allegation, Mr. Speaker, and I immediately rose and said:

Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The Prime Minister has not proved that it was a forged document. What he is doing now is smear by innuendo.

The Prime Minister replied:

Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend tells me that it is not a forged document or that he did not know that it was a forged document at the time, I will be glad to apologize to him. He has not taken the opportunity to do so, Mr. Speaker.

The reference of the Prime Minister, of course, was to the so-called Butterworth letter which I read to the house on May 27, 1963. I wonder a bit at the Prime Minister's raising this subject again after a lapse of two years. What is troubling him? Is he ready to clear up the matter? Has he some additional information that he can give the House? Frankly I would welcome clarification. Or is the Prime Minister just indulging in a smear campaign? I said it was a serious allegation that the Prime Minister made, and he then requested me to answer certain questions of his. I am under no obligation to answer those questions. I am not obliged to deny anything. I read that letter into the record. I made no accusation; I made no charge. I simply disclosed for public information a copy of a letter which had reached me after the election campaign in 1963.

An hon. Member: For what purpose?

Mr. Churchill: I have done nothing to deceive the House. I am not being charged, I hope, with contempt. It is only when an Hon. Member, with deliberation, deceives the House of Commons that he can be charged with contempt. As May on Parliamentary procedure puts it, if what he does that is a subject of criticism is done deliberately and with intent to deceive, he may then be accused and he may be dealt with by the House of Commons. But it is within the right of a member to make public information that comes to him, and that is exactly what I did. I gave the Government the opportunity to make a complete answer over a period of two years. Why was this not done? What is being covered up?

I should like to see the record cleared, and that is why I make no apology this aftenoon for dealing with this particular subject. It has been opened up by the Prime Minister and I should like to know why he opened up the subject again. I suggest that we might retrace our steps for a few minutes and examine what happened two years ago. In the course of the speech I made on May 27, 1963, I dealt with American comments on United States interference in the Canadian election campaign of 1963, and I gave four quotations on that subject from what I considered to be reputable Americans. They raised it in their columns. On page 318 of Hansard for May 27, 1963 you will find the quotations which I used on that occasion. The first one reads as follows:

Doris Fleison writing in the Washington Star says, "It could just be that some well-meaning friend here decided to give Mr. Pearson a hand. Precisely that suggestion is going the rounds with a rather important name attached."

The second quotation was from the Chicago Sun Times and reads as follows:

The issue is political in Canada. The American press release seemed to correspond with the position of Diefenbaker's political opposition, Liberal Leader Lester Pearson...For our part we hope Washington hasn't committed a diplomatic Bay of Pigs with our friends the Canadians.

My third quotation was from Mr. Walter Lippmann, a very distinguished writer who commands a great deal of respect throughout the world. This is what he wrote:

American dealings with the Canadian Government have no doubt been complicated. But the crucial issue is the same one which has disrupted American relations with France and shaken the whole western alliance and has alienated the U.S. from General de Gaulle.

It was a thoughtless decision to embroil the U.S. with Ottawa in a relatively minor aspect of the great issue which is posed from Paris.

My fourth quotation was from Mr. Richard Starnes of the Scripps-Howard chain who wrote as follows:

Adroit statecraft by the American State Department brought down the bungling, crypto-anti-Yankee Government of Prime Minister John Diefenbaker and replaced it with a regime which promises to be faithful to the concept of Canadian-American interdependence...American intervention was coldly calculated to do precisely what it did, and it was a brilliant success.

Those, Sir, are American comments on alleged American interference in the Canadian election of 1963 and that is the subject with which I was dealing on May 27 of that year. At that point I asked this question:

How coldly calculated was it by the State Department? In the brief chronological summary that I have given, there should be inserted a letter dated January 14, a copy of which I received in the mail.

I then read that letter to the House.

Mr. Moreau: Would the hon. Member permit a question?

Mr. Churchill: No, I am not answering any questions at the moment. I simply read that letter so that it would be a matter of public knowledge, and it gave the Government an opportunity to deal with the matter. Nobody in the House of Commons dealt with these comments I read from American critics of the alleged American interference in the Canadian election, but they seized upon the letter which I read into the record. It is interesting to note the turmoil that arose in the House of Commons on that day. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) rose in great wrath as the dean of the House of Commons and made this statement as found on page 319 of Hansard:

I greatly suspect that what the hon. gentleman is now doing, and he is doing it with knowledge, is that he is reading a letter which he knows to be an absolute forgery.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Churchill: Somebody says "hear, hear". The dean of the House of Commons made that statement which subsequently he had to withdraw abjectly, of course, because you cannot abide by the rules and make such an accusation against any hon. Member in this House.

Mr. Greene: You have not denied it.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Churchill: He was assisted by the then Minister of Transport and there was some dispute and points of order raised. Finally the Deputy Speaker, as reported on page 321 of Hansard, gave his decision in these words:

I do not believe the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has to deny anything.

That, Sir, is the situation in the House of Commons; that is the custom and that is the rule in this House. Hon. Members are not obliged to deny careless statements that may be made by people on the opposite side of the House.

I thought that would end the matter. Now the Prime Minister has raised the issue again. Of what is he afraid? Is it the prospect of an election campaign? Is he fearful of comments by Americans, such as the ones I have quoted this afternoon? Is he fearful that in the next Canadian election campaign these people, Doris Fleison, Richard Starnes, and Walter Lippmann may refer to the campaign of 1963 and may express a wish that there shall be no American interference in a Canadian general election?

Additional information has come to my attention since May 27, 1963. Victor Lasky, who wrote a book entitled, "JFK: The Man and The Myth", a critical study of the Kennedy administration directed to the American people, certainly not the Canadian public because it deals almost solely with United States matters, uses these words on page 555:

Then, all of a sudden, to the amazement of most Americans, the United States found itself in an unseemly row with its indispensable close neighbour, Canada. The United States, through a misguided State Department press release, brought down the government of Prime Minister Diefenbaker.

This is a statement by Victor Lasky, a distinguished writer in the United States. Then, Mr. Frank L. Kuckholm wrote a book entitled, "What's Wrong with United States Foreign Policy", a book written for the United States public and not for the Canadian public. On page 186, I find this sentence:

The United States government, on the other hand, forced the crisis in Canada which led to Lester Pearson's assumption of the leadership.

Now, I ask you, what is the Prime Minister afraid of? Is he afraid of American comment in the future along these lines?

I want to deal, Sir, with the so-called Butterworth letter, and put before the house the type of information which has been provided. I have already mentioned the intervention of the then Secretary of State for External Affairs and the then Minister of Transport, who shouted out in this house, "It is a forgery". The Prime Minister, as reported on page 322 of Hansard for May 27, came storming into the House to deliver himself of these profound remarks:

When this letter was brought to my attention, or a report of it, during the election campaign I let it be known then that I had received no such letter, and the United States ambassador let it be known that he had sent me no such letter.

Now, listen to this:

My hon. friend opposite must have known that, and therefore the letter was a forgery; of course it was a forgery.

The Prime Minister says, and Mr. Speaker you may use this in the future, that if you hear of a letter being sent to you and you do not receive that letter, then that letter is a forgery. Now what type of evidence is that? Two years ago the people and this House might have accepted a statement along that line from the Prime Minister without question. Two years later, there is uncertainty in the minds of members of this House and the people of this country with regard to some of the statements by the Prime Minister. On December 17 last year, 102 members of this House, in a recorded vote, expressed their uncertainty with regard to a statement made by the Prime Minister, an unprecedented action in Canadian history. This is the evidence given to us by the Prime Minister. I did not receive the letter, therefore it is a forgery. What nonsense.

An hon. Member: What about the Ambassador's denial?

Mr. Churchill: Thank you very much for reminding me of that. The Ambassador issued a statement, and I will put it on the record because I do not believe it has appeared on Hansard. No Member of the Government defended the Ambassador in this House. Here is what he published in the newspaper:

> The alleged letter from me to the Prime Minister, the purported text of which I understand was read into the record of the House of Commons this afternoon, is a complete forgery. The forgery was brought to my attention during the recent election campaign.
> I notified the then government that such a forgery was being circulated, and denied to enquirers who asked me about it at the time, that I had ever written any such letter. I reiterate the denial.

This is the sum and substance of the Ambassador's statement. There we are, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister said: I did not get the letter, it is a forgery. The Ambassador said: It is a complete forgery. Then the propaganda machinery of the Liberal party saw to it that I was condemned: I should not have raised this issue in the House of Commons. After all, the Prime Minister said if you do not get a letter, it is a forgery. He had not received this letter, and therefore I should not have read it in the House of Commons. So I was condemned all across the country for disclosing this information. There was an investigation instituted by the then Minister of Justice, Hon. Lionel Chevrier. On July 15, Mr. Chevrier, in answer to a planted question, gave this reply as recorded at page 2182 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I do not know that it is the practice to make these reports public, but I can say rather summarily what the report did contain.

This is the R.C.M. Police report.

> The investigation revealed first of all that there is no evidence that either of the two machines in use by the Ambassador's office at the embassy of the United States of America in Ottawa was used to execute any portion of the questioned typewriting.

There are just two machines, so a little foreign aid is required here. Perhaps they should have three or four. It does not say whether they were new machines or had been in use three or four months. I continue to quote:

> Next, there is evidence to indicate that the paper comprising the covering letter and its envelope are products of an English firm. Finally, there is no evidence to indicate that the original of the photo copy was a composite or montage, but photographic techniques used in its preparation could obscure such evidence.

This was the result of the R.C.M. Police inquiry. What instructions did they get? What did they investigate? Were they called off? Did he finally decide it was an administrative matter which should be referred to the Postmaster General, because it was a letter and there might have been a stamp on it?

You will be interested to know that no question was asked me by the R.C.M.P.; no examination of the copy of the letter in my possession was ever carried out. The R.C.M.P., the Department of Justice, have no idea whether the copy in my possession is typed, or whether it is handwritten, or whether it is a photostat. They do not know whether it was mailed in New York or in Washington or in Ottawa; they do not know the country of origin of the paper upon which it appears. In short there was no investigation at all of the copy I admitted I had in my possession—no investigation at all. It is somewhat strange that the then Minister of Justice (Mr. Chevrier) did not consider it necessary to have an investigation made.

I have reported what was said by the Prime Minister and by two Ministers of the Crown as well as by the Ambassador. I have disclosed, as did the Minister of Justice, the abortive and incomplete investigation carried out by the R.C.M.P. When you have as little information as this, you must refer to the press.

I examined rather carefully as many of the press stories as came to my notice, and I discovered that some of the gentlemen of the fourth estate had a little more information than was given by Mr. Chevrier or by the Mounted Police. I cannot refer to all of them but I do not think Mr. Blakely would object if I were to refer to his account in the Montreal Gazette on May 29. I quote:

> Informants say one flaw in the document was that in assembling the photographic stages the physical proportions of letterhead, type and signature were thrown out. The photostat, reproduced to the normal size of U.S. Embassy notepaper, would have the document's text running off the normal-sized page.

This was new and important information. In the Star Weekly magazine of October 26 a feature article by Don Peacock appeared, and in the course of that article he had this to say:

> But the giveaway was all in the body of the letter. Aside from the atrocious writing style, the contents were too long to fit on an actual-size-sheet of the embassy stationery of which the photostat purported to be a reduced copy.
> By typing out the letter with the same line lengths, spacings and margins as were used in the photostat, embassy officials found the stationery about five lines too short.

Then, further on, he said:

> The Mounties made the same typing test with the purported stationery as the embassy had and with the same result that the officials obtained: The "letter" was too long for the paper.

May I just summarize the so-called evidence at this point? There is the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the statement of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) who simply said the letter was a forgery. There was the statement of the Prime Minister that he had not received such a letter and that therefore, of course, it was a forgery. There was the Ambassador's statement that he did not write the letter, and then the evidence which the press obtained from informants that the letter when typed out on normal sized stationery ran over the page.

How conclusive is this evidence? May I suggest to people who are interested in investigating this matter at this late date that they should try doing two or three things. First they might type the letter on paper measuring eight and a half by twelve and a half inches. They will find that it fits. I had this done. It occurred to me that perhaps the letter had been written on stationery larger than the article which I have quoted called normal size. I have known for a number of years that there are several sizes of stationery used in offices—eight and a half inches by nine inches, eight inches by ten inches, eight and a half inches by eleven inches—and eight and a half inches by twelve and a half inches. Type out the letter on a sheet measuring eight and a half inches by twelve and a half inches and you will find that it fits perfectly.

Then I would suggest to an investigator that he take a photostat of the letter written on a sheet of paper of those dimensions and reduce it to the size of four and a half inches by seven and a half inches. He will find he has a photostat which corresponds to the photostat which was printed in some of the newspapers—the same size and the same spacing.

Then I suggest that if anyone is interested he might ask the United States Embassy to give him a sample of the embassy stationery measuring eight and a half inches by twelve and a half inches with the seal of the United States in the upper lefthand corner and the words "Embassy of the United States of America" embossed in the upper righthand corner. If they have not used it up by now they may have some left over from 1962-63. An investigator might also want to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether by any chance there has been any correspondence with his office over the years in the course of which stationery measuring eight and a half inches by twelve and a half inches was used by the United States Ambassador.

I took one of these elementary steps and I found that the letter did not run off the page. So what credence can one place in these stories from informants or from the Mounties—if that is accurate—that the letter must obviously be a forgery because it is greater than the size of the normal stationery? The Grit propaganda machine got working on this at full blast and I was subjected to editorial comment and attention in various articles, all because the Prime Minister said the letter had not been received and that therefore, of course it was a forgery, and because informants said that when typed out it ran over the page. I do not know how long evidence of that kind would stand up in a court of law.

There are some interesting questions which could be asked, and I wish the Prime Minister would clear them up. After all, he raised this issue; he re-opened it. I ask him this: If the letter was a forgery, why would a letter dated January 14 not become available in January, February or March if it was intended for use in the election campaign? I ask a second question: was the letter ever intended to be sent to the Prime Minister or was it a useful document for fund-raising if shown to the right people at the right time, indicating powerful support for the Liberals? I ask a third question: Perhaps the Ambassador had nothing to do with it. He issued a statement, but no Member of the Government defended him here in the House of Commons.

Far be it from me to question anything that an Ambassador states or writes but I note on looking carefully at his statement that he simply says: "It is a complete forgery. I deny that I have ever written any such letter." I am not questioning the Ambassador's statement but in similar circumstances I would have said: "I have never written such a letter; and I have never dictated such a letter; such a letter has never been produced by my secretarial staff and I have never signed such a letter." That is the type of statement I would have issued in those circumstances.

Another question: Was it just an ambassadorial indiscretion?—for this has happened with ambassadors. There is the famous case at the close of the nineteenth century, when a British ambassador wrote a letter which was used effectively in a Presidential campaign in the United States. Grover Cleveland was very seriously annoyed and the British Government was very seriously embarrassed. There was an ambassadorial indiscretion committed in this country in 1956, and if you look at the Globe and Mail for Wednesday, April 18, 1956, you will find—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret that I have to interrupt the hon. Member, but his time expired a few minutes ago; unless he has the consent of the House to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Churchill: Have I the agreement of the House, Mr. Speaker? I can finish in just a couple of minutes.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent, I regret.

An hon. Member: They don't want to hear the truth.

An hon. Member: Ain't it the truth!

Mr. Smallwood: Go back to the beer parlour.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): They can't stand the truth.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May we have order, please. The hon. Member for Fraser Valley.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, as is customary, the debate currently taking place is covering a wide range of local, regional, national and international problems. The Speech from the Throne itself sets the stage for such a broad discussion. Although it is traditional that very few details of proposed legislation are indicated in the Speech, I think this one is so general in nature that it is very difficult to know just what may be forthcoming. However, as we look over the Speech from the Throne we find that there are a great many items of real interest, and I believe that in one sense it does indicate that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the Government is interested in the development of human resources, as is indicated in the Speech.

Throughout the various debates that are held in this House we find constant reference to the need to conserve and develop our natural resources, and I believe this is very important. Too many times we have found that criminal waste has taken place as far as natural resources are concerned. We have had to face the alternative of revising our legislation, revising our concept of the problem, or else facing the inevitable consequences of our neglect. However, if it is wrong —and I am sure we all agree that it is—to neglect the proper conservation and development of natural resources, then I believe it is doubly criminal if we are to in any way fail to develop and conserve our human resources. This would be, I believe, the repudiation of the basic principle of democracy.

Someone has said that it is every person's desire to be somebody, to be recognized as an individual and to make a contribution to the age in which he lives. I believe this is basically true. However there are certain things that somehow or other tend to minimize the importance of the individual. I suppose that the very magnitude of the universe in which we live and the fact that so many of its vast secrets are being revealed to man today somehow tend to dwarf the individual. Then we think of the society in which we find ourselves, in which we are pretty well classed, not as individuals with a name but as a unit with a number. This, perhaps, also tends to submerge the individual in the mass of mankind. But in spite of this I believe that the individual, his needs, his aspirations, his capabilities, his welfare must be the paramount concern of those who occupy places of responsibility and leadership.

Therefore I would say that one of the basic principles of our democratic society must be that the individual be assisted to achieve a full and abundant life through the exercise of personal initiative and the assumption of individual responsibility. Every person must have a constitutional right to live his own life, make his own decisions, develop his own personality and pursue his own activities, provided that in so doing he does not infringe upon the similar rights of others. I would like to think that this document which we have before us today in the form of the Speech from the Throne is a recognition of this fact and expresses the desire and the determination of the Government to do something worth while in assisting in creating the kind of economy and the kind of society that will enable the individual citizens of Canada to achieve their true greatness as individuals and not just as a unit of a larger organization. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I just wanted to make reference to that particular aspect of the Speech before I enter into some of the more specific recommendations and specific proposals that have been made.

There is one that perhaps fits in very closely with this idea of the development of human resources and the development of human personality. That is the reference in the Speech from the Throne to the desire of the Government to establish new legislation as far as our Indian people are concerned. I know this has to do mainly with material things, but it does recognize the fundamental rights of the Indian people of this country. I refer to the Indian Claims Commission that is to be set up. Now, Mr. Speaker, I realize that the need for such a Commission has been constantly urged upon the Government; it has been urged by representatives of the Indian people themselves, by organizations that are concerned with the welfare of these citizens of Canada, and also individuals who on their own have given some thought and consideration to the problems that these people are facing.

In 1963 a bill was introduced in the House, Bill C-130; it was introduced for first reading on December 14, 1963. The purpose of this measure was to try to undo some of the injustices that had been perpetrated in days gone by. But unfortunately we did not get very far with that particular measure, or with many other measures for that matter, and now we find that once again the Government has indicated in the Speech from the Throne that they will be introducing a bill to establish an Indian Claims Commission. Following the introduction of Bill C-130 a great deal of study went into that particular document, and at conferences of Indian people that were held across the country a great deal of consideration was given to the various clauses. It was felt that if this was to really be effective in solving these problems and in dispensing justice to the Indian people, a great many amendments would have to be made. These were submitted to the Government as well as to various Members of Parliament—I suppose, to all Members of Parliament—and I trust that in the drafting of the new legislation the Government will take into consideration the briefs that were presented by the Indian people themselves and by other interested organizations, and will see to it that the very best possible piece of legislation will be introduced with a view to meeting the requirements of and solving the problems in this particular connection.

I believe there is a new conscience being developed with respect to the needs of our Indian peoples. We must recognize their aspirations, we must recognize their abilities and we must recognize their rights. If we are to fulfil our responsibility and recognize the basic principle that all men are equal, then I believe we must do something definite and positive to meet the needs and to solve some of these problems which have been of such concern to the Indian people down through the past years.

There is one matter to which I should like to refer which is not included in the Speech from the Throne, although perhaps it is in some indirect manner. I refer once again to the problems we are facing in my own constituency with respect to the Fraser River. On February 28, 1964 I dealt with the recommendations of the interim report of the Fraser River Board and urged action. I should like to refer briefly to what I said in Hansard on that occasion, as reported at page 381:

> Now, Mr. Speaker, we have this problem outlined for us. The board introduced an interim report in 1956 which contained specific recommendations which it felt were necessary and advisable at that time. The thing that concerns the people of the lower Fraser Valley at the moment is that in spite of the fact specific recommendations were made nothing has been done up to this time. We have been advised that the final report of the board will be brought in some time this spring, possibly in March. It is our hope and expectation that as soon as this report is introduced the governments concerned, both provincial and federal, will give immediate attention to it and will endeavour to work out a satisfactory solution to these problems.

As I pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that statement was made on February 28, 1964. The final report was prepared and tabled in the month of March. The question I should like to ask at this time is: Just how much progress has been made up to the present in carrying out the recommendations of the Fraser River Board? I recognize the fact that considerable study would have to be put into the problem. Engineering studies and all these other things would no doubt take time. But one year later we still face the situation where nothing tangible or concrete has been done to meet and to solve the problems in that particular field.

Last Spring saw the danger point reached once again. There was great fear in the minds of the people in the area that once again they would be faced with, perhaps, a repetition of the flood of 1948. The farmers of this area suffer heavily from seepage through the dikes. At one place there was a break in the dikes. We are now moving toward that time of the year when once again we face the possibility of a recurrence of this situation. As I have pointed out, apparently nothing concrete has been done up to the present to attempt to eliminate the possibility of this situation developing once again.

Mr. Laing: Would the hon. Member permit a question?

Mr. Patterson: Yes.

Mr. Laing: May I ask whether the hon. Member is not aware that the Federal Government made the first approach to the Minister of Lands and Forests of B.C.; that we committed ourselves to 37½ per cent of the $4,900,000 involved to raise the dikes in the Fraser Valley; that subsequently Mr. Williston, the Minister, called a meeting at Mission of the municipalities interested, and that the municipalities refused to accept their 25 per cent? Further, in respect of the Harrison area where the flood occurred last year I would ask the hon. Member to recall that we have made an agreement with the Provincial Government to proceed immediately, irrespective of the total job in the Valley, to repair the dikes at once and that that work is now under way.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Speaker, I recognize the fact that these matters to which the Minister has referred have come about, but I would say with regard to that one particular problem, the matter of the dikes, that it did take a very long time to receive a reply and for something concrete to be done. I was speaking to the municipal authorities and they were very concerned. They said that if they were going to meet the problem and repair and strengthen the dikes so that they would not be faced with the same situation again, the Government would really have to get cracking. I appreciate the fact that this agreement has been worked out, but I am not laying the blame altogether on the Federal Government. However, I would say once again, on behalf of the people of that particular area who face the danger of flooding, that we would expect both Provincial and Federal Governments to act with dispatch in solving this problem and bringing relief to this particular situation.

I should now like to deal with another problem, which is the main problem to which I should like to make reference today. I refer to the allusions in the Speech from the Throne to agriculture. There seems to be quite a section of the Speech from the Throne devoted to agriculture legislation. Part of the Speech reads as follows:

> My Government is developing new policies to enable farmers generally to achieve larger and more reliable incomes so that their living and working standards will be comparable to those enjoyed in other sectors of our economy.

This is setting out, I believe, the main objective in the mind of the Government regarding agriculture and agricultural problems.

If we look back to the last Speech from the Throne we find that reference is made to agriculture and some proposed legislation. But no matter how much pressure was put upon the Government and no matter how many recommendations were made, it did not seem as though we got around to considering the agricultural problems as such. Therefore, I hope that the measures forecast in the field of agriculture in this Speech will receive better treatment from the Government than did those included in the Throne Speech of last year. These references are very general. There is no indication just what specific measures will be taken or recommended, but we will await the details with a great deal of interest.

As we all know, Mr. Speaker, agriculture remains an industry basic to our whole economy. No matter how much industrialization takes place and no matter how much development in secondary industries takes place, agriculture remains the basic industry of this great nation of ours. In the carrying out of the activities in this particular area, our people face a great variety of problems; but it just seems as though the farmers cannot forecast or anticipate them.

They never know just which ones they will have to face from year to year. I think of my own constituency in the Fraser Valley, and of others which are facing the same problems.

Last fall once again the fruit growers faced a very heavy frost which destroyed a great portion of the strawberry plants.

They have been trying to figure out ways and means of reestablishing or rehabilitating the industry. They have made representations to the Provincial Government and have been successful in obtaining some assistance, but when one thinks of the assistance given to the agricultural industry in various parts of Canada by the Federal Government it seems that there should be some way in which these people can be assisted by the Federal Government, as well as by Provincial authorities. This is just one of the difficult and uncertain problems which faces the agricultural industry across this nation today.

In addition to those problems, Canadians in the agricultural industry today must face the difficulties created by a general increase in the cost of production and a decrease in net income. This problem has never been solved. It has been discussed and studied from many angles, but to the present date no solution has been found. I hope that the Government in fulfilling its promises contained in the Speech from the Throne will be able to come up with some worth-while solutions to this problem.

At this time I should like to refer to several measures referred to in the Speech from the Throne. It contains a forecast of an expanded program in respect of agricultural manpower. Such a program has been referred to in the past, and suggestions relating to this very serious problem, which exists in many parts of the country have been made. Agricultural organizations have referred to it in briefs presented to various authorities. The Government has shown some wisdom by giving attention to this difficult situation at this time.

I should like to read a statement made at page 18 of a brief presented by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. In that brief this is stated:

> On this question of availability of seasonal labour particularly we suggest that a special study group be set up, on which there would be representatives of the Canadian Horticultural Council as well as other Federation representatives, plus representatives of appropriate Government departments. It should be the job of such a study group to thoroughly assess the situation and the problem, and attempt to work out policies which can be effectively applied to prevent recurrence of the difficulties experienced in the past year.

No doubt the Government has given some attention to the recommendations of various agricultural organizations and, as I pointed out earlier, we will look forward with interest to the introduction of legislation which will assist in solving this problem.

Another reference in the Throne Speech to the agricultural industry is the suggestion that the Government is going to introduce policies which will achieve larger and more reliable incomes. I suppose this means that the Government intends to introduce legislation designed to bring a fair share of the national income to the agricultural industry. This is something we have urged upon various governments over the years. Representatives of every party in this House have urged this upon the Government, and I am sure that Members of all parties in this House have given thought to recommendations in respect of increasing and stabilizing farm incomes. Such an accomplishment would provide farmers with a better opportunity for budgeting their money to meet their financial obligations from year to year.

The arguments I have advanced in regard to the agricultural industry in general can be specifically applied to the poultry industry, the dairy industry, the small fruits industry and to all these various segments of the agricultural industry which must face these problems. These industries are all looking for help and guidance which will enable them to increase and balance their incomes, so that they may face the future with the knowledge that they can count on a certain income each year.

One other paragraph of the Throne Speech is related specifically to the dairy industry and the establishment of a Canadian Dairy Commission. It is my opinion that it is essential to establish such a body, Mr. Speaker, and in this regard I should like to refer to an article which appeared in one of the newspapers published in my area of the country, the Abbotsford Sumas and Matsqui News, which is a very reputable newspaper as are all the newspapers in that area. This article refers to the problems which the dairy industry faces, and it concludes with the following words:

> Mr. Brannick, President of the FVMPA, put it in a nutshell at the annual meeting last week.
> "Prices must be increased to the Canadian farmer, or Canada will become an importing nation." He added "this is unthinkable."

With reference to the dairy industry particularly, and to the whole agricultural industry in general, it will be a sad day indeed when farmers reach that point, which many of them have already reached, where they are not able to carry on and must go out of business, forcing Canada to become an importing country in respect of agricultural produce. At such time we will be left at the mercy of other agricultural producing countries, as far as prices are concerned.

The Throne Speech referred also to the movement of feed grain, and suggested the establishment of an organization or agency to deal with this particular problem as it affects Eastern Canada and British Columbia. In the old days when I first came to Ottawa one of our main themes in this House related to this feed grain situation. We urged the Government to adopt a program for providing assistance in respect of the movement of feed grain.

This situation is still critical, and particularly so in British Columbia where the industry is facing competition from industry in other areas which have access to cheaper feed. In that area the people are forced to pay high prices for feed grain, and find that the difficulties created as a result of these high prices are greater than they can surmount. We hope that the Government, in working out a solution to this problem, will be able to develop something which will be fair to every part of Canada, and which will give producers in all areas an equal opportunity to share in the benefits resulting from any policy adopted.

The Throne Speech suggests that the Government is interested in the maintenance of the family farm structure in Canada. Agricultural organizations across Canada have been concerned in this regard for many years and have advocated a program of assistance for the maintenance of family farm units. There has been a trend toward the development of larger farm units and the integration of small farms into large agricultural operations. These agricultural organizations have been concerned about this trend because of the possibility that small family farm units will become things of the past. As I have pointed out in the past on many occasions, individuals who operate small family farms do not do so only to make a living for themselves and their families, but because this is a way of life which they enjoy and want to maintain. They have no desire to move into the city and become units of a Canadian industrial labour force. Farming, to these individuals, is a way of life which they enjoy, and one which they wish to perpetuate. These farmers only want a fair opportunity to live with decency and dignity, and with incomes which are sufficient to enable them to meet the needs of their families. Therefore I would urge the Government to encourage the Department of Agriculture to concern itself with this situation. I believe that family farm units are an essential part of the general economy of this country.

I want to refer to a statement regarding this matter in the submission by the National Farmers Union to the Government of Canada on March 1, 1965. On page 7 they say:

> If the farm family is to be the keystone of national agricultural policy, this can be achieved through the implementation of farm policies which make it economically possible for the farmer to maintain his family and himself with a sense of dignity and at the same time apply sound farming practices to his land.

There are many other matters to which consideration could be given this afternoon but I wanted to refer particularly to some of the problems related to the agricultural industry. I wish to commend the Government for facing some of these problems and I hope they will be able to come up with an answer that will be satisfactory to the industry itself, and will be of benefit to the economy of our great country. As I have said, there are many subjects I should like to cover but time does not permit. Others of my colleagues will be dealing with various matters of importance and concern, and I appreciate this opportunity to call to the attention of the Government some of these problems of urgent concern.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Paul Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I must extend my heartfelt congratulations to the mover, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin), and the seconder, the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien), of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. If I may, I should like to single out the member for the constituency next to mine for the manner in which he represented the St. Maurice valley.

The session just ended was a long and hard one, but it achieved most gratifying results for this country, since we were able to move ahead in the program we had set for ourselves and that we had placed before the people during the 1963 election campaign.

I am glad to see also that the speech from the throne provides for a reform of parliamentary procedure. I can only hope that the new procedure will do away with the endless repetition of the same arguments and the same speeches, as was the case during the last session.

Why not set a time limit on debates as is done for the speech from the throne debate and allow the tabling of other speeches as having been read, even if there should be a day of discussion where party leaders or their spokesmen would state their policy which, I think, would waste less time while offering the same result and respecting the democratic process.

Mr. Speaker, the riding of Champlain which I represent—I like to repeat it—is one of the privileged ridings in the province of Quebec. After a survey, it was found that nobody wants to see it broken up under the new redistribution. That riding, located between Montreal and Quebec, is adjacent to the ridings of Three Rivers, St. Maurice-Laflèche and Portneuf.

My riding is both rural and urban. Cap de la Madeleine, an industrial city, has a population of almost 30,000 and the rest of the riding is divided into 19 rural communities, typical of French Canada, without forgetting my own native village of St. Tite.

It is not surprising, Mr. Speaker, that I should often ask for retaining walls, wharves and marinas, since a part of my riding is along the St. Lawrence River, from Cap de la Madeleine to Champlain, Batiscan, Ste Anne de la Pérade—the kingdom of tommy cods—with Ste Geneviève de Batiscan.

The city of Cap de la Madeleine is known throughout the world for its sanctuary which attracts thousands of people every year. "The Cape", as it is called, is an industrial city in the highest sense of the word and an ideal site, like all communities in my riding, to set up prosperous industries. We have a healthy and hard-working population.

The establishment of a steel mill in Bécancour was greeted with much enthusiasm in my constituency because it will have economic repercussions throughout my area.

Bécancour stands opposite St. Marthe du Cap de la Madeleine. Its fabulous development will no doubt provide a most sound argument for speeding up the extension of the Three Rivers harbour toward Cap de la Madeleine, for which we have been clamouring for a long time.

While Cap de la Madeleine has developed at a rapid pace and has a bright future, each parish in my riding would like to expand, and rightly so, and they are all opened to industry. I am looking forward to the day when each municipality will be able to live comfortably from the proceeds of industry and farming, as much from one source as from the other.

Farmers make up an important section of our population. They suffer, as all eastern farmers, from an unpropitious situation. The new dairy policy of this government will no doubt give hope to those people who, more than any other, need to be looked after. Under section 95 of our constitution, farming must come under the joint jurisdiction of Ottawa and the provinces.

I am proud to say that the speech from the throne will bring a ray of hope to the honest and good people who, let us not forget it, are the descendants of the founders of our country. In fact, it provides for:

1. Measures to help farmers increase their income and assistance to rural families;

2. The establishment of a Canadian dairy commission;

3. Improved movement and marketing of feed grain in eastern Canada and British Columbia;

4. Creation of a fund for rural economic development and amendments to ARDA, the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act.

What a gratifying program when we see the sincerity the present government brings into its fight against poverty, which should not exist in our fine country.

1. Parliament will be called upon to grant the Prime Minister the necessary powers to administer a program to fight poverty.

2. A commission will study the opportunity of creating a position of ombudsman, a sort of protector of the people.

3. The program of assistance to underdeveloped districts will be extended.

4. The creation of a system of assistance at the federal level, and many other measures to assist the people according to the concepts of co-operative federalism.

Mr. Speaker, my riding has known unemployment too often, and that is the worse plague which can exist. Employment is a source of happiness for everyone, and unemployment is a real calamity. I am fully conscious of this situation as a result of the many visits I receive from unemployed persons in my office.

Every man has a right to work, especially in a country like Canada, and it is our duty to look particularly after those who suffer, as the speech from the throne states so rightly.

This brings me to deal with unemployment insurance which will be improved by the government. I find the word unemployment a pejorative and I would like that fund to be called "Worker compensation fund", which I feel is more positive.

Why could unemployment insurance benefits, a social measure, not be paid to a worker who falls ill but who must nevertheless support his family? And yet, if a recipient falls ill at such times, he continues to draw benefits.

The reforms will no doubt remove all those anomalies.

I would also like the department to be more human and to apply simpler regulations to the people. I often think it is unfair for some people to be able to evade the law while others, through ignorance, are being refused benefits.

During the 1963 federal election, we submitted a five-point plan as follows: (1) revive the economy of Canada; (2) restore security; (3) preserve confederation; (4) develop the agricultural industry; (5) restore Canada's prestige.

Mr. Speaker, considering the accomplishments we have witnessed until now and this speech from the throne, we can formally declare that we kept our promises to the people, for after two years only, all those planks of our platform have been implemented. There is still much to be done, we are aware of the facts and we are being consistent.

I have received several delegations from my riding and I take this opportunity to thank the protective staff and the staff of the house for their courtesy and willingness to help visitors. However, I wonder if it would not be a good idea to put bilingual people at the main entrances because quite often people who can speak both official languages are relegated where such knowledge is not as necessary.

Before closing, I would like to pay tribute to our great Prime Minister who, more than any other man, has really understood the problem of unity, and I truly believe that he was the man chosen by Divine Providence to save Canada.

He knows how to engage in dialogue; he is the man of peace, that peace he personifies and spreads around him in our country and throughout the world. We are all the more convinced of that in view of the award he received recently from the University of Philadelphia.

Mr. Speaker, "a flame of ideals is burning in the heart of our fine youth", said the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche, a flame is burning in the hearts of all the citizens in my province. I hope I will see the day—not far away, I hope—when all together, throughout the country, equally, in complete unity and conscious of our diversity, we can sing whole heartedly and fully convinced "O Canada, beloved country of mine".

[Text]

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I should like at the start to compliment the previous speakers on their presentations relating to the Speech from the Throne. Both the Mover (Mr. Cashin) and Seconder (Mr. Chrétien) could be singled out for special consideration because of the excellent manner in which their material was presented. I would also be remiss if I did not compliment the lady Member from Westmorland (Mrs. Rideout) upon her maiden speech in this House. My own first speech here is not so far removed that I cannot vividly recall it, and sympathize with her in that rubbery feeling this Chamber brings to one's knees.

We have all heard comments presented from various sections of the House relating to various items in the Throne Speech. I believe therefore there is no need for repetition. My only comment on the Throne Speech is that it is a truly fantastic play on words. In order to describe the verbiage contained therein, I should like to recall an old Irish saying in our family which goes like this: Talk is cheap, but it takes money to buy whiskey. I do not believe there is any segment of the population that has not been mentioned in a general way for health or welfare. There is even a plan for those unfortunate Canadians who are in jail. Of course it is obvious that neither Lucien Rivard nor Hal Banks will be able to benefit, as things stand at the moment.

The announcement in the Speech from the Throne that Parliament is finally going to have an opportunity to discuss the agreement with the United States covering the automobile industry is indeed most welcome. It is long overdue. This agreement, which appears to be as one-sided as anything ever entered into by the Canadian Government, affects a wide range of industries in Canada. It affects the livelihood of many Canadians, and many of them are in my own constituency. These people want to know, what is this agreement and how was it made? How will it operate in the future? With all due respect to the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury), and I have a high regard for his abilities, the information he has given up to now is not enough. He wants Parliament to accept the deal and feel that he has made the best deal possible. I cannot accept that and few Canadians, I find, are accepting it. The Minister of Industry has been one of the biggest disappointments in this Cabinet, and that covers a lot of territory.

May I call it six o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTION TO BE DEBATED UNDER ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional Standing Order 39A to inform the house that the question to be raised at ten o'clock this day is as follows: the hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Howard)—House of Commons—consideration of Committee report on reproduction of Hansard index.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cashin for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Marcoux.

Mr. McCutcheon: When the House rose at six o'clock I had commented on the lack of information given to Parliament concerning the mechanics of the free trade car deal with the United States.

There are many questions that come to mind. What kind of deal is it which gives the big automobile companies a debate of $50 million in exise duties they would otherwise pay on parts imported into Canada, while not one consumer in Canada gets one cent of advantage out of it? We are told to have faith and put our trust in the Government because everything will work out well. We are told there will be a tremendous growth in employment; that the companies need this extra money for a few years for development purposes. The question which comes to my mind is this: If this deal is so good why are the ordinary investment channels not available to Canadian manufacturers for expansion? In this way the benefit of the excise rebate could be passed back to the consumers, the car buying public. Of course we have been given the promise that cars will be cheaper in price. But when? And by how much?

Blame for lack of information about this plan, and failure to understand it, lies on the shoulders of the Government as a whole, but particularly upon the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) and the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury). They go down to the United States, sit around a table with the United States administration and come back and tell us that all will be well if only Canada will cut down its tariff on United States automobile parts. On some bright, sunny day in the future, they tell us, the Americans may cut down their tariffs and let Canadian cars into the United States duty free. They tell us that the President cannot carry out this bargain until the Congress of of the United States decides whether or not to lower automobile tariffs. That is perfectly true. It is Congress which will eventually decide. The President of the United States proposes and Congress disposes. This is the principle of United States policy that Canadians have learned the hard way in the past. I do not think we should have to learn it the hard way in every generation.

Already there are signs that there will be opposition to such a move in the United States Congress. As a consequence we are in the hands of one man. Our auto deal depends on whether or not the President's popularity and his salesmanship of his ideas can effectively force this measure through the Congress.

One fact has been overlooked, however. It is that the President already possesses some power to cut tariffs. Indeed he can cut them up to 50 per cent for bargaining purposes. Did the Prime Minister ask for a cut to be made in Canada's favour? We do not know. Did the Secretary of State for External Affairs remind the Right Hon. Gentleman that President Johnson could have cut the United States tariff in our favour, had he so wished, without waiting for the approval of Congress? We do not know. Did the Minister of Industry jog his colleague's elbow and urge him to ask the President to make tariff concessions which might save a few thousand Canadian industrial jobs? We need 1½ million more jobs in Canada in the next few years, as the Economic Council has pointed out. I do not think we want agreements with foreign countries that cut down jobs in Canada; and I can tell this House that a lot of people are saying in my part of the country that the Liberal Government has lost its shirt in making this automobile deal with President Johnson. It is not the Government's shirt; it is the shirt of some small Canadian manufacturers of automobile parts and accessories. Do you think we are going to get our shirt back? Well, we are merely told to wait and see.

I mentioned previously that the future of this automobile deal depends on one man. This concerns me very much, because it reminds me of some of the things I learned on a recent trip down into the United States. I visited in Texas; in fact, I visited at the L. B. J. Ranch, not far from Austin. They get a lot of visitors down there these days. I would like to comment, in passing, that I can recommend a visit to Texas for my friends and colleagues in the House of Commons. It's a great state, and Texans are a great people. In our part of the country we see lots of Texans visiting Canada, and we like them. I submit that it would be a change for our Government if some of the Ministers got in their cars, as I did, and drove down. They then would find out what ordinary Americans think about this Government and some of the things it is doing. The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) goes to places like Hyannis Port, Philadelphia and Camp David. He has lunch with the President; he makes speeches, and he has his newspaper clippings about them. This is not the same as talking to the man in the street in places like Houston, Austin and Tyler. This is what is called the grass roots approach, I am told. One thing about Texas, when I was there in January, is that while it is a beautiful country—and they have lots of beautiful country—they have also plenty of dry, stony and rough country; and it looks particularly rough and dry and stony to anyone who comes from Ontario, the garden land of North America—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCutcheon: —and especially from that garden spot——

Mr. Whelan: Essex South.

Mr. McCutcheon: —the riding that I happen to represent, which embraces Lambton and Kent Counties. The L. B. J. Ranch is in the Pedernales country; and I must give credit to anyone who has made a ranch and a home in that rough country of rock and sagebrush. The President has a nice little lake right on the ranch. They have built a dam across the river; and there is also a nice big airstrip to take the biggest, fastest jet aircraft, so he can go to and come from Washington. Those Texans down there know Lyndon Johnson, and it is interesting for a Canadian to get the Texas point of view.

I would like to report what I heard in Johnson City, Texas, which is 11 miles away from the L. B. J. Ranch. It is a thriving place and has a population of 611. I visited with farmers and ranchers who came into the town the day I was there. I talked with them in the casual, friendly way that they have in Texas, and this one man in particular had a word of advice which I am going to pass on to the Prime Minister of Canada. We talked about Texas and the United States, and we got into discussion about this automobile agreement. I said to him, "What do you think about this car deal between the President and our Prime Minister?" I had hoped the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) would be here, because he could take some notes on real diplomacy as this Texan spelled it out to me. "Well", said this man from Johnson City, in his Texas drawl, "I reckon your Prime Minister better have his shirt well buttoned down, 'cos if'n he ain't, I can tell you who is going to have that shirt pretty soon; it's going to be our Lyndon". He went on, "You know, our Lyndon is one of the biggest wheeler-dealers in Texas, and if'n your Prime Minister don't have his underwear on tight, he may lose that, too". Well, I guess he could see that I, as a Canadian, did not like the idea of our Prime Minister losing his shirt and underwear to L. B. J., even in the cause of cementing the long friendship between Canada and the United States; so he added these words, "Of course, our Lyndon is a real Texas gentleman, and he will lend your Prime Minister his shirt back so he can get home safe".

Mr. Speaker, I am not worried today about the Prime Minister and his shirt; I am concerned about his image abroad. The Prime Minister may be the dove of peace in Philadelphia, but I suspect he is just a pigeon in Texas. I can tell this House that a great many Canadians in the small parts manufacturing companies around Ontario are worried about losing their shirts; and the sooner Parliament gets down to examining this automobile agreement and hearing directly from the Minister of Industry, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister the exact terms they have agreed to, then the better it will be for Canada.

I noticed in the London Free Press recently an article which was headed up, "Ford Exporting 400 Cars Monthly to New York State". It goes on to say that Ford of Canada has started exporting 400 cars a month to dealers in Upper New York State, the first time the company has shipped to the United States. This is datelined Oakville, Ontario. The question that comes to my mind is this: How can Ford Motor Company export cars to the United States of America and pay 8½ per cent duty to the United States Government, and still be competitive? I am sure that our American cousins are not going to pay any more for these cars manufactured at Oakville than they will pay for domestic models manufactured in the United States of America. I confess that I do not have the answer, but I can only surmise that Ford must be discounting their price at least 8½ per cent in order to be competitive. The question in my mind is this: If they can do it for Americans, why can't they do it for Canadians?

War on poverty is a fine, abstract doctrine, even if this is borrowed, like a shirt, from President Johnson. What we want to avoid in this country is importing poverty from the United States. Unless the automobile agreement starts working, and working pretty soon, in Canada's favour, that is exactly what the Prime Minister is doing; he is importing poverty for the employees in the production of automobile parts. So I have this to offer to the Government: You have no monopoly on knowledge of all the things that are good for Canada. Take us into your confidence some time; you might be pleasantly surprised to learn that we are as interested as anyone in Canada's welfare. After all, you should thank the Opposition for correcting a lot of your ill-conceived legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, like all other hon. members, I should like to express my thanks to the mover, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) and the seconder, the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien), of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and also to offer them my sincere congratulations for having carried out their responsibility so well.

In the Speech from the Throne read by His Excellency the Governor General, it should be noted that a very definite emphasis is put on economic and social problems.

The government intends to fight poverty and unemployment, improve the protection provided for Canadians against the dangers of illness, facilitate the adaptation of workers to new requirements of technology, stimulate the development of underdeveloped regions. All those are initiatives that will meet very real needs in this country.

Finally, the Speech from the Throne refers to the delicate matter of jurisdiction between Ottawa and the provinces.

The Government is only realizing now that there is dissatisfaction everywhere, hardship and poverty. Poverty has been deliberately maintained by the old-line parties, especially the Liberal Party which has been in office for 33 out of 45 years. We now have to resort to mobilization to fight poverty. What have old governments done to date to establish a debt free monetary system based on present and potential production? What are both Liberal and Conservative parties doing to provide, out of our colossal production, the necessities of life to everyone? Have they passed any legislation to protect the large family, the farmer or the settler? They all have a hard time to make both ends meet.

Under the old-line parties there is nothing but poverty, unpaid debts, mortgages, mortgaged governments and subservient people forever in debt to a few Canadian financial institutions and, in a proportion of 80 per cent, to foreign interests. To remedy this situation, instead of distributing our abundant available production, the old-line parties and especially the Liberal Party are becoming leftists in accepting state socialism, which is contrary to individual freedom, and they presented it to us as a remedy in proposing a series of measures aimed at correcting a situation which has become unbearable when they should be putting an end to that situation; they use it as a starting point; they put the blame on private industry and try to replace it. This is probably a part of a great scheme to establish a super universal state.

The strategy of the secret force calling the shots is very simple but effective: first, create unbearable conditions; second, state interference, with economic improvements paid through the loss of certain freedoms. There is the occult power which acts as a financial system to put private enterprise in a difficult position and which liberates the same financial system at the right time on behalf of public enterprise to make it look good.

It must be remembered that man is not born to produce, that life should not be spent exclusively on producing material goods. Economic security is necessary if freedom is to mean something, but once a minimum of economic security is guaranteed, freedom becomes much more important than wealth.

Under normal circumstances modern production is already more than enough to offer good living conditions to all. Why then all those programs for employment and large scale production with the intervention of the state, everywhere private enterprise cannot keep everyone at work? What is the purpose of all that when there is enough for the necessities of life for some extra comforts too? Why not leave alone those who are satisfied with such necessities of life, such comforts.

For those who are interested solely in material objectives, the employment and production plans may have a meaning for those who want a socialist state; they may have a meaning for the enlightened people from the London School of Economics, from this seminary for the training of the higher bureaucrats of the socialist state of tomorrow.

But they do not make sense for those who, like the Creditistes, have a broader concept of the human person, and they are distasteful to those who refuse to give up freedom for materialism. What every individual should acknowledge as the main purpose of economic activity should be to free man while providing everyone with his vital needs.

It is then that freedom makes sense and that it is odious to allow it to take a back seat it to the requirements of planners.

For instance, our fine pension plan which brings the human being into subjection, is one of the most socialistic measures ever enacted in Canada.

[Mr. Latulippe.]

I urge all right-minded people to join with those who suggest the English and French Canadians are able to solve their own problems and that since production has been organized for a long time, it should be easy to ensure its distribution. Our two old line parties have at last generally admitted that there is something completely wrong with our economic system and that it is also absurd to refuse to men devoid of the necessities of life the necessary money to obtain them, simply because there is such an overabundance of those things and that no labour is required for further production.

The factor limiting production of actual wealth has been the failure to distribute products, because the consumer does not have the money required to buy everything.

Production is short-lived, Mr. Speaker, when there is no buyer. Mass production requires mass consumption. It is therefore necessary to investigate the purchasing power mechanism in order to meet the needs.

And, while a surprising evolution took place in the science of production, no similar change occurred in the financial machinery. The system of distribution of the purchasing power dates back to centuries of scarcity when there were insufficient goods to meet the needs of the people.

There should be an end to worries, to unjust orders issued to protect some friends at the expense of other people. There should be an end to requests for privileges; now it is the people's turn to live.

The citizens want their freedom and I think that sooner or later there will be a freedom march of the Canadian citizens.

Governments have always found money to wage war or arrange for international massacres. They have always found a means to finance their war budgets. The budget and the economy were balanced in wartime. Natural resources and productivity were successfully mobilized. The necessary capital was always found to wage war. Nothing was impossible for the sake of war. What we did to win the war, let us do it now for the sake of peace. What was spent for guns, let us spend for our fellow citizens, our children and ourselves.

Let us now accelerate our production and our productivity and let us put all these goods at the disposal of our fellow citizens. Let us help our poverty stricken families. Let us put an end to poverty and indigence. Let us put an end to ignorance, incompetence and unemployment. Let us put all our adults to work; it is done in other countries. Would we be incompetent, mentally retarded, careless with regard to our most urgent problems? Are our best brains, our experts at the end of their rope?

Let us improve the lives of our citizens. Let production meet the needs of the people in their homes. This is possible. For that we only have to put at the disposal of Canadians the necessary purchasing power.

If society is able to provide the arms and the brains, it is the duty of governments to provide individuals with the purchasing power necessary to their development.

If, Mr. Speaker, interest rates on capital are too high, let us lower them. No one in this parliament has asked to lower the rates of interest which are too high, to bring to reason finance companies. There is no one either among the Liberals or among the Conservatives who would have the courage to ask that order be restored to the economic situation.

It is absurd that capital assets should always be more protected than human capital. Men are neglected but the golden calf —or is it made of silver or bronze—is always protected.

In 1964, Mr. Speaker, the total amount of taxes paid by the taxpayers exceeded what the citizens had spent for food, clothing and housing.

In 1964, each taxpayer paid about $800 out of his income solely for the federal government administration, that is almost 20 per cent of the average wage which is $4,200. It is a real shame. It is perfectly absurd. This, Mr. Speaker, is not the way to solve the problems of poverty amidst plenty.

On many occasions, I directed some questions to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh), to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) as well as to the government. I asked for an increase in family allowances, and the reply was that the government was considering the opportunity of increasing family allowances in order that they may be attuned to the tempo of the other sections of the national economy.

Do not forget that an eight-year old child, for instance, receives from our governments an allowance of $6 if he lives with his family, $65 in a foster home and up to $90 and $120 in orphanages and institutions. Such differences are recognized as normal and legitimate. These figures may be checked. They are a matter of public record. Why not increase family allowances to bring them in line with the rise in the cost of living?

Mr. Speaker, I believe that if we wanted to bring family allowances in line with the cost of living, they would have to be at least $1 per day. The reply of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and of the Prime Minister is always about the same, vague and non-committal.

> The government is always on the look-out for means to improve social security programs in Canada, and any decision in this respect will be announced in due course.

This is a word-for-word quotation from the debates of the House of Commons.

Since July 1944, that is since the enactment of the legislation, family allowances have remained at the same level, namely $6 and $8 per month, while in all other sectors of the economy, everything was multiplied by four, six, eight, ten and 11 as statistics show clearly. Why not the same escalation when human beings are concerned, especially when our children, the future citizens of Canada, are concerned?

In Canada, in 1964-65, there is no shortage of goods, housing, clothing, food or medical care. All that is plentiful. Manufacturers and businessmen want to sell, families have obvious needs. Nevertheless, the products are not sold according to the needs because of a lack of money in the family. The responsibility to remedy such a situation by restoring the proper balance of the economy rests with the government; that would give the consumers, our Canadian families, a purchasing power equal to the production yields.

What have you done, Grits or Tories, what solutions have you offered in these so-called 20 years of progress, so that the people could live according to the production capacity of the country, and not according to restrictions imposed by those who control money and credit? You have done nothing except increase our debt and consolidate the position of the financial dictatorship. During all that time, the only thing you did was to rob some to enable others to live or exist.

You have done nothing to make the material development work for Canadian individuals and families.

All that was done was to take note of the representations and suggestions of the people which means that nobody really deals with them, and for the people, the only alternative will be to live in patience or to die of despair.

It is easy to stifle the efforts of the awakeners of the masses. Mouldering in forced idleness and insecurity, are not those people ripe to accept anything?

You members of old-line parties you are responsible for the present chaos, you are responsible for the waste of the precious time we would have to find a solution to the defects of the economy. Certainly, it will be necessary some day to find a financial machine which will help Canadians, instead of punishing them, a machine which will make money to meet requirements, instead of merely creating debts; a machine which will increase purchasing power as the people increase production, instead of reducing this power through ever increasing taxes, without consideration for human beings.

Mr. Speaker, the right to life, the right to the means of living is a birthright, a right which implies the duty to respect the same right of others, by allowing them a reasonable standard of living, in a country where there is plenty of everything and where goods and skills are lost for lack of financial means. An addition to a family should not deprive the other members of the family or of the country of a decent livelihood.

Mr. Speaker, I ask this question. In order to benefit from the progress of science, to get three meals a day, is it necessary to be a dog? If not, let something be done.

Mr. Speaker, there is injustice in taxation; large institutions are favoured at the expense of private citizens. This is done to protect once more capital and especially interest.

In this way, companies and large institutions are afforded more opportunities to increase their dividends so that their shares may rise on the stock market. All that concerns only 10 per cent of the population: the mighty, the rich and the learned in Canada. All that gives nothing to the 80 per cent that forms the bulk of the people. Here we represent the people, we must see that they get justice, security and liberty.

Here are some very definite examples where the government grants great privileges to companies, while denying them to individuals.

First, the tax form for 1962 shows that companies pay only 21 per cent on their profits on the first $35,000 and only 50 per cent above $35,000 and there is no limitation, while individuals pay 50 per cent as soon as their taxable income has reached $25,000 and up to 80 per cent on larger sums.

Second, between 1954 and 1963, during a ten-year period of prosperity, the personal income tax went up by over $1,000 million whereas the corporation income tax remained at the same level, as can be seen on page 1041 of the French edition of The Canada Year Book, at approximately $116 million.

In the field of national economy, Mr. Speaker, before 1962, under various old age assistance programs, monthly payments of $20 or $25 to $40 were made to needy older citizens who presented an application and submitted to a means test.

In 1952, the government set up old age security, thus guaranteeing a pension of $40 a month to any person of 70 or over, without any means test.

That pension was raised to $46, on July 1, 1957, and to $55 on November 1 of the same year. On February 1, 1962, it was further increased to $65 a month and then again to $75 on October 1, 1963.

Consequently, old age security was raised in 1952, 1957, 1962 and 1963, five increases from 1952 to 1963.

Members' indemnities, including expense allowances, which were $4,000 in 1944, were raised to $18,000 in 1963. In fact, this indemnity which was $2,500 in 1906, $4,000 in 1920, $6,000 in 1945, $10,000 in 1954, is now $18,000.

On the other hand, family allowances, voted in 1944 and paid since July 1945, were $5, $6, $7 and $8 for children under 16. This was raised from $6 to $8 in 1957, before the surprise election called by the Right Hon. Leader of the present Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker). This increase represented, on the average, one cent per day or 30 cents per month, for every child under 16. On the other hand, from 1944 to 1957, the price of milk went up five cents a quart.

Mr. Speaker, nothing was done on behalf of the families, on behalf of those who are the nation, the real nation, on behalf of the survival of Canadians, and toward the development of French Canadians. Nothing was done apart from levying new taxes, imposing new burdens and vexations. Those are the only achievements of our governments during 33 years of Liberal administration and during the rest of the time by the Conservative administration.

No one ever paid any attention to the people. However, many schemes were devised. Every possible formula and means were found to wage war, to promote the expansion of high finance and the good of barons of finance. Measures were taken to favour only the powerful, to increase the rates of interest and to endorse loans for provinces, municipalities and school boards. We have come to the point where we are now endorsing for individuals. The only thing the federal government can do is to become an endorser and to adopt a patronizing attitude toward the large financial institutions, to the prejudice of the family.

After 33 years of Liberal administration, we are beginning to notice a feeling of unrest within society and to be aware of the need for reforms. But should those reforms be carried out by taking more money out of the pockets of the taxpayer, who has not enough already, how is this going to straighten out matters? The reforms proposed by this government will come to nothing.

The speech from the throne is vague and contains no concrete solution. The solutions that are being proposed and the reforms that are mentioned are general reforms. They are not likely to benefit the individual, the family; they do not tend to protect the family, in brief those who need to be protected.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

[Text]

Mr. J. E. Lloyd (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the motion proposed by the hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) and seconded by the hon. Member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien). Both gentlemen discharged the traditional duties assigned to them with impressive eloquence. Reflecting upon the work and exhausting efforts of the past two sessions, the hon. Member for St. John's West chose this occasion to pay tribute to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson). He said that the Prime Minister had shown a rare and perceptive talent for dealing with particular and urgent problems of this nation. Today, I add that the contents of the Speech from the Throne eloquently support that conclusion. The hon. Member for St. John's West went on to say that the Prime Minister was acutely aware of the situations in Canada and is magnificently equipped to deal with them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, events of the past few days have focused attention on the performance of Canada's Prime Minister. Canadians, and indeed people throughout the entire world, recently watched with great concern the escalation of the war in Viet Nam. All were grateful when Canada's Prime Minister, in a speech in Philadelphia, put forward constructive proposals that might remove another threat to world peace. Our thankfulness deepened yesterday when we learned that the President of the United States had shifted the emphasis of the United States from military to diplomatic measures in Southeast Asia. The Ottawa Citizen of April 8 reports the news in these words:

> President Johnson has broken the impasse over Viet Nam with a declaration of willingness to hold "unconditional discussions" for a peaceful settlement.
> He also proposed a vast Southeast Asian development scheme to which he said the U.S. would contribute one billion dollars as a starter.
> The latter idea was phrased in almost the same terms used by Prime Minister Pearson last week.

It was a time of greatness, Mr. Speaker. Two men, President Johnson and Prime Minister Pearson, exhibited to the world that they possessed that quality when it was urgently needed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne contained many references to international matters; and the meaningfulness of this, as well as of the reality and the need to be involved in these affairs, was very well illustrated in the past few days. In addition, the Speech from the Throne deals with matters of development in Canada. We are concerned with the problems and factors of economic growth. There will be no easy answer to the challenge put to us by the Economic Council. Indeed, it would be absolutely foolish for us to expect that the solution we require to meet that challenge will be found simply and only in some tinkering with credit. It goes far beyond the question of credit.

Let us examine what the Economic Council has to say, and the effect that involvement in their proposals may have on urban regions of Canada and the rural areas of this country. Last December the Economic Council of Canada published its first annual review. The Council projected the expansion of the labour force and population growth through to 1970. By 1970 it is expected that over one million persons will be added to the labour force. The dominant factor, the report points out, is an increase in Canada's population of working age. Reflecting the high birth rate in the ten years following the war, the number of people in the 20 to 24 age group is expected to increase by 33 per cent from 1965 to 1970. By the end of the decade, the increase will be 55 per cent. The average increase in the sixties of the 20 to 24 age group will be ten times that of the fifties.

The Council noted another significant element of change in the labour force. Ten years from now three out of ten married women are expected to be in the labour force, compared with only one out of ten in the fifties. The population of Canada last year crossed the 19 million mark. By 1970 we can reach 22 million, and the decade of the sixties will roughly see an increase of 22 per cent. The Economic Council continues to observe that with the massive inflow of young people, the rapid increase in the number of working wives, the labour force is expected to grow at a faster pace than the population. Speaking of the increase in labour force, allowance must be made for a reduction in the current rate of unemployment. The challenging conclusion by the Council is an additional 1.5 million jobs between 1963 and 1970.

In the light of that realistic appraisal the justification for the much debated Canada Pension Plan became apparent. The funds it accumulates over the next ten to 15 years will be fully required to supplement the massive social capital needs of the Provinces and their municipalities in making their contribution to the essential growth of the economy. It is also clear that the portable benefits at age 65 of the Canada Pension Plan phased into maximum payments over the next ten years is a practical and timely measure. The same observation applies to the reduction of the retirement test of the Old Age Security benefit from age 70 to age 65 over the next five years. Competition for jobs in the next decade will make it increasingly difficult for our citizens of retirement age to obtain and hold remunerative employment. It should be noted that over 60 per cent of our labour force are not covered by private pension plans.

I was pleased to note that in the Speech from the Throne reference is made to the need for us to become involved in legislation which will bring about a consolidation of a number of assistance plans and bring about an improvement in the assistance provided under existing arrangements. The scheme is to be called the Canada Assistance Plan. There is no doubt in my mind that this is the next step to be taken. Those of us who were actively concerned with the Canada Pension Plan recognized that it needed to be done.

We thought that before increasing flat rate benefits we should take a first step with the Canada Pension Plan and then go on to a second stage, one to proceed concurrently with the pension plan itself.

Between 1963 and 1970 the pace of expansion will need to be substantially better than our longer run experience if we are to avoid severe social and economic problems and strains. What will be the impact of economic growth on our municipalities? The assumptions made by the Economic Council allow for a high and sustained rate of growth in investment in social capital. The Council recognized a high income society, demanded improved schools, hospitals, highways, streets, parks, cultural and recreational facilities. The report of the Council stated: "There is particular need to improve our cities for both economic and social reasons." The report continues:

> This requires among other things rehabilitation of dilapidated residential areas or clearing of some of these areas for more efficient use for commercial and other purposes. There is the need for improved living conditions for families and individuals who are now relegated by economic circumstances and urban decay to substandard and blighted living conditions. To attempt to deal in a comprehensive manner with these needs will require the development of policies and programs directed towards the elimination of their underlying causes. Many problems exist in this field and available information about them is meagre. But we believe that it is essential to develop a much larger and more effective program than now exists for urban renewal and low rental housing.

As to this statement that available information is meagre, I have some reservations at this point about the extent of the Council's research work. Nevertheless, I will continue, my intention being to make some observations to show that the Economic Council might have gone further in its study of the problems of urban and rural municipalities and their relationship with the Provinces. It might have examined the situation in an effort to find out whether or not the provinces have plenty on their platter at home to deal with in the next decade without handing them long range plans having to do with constitutional amendments which will work well only when we work for common objectives regardless of what lawyers may write into those documents.

All of us have used expressions relating to automation and our rapidly changing technology. The latter phrase has become a cliché. But we all recognize what it means. We have observed the shift of population to the urban growth centres from the rural areas. The urban population explosion is widened by the rapid growth of suburban districts, with their inevitable neighbourhood shopping centres.

It is in the urban areas that increasing numbers of employables seek jobs in the servicing sector of our economy, including recreation and the entertainment fields. It is in the metropolitan regions that we find extensive expansion of office buildings and high rise apartments. With the development of industrial parks to escape high central city taxes and land costs on the fringes of the expanded urban areas, workers find themselves no longer in suburbia. Many now leave their jobs to return to sleep and relax in the densely populated traffic-congested city.

In 1956 the City of Halifax decided to take full advantage of the provisions of the National Housing Act administered by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. We learned many lessons, experienced disappointments, and enjoyed some achievements. With C.M.H.C. paying half the cost of clearance we demolished several areas of badly blighted real estate. I could tell Hon. Members more about the details, but it suffices now to reach the point at which the bulldozer had completed its work on the first clearance area. The time had come to direct our attention to redevelopment. We soon learned that a comprehensive plan required a study of the economic base of the metropolitan region in which the city was located. We had to identify possible developments of highways and railroads to the region, and bridges to the city of Dartmouth on the eastern side of the harbour and across the North West Arm to county suburban districts. We recognized that, if we were to interest large private developers, economic data and other pertinent information about the city's services and regional developments were essential for that purpose.

We publicized invitations to developers to rebuild the site with broad terms of reference. We favoured leasing the site, because of apparent financial advantages to the city and to developers. To those who may become involved in this kind of thing I would suggest it might be wise to examine the value of a freehold type of lease, even though there may be advantages attached to leases of the more usual kind. We received one proposal from a British consortium of professional planners. They proposed high density development of a mixture of tall tower apartment buildings, shopping, banking and office buildings. We decided to negotiate an agreement with our only customer. The proposals were redesigned and scaled down to correspond with both good planning and conservation of economic feasibility.

We discovered a number of things. We found that the cleared site was too isolated from the central business district, requiring the developer to acquire and clear blighted commercial districts to appropriately link the new developments with existing and well developed sectors of the central city region. After many, many months of detailed construction planning for the site, and negotiating of legal agreements with developers, they found they could not complete, to the city's satisfaction, the necessary evidence of financial capability to complete their $30 million undertaking.

Now they must make a fresh start. In the meantime, Webb and Knapp built a $9 million shopping centre in the west end of the City, with Eaton's abandoning their downtown store to become the key tenant. Simpson's across the road, rehabilitated their buildings to meet the competition. Across the harbour in Dartmouth, an industrial complex development stimulated with financial assistance from Provincial Crown Corporations, Industrial Estates Ltd., and low municipal taxes. Dartmouth has been compelled in turn to undertake development land use planning to ensure orderly expansion and redevelopment within its boundaries.

Stimulated by the flow of information on the factors or urban growth and the economic prospects of the region, local realtors and others acquired and cleared sites for high rise apartments and office buildings. The pressure for high density development to offset high cost of land acquisition and local taxes produced many conflicts between the City's planning staff and the private developers. Despite these difficulties much better redevelopment of the city has been accomplished. We are pleased to observe that last year the Federal Government amended its legislation on urban renewal. C.M.H.C. is authorized to extend its participation in clearance cost of blighted commercial districts. That Federal corporation will share the cost of providing sewers, streets, etc. to the cleared redevelopment site, thus relieving the developer from that burden of investment.

C.M.H.C. will share the cost of preparing land use development plans for the site, and economic feasibility studies essential thereto. In addition C.M.H.C. will finance two thirds of the city's portion of the partnership capital. In addition, with a new emphasis on rehabilitation of existing residential buildings, C.M.H.C. will finance that cost. Many important lessons were learned from our experience in Halifax with redevelopment, and they are not dissimilar from the experience of other cities in Canada. We may have been earlier in the game, but others have caught up with us.

One of the most significant lessons that we learned was this, that you cannot undertake land use planning for the control and orderly redevelopment of a city, or its redevelopment, in single municipalities. To be effective, they must be related to over-all land use plans for the economic region in which the municipality is located. Thus every municipality in the region must co-operate in that effort, and the same co-operation must be obtained by Departments, Crown Corporations and other agencies of Federal and Provincial Governments. Failing that co-operation by the municipalities in the region, the Provincial Government must undertake the responsibility for regional land use planning, either by direct action or by imposing regional or metropolitan government on clusters of municipal units. Economic growth considerations set forth in the report of the Economic Council, and full employment objectives dictate those conditions.

Provincial Governments oriented to the needs of over-represented rural constituencies must face their responsibilities for service and assistance to the urban municipalities. This applies to some Provincial Governments, indeed, if not all of them; and sometimes they have written provisions into the statutes and this has ended their interest in the development of urban cities or urban regions. They have paid too little attention to the impact of the real estate tax on the growth and development of cities within Provincial boundaries. That burden acts as a deterrent to new construction and lengthens the use of outworn, dilapidated housing for persons, commerce and industry. A gradual phasing into full realty taxation has been suggested by some, but that is only a temporary measure.

Mr. Speaker, I dwelt at length on this subject of the problem of housing conditions, development problems and redevelopment problems in the urban districts of Canada, and I did so because the Speech from the Throne indicates that the Federal Government at least has recognized its responsibilities in this field; and indeed the amendments to the National Housing Act last year and other proposals that will be disclosed to us as this session progresses indicate that the Federal Government stands ready to participate fully with the Provinces and the municipalities in undertaking those essential steps to bring about a proper and orderly development in the urban districts of Canada where, in my opinion, a high percentage of people will seek employment—a high percentage of the 1½ million additional jobseekers will go to find work in what is called the servicing sector of the economy. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it behoves us to do everything in our power to encourage the Provinces in turn to face their responsibility in this particular field.

In the Halifax Herald today another viewpoint was held with respect to areas designated as development areas of slow growth. I was pleased to note that the Speech from the Throne indicates that some improvements are contemplated with respect to the existing legislation. Based upon special studies made for the Atlantic Provinces by Professor Wilson of the University of Glasgow, the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, according to yesterday's Halifax newspaper, said the eight Atlantic centres are ready for mass industrialization. What they are really saying is this, that you can expect population growth in the urban centres of the Atlantic region. It is to these places that people will go to seek employment in secondary manufacturing, and also in many areas of servicing job opportunities.

I can recall that the other day the Minister of Finance came in for some quipping from some Hon. Gentlemen opposite, about the need for mobility in labour. I am sure we will now hear no more about it, because the advisers to Premiers Stanfield, Robichaud, Shaw, and the Premier of Newfoundland—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lloyd: I hope he will take the advice, too; and I am sure he will. These economic advisers had this to say:

> Mobility is necessary. There is no escape from that conclusion. But, if the policy of regional development succeeds, it should be possible to reduce the net outflow of population from the area as a whole. It is necessary to distinguish at this point—

I am sure some hon. Members would agree with this:

—between the Maritimes and Newfoundland. No doubt it is true that when a family has decided to leave the island, it is just as likely to move to Central Canada as to the Maritimes. Newfoundland must, therefore, rely upon the attractiveness of her own centre, or centres, of growth. But it seems true to say that people will move around within each province more readily than they would move to Central Canada.

Some of us in the Atlantic Provinces, of course, can fully understand why:

This is one reason why the development of provincial centres of growth should be a means of tapping resources of manpower that would otherwise remain idle or would continue to work in occupations where productivity was low. Quite a lot of this labour may, indeed, be within commuting distance of such appropriate centres as Halifax or Saint John.

I hope that when we reach that stage in our legislative process we will be considering amendments to the legislation we now have with respect to areas of slow growth; that we will keep in mind the lessons which have been learned by the municipalities; and that we will keep in mind what I have said this evening about the explosion in population, if you like, in the urban areas. We must be ready to provide jobs for the 1,500,000 people which the Economic Council says will be added to our labour force in the next five or six years.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the Provinces as well as the municipalities have a job to do in this field. The Federal Government can help them with resources and with technical skill and advice; but the initiative must lie with the municipalities in this field and with a fully co-operating and understanding Provincial Government.

I see my time is running out, Mr. Speaker, and I can add only one further thought, which is this. Economic land use planning is just as essential in our rural areas of Canada, and this is a matter which should receive concurrent consideration by the Provincial Government. You cannot hope to have intelligent development and redevelopment planning in the urban areas of Canada without in turn examining what will be happening in the hinterland of these great areas of urban growth. So I welcome the obvious interest of the Canadian Government in the field of improvement in areas of slow growth and in the rural regions of Canada, as expressed through the ARDA program. But I must conclude with this observation, that it might be wise for all of us to remember and to be somewhat humbled by this very complex business of economics. A great deal has been written on the subject, and there has been a great deal of advice from a number of people holding a wide variety of views. It seems to me that together we need to work and learn more if together we hope to progress in a better manner than has been the case in the past.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Lloyd) a question, if he would permit me. We have listened to a very informative and interesting speech on the problems of urban development and renewal, and while he had some very enlightening opinions respecting many of the problems which would be raised, it did seem to me that he had left out the central problem, which is raising the funds required. I was wondering whether he had any ideas about the changes which could be brought about to provide for this.

Mr. Lloyd: Mr. Speaker, remembering my closing observations about being humbled by the intricacies and complexities of economics, I am sure the Hon. Member who asked me the question on the matter of funding will appreciate my reply, which is this: We have given consideration to the matter of funding. One source of social capital for the kind of things about which I have been talking will be the funds raised by the Canada Pension Plan. There are others who advocate different viewpoints—that there should be a different use of Canada's credit facilities and expansion of its monetary supply. However, I share the view of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) that we have identified the principles and well know how they operate. The only question is the degree, timing and utilization of this knowledge.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to congratulate the Mover and the Seconder of the Speech from the Throne; I thought their speeches were exceptionally well presented. My first reaction to the Speech from the Throne was to wonder how it was possible to take up so much time in saying so little. My second reaction was that it seemed to me that the Government had moved well over into the left field and taken some of the block and tackle from the N.D.P.

However, I was surprised that no mention was made of a national water policy, in view of the problems we have had during the past year. I was disappointed that no mention was made of establishing a health facility development fund, as recommended by the Hall Commission. I was disappointed that there was nothing in the Speech to relieve the embattled taxpayer. There was no mention of taking off the 11 per cent sales tax on drugs, even though the Committee on the price of drugs is to be continued. There was no mention of removing the 11 per cent sales tax on machinery, equipment and supplies. There was no mention of raising the exemption of the single taxpayer or married taxpayer. There was no mention of exempting interest payments on houses owned by taxpayers, or of exempting municipal taxes from income tax.

I propose, Mr. Speaker, to deal with these matters rather briefly. First of all, I should like to deal with the necessity for a national water policy. This was advocated about three years ago by probably one of the most outstanding men we have in this field, Dr. Berry of Toronto. As you know, Mr. Speaker, Canada has almost one half of the world's fresh water supply. We are surrounded in this area by the Great Lakes basin. There are 100,000 square miles of water in the Great Lakes basin, besides roughly 300,000 square miles of land with lakes which drain into that area. We have about 32 inches of rainfall per year. If this rainfall should happen to diminish, then in about two years we start to feel the effect of this; it takes about that long. Of these 32 inches of rainfall, 10 inches enters the main source of water supply. The other 22 inches is accounted for by evaporation from the lakes, the cultivated land, and from trees and grass.

Over the past couple of years we have experienced a drop in rainfall, which has created a problem. Lower rainfall means lower humidity. There is more sunshine and therefore more evaporation. This past year we had the lowest level in the Georgian Bay-Lake Huron area for the last 100 years, which is about the length of time for which records have been kept. We have had our ups and downs in rainfall, and I think we can assume that over the years we have had some low levels of rainfall.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what has happened in this regard over the last 100 years? I would suggest, for one thing, that we have had a population explosion. Very few people were living in those areas 100 years ago, but over this period of time there have been great developments in the Great Lakes Basin. These areas have now become very densely populated, particularly around Toronto, Hamilton and Oshawa. With this growth in population, accompanied by tremendous growth in industry, there has been an increasing demand for water. The amount of water used in the average home in this area today would be equivalent to the amount of water used in a week by a family living in the same area a few years ago.

To illustrate this point, Mr. Speaker, let me refer to some statistics. It requires the use of 20 gallons of water to produce one gallon of gasoline. The production of one ton of paper requires the use of 40,000 gallons of water. To produce one ton of steel requires the use of 14,000 gallons of water. These examples indicate the immensity of the problem which exists as a result of the growth of industry in this Great Lakes Basin. The problem is intensified even more as a result of the accompanying growth in population, with which I shall deal in more detail a little later.

There has been a great deal more transportation service required in the Great Lakes area within recent years than ever before as a result of the development of the St. Lawrence Seaway. Within recent years the first ocean-going steamers of any size were able to ply this waterway. This development has in itself created further problems. We find that the Georgian Bay area, the Huron Lake and Michigan Lake areas—which are treated as one—are uncontrolled lake areas. Lake Superior and Lake Ontario are controlled, as a result of which we have found that Lake Superior has maintained its level, whereas the water level in the Georgian Bay and Lake Huron and Lake Michigan areas has dropped six to seven feet. A national water policy should be developed to find ways of counteracting the economic loss we have suffered in these areas in the past few years. Millions of dollars have been lost to the shipping industry, which represents a tremendous set-back to the economy of the Great Lakes areas. This set-back will be aggravated as the population and industry grow, unless some steps are taken to counteract the current adverse trends.

Many individuals in the Georgian Bay area of the Great Lakes Basin, as well as in other areas, are engaged in the tourist trade. Many millions of dollars will be lost to this industry as a result of uncontrolled water levels. Many people in these areas have been hard hit in the last year because of water level drops and because of pollution. Some of them have had to go out of business after finding themselves left high and dry with beaches stretching for a quarter mile and farther to the water. I suggest that these problems should be considered by a national water council, and treated so this will not occur again.

Many other problems are created as a result of water pollution, and in this regard I should like to quote from an article which appeared in the Toronto Telegram of March 1965, under the heading "Water Pollution". The headline is "Who's To Blame for the Ocean of Filth?" The article in part states:

> Montreal pours all its wastes, untreated, from its sewer system into the St. Lawrence River; the largest city of our land rests amidst an ocean of filth.

Apparently this situation is not confined to Eastern Canada, because the article then continues to state:

> Edmonton, until the recent completion of a treatment plant, polluted the water of the North Saskatchewan River all the way to Prince Albert, Sask., a distance of 500 miles.

Apparently Provincial Governments can no longer cope with this sewage problem. Sewage from Toronto dumped into Lake Ontario is carried down through the St. Lawrence River to Montreal. Sewage dumped into the Detroit River at Windsor is carried down to Toronto. This article states:

> Windsor gushes all its raw, untreated sewage into the Detroit River—

Certainly this results in pollution of the river from that point downstream. This pollution is aggravated by industry.

The average individual today uses 100 gallons of water per day for domestic purposes. It is estimated that it requires 2,500 gallons of water to supply one person with food for one day. These facts obviously indicate that fresh water is a precious commodity. Unless some change is made in respect of water pollution regulations, we will very soon find people in this country clamouring for fresh, pure water. In the United States today it has been established that 40 per cent of the people who live along the Mississippi use water that has passed through sewage systems. This situation both in the United States and in Canada is aggravated by increases in industrial use of water.

Perhaps I should give a few examples of the amount of water required by industry to produce every day items. To produce one pound of bread requires the use of 100 gallons of water. To produce one ton of rayon requires the use of 165,000 gallons of water. To produce one ton of Terylene requires the use of 215,000 gallons of water. This will illustrate the immensity of this water problem, which I am sure we have not even started to think about.

Mr. Speaker, a great deal of money will have to be spent for research to solve the problems created by lower water levels, and pollution. Perhaps we will have to build a dam below the City of Montreal in order to control the runaway of fresh flood run-off water. If we allow the drop in the water level of the Great Lakes to continue at its present rate, we might just as well forget about our seaway transportation system.

I think the Government must establish immediately a commission to find the answer to two basic water problems—recurring lower lake levels and pollution. This commission, in the form of a national water board, should develop policies in respect of both ground water and surface water, having regard to pollution control. Now is the time to study these water pollution problems.

Mr. Speaker, I should now like to deal with another problem to which I have made reference on previous occasions, and that is the problem in respect of the cost of drugs to Canadian consumers.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) indicated that he was worrying about the cost to the people of drugs and he quoted enough statistics to show that there are a substantial number of people in Canada who are not able to purchase the drugs they need without hardship. He quoted these figures and he referred to the poverty that exists in Canada. He put all these facts on the record. He intimated that the cost of drugs was too high because the matter is going to be investigated by a Committee; but surely it should have occurred to the Government long ago that the 11 per cent sales tax represents about 18 per cent or almost one fifth of the cost of drugs. Surely this is not right. Surely the sales tax should be removed immediately.

I was further disappointed that there was no provision made for the setting up of a commission as referred to previously to help in the building of the medical schools that are so badly needed across Canada. As a matter of fact, the Hall Commission has stated that we will need five new medical schools but nothing has been done in this regard. Yet at the same time we talk about medicare in Parliament. I sometimes wonder whom we are fooling in talking about getting medicare, when we have not enough doctors now to look after the people. When you examine the statistics you find that from 1950 to 1960 there was a 5 per cent decline per capita in the number of doctors who graduated from our medical schools. How in the world can we carry out a medicare program or a dental care program when we are so short of both doctors and dentists and do not have the schools to produce them? I am very disappointed that nothing has been done about the Hall Commission recommendation that a committee be set up to help in the building of these schools and in the education of doctors and dentists.

I was also disappointed that nothing was said in the Speech from the Throne about research. In this regard I should like to refer to an article by David Spurgeon in the Globe and Mail which I think sets out the situation very well. He says:

> The gap between the supply and demand for funds for medical research in Canada has widened again this year, and medical researchers are greatly concerned.
> This is the time of year when investigators learn whether or not they will be granted funds by the Medical Research Council to continue their work. The council is the chief federal fund granting body for medical research. The council has awarded only about 60 per cent of the funds requested this year—

That is not good enough in a land like ours, Mr. Speaker.

> —compared to 65 per cent last year, 71 per cent the year before and 72 per cent in 1961-62.
> Some grant applications inevitably would be turned down because they would not be of sufficient quality. But this year the council has turned down more than $1 million worth of first class applications simply because it did not have the money. At the University of Toronto alone grants were cut by at least 30 per cent. The funds awarded are considered inadequate, a spokesman said.

This is not good enough in a land where we are trying to keep our researchers and are trying to seek cures for cancer and other diseases.

I want to speak for a moment or two about the poverty that exists in this land. I mentioned it before and I want to add some comments now. We have a great land of plenty but many people are suffering from poverty. We have people who are ill-clothed, ill-housed and badly educated. Yet those people have to buy life-saving drugs and the Government collects its tax on those drugs. As I indicated before, surely this tax should be tossed out the window. These drugs have saved millions of dollars through decreasing the length of illnesses and in hospitalization costs which are paid by Governments, with a small premium from the recipient. There is no excuse for retaining this tax.

The Prime Minister knows that in each large city pockets of poverty perpetuate themselves from one generation to another. What grants have been made to study and obliterate these pockets? We know that in certain cities in Canada they have existed for five generations. It is not fair to condemn the children who are born into these families and to say to them when they are four or five years old that this is their station in life and they are going to suffer the poverty that their parents have. This is not good enough.

The Government knows, because it was indicated by the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé), that half a million children of school age are not attending school and have a grade 4 education or less. This is an alarming fact. We talk about automation, training more technicians and the necessity for education, but in this land we have half a million children today who are condemned to be jobless or to work at very menial jobs, which we are told will be very scarce. We are condemning them to that type of life. This is not fair, Mr. Speaker. I suggest that there should be an all-Canadian educational policy and that research should be conducted into this situation in order to make sure that these children are not condemned in their infancy to poverty.

I am disappointed that more has not been done in the field of human betterment in order to help people to improve their own situations. Surely it is better to take these children out of the poverty of the slums and educate them so that they can contribute to the economy of the country, rather than leave them in these small pockets of poverty that exist in many of our cities across Canada. Surely the time has come for action to deal with this situation in the right way and not merely by handing out something to somebody. Surely we should not go on saying that because they are poor we will give them something, and at the same time do nothing whatever to cure or prevent the disease. I suggest it is time that the Government and Parliament took a good long look at curing these ills by means of preventive legislation, and not go on throwing money away by treating the ills after they have occurred.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in the few days since the Throne Speech was delivered a popular interpretation of its contents has been made in newspaper editorials and by columnists, in which it is suggested that the Speech from the Throne is a steal from the New Democratic Party's platform. We in the New Democratic Party suspect that to a large extent this is nonsense. We have heard Liberal Throne Speeches before and we have waited to see their execution, and to say the least we are sceptical that much will come of this Throne Speech.

We think there is a great deal of sham in the Speech from the Throne. We think that on the basis of its past record and performance the Liberal larceny of New Democratic Party ideas is certain to be for appearance's sake only, and not for the substance contained in our ideas.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that the goal of a modern nation must be to insure a rising prosperity, with a higher standard of living rubbing off on all its citizens. The phrase coined by President Johnson's ghost writers, the Pearson Government has found in April, 1965, and taken the slogan "War on Poverty".

An hon. Member: It took them a year to find it.

Mr. Orlikow: It took them more than a year to find it. If we examine the details of their proposal contained in this phrase "War on Poverty", we will see there is very little which will bring economic growth to this country. Growth in this sense envisages an increase in the output of goods and services, with a proper distribution of income. Income is generally distributed through wages and salaries. This makes it essential for citizens to find jobs. Obviously this means growth in both the scale and quality of goods and service producing enterprises.

Theoretically, Canadian Governments have expressed agreement with this objective. As early as 1945, the Liberal Government of that time had a white paper prepared in which they said unequivocally they adopted a high and stable level of employment income, and thereby a higher standard of living, as a major aim of Government policy. It has been made clear that an endeavour to achieve it must be made through Government economic policy. This must be wholeheartedly accepted by all economic groups and organizations, and national objectives must take precedence in importance to sectional and group interests.

Those were brave words, Mr. Speaker. Unemployment stubbornly continued as an economic problem for Canada. In recent years as many as 7 per cent of our labour force were unable to find jobs. Even in the peak year of 1964, of which we have heard so much from this Government, nearly 5 per cent of the Canadian working force were, on the average, out of work.

Economic growth is necessary and desirable, not just for itself as the Russians and Chinese seem to feel, but because it can be used to eliminate poverty and raise living standards, as has already been done in countries such as Sweden. However, the Government's so-called war on poverty will prove to be long on words and short on action. It is too little and already too late. The comparatively rapid rate of growth and no corresponding reduction in the very high rate of unemployment prevailing for the past five years has been achieved. This has been the result primarily of three forces. First, the pick-up in the United States economy; second, the devaluation of the Canadian dollar in 1962 and, third, the very large wheat sales to Communist China and the Soviet Union. We cannot rely on such forces in the future.

It is impossible to completely insulate Canada from the economic forces operating in the United States. We will profit by their periods of boom and be depressed when their economy slumps. We can, however, take steps to make the impact of their business cycles somewhat less critical for Canada. This will require positive Government action, both in the traditional fields of fiscal and monetary policy and by more direct intervention in the economy, particularly by public investment and the development of our own resources and economic capabilities. We got away with the devaluation of our dollar in 1962, but it is doubtful, in fact inconceivable, that we could use such a device again to help expand our exports and reduce our imports without triggering international retaliation, thereby rendering impotent our own devaluation.

While we must be ready to supply foods throughout the world, we cannot count on crop failures and misfortunes in other countries to supply our economic policy. We cannot count on the forces behind our current rapid economic growth. We require positive leadership to bring some fundamental shifts within the Canadian economy. The imperative requirements for Canadian growth were brought forcibly to our attention by a recent report of the Economic Council of Canada.

The basic demands put forward by the Council are now becoming very apparent; a 5½ per cent growth in production, 3.4 per cent per capita, and the creation of a million and a half new jobs by 1970. We can welcome the Council's report as a first and encouraging beginning at looking at Canada's needs. We, in the New Democratic Party deplore the fact that the Council has not spelled out how we are to achieve these goals. There is no indication that the Council's thinking is accepted by this Government or will be acted upon by it. Some of the implications of these goals are not as clear as the figures themselves. The Council's figures demand a much higher rate of growth than has been achieved over a long period of time in Canada. In fact, the growth rate demanded by the Council is at least twice as much as that annually achieved in the past decade.

To show what I mean, Mr. Speaker, I want to refer briefly to the second annual report of the Manitoba Economic Consultative Board, which pointed out that if Canada does provide a million and a half jobs, as the Economic Council has suggested we need, and if it is assumed Manitoba will maintain the same percentage of the total national jobs as it did in 1961, the Province of Manitoba would have to provide an average of 11,000 new jobs each year from 1967 through to 1970. In fact, in recent years Manitoba has been providing only half of this required number.

May I call it ten o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, before you call it ten o'clock, I should like to ask whether the house would give its unanimous consent so that tomorrow votes could be taken at 3.30 p.m. instead of 5.30 p.m. I think this would be possible with the unanimous consent of the house, and this would make it easier for some members to solve certain problems. I think that the votes are supposed to be taken at 5.30 p.m. on the amendment and the subamendment. If the house is agreeable to that, I think it could be possible to take those votes at 3.30 p.m.

[Text]

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I must say that I am taken a bit by surprise by the request. So far as we are concerned, if it is the wish of the House, we are quite agreeable to having a vote taken at 3.30 rather than 5.30. I am wondering if the hon. Member has made any proposals, so that as many Members could speak before the vote as would otherwise be the case?

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): I feel personally that members who are supposed to speak by 5.30 tomorrow evening will be able to do so after the votes. I feel that the volume of business carried out at the end of the day would still be the same if the house gave its consent.

[Text]

Mr. McIlraith: So far as the Government is concerned, we are agreeable to this change in procedure.

Mr. Churchill: I did not hear the first part of the remarks of the hon. Member, in which I presume he set out the reasons for suggesting this change. However, I think it is not appropriate, at ten o'clock at night with a rather slim attendance, to decide an issue of this kind. I think it had better be decided tomorrow morning at the opening of the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, the leaders of the various parties could discuss this suggestion and the government house leader could inform us of the decision tomorrow morning.

[Text]

Mr. McIlraith: I would be very glad to call a meeting tomorrow morning for discussion of this point.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional Standing Order 39A deemed to have been moved.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—CONSIDERATION OF COMMITTEE REPORT—REPRODUCTION OF "HANSARD" INDEX

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, when a matter of privilege is dealt with by the House, the first determination is made, as I think it is called in Latin, of a prima facie case, that is, as to whether it looks as if there is a question of privilege. Then the subject matter of the question of privilege is referred to the Committee. The Committee examines the question and reports to the House; presumably in the course of the report it makes some declaration by way of motion. I think it is then incumbent upon the House to consider the report and the proceedings in the Committee to see whether or not there was justification for the original decision that there was a prima facie question of privilege.

In the last days of the session just completed the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro), a learned gentleman, raised this question of privilege. I must say he prosecuted with all the fervour associated with the famous Judge Jeffreys, renowned in English courts. But I will be polite and merely say that the hon. member allowed his enthusiasm to attract his tongue and vocal chords into the realm of fantasy when dealing with this question.

None the less the question of privilege, which had to do with a document prepared by the Hamilton Area Council of the Steelworkers Union, was referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. The Committee held its hearings. At those hearings a letter of apology was read signed by one Stewart Cook of the Steelworkers Union. It apologized—I am paraphrasing now—for any affront to the House by the reproduction of any of the documents of the House.

This apology was accepted by the Committee. But what the Committee did allow, in my submission, was a vindictive and vicious attack upon an Hon. Member of this House who was not sitting on that Committee, one who felt that because he was one of the Members referred to in this particular document he should not, as a Member of the Committee, be acting as judge and jury, as it were, at the same time. I submit that the obvious purpose of the whole course of the hearings of that Committee was that certain members of the Committee desired to see the political lifeblood of the Member for Hamilton South (Mr. Howe) spilled, rather than pursue properly the question of privilege which the Hon. Member for Hamilton East had raised in the first place.

There was a motion passed, a motion somewhat innocuous in content in view of all that had gone before it, that the Committee accept the apology of the Steelworkers Union and that a question of privilege remain unresolved. I submit that in view of the vindictive and slanderous approach on the part of some of the members of that Committee, the decision which was reached is a strange one. It leaves the House in the unfortunate position of being unable to determine whether or not its action in accepting the argument that a prima facie breach of privilege had been committed was correct in the first instance. I submit there is an obligation attendant upon Parliament now, even though this is a new session, to examine that report and make a determination and see what should be done about the whole question.

This consideration can take place during the present session upon a motion to consider a report of the Committee on Privileges of the previous session. It is true that a private Member could introduce such a motion, but if this were done it would fall into the same category as that which includes other notices of motion put forward by private members; it would be subject to limitation of time for debate, it would fall to the bottom of the list and in all probability it would never be dealt with.

The Member who was the Chairman of the Committee cannot move the amendment now because there is no committee for him to be chairman of. If the Government would take—and this is what I asked the President of the Privy Council (Mr. McIlraith) to do today—the initiative in this case and place a motion on the Order Paper to consider that report, it would permit it to come under the routine, normal proceedings of business and would enable it to be brought up by the Government, dealt with and the matter disposed of.

This is simply what I asked the President of the Privy Council to do today, namely to revive this matter before Parliament at this time, so that Parliament will not look as if it had been made a fool of by people who wanted to use a particular document and a Committee for their own selfish ends.

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is very interesting to hear the hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) raise this point again. He must be terribly upset by the result arrived at in the Committee, and apparently it is because it did not work out to the entire satisfaction of the New Democratic Party.

As I recall it, before the motion was put by myself in the Committee to accept the apology and have an end of the matter, I invited the hon. Member for Skeena and the hon. Member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) to make any other motion, as expressed by the hon. Member for Port Arthur, that would bring the matter before the House so we could have an open discussion on it.

Mr. Howard: The record does not show that; it shows otherwise.

Mr. Munro: But what happened was this. Despite the sentiments expressed by the hon. Member for Port Arthur, he then left the room and the hon. Member for Skeena took over and supported the motion that we accept the apology. They were not nearly so anxious, apparently, to open this matter and have further discussion on it at that time; they voted to accept the apology and regard that as an end of the matter. The matter thus remained unresolved, and this motion was supported by the New Democratic Party.

Another very interesting feature of this whole thing is the great diligence of the hon. Member for Skeena to protect the hon. Member for Hamilton South, who is now in the House. I would think he is perfectly capable of standing up in this House and protecting himself. Apparently they feel he has no real defence to offer—

Mr. Howard: More slander.

Mr. Munro: —and needs the more experienced Members of his party, such as the hon. Member for Skeena, to protect him. I would think he would find it rather difficult, to promote the argument that he was not a member of the committee from a sense of propriety. More likely is the reason that he spends more hours in Ottawa taking care of his private medical practice to afford time for his responsibilities in committee.

Mr. Douglas: Whenever you run out of policies you start to smear.

Mr. Munro: It is not difficult to attribute motives to your party; you are so obvious in your motives. I cannot understand why the Members of the New Democratic Party do not invite the Member for Hamilton South to get up and promote his argument in this House, to defend his record, to explain how he expects to carry on a private medical practice in Ottawa and supplement his $18,000 a year at the same time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would suggest to the hon. Member that at this point he is going beyond the subject matter that has been raised by the hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Howard). I would also point out that a note I have received from the table indicates that the Parliamentary Secretary's time expired at 10.11. It being beyond 10.11, I now call it ten o'clock.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.12 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, April 9, 1965

The house met at 11 a.m.

THE SALVATION ARMY

TRIBUTES ON ONE HUNDRED YEARS OF SERVICE

Mr. Speaker: In these days when we so frequently hear proposals for the establishment of armies of an international or multilateral character it is very easy to forget that there has been in existence for no less than 100 years a world army whose peaceful activities now extend to 70 nations of the world.

• (11:10 a.m.)

I refer, of course, to the Salvation Army. Members will, I know, want to acknowledge the presence in the Speaker's Gallery this morning of the Canadian Commander, Commissioner Edgar Grinsted, Mrs. Commissioner Grinsted and other senior officers of this great and vital organization which is this year celebrating a century of service to God and to man.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: It was just 100 years ago that its founder, William Booth, first stood on Mile End Waste in the east end of London, England, in the midst of the degradation and disorganization of the industrial revolution and proclaimed the age old message that gave birth to the Salvation Army.

In the intervening century the Army has extended its good work into all parts of the world. I am sure all hon. Members, particularly those who are war veterans, will be entirely familiar with the fine work of this organization in evangelical and social welfare endeavour, and will join with me in wishing them Godspeed as they continue their great work of mercy into a second century of service to their fellow men.

May I add that the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), who is himself a leading member of the Salvation Army in Canada, has asked me to call attention to the special Service of Commemoration that is being held this evening in Christ Church Cathedral at 8 p.m. This service will take place in the immediate presence of their Excellencies the Governor General and Madame Vanier, and Commissioner Grinsted will be the guest speaker. The hon. Member for Brandon-Souris has reminded me that hon. Members of this House are cordially invited to attend and share in the fellowship of this important anniversary occasion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I may be permitted to join you in the tribute you have so fittingly paid to the organization which we affectionately know as The Army, whose unselfish and untiring service and dedication to God and to man, as you yourself have said, Mr. Speaker, has left the whole world a better place.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure hon. Members in all parts of the House will join with you and with the Prime Minister in a word of deep appreciation for the tremendous contribution that has been made to mankind by the activities of that unselfish band in all parts of the world in war and in peace in spreading God's message to the poor and the afflicted. Today as one looks back over the history of mankind, William Booth stands out as one of the great spiritual leaders of all time.

In 1963 I had the honour of receiving the freedom of the City of London, and among the 250 who have received that honour the name of William Booth naturally attracted my attention. I read the speech which he delivered in 1905, only a matter of 30 years after he started in the streets of London to carry the Master's message to the afflicted. In that speech he referred to the unusual nature of the freedom being given to him and those associated with him, the right to preach their religion as they would, a freedom that had been denied when he first started. May I say to the Commissioner and to the officers of the Salvation Army in Canada that I know all of us will join with the Prime Minister in the tribute he has paid.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, you spoke for all of us when you paid tribute to the work of the Salvation Army. Those of us who are familiar with their devoted and unselfish service to mankind are glad to support the tribute you have paid to this great organization. The members of this party trust that as the Salvation Army starts its second century of service to mankind it may continue to enjoy success in its very fine, humanitarian endeavours.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure to associate our party with Your Honour, with the Prime Minister and all other members of the House in expressing our congratulations to the Salvation Army for their 100 years of service. It has been my privilege to work closely with the Army in different countries of the world, and certainly their work can be considered not only a work of faithful service but of service rich in faith to God and to man.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): It is indeed a privilege, Mr. Speaker, to join with the leaders of the various parties and especially with Your Honour and the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) in paying tribute to the Salvation Army.

We are all aware of the tremendous accomplishments of the Salvation Army in many fields and throughout this country of ours. It stands as an example of hard work and selflessness.

On behalf of the Ralliement Creditiste, I want to congratulate all members of the Salvation Army for the wonderful job they are doing, both from a social and Christian standpoint, thereby enabling men of good will to get along together and understand each other as much as possible.

[Text]

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be permitted a brief word to express to you and the members of the House sincere appreciation for your kindly references this morning. I should also offer an explanation for my personal membership. William Booth, the founder of the Salvation Army, often used to repeat a slogan: "Go for souls and go for the worst". That explains my membership in the Salvation Army. I think too it is a sentiment in which all members of the House can concur. It is also interesting to note that those words have the "go-go" spirit of the space age and at the same time express the essence of the Christian message.

May I make one other brief reference. As a young man William Booth flirted with the idea of a career in politics through a group known as the Chartists, who were interested in electoral reform. I am sure all politicians in this House will be grateful that he chose instead a religious career. It was as the result of the personal commitment he made as a lad of 15 that God should have all there was of William Booth that the great world wide work began which has brought so much good to mankind.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, would you grant me the privilege of saying just a few words? May I put it this way. In the many years during which I have had the honour and privilege of being a Member of Parliament, provincially and federally, there have been occasions when problems have been brought to my attention in which I have found it impossible, because of provincial or federal legislation or regulations, to be able to do anything of an official nature or to get assistance. Therefore, sir, I want to take this opportunity in the House of Commons of saying that, under those circumstances, when I thought the need was great and by reason of a law or regulation nothing could be done, for 32 years I have turned to the Salvation Army. May I say, sir, that at no time did they turn me down.

FINANCE

TABLING OF TARIFF BOARD REPORT ON LIVE TURKEYS

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): I wish to table in English and in French copies of the report by the Tariff Board on Reference No. 136 which covers live turkeys. I am tabling also a transcript of the evidence presented to the Board at its public hearings. The Tariff Board has recommended that the duty on live turkeys be increased from 2 cents per pound under the British Preferential and Most Favoured Nation tariffs to 10 per cent but not less than 3 cents per pound. I can assure hon. Members that this recommendation will receive careful consideration by the Government.

The present rate of 2 cents per pound is bound under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. Hon. Members will appreciate that negotiations would have to take place if the Board's recommendation is to be implemented. Interested parties who may wish to comment on this report should do so promptly.

AIR TRANSPORT

AIR CANADA-CANADIAN PACIFIC AIR LINES—SIMILAR FARES ON DOMESTIC FLIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I have a question for the Minister of Transport concerning Air Canada and Canadian Pacific Air Lines. There is a reliable report that these two rival air lines, competing in our free enterprise system, are now going to charge the same fares on economy and first class flights on their Montreal-Toronto-Winnipeg-Vancouver routes after April 25. Has this arrangement come about through the activities of the Minister, who met with the Presidents of the two air lines, and does he approve of the proposal?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Well, Mr. Speaker, the two air lines indicated to me some little time ago they were filing similar tariffs effective April 25. I noticed the same dispatch as the hon. gentleman did in the newspaper, and I would think this is correct.

Mr. Churchill: Does this meet with the Minister's approval, that these two competing air lines should now enter into what appears to be a combine to charge the same fares across the country?

Mr. Pickersgill: I have a feeling, sir, that this is one area, the area of fares, that does not lend itself very much to competition, any more between the air lines than it does between the railways.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STEPS TO MEET REPORTED INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I have a question for the Minister of Finance relating to the cost of living index which has just been published for March, 1965 and which stands at 137.3 as compared with 134.6 a year ago, an increase of 2.7 percentage points.

In view of the fact that the Economic Council of Canada has recommended that we hold any increase in the cost of living to 2 percentage points, I want to ask the Minister is his Department taking any measures to counteract this increase in the cost of living?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the report of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics showed that the cost of living in March was two tenths of one percentage point higher than in the previous month, which would mean an increase of substantially less than one fifth of one per cent from one month to the other. Over the year the increase was 2 per cent which, as I have said on other occasions, is the lowest increase in any industrialized country in the world with the exception of the United States.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the fact that the increase in the commodity index is 2.7 percentage points I am asking the Minister, is his Department setting up any machinery or taking any measures to counteract this progressive increase?

Mr. Gordon: The Government is doing its best to encourage everybody to keep down the cost of production. That is the way in which the objective of my hon. friend—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gordon: There seems to be a little noise at the moment, Mr. Speaker. I can assure my hon. friend that this objective will be kept very much in mind.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Remove the 11 per cent sales tax.

Mr. Douglas: I am asking the Minister, is any machinery being set up by his Department to ascertain whether these increases are fully justified?

Mr. Gordon: This is being watched carefully week by week.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. I want to know if the Government is going to practice what it has just preached.

Mr. Gordon: Certainly, Mr. Speaker.

EXPO '67

REPORTED CALLING OF TENDERS FOR C.B.C. BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State and is twofold in nature. Is it correct that tenders are being let at the present time for the $10 million C.B.C. project at Expo '67? Second, if that is so, on what basis is the C.B.C. able to make such a commitment when there has been no appropriation in this House for such an expenditure?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very happy to seek the information and reply later.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): The Minister has stated that he will look into this matter. I would ask him, did he not make a statement in Montreal in connection with this very peculiar proposition? Did he not make the following statement:

> —it is possible to have at least part of the money available through the parliamentary process known as interim supply.

I am quoting from the Montreal Star of March 26, where it was further reported:

> Technically, there will be no money available for construction purposes until the C.B.C. estimates are approved in the House of Commons; for practical purposes, however, according to Secretary of State Maurice Lamontagne . . . it is possible—

I would ask the Minister to explain why he now has to look into the matter. When he spoke in Montreal he understood fully what was being done in the outrageous proposition advanced by Mr. Ouimet for spending $10 million without authorization by Parliament.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, the question asked by the hon. member for Red Deer was about tenders, and I certainly did not say anything about tenders in Montreal.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right. Will the Minister explain now what he meant when he said that the C.B.C. can go ahead and spend $10 million on a building for the purposes of the C.B.C., when no amount has been allotted by Parliament? What right has the head of the C.B.C. to make an announcement like that without consideration by Parliament?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, at that time we announced a proposal or project, but I certainly did not say we intended to go on with that project without the approval of Parliament.

• (11:30 a.m.)

An hon. Member: Who is "we"?

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it not a fact that a contract has been let for part of this work?

Mr. Lamontagne: I said, Mr. Speaker, that I would seek the information.

[Later:]

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State that I intended to ask before. Would the minister consider recommending that all Expo expenditures, past, present and particularly future, be referred to a special committee of the House so that we can all get the story on these mounting, astronomical expenditures?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid my hon. friend should direct his question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Bell: Well, as a matter of fact I will address my question to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister consider recommending that all Expo expenditures, past, present and particularly future, be referred to a special committee of the House so that all members and particularly the Canadian people can get the full story with regard to these mounting, astronomical expenditures?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if that were done literally I think it would be very difficult indeed to have Expo ready for 1967.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to that asked by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert. I wanted to direct it to the Minister of Finance, but since he is absent I will address it to the Prime Minister. Are expenditures on Expo '67 approved by Treasury Board in the same manner as normal expenditures, and are the regular rules to which he referred yesterday applicable?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, Expo '67 is operating under legislation passed by this Parliament under the previous government, and the regular procedures are being followed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister mentions that fact does he not recall that he said that expenditures by the federal government should be limited to $20 million?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

Could the right hon. Prime Minister tell the house at the same time what extraordinary amounts will Expo '67 inject into the economy of the country?

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: Many millions, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bell: We are spending billions.

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister tell us what authority, what government is responsible for making of the Montreal world fair a reality?

[Text]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this is under my jurisdiction, and if there are any questions I would be very happy to answer them.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE TAX REDUCTIONS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance.

On the occasion of his next budget, does the minister intend to lower some taxes so as to lessen the detrimental effect of the tax increase by the Quebec Liberal government?

[Text]

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend would not wish me to announce in advance what would be in the Budget.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Minister say, in an effort to assist those who have to make plans, when we can expect the Budget? Will he narrow the time down, at least?

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, I hope to make an announcement in specific terms on Monday.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance.

In view of the pyramid of new taxes announced yesterday in the province of Quebec, can the minister tell us whether this is part of the federal-provincial joint programs?

[Text]

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, this Government has no control over or anything to say about the taxes levied by any of the Provinces.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

WEST BERLIN—STEPS TO END INTERFERENCE WITH ACCESS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the Minister tell us what is the present situation with regard to the interference with and harassment of traffic into and out of West Berlin and what action, if any, the NATO Council has taken to try to bring an end to this potentially dangerous situation?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, may I ask my hon. friend to allow me to take this question as notice.

PROPOSED EUROPEAN TOUR BY CANADIAN HOCKEY PLAYERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. J. Greene (Renfrew South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. It is reported that Canadian hockey players, led by the incomparable Mr. Gordon Howe, are to be prevented from playing in Austria. Canada has made welcome Russian, Czech and other European teams in the past. Does the Government contemplate any action to enable this proposed tour of Canadian N.H.L. ambassadors to be carried out, in order that Europeans may at last have the opportunity of viewing the finest hockey players in the world, Canadians of the National Hockey League?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps this question should have been addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but I can tell my hon. friend that appropriate steps, through diplomatic channels, are being taken to remove, if possible, the obstacles in the way of this tour of N.H.L. hockey players led by, as my hon. friend designated him, the incomparable Gordon Howe. Mr. Speaker, there is one hockey player who is comparable to Mr. Gordon Howe, and that is the Member of this House for York West (Mr. Kelly), who last night in his 126th Stanley Cup game scored two goals.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege, I withdraw that adjective and concur in the Prime Minister's statement.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PARTICIPATION BY CANADIAN INDUSTRY IN PRODUCTION OF NEW PLANE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Could the Minister tell us whether the various companies, Douglas, Northrop and Link-Temco-Vought, have made equivalent offers to the Canadian aircraft industry with regard to participation in the production of the aircraft they are now offering for consideration to the Minister and the Government?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would not be in a position to answer that question. There is a very real difficulty in describing what the hon. gentleman would mean by "equivalent". Also, in so far as the actual proposals made to the companies are concerned, I am not directly involved in that aspect of the negotiations. These negotiations are being carried on by the Department of Defence Production.

Mr. Lambert: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it the Minister's intention to insist that Canadian aircraft component manufacturers have an equal chance to tender for the supply of parts for whatever aircraft is bought by the Department of Defence Production?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, whatever the ultimate decision is, it will be one which will be good for the Canadian areospace industry.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR VOTE AT EARLIER HOUR TODAY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the President of the Privy Council in his capacity as government house leader, with regard to the suggestion I made last night.

Did he have the opportunity to meet with the representatives of the various parties this morning in order to decide if the vote to be taken at 5.30 this afternoon could not take place at 3.30 instead?

I made this suggestion in the hope that after the vote we could take advantage of the good will of the house and even carry the main motion, which would enable us to proceed with government business as early as next Monday?

[Text]

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, a meeting of the house leaders was held this morning. There was no agreement to change the hour for taking the vote. Consequently the vote will be taken, as provided in the rules, at 5.30 this afternoon.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker.

[Text]

POWER

BRITISH COLUMBIA—APPLICATIONS FOR LICENCES FOR DAM CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a matter of national and considerable importance. It has to do with recognition of the Statutes of this land, passed by this Parliament. My question is based on the fact that clause 4 of the International River Improvements Act reads:

> No person shall construct, operate or maintain an international river improvement unless he holds a valid licence therefor issued under this Act.

And clause 5 of the said Act states that every person who violates this Act or any regulation thereof is guilty of an offence and liable to a fine of up to $5,000 or five years imprisonment. My question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources is this. Would the Minister inform the House whether the B.C. Hydro and Power Authority have complied with the law by applying for a licence under this Act for the construction of the High Arrow Dam?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether the hon. Member is asking for a legal opinion or not, but it seems to me the question is not in order; and if it is in order, it certainly should be on the order paper.

Mr. Herridge: I will have a go at ten o'clock on Monday, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect I rise on a question of privilege, because I think there was a misunderstanding about my question. I was not seeking a legal opinion; I was just seeking information from the Minister which he must have as a result of his administrative duties. I understand that unfortunately he is not going to be here next week, and this matter is of great interest to this House and to the country. I beg your mercy, Mr. Speaker, and ask you to reconsider your former decision in respect of my question.

Mr. Speaker: This being the Easter season I think the hon. Member should be given the benefit of the doubt.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to thank the hon. Member for giving me notice of this question. This has enabled me to bring some details of this matter to the hon. Member's attention.

On January 11 I received a letter from Dr. H. L. Keenleyside, who is co-chairman of the British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority in which he asked me that the Authority, namely the entity which is charged with building the dams under the Canada-British Columbia agreement, be exempted from the provisions of the International River Improvements Act, which requires the entity to seek permits for the building of dams on the river. I can assure the House that we took some time to study this matter and I did not reply to Dr. Keenleyside until March 1, at which time I wrote as follows:

> The express covenant of Canada in paragraph (3) of that Section as confirmed by Section 6 of the Supplementary Agreement does not admit of an alternative to issuing a licence. We have, therefore, decided to issue the licences as required by the Statute
> This decision to licence the projects has been confirmed by an Order-In-Council dated February 16, 1965, a copy of which is attached along with draft copies of the licences which I propose to issue.

I wrote this letter to Dr. Keenleyside on March 1 but to date I have not heard from him. I attach no more significance to that fact than that he and his officials are now studying the draft form licences which were sent to him at that time.

BICULTURALISM AND BILINGUALISM

SURVEY OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT BY ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, and the previous day the right hon. Leader of the Opposition called my attention to two questions which had been previously asked by Members on the other side regarding certain questionnaires that had been submitted to Members of Parliament by the Bilingualism and Biculturalism Commission. I have received information from the Commission on this point which I would like to give to the House in answer to the questions.

The Royal Commission in question had among its terms of reference the obligation "to inquire into and report upon the existing state of bilingualism and biculturalism in Canada". In order to understand better how Canadians of different cultures and language groups work together, and in particular to study the possible effects of differing attitudes within the two principal linguistic groups of the country, the Commission has undertaken a number of studies of major Canadian institutions. It was felt by the Commission that no such study could be complete if it ignored Parliament, the pre-eminent political body in the country.

The purpose of this research project is to try to understand in what ways the role of the Canadian Member of Parliament and Senator is affected by Canada's bilingual and bicultural character and by the presence of other cultural groups. In particular, the relation of the Member of Parliament to his constituents, his Party and the Party Caucus in Parliament, is being explored as a means of assessing whether or how our bilingual character affects these matters. In carrying out the survey every precaution has been taken to assure that it will be impossible to identify any individual Member of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: The individual replies will be used to build up statistics and non-attributable statements, and only these results will be available to the Commissioners. Approaches to this end are being made to Members individually. It is hoped by the Commission to interview all of them, but it is clearly understood that any Member may not wish to be interviewed and has no obligation to receive any representative of the Commission and answer any questions. If a Member agrees to be interviewed on this subject, he may decline to answer any specific questions.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I cannot deal with what the right hon. gentleman has said because it was not put forward at the time of motions. But I would ask him this. Has he read over the questions? Does he not agree with the view of a great national newspaper which says it is an affront to Parliament? I refer to a paper that I am sure the seatmate of the Prime Minister will agree comes within that ambit, the Windsor Star.

Does he not agree that this touches new heights of foolishness which cannot be dismissed as ordinary harmless foolishness; that it is insulting to Members of Parliament and to the voters who elect them? I would ask him whether he would review the questions that are being asked. I cannot do this now, but I hope to have an opportunity very soon of dealing with this subject because these questions, with the exception of five or six, are simply snooping, I suggest to the Prime Minister, and have nothing to do with biculturalism.

Mr. Pearson: I will be glad to examine the questions in the light of the right hon. gentleman's remarks.

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): May I address a question to the Prime Minister. I doubt that he will care to answer it. Does he by any stretch of imagination see any connection between bicultural and bilingual conditions in Canada and questions which ask a Member of Parliament about his relationship with a political party, how he was elected and whether politics is a dirty game?

Mr. Pearson: The hon. Member's doubts were well founded when he suggested I would not care to answer that question on the orders of the day. But I will be glad to look into it, as I am looking into the question asked by the right hon. gentleman.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

VANCOUVER—POSSIBLE USE OF FORMER R.C.A.F. BASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, and I do so since he is one of our cabinet representatives from the city of Vancouver. My question is one of urgency and importance to the city of Vancouver. I should like to ask him, relative to any Government proposals now determined or under consideration, and relative to the transfer of lands at Kitsilano which were previously occupied for defence purposes—

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Winch: Oh, no; this is too damned important to Vancouver for the order paper.

I should like to ask whether a decision has been reached or is contemplated and, if so, what is the decision or what is the contemplation in view of the presentation made by the Vancouver parks board, by the city council and by Members of Parliament from Vancouver on this matter.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I think this question might be better answered by the Secretary of State. There is a resolution of the city council with which the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and I are dealing in consultation with the Secretary of State. This resolution of city council set forth certain conditions under which they would agree to accept responsibility for the Kitsilano area and at the same time satisfy the requirements of the C.B.C. These matters are now being discussed with the Secretary of State.

Mr. Winch: Can I now ask the Secretary of State what is the present status of the consideration of this matter, after almost two years; and what is going to happen on the Kitsilano reserve which during the last war went to the defence department on condition that it would be returned?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): All I can say is that we are planning to hold a meeting of Cabinet Ministers about this matter immediately after orders of the day.

INDUSTRY

BENEFITS OF CANADA-U.S. AUTOMOBILE AGREEMENT TO CANADIAN CONSUMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): I should like to address my question to the Prime Minister. It has to do with a question which was asked by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam the day before yesterday indicating that Canadian-made cars are now being sold in the United States at the same price as American cars. The Prime Minister said he would look into this and report at once.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes. As I indicated to the hon. member who asked the question, I am looking into this. I am trying to get together all the information which deals with this matter. I have not got it yet, but I hope to be able to give an answer before long.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

SUGGESTED CONFLICT BETWEEN PRESENT LEGISLATION AND PROPOSED ASSISTANCE PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. N. Ormiston (Melville): I, too, have a question I should like to ask the Prime Minister. In the light of the opting out legislation passed in the lest Session how can the right hon. gentleman reconcile this idea with his proposal to establish a Canada Assistance Plan providing for Federal sharing in the cost of comprehensive programs which may be undertaken?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I have no difficulty in making that reconciliation.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It does strike me that if that is a question it is a most argumentative one. It is important in theory, but it is not the type of question which is in order at this stage of our proceedings.

SHIPPING

CONTINUATION OF ICE CONTROL CENTRE AT SYDNEY, N.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Is consideration being given by the hon. gentleman's Department to the removal of the ice control operations centre for the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the Atlantic areas from Cape Breton to Halifax?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): No. I think this is about the most nonsensical suggestion I have seen in a long time. It would be just about as sensible to consider moving it to Bermuda. Everybody knows that Halifax is an ice-free port and that the control headquarters at Sydney is doing a wonderful job.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I am pleased to hear the Minister make that statement. It makes me very happy to have that statement on the record. Will he give an assurance that the ice operations control centre will not be moved from Cape Breton to any other area?

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, there is no thought of doing anything of that kind.

TRANSPORT

APPLICATION BY RUSSIAN SHIP TO USE ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport if he is now in a position to answer my question of yesterday regarding the application made on behalf of a Russian ship to use the St. Lawrence Seaway.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs might be in a better position to reply.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The application is under consideration. Similar treatment has not up to the present I believe been accorded to Canadian ships by the Soviet Union. Nevertheless the application is being examined on its merits.

Mr. Knowles: May I address a supplementary question to either of the two Ministers. Has their attention been called to a report on this matter in the Winnipeg Free Press written by Mr. Victor Mackie, to the effect that reciprocity and security are the matters being considered in relation to this application? Is this correct?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have not seen the article, but knowing Mr. Mackie I am sure it is a very thoroughly written article.

TRADE

REPORTED INCREASE IN IMPORTS OF JAPANESE TEXTILES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Rémi Paul (Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Can he tell the House what steps he intends to take to stop the flood of textile products and clothing from Japan whose exports to Canada in 1964 increased by 37.5 per cent over 1963, according to a statement made by Mr. Dan Rosenbloom, administrative director of the Canadian Association of Clothing and Textile Manufacturers?

Could he tell us what policy the government intends to follow to protect the Canadian Textile Industry?

[Text]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am aware of the representations made by Mr. Rosenbloom. These are under consideration. If there are any changes to be made in our present policy they will be announced either by myself or by the Minister of Finance.

NATIONAL PARKS

JASPER—USE OF FACILITIES AS OLYMPIC TRAINING CENTRE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I have a question for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources on the subject of athletic prowess, discussed earlier today in the House.

• (11:50 a.m.)

Would the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources consider making available the athletic training facilities at Jasper National Park as an Olympic training centre, either under the auspices of the Canadian youth program about to be established or the physical fitness program which has been operating for several years?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should certainly want to take this question as notice. My friend knows as well as I that we have certain facilities there which were acquired I think during his tenure of office, and which would appear to include all the requirements for such a training camp. We will certainly take this under advisement.

IMMIGRATION

TORONTO—PROSECUTION OF CHINESE LANDED IMMIGRANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration arising out of a report which appeared in the Toronto Evening Star last evening. Can the Minister give this House any explanation today for the launching of a prosecution against a Chinese landed immigrant, Ngar Mye Lau?

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there is a strong element of urgency in this matter, and I thank the hon. Member for having raised it. I should like to assure the House that it was a somewhat disturbing article, that appeared in the newspaper, and it merits the consideration of every Member of the House and all those people, who are interested in the administration of the Immigration Act in this country. I want to say also that the prosecution out of which the decision of the Court of Appeal of Ontario arose, the decision handed down the day before yesterday, was not the result of any charge that was instituted by the department of immigration or any of its officials.

This matter was first brought to my attention yesterday and I said I would look into it. My preliminary report indicates that this matter involves an offence which is not covered by the amnesty that was introduced by the previous Government, nor is it covered by the extension that was announced by my predecessor, Mr. Tremblay, last August. However, the circumstances are special and I would ask the hon. Member's agreement to take his question as notice, so I can make a complete study and a statement at the beginning of next week.

I believe that this House, the people of Canada and particularly the Chinese Canadian communities are entitled to know that the assurances given with regard to the amnesty both by this Government and by the previous Government will be adhered to in spirit and to the letter. There have been some 8,300 people who have come forward and made adjustment statements since the amnesty was first instituted, who have not been prosecuted.

I understand that the circumstances are rather special in this case. I need a little time to obtain a further report and to confer with my colleague, the Minister of Justice, but I promise the House I will make a full statement at the beginning of next week.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister mentioned that this case did not come within the provisions of the general amnesty. Will the Minister indicate in what way it did not come within those provisions? I am sure he can do that immediately.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I have only received a preliminary report and I require time to confirm the fact, but my information is that certain authorities—not of the immigration department—received a report to the effect that an offence had been committed and a charge was laid in early September of last year.

Mr. Diefenbaker: By whom was that charge laid?

Mr. Nicholson: This is what I want to check, but my present information is that it was laid by the police on September 4, and a so-called adjustment statement was made subsequent to that time. I want to obtain all the facts so I can explain this situation clearly.

I should like to repeat, however, that nobody who has acted in good faith in coming forward to make an adjustment statement need worry about being prosecuted, unless he has been engaged in trafficking in immigration documents on a commercial basis or has committed illegal or fraudulent acts for personal gain.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Minister whether he intends to withdraw, or has withdrawn, what I believe is form 1000 which has been used in respect of these cases, as he recently stated in Vancouver would be done.

Mr. Nicholson: The short answer to that question is yes, Mr. Speaker. I did not know that such a document was still in use, but in the early days when ships from the Orient were coming to the ports of Vancouver and Victoria in great numbers, form 1000 was in fairly common use to facilitate the return of people coming from China to this country. These people can enter the United States, then enter Canada from the United States or re-enter without such a form, and it seems absurd that a person of Chinese origin returning to Canada via the port of Seattle or San Francisco by air is not required to use this form, but those arriving in Canada direct must do so. Within 24 hours of the time I learned of its continued use, such use was abolished. I can assure the House that action was taken within a matter of hours of my learning of the continual existence of this form, and they are no longer required.

WATER LEVELS

GREAT LAKES—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Can the Minister make any favourable report in respect of water levels in the Great Lakes?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have read favourable weather reports and I know there have been reports made by various authorities that the low point has been reached and that precipitation has been higher, and that we are now entering upon a period during which the water levels in the Lakes will rise again in the next several years. This is dependent entirely upon nature, of course, but a great number of suggestions have been made in this regard and a great deal of attention is being paid to this subject.

I should like to pay a compliment to the House Committee which dealt with this matter and which presented an interim report of real value. A great number of other authorities are also making suggestions with regard to raising the water levels by means other than those provided by nature. In any event, it would now appear that nature is on our side.

[Later:]

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources arising out of his answer a moment ago when he stated with regard to the Great Lakes water situation, if I understood him correctly, that nature is now on our side. Would the Minister not agree that if we had been a little more on nature's side we would not have had this problem in the first place?

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

LUCIEN RIVARD—REPORTED PRESENCE IN PERU

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice.

Has the minister in the past few hours read a report to the effect that the Canadian fugitive, Lucien Rivard, had been seen in Peru in Latin America?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in reply to this question I should like to say that, although my answer which I already have given in the house, is of a general character, as my predecessors were wont to do for that matter, it would not be in the interest of the administration of justice that the Attorney General should announce or divulge daily progress of the work done by the police in a given case.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

REGINA—INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF COURT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. K. H. More (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. May I preface it by saying that I approve of the mission that took the Minister to Kitchener on April 7. I should like to know when we are going to have a Citizenship Court established in the City of Regina?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): The matter is under study, Mr. Speaker.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Thursday, April 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cashin for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Marcoux.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes I had last night I made the point that the Economic Council in its first report told the Canadian people that if we are to bring unemployment down to a rate of 3 per cent by 1970 we will have to find a million and a half new jobs for Canadian workers.

Mr. Speaker, the magnitude of one percentage point of unemployment is tremendous. According to figures produced by the Economic Council it can be seen that if we can manage to reduce unemployment by one additional percentage point by 1970 we will be able to add to the value of output in Canada by $825 million a year.

What we can do with this additional wealth is, of course, phenomenal. For instance, the Hall Commission report stated that the additional cost to the economy of the implementation of their proposals, not just medicare but also medical schools and research, would only be $466 million, or just over half the additional production which could be achieved by obtaining a one per cent reduction in unemployment. With $825 million we could build another university in every province in Canada to help meet the phenomenal increase in students which will be hitting our universities. To achieve this high rate of growth and to raise the effective demand for goods and services we must make our economy move at a much greater rate than it has been. The Economic Council put it very well when it said:

> An appropriate combination of strong expansionary policies is therefore required to generate adequate levels of demand both at home and in export markets in support of rapidly expanding employment.

We in the New Democratic Party believe that the aim of the government should be for a level of unemployment even lower than that proposed by the Economic Council. Other countries in northwestern Europe with similar problems of winter and fewer resources have managed to keep unemployment down far below 3 per cent. For example, in 1963 when Canada's unemployment rate was 5½ per cent Sweden had a 1.4 per cent rate, Norway's rate was 1.7 per cent and Finland's rate was 1.5 per cent, while that of West Germany was as low as 0.8 per cent of the work force.

Strong expansionary policies of course require, as was pointed out by the Economic Council of Canada, both tax cuts and increased expenditures. We believe the Government should not hesitate in the budget they will be bringing down later this month to give tax cuts to the Canadian people. Cuts in tax rates will not have as bad an effect on Government revenue as initial figures would make one believe. It is our belief that the loss through the cutting of rates will largely be made up by increased yields as a result of the economic expansion induced by the cuts. This has recently been the experience of the United States following their substantial tax cuts last year.

We believe there is no need for expansion of our defence commitments at this time, and at the same time we believe there are some fields in which there are a great many unmet needs and that now is the time to meet them. There must be increased investment in human capital. We need more schools, more medical schools, more hospitals. We need far more investment in research and in the fields that deal with human welfare, health and education. Economic studies have shown that investment in these fields has a high return in the form of increased economic growth.

With considerable fanfare the Speech from the Throne announced the appointment of a science council which supposedly will do for science what the Canada Council has done for the arts and humanities. We have the right to ask in this House what this science council could do for science that the Scientific Secretariat headed by Dr. Forward has not been able to do. Government promises are cheap, and nothing is cheaper than a promise made by the Liberal Government. Of what use will the science council be when science, for the past number of years, has been stretched to the breaking point by the refusal of this Government to make available the necessary funds for scientific research?

It is not my intention today to document these facts in detail. I will content myself with one example. Dr. Hans Selye, of the University of Montreal, is probably the best known Canadian working in the field of medical research. A communication received several days ago from his office brought to my attention—I am sure the Minister of Industry will know about this—the fact that the grant received by Dr. Selye's Institute of Experimental Medicine and Surgery from the United States, which amounted to approximately $225,000 last year, is to be terminated this year. Urgent appeals to the Medical Research Council of Canada have led to some increases in grants to his institute, but the difference between the amount he will receive in total from the United States and Canada this year as compared with last year is about $160,000. There is no doubt that key personnel will have to be dismissed and that important experimental programs will have to be terminated. All the while the Government has the audacity to claim that the appointment of a science council will solve our problems of scientific research. Nothing could be further from the truth than this claim.

Second, we need added investment in the human environment in Canada. We need increased urban and rural development, better housing, better transportation and so on. No field of action requires more aggressive action by the Government than the field of housing. In no field are the needs of the people so desperate, the opportunity for increased employment so great, economic growth so easy to achieve, as in the field of housing. In no field of endeavour have we failed so dismally as in the provision of housing for the people who are really in need.

I am not concerned, and the house does not need to be concerned, with the housing needs of people who make more than $6,000 a year. We have provided for them through the provisions of the National Housing Act. As somebody in Toronto said a year ago, our housing policy is a socialist policy for rich people and free enterprise for the poor people. It is the people who make less than $100 per week who find it impossible to either buy a house or rent a house at a rent which they can afford to pay.

Surveys have been made in Canada in the cities of Edmonton, Winnipeg, Toronto, Vancouver and Montreal. In the central part of every city a substantial portion of the people are living in housing which is a disgrace. Over 200,000 homes in these cities have no hot water service; close to 175,000 homes have no bath or shower; over 200,000 homes have toilet facilities which are shared by two or more families.

We have done virtually nothing about this. We have had some wonderful speeches over the years. The present Minister in charge of housing made an excellent speech when he introduced some amendments to the Housing Act during the last session. The number of public housing units built for people with low incomes is still less than 10,000. We have said, and we will continue to say, that legislation by itself will not do anything for people who need housing; that what we need is action, what we need is a full time Minister for housing.

Since I came to this House I know of no department that has had more difficulty, no Minister who has been in more trouble, than the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Nicholson). His is a difficult department. To expect him to handle that department—I am not going to talk about how he began that job—and also to be in charge of housing I think is to say in advance that we are not going to do the job in housing which is required. Even the United States, which has such a poor record when it comes to public housing, has begun to move. The major cities in the United States have begun to clean out the core, the rot, the slums which exist in the central part of every city on the American continent. It is about time Canada began to do the same thing. We call on the Government and the Minister in charge of housing to concentrate on that and go out and do a job on the housing needs of the people of Canada.

I believe that if the people of Canada knew of the situation, how bad conditions are for people who live in the poorer and older parts of the cities, they would do anything any Government wanted, federal, provincial or municipal, in order to clean up the mess which exists. We think there is a need in the field of housing, as in other fields. There is a tremendous backlog of production needs in social capital, in public housing, hospitals, schools and universities, roads, bridges, parks, electric power, conservation and development of natural resources, centres for recreation and the arts, scientific and technical institutions, etc.

We believe that unlike the private sector of our economy, where there is still a great deal of excess capacity, the public sector offers tremendous room for the investment of idle capital, the utilization of unused natural resources and the employment of thousands of men and women who are still unemployed. The Government has indicated its intention of taking some action in this field. This is encouraging. But the Government's thinking on this question is still struggling in the strait-jacket of outmoded theories on the role of public investment. Until it breaks out of this strait-jacket, action in this field will continue to be puny and half-hearted. This Government obviously believes the proper amount of public investment is merely the residue of whatever private investment happens to require. Their approach is to give priority to private investment, and after it has clearly delineated the areas where it is not prepared to act, only then should the Government step in with public investment to patch up the gaps. We believe public investment must be expanded at a greater rate.

I want to make a concrete suggestion as to how this can be done. The Government has announced it is finally going to go ahead and establish the Canada Development Corporation. We believe it should utilize this instrument, not just for giving low interest loans to the large private interests, but should use this as a powerful instrument of national economic planning to publicly develop many of the resources needed for our economy and for the reduction of unemployment. Unless the Canada Development Corporation has large and massive funds available, its impact on Canada's economy and its ability to promote economic growth will be negligible. It will remain nothing more than one of the Liberal Party's many unfulfilled promises. Public and private funds should be made available to the Canada Development Corporation.

Last year legislation was enacted which would permit Canadian insurance companies to invest 25 per cent of their funds in the shares of Canadian industry rather than the 15 per cent previously permitted. Of what use was that legislation when the fact is that only 4.5 per cent of insurance companies' funds have been invested in shares and stocks of Canadian corporations? I suggest that legislation be enacted which would make it mandatory that 10 per cent of the funds of insurance companies be invested in the Canada Development Corporation. These funds could be used to develop Canada's resources and increase Canadian employment and possibly, but just possibly, help achieve the aim about which the Minister of Finance has talked so often, of decreasing or slowing up the rate at which Canadian industry and resources are being taken over, lock stock and barrel, by United States corporations.

At the same time the government does the things which I have outlined, it must also begin real economic planning. What is needed is not so much a secretariat on poverty but a real planning board to promote the economic development of the country. Poverty cannot be divorced from the over-all performance of the economy. One of the main reasons we have poverty is because the economy is growing too slowly, and the Economic Council has demonstrated that very clearly. Poverty must be met head on, but it must not be met as a problem separate from all our other problems. Rather it must be seen as the result of failure on the part of our other policies.

We must, of course, support the methods for combating present poverty which are worthy of support, such as income maintenance for those who are unemployed, who are sick, who are old; adequate housing for those unable to provide it for themselves; education for all to make sure that the next generation and, as much as possible, the present generation will not be forced to live in poverty because of lack of knowledge and skills necessary to make a decent living.

These are all necessary and good. However, they are not sufficient. We believe we are going to have to plan the use of our resources, both material and human, much better than we have been able to do to date. We believe the people living in poverty in our society are, to a large extent, a changing group; that people move into this group and out again. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we believe the Government is going to have to plan much more than even the Economic Council has envisioned because, as it functions today, we look on the Economic Council not as a planning agency but, unfortunately, only as an economic research agency.

I would like to see the Economic Council transformed so that it undertakes not only the economic research which is necessary but also economic planning, so this and future governments will be able to meet the needs of the Canadian people as they ought to be met. As I say, economic growth requires economic planning, and this is the job which an expanded Economic Council could do, together with the Government, with the hope and expectation that Canada's economy will continue to grow, Canada's resources will be used to their capacity, poverty will be eliminated and the needs of the people met.

The amendment proposed by the Leader of the Official Opposition has required much thought on our part because it is more than a want of confidence motion. It is an indictment, in effect, of the moral integrity of the Government. Further, it pinpoints in the statement—

—the careless indifference and neglect of the Prime Minister in refusing to take action to eradicate wrongdoing in high and low places—

—the inadequacy of the Prime Minister in such a way as to pass a most harsh judgment on his capacity for making unhappy decisions, as well as his ability.

We interpret this phase of the amendment as not relating to the questions before the Dorion inquiry alone, but including the matter of the continuing position within the Liberal caucus of the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) and the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grâce (Mr. Asselin). We were dismayed by the fact that there is not one word about this serious matter in the Speech from the Throne, and we wish the Prime Minister had dealt with this matter as a former Prime Minister, Sir Robert Borden, did during World War I.

We acknowledge that it is not easy to support this amendment, given the high repute of the Prime Minister through services rendered our country in years past. On the other hand, if we failed to support the amendment we would be denying our own conscience. We are much disturbed by the character of the response, the hesitation, the blind or vague spots in the stories given us by the Prime Minister, the general disgust and discouragement in the nation over these affairs, and the reputation given to the federal Parliament by the Prime Minister's behaviour and handling of these internal Liberal Party difficulties.

Therefore we have decided that the only responsible choice for us is to support the amendment. We do this recognizing that its consequences, if others join with us and the Official Opposition, may be the defeat of the Government and a general election.

[Translation]

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, even though my voice may not be too melodious today, I would be remiss if I did not at the outset join the chorus of praise directed towards the mover, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) and the seconder, the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. If, on the day those gentlemen made their speeches, John Cabot and Jacques Cartier had stepped out of the history books and sat in this house to listen to their respective posthumous protégés, if I may call them thus, they would surely have had a long discussion to determine which of those two young and brilliant members had been more eloquent and convincing. Being both great partisans of truth, I am sure they would have agreed as we all do here that both speeches were, each in its own way, as politically sincere and eloquent one as the other.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to belong to the team which has taken advantage of the speech from the throne to present to the Canadian people a truly remarkable legislative program.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud—and I thank God and my fellow citizens for giving me the opportunity, despite some difficulties and sometimes also, perhaps, the cruelty of politics, especially for a beginner, to work on this team with the group of Liberals which faithfully surround me, for the greatest prosperity and happiness of the Canadian people. And all this under the dynamic leadership of a man who will undoubtedly be remembered in history as one of the great prime ministers of our country and certainly also as one of our most genuine Canadian patriots, the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Pearson).

Mr. Speaker, at the very beginning of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) engaged in a biting speech, the skilful looseness of which was only surpassed by the outrageous series of contradictions to be found in it.

In that speech, which was certainly not a model of logical arrangement, the Leader of the Opposition, saw fit to bravely blame the Government—these are not the very words he used, but their inner meaning—for gathering in the speech from the throne a series of pieces of legislation almost without any link, intended merely to blind us to the facts and to serve electoral purposes.

Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne as presented to the people of this country has not been written casually. It is a thoroughly thought out document, which contains a legislative program quite in accordance with the traditional thinking of the Liberal party in this country.

When one takes the trouble to analyse that speech from the throne, to study it objectively, one sees it, first of all, as the necessary extension and the natural result of the mandate given to the Liberal party by the Canadian people at the general election of April 1963; second, it is the normal extension and natural result of the carrying out of the measures which this government succeeded in having passed by both houses and in putting into effect in a brief period of two years, despite the filibustering of an opposition which persisted in obstructing the work of parliament.

[Text]

• (12:30 p.m.)

Mr. Churchill: Your statement of systematic obstruction is wrong.

An hon. Member: Pipe down.

[Translation]

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, even if the official opposition in particular is green-eyed with jealousy over the speech from the Throne it meets the interests and wishes of every Canadian to such an extent that if any citizen of this country, with a knowledge of Canadian politics and of the achievements of the present Government in the last two years, had endeavoured to draft it beforehand, he would necessarily have included therein all the social and other measures which it contains.

Indeed, the speech from the Throne embodies remarkably well at least three of the great ideals which, traditionally, Liberal governments have pursued and which they endeavour to apply in the best interests of the citizens of this country: in the first place, a genuine Canadian patriotism, second, an unflagging concern for our economic stability and development, a finally, the wish to see the triumph of social justice, in its broadest sense, in this country and for every individual.

If they examine every measure proposed in the speech from the Throne, the hon. members will realize that they all fit within the framework of one of those three great ideals.

In view of the short time at my disposal, I will discuss more particularly the three proposed measures which specially fall within the purview of the department I have the honour to direct. In my opinion, those three measures are desirable so that Canada can maintain and enrich its civilization.

They all come under the banner of justice in a liberal society, with a small "l".

Justice is the respect of the rights of everyone and, in a modern world such as ours, justice would and should reconcile the concurrent interests of every Canadian, as well as the interests of the individual with those of the state.

Such a synthesis was difficult to work out, to effect, but it will be found that the three measures in question will carry it into effect if they are passed. Their purpose is to ensure first of all, in all fairness, the freedom the individual and in this connection, I shall deal briefly with the "ombudsman". I shall then refer to the protection of society and say a few words also about our research in the correctional field. Finally, I shall deal with the Canadianization of our country and make a few brief remarks about the proposed amendment formula to the Canadian constitution.

Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne raises the question as to whether it is advisable to institute in our country an ombudsman and if so, what will be the terms of reference of the royal commission to study and report on matters respecting the administrative courts.

The growth of government business and services has made it necessary, in the interests of the citizens in our modern world of 1965, to a tremendous administrative machinery and a large increase in the number of civil servants. This was necessary because nowadays, the state is of necessity required to provide a great number of services that individuals had to provide for themselves in the past. The state is now taking a great number of decisions which hitherto belonged exclusively to the private citizen himself.

It is a fact, as found in several countries of the world, that this administrative machinery actually stands between the individual and the state. The private citizen has often been scared and sometimes completely overwhelmed. We have reached a point where, in some cases and in certain ways, people feel their personality is being perhaps crushed by the growth of legislative services. They feel a bit awed by this machinery which, of necessity, bears a somewhat impersonal character. That is why I think we must make sure that the citizens of this country where, after all, every government service is meant for them and to serve their own interests, are not hit on the rebound, so to speak, by a reaction which could leave the impression that their security and personal interests are affected to any extent. I think the citizen's confidence in the administration and the civil service must be restored or at least maintained. At the same time, and quite properly, civil servants should also feel nearer the people and have not only the impression but the assurance that they enjoy the respect and confidence of the citizenry.

Some countries have already tried, and the experience varied from one country to the other, to overcome such difficulties and dangers by appointing a most impartial and independent officer who looks first of all for simplicity in all procedures. This officer is responsible and reports to parliament; in some countries he is called a parliamentary commissioner and, in others, an ombudsman.

I do not intend to recall the history of the ombudsman, I will briefly outline his duties. In short, an ombudsman could be a parliamentary officer whose function is to receive and examine complaints from Canadian citizens who may feel that they have been wronged by the authorities or that their rights are being encroached upon by some civil servants or departmental officials through misuse of authority. The function of that parliamentary commissioner or ombudsman would be, therefore, to examine the complaint and, if he deems it unwarranted to convince the plaintiff that he has not in fact been ill treated or placed in an untenable position and that the state was not unfair toward him; on the other hand, if the complaint is warranted, he would make to the state or to its officials the necessary recommendations so that the situation may be remedied.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the Minister answer a question at this stage? Does he propose doing this by a Constitutional amendment or, in the alternative, by working out an arrangement with the Provinces, since we have a Federal system and there is a difference between the Federal authorities and those which are Provincial?

Mr. Favreau: I have just said that the Government proposes to submit the question of the advisability of establishing this body to a Royal Commission. I was just coming to the point raised by the hon. Member for Bow River——namely that, in the case of a country like ours, which has a federal constitution, it must be decided if, because there are two levels of government, federal and provincial, in short because the jurisdictions are divided, it would be really practical to appoint an ombudsman and if it could be done under conditions in keeping with British parliamentary traditions.

Of course that commission will have an opportunity to study the matter thoroughly.

The last thing I want to say is that this is the first government since confederation which gives so much thought to the possibility of undertaking such a study which, if my wishes come true, will result in the government and its officers being subject to the close scrutiny of an officer of parliament; there is no doubt that this is quite extraordinary for a government which is charged with unfairness because it is allegedly trying to hide things, although it is expressly forbidden by law to produce certain documents.

This government, in the fullest sense of the word—

Mr. Favreau: I would be pleased to reply to any questions at the end of my remarks, but I have only a few minutes left.

Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne is true to one of the ideals of the Liberal party, the protection of society.

I believe and maintain that in a modern and civilized world, our penal system makes sense only if it tends mainly to the rehabilitation of prisoners. Looked upon in that light, it remains the best protection for the citizen. We are no longer in an era of punishment for vengeful purposes. Living as we do in an entirely civilized country, everyone must realize that the penalty itself and even detention are, as I often said, justified only if the physical detention of the prisoner can better contribute to the freeing of his mind.

Therefore the institutional and psychological methods leading to such a freeing have to be studied very carefully.

With this end in view, a resolution will be put on the order paper without delay, for the establishment of a parliamentary committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, the terms of reference of which will be to consider the physical and material conditions in Canadian penitentiaries.

The creation of a second committee was officially announced in the speech from the throne in these words, and I quote:

My government will appoint a special committee to study and make recommendations on a comprehensive policy for the correction and rehabilitation of prisoners.

I am pleased to announce to the house that the terms of reference of the committee have already been approved by the cabinet. I have sent copies to the press because I do not have time to read it in full and, if the house agrees, I shall table two copies.

I am glad to say also that I am completing negotiations with the people whom I shall recommend to the government as members of the said special committee on our correctional system and of the secretariat which will be attached to it.

Those people will be on the list of experts and consultants in various fields, such as the information services dealing with parole, sociology, penology, psychology, psychiatry, and others who are interested in the rehabilitation of prisoners and the reform of our correctional system.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, this matter will involve the Criminal Code at least incidentally. There is another matter announced in the speech from the throne which will affect the Criminal Code one way or the other. I refer to the discussion on capital punishment in this house.

On that matter, I should like to make a brief announcement to the house. It will be a free vote, and not a vote along party lines. Since the matter touches the heart and reaches into the depth of the conscience of each and every Canadian, it is important that such a vote be completely enlightened. Consequently, I have given instructions to my department officials to prepare, for the information of hon. members and the general public, not a white paper, because it will not involve a matter of government policy, but an information pamphlet that will be made available to all hon. members. That pamphlet will contain statistics along with the pros and cons of the problems involved. Finally, there will be a historical record and the result of facts observed in various countries which, to a varying degree, have retained or abolished capital punishment.

Mr. Speaker, I said a while ago that the third aspect of a measure which I mentioned gave evidence of the government's sense of a truly Canadian patriotism. In fact, imbued with a genuine Canadianism, this government expresses in the speech from the throne, its desire to have passed by both houses an Address to Her Majesty in order to give us once for all full control over our constitution.

This measure is part of the general policy which has caused the government to have the house pass, on that now historic day of last December, what has finally become the proud symbol of our unity, the red maple leaf flag.

Mr. Speaker, this address was inspired by that same spirit of love for our country which inspired the government's decision to propose now the adoption of "O Canada" as our national anthem.

The right hon. Leader of the Opposition launched a violent attack, which I suggest is unthinkable, against the amending formula. He forgot the proverb which is indeed very true: People who live in glass houses should not throw stones.

Mr. Lambert: Then watch out.

Mr. Favreau: Indeed this formula was conceived by his own government, in its essential characteristics as well as in its final form. And yet the Leader of the Opposition says: This is a dreadful measure which is contrary to the interests of Canadians, a measure which will freeze our constitution—he even said something about it being a "strait-jacket"—and finally a measure which would balkanize our country forever.

Mr. Speaker, we argue that this measure will be beneficial to Canada, that it will give us, Canadians, once for all, control over our constitution; it will enable us to amend, repeal or replace it, here in our country, in Canada.

In a letter to the Leader of the Opposition, dated October 26 last, one of my predecessors, Hon. Davie Fulton, former minister of justice, reminded him that the present formula is identical, in its essentials, to the formula which his government had asked all the provinces to ratify following the federal-provincial conferences of 1960 and 1961.

Mr. Speaker, I have only one minute left to remind the house that this measure is not an obstacle to the amendment of the constitution. In fact, far from being an obstacle, it will enable Canadians to discuss their political future freely between themselves and in their own country. It will become the technical instrument to adjust federal and provincial long-term interests, the co-ordination of the dual loyalty of Canadians to the cultural ideals of their province and the political ideals of Canada. In brief, it puts an end to a mortifying anachronism.

That is how, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal mind considers three of the major questions concerning our country. I ask all reasonable men, all people of good will, all patriots, to join with us in building a country which will be authentically Canadian, because it is a just and civilized country.

[Text]

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise briefly on a point of order. The Minister has said he is going to give the terms of reference of which he has spoken to the Press, and it seems to me that they should be placed in Hansard.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I did ask leave of the House to table two copies.

Mr. Douglas: I would ask the Minister to seek leave of the House to have them included as an appendix to Hansard or as part of the Minister's speech.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. Member for Burnaby-Coquitlam for his very good suggestion. I should like to ask him to note carefully that I did ask for leave of the house to table two copies of these terms of reference at the same time as I give them to the Press. I have taken this course because the terms are too long to read at this time.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I would ask through you whether the House consents to have this included as an appendix to Hansard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreeable?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For terms of document referred to above, see appendix.]

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister a question?

Some hon. Members: It is one o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are now faced with two difficulties. It is almost one o'clock, and the Minister's time has expired. Do hon. Members wish to allow the hon. Member to ask a question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister why, in view of what I consider is widespread support in this house, certainly on this side, for the appointment of an ombudsman, legislation cannot be introduced rather than delaying this by the appointment of a Royal Commission. There are ombudsmen now in other countries, and I am wondering why a Royal Commission is necessary.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I am personally convinced of the validity and value of such an institution, and I am aware of the fact that there is a great deal of support in many parts of this country and in many sectors of our population for the establishment of such an institution.

However, I hope the hon. gentleman will agree that many questions are being posed by people in many parts of the country as to whether, in view of our Federal constitution, in view of the fact that we have 11 governments, and in view of the division of jurisdiction within the provincial and federal fields, first it is advisable for Canada to establish such an institution; and second, whether certain precautions or certain modalities ought not to be adopted so as to make sure in the case of an affirmative report that the institution of an ombudsman will be both useful and effective in Canada. That is the only reason.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, may I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in this debate I should like first to congratulate the hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) and the hon. Member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien) on the competent manner in which they moved and seconded the Address. Their speeches were well prepared and delivered in a manner that does credit to them and to the constituencies which elected them to this House. I listened with care to the last speaker, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau), and in the course of his remarks he had nothing to say concerning our amendment. Obviously, he must agree with it and will support us in condemning the Government for its failure to deal with wrongdoing in high and low places.

I have read the Speech from the Throne in the hope I would find therein some special recognition of the social and economic ills that continue to plague the Atlantic Provinces. However, in this instance, the Liberals have run true to form and again ignored the Maritime area. The Throne Speech contains a mountain of proposed legislation, of which only a small part could vaguely be construed as applying to our area. Why was there no recognition given to the needs of our Maritime universities? Their financial plight should be of some concern to this Government. The university grants are still administered by the Federal authorities on the basis of the population of a province, divided into the size of the subsidy which the Federal Government makes available. The province then divides this sum by the number of university students within its borders, thereby determining the per student grant.

This method has resulted in a greater share going to the larger and growing provinces, while the Atlantic Provinces, especially Nova Scotia with its high student enrolment in its numerous universities, has received a smaller proportion of the grant than any province in Canada. The cost of maintaining and expanding Nova Scotia's universities is constantly increasing, mainly as a result of the actions of this Government and its 11 per cent sales tax on building materials. With costs spiraling, it may be necessary for economic reasons to restrict the enrolment of students from other regions of Canada. It would indeed be regrettable if this action became necessary. I think the Government should take another look at this matter immediately. A more equitable formula would be to make the total Federal subsidy available on a national basis with the grants to be provided to the various provinces based on the number of students attending universities in that province.

In the economic area surely this Government, which has 100 per cent support from the Province of Newfoundland—even if the Cabinet Minister's origin as a Newfoundlander is questionable—must give an answer to the Atlantic problems.

Mr. Cowan: I should like to raise a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker. As one coming from the Province of Ontario, I was rather hurt to hear a Member of this House referred to as having questionable origin when he comes from Ontario. I think they are quite reputable.

Mr. Mandziuk: On the question of privilege, why would not Ontario have him?

[Mr. Crouse.]

An hon. Member: He came from Manitoba.

Mr. Mandziuk: We did not want him.

Mr. Crouse: I am sure the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) will regret that he is not present at the moment to hear this enjoyable interplay upon his origin.

I feel that this Government must know that the answer to the problems of the Atlantic Provinces is Federal action which will give the people of the region the opportunity to establish economic equality with central Canada through their own efforts. This action would provide facilities for self-development, on the one hand, and ensure the maintenance of existing vital industry at least throughout the long transition period on the other. Quite frankly, the opportunity to obtain economic parity just does not now exist. Certainly, in some areas, especially in Nova Scotia there has been substantial economic growth in recent years. There are other areas still suffering from unemployment. However, the opportunity to put the Atlantic Provinces on their feet has never been better than it is today, provided this Government moves courageously and with imagination, in the full realization of the fact that what is involved is the economic health of the entire nation.

After reading the Throne Speech it is evident the Liberals are taking the same attitude toward the Maritimes that they took for 22 years, an attitude of waiting for an almost incurable crisis to occur. This is the typical Grit method of avoiding action, and a refusal on the part of the Government to assume full responsibility for this regional problem which is, in effect, a national problem.

Perhaps this is due to the attitude of some of the Cabinet Ministers. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh), whom I am glad to see in her seat, spoke in Montreal recently, as reported in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of April 5. She apparently was looking through her rose coloured glasses as she reviewed what was taking place in the Atlantic Provinces, with special reference to Nova Scotia. This, in part, is what she said:

> Ottawa's assistance to the Atlantic Provinces is no longer regarded in Ottawa as "simply a form of federal hand-out—a means whereby Daddy can look after his shoeless cousin in Halifax," Health and Welfare Minister Judy LaMarsh told the Maritime Women's Club of Montreal Saturday.
> "Instead," she said, "the Atlantic Provinces are moving ahead with a pride in their own identity.

There's an air of confidence in the Maritimes that was not in existence a few years ago."

The reason, she suggested, included a world trend toward freer trade which had made the area more attractive for the location of industry; a new expansion by foreign firms of their operations in Canada, often with a preference for coastal locations; and a greater confidence by Maritimers in their own potential....

Miss LaMarsh also attributed much of the region's economic improvement to the policies of the Pearson Government.

One of these, the "designated areas" program, she disclosed for the first time, had resulted in some 20 firms indicating to the Government interest in establishing new plants or new production facilities in the Atlantic provinces....

Not all of the companies considering new operations in the area had yet made public their plans.

Among those which had were Deuterium of Canada Limited, which is establishing a heavy water plant at Glace Bay...Scott Paper Limited and Canadian Motor Industries Limited, which is benefiting from a site at Point Edward Naval Base being made available to it by the federal Government....

The Health Minister pointed out that the unemployment rate in the Atlantic Provinces now was down to 7.8 per cent, the lowest since 1956.

The hon. Lady cannot have it both ways. First she told this group that the Atlantic Provinces are "moving ahead with a pride in their own identity" because of a "world trend toward freer trade." Then she got a little bit political and tried to attribute much of the improvement to the policies of the Federal Government.

If the Minister were less interested in gathering bouquets for herself and the Government, she would realize that much of the credit for the present industrial revolution taking place in Nova Scotia must go to Hon. Robert Stanfield and his hard working cabinet. This dedicated group of men are leaving no stone unturned in their efforts to bring new employment opportunities to Nova Scotians. By studying local and regional possibilities, and refusing to listen to apostles of doom or gloom, they are bringing new industries and new prosperity to Nova Scotia.

Miss LaMarsh: Are you taking credit for Premier Stanfield?

Mr. Crouse: In pursuing their goals, however, they must not only endeavour to bring in new industries but must help provide an economic climate that will hold and expand existing primary industries.

The Minister asks if I am taking credit for Premier Stanfield. I am happy to tell her I cannot take credit for Premier Stanfield, but it has been my privilege in every Provincial election campaign to stand on the same platform to assist him in whatever way I can to continue in the job he is doing so well.

As I have said, in pursuing their goals in Nova Scotia the Provincial Cabinet, led by Premier Stanfield, must not only endeavour to bring in new industries but they must help provide an economic climate that will help hold and expand existing primary industries.

In order to obtain these goals the Premier of Nova Scotia, along with other Atlantic Province Premiers, requires additional assistance from the federal treasury. I say this because unemployment in the Atlantic Provinces is not what the minister told that group in Montreal, but in fact is higher than in any other part of Canada. The Daily Gleaner in its editorial on March 18, pointed out the seriousness of the problem, and I quote:

The mid-February employment report contained bad news for the Atlantic region. Unemployment stood at 13 per cent, a jump of 2.2 per cent from the figure of a month earlier. ...

The Atlantic region's jobless totalled 78,000, as compared with 64,000 in mid-January.... This shows conclusively that whatever is maintaining relative prosperity in every other part of Canada is not functioning in the Maritimes.

In mid-winter the primary industries, vital to the Atlantic economy, are operating at low ebb, and the region has only made the first gestures at developing the network of secondary industries to take up the employment slack.

So we have this veritable army of the unemployed, who, with their families must be sustained by various forms of relief and social assistance.

The shame and the folly of this situation should spur everyone concerned to a sustained effort to end this situation of regional inequality once and for all.

I repeat that the unemployment figure is 13 per cent, not 7.8 per cent. Perhaps it is time we reconstituted the truth squad.

When you examine these figures and compare them with the total claims for unemployment insurance at the end of January, which numbered 547,800, it is easy to note the higher percentage of unemployment and unemployed in the Maritime Provinces in relation to the rest of Canada.

Under such circumstances it is not difficult to understand the anger and despair of Maritimers, who take exception to the tariff wall with which we have surrounded such industries as the assembly plants of United States automobile manufacturers in Ontario. We have been told repeatedly that the wall is there to safeguard the jobs of workers. As a result, Canadians pay approximately one third more for their cars than Americans do, and people in the Maritimes, as a result of greater distance from the assembly plants and the higher freight rates, must pay more for their cars than citizens of Quebec or Ontario. We are told in the Throne Speech that in this session we will be asked to approve a resolution concerning the important agreement on the automobile industry recently concluded with the United States. Mr. Speaker, in all sincerity, I ask to whom is this agreement important? Since its terms have been announced, we have not seen or heard of any reduction in the price of automobiles to Canadian buyers, and since cars are no longer a luxury, but a necessity to the average Canadian, this should certainly be the objective of any change in the present legislation.

As I said earlier, we are told in the Maritimes we must pay more by way of tariffs on automobiles to protect the jobs of the workers. What about the workers in the Atlantic Provinces and their need for job protection? For some years, Maritimers enjoyed a preferred position on goods moving within the area and westbound from the Maritimes, but the disparity in present freight charges works a hardship on our primary and secondary industries, and when our products cannot be delivered competitively, our industries slacken or close down. It can truthfully be said that higher freight rates contribute to our unemployment condition.

Maritimers quite rightly ask, what can be done to improve the situation? Well, the Speech from the Throne promises comprehensive legislation to reform public regulation of the railways and to facilitate the adoption of the railway system to present and future needs. It seems to me that I have heard that song before.

For more than two years, transportation experts in the Department of Transport have worked out new railway legislation based on the MacPherson Commission's recommendations; but what happens? As soon as the public get an opportunity to look at these recommendations, and point out some of the faults in the proposals, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) does one of his well known flip-flops and says he was only flying a kite to gain public reaction. And all the while the Minister fiddles and fumbles, it is still possible for a stove manufacturer in Hamilton, Ontario, to ship his product to Montreal for approximately 75 cents per stove cheaper than a Nova Scotian producer in Sackville can deliver a similar product over the same distance. Now this is not much per stove, but on volume business it soon runs into thousands of dollars. And this is only one side of the coin.

It must be remembered that Nova Scotian companies must pay considerably more freight charges on inbound raw materials. For example, the ship refitting yards in Lunenburg and Queens Counties, when fabricating equipment for ships or other industrial purposes, must pay over $1 more per 100 pounds of inbound freight charges on steel sheets as compared with a manufacturer in Hamilton. These extra freight costs price many of our Maritime manufacturers out of the market when competing for business in Central Canada, and I don't think we should allow anyone to fool us into thinking transportation costs are not the major key to our problems.

Now what is the answer? It of course lies in the fact that competitive freight rates have been set up as a result of producers being able to use water or highway transport in the Central Provinces as an alternative to the railroads. In my opinion, the economy and employment opportunities in the Atlantic Provinces, will always lag behind the rest of Canada, until the Federal Government recognizes the fact that improved transportation links are of prime importance.

Lower cost freight charges on goods shipped westward is the key to survival of our primary and secondary industries in the Atlantic Provinces, and this can only be brought about by an improved highway system, with the Federal Government working in co-operation with the Provinces concerned. At present, the C.N.R. is the major hauler of freight, but it is endeavouring to cut down on its yearly deficit, and part of its program is to terminate service on what it considers uneconomical branch lines. These changes are proposed without too much consideration being given to the effect on the economy of these areas, but I ask the Government and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) which bill they think will be the highest, the one for subsidizing the railroads or the cost of dissolving industry and finding new homes and jobs for the people involved?

Mr. Speaker, we cannot go on ignoring the social and economic problems of the Atlantic Provinces. Canada, and the provinces concerned, cannot permit emigration to occur—which was one of the suggestions put forth as a solution to our problems by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) in his 1956 Royal Commission report on Canada's Economic Prospects. No good purpose can be served by endeavouring to build up one part of Canada on the one hand, while tearing it down with the other. There is only one answer, and it is for all the Governments concerned, acting in unison, to come to terms now on the simple question, "What does it take in dollars to help you expand your economy so that you can remain in the Atlantic Provinces?" It is futile to argue that this will cost the country money, for this is a certainty. But the cost of establishing new industry, and enabling Maritimers to stand on their own two feet, will indeed be small when compared with the alternative. In short, the present key industries of the Atlantic Provinces must be maintained in health and expanded, at least during a lengthy transition period while new economic areas are under development.

You might rightly ask, "Where do we begin?" The Speech from the Throne calls for improved measures for regional development, and states, "We will be asked to approve measures to aid industrial expansion in those areas requiring improved employment opportunities". I am in agreement with this particular proposal, and I would suggest that the Government give consideration to starting immediately on a multipurpose causeway dam from the Annapolis Valley shore at Cape Split to Fox River Point on the Cumberland shore across Minas Basin. This would serve to develop tidal power, and provide a transportation link as well as recreational facilities in the area. The Atlantic Development Board has been asked to undertake a feasibility study of this project, and if this study indicates the proposal is practical we already have the endorsation of Premier Stanfield on this project.

Just what is involved? The length of the dam between Cape Split and Fox River Point would be four miles, and in places it would be 200 feet deep. Engineers have estimated there would be 5 million kilowatts of power generated annually by such a project. The generators of this power could be similar to the ones used on the River Rance in Britanny, France, which is the first commercial tidal power development in the world. These generators are essentially like small submarines set in tunnels at the bottom of the dam, and they would catch the surge and flow of tidal waters both entering and emptying Minas Basin.

The recent trend in cheaper transmission costs would enable the power produced from this dam to be exported to the power-hungry markets of the United States, especially to New England, after the immediate needs of an expanded industrial complex in this area of Nova Scotia were satisfied. This proposed development for Minas Basin would be the largest single source of power in the world, and the future possibilities for industrial development would be virtually unlimited. We must also remember that the only money required for this project is the amount expended on the original construction. Once the dam is built and the generators installed, the electrical output will continue to be produced by the tides in perpetuity. We therefore need long term cheap money, loaned by the Federal Government, which in turn will be reflected in cheap power that will guarantee economic development in the entire area.

In addition to these benefits, the highway crossing the causeway would end the transportation bottleneck in the western part of Nova Scotia. For example it would no longer be necessary for trucks serving the industries in Liverpool, Bridgewater, Lunenburg, Mahone Bay or Chester to travel all the way to Halifax when en route to central Canadian markets with produce or manufactured products. These trucks could cut across the Province from Chester Basin through New Ross to Kentville, and crossing over the new causeway to Parrsboro they could cut off an estimated 100 miles on the highway route from the South Shore of Nova Scotia to Fredericton, New Brunswick.

At this point, I would like to propose another change. The Speech from the Throne states:

> My Ministers attach great importance to Canada's neighbourly relationship with the United States and to the development of practical, mutually beneficial arrangements within that relationship.

In keeping with that lofty concept, I would suggest that the present administration start negotiations immediately with American authorities in order to gain early acceptance of our proposal for a corridor road through the State of Maine. This would be an exercise of our good neighbour policy, and would shorten the distance from the trans-Canada highway at Fredericton, New Brunswick, to Sherbrooke, Quebec, by 150 miles. This would bring Montreal to within a comfortable five-hour run from the Maritime border. Surely the cost to the Federal treasury of building this corridor road could not be termed excessive by anyone, when weighed against the benefits this shorter highway route would bring to our primary and secondary industries in the Atlantic Provinces.

Mr. Speaker, this type of proposal should not be too difficult to negotiate with the Americans. We have co-operated with the Americans in the sale of B.C. power, we co-operate with them in matters of national defence of this hemisphere, and we are their best customers. I believe that the question of a corridor road through Maine, if properly presented, will not only receive their blessing but also their financial assistance, as it will be opening up and improving a section of their country for further development. The proposals I have mentioned required a dynamic, national attitude on the part of the present administration in order for them to be carried to fruition. When completed, they would shorten the truckers' route for products from my constituency to Montreal by some 250 miles. This would provide an alternative shipping route for our industries on a more competitive basis than presently exists.

It is a known fact that our long established Maritime industries have acquired and retrained national markets primarily through freight rate assistance. It is equally clear that some of our industries face extreme economic hardship unless the present scale of freight rate assistance is basically increased or steps are taken, as suggested, to shorten the competitive highway route to our central Canadian markets. Canada and this Government have no choice but to find ways and means to take the Atlantic Provinces into economic as well as political Confederation.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words about the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. When the C.B.C. was set up by the late R. B. Bennett during the mid-1930's it was felt that because of the large geographical area of Canada, with a very small population, only a publicly operated broadcasting system could adequately serve the Canadian people. In some ways the C.B.C. has performed a wonderful service to the Canadian people, and it will undoubtedly continue to do so. In order to ensure that political interference will not take place, the C.B.C. has been so organized that it is not responsible to the Government, but rather to Parliament as a whole. The result has been that the C.B.C. would appear to think that they are responsible to nobody at all, and literally does what it pleases. I object to that attitude. If M.P.'s make suggestions or criticisms in Parliament they seem to be regarded by the C.B.C. as some sort of ignorant heretics who are opposed to free expression of opinion. There seems to be a firm resistance by the C.B.C. officials to accept any kind of criticism or suggestion. As a result, a small group runs the C.B.C. exactly as it pleases and any suggestions are regarded as interfering with free speech. Well, I have some news for the C.B.C. No one wishes to interfere with free speech or free opinion—but financially it is far from free. When you have a Government agency asking Parliament in the year 1965 for a grant of $99,444,000, which is an increase of $11,444,000 over last year, so that it can discharge the responsibilities of the national broadcasting service, surely the taxpaying public is entitled to some control over the operation and over the determination of these responsibilities by the organization.

[Mr. Crouse.]

What did ten C.B.C. staff announcers say in a recent brief to the Fowler Commission on Broadcasting as reported in the Chronicle-Herald on March 9? I quote:

• (3:00 p.m.)

Creativity in the Corporation is being stifled and it could turn into a fat, self-perpetuating, self-servicing bureaucratic Goliath.

This is strong talk, but despite these charges the President of the C.B.C. recently suggested the Corporation be granted long term financing up to ten years to keep it free from partisan political influence. Even at the present rates this would amount to $1 billion over a ten year period, and this request should give the Canadian taxpayer some idea of the greed for power of the present group controlling this bureaucratic giant. This is nothing but unmitigated gall, the most callous I have heard since I entered the House of Commons in 1957.

In my opinion, the C.B.C. should serve the Canadian people, not dominate them. For greater control of its activities I would suggest that a special Committee be set up composed of elected representatives of the people of Canada. Since Members of Parliament must answer for the money spent by the C.B.C., we should have some control over its policies and expenditures. With all parties being represented on the Committee there would be no danger of political interference in programming, and since the Speech from the Throne promises legislation dealing with broadcasting, I hope this suggestion will be given favourable consideration by the Government.

The C.B.C. likes to talk about the danger of partisan political influence. I do not think the Canadian people need to worry too much about the partisan influence of the present Government—or of the Conservative Opposition, the N.D.P., Social Credit or Creditistes. We are exposed to this daily, and the electorate can deal with it at the proper time. The type of partisanship I object to is the bureaucratic partisanship practised by the officials within this Corporation, and I believe their activities could result in an abuse of public funds, unless provision is made for close supervision of this Corporation.

Mr. Macaluso: Would the hon. Member permit a question?

Mr. Crouse: Certainly.

Mr. Macaluso: I was interested in his remarks concerning low cost transportation to permit the products of the Eastern Provinces to reach Central and Western Canada. Would the hon. Member agree with me that the economic and social progress of the Atlantic Provinces could be helped by having an all-Canadian toll-free St. Lawrence Seaway to cut down the costs of inland water transportation to Central and Western Canada? This would allow these Maritime products to be shipped in.

Mr. Crouse: That is an interesting question. It involves the cost of the seaway and the regulations which were drawn up by the party which he supports, to deal with the amortization of those costs. We in the Atlantic Provinces had some doubts about the benefits which might accrue to our region when the seaway was built. It is now an accomplished fact, however, and it would appear there is a determination on the part of the Government to get back into the treasury some of the money which was expended on this project, before making any such change as the hon. Member has suggested.

Mr. Macaluso: Would the hon. Member not agree that low cost inland water transportation would help the Atlantic Provinces to ship their products into Western and Central Canada? One of the factors in reducing the cost would be the reduction of seaway tolls.

Mr. Crouse: The hon. Member has posed an involved question that would take more time to answer than I have available now. Certainly, we in the Atlantic Provinces are endeavouring to use every means at our disposal to get the goods we require for our use at the lowest cost, and we shall use every means at our disposal to ship our products into the markets of Central Canada at the lowest cost. But there are areas we are endeavouring to develop that are not adjacent to the seaway, and it is for this reason I propose that the present administration should study carefully the possibility of improving transport facilities by means of a highway from the Maritime production centres to the markets of Central Canada.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. Maurice Côté (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne we heard last Monday contained this sentence:

> All the great potentialities of our economy are not, however, being realized. The talents of some of our people are wasted because of poverty—

Thus, the truth for which our group has been fighting in this house for the past three years has come out into the open. For the first time the government has humbly admitted the existence in our country of a dire situation which has taken a turn for the worse in the last decade, and two different governments have during all that time taken no rational or permanent steps to remedy the situation. Those who were too proud to believe in the logic of our suggestions have now admitted their weakness.

At this stage I think the words of St. Remigius baptizing Clovis, the king of the Franks, would quite suitably apply to government members:

> Courbe la tête, fier Sicambre, adore ce que tu as brûlé, brûle ce que tu as adoré.

This is a lesson drawn from history on which government members should reflect, Mr. Speaker, to pull our country out of economic stagnation, with the co-operation of members of good will in the house.

At the opening of the session in the fall of 1962, I stated in parliament that there were more than 2.5 million Canadians who were underfed and living in most destitute conditions. Those figures, based on my own computations, seemed exaggerated to a few. The figures arrived at by experts following research are more precise and more alarming.

In fact, the assistant dean of the faculty of social sciences at Ottawa University and former adviser to the Department of Trade and Commerce, Mr. O. J. Firestone, breaking four years' silence, stated that:

> One Canadian out of five lives in a state of destitution. The 1961 census indicated that 3.8 million Canadians lived in a continuous state of destitution, whether they were unemployed or not.

In its October 8, 1964 edition, the newspaper Le Droit stated that about 2.5 million Canadians, that is over 13 per cent of the population, lived in extreme poverty and that another 1.5 million barely had enough to subsist.

In its April 1965 edition, Chatelaine magazine had an article entitled:

Poverty is the lot of over 4 million Canadians who lack the bare necessities of life. It read as follows: In 1965, a flourishing year if ever, over 4 million Canadians live in hardship, are ill-housed, ill-fed, ill-clothed and poorly educated. This state of affairs is to be found everywhere, in cities as in the country. However, the paradox is the same for all the underprivileged, regardless of where they live: the absurdity of suffering hardship in a land of plenty. Twenty-two per cent of the population barely has the strict minimum. In the province of Quebec, 25 per cent of rural families live in poverty and 45 per cent barely have enough to keep body and soul together.

So, now, the Government recognizes that our requests were quite reasonable and that those statistics, which put Canada in a bad light, were correct. And it seems willing to put an end to general poverty. In my opinion, that is the main point in the Speech from the Throne.

It was a pleasure for me to listen to the mover, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin), and the seconder, the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien), of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. While I am at it, I should like to congratulate them most sincerely for having shown us the ill-effects of the lamentable state of the Canadian economy and the urgency of finding the remedies required.

All those testimonials were confirmed by the Prime Minister himself, who gave us an extremely lucid analysis of this chronic evil which brings shame upon our Christian democracies.

Of course, the plain truth is quite different from the wonderful statements made by the Minister of Finance in Toronto on February 1, 1965, as reported in Le Devoir:

As a matter of fact, stated the minister, 1964 was the best year in Canadian history. This is not the result of a mere chance. The policies of the Liberal government have directly contributed to those results.

I feel that the Minister of Finance, who is a chartered accountant, as everybody knows, has been deluded and misled by figures.

Naturally, the figures indicating the national product are steadily increasing, and this is quite normal because every year the population increases on the average by

[Mr. Côté (Chicoutimi).]

345,000 citizens, through births and immigration. Yet, this does not mean that the economy is thriving. It will thrive only when those 4 millions of destitute Canadians will be able to enjoy a better distribution rather than redistribution of the wealth of Canada.

Family allowances, which could have been a most powerful instrument to balance family income, have remained at the same level since 1958 although they should have been raised in keeping with the rise in the cost of living. At present, there are 4,800,000 families in this country; what steps have been taken to support Canada's, greatest asset, our children? Nothing, absolutely nothing. Such is the result of the administrative carelessness of our governments under the control of financial oligarchy.

To adjust our national economy and eradicate poverty and misery, the government proposes certain measures which seem to have a socialistic approach. I am convinced that the government does not intend to lead us to socialism which destroys human qualities. However, with the projected implementation of all those plans, the one being more complicated than the next, I wonder what they are driving at, because that will not provide any equitable solution to the problems of family heads or of Canadians who do not have enough purchasing power to live decently. On the contrary, I do say that such plans will increase our general difficulties because they are detrimental to the freedom of initiative and enterprise and an act of aggression against individuals.

Why, Mr. Speaker, should we be made to fall out of the frying pan into the fire when it would be possible, with some minor adjustments to the finance mechanism of the country, to enable the Bank of Canada to issue new credits or bank money at administrative costs according to strict standards in order to meet the social needs of the people and make the public investments required for the development of the country?

It is the only way to hold in check our ever increasing debt. During the year the national debt will exceed $26 billion. The interest charges on that debt of the Canadian government will reach $1,102 million. Who will foot the bill for those interest charges? Small wage earners and middle income employees, to a large extent, will have to deduct this amount from their purchasing power, while they do not have an income related to the inflationary costs of living.

It is also disturbing to see such figures and to know that the government will have to deduct such an amount of money from the national budget to enrich private or commercial banks. Instead of that amount being paid in interest, it should be added to the budget of the Department of Public Works, which has to manage with the ridiculous amount of $208 million to meet the capital expenditures of our large country. It is really a distribution in driblets.

As an illustration, let us take the county of Chicoutimi which I have the honour of representing. This year we would need to spend at least $20 million in public works, because the sea wharves are falling to pieces; we need a bridge to cross the Saguenay river at Chicoutimi; retaining walls and embankments should be built to protect the properties along the Saguenay river; sea relays, post offices, wharves at various places, etc., should also be built. We have enough men, materials and machines to do it, but we lack bank credits, bank money.

Is there anything stranger than being so helpless because our governments lie at the mercy of an out of date financial system which prevents us from taking advantage of the huge wealth accumulated by our ancestors?

By what means does the government intend to pay back that debt of $26 billion? When shall it be done? The speech from the throne says nothing about that calamity for the Canadian taxpayers.

Where are we going, Mr. Speaker, with that all-devouring usury which ruins our fellow citizens, undermines our economic foundations and is the underlying cause of that inflation which depreciates our money?

I wonder why the Liberals as well as the Conservatives are so afraid of talking about monetary reform, when Chancellor Ludwig Erhard, one of the most prominent statesmen in the world refers to it more than a hundred times in his essays on political economy, namely "Prosperity for everyone" and "A policy of affluence".

When Mr. Erhard came to Canada last June, the Prime Minister himself paid tribute to him, as reported in the July 1964 edition of External Affairs:

> The part he played in the stupendous recovery of Germany is well-known and has gained our respect and our admiration.

It is difficult to imagine a higher praise. In addition to the elimination of poverty, the speech from the throne mentions amendments to the Bank Act and the Bank of Canada Act.

I hope that this will mean that the issue of bank money or of credit will be nationalized and that the exclusive power of such an issue will be vested in the Bank of Canada alone. However, I think that the commercial banks and caisses populaires should keep the privilege of rediscounting bankable bills to the Bank of Canada at administrative cost, so as to meet industrial and commercial needs.

It is extremely important that this sovereign privilege of the state, that is the issuing of credit, be used for the common weal and not to the advantage of a few greedy people, actuated solely by their own benefit, ambitions and interests.

I also assume that the government does not wish the interest rates of the commercial banks to be increased, since those financial institutions are already reaping enough profits with a simple reserve of 8 per cent. The rate of interest on bank loans must be limited to 5 per cent, in order to stop this pernicious inflation which constantly sops the value of our currency. There should be limits to this devastating usury which, since the seventeenth century has spread throughout the whole world. A simple arithmetical calculation shows that if any new currency must return to the issuer with interest, there will come a day when all free economies will have been devoured by this usury and when the issuers of new credit—in this instance the commercial banks—will be the only holders and the absolute masters of money.

In days gone by, currency and credit were the sole prerogative of the king. The state reigned supreme. The mandate of the federal state is to provide for the welfare of every Canadian citizen. There cannot be two sovereigns at variance with one another: one reigning by natural right, stemming from the God-given power, and whose duty is to provide for the well-being of his subjects;—the other one reigning solely to exploit the Canadian citizens, to his own advantage, and actuated by the passion of his own interests.

Today, in Canada, there is only one real sovereign; it is neither the parliament nor the government, but the commercial banks, entitled every year to issue more than a billion dollars of new credit, whereas these regalities should be the exclusive right of the federal government, through the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, if, within the next ten years the Christian democracies do not recover control over their monetary system, and if the latter remains based on interest and profit, we will be subdued by the communist powers. This is the serious warning I am giving to the hon. members of this house.

We, in this house, are mostly Christian parliamentarians and we ought to give the world an example of an administration based on justice and equity in which the economic mechanisms operate harmoniously for the well-being of every Canadian.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind the house that next September the Canadian section of the Interparliamentary Association will welcome in this Parliament building the delegates of 75 foreign countries who will be coming here to discuss problems of mutual interest. In our age of sociometry, it is easy to understand the interdependence of peoples and the significance of such a world conference.

A very elaborate program has been prepared to welcome those distinguished visitors. It will be a meeting of nations, prior to the marvellous gathering on the Land of Men, the 1967 World Fair in Montreal.

The Interparliamentary Union was formed in 1889 and it is the oldest and most important group of its kind. Since its inception, the two official languages of the Union have been French and English. This is worthy of note, for Canada may be the only country in the world to have both French and English as official languages. By that time, our federal services and indeed our civil servants should faithfully reflect the Canadian constitution. Special efforts and firm measures are essential to the correcting of those deficiencies which we observe practically every day at the various levels of our parliamentary system. I think my English speaking friends would also be fed up, and rightly so, if they came up daily against unilingual French speaking civil servants.

Therefore, we see what leading part our country will be able to play before those honoured guests who will come here to get ideas and means to improve the lot of their own fellow countrymen. That is why, Mr. Speaker, this parliament has such a heavy responsibility during the coming months and until 1967 for building an economic and social structure that will be on a par with men of ability and will arouse the admiration of the world.

[Text]

Mr. B. S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am particularly pleased to have the opportunity of participating in this debate for two or three reasons. First of all, it provides me with an opportunity to extend my warm congratulations to the hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) and the hon. Member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien) for their very excellent Addresses in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Then, because I represent one of the very rapidly growing areas in Canada, I thought that probably the 125,000 people who live in my riding might expect me to rise in my place and express some general approval of the very challenging and excellent Speech from the Throne which was caused to be laid before us by His Excellency the Governor General. Also, in these days when so much has been said about Government policies, I thought that probably the people of my riding would expect me to rise and extend general commendation to the Government for some of the policies that have resulted in improved conditions in the County of Peel.

The level from which we now view the needs of the Canadian people is very different from the sodden flats into which we dug our heels in 1963. The climb has not been an easy one because there have been those who would tend to obstruct and confuse the measures that were presented by the Government. Even today there are those who would discredit the achievements, not only of the Government but of the Canadian people in opening up new frontiers. My only claim on behalf of the Government is that a new confidence, a new purpose and a new determination, have been established in the minds of our people which have made our recent achievements possible.

The hon. Member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) speaking in the House very recently made reference to the 60 days of decision. I do not back up from the reference made to the 60 days of decision. I do not believe there ever was a time in Canadian history when more decisions were needed than when this Government took office in 1963. The decisions are still being taken, and they are wise decisions. Those decisions are paying off for the Canadian people. If we had not taken these decisions in 1963, we would not have the increase in our gross national product of approximately 8 per cent in 1964. If we had talked about transferring trade from the United States to the United Kingdom in 1963, we would not have the trade expansion that took place in 1964. We would not have had a total export increase of 19 per cent, such as took place last year.

If the Government, and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer), had sat around and thought about the integration of the armed services and the defence program, today we would not have an integrated system that is the envy of the world. The Government did not just rest on its oars in the mistaken idea that Canada was not a manufacturing country. If we had, we would not have a Minister and a Department of Industry which is giving such leadership to the industrial community. We would not have an over-all increase in our manufactured goods of some 8 per cent, and in our export commodities of some 18 per cent. If our Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) had been sensitive to opposition, obstruction and criticism, we would not have the Canada Pension Plan. If the Government had been content with 7 per cent of our people unemployed, we would not have been able to provide 198,000 new jobs last year. If the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) had been content to say to the producers, if you do not cut down we will cut off your supports, or if he had been satisfied with a decline in essential services that are available to farmers, as was the policy of the former administration—and we all recall the way the former administration undertook to cancel or cut down some of the essential services to farmers in order to have $250,000—

Mr. Hales: May I ask a question of the hon. Gentleman?

Mr. Beer: —and if we had not had a Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé) who was concerned about rural development, we would not now have the concern that is expressed by the Government for the revitalization of the character of the rural communities.

Mr. Hales: I wonder if the hon. Member for Peel, when he was speaking about decisions and his Department of Agriculture, would consider the removal of the turkey quota a good decision?

Mr. Beer: There will be other opportunities when time is less urgent than it is today to deal with this important question.

Mr. Mandziuk: You have no reply.

Mr. Beer: I want to deal, for a minute—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please, the Parliamentary Secretary has the floor.

Mr. Skoreyko: I should like to ask a question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the Parliamentary Secretary wants to allow a question at this time, I should like to remind him that all these questions are on his own time.

Mr. Skoreyko: It is a very important question.

Mr. Beer: I have a great deal of information to present to the House and I know I am going to be crowded for time. If the House wishes to grant special time after for a question period, I will be happy to entertain all the questions hon. Members opposite can offer.

Mr. Skoreyko: Just one short one?

Mr. Beer: Agriculture has undergone a very considerable technological change in the last ten years. We have moved into mechanized farming. This has had a very serious effect on agriculture as it is practised in Canada, because there have been areas which lent themselves to the use of mechanized equipment to a greater extent than some other areas of Canada. These areas were blessed with a tremendous production advantage. At the same time, there were areas in Canada which, because of their lack of adaptability to equipment and machinery, were placed at a tremendous production disadvantage. This brought about a great disparity in the income position of farmers in Canada.

Mr. Mandziuk: What about vertical integration?

Mr. Beer: There is no doubt that vertical integration may have played some part in this particular problem that exists. Farmers are not now content to have a declining share of the consumer's dollar. This is one of the problems that has confronted agriculture in recent years. Farmers wish to participate in the affluent society which many of us enjoy to a greater extent than they have in the past.

What are some of the benchmarks that prevailed when this Government took office? Earlier I mentioned the decline or reduction in essential services to farmers. We all, of course, remember the premium on the production of quality hogs which was placed on an on-again-off-again-gone-again-Flanagan basis. Then, I mentioned earlier that farmers were simply told to cut down on their production or the supports would be cut off. No attempt was made to curtail or look after the mounting surplus of butter, which by the time this Government took office amounted to 239 million pounds.

This Government believes that the problems confronting agriculture fall into three or four main categories. We believe, first of all, that the use of money has become increasingly important to many of our Canadian farmers. We think that the efficient use of land and machinery is extremely important and that management is one of the key figures in a successful farm operation. Management, which may be regarded as purely or partially educational, would immediately fall into the jurisdiction of the Provinces, because they do look after educational matters. However, the other matter of making money available to establish a viable economic unit is a Federal responsibility, and this has been undertaken. I need only mention two or three of the measures which have been enacted or placed on the statute books by this Government in order to make more money available to farmers.

We recall, of course, that during the last session amendments were introduced to the Farm Credit Corporation Act which doubled or practically doubled the amount of money that was available to farmers, up to $55,000 on a supervised loan. This made available the kind of money farmers needed in order to integrate their operation and make it an economic unit. I know that Members opposite and on this side of the House as well will be interested in knowing the extent to which this measure has been beneficial to farmers, and the extent to which it has been used. At the moment, we have 47,427 loans to farmers in Canada for a total amount of $434,556,153.

Possibly of particular interest is one comparison I would like to present, namely the increase in the number of loans this year as compared with last year, and I shall give this by provinces. In British Columbia last year there were 112 loans, and this year there are 200. In Alberta last year there were 614, and this year there are 982; in Saskatchewan 486 last year, and 799 this year; in Manitoba 125 last year, 220 this year; in Ontario 397 last year, 570 this year; in Quebec 324 last year, 379 this year, and in the Atlantic area 24 last year as compared with 48 this year, a total increase from 2,082 to 3,198. This is an increase of 53 per cent over last year in the use of the money made available.

It goes to indicate that the Government was right in arriving at the decision that making more money available to farmers would enable them to increase the size of their units and make them more economical.

Another comparison which may be of interest to hon. Members is the number of loans approved this year as compared with last year. In 1963-64 there were 8,689 loans approved, while this year 10,142 were approved, a 17 per cent increase; but the more interesting fact is that the size of loans increased by 43 per cent, thus showing that the amendment to the Act, by which more money was made available to farmers, was a step in the right direction.

In addition, the Government amended the Farm Improvement Loans Act, raising the ceiling on loans from $7,500 to $15,000. Farmers can now obtain this amount of loan from their banks, and it will be backed by the country.

I mentioned earlier that the use of machinery was one of the major costs to farmers, and the Government felt something should be done in this particular area. During the last session of Parliament a measure was introduced, known as the Farm Machinery Syndicates Credit Act, and I know the House will be interested in a brief report on the extent to which that act is meeting the needs of farmers. During the debate on supplementary estimates a number of questions were asked, and I think this report may answer some of these questions.

It indicates that the number of loans made available to syndicates has been one in B.C., 10 in Alberta, seven in Saskatchewan, one in Manitoba, two in Ontario and one in Quebec. In other words 81 members are participating in 22 syndicates and the total amount of loans involved is $215,404. I believe the House will warmly receive the news that this measure has met with general acceptance across the country and is filling a great need. One application has been received for the maximum amount of $100,000. This syndicate is in Alberta where a number of potato farmers have proposed joining together to buy washing and grading equipment for potatoes in the hope that they may do a better job of marketing the product on their farms.

As has often been indicated by the Minister, another thing which affects farmers materially is the danger of crop loss, and in order to meet this contingency the Government brought in a measure to amend the Crop Insurance Act, whereby the Government of Canada can underwrite Provincial schemes that may be introduced. All these measures have helped meet the needs of the farming community by way of providing capital and protecting farmers against some of their losses.

As the House well knows, improvements which affect farmers are introduced by legislation, some of which I have indicated, by Order in Council, or by administrative means. I have with me a list of all the Orders in Council affecting agriculture, passed by the Government since it took office in 1963, and I would ask the indulgence of the House to have this list included in my speech in Hansard because I believe the information contained in it would be helpful to hon. Members on all sides of the House.

Mr. Skoreyko: Read it.

Mr. Beer: There are 31 items. I would be happy to read them but it would seem to be an unwise use of the time of the House.

Mr. Skoreyko: We don't want it on Hansard.

Mr. Beer: Thank you. I will be happy to read the administrative changes which have taken place in the last year or so.

In April, 1964 we entered into a joint program with the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec for the eradication of barberry in order to control cereal rust which has been causing considerable losses to grain crops, particularly oats.

We are establishing a research laboratory in association with Laval University in Quebec, and a horticultural research station at St. Jean, Quebec. We are building a new research laboratory at Harrow to serve better the needs of farmers in Southwestern Ontario.

We are establishing a maximum security quarantine station at Grosse Ile, Quebec, for the importation of European livestock which holds promise of improving the efficiency of Canadian livestock production.

We are constructing a vehicle washing station at Port aux Basques, Newfoundland, to guard against the possibility of potato wart disease, which could cause serious damage to potato crops, being introduced into the mainland. This has been requested for some time by the Atlantic Provinces.

We have eliminated waiting lists for R.O.P. dairy cattle inspection by providing adequate staff to take care of all applications.

We have provided assistance to the Provinces of British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Ontario, Manitoba and Quebec in the movement of fodder to drought areas.

We have sponsored and are contributing financially to new livestock classes at agricultural fairs to stress economic qualities and to improve the efficiency of livestock production.

We have announced a new dairy policy to improve the economic position of dairy farmers, and have given notice of our intention to introduce legislation for the establishment of a Canadian Dairy Commission.

We have made significant improvements in the operations of feed grain assistance, including provision for the payment of winter storage charges on western feed grains in eastern elevators.

We have started ten new community pastures in the West, costing $1.5 million, and nine new large water construction projects at a cost of $1.7 million.

We have provided improved price support for sugar beets at a national average level of $14.35 per ton, and in total the Government has passed 31 Orders in Council, which I mentioned a moment ago.

We have provided an additional $2 million to the World Food Program, and entered into an arrangement with the Program to supply dried eggs. The purchase of eggs for this purpose had a significant effect in strengthening the price of eggs.

We have disposed of the huge butter surplus which had accumulated during the years 1958 to 1962.

We are doubling the capacity of the Canadian Government elevator at Prince Rupert.

These are some of the achievements of the Government in general, and with relation to agriculture in particular. There are certain areas where none of these programs actually apply, and in these areas of low productivity the Government proposes to extend the use of ARDA so that land may be used to better advantage, so that new life may be stimulated or injected into local communities and thus provide better standards of living in those areas.

Mr. Speaker, I notice my time has just expired, and I am grateful for the kind attention of the House.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak in the debate on the Speech from the Throne. The last time I spoke in a similar debate was back in 1958, and I must admit that this was indeed a long time ago. At the outset of my remarks I want to congratulate the hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) and the hon. Member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien) on the manner in which they discharged their responsibilities to this House as Mover and Seconder of the Speech from the Throne. As young Members, I congratulate them, and I am sure their constituents will be proud of the responsibility they have shown.

Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks I wish to say that rather than being critical for the sake of being critical, I want to offer some constructive criticism to which I hope the Government will pay some attention and will heed. I cannot help, of course, but refer for a moment to the speech made by the hon. Member for Peel (Mr. Beer). It has been a long time since I have listened to a dissertation so politically biased as the one completed just a moment ago. I dare say that even his constituents know that the hon. Member for Peel is not capable of writing such a document, and I might ask him where he got his information from.

Mr. Beer: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I want the hon. Member to know that I was using all my own material, except the figures which I quoted. I composed my own address.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member who has the floor knows that it is against the rules or procedure of this House to suggest that another hon. Member did not originate the speech he made in the House.

Mr. Skoreyko: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I did not mean to transgress any rule; I was just making an observation. The reason I made it, of course, was that when the hon. Member for Wellington South (Mr. Hales) rose and asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture, who should be able to come up with the answers immediately, "Does the hon. Member believe that it was a good idea to remove the quota on turkeys?", he said, "There will be another opportunity to answer these questions". This is what we have heard since this Government took office: There will be an opportunity at a later date.

I became involved in a debate last Friday over the very same thing. The hon. Member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) stood on his feet and said that we should not be talking about the estimates of the Department of Labour, when we were in fact dealing with that very Department at the time, and the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen) said there would be ample opportunity subsequently to answer these questions. Then I asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture whether he thought that the legislation which removed the capital grants from fairs was good legislation, and whether he thought the 11 per cent sales tax was good legislation. I believe that if he wanted to be honest with the House he would rise in his place and say, "No, it was not good legislation; but I was not responsible for it".

This afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I want to deal with the many items in the Speech from the Throne, and I hope to review later the proposed legislation item by item, if time permits. But I want to offer something constructive to the Government. I suppose that because I have a number of items with which I wish to deal this afternoon, the first thing I should start with is the question of amnesty in so far as the Chinese in Canada are concerned. I have before me a clipping from the Montreal Gazette which states, in part, that when the former Minister of Citizenship and Immigration the hon. Member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Tremblay) was asked whether the amnesty covered all the cases in which the Chinese might be involved, he said that illegal passport cases were not covered, and being smuggled into the country was not covered.

I agree that in a good many cases people who were smuggled into Canada or entered this country illegally should not be covered by the amnesty; but I think it is entirely wrong to search out Chinese who have lived in Canada for eight or ten years after entering this country on an illegal passport. In many cases these people who entered Canada were not even aware of the seriousness of this infraction of the law. However, these people have lived in this country for eight or ten years, we are now searching them out and they are still under the impression that they will be prosecuted. I suggest to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Nicholson) that the proper action for him to take would be to search out those culprits who issued or were responsible for the issuance of the fake passports in the first instance. The Minister should immediately issue a press release clarifying the Government's position in respect of this matter and let those people—there are undoubtedly hundreds of them—still remaining in Canada, who are afraid of the consequences, come forward and make a declaration so that they may become honest, law-abiding citizens of Canada.

I have here a clipping from the Calgary Albertan of September, 1964, which is very interesting. This was written shortly after the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration advised the House that the deadline, in so far as he was concerned, for amnesty would be September 1. I say it is a fortunate thing for those Chinese who have since sworn declarations as to their true identity that the House of Commons was in session at that time, otherwise the amnesty may have been cancelled.

Mr. Speaker, I say that there are inadequacies within this amnesty program of ours. For instance, as I pointed out a moment ago, the people who came into the country on illegal passports are not covered by it. The article in the Calgary Albertan says:

> L. C. Hawkins, regional immigration director, says about 1,100 illegal immigrants have come forward to claim amnesty since the program was started.
> He estimates another 2,000 remain in hiding. Some 500 are the forged-passport cases.
> Ingrown fear of police action, prosecution and deportation keeps some from coming forward, he believes.
> "This, coupled with the fact that the amnestry does not cover the illegal passport cases, is a real problem", he said.

• (4:00 p.m.)

I have heard the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration in recent days—as a matter of fact, today—make it clear to the House, or at least I understood it to be a clear statement, that the Chinese people in the country who have not as yet made a declaration have nothing to fear, excepting those persons who could be charged with smuggling or offences in connection with narcotics. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that in most cases the Chinese who are in this country today by reason of having entered on illegal passports do not realize the seriousness of the offence. The Minister should make a statement forthwith to the press which would enable these people to come forward and clear their names. In a statement which appeared in the Edmonton Journal of August 14, released under an Ottawa dateline, the former Minister of Immigration is reported to have said:

> Henceforth from September 1, 1964, the R.C.M.P. and immigration officers are being instructed to apply the law to Chinese in exactly the same way as to other residents of Canada.

He also said—and this puzzles me somewhat—that he was having some difficulty about recent cases where people had been smuggled into Canada. I say there should be no problem at all in this respect. As I understand it, the amnesty covered those Chinese who entered this country prior to the amnesty program. Anyone who entered this country after that time was fully aware of the law and of the consequences of breaking the law. As I say, I hope the Minister will consider a press release defining clearly, once and for all, the limitations and the extent of the amnesty program.

I notice with interest that the Speech from the Throne contains another promise that the Immigration Act and the Citizenship Act will be revised. I wonder when these revisions will take place. I want to quote from page 24 of the report or memorandum submitted to the Government on March 10, 1965 by the Canadian Labour Congress. Maybe I do not agree with everything the Canadian Labour Congress enunciates but I certainly do in this case. They say:

> We have consistently criticized the Immigration Act and the administrative procedures under it. We have done so for many years and find a growing number in Canada who share our concern over the legislation and the way in which it is administered. As we have said before, we consider the Immigration Act clearly discriminatory in tone in so far as the selection of immigrants is concerned. Past practice has made this all too clear. The greatest preference has been given to immigrants from the countries of Northwestern Europe. Different criteria seem to be employed with regard to prospective immigrants from other parts of Europe and elsewhere. Although the regulations have been amended in a way which would seem to mitigate the effect of the provisions of the Act, we are not altogether satisfied that this is so. It is still possible for immigration officers to select immigrants not on the basis of the contribution they can make to the life of the country, but on the basis of their pigmentation or some such reason.

I agree wholeheartedly with the recommendations which are contained further on in this memorandum. Though I will not take the time of the house by putting them all on record I advise the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to peruse this particular document carefully.

It may be suggested that the Canadian Labour Congress has not made a thorough study of the Immigration Act and does not therefore fully understand the subject with which it is dealing. For my part I have made an extensive study of the act and of the regulations since I arrived here in 1958. The former Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Mrs. Ellen Fairclough, who is unfortunately no longer a Member of this House, did somewhat broaden the regulations affecting admission to Canada. Notwithstanding these efforts, discrimination has not been completely eliminated from the regulations. Somehow, in some way, it persists. Although the old section 20 of the Act, with its paragraphs (a), (b), (c) and (d), are supposedly no longer in existence, it is still being applied by immigration officials. I thought the new regulations of January 19, 1962 constituted a wonderful improvement. Part I dealt with admissions and part II with the jurisdiction of the appeal board. The hon. Lady said at that time:

> The most important provision of the new regulations is section 31 which is in fact the core of Canada's immigration policy. The new regulation 31, replacing section 20 of the former regulations, lays primary stress on education, training and skills as the main condition of admissibility, regardless of the country of origin of the applicant.

I have just said, and I say it again, that although section 20 is no longer in existence it is still being applied.

One of the things I do not understand about the Immigration Act is why I can sponsor relatives, no matter what their qualifications may be, from countries such as Great Britain and the United States while I cannot sponsor them from countries in Asia and certain parts of Europe. I realize there are difficulties surrounding migration facilities in Europe. On the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration I asked the Minister whether he would consider staffing our embassies, in countries which do not allow us immigration facilities, with competent people from the Department of Immigration who could assist our embassy staffs in processing applications approval of which would unify families in Canada. I have not yet had any response to this suggestion but I hope the Minister has it under consideration and that it will be mentioned in the white paper which the hon. Gentleman said he will be introducing before long.

The requirements under section 31 are simply these, as I understand them: first, an immigrant has either a profession or a trade; second, he has either sufficient financial capital to establish himself in Canada or he has relatives in Canada willing to guarantee his maintenance. In so far as I am concerned those are the two things which can be taken to be the criteria of acceptance and admission into Canada. Although these criteria apply to many other countries, they do not apply to several countries, and I take exception to the continued use of this old section 20. I should like to know why the Immigration Department has the right to deny individuals of Asiatic origin or with skins of different colour the right to apply for and obtain permission to bring relatives to Canada under the existing regulations.

I hope the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Nicholson) will change his attitude and do some of the things we have asked him to do in order that this situation can be changed. I suggest that he should look at these regulations in a broad sense and realize the many hardships which are being imposed on people of many ethnic origins in Canada. These people originally were quite happy with the immigration laws as they exist, but many have found after visiting immigration offices in different towns and cities that certain of their relatives cannot qualify for entry into Canada.

I should like to ask one question for the purposes of clarification, Mr. Speaker; but before doing so, in order to give a clear picture of the situation to which I refer, I should like to quote from page 12324 of Hansard where the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Badanai) quoted from a statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) at a press conference on December 31 of last year. This quotation reads as follows:

> I have asked the minister to prepare a white paper on immigration policy, immigration administration and immigration procedures, telling what has been done and what is in process, and to have that available if at all possible—and it is possible, I think—by the beginning of the next session of Parliament.

This is that next session of Parliament referred to by the Prime Minister, and even if the white paper was tabled this afternoon, so far as I am concerned, it would not only be days overdue, but years overdue. I do not criticize only this administration in this regard, but all administrations for not having taken action to eliminate the discriminatory sections of the Immigration Act. I should like to know now when this white paper which was promised is to be brought forward.

I have dealt with these promised changes because of the many statements which have been made in the Press regarding this unfortunate state of affairs. I should like to quote the headline of an article which appeared in the Montreal Gazette on September 24, 1963, which is: "Favreau Promises Change in Chinese Immigration". I need not remind the House of the fact that there has not been any change made in respect of Chinese immigration.

I should like to quote also from an article which appeared in the June 25, 1964, edition of the Toronto Globe and Mail under the heading "Chinese Offer Tremblay Food for Thought". According to this article Mr. Tremblay said there would be a general overhaul of immigration policy. The article states:

> He hinted also at a coming general overhaul of immigration policy and announced that he will go on a tour of Canadian immigration offices in other countries, including Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Portugal and Greece.
> "I shall go on the journey at the recess of Parliament—if we have a recess," he told a reporter.

We did not have a recess so I assume he did not make that trip.

The article then states:

> Improvements in immigration procedures that were made as a result cut down the waiting period for sponsored relatives from nine months to three, Mr. Tremblay said.

I remember that not many years ago there was a list of some 250,000 people in Italy who wished admission to Canada. That was indeed a long list. Those individuals have conducted themselves in a manner that is acceptable to the Canadian way of life and we should do something that will assist in expediting the processing of these applications.

The Minister also dealt with changes in the Hong Kong immigration office. He suggested that they were going to expand the facilities there in order to take care of the backlog of applications from that area of China for entry to Canada. On January 18, 1965, only a short time ago, a headline appeared in the Montreal Gazette which read, "Canada Establishes Long Term Policy for Immigration". I suggest that all hon. Members should read the article under that headline. I read it and experienced some anticipation in respect of new policy on the part of the Department of Immigration. The article in part stated:

> The reorganization of the department also includes steps to:
> Make immigration posts abroad more effective.
> Improve the pay of immigration officers abroad.
> Give officers at home and abroad more responsibility to make decisions on their own initiative, a step to speed the handling of immigration applications.
> Improve the morale of Immigration Department employees by giving them the prestige accorded career diplomats.

I might say that this whole article dealt with the reorganization of the Immigration Department policy, and these are the changes which were announced. I suggest it is not enough to make changes of this kind while at the same time leaving the impression with the public that new immigration policy is being established. These four recommended changes relate only to internal matters and have nothing to do with the processing of immigration applications.

Mr. Dinsdale: It is straight propaganda.

Mr. Skoreyko: Someone suggested that this was straight propaganda, and I must say that I agree.

In concluding my remarks in respect of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration let me say that I hope the promised white paper will be produced soon and will contain revisions similar to those recommended.

At this time I want to make one or two comments regarding the work of the Bilingualism and Biculturalism Commission which has done nothing more than conduct uncertain studies across this great country of ours. I use the term "uncertain" because up to this time that Commission has confined its studies to how English and French speaking Canadians fit into the Canadian way of life.

• (4:20 p.m.)

No one seems to be particularly concerned about the other one third of the population of this country comprising the other ethnic groups. I am not going to dwell on the B and B Commission at any length, but I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that any massive concession by any government to any minority group in Canada would just be the beginning of many problems. I say this only because there are some one million Germans in this country, some 750,000 people of my national origin, some 450,000 to 500,000 Italians, and so on down the line. I do not think that you can build a united Canada by recognizing one or two races as the only races in this country. They must all be recognized as they have been in the past. I simply say that it will be very interesting to see the final report of this Commission, because I think it has done nothing more than to sow the seed of uncertainty in this country, which we could have very well done without.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I apologize for interrupting the hon. Member, but the time allowed to him has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my observations, I should like to congratulate very sincerely my colleagues from St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) and St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien) for the ability, the mastery and the dignity with which they have performed the important duty that was bestowed upon them. By means of carefully prepared speeches, they have proven that maturity and youthfulness are not inconsistent with one another nowadays, and those who trusted these two young Canadian citizens should be proud of having brought into the limelight of Canadian politics two of their best brains, who are typical of the vigorous defenders Canada needs so much in the troubled times it is going through.

In order to bring back to earth the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) who in a recent speech chastised the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche, displaying the Quadragesimo Anno encyclical letter of Pope Pius XI, I would like to remind him that since Rerum Novarum and that encyclical letter and Pius XI, there was another document entitled Mater et Magistra which was written by someone who is not behind times like the hon. member, but by a very dignified pope called John XXIII.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the hon. member?

Mr. Béchard: When I have completed my remarks.

Mr. Laprise: You may as well wait.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, since I have not sufficient time at my disposal to sum up Mater et Magistra, I would suggest that the hon. member read the chapter which deals with socialization.

It is comforting to find that no aspect of the social and economic life of this country has been neglected and that nobody seems to have been forgotten in the speech from the throne submitted to our examination.

The government's desire to keep on following the course it set itself is clearly reflected in this legislative program, which shows us to what extent the government is conscious of the needs and fondest aspirations of the Canadian people and how it can take into account, in its legislation, the problems facing us now.

Thus, we find the government quite intent on waging war on poverty, through programs and policies designed to provide every Canadian, no matter which area and province he comes from, with a decent income. I refer to grants to workers forced to move to new jobs, to the training of workers for industry, etc.

As regards administrative reforms, there are proposals to overhaul the Bankruptcy Act, the Bank Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Citizenship and Immigration Act.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the third phase of the program worked out only two years ago yesterday by the party to which I have the honour to belong and which was ratified by the Canadian people. Already, after only two years of administration—

Mr. Knowles: Yesterday.

Mr. Béchard: —in spite of the numerous difficulties peculiar to any minority government, in spite of the obstruction and sometimes the filibustering by a large section of the opposition, the Canadian people appreciate today the tremendous job accomplished under those circumstances by the government which has enacted through legislation more than half of its program.

One only has to read the comments of many newspapers of the last week end to find out.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote an editorial from the newspaper Le Droit of April 3, 1965. It is entitled "End of a session", under the signature of Marcel Gingras:

> In spite of filibustering which marked its proceedings, the session now coming to an end was much more fruitful than would seem at first glance. There is no intention to give a list here of the 95 pieces of legislation passed since February 18, 1964, but we cannot ignore some facts as important as the adoption of the flag, the adoption of a national pension plan, the enactment of the labour code, the agreement on the opting out formula concerning shared cost programs or the integration of the armed forces.

Mr. Speaker, representing as I do a district which has greatly suffered in the past from its remoteness from the great centres on which our governments focused all their attention—I might add that it also suffered from the indifference of our various administrations and the inertia of some of our representatives—I can only welcome the fine program outlined in the speech from the throne to improve the standard of living of underprivileged Canadians. The Gaspé area, I do not hesitate to say it here, really became economically active only when a dynamic and progressive government took office in Quebec in 1960. That government restored its true meaning to the autonomy behind which its predecessor had hidden for 16 long years, thus depriving the people of the province and those of the Gaspé area in particular, of major sources of capital which were indispensable to the economic recovery of those underprivileged and depressed areas and which the federal government was offering under various programs.

The numerous efforts of this federal government since 1963 to restore the economy of areas like mine, by enticing industries to settle there, have given a shot in the arm to the Canadian economy and some hope to the people. To mention only one, that of designated areas, I can say that this policy has been a determining factor of the establishment in New Richmond, in my riding, by the Bathurst Power and Paper Company, at a cost of almost $50 million, of a wood processing factory which will be in operation in August 1965. The construction itself, since last April, has been giving work to about 900 people. When it is in operation, this industry will provide steady and well paid jobs to almost 1,000 Gaspé people and to several Canadian experts, not to mention the many opportunities which the increase in the population of this town will bring to businessmen, farmers, workmen and professionals in my area.

At the same time the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), in co-operation with the said company, is also making, at a cost of almost $1 million, very important improvements in port facilities which will assist the shipping of the products of this new factory to the domestic and exportation markets. Without the strong measures initiated by this government, jointly with the equally strong efforts of the Quebec government and of the Bathurst Power and Paper Company, the latter would not have made such a decision and our area would still be waiting impatiently to take its place under the sun.

It is encouraging to see that the speech from the throne mentions the intention of the government to extend to other areas of the country this policy of special conditions to designated areas. To do that, he should alter the criteria on which this measure was based, criteria which I criticized in a constructive way at that time.

I believe that the data obtained from the unemployment insurance offices, though quite valuable for the government in the assessment of underdeveloped areas, do not do justice to those areas in our country where there is practically no industry. Though far from large centres, the Gaspé peninsula, for instance, and the county of Bonaventure especially, offer many facilities and opportunities which should attract industries: their proximity to the sea, inexpensive means of transportation and available manpower which will be soon skilled and ready to work. These factors, combined with an urgent need for industry and a high rate of unemployment, should be taken into consideration by the experts during the review of designated areas.

Canadian unity, which English speaking as well as French speaking extremists contribute, knowingly or unknowingly, to weaken, the first by their rigid and vexatious attitude, who persist in not recognizing the equality between the two founding races of our nation, in denying French Canadians the right to work in their mother tongue; the second by their unbending attitude, who see no possible solution and who refuse all dialogue, has never been the object of all the consideration it has received under the present administration. No prime minister and no political party in the country has ever been so dedicated to the cause of unity between our two peoples, as have been the present Prime Minister and the Liberal party.

Positive and efficient steps have been taken to that end and we are already noting a greater understanding of French Canadians by English Canadians. The Prime Minister and his government were criticized for setting up the Laurendeau-Dunton Commission, but I feel that this action taken by the government, due to the initiative of the Prime Minister, will prove its efficiency and its validity to those prophets of doom. I should like to quote the words spoken by Mr. Maurice Egan, an Ottawa alderman, last Monday night at a city council meeting, as reported in Le Droit of April 6:

> All men are prejudiced in some way and we are no exception to this rule. The matter now under consideration is very serious. As a matter of fact, our country is going through the most serious crisis in its history.
> I do not believe that the commission divided our country. This is the first time that we, English Canadians, are forced to engage in soul searching. And we are already beginning to understand.

And later on, Mr. Egan goes on to say:

> French Canadians have rights which were granted to them by the constitution. Let the commission do its work. I am proud to be a member of this council and I would not like it to be divided on such an important issue. The commission is seeking solutions to a major problem. We, English speaking Canadians, hold that solution. Let us not forget it.

Being very anxious to help unite our two main peoples, the present government had parliament adopt a distinctive national flag, a symbol that was asked for so long and under which all Canadians can rally proudly and proclaim themselves, from sea to sea, citizens of a sovereign country, ready to struggle side by side on occasion and to fraternize as brothers really united in the pursuit of the same ideal: greatness, prosperity and unity of our dear country. This symbol of unity will be completed during this session when the house adopts a national anthem, a rallying song for a people ready to do anything to defend and protect its territory. One has to be the present Leader of the Official Opposition to repeat in this house and outside that no government has ever done as much as the present one to divide our country, while he is himself recognized throughout the country as the great common divisor, not only of the Canadian nation, but also of his own party. Another most important legislation, which will free us from this humiliating necessity of appealing to the parliament of Westminster to amend our own constitution is the adoption of the formula presently known under the name of Fulton-Favreau formula, which was worked out by representatives of all the provinces, last fall, after over 30 years of serious and continuous discussions.

What is important for us, as Canadians, is the right to amend our constitution in Canada. Once we have that right, it will be easier then, to bring about the necessary and recommended amendments and adjustments, through consultation and negotiation at the different levels of government in our country.

When I hear the leader of the Ralliement Créditistes, and the deputy leader who has an eye on his leader's job state on television that they do not want this dusty document back in our country, I wonder whether they fully realize that it is not a matter of repatriation of a document but rather the right for us, Canadians, to amend our constitution which they call dusty. Besides it is not by doing tricks, or dancing or having fun at the expense of the people that you can talk seriously of a matter of such a great importance for us.

I should like also to know what position is the N.D.P. going to take at the national level, in the fight it has waged against the Fulton-Favreau formula. Indeed, the national leader stated in the house that this formula is a strait-jacket because it weakens the powers of the central government, which that party wants centralist to the utmost, and again, before a small group of Quebec militants and his lieutenant, Mr. Cliche, he stated that he objects to this strait-jacket because it weakens the powers of the provinces, especially of the province of Quebec. It is difficult to reconcile these two completely opposite attitudes. How can we expect more sincerity when we hear the national leader, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas), state, in his contribution to this debate, on April 6, 1965, that consultations with the provinces about this measure can solve nothing?

What can the country and especially the province of Quebec expect from such a party which has been a stark opponent of consultation from the start?

Mr. Speaker, I will no doubt be permitted during the few minutes at my disposal to deal with some of the problems facing the Gaspe peninsula and more particularly the constituency of Bonaventure which I have the honour to represent in this house. In my riding, the main sources of revenue are the farming, the forest, the fishing and the tourist industries. At the present time, a special study and a complete inventory of all the resources of our region are being made by the Eastern Development Bureau under ARDA.

A team of researchers, whose salaries are paid on a shared basis by both federal and Quebec governments, are doing an excellent job in trying to find a solution to the chronic problems which this pilot area is facing in every field.

I am happy to find that the people of my riding have shown such an interest in these studies; and they are to be commended for it. All parishes have a very active local committee which have already submitted some very good information to the various groups of the area committee. Interesting reports have been prepared by most of these study groups.

The people and myself entertain great hopes from this work begun nearly three years ago.

We all realize that agriculture, and especially that of eastern Canada, is in a sad state of affairs and needs a shot in the arm, if it is to continue to provide the farmers with a decent living. The uneasiness comes first of all from the very high cost of farming equipment required for modern and efficient farming; then from the high cost of farm labour and the lack of organized markets and storage which results in the fact that the farmers' income is clearly inadequate to meet their obligations.

Many of our farms are farms in name only. It is no longer possible to live on a 50 acre farm. But, to expand, the farmer must have the money required.

True, the government has taken certain steps to make it easier for farmers to get loans, but that is not enough. A real farm policy is needed, and I am glad to find that, in co-operation with the provinces, such a policy is being developed. It would be easy to deal temporarily with the situation by continuing the stopgap policies that have been used for so long. That is why, even if farmers are getting impatient—and justifiably so—I think it is to their own advantage and that of agriculture in general that a real and responsible farm policy be established in Canada. I am convinced that the work now being done by ARDA will bring the solution that the farm people have been awaiting for so long.

In this case again, many will have to give up their old habits and ways but the expected result for the future of our agriculture is worth while.

When we realize that 75 per cent of our Quebec farmers are responsible in fact for 25 per cent of the total production, when 25 per cent of the rural labour force is, alone, responsible for 75 per cent of the total production, we may wonder whether our eastern agriculture, in Quebec in particular, plays its intended role in our economy.

Our forest industry which is the most important industry in my riding is, I believe, faring quite well. Some producers might play a more efficient part if they could take advantage of access roads to the forest which are a basic requirement for a rational and economic operation.

Incentives will have to be found if we want not only to preserve but to develop the tourist industry, one of the main sources of income in the Gaspé area. Nothing is more marvellous and more refreshing for Canadian and foreign tourists than to make what is called the tour of the Gaspé peninsula. That is why that magnificent district should be made more readily accessible to tourists.

I am thinking, for instance, of the establishment of a regular air route to Gaspé. Besides tourists, the planes could transport the mail so that news would not be outdated when it reaches us. As I pointed out very often here to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), that would require the improvement of existing private landing strips by the government. I will confine myself to my riding of Bonaventure and mention those of Carleton and Bonaventure. Apart from the new standards announced recently and the substantial increase of federal aid toward the establishment of small airports, the burden which our small municipalities and public bodies will still have to bear is too heavy, and they cannot afford it. This is a vital, very important and urgent matter for my riding, the Gaspé peninsula and the county of Bonaventure.

Therefore, I ask that the government pay all costs of establishing and administering airports in that district of the Gaspé peninsula. In my opinion, only the government can afford such expenditures. That would be an appropriate way of assisting the development of isolated and economically underprivileged districts which, furthermore, are totally deprived of air transport.

In view of the time at my disposal, I must omit a number of important points, but I should like, however, to stress the importance of developing the seaport of Gascon. This parish has the greatest number of fishermen in the county and little or no other sources of income. Therefore, I hope that the special conditions granted to designated areas will apply in this case and enable those fine people to establish a fish processing plant so as to process locally and to their profit the fish they wrest at the cost of hard work from the sea.

Our municipalities and seaside residents suffer also from the policy of the Department of Public Works with regard to erosion damage caused to private properties by the sea. Private individuals and municipalities are financially unable to build those costly retaining walls which have become necessary. Such an emergency should prompt the government to revise its present vexatious policy.

Those are the few remarks I wanted to make in this debate, Mr. Speaker. The Speech from the Throne is for hon. members a program in which they could find something to keep them busy during the whole session, if they really want to work for our country's social and economic development. Some are afraid of it because of its length and the many bills it proposes, but if each of us forgets himself and thinks first and foremost about the people he represents, he will first tackle the job of amending our obsolete rules to expedite the passing of measures that the people of Canada are awaiting impatiently.

To conclude, I will say just a few words to remove any fear which can be found in the minds of our friends from the Social Credit party—

Mr. Chrétien: Of the Ralliement Créditiste.

Mr. Béchard: Yes, Social Credit. I should like to tell them the Liberal government that has been the originator of and has given all the social security measures the Canadian people are enjoying today will in due course increase family allowances. That is what they advocate in their subamendment.

[Text]

Mr. Fred F. Stenson (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of speaking on the Throne Speech and I would be remiss if, at the start, I did not congratulate the Mover and the Seconder of the Address in Reply on the fine job they did last Tuesday.

The Throne Speech did not make mention of any proposed attempt to increase our export trade and we in this Party are very concerned about our imbalance of trade with the United States. I believe we should examine the reasons why we are not securing more of the United States market, and in this connection I would like to put the figures for the last eight years on record.

In 1956, under the then Liberal government, our imbalance of trade with the United States was $1,167 million. This was reduced in 1957, the first year the Conservative government came into power, to $996 million. By 1958 we had reduced this another $400 million, to $564 million, or by $550 million since the last year of Liberal government. In 1959 it was further cut to $527 million and in 1962, the last year the Conservatives were in power, it was $544 million.

The projected figure for 1964 is close to $728 million, representing an increase of over $200 million during the short time since the Liberals returned to power, and present policies indicate they are driving for a figure of over $1 billion to be soon achieved in our trade imbalance with the United States.

Canada is losing ground in trade. The Canadian economic report has stated Canada's share of world trade is declining. The bulk of our exports is still resource material, although the big boom in world trade has been in manufactured goods. The lion's share of Canada's exports is still going to the United States and Britain, but everywhere Canada is losing ground to other countries and other exporters. These disquieting facts emerge from the Economic Council of Canada. Mr. Speaker, the Economic Council stated that the aim for better economic products is to win better access to foreign markets for Canadian manufactured products and highly-processed raw materials, instead of concentrating, as in the past, on tariff breaks for raw materials. Elsewhere in the report the Council noted that manufacturing will have to supply most of those 1,500,000 jobs needed in Canada between 1964 and 1970. They also pointed out that future Canadian prices and costs must be kept in line with any given exchange rate and with world prices and costs for goods entering into the international trade. What has the Liberal Government done about this?

The Council also said the private institutional psychological barriers to higher exports of manufactured goods must be reduced. Steps recommended in this direction are broader development within Canadian industry of modern and aggressive marketing techniques; adequate, competitive, export financing facilities; removal of arbitrary restraints, where they exist, on the competitive export capabilities of foreign-controlled firms; vigorous trade promotion for industrial goods. It is a known fact that world markets for manufactured goods are increasing, and we must share in these markets if we are to maintain existing standards of living and to provide employment that will be needed in future years. Every effort should be directed to the expansion of secondary manufacturing.

I have asked questions regarding the 11 per cent sales tax of the Finance Minister (Mr. Gordon), the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) and in every case the Ministers' replies are very vague, sometimes pointing out that exports are increasing or that economy is good; but they are afraid to face up to the issues. They will not admit that this tax is hurting our Canadian exports. These figures that I have given today show that the imbalance of trade with the U.S. is going to be over $700 million this year. While the Conservative Party when it was in power cut this drastically, this Liberal Government is letting it slip right back to where it was—over $1 billion in 1956. The point is that these increased costs on building materials, on processing machines, on industrial machinery, must be borne by the Canadian citizen. The loss of export business, the loss of Canadian jobs, the high cost of Canadian goods and higher operational costs mean high finished goods selling prices. High finished goods prices mean limited sales, and limited sales naturally impose limits on production not only for food processors but for all those industries serving this country.

This environment limits the Canadian labour force and the amount of money this force can pay to the Government in the form of income tax. Certainly the high cost of production curtails drastically the number of foreign markets. As a matter of fact, the primary reason a great percentage of our total exports have been on the increase is that we receive preferential treatment from our best customer, the Commonwealth. Collectively the United Kingdom and Commonwealth countries account for our exports being as healthy as they are. Canada has been warned about the imbalance of trade which they have with the United Kingdom. Harold Wilson has warned countries that they are going to be very firm regarding imports.

In the January issue of the Canadian Food magazine they had this to say: "Is the Canadian politician against us? Canadian and U.S. tariff comparisons are not fair. The 11 per cent sales tax legislates against competitive, domestic and export pricing". They also stated that a probe should be conducted on assistance by foreign Governments on export pricing. They pointed out that Canadian industry should be watching very carefully the negotiations that will be going on at GATT this year. This is where general agreements on trade policies will be set up for the future. The late President Kennedy recommended a cross-the-border cut on all present tariff structures.

I feel our Canadian export delegation at GATT should be very careful with these tariff reductions until this Government sees fit to reduce taxes that are hurting our export trade. We must also consider the standard of living in this country as compared to other countries that we will be asked to trade with; and we must in addition consider our climate conditions in Canada, which is a factor in our costs of production.

However, as if these natural factors were not enough to retard the efficiency of Canada's food processors in both domestic and foreign markets, the present Government has further compounded the problem through the additional burden of an 11 per cent tax on new building and machinery. What this artificial burden does to our building and equipping costs is quite staggering. Some examples cited in their brief are as follows: A food processing machine in the U.S. costs about $12,000; the same machine in Canada costs over $16,000. A labelling machine costing $59,000 in the U.S. costs the Canadian user $75,000. A case packer going for $11,730 in the U.S., in Canada calls for an investment of $15,000; and a case unloader going in the U.S. for $8,000 goes for $11,295 in Canada.

On everything the Canadian processor touches, from agricultural products through to packaging, from new machinery to building bricks, he is faced with much heavier costs than his U.S. counterpart. Yet he is expected to sell efficiently against his U.S. opposite in foreign markets, and also defend his domestic position—all in spite of the present obvious tariff imbalance.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to read from an article that appeared in the Peterborough Examiner regarding the Fisher Gauge Company. You have heard of this in the House before; it is the company that has gone to the United States because of the 11 per cent sales tax. This article says:

New York state governor Nelson Rockefeller is scheduled to tour the Watertown operations April 1.

The Fisher brothers, Chester and company president William, still seem somewhat awed by the rapid growth and potential of their operation.

"We are now working on developmental projects with several major U.S. manufacturers," Chester said, "and if our ideas are accepted it may mean substantial growth in the near future.

The potentialities are staggering."

But both men are disgusted and discouraged by the Dominion governments' attitude toward Canadian manufacturers.

William Fisher said the Dominion government gives special consideration to the raw materials industries (mining, pulp and paper) but is persecuting the manufacturers whose employment is much greater.

The climate for manufacturers is good in Europe, even better in the U.S. and Fisher expects business soon from Australia.

But Canadian government policies, Mr. Fisher stated, are driving manufacturers from this country.

"While our growth is most encouraging," William Fisher said, "it is certainly not nearly as rapid as woul dbe possible if the climate for industrial growth was more favorable."

The 11 per cent tax on production machinery led to the founding of the Fisher plant in Watertown last year and the tax is still a big headache for the company.

The complexity, the red tape, the import duties and the duplication of taxes between both senior governments has necessitated increased office staff and hours of work for senior company officials.

● (5:00 p.m.)

In New York State, Mr. Fisher explained there is no sales tax on industrial equipment.

Here, he said, there is tax on purchase and tax on harbour, both governed by a complex set of rules.

Chester Fisher said the growth of the Watertown operation was unexpected, partly because Americans would rather buy products made in their own country than those imported.

Sometimes we wonder whether this Government would like to see everything imported for our use.

We have heard from several hon. Members with regard to the car parts industry. I, too, feel I should bring to the attention of the government the fact that all across Canada people are becoming alarmed about the trade agreement which has been set up. I refer particularly to the car industry agreement. What effect will these agreements have on our car parts industry? The Minister has told the manufacturers that they must cut their costs. It is a known fact that this agreement was reached down on President Johnson's ranch. I think this is a very queer place to be signing an agreement which will affect many of our workers in Canada, especially those engaged directly in the car parts industry.

Canadian-owned industry will suffer. This is one industry we should be trying to promote and help at the present time. Other manufacturers affected are those who are trying to operate in this country with United States capital. Canadian industries have been told to cut their costs or they will be deprived of this business. This is what the minister told us in this House. How can these industries cut their costs when every time this Government turns around it raises taxes?

I would like to ask the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) why he has tied the Canadian Government to this free trade policy when the United States government has not given approval to the plan. I know the Minister is aware of the statements which have been made on this subject and the attacks which many of the auto parts makers have levelled at this Government with respect to its trade policy. A firm in Ingersoll has made a statement through its president that the plan signed on January 16 by the Prime Minister and President Johnson means his company will have to pull out of the auto parts manufacturing business if the agreement is not revised. A questionnaire mailed to members of the Automotive Parts Manufacturers Association of Canada indicated that most of them are unhappy about the provisions of this scheme. Evidence has been placed before the minister that manufacturers of auto parts are being denied the privilege of bidding on business transacted with the Chrysler plant in Windsor.

[Mr. Stenson.]

The Minister has stated in this House that manufacturers of car parts must become more efficient. However, as one auto parts manufacturer pointed out to him, if one is not given a chance to participate in this large United States market, how is one to become more efficient? Every car parts manufacturer in Canada is worried about this trade agreement the government has made. The manufacturers feel the Canadian Government must give serious attention to the situation in which this industry finds itself, and reconsider this trade agreement.

Under the automobile plan set up by this government, $50 million of Canadian taxes or money which would normally have gone to the Department of National Revenue will be given to the large car manufacturers as a subsidy. The Minister of Industry has not seen fit to make any attempt to help our car parts manufacturers, with the result that many will be forced out of business. That will be the result of this agreement, the result of this policy adopted by the Liberal Government. Instead of decentralizing large industries, hon. Gentlemen opposite seem to have a policy of centralizing them.

Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes at my disposal I have outlined the fears of industry and labour in connection with our export markets and I would urge this Government to seriously consider the removal of these detrimental roadblocks.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo South): I should like to pay my compliments to the hon. Member for Westmorland (Mrs. Rideout) on her lovely speech the other day. We have a community of interest, since we were elected at the same time and I was very pleased to hear her excellent speech. She graciously acknowledged that the image of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) played a leading role in her election. For my part I should like to point out that the image in Canada of the hon. Member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) played a leading role in mine.

We in the New Democratic Party take some satisfaction in the Speech from the Throne, in the sense that after so many years of prodding from this side of the house the Liberal party has finally taken the first hesitant steps toward a program of manpower utilization.

The manpower policies set out in the Speech from the Throne are not, as has been said, a challenge to the bold; rather, they are little more than a sop to the timid.

The Government could have opened a new chapter in Canadian history, it could have provided the solid confidence needed to usher in the scientific age of automation and cybernetics. Instead it has given us warmed-over old hat. The Government could have given this country confidence for the future by the use of a simple clearcut statement in the Speech from the Throne such as: This Government commits itself to the proposition that policies will be designated to guarantee full employment in Canada. There can be no real gain in the economy of the nation until a Government dedicates itself to this basic fundamental proposition.

The greatest concern of Canadians today is the fear of unemployment and the related problem of economic growth. Until this fear is allayed, economic development will lag. Until Government makes a commitment to full employment, the economy will fluctuate from uncertainty to uncertainty. The Government had this opportunity. They either did not recognize it, or they muffed it. Canadians had been waiting for a clarion call, but got instead sour notes.

There probably was a time when government could say that such an objective as full employment was impossible. They do not dare say that today, because we know better. We know, and there are people at the disposal of the nation who know, that these objectives are obtainable, if only the proper course of action is taken. It needs only a determination on the part of Government to make full employment a policy. The people of Canada would do the rest.

This commitment would not have cost the Government a cent; yet such a commitment to the people of Canada would have been of the greatest psychological effect. Confidence in the future would spur spending on both consumer and capital goods. We hoped for this clarion call but got the Speech from the Throne instead.

Much has been said and written about the progress made in Canada's manpower programs during the last few years, especially since the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act came into effect in 1961. At first observation, one is likely to be impressed by the number of new training schools built, the students accommodated, the placements of workers, etc. But we have been impressed, not because it has been done well, but because anything has been done at all.

There seem to be two schools of thought about the nature and causes of Canadian unemployment. Most economists tend to blame inadequate demand, particularly inadequate consumer demand. When purchasing power and willingness to buy is not keeping pace with our country's capacity to produce goods and services, cut-backs develop in production, workers are laid off. These further reduce demand. They are followed by more cut-backs and lay-offs, not only in the consumer goods industries but also in those producing heavy machinery and equipment. So came high unemployment and sluggish economic growth. The gap between our ability to produce goods and services and the ability of people to buy those goods and services is reflected in unemployment. The solutions proposed are designed to raise and maintain aggregate demand. They may range all the way from modest proposals regarding the interest rate, to a whole constellation of programs including large scale Government expenditure on social capital, lower taxes for middle and low income groups, and greatly expanded social security programs. These are solutions that we propose, but not the solutions that are seen in the Speech from the Throne.

The second school of thought senses that unemployment takes the form, not of an absolute gap between the supply of and demand for labour, but rather, a mismatching between the labour demanded and the labour supplied. They feel that there are enough jobs to go around but not enough Canadian workers possessing the necessary skills, or in the right places, to fill all these jobs. Thus, job vacancies on a large scale may co-exist with unemployment on a large scale. This mismatching or imbalance in the labour market is produced by structural changes in our economy, due mainly to rapid technological change and to new trade and tariff policies. Technological change, it is said, creates new jobs while destroying old ones, but the new jobs require a higher level of education and technical know-how. Both technological change and new tariff policies may cause the location of job opportunities to change by producing a rise in new industries and a decline in old ones, or by encouraging greater concentration of production facilities.

The New Democratic Party feels that the fundamental cause of Canadian unemployment has been due mainly to inadequate demand. In the past we have proposed a wide range of policies designed to build up purchasing power and to keep it growing in balance with productive capacity. We shall continue to advocate these measures in the future because, in spite of the improvement in economic conditions since 1961-62, there are still no long-run forces in our economy which can guarantee a continuing state of buoyant demand. Wheat sales to Iron Curtain countries, and devaluation of the dollar cannot be relied upon indefinitely. Deliberate Government policies of an expansionary nature—particularly large scale Government expenditures on social capital and reduced taxes on low income groups—are essential.

However, it also seems to us that over the next decade or two the mismatching kind of unemployment will grow in importance as technological change accelerates. To cope with the problem we will require an active, co-ordinated, manpower policy; it will lie with the monetary and fiscal authorities and will be a collective responsibility of Government. The objective of manpower policy will be to achieve balance in the labour market and maximum utilization of manpower resources under given conditions of demand.

There are many weaknesses in Canada's present manpower policy. Three of them have overriding importance. First, it lacks co-ordination. Second, there is no continuation of analysis of changes in the composition of demand for labour. Third, there is no satisfactory program to aid and encourage the geographic mobility of workers.

Mr. Speaker, no manpower policy can hope to succeed without co-ordination of the various programs of which it consists. Canada's manpower policy is scattered among a variety of agencies and branches, even among a variety of Government departments. The Economic Council of Canada has called attention to the fact, charging that "lack of co-ordination of manpower services is a basic weakness of labour market policy in Canada", and warns that, "to distribute such tasks to separate branches and agencies will only succeed in rendering impossible an integrated labour market program".

First, all manpower programs ought to be in one department—logically the Department of Labour. Those departments such as Citizenship and Immigration that now operate placement and other manpower services ought to transfer these to the Department of Labour. But even within the Department of Labour, co-ordination has been lacking. There are now at least five agencies in the Department engaged in manpower policies.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

Mr. Speaker, we do not suggest that these agencies should lose their identity but that their functions should be clearly defined and co-ordinated. With regard to the Manpower Consultative Service, the Economic Council has said:

> It is hard to escape the impression that it is a disembodied branch, and not at all integrated into an over-all labour market program.

Mr. Speaker, to achieve the necessary co-ordination and direction in manpower policy, one of the manpower agencies should build their activities around it. The logical agency for this role is the National Employment Service, because of its continuous contact through its 200 or more local offices with local labour markets. The Economic Council of Canada has made exactly this point. They have said:

> The N.E.S. must become the key operational agency for implementing manpower policies. It must also become the sole co-ordinating agency of all programs and policies related to the labour market.

In announcing the transfer of N.E.S. to the Department of Labour on March 31, the Minister made some encouraging remarks in this regard, stating that steps would be taken to ensure that the Employment Service would become the key operational agency in the manpower field.

The Minister has wandered hither and yon on manpower policy since he took office. One hopes that he is now on the right path, to stay. On January 26 in St. John's he said that he was delighted with the part of the Economic Council's report dealing with manpower policy. Then on March 8 in this House he unleashed an attack on the same section of the same report. Now he is back giving cautious endorsation to part of the manpower policy advocated by the Council. We can only hope that his confidence in the Council's recommendations will grow, and that the foundations for a solid manpower policy in Canada will be developed. I hope that the Liberal Government makes a better job of this than some of the agencies have done, where very often their efforts have seemed to be much like a Wagnerian death wish. If this Government wants a good manpower policy for Canada and wants the N.E.S. to be successful, it should be prepared to go out and hire the proper people at good salaries to make sure that this will occur in Canada.

The most incredible thing about Canada's so-called manpower policy is that it is operated in a vacuum of labour market information. There is no agency of Government that carries out a continuous and detailed analysis of changes in the composition of demand for labour. The N.E.S. is structurally equipped for this job on the basis of its local offices. But it has been starved for funds and professional staff. It has been unable to carry out this function. For example, there is provision for only one economist in the N.E.S. and even this position has gone vacant for five of the last eight years because the salary offered is too low to attract a professional person.

When Ministers talk glibly about changing the supply structure of the labour force in accordance with changes in labour demand, one gets the impression they know what types of labour are going to be needed. But they do not know. Nor is there any agency of Government which is carrying out the kind of continuous analysis and forecasting that would enable us to know.

How can we possibly discuss the courses to set out for our vocational schools if we have no notion of the kind of labour market that these students are likely to face? How can we devise training courses to upgrade the adult labour force or to train the unemployed if we do not have a clear picture of the kind of labour services currently demanded by industry, or likely to be demanded over the next several years? Technical training that takes place in a vacuum of labour market information is an exercise in futility. The same is true of programs designed to assist the moving of workers. It is a classic case of the blind leading the blind.

Training and mobility programs, to be effective, must be integrated into an active, national, labour market policy. An essential foundation for such a policy is a continuing analysis and forecasting of labour market demand.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, we feel that this could be carried out through the National Employment Service, possibly in conjunction with the Economics and Research Branch of the Department of Labour. Through its local offices throughout the country the N.E.S. could get advance information from most of the country's employers of expected changes in the level and composition of their demand for labour. This information should then be analysed by a professional staff. When certain trends are discovered the information should then be fed to the training schools so that they would be able to arrange their curricula in accordance with labour market trends. There should also be assessment as to the utility of questions. In other words, let us not ask pointless questions, as has so frequently been done in the past. Let businessmen who are going to be asked these questions know why the questions are needed, and let them understand the value and merit. There would be a lot less opposition to the answering of questions.

Structural change in our economy will require a high degree of geographic mobility of the labour force to adjust to the changing location of job opportunities. In a country of Canada's size financial considerations may pose a serious obstacle to a worker who considers a move. A comprehensive program to provide financial assistance for worker mobility is therefore urgently required. There is only a smidgen of such assistance in Canada at the present time. The programs that we have had in the past have fallen dismally short of what has been done for many years in most of the countries of Western and Northern Europe.

The New Democratic Party proposes that a national labour mobility program be launched based on the following principles:

(a) That it include not only assistance for the travelling expenses of the worker, but also a removal allowance to help him in the moving of his family and belongings and a settling in allowance to help him get established in the new region. It should also include a second residence allowance for workers attending a training school away from home.

(b) Assistance should not be based on a means test.

(c) It should be truly comprehensive in scope. In other words, its provisions should not be confined to disadvantaged workers in depressed areas but should be available to all workers in any part of the economy, including workers moving on a temporary basis.

(d) The assistance should be administered and co-ordinated by the National Employment Service which, through its local offices across the country and its constant contact with local labour markets, is the only agency in a position to carry out this function.

The New Democratic Party manpower policy embraces the following: A co-ordinated set of manpower services built around the National Employment Service and performing the functions of a labour market board. This co-ordinated group of services might be called the national manpower services. It also includes a nation-wide network of adult training centres under the direction of the national manpower services. Allowances would be paid to unemployed trainees on a wage related basis. The federal government would pay 100 per cent of the cost of allowances and would set the levels.

Our policies are designed to move Canada into the scientific age while still preserving and heightening the human values upon which our society is founded. For the first time in human history the prospect of plenty for all is possible, plenty not only for Canadians but for all humanity. Automation and cybernation can be that avenue, that road, that highway to plenty for all people. But to take advantage of the fruits of science the Government must commit itself to a manpower policy designed to ensure full employment. Otherwise fear will put roadblocks in the way of progress. Only if full employment is assured will the workingman lose his fear of change. It is easy enough to tell the workingman he has nothing to fear, but when he knows he has a wife and children to look after or if he is contemplating marriage or is concerned about his future, fear is a very important factor. If the Government is really concerned about those factors that go toward making for slowdowns and featherbedding in industry, then it will move to remove the fear of unemployment from the mind of the workingman. The workingman functions best when he is not afraid of the future, and a Government proposal to maintain full employment would remove that fear from his mind.

Only a worth-while manpower and investment program can ensure that the change into the scientific age will take place with ease among those in industry and will not meet with resistance from industry. People who have worked all their lives to build and maintain a business are justifiably afraid of the kind of changes that are taking place in society. I think they are quite willing to change and quite willing to meet the new challenges, but the opportunity to rationalize their business operations should be available to them through an increased amount of capital machinery so they can compete with others in the same market. If the Government accepts this challenge, this land can be free from fear and ready for the scientific age.

APPENDIX

STATEMENT BY JUSTICE MINISTER RESPECTING CORRECTIONAL REFORM

The Minister of Justice, the Honourable Guy Favreau, today announced to the House of Commons details of two measures foreseen in last Monday's Speech from the Throne. Both measures concern correctional reform and are part of the Government's plans to modernize Canada's entire treatment of offenders. Speaking in the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, the Minister outlined the Government's intentions on:

(1) The Special Committee on Corrections: a group of specialists to be named shortly in addition to the joint Parliamentary committee on corrections already proposed on the Order Paper.

(a) Terms of Reference: as now approved by Cabinet, the Terms of Reference of the Special Committee on Corrections are as follows: "To study the broad field of corrections, in its widest sense, from the initial investigation of an offence through to the final discharge of a prisoner from imprisonment or parole, including such steps and measures as arrest, summonsing, bail, representation in Court, conviction, probation, sentencing, training, medical and psychiatric attention, release, parole, pardon, post release supervision and guidance and rehabilitation; to recommend as conclusions are reached, what changes, if any, should be made in the law and practice relating to these matters in order better to assure the protection of the individual and, where possible, his rehabilitation, having in mind always adequate protection for the community; and to consider and recommend upon any matters necessarily ancillary to the foregoing and such related matters as may later be referred to the Committee; but excluding consideration of specific offences except where such consideration bears directly upon any of the above mentioned matters."

(2) The Free Vote on Capital Punishment: In order that Members of both Houses of Parliament may have at their disposal all the elements necessary to make a truly free and informed decision on the possible abolition of capital punishment, the Government will publish an Information Paper on this subject. The Paper will present objectively, without taking any determined position, all significant facts and arguments advanced by both defenders and opponents of abolition. It will contain notably a brief history of capital punishment, statistics showing its apparent value or irrelevance as a deterrent, and notes on the experience of other countries.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, I should also like to announce that subject to emergencies and barring accidents—and I am thinking of the vote which is to take place on Wednesday or Thursday—the Budget will be presented to the House on Monday evening, April 26.

ESTABLISHMENT OF RETIREMENT AGE FOR SENATORS

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the House by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the retirement, upon attaining the age of seventy five years, of any person appointed to the Senate after the coming into force of the said measure; to extend the provisions of the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act to such persons; to provide for the granting of an annuity to any person appointed to the Senate before the coming into force of the said measure who resigns his place in the Senate after having attained the age of seventy five years or having become afflicted with a permanent infirmity disabling him from the performance of his duties; and to provide further for the granting of an annuity to the widow of a person who was granted such an annuity upon resigning his place in the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

EXCISE TAX ACT

PROVISION FOR TAX REFUND ON DESIGNATED GOODS

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the House by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act, chapter 12 of the Statutes of 1963, to permit a refund of or deduction from tax or a payment of an amount equal to tax to be made in respect of designated goods described in section 10 of that act that are sold and delivered, or applied to a use resulting in the property in the goods passing, after December 31, 1964.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC SERVICE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SUPERANNUATION

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the House by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend certain Acts respecting the superannuation of persons employed in the Public Service, members of the Canadian Forces and members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, to give effect to the provisions set out in Finance Votes 18d, 21d and 23d of the Supplementary Estimates (D) tabled in the House of Commons on March 19, 1965.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE—COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF ROYAL COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS

On the order—Government notices of motions.

April 9—The Minister of Agriculture:

That the recommendations contained in the Report of the Prairie Farm Assistance Administration Commission of Inquiry, tabled on July 29, 1964, including the following two questions:

1. Whether the permanent staff of the P.F.A.A. should be brought under the Civil Service Commission, and

2. Whether there should be other changes in the operation of the P.F.A.A.,

be referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization for such recommendations as it deems advisable.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of Standing Order 21, this notice of motion is transferred to and ordered for consideration under Government Orders at the next sitting of the House.

PENITENTIARIES

CONSIDERATION BY JOINT COMMITTEE OF SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

On the order—Government notices of motions.

April 9—The Minister of Justice:

That a Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons be appointed to consider the state of penitentiaries under the control of the Government of Canada and the plans of the Government in relation thereto with powers to report from time to time its observations and opinions thereon; send for persons, papers and records; adjourn from place to place; sit during sittings of the House; and print from day to day such papers and evidence as may be ordered by the Committee, and that Standing Order 66 be suspended in relation thereto;

That 15 Members of the House of Commons, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the House as Members of the said Committee; and

That a Message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deem advisable, some of their Members to act on the proposed joint Committee.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of Standing Order 21, this notice of motion is transferred to and ordered for consideration under Government Orders at the next sitting of the House.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DAMAGE CAUSED BY PLANES BREAKING SOUND BARRIER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. I have not given him notice, but possibly he can check on the matter and give us an answer tomorrow.

Has the minister received complaints from western Nova Scotia with respect to damage being done by planes presumably based at an American base in Maine breaking the sound barrier, thereby doing considerable damage to residences and tremendous potential damage to all the mink farms in western Nova Scotia, where the mink pups will be born within the next two or three weeks and the mothers would prefer to eat them rather than have them die of an atomic bomb.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, if any complaints have been received they have not yet been brought to my notice, but I will certainly inquire into the matter and reply as soon as possible.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): May I put a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker?

Has the Minister of National Defence received any complaints from people of the Saguenay-Lake St. John area to the effect that Voodoos stationed in Bagotville have also broken the sound barrier around five thirty or six o'clock in the morning, causing some concern to the population of the Jonquière-Kénogami-Arvida area?

[Text]

Mr. Hellyer: Not that I am aware of, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

CONSIDERATION BY HOUSE COMMITTEE OF AMENDING FORMULA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in view of the widespread interest in the proposed amending formula with regard to the British North America Act, and in view of the fact that the various legislatures are now discussing its terms, I wonder whether the Prime Minister has given any further consideration to the recommendation of the hon. member for Greenwood that a parliamentary committee be set up at the earliest possible date to which this whole matter could be referred, so that members of parliament may have an opportunity to discuss it before it becomes a fait accompli.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are giving consideration to this matter, but no decision has been reached yet as to the procedure that should be followed.

RIGHT OF PROVINCES TO WITHDRAW FROM CONFEDERATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of everything we read in the newspapers and hear over television at present, would the right hon. Prime Minister tell us if, under the terms of the constitution, a Canadian province could, sometime or other, withdraw from confederation if it so desires?

In view of what we hear these days it is important to know if a province can withdraw tomorrow from confederation.

Can the right hon. Prime Minister tell us if a province has such a right?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is far too important a question to attempt to deal with on orders of the day. Our constitution speaks for itself in this matter.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

FEDERAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR INCREASED COST OF OUTPATIENT CARE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance arising out of the budget brought down in the Quebec legislature last week. There is an additional item of $13 million for the extension of outpatient care under the Quebec hospitalization plan. I wonder whether the existing agreement with the Federal Government takes care of this, or has a supplementary agreement been made with the Federal Government to pay a portion of this additional outpatient cost?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): I will be glad to take the question as notice and look into the matter, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Olson: I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance and ask him whether, when he is looking into the agreement between Quebec and the Federal Government with respect to the cost of outpatient care, he would also look up the agreement between the Federal Government and Alberta to find out whether the Federal Government will be sharing in the additional outpatient costs which I think were approved at the recent sitting of the Legislature.

Mr. Gordon: I am now beginning to understand the purport of the hon. Member's first question. I will look into both these points.

TORONTO—REFUSAL OF PATIENT TO LEAVE HOSPITAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): I should like to direct a question to the minister of health or to a representative of that Department, and inquire whether the Department will be taking any direct action to see that an appeal is entered in relation to an opinion expressed by the Ontario Supreme Court with respect to the patient at St. Joseph's Hospital, Toronto, who has refused to vacate his bed after being discharged by a body of doctors, thus imposing on Canadian taxpayers an unnecessary charge of $30.90 a day for the maintenance of this hospital patient.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): In the absence of my colleague I will be glad to take that question as notice and bring it to her attention.

CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING AGENDA OF DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister with respect to the proposed federal-provincial conference set for May, I believe, on the question of health services. Is the Prime Minister yet in a position to table the correspondence with the provincial governments concerning the agenda of that conference, which on Tuesday of last week he said he would be willing to table?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether we have received the permission of all the Provinces to whom correspondence has been addressed, but as soon as we have I would be glad to table it, and I hope to do this very quickly.

INDUSTRY

ASSISTANCE TO WORKERS DISPLACED BY AUTOMOBILE AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is the Minister now in a position to inform the House what plans are under way to re-establish those workers in the Canadian auto parts industry who are being and who will be dislocated by the new automobile agreement?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last I had a meeting with representatives of the automobile manufacturers as the first stage in developing appropriate programs. Further discussions will be held by the officials of the Department of Labour and the Department of Industry with the automobile manufacturers. Beyond that I have no report to make to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Labour. As a result of his conversation with the automobile manufacturers is he in a position to give the House the same assurance the Secretary of State for External Affairs gave the Star in Windsor, that there will be no layoffs as a result of this agreement?

Mr. MacEachen: The discussions with the automobile manufacturers on Friday last confirmed the statement already made that there will be a substantial increase in total employment and total jobs available in the industry as a result of this agreement. There will be dislocations, and the purpose of our discussion is to mitigate or minimize these dislocations where practicable and possible; that is the point of the exercise. However, it should be borne in mind that these adjustments will take place within the context of expanding employment within this particular industry.

Mr. Scott: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the widespread uncertainty as to the precise plans of the government in the area of dislocation, can the Minister tell the House when he will be in a position to make a firm statement of Government policy in this regard?

Mr. MacEachen: The purpose of the discussion, Mr. Speaker, is to isolate and pinpoint as accurately as possible the sources of dislocation. Until that is accomplished more accurately it would be impossible to develop plans such as my hon. friend suggests. This is one of the purposes of the further consultations. I think it is fair to say that it would be wrong to create apprehensions and fears at this stage about potential displacement.

SHIPPING

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO SHIP COLLISIONS ON ST. LAWRENCE RIVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerald A. Regan (Halifax): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport which arises out of the very serious ship collision on the St. Lawrence River over the week end, in which one ship burned and subsequently sank. Does the department plan an investigation into this collision and if so, in view of the number of serious collisions on the St. Lawrence in recent years, will the investigation also look into the question of whether the river is carrying more ship traffic than is warranted by its size?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): The usual investigation will be made.

Hon. A. J. MacLean (Queens): May I ask a supplementary question. Will the Minister say what action, if any, his department is taking to lessen the hazards of ship collisions in the St. Lawrence which, it would appear, are fairly great?

Mr. Pickersgill: I would be glad to look into the possibility of making a statement on the subject on some future occasion. It is not a matter I can answer on orders of the day.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport.

Inquiries of the Ministry

While conducting his investigation, could he check whether the pilots of the ships involved in the accident on the St. Lawrence river came from the maritime provinces?

[Text]

Mr. Pickersgill: That is a question I would have to look into at some length.

AGRICULTURE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR LONG TERM LOANS TO TREE FRUIT GROWERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture in a hopeful vein. Does the Secretary know whether the Minister has received representations from the B.C. Fruit Growers' Association for an amendment to the Farm Credit Corporation Act or other legislation so that tree fruit growers may borrow long term low interest funds in order to renovate their orchards by cutting out trees of low market varieties or low volume root stocks in order to replace removed trees with varieties acceptable to the consuming public of high volume production?

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member will assist the Chair by putting this question on the order paper.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LOUISBURG, N.S.—LAY-OFF OF WORKERS AT HISTORIC SITE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I have a question for the Prime Minister as the result of a telegram I received a few minutes ago. It says:

> • (11:20 a.m.)
> Fifty eight employees to be laid off at Louisburg project April 20. Are these men to be the first prisoners in the war on poverty or are there plans to place them in other jobs?
> Executive The Fortress of Louisburg Employees Association.

Since the Prime Minister has at this late date personally become interested in poverty, would he be so kind as to investigate the contents of this telegram and report to the House?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not understand the preamble to this question, but the rest I shall be glad to look into.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PREPARATION OF PAMPHLET ON CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I would like to address to the Minister of Justice but in his absence I shall address it to his Parliamentary Secretary. On Friday the Minister referred to an information sheet which his department is going to prepare with regard to capital punishment. I would like to ask him whether those of us who still have some respect for the moral law and believe in the retention of capital punishment will have an opportunity to look at the contents of this pamphlet before it is printed, so that both sides of the question can be presented fairly to the public.

Mr. Speaker: May I suggest this is a question for the order paper.

Mr. Cowan: Ten o'clock.

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON JUVENILE DELINQUENCY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Enns (Portage-Neepawa): I have a question for the Minister of Justice. Perhaps in his absence the Parliamentary Secretary would have the information. It deals with the report of the Committee on Juvenile Delinquency and I am wondering when the report of that Committee can be expected.

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): My understanding is that the report will be ready within a month or so.

ALBERTA—TRANSFER OF PRISONER TO B.C. INSTITUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): My question is for the Minister of Justice, but perhaps in his absence the Parliamentary Secretary could take it as notice. A man by the name of Talbot was given eight years in the Prince Albert penitentiary for stealing at least $200,000 from the Alberta Cancer Association. It has now been reported that he has been removed from that penitentiary to a minimum security institution in British Columbia. I wonder whether the Parliamentary Secretary would give us a full report on the circumstances.

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): I would be glad to take the question as notice.

[Mr. Pearson.]

CONSIDERATION OF EARNED REMISSION WITH RESPECT TO PAROLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Justice could I pose a question to his Parliamentary Secretary and in this way give notice of the question, because it may require reference to some files and documents. I base my question on a letter which I have just received, and it is necessary to quote two brief sentences from it in order to make my question intelligible. The letter relates to a former inmate of the British Columbia penitentiary, one Raymond Johnson, and according to the letter:

> In Johnson's case he was sentenced to ten years in 1957, was paroled in July, 1962, found that because of the new Penitentiary Act 468 days that he had earned under the old Act was added to his parole period, thus in effect he was having to serve this time over again. He claimed in the writ—

That is a writ of habeas corpus.

> —that earned remission under the old Act could not be considered statutory remission under the new Act. Johnson appeared before Mr. Justice Ruttan and was ordered released.

I am wondering, Mr. Speaker, what the Government or the Department is doing in respect to all other inmates who find themselves in a similar position, or all other ex-inmates who have been released on parole since that time.

Mr. Speaker: Surely this is a question for the order paper.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF CONDITIONS ON RESERVES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I was going to direct this question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, in reference to Indians, but in his absence I would like to direct it to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister is right here.

Mr. Woolliams: Oh, I am sorry; he is here. Would the Minister consider setting up a Royal Commission to examine the fact that Canadian Indians are living on reserves in a state of destitution, and the medical attention they are receiving is totally inadequate?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly give the suggestion consideration. I might say, however, that as the House knows we already contemplate the establishment of an Indian Claims Commission, and there is an interdepartmental committee already being set up to study part of the subject matter referred to in the hon. Member's question, but I will take his suggestion under advisement.

Mr. Woolliams: I think maybe I misunderstood the Minister, but surely he is not suggesting the Claims Commission will be the answer to the Indians' poverty and the inadequate medical attention they are receiving?

Mr. Nicholson: I am not suggesting any such thing. I am simply reminding the hon. Member that a bill to establish a Claims Commission for Indians is largely drafted, and that an interdepartmental committee has been set up to study many of the matters he has mentioned. In addition to that I said that I would take his suggestion under advisement.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, if I understood the Minister correctly he said the interdepartmental committee has now been established. If so, can he tell us its composition?

Mr. Nicholson: The names will be announced at an early date. I might say that five or six of the members have been appointed. I am not sure whether the chairman has been agreed upon, but this will be announced within the next day or so.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Could the Minister tell us how he is progressing in proposing or developing amendments to the Indian Act, based upon the recommendations of the joint Senate and House of Commons Committee on Indian Affairs which reported in 1961 and have since been lost sight of?

Mr. Nicholson: I will have to take that question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF REGIONAL POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gene Rhéaume (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Now that Air Canada and Canadian Pacific Air Lines have achieved agreement on domestic fare structures, can the Minister advise the House when we may expect him to announce the regional air carrier policy for Canada?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): So far as the relationships between the two main line carriers and international carriers are concerned, I hope it will not be very long now.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

ALASKA HIGHWAY—MOTION BY ALBERTA LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I have a question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Has there been any communication from the Government of the Province of Alberta to the Government of Canada with respect to a motion passed unanimously by the Legislative Assembly of Alberta on April 8, strongly urging the commencement of negotiations between the Government of Canada and the United States Government, with a view to early commencement on the paving of the Alaska Highway?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will have to look into that, Mr. Speaker. I am not aware of any communication, but I will have to check.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

VANCOUVER—POSSIBLE USE OF FORMER R.C.A.F. BASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ron Basford (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State, but in his absence I will direct it to his Parliamentary Secretary. On Friday last the Secretary of State announced that a meeting would be held to determine the result of discussions with regard to Kitsilano R.C.A.F. station.

Mr. Winch: Don't forget who asked the question.

Mr. Basford: Can the Minister's Parliamentary Secretary tell me what conclusion was arrived at?

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, at the risk of staying up late tonight, may I say that the answer is no.

Mr. Basford: I do not find that too informative, Mr. Speaker, and would like to debate the matter at ten o'clock.

Inquiries of the Ministry

IMMIGRATION

USE OF FORM 1000 BY CHINESE IMMIGRANTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): On Friday last the hon. member for Pictou inquired about the use of Form 1000. In reply to the hon. Member's question, I said that this form had been used for some considerable time in connection with people of the Chinese race who were returning to Canada, and I added that its use had been done away with in connection with Chinese Canadians returning to this country after visits to China.

I should have stated that the use of the form would be continued for identification purposes for people of the Chinese race coming to Canada in the first instance. However, its use has been discontinued in respect of naturalized Canadians, or Canadians domiciled in this country, who return to Canada after a visit to China.

GRAIN

PEACE RIVER—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE RESPECTING DAMP WHEAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I regret I could not give him notice; I have just received some telegrams. Will the hon. gentleman consult with the Canadian Wheat Board to find out whether anything can be done to alleviate a serious situation which has developed in the Peace River country because, with the approach of spring, large quantities of damp wheat on the farms are rapidly deteriorating?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I shall be happy to take up the question with the Canadian Wheat Board.

FINANCE

OPINION OF MINISTER ON LEVEL OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that we have not had a report from the Minister for some time on the state of the Canadian dollar, can the House be advised whether he feels the Canadian dollar is being maintained at a desirable level?

[Mr. Basford.]

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Yes, I do.

[Later:]

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance which is really supplementary to the question asked by the hon. Member for Churchill about keeping the dollar at a desirable level. I would ask the Minister of Finance whether he would now state that the pegged dollar at 92½ cents is a desirable level.

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, I seem to have difficulty in getting this thought across. I have said on several occasions, and I am perfectly prepared to repeat it now, that it is in the interests of the country to maintain the value of the dollar at its present level.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CONSIDERATION OF BILL INCREASING QUORUM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the Government's interest in the procedures of this House, and in particular in view of the Prime Minister's stated interest in improving respect for Parliament, I wonder whether the Government would consider either making Government time available for, or taking over, the Bill I introduced this morning calling for an increase in the quorum of the House of Commons.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will be glad to give consideration to that matter but first, I think, I had better read the Bill.

INQUIRY AS TO REDUCTION OF VOTING AGE TO 18

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister a question which is based on the Government's well known desire to honour its commitments. I am wondering when the Prime Minister will be honouring his commitment of last year to introduce legislation lowering the voting age to 18.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall any commitment to that effect, but I do recall a statement of approval on the part of Members on the Government side for a reduction to that age. The matter will certainly receive very serious consideration, but it is not of immediate priority.

• (11:30 a.m.)

Mr. Ron Basford (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question which arises out of the answer given by the Prime Minister to the question from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, in which the Prime Minister said he would first like to study the bill. Would the Prime Minister consider whether the bill makes provision for improving the attendance of N.D.P. members?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Perhaps the Prime Minister would also do something about the attendance of his own party members, as witness the number of members on that side present this morning.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There seems to be a little too much agitation for a Monday morning.

BICULTURALISM AND BILINGUALISM

SURVEY OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT BY ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet may I refer to a question raised by the Leader of the Opposition and others last week in regard to the nature of a questionnaire which was sent to certain Members of Parliament by the Bilingualism and Biculturalism Commission seeking on a voluntary basis certain information from Members.

I agree that the Commission should naturally seek all relevant information on the bilingual and bicultural aspects of the work of our institutions, including Parliament. I agree that a Government should not tell a Royal Commission what it can do and how it should do it within its terms of reference. But so far as this particular questionnaire to Members of Parliament is concerned, if I were asked to answer it in its present form I would not, as I consider many of the questions irrelevant and some highly inappropriate.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): A supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of his statement respecting this questionnaire by the B and B Commission, has the Prime Minister brought this matter to the attention of the B and B Commission and asked them to desist from proceeding any further with this?

Mr. Pearson: I have, Mr. Speaker. They have naturally been following this matter in the Commons Debates, and I have taken it up with the Minister who speaks for the Commission in the House. I have also been in touch with the Commission myself.

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, may I address a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. I am pleased to hear that he agrees with me and others that a lot of these questions are inappropriate, but would he tell us—and if he cannot would he find out—whether this inquisition will be continued with the rest of the members? Because so far, as I understand it, some 40 or 50 members have been canvassed.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to interfere improperly with the business of a Royal Commission, but I would think, after reviewing what was said earlier this morning in the House of Commons, that the Royal Commission might wish to have another look at this questionnaire.

BRIDGES

JACQUES CARTIER BRIDGE—FEDERAL SHARE OF COST OF APPROACHES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport.

Could the minister tell the house if the federal government intends to defray the costs of necessary repairs to the roadway of the Jacques Cartier bridge which has become impassable; if so, when will such repairs be undertaken.

[Text]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am advised by the National Harbours Board that they are well aware of the need for certain repairs being made to the Jacques Cartier bridge. The matter is under active consideration, and the necessary steps will be taken very shortly.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Friday, April 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cashin for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, first, I should like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Cashin) and the seconder (Mr. Chrétien) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They have performed their tasks singularly well; they praised the speech to high heaven. Both their speeches were magnificent examples of a torrent of words devoid of any ideas.

The speech from the throne we heard last Monday was merely the icing covering the budget cake to be served to us in a few days. What will the budget speech contain, we do not know as yet, but it will reflect the future policy of the country's financiers put forward by their go-between, I mean this government.

This speech is particularly noteworthy not for the solutions it brings but for the acknowledgements it contains.

Upon careful reading of this speech, I mean the speech from the throne, one wonders whether the Liberal party awakening from a bad dream is not telling us this bad dream is about the results of its policies which have lacked administrative foresight during the 33 years it has been in office in the last 45 years of the country's administration.

We have at least learned one thing from this speech from the throne: Poverty does exist in Canada. For the past 25 years the Créditistes have repeatedly pointed out that poverty existed in Canada and have succeeded at least in opening the eyes of the Liberals who finally have admitted and acknowledged that poverty does exist. After having been in office for 33 years out of the last 45 years of the country's administration, the Liberals have finally admitted that poverty does exist in Canada and that the Créditistes were right in speaking about poverty.

The worst off in all that are the poor themselves who had to live for those 33 years under a Liberal administration and who had to live and suffer from Liberal policies.

I should like to quote here a few lines from the speech from the throne in order to show how ridiculous it is:

> Our country is achieving a high rate of economic growth. Trade is expanding. With growing industrialization, Canadians are enjoying rapidly increasing employment opportunities; incomes and living standards are rising; the number of people out of work has been reduced to lower levels than for many years.

And immediately after this, we find that:

> All the great potentialities of our economy are not, however, being realized. The talents of some of our people are wasted because of poverty, illness, inadequate education and training, inequality, in opportunities for work.

The measures to correct that misery, as set forth in the speech from the throne, are yet unknown. But the adoption of "O Canada" as the national anthem is mentioned in order to enable all Canadians to sing officially their national anthem, including those who are in misery and poverty because of Liberal policies especially, and also of Conservative policies for that matter; indeed, at the rate debts, taxes and poverty are increasing at present it will soon be more accurate to sing: "O Canada, our home and taxing land".

In 1963, at the time of the last federal election, everyone remembers the dirty publicity campaign launched by the Liberal party against the Social Credit to the tune of at least $5,000 a day, in the newspaper La Presse. Those full page ads were headed:

> Social Credit means poverty.

But it is not the Social Crediters who have been in office in Ottawa since 1963 and yet one can read in the Liberal government's speech from the throne that there is poverty and want in Canada.

The poverty which is mentioned in the speech from the throne did not spring up overnight among the people. It results from the administration of the two old-line parties which have succeeded one another in office since confederation. Poverty is the offspring of past governments which, through their systems, sowed and today are reaping poverty and want. They have never had any policies to prevent hardship and poverty. On the contrary, they have always allowed hardship and poverty to grow worse from day to day.

What with taxes and debts, the two old-line parties do their utmost to drive people to poverty and keep them there. Every day and in every way, we are told that our country is tremendously rich in all sorts of things. That is true. So much so that we hardly know the real value of our natural and other resources. And yet, this same country, in spite of all its wealth, is forcing its own people to live in insecurity, sickness, poverty, unemployment, to such an extent that they need unemployment assistance, public welfare and charitable institutions. The people know what bankruptcy and poverty are.

We have a rich, an affluent country, due to our national resources and the labour of our people, but we have poor and indigent people because of the political and economic system of the old-line parties.

While Ottawa was considering waging war on poverty, the provincial budget made public last week in Quebec brought us a shower of new taxes, an increase in taxes which will increase the number of poor and poverty in the province of Quebec. Poverty in Ottawa and taxes in Quebec. Liberal in Ottawa, Liberal in Quebec. Grits in Ottawa, Grits in Quebec.

I would like to quote an article by Leslie Roberts published in the Montreal Star, Saturday, April 10, 1965, page 5:

Between Ourselves

Dirty Word "Thrift"

What makes me dubious is the fact that as a people we have totally abandoned all notions of respectable frugality, all ideas of pay as you go, nowhere more than at the highest levels of government.

When Mr. Gordon, the Minister of Finance, tabled his estimates for the Federal Government's new fiscal year which began on April 1, his proposed spending figures for the period which will end on March 31, 1966, topped $8,000,000,000, with more to come later in what are called "supplementaries."

Assuming a population of 20,000,000 Canadians, what this means is that the federal authority alone plans to spend $400 for every man, woman and new-born babe in the country.

If you proceed from this point to regard five people as comprising the average Canadian family, you arrive at a figure of $2,000, representing what Mr. Gordon proposes to spend per household this year—and in most households I would guess the bite is carved out of one income.

This is just the federal tab. After that the province and your municipality still have to collect their share.

As Quebec has just budgeted for expenditures of approximately $2,000,000,000 and we are 5,000,000 Quebeckers that's another $400 per household of five.

Another fascinating item here is that of Mr. Gordon's eight billions, at least $1 in every eight he raises (whether in taxes or new borrowings) will go into what is politely called "servicing the national debt."

• (11:50 a.m.)

What this means, in the kind of language laymen use to communicate with each other, is that $1 in every eight Mr. Gordon acquires by taxes or new loans will be expended solely to pay interest on money we already owe. This is $1 billion for which the Canadian people will not get a damned thing in return—a steadily rising total which you may as well jot down on your reminder pad as the high cost of deficit financing.

This article criticizes the financial system which we have unceasingly denounced for more than 20 years. We are now subject to an inflationary system and it is because we have known this inflationary system that we of the Ralliement Creditiste move today an amendment in order to balance one aspect of our national economy, family allowances.

The Family Allowances Act was passed on August 15, 1944, more than 20 years ago, and the first benefits were paid under this act on July 1, 1945. This was an act for which the Government of the day had reason to be proud. It was the same party as the one which is in office now, the Liberal party. We are wondering if the present Government does not regret the enactment of that piece of legislation since it has let the purchasing power of family allowances fall to nothing or practically nothing. In fact, the cost of living has tripled since 1945. Everything has gone up and increased threefold and often more, such as the indemnities of members of parliament and of members of most provincial legislatures. Only family allowances have remained at the same level as in 1945, which means that they are only worth one third of their original value.

Whereas they permitted the purchase of a quart of milk for children, in 1945, they now permit the purchase of only one third of a quart. It is the same thing all along the line. Milk which sold for 10 cents a quart in 1945 now costs 25 cents.

In 1945 a 24-ounce loaf of bread sold for 10 cents while it now sells for 25 cents in 1965. Compare the cost of living in any area and you will realize that what cost 100 per cent in 1945 has gone up 300 per cent today.

In 1945 an hon. member's indemnity was $4,000 while it is now $12,000 in 1965. Hon. members' expense allowances were $2,000 in 1945, while they have gone up to $6,000 in 1965.

Family allowances have remained at the same level since 1945. When an employer cuts his employee's salary by half it is because he is not satisfied with his services and he would have no regret if he were to quit his job. Should we conclude the same thing in the case of family allowances whose value is reduced to one third of their initial value? And to think that the Liberals would prefer that such a legislation had never been passed.

I see government members vehemently denying those charges. Why, then, do they leave family allowances at the same level as in 1945? Why did they reject every year motions to raise family allowances in order to give them back their initial value? Every session we of the Ralliement Creditiste made new attempts to have family allowances raised to put them in line with the cost of living index.

There is no electoral approach in this plea. We are only concerned with the welfare of families raising children. The party in office does not care for the welfare of families between general elections, but waits for the eve of new elections to give a thought to family allowances. Why wait until the next election to think about children and families? Thereby, the Liberal party proves once more that its hunger for power is stronger than its concern for the well-being of this country.

The government knows where to find young people when it launches a military crusade, but it cares a lot less about the families where are born and will grow those who will be 20 a few years from now.

The amount paid as family allowances should be tripled to meet family needs and to counterbalance cost of living increases since 1945. By so doing, families could buy three times more products than they can now afford. Stores have a surplus of products, industry is always ready to produce more, farmers find it difficult to sell their products. They are all waiting for orders from the families who need this production.

If the government has compromised itself with financiers who control it, if it cannot make capital serve production by taking money from the Bank of Canada in order to satisfy production and if, out of respect for financiers who had it elected, the government has to resort to taxation, well, it should dip into the national defence budget, into the armaments budget, in order to increase family allowances.

Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Compton-Frontenac (Mr. Latulippe):

That the following words be added to the address:

We respectfully regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to propose legislation to adjust the family allowances according to the rise of the cost of living index since 1945, and no longer enjoy the confidence of the house and the Canadian people.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: I have had an opportunity of reading the proposed amendment and I should like to hear from one or two Members if they would care to speak on the point of whether or not it is in order. I would call the attention of hon. Members to Beauchesne, citation 200, subsection 1, which reads in part as follows:

An old rule of Parliament reads: "That a question being once made and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again but must stand as the judgment of the House."

While it is true that the amendment proposed by hon. members of the Social Credit party covered a great many other items, this amendment would appear at first sight to be a subsection or a part of their original amendment which was subsequently negatived. However, if any hon. members have anything to say I will be glad to listen.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw your attention to the language that was used in the subamendment proposed by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency, which reads in part as follows:

...having thereby failed to raise family allowances in keeping with the cost of living...

That was part of his amendment and one of his reasons for asserting lack of confidence in the Government. That amendment was voted on last Friday. The amendment now offered attacks the Government and proposes want of confidence in that the Government has failed to propose legislation to adjust family allowances according to the rise of the index of the cost of living. In other words the two motions are identical in that respect. They both invite the Members to show lack of confidence in the Government because the Government has failed to raise family allowances. This is the allegation in the two of them. It is true that the subamendment on Friday added other things, but on this point they are identical. The amendment merely takes part of the subamendment that was offered on Friday, and which was rejected by the House, and brings it forward again. I therefore ask that you rule the amendment out of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Do other members wish to take part in this debate?

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, citation 200 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules And Forms states:

An old rule of parliament reads: "That a question being once made and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again but must stand as the judgment of the house".

The beginning of that citation reads as follows:

That a question being once made and carried—

On the other hand, the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Marcoux) reads as follows:

—having failed to carry out an economic and financial program such as would have been possible through the facilities of the Bank of Canada—

That is the question submitted to the approbation of the house. I continue:

—having thereby failed to raise family allowances in keeping with the cost of living—

That is a second question in the same subamendment; I continue the quotation:

—and been unsuccessful in establishing a balanced economy and in lightening the burden of the public debt and the interests thereon—

That is a third question in the same subamendment, which continues as follows:

—so as to provide every Canadian with a standard of living consistent with the value of this country's natural resources; not having considered it advisable to invest a huge amount of debt free social capital through the Bank of Canada—

That is a fourth question in the same subamendment which goes on as follows:

—with a view to financing the training of an adequate staff to deal with medical and hospital care, do not enjoy the confidence of this house.

Thus, the subamendment included five different questions.

It is recognized that such a subamendment should normally have been found out of order, but it was not.

As the said subamendment included five different questions, it might have occurred during the vote that certain members would have been in favour of one of the five proposals contained in the subamendment, but opposed to the others. Furthermore, some hon. members could have been for the second proposal and against the fourth and thus they would have voted against it in the house.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one of Beauchesne's citations states that when an amendment is incomplete, and I am trying to find it—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Grégoire: In any case, Mr. Speaker, the citation I am trying to find specifies that when an amendment is not clear enough to permit the house to vote on each proposal, then it can be amended.

That is exactly what has happened in the case of the subamendment presented by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency which contained five completely different questions.

This means, therefore, that hon. members who intended to vote for increasing family allowances based on the cost of living index but who, for instance, did not want to vote for using the potentialities of the Bank of Canada or for the investment of large debt-free social capital through the Bank of Canada, did not really have any opportunity, as a matter of fact, to vote for increasing family allowances because they had to vote, at the same time, for using credit through the Bank of Canada. I think that would have been unfair to hon. members as a whole and that is why I maintain that the house has not yet been called upon to vote on the specific matter of increasing family allowances. In fact, the house was called upon to vote, not on the first question, but on a series of measures one of which could have been accepted by some and rejected by others.

That is why I say that citation 200 of Beauchesne which reads as follows:

A question being once made and carried—

—does not apply in this case, because the subamendment of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency contains five different proposals. Consequently, it is not each individual proposal which has been carried but the five of them as a whole, and this was done by a subamendment to another motion, the one dealing with the scandals within the government.

For all those reasons, Mr. Speaker, and precisely because the house has been called upon to decide on a group of questions and not on a specific question, I submit that the house has not voted on the issue dealt with in the amendment which has just been moved. Under the circumstances, I feel that the amendment is out of order.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: I have to decide whether or not the proposed amendment is in order. Let me say at the beginning that an amendment is not necessarily out of order because it may be vague or even complex. However, the Chair has to be bound by tradition and the rules of the House. May I read this citation once more, the first paragraph:

An old rule of Parliament reads: "That a question being once made and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again but must stand as the judgment of the House."

The next sentence gives the justification for such a rule:

Unless such a rule were in existence, the time of the House might be used in the discussion of motions of the same nature and contradictory decisions would be sometimes arrived at in the course of the same session.

Division

I must come to the conclusion that in my judgment this amendment deals with the same matter that has already been decided by the house and, therefore, I regret that I cannot accept the amendment as proposed.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, I think that we must appeal against your ruling, because the amendment we have moved is strictly in order.

So, I ask that your ruling be put to the house.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the decision of the Chair, from which the hon. Member for Villeneuve has appealed to the House. All those in favour of sustaining the decision of the Chair will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

And the members having been called in:

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

The question is an appeal to the House from a ruling of the Chair which is as follows:

To the motion for an Address in Reply to His Excellency's Speech from the Throne, the hon. Member for Shefford proposed in amendment thereto the following:

"That the following be added to the Address:

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Mr. Speaker: Shall I dispense?

Mr. Grégoire: No.

Mr. Speaker:

"We respectfully regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to propose legislation to adjust the family allowances according to the rise of the index of the cost of living since 1945, and no longer enjoy the confidence of the House and the Canadian people."

The Chair ruled the proposed amendment out of order on the ground that in effect the substance and essence thereof was a question on which the House expressed a judgment on Friday, April 9 last during the course of the current debate.

Whereupon the hon. Member for Villeneuve appealed to the House from the decision of the Chair.

• (12:20 p.m.)

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

Mr. Joseph Macaluso (Hamilton West): It is indeed an honour for me to take part in this debate. I too would like to join with my colleagues in all parts of this House in congratulating the Mover and the Seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I am more than proud to belong to a group in this House which includes such energetic and aggressive members.

I do not intend to spend very much time on the contents of the Speech from the Throne. At the outset, however, I wish to put on record some comments which appeared in an editorial published on April 6 in the Toronto Star, since these comments express my own views.

> The Speech from the Throne which opened the new session at Ottawa yesterday may fairly be called an historic document. It outlined what is probably the largest, boldest and most sweeping program ever submitted to a Canadian Parliament.

Then it goes on:

> This Speech from the Throne remains a tremendous challenge to Canada. It is nothing less than a call to bring the economic and social forces which dominate, and sometimes wreck, the lives of Canadians under public control.

I compliment the Government on the contents of this Speech from the Throne which is so challenging, so ambitious and so visionary, if I may use that word. However, I feel there has not for many years been a debate in this house on a most important topic. I refer, of course, to the subject of the St. Lawrence waterway upon which a debate took place in 1951.

That debate was probably one of the most important which has ever taken place in this House. I certainly wish to make some comments on the present Seaway because of the contribution it has made to the economic life of this country, to job opportunities and to the industrial development of Canada.

The St. Lawrence Seaway has been described as the world's greatest engineering project. Its most remarkable feature is the Welland ship canal, a navigational facility unequalled anywhere in the world. It was designed, constructed and paid for solely by the Canadian people at a time when Canada had yet to achieve the proud place it occupies in the world today.

The first Welland ship canal was constructed in 1829 in the face of incredible difficulties, physical, financial and political. It was the opening of the present canal which did so much to ensure the progress and prosperity which Canadians have since enjoyed. We should never forget, however, that the first canal was opened only after a long and bitter struggle, and that all subsequent improvements were brought about by courageous and determined men who fought deeply entrenched opposing interests.

In 1932, the Welland ship canal was deepened to 25 feet, giving impetus to the growth of industrial development throughout a large area. As a result of this demonstration of what a canal 25 feet deep could do, it was further deepened to 27 feet. This work was completed in 1959.

The canal is the most crucial part of the St. Lawrence Seaway. In 1964 the cargo throughput was 51.4 million net tons. This was nearly double the tonnage handled in 1958 before the Seaway was completed. Despite the fact that the Seaway operates only eight months of the year the project has encountered opposition from those who have always feared and resented its existence. In 1959 the Seaway from Montreal to Lake Ontario handled 20.4 million net tons of cargo, and in 1964 this figure rose to 39.3 million net tons, an increase of more than 92 per cent. I submit this explains the vociferous opposition which the Seaway has engendered since its inception.

A great part of this cargo tonnage is being attracted away from the United States Atlantic coast ports. Last year it is interesting to note that the United States North Atlantic Ports Association, which represents 13 port districts, told a United States Senate subcommittee:

> The greatest share of traffic that today moves via the Seaway once moved via the ports along the seaboard. Without doubt those who have suffered the greatest loss as a result of the Seaway have been the North Atlantic ports.

In January, 1965 the Association of American Railroads issued a statement which, in part, had this to say:

> Prudent judgment would indicate that there is no alternative except to raise Seaway tolls to a more realistic level. Our interest in this subject is stimulated by the Seaway competition with railroads.

Also in May of 1964, Mr. Speaker, the National Association for a Non-Subsidized Seaway, with headquarters in Baltimore, Maryland, and which represents United States Atlantic, Gulf and west coast ports, issued a statement before the same Senate subcommittee; and its chairman, a Democratic Congressman from Maryland, characterized the Seaway at that time as, and I quote, "a monstrosity". He said:

> We hope this Senate subcommittee will recognize that the good of the Seaway, the good of the nation, and indeed of expanding world trade will best be served by raising tolls on the Seaway.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this is an absurd statement and in the interests of the continued good relations between Canada and the United States I will not comment further on this very extraordinary statement.

Canadian railway and truck operators have benefited from the heavy flow of traffic along the St. Lawrence Seaway, and it is important to bear in mind that every pound of the 39.3 million net tons of cargo which transited the Seaway from Montreal to Lake Ontario in 1964 was transported at one step or another by rail or truck in Canada. So much so, Mr. Speaker, that in 1964 Mr. N. R. Crump, the chairman and chief executive officer of Canadian Pacific Railway, said that the movement of bulk cargoes in export have been a factor in the favourable showing made by railroads in 1964. There is a reflection of that movement found in the fact that in 1964 tonnage of Canadian steel consumed by Canadian builders of railway cars and locomotives increased by 135 per cent over 1963.

One of the principal reasons for the construction of the Seaway, which was put forward back in 1951, was to facilitate the movement of Canadian forest products, iron ore and coal from the lower St. Lawrence and Nova Scotia to ports on the Great Lakes, and of Canadian wheat to overseas ports. The St. Lawrence River ports in 1964 handled for export 270 million bushels of Canadian grain. It is obvious that without the St. Lawrence Seaway it would have been quite impossible to commit ourselves to supply such enormous tonnages of wheat to Russia and to other iron curtain countries. Iron ore from the lower St. Lawrence destined for United States Great Lakes ports furnished the greatest tonnage of any commodity transiting the Seaway.

Therefore in my view, and in the view of many others, the Seaway has provided an increase in traffic for Canadian ports, for Canadian railroads and Canadian road haulers; and has also performed a most notable economic, political and social service to the whole of Canada by making it possible to create a whole new civilization in the lower St. Lawrence valley. This in turn involved millions of dollars of Canadian investment, created new and substantial markets, continuing and growing markets, for Canadian products and manufactured foodstuffs.

[Mr. Macaluso.]

In my view, Mr. Speaker, more important than this today, about 85 per cent of the bulk cargo transiting the Seaway and the Welland ship canal is carried in Canadian vessels. This is most interesting, because one of the most important reasons put forward in 1951 for the imposition of tolls on the St. Lawrence Seaway was that United States vessels would provide the bulk of the revenue. But this is not the case. The movement of Canadian raw materials through the St. Lawrence has stimulated Canadian shipbuilding industries in Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick, and this has been a direct result of the construction of the Seaway.

I should like to refer to the book "The St. Lawrence Seaway" written by Hon. Lionel Chevrier, the present Canadian High Commissioner to Great Britain, which was published in 1959. In discussing the matter of tolls Mr. Chevrier had this to say, as recorded at page 114 of his book:

> The question of tolls was often used as a political and economic argument to make the Seaway impossible. The powerful interests in the U.S., when they could no longer stop the construction of the Seaway, tried to get the tolls pinned at hopelessly high rates, high enough to scare all shipping away from the Seaway.

At that time Senator Wiley was piloting the bill through the U.S. Senate, and Mr. Chevrier says:

> Wiley emphasized that the U.S. must have a voice in setting tolls. She must be able to watch for the possibility of reducing tolls when possible...
> The U.S. could not permit Canada to dominate the Seaway. For the same reason she was loath to see Canada planning duplicate facilities during construction of the joint venture.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, the revenue from tolls is not coming from United States vessels but from Canadian vessels. Canada reluctantly accepted, under duress, the principle of trying to make the Seaway self-liquidating through tolls within 50 years, a hitherto unheard of provision in the history of North American navigation, both coastal and inland. When the Government announced last year the twinning of the remaining locks in the Welland ship canal at a cost in excess of $180 million, it also announced its continued adherence to the unique and highly discriminatory principle of trying to recover capital costs of this public work through tolls.

Presently, Mr. Speaker, tolls on the Welland ship canal are suspended, if I may quote the Minister, "for the time being". The tolls on the St. Lawrence Seaway from Montreal to Lake Ontario are frozen at their 1959 level until July 1, 1966. Therefore I bring this matter to the attention of the house at the earliest opportunity.

We might ask ourselves, what is the burden of tolls? The largest type of Canadian bulk carrier, fully loaded with Canadian iron ore or Canadian coal upbound from the lower St. Lawrence, or loaded with Canadian grain downbound from the Lakehead, pays $12,400 each time it transits the Seaway between Montreal and Lake Ontario, and vice-versa. The length of the Seaway is approximately 124 miles. I regret to hear the junior Member for Halifax (Mr. Regan) applauding, Mr. Speaker. This amounts to a toll of $100 per mile.

Out of every $100 collected from tolls, $29 is paid to the United States in U.S. funds. These funds are coming from Canadian vessels. To my mind this is a humiliating position for a country which built and operated an all-Canadian Seaway from Montreal to Lake Erie on a virtually toll free basis for 111 years. Our main interest as Canadians, Mr. Speaker, should be to bring about abolition of all tolls on Canadian inland waterways in accordance with the long-standing Canadian policy of toll free navigational facilities, which has served us so well in the past. The continued existence of tolls on what was once an all-Canadian and virtually toll free Seaway constitutes a dangerous precedent for the extension of the principle of trying to recover the capital costs of other vital water transportation facilities, both coastal and inland, in this fashion.

• (12:40 p.m.)

Thus it is my sincere belief that Canada should restore the St. Lawrence Seaway from Montreal to Lake Erie to its all-Canadian character by constructing a lock at Cornwall, Ontario, and revert to our historical policy of toll free inland waterways which still applies to our coastal waterways. We face a battle to prevent the usefulness of the whole St. Lawrence waterway from being curtailed by the actions of those who have always been opposed to its existence and who now have greater reason than ever to fear and resent its success.

It is interesting to note that the Seaway opened this year on April 8, and I should like to quote from an article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal on that date, as follows:

> The St. Lawrence Seaway opens today for its seventh and probably most profitable season—

I suggest that we have a hard battle to fight against very powerful and persistent enemies both in the United States and at home. This was described in Mr. Chevrier's book. I regret that the hon. Members for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Basford) and Halifax (Mr. Regan) take such a regionalistic outlook to this very important problem.

Major opposition to a toll free Seaway from Montreal to Lake Ontario has been based on the premise that exemption from tolls is equivalent to a subsidy. Let me name some of these very revealing titles. The National Association for Non-Subsidized Seaways; the Maryland Committee for Non-Subsidized Seaways; the New York-New Jersey Committee for a Self-Supporting Seaway; the United States North Atlantic, Gulf and Caribbean ports, as well as the Association of American Railroads, all are long-standing opponents of the Seaway.

Yet strangely none of the above mentioned bodies, or other opponents of the Seaway, are on record as being opposed to the maintenance at public expense, on a toll free basis, of channels capable of accommodating deep sea ships in such United States rivers as the Hudson to Albany, New York; the Delaware to Trenton, New Jersey; the Mississippi to Baton Rouge, Louisiana; the Columbia to Dalles, Oregon; and the Sacramento to Sacramento, California. None of those rivers is of such importance to the economy of the United States as the St. Lawrence is to that of Canada, yet in all of North America only the St. Lawrence from Montreal to Lake Ontario is subject to tolls.

In the light of our dependence upon exports for the level of our over-all business activity it is difficult to understand why this discrimination should be tolerated by Canadians. The St. Lawrence Seaway not only provides access to overseas markets for Canadian grain and other natural products, and for a growing export of manufactured goods, but also provides access to the extensive and growing United States markets in the Great Lakes area for forest and mineral products from Quebec and the Maritimes. This means that the Seaway makes a very vital contribution to the solution of our vexing balance of payments problem.

Many, many ports in the U.S. are now proceeding with channel and harbour deepening and placing themselves in a position to handle ships of a size quite beyond any currently contemplated capacity of the St. Lawrence Seaway, all of which are, and will remain, toll free. The efforts of U.S. North Atlantic ports to meet Seaway as well as other forms of competition at public expense on a toll free basis should be of real concern to we Canadians whose interest in our inland waterways is vital.

We must remember that the United States really showed surprisingly little interest in the navigation of the St. Lawrence River during all the years when Canadians were striving for ever greater improvement of their own transportation facilities on that water highway. It was, of course, very natural for Canadians to press for the construction of a seaway in the face of United States indifference of obstruction, because the St. Lawrence waterway gives us our principal access to the Great Lakes. Without such access Canada would not have become the dynamic, prosperous and progressive country which it is today.

Mr. Speaker, the ignorance which has existed and which in large measure unfortunately still exists as to the economic and social significance of the Seaway and the Welland ship canal is really deplorable. This ignorance is more remarkable in that Canada has spent many hundreds of millions of our hard earned dollars on aids to navigation, dredging, canal building and harbour construction. Therefore there is still far too little realization on the part of Canadians generally as to the vital importance of the Seaway and the Welland ship canal to the future progress and continued prosperity of this country.

This perhaps explains one of the difficulties we face in fighting the battle against tolls on inland waterways. While we search desperately for a Canadian national identity, we persist in ignoring the Biblical advice "by their fruits shall ye know them"; and judging by the fruits of Canadians we are really a great people, despite our relatively small numbers. In almost any other country but Canada the whole St. Lawrence waterway would be a source of such immense national pride as to make its future absolutely secure from inimical action from any quarter.

The present Welland ship canal was completed in 1932, and it is still, in almost every particular, the most outstanding man made water transport facility in the world. Certainly none other performs a more outstanding service for any national economy, and none approaches its spectacular feat of lifting 700-foot ships, weighing with their cargoes up to 45,000 tons, 326 feet up an escarpment, the difference in height between Lake Ontario and Lake Erie. The Welland ship canal is unquestionably one of the greatest existing tributes to Canadian ability, Canadian courage and Canadian vision. It would probably be easier to bring home to Canadians the contributions the Seaway and the Welland ship canal have made and are capable of making to our present prosperity and future progress if they both had been the subject of less criticism by those with a vested interest in other forms of transportation.

This brings to mind the brief submitted to the Government by the National Legislative Committee of the International Railway Brotherhoods of March 11, 1965. I should like to quote from page 6 of that brief as follows:

> It is the opinion of this Committee that the best interests of the people of Canada will be served if Seaway tolls are brought to a level that will meet current operating costs and the financial obligations contemplated in the Seaway Act. Thus the St. Lawrence Seaway will find its proper place in the over-all transportation system through competitive operation and not by way of subsidization.
> The Government of Canada should oppose any scheme designed to lower present inadequate Seaway tolls or extend the 50 year amortization period predicated by the Seaway Act.

I have only one statement in respect of that brief and that is that in my opinion it is absurd. I regret that the Minister of Transport at the time the brief was submitted seemed to indicate that he might be in agreement with the submission. I certainly want to bring this situation to the attention of the Minister at this time, and I hope I can change his point of view.

Those who have been persistently and vociferously opposed to the development and use of the St. Lawrence and our other inland waterways and who seek to limit their use do, it seems to me, take a very shortsighted attitude. In the final analysis all our forms of transportation depend for their own progress and prosperity upon the progress and prosperity of the whole Canadian economy. Most of the bulk cargoes handled through our inland waterways are carried at some point, very often for considerable distances, by rail or other forms of transportation. Canadian manufactured products, even those destined for ultimate shipment to overseas markets, are very largely transported by rail or truck. Therefore it seems to me there is very considerable identity of interest between all forms of transportation in this country.

History has already amply demonstrated that our inland waterways are a priceless asset to the Canadian economy and, as such, have played a great part in our industrial and social progress. Why then should inland transportation, which makes such a valuable addition to national employment and national wealth be discriminated against in this fashion? Why not revert to our traditional policy of toll free inland waterways?

• (12:50 p.m.)

A very considerable tonnage of Canadian iron ore already finds its way to United States Atlantic ports from the lower St. Lawrence in ships far too large to transit either the St. Lawrence Seaway or the Welland ship canal. Those large vessels and their cargoes contribute no revenues—I repeat, Mr. Speaker, no revenues—to any part of the Seaway. If such off-shore traffic increases at the expense of Seaway bulk traffic throughput, then trying to recover the capital costs of the Seaway and Welland ship canal through tolls is bound to create more and more difficulties for those who must rely upon our inland waterways for their fuel and raw materials. These large U.S. carriers are able to take iron ore and other bulk materials to ports all over the world and deliver them to plants whose finished products compete with those produced by Canadian industries dependant upon much smaller carriers which are capable of using the Seaway and the Welland ship canal.

In the light of these developments and others that are likely to take place, the Government should seriously consider whether we should bring the Welland ship canal locks up to the standard of the new United States locks now being constructed, at federal expense, at the Sault, Michigan. It would seem to me to be somewhat shortsighted to build twin locks in the Welland ship canal now only to the dimensions of those already existing. It is clear that this will not exactly help to cope with the problem in the future. In fact it is estimated by the experts that even with the twinning of these locks they will be saturated within a few years after completion. It cannot be too often emphasized and brought home to the people of Canada that if the existing level of tolls on the St. Lawrence Seaway is raised, the whole future of our Seaway is likely to be placed in serious jeopardy.

In September, 1957 the Mayor of Milwaukee wrote a letter to the United States St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation in which he expressed the belief that the objective of the National Committee for a Non-Subsidized Seaway was, to quote him, "to set the tolls so high that the Seaway will probably not be used at all". We in Canada, Mr. Speaker, are not the only ones fighting the battle against tolls. There are many interests in the United States which are also doing so, but it must be agreed that the opponents of the Seaway are very powerful interests who command a lot of votes in the United States.

Closer to home, the Steel Company of Canada and Dominion Foundries and Steel, who are situated in the city of Hamilton, and some U.S. steel interests have hundreds of millions of dollars invested in the Wabush mines in Newfoundland and in its harbour works and railway lines and the pelletizing plant at Pointe Noir, Quebec. These projects have contributed substantially to employment and to the growth and prosperity of the lower St. Lawrence valley and Newfoundland. These great developments, especially Wabush mines, were set in motion in 1956, and were predicated upon the assumption that the St. Lawrence Seaway would continuously provide low cost water transportation to our Great Lakes area. Low cost water transportation, Mr. Speaker, is vital and essential to these steel complexes.

Back in 1951 the Canadian Government agreed to bow to the wishes of what Hon. Lionel Chevrier described as "tremendously powerful United States business interests" and agreed to make the Seaway self-liquidating within 50 years through tolls. This was a unique departure from our traditional policy of paying for public works out of the consolidated revenue fund, but our government to do so was the price that Canada was asked to pay for United States collaboration in the construction of the Seaway. The large and wealthy United States, Mr. Speaker, only constructed two of the seven Seaway locks and a short canal to connect them at a cost of less than $132 million. This was the same as the cost to Canada of building the Welland ship canal between 1913 and 1932, when our wealth and population were far lower than today. The over-all cost to Canada with regard to the present Seaway was about $500 million.

I think we made a very bad bargain when we bowed to United States pressure. I believe we should have gone ahead alone. At that time the House supported unanimously a resolution to go ahead with the Seaway, and it is recorded in Mr. Chevrier's book on the Seaway that there was great disappointment when the United States finally decided to go into the construction of the navigational end of the Seaway. The House was unanimous because it was stated that "everybody in the House recognized that if it were beneficial to the whole nation it would ultimately be beneficial to the separate parts of Canada."

It is because I believe that Seaway tolls are against the public interest of Canada that I make no secret of my belief that they should be abolished, and Canada should build an all-Canadian seaway. I think it was visionary at that time that the Canadian Government did build the abutments at Cornwall to provide for this being done, although this was opposed at that time by the United States interests. I realize only too well that the abolition of tolls is not an easy objective to achieve, and it will only be achieved if Canadians can be made to realize the importance of the Seaway to our national economic prosperity and social progress.

The continued existence of tolls on the St. Lawrence Seaway is an invitation for the imposition of similar charges on the Welland ship canal, the Sault locks and the river channels connecting Lakes Superior, Huron, Michigan and Erie. Some eight or nine years ago the Hoover Commission in the United States recommended such user charges on all such facilities in the United States, and President Johnson in his budget message to Congress in January, 1965 recommended the imposition of such tolls on United States inland waterways. Imagine if you can what the situation would be if tolls had to be paid for the use of inland waterway facilities on all grain shipped from the Lakehead to markets in Europe, and on all iron ore cargoes upbound from the lower St. Lawrence. Tolls are a hindrance to export trade and I wish to say—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Côté, Longueuil): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Member.

Mr. Macaluso: I am just coming to my last sentence, and perhaps I might have the indulgence of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Côté, Longueuil): Does the hon. Member have the indulgence of the House?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to grant the hon. Member the right to continue, although it was not granted to me the other day.

Mr. Macaluso: I would be glad to grant it to the hon. Member when he wishes to speak. Mr. Speaker, if a tolled Seaway has been able to accomplish so much for Canada, think what an untolled all-Canadian seaway might do for us in the future. I thank hon. Members for allowing me additional time.

[Mr. Macaluso.]

Mr. Nielsen: May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Côté, Longueuil): Shall we call it one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand that when we interrupted proceedings at one o'clock the hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) had the floor. However, the President of the Privy Council is seeking permission to interrupt this speech. Is this agreed to by the hon. Member for Yukon?

Mr. Nielsen: He did not receive permission from me, but I will agree, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF BUSINESS TO BE CONCLUDED BEFORE EASTER RECESS

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, after consultation with the House Leaders of the other parties, a consensus was reached whereby the House would continue to sit during the dinner hour tonight; it would sit continuously tomorrow after it convened at eleven o'clock, until the completion of the Address in Reply tomorrow night. When the vote is taken on the Address in Reply tomorrow night, that will be the conclusion of the proceedings.

The Government undertook that it would not introduce any other legislation except two items on today's order paper, Government Notices of Motion Nos. 5 and 6, which merely give legislative effect to those items in the supplementary estimates which had to do with the civil service and mounted police pensions and the extension of the date for rebates under a tax act. No legislation, other than those two items, will be presented.

On the adjournment of the House tomorrow night the Government would move it stand adjourned until Monday, April 26, at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that it is essentially because of the humanitarian nature of this group, its feeling for the members of the staff, the ladies and gentlemen of the press gallery and others who inhabit those precincts, that we are quite willing to agree to this arrangement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Then it is so ordered by the House.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cashin for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, as is the custom in this House, my first words must be words of congratulation to the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. The hon. Member for St. John's West and the hon. Member for St. Maurice-Laflèche did a noble job with the very sketchy material with which they had to work.

The Speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker, reminds me of a Mexican game—I forget the name—in which they have a paper bag full of goodies at Christmas time. The participants in the game bang it around until they have broken it and out fall all the candies and goodies. The Prime Minister and his cabinet remind me of this game. They have broken this bag and out have fallen the candies and goodies, the absolute sop for the Canadian electorate.

The Liberal Party came to power almost two years ago with a number of slogans, such as "The Liberals have all the answers." A reading of the Speech from the Throne must have caused great disappointment to Canadians and to the backbenchers on the other side. It must have been disillusioning to the thousands who supported the brave words "60 days of decision", and "a time to test the strong, excite the daring and give new promise to the timid". Over the last two years—it will be two years on April 23 since this Government took office—all we have had have been the affairs which have hit the Government and the Members of the Cabinet, and which have aroused great disillusionment and confusion in the minds of Canadians throughout the country.

We have had, instead of a time to test the strong, a time to test the credulity of Canadians, in that the Prime Minister would allow the conditions to exist which were the subject of the amendment voted upon last Friday. Instead of a new promise for the timid we have had despair for the hopeful thousands. This Government was going to bring a fresh new breeze to the Canadian political scene, but we have had something that has been certainly something less than fresh. It was not long ago that Canadians heard this stirring battle call of the Liberal party, "Let us get Canada moving again". They said we were in the economic doldrums and criticized us severely for the action which was taken in pegging the Canadian dollar. However, we have a perfect example of the policy of retreat and indecision followed by this Government in the answer of the Minister of Finance today when he flatly said that the present rate, that is the 92½ cent dollar, was quite acceptable and they were quite happy with it.

So, instead of these brave promises and new words, we have been given a Speech from the Throne in which all we have is the warmed over leftovers from the last session. We have sections that have been blatantly plagiarized from the Kennedy and Johnson administrations in the United States. I am sure hon. members who saw that program on the C.B.C. last night would have had a laugh or two at the conversation between the Prime Minister and the President. Then to wind up the whole thing we have the amazing, wholesale borrowing from the N.D.P., so much so that one commentator was led to say in a television and radio broadcast that after this Speech from the Throne, all the N.D.P. had left in their platform was anti-Americanism.

What has happened to all those brave words? Where have all those promises gone? Where is this brave new world that was going to be ushered in for Canadians by the Liberal Party? From 1960 to 1963 we have had the Madison Avenue hucksters forming all the catch words, with all the slogans of the Kennedy campaign being parroted by the Prime Minister, the leader of the Liberal Party. For the past year or more the advertising specialists, to whose Edgar Bergen the Prime Minister plays Charlie McCarthy, have been putting the slogans of the Johnson administration directly into his mouth.

Down there across the 49th parallel they have the "great society". Here we have got the "good society". South of the border they have a war on poverty, and so the Liberals declare a war on poverty here. The Americans have a peace corps, and all of a sudden we have a youth corps. And so it goes. I daresay soon we will be having barbecues at 24 Sussex Street. It is a degrading spectacle for the Prime Minister of this country.

There have been moments in his administration when free from the foolish and vacuous image making of his public relations men—and even these have been failing him, according to one prominent member of the Press Gallery whose notable achievement was the publication of another book before this government took over—when we have been able to see the Prime Minister at his best; and we can be forgiven sometimes for wanting to ask, in the vacillations that have occurred between all the other images attempted by the Prime Minister, "Will the real Lester B. Pearson stand up and be identified"?

Mr. Rhéaume: There isn't a real one.

Mr. Nielsen: There isn't a real one, a colleague of mine says. I have heard people, speaking about disillusionment and confusion across the country, say "We would not be in the terrible mess in Ottawa if Pearson were alive."

It is perfectly understandable if Canadians have no confidence in the present Government. They are unable to act decisively. They are unable to act imaginatively in the area of policy, whether it is affecting the economy, labour, immigration, agriculture, or indeed in an area that vitally interests all of us, the area of justice; and in an area which vitally concerns me, my colleague from the Northwest Territories and a good many others on this side of the house, the area of northern development.

Since the change of government there has not been a single new development project undertaken above the 60th parallel. Why? Is it because there exists that fundamental difference between the approach of the Liberals and the approach of the Conservatives in these matters? How can we expect government investment to develop our northern frontiers when we have this grab bag of eye-catching goodies falling out of the paper target the Prime Minister breaks blindly with his pole, as they do during a Mexican Christmas celebration?

The Prime Minister in his speech last Tuesday dealt with this problem in a way that will shock many Canadians. When a housecleaning is clearly in order he resorts to legalisms and to hair splitting, in which all the Cabinet Ministers indulge on almost every occasion when questions are put to them intended to elicit proper information. A man must be en route to the courts before prime ministerial notice is taken of his behaviour.

Prudence and good judgment, discretion in the choice of one's personal associations, probity in one's business transactions—none of this matters, apparently. The Prime Minister has made his decision: there will be no clean up in his cabinet, and we are stuck with it until the government is changed. There will be other opportunities to deal with this question of integrity in high places, and no one will find those on this side of the house loath to take advantage of those opportunities.

Canadians do not have to look far to find the reason for this lack of initiative, the lack of originality in the Speech from the Throne, or to find why the Government of this country has become, as one respected overseas publication has put it, "a rudderless mess." The Cabinet is in disarray because of the pressures exerted not only by a public outcry for a public hearing but by an outcry from all the opposition parties combined. The Cabinet is beset by every manner of division.

Mr. Moreau: Tell us about your divisions.

Mr. Nielsen: I will have a few words for the hon. Member for York-Scarborough about divisions in a minute, if he will contain himself in patience. I am only sorry that a good many of the Cabinet Ministers about whom I am going to be making some remarks are not in their seats this afternoon. It is a Cabinet that is at war with itself. How well we remember the non-confidence motion, moved by the then Leader of the Opposition in February, 1963, referring to divisions in the Cabinet.

The present Cabinet, this present rudderless mess, has more holes in it—I did not say leaks—than any ship of state in this century. I could say it has more leaks in it than in the Progressive Conservative Party caucus, and that is saying something.

Mr. Graffiey: Explain.

Mr. Nielsen: Almost a year ago a responsible correspondent, a columnist of the Montreal Star, Mr. W. A. Wilson put it this way:

> The underlying problem...seems to be that Mr. Pearson has so far failed to weld his Cabinet into a team—despite the 1962 election slogan touting the "Pearson team." Members of a team do not normally scupper their colleagues in Mr. Tremblay's reckless fashion nor embarrass important causes as Miss LaMarsh did through her electioneering. It would be unjust to suggest that these are disloyal people but in a very practical way they are lacking in true loyalty to the ministry to which they belong because they fail to weigh their private inclinations against the public good.

Well, that failure is still with the Prime Minister, but we understand his failure better now. You can't build a team, and even he can't build a team, with nothing to work with.

As I watched this strife-torn Cabinet day after day my eyes often wandered beyond the treasury benches to all that talent on the backbenches, all those capable and intelligent backbenchers on the other side both men and women, waiting for their turn, a turn that will never come because the Liberal old guard is still holding the reins. The old guard of that party has triumphed, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister is their captive and their advocate.

What a sense of frustration must overcome all those ambitious Members behind the treasury benches. I think of one in particular, the hon. Member for Renfrew South (Mr. Greene). Here is a Member who looks on with envy each day this house sits, when he observes the conduct and the machinations of those who occupy the treasury benches today. He thinks to himself "How much better I could do it if I were the leader, the Prime Minister."

Mr. Moreau: Would the hon. Member permit a question?

Mr. Nielsen: Another hon. Member over there is the hon. Member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Moreau), and I will allow a question if I still have time after I am through. I know he is one of those intelligent, young, aggressive backbenchers on the Liberal side looking forward to new horizons for himself, but they will never come because the old boys are in the saddle and they are not going to get out.

• (2:50 p.m.)

One need look no further than the treasury benches to witness examples of frustration. The Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé), who I understand has gone on an extended vacation, has been ready, willing and able to take the initiative in cleaning up the party, especially in his own Province, even though he would be facing a herculean task in that regard. But he has been kept down. He has been smothered by the Minister of Justice, by the Secretary of State, by the Postmaster General, and finally by the Prime Minister himself. I think the Minister of Transport is perhaps beyond ambition for leadership these days.

The Brandon Sun put it this way almost a year ago; conditions have not changed and I quote from that publication:

Young, forceful, frank and politically appealing, he is an avowed member of the Liberal Party's left wing who, it has been suggested had hitherto been held down in the party ranks by more reactionary elements.

A more recent comment came on March 20 of this year in La Presse under the by-line of Pierre O'Neil, who described graphically and at length the complete fragmentation of the Liberal Cabinet. I have a translation of the article here. It is lengthy and I do not intend to read it all, but the subheading reads:

Maurice Lamontagne is on the brink of resignation; Maurice Sauvé is 'on the outs' with the Prime Minister; only the Minister of Justice, Guy Favreau, retains a bit of enthusiasm.

What a description. The article says:

The Quebec wing of the Pearson Cabinet is in full rout. Mr. Maurice Lamontagne almost resigned recently. Mr. Maurice Sauvé is 'on the outs' with the Prime Minister who has turned a deaf ear toward him. Mr. Guy Favreau, the Minister of Justice is the only one of the three Quebec generals to keep some enthusiasm despite the extremely hard blows that he has taken recently.

The caucus, it goes without saying, is also tossed about by the tempest. The ship is going around in circles, not knowing in whom to repose its trust.

People are familiar with the old story of politicians going around in circles. The Prime Minister of this country is as capable of doing so as is the Secretary of State for External Affairs. That is all he does; he goes round in circles and stands foursquare for everything. The article goes on:

In this climate is born the rumour insisting that Mr. Lucien Cardin is gaining stature in cabinet deliberations and that he will be in his turn an important Quebec spokesman.

It is not easy to evaluate all that has happened recently which has revealed this crisis. It is still less easy to predict where all this will lead the Cabinet, and the caucus. Above all it is not easy to know how the Federal Liberal Party in Quebec will extricate itself from these convulsions.

We all know the end product of convulsions.

The case of Mr. Lamontagne is typical.

As for the tensions between Messrs. Favreau and Sauvé, they resulted from their different conceptions of what should be done in Quebec to reinforce the party and to make it responsive to the important changes which have happened these past years in the Quebec political society.

The Secretary of State is just recovering from the hard blows which have been struck him in the House on the subject of the famous furniture affair. This volley of blows came down on a man who has not ceased to receive such blows since he entered politics.

And so the article goes on, a massive indictment of the confusion and indecision which exists within this Cabinet. There is the former Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, the present Postmaster General. Let me simply quote from the Toronto Telegram. What an asset this Minister is to the Cabinet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nielsen: Members should withhold their applause until they hear what Mr. Fraser Kelly of the Telegram has to say about this hon. gentleman:

The switch of controversial René Tremblay from Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has sparked bitter resentment among Canadian postal workers.

The implications are crystal clear. In the Canadian cabinet the portfolio of Postmaster General is the ultimate disgrace, the Outer Siberia, cries an editorial in the Canadian Postal Worker, a civil service publication.

We, in public estimation, are so low on the totem pole that we have sunk into the mire. We are fit only to be headed by some incompetent.

Under a thick red headline stating We Protest, the editorial asks isn't it time that a cabinet be thought of as a team of experts. . .not a party grab-bag with juicy plums for some and bitter quince for one unfortunate other.

The news story in the Telegram continues, quoting the Canadian Postal Worker as follows:

To those of us who have considered the keeping open of the lines of communication a worthy calling, to those of us who have taken pride in the handling of the Royal Mail, the implications of the situation have come as a blow.

A foul wet rag across the face could have carried no greater impact.

That is what the employees of the Minister's Department feel about this Minister. So one need not wonder why the Canadian public came to the same conclusion.

How well we remember the cries when the former Government was in office that Canada's reputation had suffered abroad. I wonder whether hon. gentlemen opposite have been reading the overseas press lately about the aura of uncertainty that surrounds the Cabinet, about scandal and the lack of leadership in Canada. That is what these publications are saying. Have they heard about the Gallup poll in Great Britain which showed that the British people regarded the United States as their number one friend, with Australia number two and Canada third? That is a condition which did not exist when the Conservatives were in office.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

While this fumbling and bumbling is going on over there, serious situations are arising and the Government is failing to deal with them.

We heard the Prime Minister's new politics described in January of 1964 in the course of a national bilingual television broadcast. Well, having seen them in action on the Canadian political scene, I say we have had enough of these new politics. He has recently been touring the country whimpering and whining about the Opposition, saying we are obstructing, filibustering and preventing his new politics from being implemented. This is the same right hon. gentleman who, when he was Leader of the Opposition in September, 1962, speaking to the Young Liberals in Toronto, used some of the most disgraceful language I have heard any person use against a Prime Minister of this country, referring to falsehood, gross deception and deceit. Then we have Cabinet Ministers opposite like the Minister of Justice who complain and whimper when somebody else says a statement is false. Where do we go in Canada? The conduct of the Cabinet is not such as to warrant confidence either at home or abroad.

The Minister of Health and Welfare—I am sorry she is not in the house today—has indulged in hobbies from the anti-smoking campaign, which is getting nowhere, to the defence of some, if not all, of the members of her sex as is reported in the Toronto Star of November 5, 1964. I quote from that article.

Winnipeg—Health Minister Judy LaMarsh yesterday criticized Opposition Leader Diefenbaker, Manitoba Premier Duff Roblin and people who question the intelligence of large bosomed women. Miss LaMarsh at a press conference was asked about an American scientist who recently said that small bosomed women have the highest intelligence quotients.

Then the paper quotes the hon. Lady as saying:

"A bosom size doesn't prove a damn thing about my brains".

I am happy that the hon. Lady was so frank with the press. A year ago it was reported that the Minister had threatened to resign because she was being excluded from secret consultations between those at the federal level and those at the Quebec level concerning the design of the pension plan. The Montreal Gazette had this to say:

The gesture is said to have been made in protest over the primary responsibility for Canada Pension Plan planning transferred out of her hands, and over the Federal Government's decision to adopt a new pension scheme embodying many of the features of the Quebec pension legislation. Miss LaMarsh was not a key figure at the Quebec conference, at which federal plans underwent a drastic change.

We all know, Mr. Speaker, which Minister in the Cabinet carried the bill through this House, and it was not the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The Minister's troubles are not confined only to pensions, but I do not want to elaborate any further with respect to her troubles except to say, in connection with this brave new world of politics that the Prime Minister is ushering in, that according to the Vancouver Province for December 5 the Minister is reported to have said:

"Sit down, shut up and let the matter come to a vote", yelled Health Minister Judy LaMarsh to Tory M.P. Deane Gundlock in Parliament the other day, and no doubt the suffragettes of yore revolved in their graves.

The Minister went to Montreal to make a speech one month later, and on January 14, 1965 the Montreal Star carried this headline:

Judy LaMarsh counsels tact in debating Canada's future.

That is her idea of tact, Mr. Speaker. The Secretary of State for External Affairs—I see only two Cabinet Ministers in the house at the moment, and they are probably the only two who have no leadership ambitions on that side—who retired from politics long ago, does not get mixed up in anything so blasé as party wrangling and politics nowadays. First there was the appointment to a Senate vacancy. It was assumed that this would go to one of two candidates for the job in Essex county. But the Minister has been paying so little attention to politics lately that he let the old home town down. Here is a quote from the Windsor Star for November 16:

From charges of obstructionism to disarmament and Communist China, Canada's Minister of External Affairs, Paul Martin, covered a wide range of topics Saturday evening in Belle River.

Missing in his remarks however was any reference to the recent Senate appointment. Dissension and anger have been reported in the Liberal party ranks in Essex county because the appointment was not given to a local Liberal.

Addressing himself to the Chinese government, he said—

—and so on. How familiar we all are in this House with the Minister's technique. The good people of Belle River in the Minister's constituency wanted to hear about Essex county and about a Senator from that county. And what does the Secretary of State for External Affairs do? He addresses himself to the subject of China and the Chinese government.

Then there are other quotes from the national press about the doings of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. There was one in the Daily Colonist of November 8 concerning the leader of the Social Credit Party, which is as follows:

Some Liberal backbenchers are reported to be just as disturbed privately as opposition M.P.'s have been publicly about External Affairs Minister Martin's handling of Social Credit Leader Thompson's current Africa trip.

Then speaking of international images, about a year ago there was a report concerning the NATO ministerial conference, when another distinguished gentleman of the fourth estate, Warner Troyer, writing in the Vancouver Sun had this to say.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to have to interrupt the hon. Member but his time has expired, unless he has the unanimous consent of the House to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Nielsen: Then if I have unanimous consent—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member does not have the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, among other things apparently the hearing of the hon. Member for Yukon is not functioning very well this afternoon. May I begin by expressing my congratulations to the hon. Member for St. John's West and to the hon. Member for St. Maurice-Laflèche who moved and seconded the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

During the course of this debate, notwithstanding what we have just heard, there have been many excellent speeches; and while I do not wish to single out any particular members when I say this, I think I would be remiss if I did not make special mention of the speech delivered in this House by the hon. Member for Westmorland (Mrs. Rideout). I say that, Mr. Speaker, because I think the hon. Lady delivered a very informative and interesting speech respecting a number of national problems, as well as displaying an obvious grasp of the conditions and problems within her own constituency.

Some of the hon. Members who were here last session will know that the City of Moncton in New Brunswick and the City of Medicine Hat are twinned for the centennial celebrations which will be held during 1967. During that time there are plans under way, I understand, to exchange a number of students between these two cities. There are also plans to exchange some of the civic officials for a period of time so we can have an opportunity to learn more about cities in other regions of Canada.

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Are you exchanging Members too?

Mr. Olson: The hon. Member for Lake St. John asks me if we are going to exchange Members. I do not think the people in Moncton would appreciate it if we went that far, but we do intend to work out an arrangement where we can exchange a speech or two. In other words I will attempt to select some particular matter of special interest to people in her constituency and deliver a speech on it, and she will do the same in the Medicine Hat constituency. After having heard the way she is able to address herself to this house I think perhaps Medicine Hat will get the best of this exchange.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Olson: I am pleased to note the applause I get from the Tory Party; it is not often that that happens. As a matter of fact I do not think they will applaud what I am about to say now, and that is that having heard the speech of the hon. Member for Yukon I think at some time they should try some new kind of tactic; because the discourse we have just heard is a clear indication to me that we can expect some more rumblings very soon from within the Progressive Conservative Party. You would think, Mr. Speaker, that these members would try something new, because diversionary tactics are a very old trick to try to focus attention on somebody else's problem or to create a border incident while their own difficulties are coming to the surface. So as I say I presume that this is the harbinger of some further rumblings within the Tory Party.

• (3:10 p.m.)

This afternoon I am not going to speak for the maximum time allowed a Member because I want to discuss only two particular matters which are referred to in the Speech from the Throne. The first is related to matters of procedure and organization of this House; the other relates to that paragraph which is devoted to agricultural matters.

[Mr. Olson.]

Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne in part states:

> My Ministers believe that it is imperative to reform the procedures of the House of Commons in order that it may accomplish the large volume of work required to meet the needs of the Canadian people in modern times.

Then it goes on to state:

> My Ministers therefore will submit to you proposals for reform, based both on the valuable work of your Committee on Procedure and Organization and on my Government's study of the procedures—

I am sure if you review some of the speeches which have been made both inside and outside this House by the leaders of various political parties including the Prime Minister and the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition you will find that there seems to be general agreement that something ought to be done about modernizing the rules and procedures of debate in this House. After the Committee was set up two years ago and reconstituted in March of 1964, there was not really as much accomplished by way of results from the studies and recommendations of that Committee as could be expected, particularly in view of the apparent disposition of all parties to modernize our rules.

This Committee on Procedure and Organization met during the last session on at least 50 occasions. In addition there were dozens of meetings of subcommittees which discussed certain aspects of the procedures of this House. While I am thankful and grateful that some of the measures suggested have been accepted on an interim basis, there certainly was not the so-called bold, new and imaginative approach to parliamentary reform which we were led to believe was both warranted and acceptable.

I should like to suggest to the President of the Privy Council that in spite of the fact that we were more or less sabotaged or scuttled in so far as our Committee reports were concerned during the dying minutes of the last session, there is a way to revive some of those reports if there is a disposition on the part of the Government to do so. Citation 320 (3) of Beauchesne's third edition states:

> As to the report of a committee presented during a previous session, motion must first be made that it be considered during the current session, and, if such a motion is carried, the House may appoint a day for consideration of the report.

Then it goes on to state:

> A report may be adopted only in part or an amendment imposing a condition to the motion for concurrence may be moved.

That clearly sets out that a report which has been submitted to the House by a committee established during a previous session can be brought in at a following session for approval or on a motion for concurrence, providing the Government is willing to take that step. It is my opinion that I, as Chairman of one of the subcommittees and the Member who moved concurrence in the reports numbered 18 and 19 on behalf of the whole Committee, could make such a motion but, of course, it would be buried along with a great number of other private members' motions. If the Government was serious and intended to change some of the rules of this House in order that we can complete the tremendous volume of business with a certain degree of order and dispatch, it could revive these two Committee reports and have them debated and, I would hope, subsequently passed during this third session of the twenty sixth parliament.

If the Government was ready and willing to do this, Mr. Speaker, it could appoint a day, as is set out clearly in citation 320, for the purpose of passing these two reports. If the conditions and recommendations contained in reports Nos. 18 and 19 are acceptable to the Government, surely this would be a far better way of bringing about these reforms than by bringing forward a completely new Government motion. I say that because of the obvious fact that these reports were developed, worked out, compromised, written and rewritten by a Committee made up of members of all five political parties in this House. Surely that would be more acceptable to this House than a new Government motion which would almost automatically receive the opposition of many Members in the Opposition.

Reports Nos. 18 and 19 deal with changes to Standing Order No. 65, to realign the Standing Committees of this House, and with Standing Order No. 56, which deals with the limitation of time in debating the main estimates in this House. These involve major reforms which have received support from at least some Members of all the parties in this House. Therefore it seems to me that it would be highly desirable for the Government to take the course open to them under citation 320 of Beauchesne.

The Members of the Special Committee on Procedure and Organization spent many weeks, in fact several months, meeting several times each week studying these reforms and drafting these reports. The committee took into account the various opinions and suggestions in writing the reports and arriving at compromises so they would at least in some measure meet the approval of Members from all parties. I hope the Government will take this course of action which is open to it. I am not suggesting that it will be going far enough in this regard, but this will at least permit the establishment of standing committees of this House in such a way that they will be in a position to receive and deal with all the estimates of the Departments of Government.

Standing Order No. 65, as it is now constructed, does not in effect allow all estimates of all Departments to be referred. The old committee on estimates could perhaps be a catch-all committee to deal with those estimates which cannot appropriately be referred to specific committees. That is not what we intended, nor is it the way most Members of this House feel these estimates should be referred to committees.

Mr. Speaker, for these reasons I make the very positive suggestion to the Prime Minister and the President of the Privy Council that a major step forward toward the modernization of our rules could be taken by following the course open under citation 320. The reports of the Committee are now before us. They have already been approved by the Members of the Committee on Procedure and Organization, and it would be very easy for the Government to reinstitute them for consideration at this Session.

The other subject to which I wish to refer is that covered by this part of the Throne Speech:

> My Government is developing new policies to enable farmers generally to achieve larger and more reliable incomes so that their living and working standards will be comparable to those enjoyed in other sectors of our economy.

• (3:20 p.m.)

I suggest it is about time, Mr. Speaker, that a concerted effort was made by the federal Government to do something about the price structure for the primary producers of food, or the primary producers of groceries, as the Minister of Agriculture has said on a number of occasions. I do not wish to downgrade in any way the very useful amendments that have been made to the Farm Credit Act, the Farm Improvement Loans Act and the new Farm Machinery Syndicates Loans Act, but we have reached the end of what we can do to assist farmers by increasing the maximum amounts of credit available. In fact, in my opinion we have already gone too far in many cases, in that there are extensions of credit to farmers in various parts of Canada far beyond their ability to repay the money within a reasonable length of time.

I suggest further that these extensions of farm credit, which are burying farmers deeper and deeper in debt, gloss over the real problem, which is the whole structure of the prices that farmers receive for the goods they produce. The new dairy policy announced a few days ago by the Minister of Agriculture is useful. It at least sets a pattern of first of all increasing and then holding up the price of milk used for manufacturing purposes, and this is in addition to the butter support price which has been in effect for a number of years. But this is only one sector of primary production in the field of agriculture, and I simply say that it is a step in the right direction.

I am not going to refer to a lot of statistics, Mr. Speaker, but it has been said that 70 per cent of the farmers of Canada have incomes of less than $2,500. This should illustrate forcefully that the industry in general is badly in need of some revitalization. A survey by the Ontario Federation of Labour showed that 27 per cent of Ontario's farm families or 131,000 people are in a state of abject poverty with net incomes of $600 for a family of four. Sixteen per cent of Ontario's farm families or 72,000 people are living at a subsistence level with incomes between $600 and $1,250. Twenty two per cent of Ontario's farm families, with incomes between $1,250 and $2,250, lack the necessities of life.

Dr. Travis Manning, head of the Department of Agricultural Economics of the University of Alberta, in a survey based on figures from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, shows that in Alberta only 3 per cent of the farms have gross sales of over $25,000, while 11 per cent have gross sales between $10,000 and $24,000, 22 per cent have gross sales between $5,000 and $9,999, and 64 per cent have gross sales of less than $5,000. These figures illustrate that relatively few farms have gross sales sufficient to assure an adequate income.

Very recently there was a decline in the price of Canadian wheat because of a lowering of the price in the international market. A recent issue of the Western Producer, which is published in Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, had this to say about the situation:

> Faced with the stark fact of declining prices and the strongest competitive conditions they have encountered for many years, western Canadian producers are worried. Their worries are justified, as we have noted, for they are literally the only producers in the world whose governments in the past have expected them to weather on their own the storms of declining prices in the export market.

I am not one of those Members, Mr. Speaker, who think that all sectors of the Canadian economy should run to the Government every time they are in a little difficulty. I think I am perhaps as much of a free enterpriser by nature as any Member of the House. But, Mr. Speaker, the whole price structure of Canadian farm products is based on the surplus and dumping prices in the international market of all other countries in the world. The price that our own people pay for wheat is exactly the same as the lowest price that is available anywhere in the world. This also applies to sugar and to many other farm products.

There is no other developed nation that does not make some special arrangement for insulating their own domestic food market from the dumping prices of other countries in the international market. The Minister of Agriculture, for example, has said that in Great Britain 7.5 per cent of the national budget is used to maintain and support the price structure of the farm products of that country. In the United States, Denmark, Sweden, Norway and France 8.2 per cent of the national budgets are used to maintain and support the prices of agricultural products grown in those countries. In Canada the figure is 3 per cent.

I might point out that this becomes even more significant when you realize that in the United States and Great Britain, for example, the percentage of their contributions to the armament of the western world is also substantially higher than that of Canada. I suggest that if we look at some of the statistics respecting the change in the prices that farmers receive for what they grow in relation to the cost of what they have to buy, and in relation to the increased incomes of people in almost every other sector, the picture becomes even more alarming and adds further justification to the fact that some concerted effort should be made now by the Federal Government to, as they say in the Speech from the Throne, "achieve larger and more reliable incomes" for farmers.

For example, on a number of occasions we have heard the Minister of Agriculture say that in 1964 farmers had a higher total gross income than at any other time in history. I think he mentioned a figure of approxmiately $3.4 billion. That may be fine on a basis of gross returns, but when you place that alongside the increased cost of production and the fact that some of the sales were out of inventory, it does not look quite so good. When I refer to sales out of inventory I want to make it abundantly clear that a large part of the money that went into the total gross sales came from wheat that was sold in 1964 but was actually produced in 1963.

• (3:30 p.m.)

The Dominion Bureau of Statistics, in a publication issued in March, 1965, deals with farm net income for 1964 and gives figures for the net income of farm operators from farming operations for the years 1962 to 1964. In 1962 this figure was $1,627 million. That was net income, not gross income. In 1963 this had risen to $1,654 million. By 1964, Mr. Speaker, it had dropped down to $1,432 million. So, Mr. Speaker, in spite of 1964 being the year with the highest gross farm income, there was a decline of over $200 million in net farm income as compared with the previous year. This is not satisfactory any more.

Another point I should like to make is this, especially when we are talking about subsidies. I asked the then Minister of National Revenue in July, 1963 for a complete breakdown of subsidies paid to agriculture producers. If you look over this list you will find that out of the $71 million paid out during the year ending March 31, 1963, $42 million was paid under the butter support program. I wonder if it is fair to call this butter price support program a farm subsidy. It seems to me it would be just as fair to call it a consumer subsidy. We know that the Government is in fact subsidizing the price of butter to the Canadian consumer to the tune of 12 cents a pound. The subsidy is paid through the Department of Agriculture, but it is certainly of direct benefit to the consumer of butter in Canada. If you deduct that consumer subsidy it leaves the total Canadian Government support for farm produce in all sectors at less than $30 million for that year.

I have another publication before me called the Economic Analyst, published in August, 1964, by the Department of Agriculture. This publication shows that in April, 1964, the latest month for which figures were available, the price index, that is all farm prices for agricultural products, has risen to 245.8 based on 100 equalling the period from 1935 to 1939. During the same month the prices of commodities and services used by farmers had risen to 309.9. You have to go back to 1948 before you can find a period when the average of prices received by farmers was less than it was last year. There were one or two years, 1954, 1955 and 1956, when it was approximately the same as the index for April, 1964, but to find a substantially lower amount you have to go back before 1948, some 17 years ago.

In spite of the fact that there has been no substantial increase in the prices farmers have received for their goods and services, particularly for the primary goods they produce, namely food, there has been almost a doubling in the cost of those things which are required by farmers, that is commodities and services. I hope, therefore, there is a determination on the part of Government, as indicated in the Speech from the Throne, to do something finally to upgrade the whole price structure and provide it with some reliability. Credit is no longer the answer. We have now to provide our farmers with an opportunity of repaying some of the credit extended to them during the past few years.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not care who gets the credit for it. I give the Progressive Conservatives full marks for all the things they did that were beneficial and useful to the farmer. I give also, to the Liberals, full credit for all the things they did that were beneficial to the agricultural sector of our economy. But really none of the policies have been able to get at the root of the problem, that is this competition from the dumping of surplus products from other nations in the world. As I said at the outset, other countries in the world have insulated their domestic market against these surplus pricing arrangements.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I hope there will be a concentration of the effort of all parties, of all members of all parties, to get on with correcting this problem which is so old, and I am not concerned about who gets credit for it.

Mr. Robert Temple (Hastings South): Mr. Speaker, may I preface my remarks by complimenting the Mover, the hon. Member for St. John's West and Seconder, the hon. Member for St. Maurice-Laflèche of the Address in Reply for the excellent job they did and the eloquent and expressive way in which they made their remarks. I join with the hon. Member for Medicine Hat in complimenting the hon. Member for Westmorland upon her excellent speech in this debate last week. She showed a clear insight into the problems of the country as well as a great knowledge of her own constituency.

It would be nice, Mr. Speaker, if we could compliment everyone in this House all the time, everyone in Canada and everyone on the international scene. Of course this is not possible. We have a great many troubles in the world today, and on the international scene certainly not the least of them is Viet Nam. In the past there has been a tendency to say that the United States should stop acting as international policeman and should pull out of South Viet Nam. It would be very nice if the need were not there for an international policeman. However, the facts of international life today are such that we, as Canadians, are very fortunate in having a friendly ally such as the United States willing to take on the responsibilities it has assumed for international affairs.

When people say that the United States should get out of Viet Nam or get out of this country or that country, I suppose what they are saying is, let these people determine for themselves; these people can and will determine things for themselves. This would be all well and good if these people were allowed to follow the process of self-determination. We do not need to look very far. Let us look at Poland. Did the people of Poland have the right of self-determination? No. Did the people of Hungary, after the war, have the right of self-determination? Again the answer is no. The people of Rumania; did they have that right, or the people of Bulgaria? Of course the people of Czechoslovakia in 1948 were not given the right or opportunity to determine their own course, because their democratic government was overthrown by a coup by a minority party. Well, if the United States were to pull out of South Viet Nam without making provision for an absolutely free self-determination by the people of South Viet Nam, then the same old pattern would repeat itself.

I welcome, as I am sure all do, the détente in Western Europe, although the events of the past week in Berlin make me rather wonder if this is going to be a continuing détente. We have welcomed it during the last two years, and it is not time yet for us to let our defences down. In my opinion it is always best to bargain from a position of strength.

I hope that this can be brought about in South Viet Nam so the South Vietnamese will have the right of really free self-determination. Of course I welcome also what was announced by the President of the United States last week, that the United States is willing to put in and will put in up to $1 billion of economic aid in that troubled area. I also compliment our Government very much for going along with that and saying Canada will share part of that burden.

If, Mr. Speaker, the United States pulls out without having brought about these negotiations, if it pulls out its military forces from South Viet Nam, what will happen? It will be like a game of dominoes; the whole thing will collapse. I suggest Laos will be next, and Cambodia. Then will go Thailand and no doubt Burma. Then will come Malaysia, but it is hoped it can be contained there. It is less than 20 years ago that the war in the Pacific came to an end. That war was fought, as I understand and believe it, to stop the spread of another type of imperialism throughout the Pacific. So let us not let that happen again.

I was particularly annoyed and upset a week ago Sunday night at a program called "This Hour Has Seven Days." Mr. Speaker, Voltaire said that a man has a perfect right to say what he believes in, no matter how much one may disagree with him, and I subscribe to that. But if this program has the right to say what it does surely I, as a Member of Parliament have the right to say what I am going to say about it. It depicted the American in South Viet Nam as a stupid, sadistic moron who did not know anything except torture and war, and disregarded everything else. I take very strong exception to that program which I consider had either no taste or certainly was in very bad taste.

In my opinion the Minister of Justice is to be highly complimented and congratulated for the decision to introduce legislation that will provide an Ombudsman for Canada. Having read the Minister's speeches on this subject for the past several weeks, I understand it will be the task of the Ombudsman to protect the rights of the individual Canadian. This is terribly, terribly important. What distinguishes us from other, non-democratic governments is our basic desire to protect the individual and the individual's rights. Therefore I say the Minister is to be complimented on this decision.

Something which I am not so happy about is a bill introduced in a provincial legislature during the last few days concerning wire tapping. It is called a bill to prevent wire tapping, but instead of being a bill to prevent wire tapping it gives the authorities the opportunity to obtain an order from a federal judge, if they are able to give him evidence that they have reasonable grounds to suspect somebody may be committing or conspiring to commit a crime. Any hon. Member who is a lawyer, and a good many hon. Members who are not, will realize it is not too difficult to present a case to a judge showing you have reasonable grounds to suspect something, and thus be able to get an order. The part I especially do not like, apart from the very fact of wire tapping itself, is that the bill provides for a secret order that can go on month to month, and in fact provides it is an offence for anyone to disclose publicly that such an order has been obtained. Making such information public is to be punishable by a fine and/or imprisonment.

I made my maiden speech in this House two years ago, and in closing stated I was very concerned that the liberty and freedom of the individual be retained, and that it not be whittled away. There has been no change in my feelings since then, nor will there be in the future. I realize of course that this is becoming a more and more complex civilization and society. I also realize the dangers of organized crime; but I believe this provincial legislation is an attempt to reach a proper end by improper means. We are trying to protect society and the individual in the wrong way. What is in effect being done —not by this House, thank goodness—is a whittling away of the liberties of the individual.

Mr. Brewin: Would the hon. Member permit a question?

Mr. Temple: When I am finished I would be very happy to have the hon. Member for Greenwood ask me a question.

Mr. Brewin: I thought possibly while you were on this topic.

Mr. Temple: I would also like to congratulate the Government for including a statement in the Throne Speech that there will be a free debate on capital punishment. At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I must say I am in favour of the abolition of capital punishment. It used to be in the days when Babylon was at the height of its power and grandeur that the old maxim of "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth" was generally accepted. We would have thought that over the years we would have grown away from that, but instead of that adage being accepted or not being accepted, as we went along things became worse.

When Rome was at the height of its power, a good many hundreds of years after Babylon, the crime of parricide was punished by sewing the condemned in a sack with a dog, a cock, a viper and an ape, and throwing them all into the sea.

Then we come to the eighth century in England and one would think we should have been progressing, but I doubt that very much so because there they had ordeals by fire and water. In ordeal by fire the accused carried a red hot iron around in his hand for a certain length of time. In ordeal by water you placed your arm up to your wrist or elbow in boiling water for a period of some minutes. The hand was then bandaged and kept bound for three days—I suppose they had no antiseptics—and after they removed the bandage, if your hand or arm had not healed you were guilty. The crown attorneys of that time must have had a real field day.

We now come to the time of the Puritans in the seventeenth century. In England in 1650 a law was passed by parliament making adultery punishable by death, and this savage sentence was actually carried out in two or three cases. But then it became a fact that even Puritans would not convict for this, and the law was repealed. I think it was rather remarkable that the law was repealed so quickly, because usually a criminal law is not repealed until many years after it has gone into disuse and is not looked upon with favour by the public. The people in the England of the sixteenth, seventeenth or eighteenth centuries were not more stupid than the people who live in England and Canada today, but there was a tradition in force there, and this tradition could not keep up with the facts. Mr. Speaker, because something is widely believed does not necessarily mean that it is true. Prior to the time of William Harvey in the seventeenth century people thought the arteries were filled with air, and that there was no such thing as the circulation of the blood. Even after he had proved his theory of blood circulation people condemned him and said he was a heretic.

In the eighteenth century no less than 240 different offences were punishable by death in England. I am sure the Government of that day was trying to cut down the number of crimes of all types. Between 1525 and 1550 it is reported that 72,000 people were executed in England. But crimes of violence did not cease; on the contrary, they increased. They got worse. Gradually people began to realize that it is not possible to have a completely harsh outlook on life and then expect people to act in a refined, decent and honest way.

This is my point. I do not believe capital punishment is any deterrent to murder. I will not take the time of the House now by going into statistics; we shall have an opportunity to do that at a later date. But I am unable to find any states or countries where the abolition of capital punishment has led to an increase in the ratio of crimes. I am not saying it leads to a decrease; I am saying it has no effect at all.

What we are doing when we put someone to death at a definite hour on a certain appointed day is this. We are debasing all of ourselves, all of society. When we put a man to death that is what we are doing; we are shaming and degrading ourselves. If it were not so why do we do it so furtively, at midnight behind closed walls? If there is to be a real deterrent effect, bring these things out into the open and let us have a real circus; sell the beer and the hot dogs and have people jumping around waving flags, whatever they might be, and let the condemned man say his last words.

Mr. Patterson: That is plain stupid.

Mr. Scott: What is?

Mr. Patterson: What he is saying.

Mr. Temple: If the hon. Member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson) wishes to express his views he will have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. Scott: It is a good speech. Keep it up.

Mr. Temple: I am saying that capital punishment is not a deterrent. Because the majority of people may believe it is, doesn't mean it is true. When I am told I am stupid I am reminded of Cesare de Beccaria, an Italian nobleman of the eighteenth century who put forward what were, in those days, advanced views on crime and criminology; they are probably not so advanced today. However, he was denounced by his enemies, and they were many, as being stupid, as seducing the public and promoting revolution.

Any time a man puts forward a new idea there will always be others to say he is stupid and knows no better. That may be. I do not profess to know all the answers, but I do know how I feel. In closing, I would say on this subject of capital punishment that life imprisonment should mean life imprisonment. If someone is sentenced to life imprisonment because of a capital crime, it should mean exactly that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Temple.]

Mr. Temple: I have enjoyed this opportunity to get on my feet and make these few remarks. I hope they have been thought provoking. I enjoyed the interest some people have taken.

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): I appreciate this opportunity to take part in the debate. I preface my remarks by saying to the Speaker, the Deputy Speaker and to the Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten) that I hope you will all continue to enjoy the good health you have enjoyed during the marathon session just completed, and that you will continue to show the patience of Job and the judgment of Solomon during the months to come, as you have during the gloomy events of the last 14 months.

I should like to congratulate, too, the Mover and Seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Though young in years they have displayed a rare maturity of judgment without having lost the idealism of youth. Young men of that calibre will go far in the service of their country.

We have had a Government which has been at the helm of the ship of state for almost two years, longer than it had ever expected. During that time it has presented three Speeches from the Throne. This is the third, and like all such speeches it gives some indication of the Government's plans for the coming session. The present Speech is longer by far than its two predecessors. It contains no less than 58 items of business as far as I have been able to determine, and this from a Government which has been suffering from a bankruptcy of ideas. I believe it is still suffering from a bankruptcy of ideas, but 58 items of business represent quite an order.

Some of these items in the Speech from the Throne are worthy of consideration. Some are original and others have been borrowed from other parties. Together they make up this wonderful bag of gimmicks, tricks and promises which the Government dangles in front of the Canadian people. When the hon. Member for Villeneuve was asked to comment on the Speech from the Throne the day it was delivered he said, over the C.B.C., that there were so many promises in it that we would have to work for the next two years, so there would be no election before that time. In the light of the methods this Government has used in planning its legislative program it might take even longer than that unless, as I believe, the Government has in mind giving us merely an election manifesto hoping that opposition parties will get together and give it the boot. Then they can go before the electorate and say "Look at all the goodies we had to offer you; now we cannot provide them because the wicked Opposition would not let us proceed."

I feel this House should give the Government an opportunity to carry out these plans for this Session regardless of how long it takes. After all, we have had one record breaking Session, and we could have another. They came into office on several election slogans and promises.

Let me bring you back, Mr. Speaker, to 1962 and 1963 and the 60 days of decision. Yes, in 60 days there were going to be visible improvements in all facets of the Canadian economy. Divide and rule was another method used, making different promises in the west from those in Central Canada and Eastern Canada. But the main platform was that the wicked Tories were driving the country into bankruptcy by devaluating the dollar. We all remember this, and I think the Government can stand to be reminded on this score. Today that "Diefendollar" seems to be pretty sound currency for the troubled Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon).

Another favourite expression used by the Pearson team was "Get the economy moving". What was the state of the economy during the Conservative administration? On this subject I am going to quote an authority, a Minister of the Crown, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh), whose opinions at rare times are worth repeating. On April 5, 1965 she spoke to the Women's Club of Montreal, and according to the Ottawa Journal had this to say:

> I feel that we can now say with pride that we have lived up to this our most important promise... the usual economic downturn has been avoided in the current business cycle and Canada is now in its fifth year of almost unbroken economic development.

To anyone who can even count on his toes the Minister stated that the economy had been rising for the past five years. This statement was made in 1965, so the economy started to go upwards in 1960, a time when the Liberals were far, far away from even becoming the government of this nation. Is that not an admission that this slogan or cry of "Get our economy moving" was just an election gimmick, something to try and fool the people?

I will quote no other authority than the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon), who the Gazette for March 13, 1964 quotes as follows:

> Finance Minister Gordon says he detects no signs of weakening in the current economic upswing which now has lasted three full years.

So that in 1964 it had already lasted three full years. Therefore it was in full swing in 1961. Where were the Liberals in 1961? They were in the wilderness and they are in the wilderness today.

We have had admissions from the Minister of Finance that the devalued dollar is a perfectly sound currency, and we all know how the "Diefendollar" has carried right through the country both in the West and in the East. I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) himself went on a buying spree in a grocery store just to show how much more the groceries would cost if the wicked Tories got into power. But today the Government say everything is fine. In this regard I should like to refer to an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Journal shortly after the Liberals took office. It is headlined "A house left in good order". I should like to put some of this editorial on record because I think the House should be reminded of what happened. This editorial sums up the condition of the nation when the Liberals took over, economically, financially and otherwise:

> He left—

"He" is the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker).

> —Mr. Pearson a country whose national production in 1962 had climbed 8 per cent to a peak of $40.4 billion—the greatest increase achieved by any western country, and the biggest income ever earned in history by a country with a population of 20 million people.
>
> He left him with a country which, after years of trade deficits, had at last achieved a favourable trade balance.
> He left him with a country which, on the testimony of President Kennedy—

That is the late President Kennedy.

> —had achieved a greater price stability than any other western industrial nation.
> He left him with a country whose reserves of gold and U.S. currency had been brought to $2,700,000,000—the greatest reached in years...
> In short, Mr. Diefenbaker left Mr. Pearson with a country whose people were producing more, selling more, earning more and saving more than ever before in their history.

I should like to see the Government challenge that record instead of spreading stories about getting the economy moving. If they have done anything they have just followed in the footsteps of the Conservative administration, nothing more. The poverty of their ideas and opinions is evident, and it is evident in their third Speech from the Throne.

I should like to return to the Speech from the Throne which, on careful analysis, gains more prominence by what it does not say than by what it does say; and as I have said already it tries to say plenty. In this, as in the first two Speeches from the Throne, the farmer is a forgotten man. I am not speaking of the farmers of the West but of all farmers in Canada. Whether we admit it or not, agriculture is still one of the most important industries in Canada. But the farmer is a forgotten man.

I would remind this Government which lacks ideas, this Liberal Party which, when in Opposition, all it ever did was to remind the Conservative Party about our election promises—which we did carry out—of what the facts are. I have authority for this in the person of Peter Newman, one of their best apostles in the press, who admitted to Maclean's magazine that the Diefenbaker government carried out practically all its election promises.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mandziuk: If they will give me 60 minutes I will show hon. Members the clipping. However, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read to the House the agricultural policy promised the nation by the Liberals.

An hon. Member: Dispense.

Mr. Mandziuk: No, I will not dispense, because this is worth repeating. Hon. gentlemen opposite would like to dispense with it or forget it, but it is the duty of the Opposition to remind this Pearson team which was going to do everything for this country of what were its promises. First of all, there was to be a two-prices system for wheat. Where is that policy? What did this Government do when the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the National Farmers Union came to Ottawa in March? It turned a cold shoulder toward them and they got nothing from this promise.

What did the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) tell the farmers in Winnipeg? I have not time to quote it now because I want to proceed with this wonderful agricultural platform which was going to result in an initial price to the farmer of $3 per bushel for the first 300 bushels delivered. There was also to be a consumer subsidy so that the price of bread did not go up. Over the course of the last two years I have seen the price of bread go up twice in the West; I do not know whether it has in the East. Where is this consumer subsidy, and where is the $2 wheat and the $3 wheat? Then a little while ago the Wheat Board lowered the price, and the Government are now blaming the Wheat Board.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Let me read what Mr. Hazen Argue promised at Beauséjour on April 4, 1963:

> —a consumer subsidy, and not so increase the price to the purchaser or create less sales; a minimum price for grains based on a minimum price of $2.00 per bushel for No. 1 wheat basis Fort William for the next three years;

Then he makes this further promise:

> —regional and quarterly period for computing average prices of eggs, hogs etc.

This Government has been in office for two years, yet it has not really started to carry out these election promises. What has happened to these promises? Unfortunately there is not one Minister in the House at this time, which indicates to me that they do not care about these things.

Mr. Macaluso: You are wrong, there are Ministers in the House.

Mr. Mandziuk: Yes, there are a few assistants to the Ministers, but there are a great number of empty front benches.

I have these election promises on record, and let me remind Members on that side of the House that the farmer of Canada does not forget these promises as quickly as Members on the front benches of this Government have forgotten them. In the event you challenge me as to the accuracy of these promises, I shall give you the authority upon which I have relied. One of them is none other than that gentleman who was the agricultural spokesman for the Liberal party when they were in opposition, that gentleman who as the result of election fortunes in Assiniboia did not get back and is now the Liberal organizer in Saskatchewan. That gentleman has made these and similar statements throughout Manitoba. He made them in my riding, and I refer particularly to to the one from which I quoted, which he made in Springfield.

Let me refer to those statements made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) regarding prosperity on the farm. The Minister gallivants around the country telling everyone about increase in gross farm incomes.

Perhaps gross incomes are up, but what has happened to net incomes, that is what I want to know. Has the Minister of Agriculture ever worked out what net incomes are after the farmers have paid out their expenses? It is my understanding that the farmers are even more firmly held by the cost price squeeze. According to the Minister of Agriculture the farmer is not important. He is a forgotten man as far as this Government is concerned. He is the man responsible for providing food for the world. He does not observe a 40-hour week. He must fight the elements continuously, and continuously fight the Government. He has a formidable task when fighting this bankrupt Government.

What has happened to the price of eggs during the last two years? Those gentlemen who now sit in the front benches on the other side of this House, when in opposition promised regional price support. They promised the poultry farmers price support on eggs. Last Christmas when I was back in my constituency the farmers there were selling eggs for as low as 12 cents a dozen. That does not mean that the consumer was paying any less for them. The consumer was paying the same price for eggs and someone else was receiving the benefits of the price spread. Apparently that is of no concern to this Government.

The Canadian consumers of agricultural products asked for a royal commission to be set up to investigate the price structure on eggs. What answer did that organization receive? I do not think it received any answer.

What has happened to the price of beef to producers? In 1963 after the Liberal Government took office the price of beef to producers dropped. In 1964 this price dropped on an average of five cents per pound. One can imagine the effect of that price drop on a thousand pound steer, particularly to a small producer. It makes quite a difference as well to the operations of a large cattle producer.

What has happened to the price of pork? The price of pork has gone down, as far as producers are concerned, since this Government took office. What has happened to the price of wheat?

An hon. Member: How about turkeys?

Mr. Mandziuk: We must not forget what has taken place in respect of the turkey industry. The Minister of Agriculture announced that the Government intended to reinstitute a tariff on turkeys. This announcement came after this Government practically ruined the turkey industry in Canada by taking off the quota on turkeys imported from the United States. The Government in fact allowed turkeys to come into Canada from the United States, without restriction. The turkey producers there were quite happy to ship turkeys to our market. Those producers made a great deal of money in this way and almost ruined the turkey producers here. The Government then announced a tariff on turkeys, probably as a result of the smell of election smoke. I do not know what prompted them to change their mind—perhaps it was deathbed repentance—but a tariff is now to be placed on turkeys from the United States.

What has happened to the price of wheat? Both the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the National Farm Union have been deeply concerned about the drop in the price of wheat. Who is responsible for lowering this price? It was not lowered as a result of world markets, but because of Canadian policy. This Government must accept the blame in this regard, not the Wheat Board. This Government is happy to accept the credit for something the Wheat Board has accomplished, but in this case it must accept the blame for lowering the price of Canadian wheat.

An hon. Member: That is not so.

Mr. Mandziuk: You must accept the blame in this regard.

An hon. Member: Not me.

Mr. Mandziuk: I am not pointing at you, I am pointing at the empty Government benches, which are empty I suggest because the Ministers do not like to listen to these facts. Everyone is perfectly aware of the fact that when Canada lowered the price of wheat, the United States authority followed suit. Every wheat exporting country followed this action on the part of Canada.

I am sure everyone in this House appreciates what the Conservative Minister of Agriculture did under similar circumstances. He held the line and we sold our wheat. If it were not for the windfall in relation to the sale of wheat to Russia, where would the Canadian wheat farmer be today? Hon. Members will recall that the Liberal Party promised two Ministers of Agriculture.

An hon. Member: We have not even got one.

Mr. Mandziuk: I believe that we have three Ministers of Agriculture. The hon. gentleman who carries the name has nothing to do with agricultural problems. All his responsibilities have been divided up among three Members of the Liberal Party; yet only from time to time do we have the pleasure of seeing one of those gentlemen here.

The hon. gentleman who has the name of Minister of Agriculture says that farmers do not require acreage payments. He has made that statement in Saskatchewan. He has referred to these payments as peanuts. I know as a result of speaking with the farmers in my constituency, and I am sure all other representatives of farming areas will agree, that those farmers would like to obtain some of these peanuts. The Minister of Agriculture says that agricultural conditions have so improved that these acreage payments are not necessary.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Again I can only suggest that this Government is suffering from a bankruptcy of ideas. I should like to read from an article which appeared in an October, 1964 edition of a newspaper, regarding a statement made by the Minister of Agriculture at Falher, Alberta. The headline is "Hays Praises Former PC Govt. for Concern on Farm Problems." We appreciate honesty once in a while. I should like to put on record what this article states was said by the Minister of Agriculture, so that everyone will know just how bankrupt this Government is as far as ideas and programs which will move today's economy forward are concerned. I suggest this Government has done nothing more than to carry on with our policies, although it promised to improve on them. This Government said that it would push the economy forward within three or four years, but what are supporters of this Government going to tell the people of this country when they go out on the hustings this fall or next spring? When they go on the hustings this fall or next spring, are they going to tell the country another pack of lies? They are apt to. Here is what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) says:

Agriculture Minister Harry Hays has criticized the former Liberal administrations and commended the Progressive-Conservative Government for its concern on farm problems while it was in office.

Very commendable.

Mr. Hays...told a meeting sponsored by the Farmers' Union of Alberta that Canada and the Liberal Party needed a change when the Conservatives were elected in 1957.

[Mr. Mandziuk.]

May I interject that I think Canada needs a change again.

An hon. Member: You will have a new leader pretty soon.

Mr. Mandziuk: The article continues:

"I think...the last Liberal government deserved to be kicked out when it was."

What a kick they will get again.

He said the present Government has continued the agricultural policies started by the Conservatives.

Sir, they are continuing these policies that they smeared, downgraded, laughed at and slandered because they have none of their own, and furthermore because they know that the Canadian farmer is not going to stand for any tampering with Conservative policies which improved agricultural conditions. I should like to read an extract from an editorial in the Western Producer of April 2, 1964, a good farm paper. It quite frankly says:

We're interested in policies, not parties.

That is quite correct, or at least I will take their word for it.

We have consistently stated that Tory farm policy, as it developed up to last year, was a good start in the direction of the kind of policy we needed. In fact, we urged Mr. Pearson's new Government, in an editorial last May 2, not to get too far away from it.

They promised improvements, but where those improvements are only the Lord knows. We know that when the farmers' organizations came to Ottawa they were deeply concerned about the increase in steel prices, because it will increase the price of everything made out of steel. The farmer is a large consumer of steel products, starting with his high priced farm equipment right down to an ordinary hammer, saw, and nails. What has the Government done? Do you see anything amongst the 58 items of business proposed in this long Speech from the Throne which would indicate that the Government has in mind the controlling of steel prices, just as the United States President did several years ago? Oh, no.

These farm organizations asked that the Government subsidize wheat exports to give the farmers $2 a bushel for their wheat. They kindly reminded the Government of their election promise, but there is nothing in the Speech from the Throne in this regard. The National Farmers Union expressed concern over crop insurance, a revision of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, unemployment insurance for farm labour and requested a royal commission on the farm implement industry.

The prices of farm implements have been going up every year, and with the increase in the price of steel they will continue to go up.

Mr. Nasserden: And there is also the 11 per cent sales tax.

Mr. Mandziuk: Oh, yes. The Government is trying to forget that. It is a revenue bearing item which will help them to have a balanced budget but they do not even give the farmer peanuts. Let the farmer go to—well, I will not say the word because it would not be parliamentary.

When we were in power we set up a House Committee to investigate the prices of farm implements. When the Liberals took office they took no steps to re-establish this Committee which had accumulated a great deal of information. A large number of briefs were presented to it by the farm implement manufacturers and farm organizations. Why did they not pursue this matter further and arrive at a solution of some kind? Oh, no. They take pride in the level of gross income of farmers, but I think it was the hon. Member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) who proved that the net income of farmers is down. It is going to go down further because the price of wheat has gone down. What is the government going to do about the situation? They have produced a long Speech from the Throne with 58 items but they are not concerned about agriculture.

An hon. Member: It is a record.

Mr. Mandziuk: Yes, it is a record. I do not think anybody can beat it. They are more concerned about a flag and about a new national anthem for Canada. We are going to sing "O Canada" whether or not it is on the statute books and we would love to sing it whether or not it is on the statute books. Why is the Government going to waste the time of the House to put it on the statute books?

An hon. Member: You are going to filibuster.

Mr. Mandziuk: We are going to have something else. We are going to have another royal commission to try to find out whether Canada needs an Ombudsman. Canada needs an Ombudsman as much as she needs a hole in the head.

Mr. Bigg: We need an alert Parliament.

Mr. Mandziuk: If we have a proper Government and proper administration of the law, then with 20 million intelligent Canadians we are properly protected by the law. We do not need an Ombudsman. I do not know whether I am pronouncing "Ombudsman" properly; I do not think it is an English word. It must be an import from Asia or some place else. Nevertheless the Government intends to establish a royal commission.

We have had experience with one royal commission, the "buy and buy" commission, or B and B Commission. It started with ten members at $100 each a day. That was not too bad; but do you know what it has snowballed into? One hundred and fifty people; because every secretary needs a secretary, and the second secretaries need secretaries, all the way down the line. Do you know what they have done? I am glad that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has agreed with me and my colleague, the hon. Member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski), with regard to the silly task they undertook—

Mr. Pepin: Have you got something to hide?

Mr. Mandziuk: —which involved putting Members of Parliament through the wringer by asking inappropriate questions. I agree with the Prime Minister that you cannot dictate to a royal commission as to what it should do, and that they must work within their terms of reference. However, I believe that the Government and the country, which pay for these royal commissions, should put a check on some of these investigations. This commission may not be going to carry out these investigations of the thinking of Members, but they might start another search to find out what the ethnic groups in Canada eat. They might try to find out whether the Italians still love pizza pie.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I must interrupt the hon. Member to advise him that the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Mandziuk: I just want to finish this statement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Does the House give unanimous consent for the hon. Member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Mandziuk: Thank you. I am not going to take much more time. They might check to see whether the Danes in Canada still love Danish pastry, if the Ukrainians love their borsch, the Scots their haggis, the Germans their sauerkraut, the Hungarians their goulash, the Icelanders their hongiket. And if you do not know what that means, it is smoked mutton. The taxpayers will be paying for all this. Favourite foods are a part of everyone's culture and they have contributed them to the new Canadian culture that is growing up. I know that pizza pies are eaten by more than Italians, that borsch is a favourite of the Scots, Irish and English.

• (4:30 p.m.)

An hon. Member: And chop-suey.

Mr. Mandziuk: Yes, and chop-suey. If you do not check these royal commissions, they are going to dig into these things at your expense. They are already costing a million and a half, and they will cost another million and a half. How is this going to give them an opportunity of recommending to the people of this nation how to solve the problems that exist between the two founding people and the ethnic peoples and teach them to live together, to be integrated into one group of Canadians?

I wish to thank the House for giving me the opportunity of making these few remarks.

[Translation]

Mr. Lucien Plourde (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of these remarks, I should like, according to practice, to offer my congratulations to the mover, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) and to the seconder, the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien) of the address in reply, who discharged their task conscientiously and who carried out properly their duty which is to put forward the views of the government.

As for me, not being a member of the Liberal party, I might be allowed to differ as to the goals and objectives pursued by the policies set forth in the speech from the throne and also as to the means proposed by those two government spokesmen.

I should also like to refer to a certain part of the speech made by the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche when he discussed the exodus of the graduates from Quebec technical institutes.

> The exodus of our young graduate technicians, well prepared for a technical career, was a tragic thing. May I point out, he said, that in 1961, while I was teaching graduates at the Technological Institute of Shawinigan, ten students only out of 100 intended to remain on the local labour market.

Such a statement, Mr. Speaker, means that the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche, as teacher at the Shawinigan Technological Institute, must assume his share of responsibility for such a situation.

It was not the fault of the students and graduate technicians if they ended their studies with a stock of knowledge that did not enable them to find employment in their own working area.

They cannot be blamed for the programs not being adapted to the conditions of the local labour market. It is not their fault if the Shawinigan Technological Institute did not train young metallurgical technicians for the aluminum plants at Shawinigan; they cannot be blamed if the programs did not train technicians for the chemical industries in Shawinigan; they can neither be blamed if the Shawinigan Technological Institute did not train technicians for the pulp and paper industries in Shawinigan, Grand'Mère and La Tuque.

The fault cannot be placed on the shoulders of the graduates of that institute, but on those whose duty it was to train competent technicians the district required and prepare programs suitable for the working and employment conditions in the Shawinigan district.

The responsibility rests with those whose duty it was to prepare those programs, namely the directors of those institutes, the authorities in charge of specialized education in the province of Quebec and the whole teaching body to which belonged the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche; they were the ones who should have advised those in charge of preparing the programs.

In this regard I must say, Mr. Speaker, that the results of a survey of professional and technical teaching in the province of Quebec show that the teachers themselves—most of whom were former graduates of those technological institutes who had never visited a plant and, therefore, could not know the needs of industry—were incompetent and inefficient at training qualified technicians capable of meeting the needs of industry in their respective districts.

Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne makes a great play about the fact that Canada must wage war against poverty and makes it clear to us that we must get behind such a fight.

It is as if we were asked, Mr. Speaker, to take a stand against alcoholism, crime or sin.

Everybody is against poverty. Everybody wants to do away with it. Everybody, the Creditistes to begin with, wants for our families and their members a decent living. Everyone wants for our people reasonable and paying salaries and wages. Everyone wants education and training to be made available to our youth, in keeping with the economic and cultural needs of our times. Everybody would like to see want and illness disappear from our homes.

Everybody would like farmers to earn a decent living on their farms.

We all agree about that. Everybody including members of all parties, will endorse the government proposal for an intensive fight against want, poverty, illness and ignorance.

But if we are all agreed about the necessity of removing poverty from our homes, and providing a decent living to all, we disagree about the means to attain this end.

Those who are steeped in materialism and collectivism and who would like to make the individual subservient to a party, a class or the state will try to deprive the individual of his most important asset, freedom, and put forward some measures to depersonalize the individual, to make him lose his dignity and forget the purposes of his existence.

On the contrary, those who believe that man, as stated in the American Declaration of Independence, has an inalienable right to life, freedom and the pursuit of happiness, should see to it that, as stated by John XXIII in Mater et Magistra, and I quote:

—precautionary activities of public authorities in the economic field, although widespread and penetrating, should be such that they not only avoid restricting the freedom of private citizens, but also increase it, so long as the basic rights of each individual person are preserved inviolate. Included among these is the right and duty of each individual normally to provide the necessities of life for himself and his dependants.

No step detrimental to the freedom of the individual should be taken to fight poverty of the individual or the family.

Any step taken to raise the intellectual and professional training level of young men and women or adults should respect their freedom, the freedom of their parents or the freedom of lower levels of government such as provincial or municipal governments or school boards, or organizations whose rights supersede those of the central state in the field of training and education.

Any step taken to improve health standards should not be imposed without respecting the freedom of the individual and the autonomy of the provinces in that area.

Any step taken to help farmers should not place them in a strait-jacket, remove or limit their right to ownership and should not replace the prior right of the provinces in this field.

No measure for the development of natural resources should run counter to the purposes for which natures assets exist and to the aims of industrial organization.

Now, the object of industrial organization is to produce as cheaply as possible the goods required to meet the consumers' needs. Industrial organization is not meant to provide employment, but goods and services. Consequently, when policies implemented by governments are aimed at and succeed in reversing the order of ends and means, such policies are bad, harmful, and have no place in a federal system like ours.

To conclude this part of my statement, the centralizing policy advocated in the speech from the throne—and which the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche described as a collectivist policy—ought to be rejected because it runs counter to the particular autonomies at the various government levels in this country.

It is not by adopting centralizing measures that the most complete development of the human being will be ensured, but through measures making the individual more and more free and able to free himself with the help of institutions of his own making.

However, there are certain goods or means which can only be made available to every member of society through state intervention: currency and credit.

The creation of money has always been a royal, a state prerogative. And it is due to a certain mental aberration that governments have waived their right of controlling money and credit.

In Canada and in Quebec nowadays, the creation of credit is left to the discretion of a small number of private individuals and organizations. Today in Canada, the creation of money has become the prerogative of some financiers who in this way happen to control the very lifeblood of social and economic organization.

As the Creditistes explained on several occasions, private citizens or organizations should not be allowed to create money and credit, because money and financial credit, which must reflect the real credit of the country, rightly belong to all those who contribute to the production of goods and services.

Therefore, if the community produces a certain amount of goods and services wanted by the consumers of whom that community is composed, the amount of money or credit placed at the disposal of the community must be equal to the amount of goods and services produced.

I will go further. In order to make possible the production of a certain amount of goods and services wanted by consumers, if the members of society as producers want and are able to produce this amount of goods and services, money and credit which make possible the creation of this amount of goods and services must be given to the community before hand. This is what is called "credit advances".

But if there are some classes of goods which are of a private character, the production of which is likely to produce benefits and profits and which, consequently, justify a payment of advanced or loaned credit, on the other hand there are other classes of goods which are mere services given by society to itself, mere services which do not produce benefits nor profits.

For instance schools, universities, hospitals, roads, highways, waterworks, streets, sidewalks are not private assets but public assets, because their purpose is to serve society as a whole; they cannot be monopolized in the hands of a few, and they are meant to provide for the well-being of society, to favour the weal and, consequently, to serve all human beings.

Since public capital must not bring in dividends and profits, since public capital is only used for the production of goods intended for the community as a whole, it is obvious that this capital must be made available to the community interest free.

This is, therefore, the efficient part the Bank of Canada must play in this field. Therefore, the government must deny private institutions the power to create credit and give back this power to the only agency fit to create credit free of charge for the community as a whole.

That is why we say that the Bank of Canada should make available to the federal and provincial governments, to the municipalities and the school boards under their jurisdiction the money they need to finance universities, schools, libraries, waterworks, sewers, highways, streets, sidewalks, hospitals, recreational centres, etc.—we could continue this enumeration till tomorrow morning—as long as these public capital investments are materially possible and there are needs to be met.

Now, there are in Canada hundreds of thousands of unemployed; there are plants which are not operating at full capacity; there are plenty of raw materials and other materials.

[Mr. Plourde.]

The needs are there also. The medical schools of the University of Montreal and Laval University, in Quebec City, had to refuse 600 young people who had prepared for 15 years to become doctors; the agricultural school of Ste Anne de la Pocatière, in the province of Quebec, had to refuse many rural youths who wished to learn rational farming.

Why? Because these institutions lacked space, and money to provide more space. We need a humane and orderly economy. A government convinced of its responsibilities toward society would endeavour to provide the necessary public capital to meet these needs.

Such a policy, providing public capital without interest, would bring about certain results.

It would allow, for instance, a reduction in the ever-increasing costs of the public debts of our different governments. The reduction of interest payments on public debts would enable governments to reduce taxes, and thus increase the purchasing power of families and of individuals.

That is why we, of the Ralliement creditiste, are calling for legislation which will permit the provinces to use their real credit as they please, according to the needs of their citizens so that the wholesome and useful things which could benefit the people may be made available to them.

There is another thing the Ralliement Creditiste calls for, and it is to allow the provinces to control their own trade.

Mr. Speaker, the members of the Ralliement Creditiste are not the only ones to regret the evil effects of the control of trade on the part of the federal state. Here are two examples:

At the federal-provincial conference of November 1963, the premier of British Columbia, Mr. Bennett, said:

> British Columbia urgently asks the Canadian government to revise as rapidly as possible the national tariffs. Measures conceived to protect manufacturing industries in central Canada at the expense of other provinces must be cancelled as soon as possible.

And he added:

> Canada's tariff policy protects manufacturing industries in Quebec and Ontario. Consequently, the British Columbia consumers must pay a higher price for their consumer goods.

Another authorized spokesman for the prairie provinces, Mr. Charles Gibbins, president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool, also stated the problem in the following terms before the Canada-Japan Trade Council on October 15, 1964.

After noting the Canada wheat sales to Japan and the possibilities opened by Japan to western farm products, Mr. Gibbins stated that the high tariffs and the quotas laid down by Canada against imports of Japanese products impaired our grain exports. He added:

> Only 8 per cent of Canadian imports of textiles come from Japan. Only 4 per cent of our imports of various goods come from the same source. In fact, Japan supplies only 2 per cent of our total imports.
> And yet, Japan is requested to make sacrifices in order to enable some of our marginal industries to continue to deteriorate. That is expensive for us all. We pay more for those goods which we could buy from Japan if that country was given a reasonable access to Canadian markets. We place a most heavy burden on a very good customer, so much so that Japan must wonder how long it will be able to continue buying from us.

So, Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the control of Ottawa on our international trade is not satisfactory.

Canada is too large geographically; its production is so diversified that tariff measures likely to help an area of Canada cannot but be to the disadvantage of another.

For instance, if easier access to Canadian markets were provided for Japanese textiles so as to reduce the cost of living in certain parts of Canada, the textile industries in Montreal, St. Gregoire de Montmorency, Drummondville, St. Hyacinthe, Granby, Magog and Sherbrooke, in the province of Quebec, would automatically bear the brunt of that new policy. Thousands of workers would be laid off and hundreds of families would suffer hardship.

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, the Ralliement Creditiste is justified in demanding that the provinces have control over local and external trade. It is not that Quebec seeks to put up tariff barriers between itself and the other Canadian provinces, because it could make with them trade agreements similar to those prevailing between members of the European community, the common market.

However, Quebec could have more effective control over its import and export trade with foreign countries. It would thus be in a better position to meet more adequately the needs of its population, taking into account the goods and services with which it could provide that population through its production and its trade with other countries.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the Ralliement Creditiste will keep asking for a federal-provincial conference to amend the Canadian constitution for the purposes I have just indicated.

Consequently, I want to move an amendment.

An hon. Member: Out of order.

Mr. Plourde: Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

> That the following words be added to the address·
> We regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to propose a measure to exempt from income tax any Canadian married or with dependents who earns less than $5,000 a year and any single Canadian who earns less than $2,500 a year, and therefore no longer enjoy the confidence of the house and the Canadian people.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean L. Rochon (Laval): Mr. Speaker, it is customary for a member taking part in the debate on the speech from the throne to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address. The speech from the throne gives the people of Canada an idea of the legislative program to be submitted to both houses in the days ahead.

Our two colleagues, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) and the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien), were worthy of the confidence placed in them and everybody appreciated the moderation and seriousness of their speeches. They succeeded in emphasizing the truly national democratic spirit of the government of our country.

They have stressed the social aspect which we will be considering and they should be commended for having placed the higher interests of the nation above cheap politics. In doing so, Mr. Speaker, they represented with dignity their voters; they represented with dignity this great Canadian who is our leader, the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Pearson); they represented with dignity the holder of the Nobel prize for peace; they represented with dignity the one who, because of his courage and his indomitable willpower, personified the soul of our people in a flag and who, tomorrow, by means of our own national anthem, will tell the whole world:

> O Canada, terre de nos aïeux
> Ton front est ceint de fleurons glorieux

It is also customary, in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, to pay tribute to one's constituents. I would be remiss in not doing so and in not thanking publicly all those who gave me the largest majority of anybody in this house. Therefore, my most sincere thanks to the electors of the third largest riding in Canada, whose various classes of people are truly representative of the aspirations of every group in this country, be it that of the farmers, the city workers, the manufacturers, the businessmen or the professionals. It is my duty to thank them and, as their member, not to forget that, as the seconder of the address pointed out, before being a Liberal, I must stand for national unity, for this strength of which Sir Wilfrid Laurier said, at the beginning of this century:

> Thanks to the goodwill and the enlightened patriotism of everyone, the twentieth century will belong to Canada.

This prophesy of a great statesman has come true, but this wonderful reality could become still more actual if it were possible to forget, or rather settle our differences; if the rights of minorities were respected and if an attempt were made to find a form of agreement among the provinces which would enable everyone of them to play its full part to enhance the fame and the greatness of our country.

In the last few years, the advantages of co-operative federalism have been felt. Certain people, steeped much more in petty politics than in true and sincere patriotism, have decried that theory, but its results are there to prove its worth.

Following Federal-Provincial meetings, compromises satisfactory to each party were reached, and immediately the beneficial results of those discussions, of this co-operation with the federal government, were felt. It was realized that all were equal partners, that what could be obtained was not a mere handout, but a right recognized to everyone.

With a thorough understanding of its role, the present Liberal government proved that it was worthy of its past achievements. It pursued its social assistance program without paying attention to the malicious remarks of those whose only ambition is to return to office, even if in so doing they smear and blacken reputations. It forged ahead, and today as in the past, it advocates a comprehensive social program.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) sees in it worn-out measures borrowed from other countries. But what does it matter, Mr. Speaker, if those worn-out measures can erase poverty from our country, if those measures borrowed from other countries can produce the wonderful results achieved by the American peace corps, dreamt about by one of the greatest figures of our times, the late President Kennedy of the United States.

After the Prime Minister's masterful speech last Tuesday, after his clear and precise outline of the steps that should be taken to fight poverty, needless for me to repeat what he said and what others, ministers as well as members said also when they dealt with help for the sick, for those who are obliged to change jobs because of automation, for the farmers in eastern as well as western Canada, who talked about the creation of a Canadian dairy commission, a public assistance program at the federal level, and help for those who cannot benefit from the Canada pension plan. They knew how to explain the government's views, show the social scope of those measures and the benefits that will be derived therefrom when they have been passed by parliament. There is no need for me to do that.

However, I would like to stress one point which struck me and which meets so well one of today's most pressing needs, namely help for young people.

Provincial governments, through their department of welfare, do a lot and those which, like the government of Quebec, have a department of education allocate huge sums of money for the education of our young people; parish organizations set up recreation centres because it is a well-known fact that a clear mind needs a healthy body. Everyone is agreed that we must allow our young people to assert themselves, that we must allow them to spend their energies for the good cause, that we must prepare them for the role which will be theirs tomorrow. Therefore, the federal government, without interfering with any provincial right, intends to introduce legislation to help them.

Mr. Speaker, I represent one of the most heavily populated constituencies in Canada; several of the great teaching institutions of the city of Montreal and its northern suburbs are located there—teachers' colleges, classical colleges, high schools as well as grade schools. Thousands of young people study there. Therefore, you will understand why I welcomed the announcement in regard to the establishment of a company of young Canadians, through which the energies and talents of youth can be enlisted in social and economic projects, both in Canada and abroad.

I have applauded this beautiful and noble deed on the part of this government. On reflection, an idea flashed through my mind; I thought of another deed that would be equally beautiful, great and noble. Why would not these talented young people channel their energy toward a social achievement which might take the form of an investigation to eliminate an evil that poisons the soul of our youth, cripples and numbs too many of these young brains who could do so much tomorrow when the time comes for them to take over.

You realize, Mr. Speaker, that I am referring to certain radio and T.V. programs, to certain publications through which immorality and sexuality find the doors of our homes wide open.

However, I would not want to make a blanket condemnation—and nobody would take me seriously, if I did—because to condemn these marvellous media of popular education such as radio and T.V., would be condemning everything that modern science and human genius have achieved that is beautiful and great in this world. I would not think of it.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Everybody realizes that in this atomic and space travel age, one needs much more training than in the past and that to keep up with progress, one has to be familiar with modern techniques and methods of self-improvement. Apart from schools and teachers, where could we find, to provide us with such methods and techniques—to open up our minds to the unlimited horizons of the world—anything better than radio and television? However, as anyone may have noticed, what should be used only for the good of humanity can one day become a pernicious instrument and be put to work for evil purposes. As I said a while ago, Mr. Speaker, that is where I felt educated young people could exert a healthy influence.

After investigation, they could examine the problem and suggest the most efficient ways of eliminating this evil. What a fine social undertaking and what noble action on the part of the government who would bring this about.

Our young people are not bad, far from it; they have to be guided; their enthusiasm must be directed toward a just cause; they are imbued with ideals; we could spare them difficulties and give them the opportunity to assert themselves in allowing others of their own age to devote their energy and their talent to their service. This is a thought that occurred to me. Why would it not come through?

May I, Mr. Speaker, deal with a question of current interest? The quiet revolution going on in the province of Quebec, which, in 1867, agreed to become a partner in confederation, accepted its responsibilities but expected its rights to be respected.

During the last debate on the address in reply, in February 1964, I dealt at great length with that matter; I recall the statement made in the house in 1865 by one of the fathers of confederation, Sir Georges Étienne Cartier, and I quote:

> The delegates who will go to England will not accept any decision from the imperial government unless it is one based on the resolutions passed by this house and they will bring back no others.

And apart from guaranteeing the preservation of our language and our faith, the main resolutions also guaranteed Quebeckers that they would be considered equal partners who would take a full part like their English-speaking fellow citizens, in the country's economic, social culture and political development. The federal system did much for the emancipation of our country. We are now a great nation which is listened to and respected. Every province had a share in it, Quebec as well as the others, but unfortunately, Canada was too long considered as an Anglo-Saxon country, which has obliged us, from Quebec, to fight for survival.

For too long they have forgotten to treat us as equals, for too long they have forgotten that we were partners, so much so that we felt and unfortunately we still feel too often, that we are strangers in our own country. It is true that we had to fight for our survival, but those days are gone now. The province of Quebec became conscious of its value, and particularly of the part it can play within confederation, and this government, more than any other, endeavoured to make it clear to Quebec. It endeavoured to direct its action towards the union of all men of good will and, as one of our historians said last year:

> Let us recognize that the Prime Minister of Canada has a fine quality; as a diplomat, as a Canadian who thinks of national unity before everything else, he strives to make it clear that throughout discussions among the different groups of people, Canadians should show themselves more realistic and less emotional.

• (5:40 p.m.)

[Text]

If we would only be willing to forget our differences of opinion and try to join in our efforts, how much more beautiful and great a nation we could build.

And, as a professor of McGill University stated, in his report to the Laurendeau-Dunton Commission, "English speaking as well as French speaking are faced with a problem of national unity", which should be resolved so that all inferiority complexes would disappear into Canadianism. And, according to that professor, the majority of our English speaking compatriots are doing their utmost to understand French Canada.

If Quebec seems, at times, to be the only Province changing in recent years, we should remember that industrialization in all the English speaking Provinces, as well as in Quebec, has totally changed the face of our country. So, instead of losing precious time in sterile discussions, instead of trying to destroy one another, why not try to understand each other and reach our goal—a great Canada—a great nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Rochon: Borrowing from Hon. Mr. Chevrier, our high commissioner in London, an idea which he developed last week before the Royal Commonwealth Society, if I may use his words, Mr. Speaker. It has been realized throughout the world that the quiet revolution which is now taking place not only in Quebec but in the whole of Canada, has caused almost everywhere a great deal of soul-searching. It has been inferred therefrom that in order to save the unity of the country, we ought not to listen to extremists, either English or French separatists, either English or French nationalists, but rather to develop in understanding and mutual goodwill the biculturalism and bilingualism movement promoted by one of the great fighters for Canadian unity, our leader, the Prime Minister of Canada.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED UNDER ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before calling on the hon. Member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings and since the House is not rising at six o'clock, hon. Members may like to know what the program will be at ten o'clock tonight. It is as follows: the hon. Member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge): Agriculture—British Columbia—request for long-term loans to tree fruit growers; the hon. Member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan): administration of justice—preparation of pamphlet on capital punishment; the hon. Member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Basford): Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—Vancouver—possible use of former R.C.A.F. base.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cashin for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, it is a convention of the House on occasions such as this to pay tribute to the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply. Although it is a conventional expression of tribute, yet in the years I have been here I have never known it to be merely conventional. It has been well earned on every occasion, and certainly this applies to the mover and seconder of the Address on this particular occasion. They carried themselves excellently. They did a very good job. They were a credit to themselves, to their party and to the House, and I want to express my own congratulations to them on having performed a very difficult task.

Dealing with the Speech from the Throne in the very few minutes which are allotted to one, some 30 in this debate, it is impossible to cover many of the points with which one would like to deal. The Liberal Party in its election campaign of a year ago used a comic book, which had various sections with instructions, such as "colour them green." I think, Mr. Speaker, they must feel everybody in Canada is green if they accept all the statements contained in the Speech from the Throne.

Many years ago Marie Antoinette when she could not understand why people did not have bread, said, "Well, let them eat cake." In this case the cake would not be of the Government's making. The frosting would not be of the Government's composition but the results, if and when the Speech from the Throne is implemented, will in the great majority of cases be a numerous multiplicity of Dominion-Provincial conferences, and this is something on which I wish to comment.

Take the war on poverty, that grandiloquent phrase borrowed from President Johnson, the new manpower policies, the changes in ARDA, the Canada assistance plan, medicare, the agricultural policies and the constitutional question—as, if, and when dealt with—will all result in a very large number of Dominion-Provincial conferences; indeed will depend upon an interminable series of these conferences.

A Dominion-Provincial conference in itself is not a bad thing, but when you have a continuation of them to the extent that they enter upon practically the whole program which the government places before the House, it is a matter to which the House should pay more than passing attention.

• (5:50 p.m.)

I do not want to give any partisan criticism on matters such as this. I prefer to refer the House and you, Mr. Speaker, to a statement made by the non-Conservative partisan, Mr. Peter Newman of the Toronto Star, whose claim to fortune, if not fame was the publication of the book "Renegade In Power".

This is what he had to say with respect to Dominion-Provincial conferences. Dealing with this specific Speech from the Throne he writes:

> The massive intrusion into the economy suggested by the Speech from the Throne, will require fiscal and constitutional powers that Ottawa does not possess. It is clear that the details of most of the proposals will have to be hammered out not in the open forum of Parliament, but in the cloistered privacy of Federal-Provincial conferences.

Later in the same article he goes on to say:

> The Pearson Government has, as a matter of deliberate policy, down-graded the functions and the powers of the Federal Government. This being true, all of the legislative initiative cannot remain in the hands of Ottawa, no matter what brave new world it conjured up in the Speech from the Throne. The Liberals simply cannot have it both ways.

If they want a description—I think one might want some light reading, some amusing reading and, I think authoritative reading about Dominion-Provincial conferences—I refer hon. Members to an article in the Montreal Star by one Mr. Leslie Roberts. This appeared on April 3. Mr. Roberts, as I think all of us know, is an active apologist for the Liberal Government. He knows the desires, the aspirations and the hopes of the Government. He has written and spoken for them in election campaigns and he writes for them in every article of his which appears in the press, directly or indirectly. In this particular article he was dealing with the political future of the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé). He was suggesting something of the future which might lie ahead of him and he based his prophecy on action the hon. gentleman took following the Dominion-Provincial conference which was held in Quebec last April, out of which grew the Canada Pension Plan. He described in some detail all that went on following that conference. He referred to it as a disaster of stunning proportions and he said:

> Through the early days in April, nobody in Ottawa seemed to know what to do next. People wrote notes, memoranda and briefs, and in Quebec, Lesage alternated between tempestuous rage and silent sulks.

Then the Minister of Forestry persuaded the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) to allow him to take matters into his own hands. The hon. Gentleman, accompanied by that brain-truster Tom Kent, went to the Prime Minister late one afternoon and said: We are heading for an unmitigated disaster and something must be done about it; will you authorize us to go to Quebec and see what we can do? So they went to Quebec. They met a prominent civil servant in the Government of that Province. Then there are details here with which I will not bore the house—how they registered at the Chateau Frontenac under assumed names, and so on. It has all the trimmings of plot and counterplot. Only the late Ian Fleming, creator of James Bond, agent No. 007, came near to matching what Mr. Roberts writes as to the activities of these gentlemen at this time. According to his article, conferences were held in a small hotel in Eastview. The Minister of Forestry and Mr. Kent conducted discussions in a men's room off the lobby. Out of these conferences and negotiations in men's rooms and hotel rooms, and under assumed names, grew the massive Canada Pension Plan.

That is the picture according to Mr. Roberts. It shows how Parliament can be denigrated in Dominion-Provincial conferences. If these policies are continued, if there is to be a multiplicity of Dominion-Provincial conferences, this House becomes a mere sounding board and Members of the House of Commons will certainly become nothing more than echoes of what is decided outside this Chamber, sometimes without even discussion between the various Departments.

Walter Stewart of the Toronto Star Weekly in a broadcast yesterday dealing with Dominion-Provincial conferences pointed out the menace presented by a multiplicity of conferences such as the Government proposes. He said that Government without representation is bad, but that Government without responsibility is much worse. I suggest to you, sir, that our whole system of responsible Government will not only be denigrated but will be so eroded and weakened that Parliament as a whole will have no more control of the public affairs of this country and that the Government will become only a sounding board for what is said at these Dominion-Provincial conferences.

John Meyer, financial editor of the Montreal Gazette said in one of his columns the other day, commenting on this subject of a war on poverty, that the idea was not original. I happened to be looking back the other day on some of the speeches made following the end of the second world war, and it is interesting to note the extent to which that is true. Mr. Meyer points out, in drawing a parallel between what was done then and what is proposed today, that when massive welfare programs were introduced following the Second World War the people of Canada were told at that time that these policies would end poverty; they were to end poverty and abolish it in this country. The fact that today after 20 years we find the Government of the day declaring a war on poverty would suggest that we did not eradicate it by those measures which were brought in at that time.

Poverty, I suggest, is not the result of any single factor. It is a combination of various element affecting different individuals in different ways. It is lack of health, lack of opportunity, lack of ambition, leading, in the end, to discouragement. Primarily perhaps it is lack of education. All these factors enter into poverty, and you do not eliminate poverty by moving people into better housing accommodation. This has been shown in the past. Very often people have been moved from poor housing conditions into better accommodation, but after four or five years the newer houses were in as bad shape as the ones they left. Neither do you cure poverty by pensions or handouts. Poverty is cured, I suggest, in two ways; first by improving the educational system of the country, providing an education at least for our youth so that they can go forward confidently to earn a living in a new world; and second, by providing employment for the people. These two factors are the main factors to be considered in a war on poverty.

Several hon. Members have referred to the report of the Economic Council, Economic Goals for 1970. I was glad to hear this and I suggest it should be required reading for every Member of the House of Commons and, so far as possible, for Canadians generally. It sets very high goals for us and it says they can be attained. It says they have to be attained if we are to provide employment and even hold our own, let alone move ahead. It says this can only be done on the basis of a well trained labour force and population generally, and by an efficient productive system.

I suggest that the most important problem which this nation and this Parliament is facing today is that of education. It is a problem which is scarcely mentioned, except indirectly, in the Speech from the Throne. If we are to attain the goals which the Economic Council holds out for us, we must improve our educational system, a system which weighs heavily on the Municipalities, on the Provinces and on the Federal Government. It may be in the years to come that the increasing burdens which have almost bankrupted many of the Municipalities will be eased to some extent. The population explosion has just about run its course. Our youngsters in the primary and secondary schools may not need more school buildings but the cost of providing teachers and servicing the debt, however, will be with us.

The Economic Council of Canada foresees that the cost of education will increase from its present level of $2,140 million in 1963 to $3,180 million in 1970, which shows a yearly increase of 5.3 per cent. This is over-all educational cost. In the field of university education the Council envisages an increase of 16.4 per cent each year from now until 1970. I say to you that the most important problem facing the country today is not the provision of bigger and better pensions, not the providing of medicare and various other matters, all of which are good in themselves; unless we deal realistically with the educational problem with which the country is faced, then we are not going to conquer poverty. We are not even going to hold our own and consequently our economy will falter. Instead of improving our social security measures and increasing pensions we are likely to find our economy faltering, because we cannot maintain our economic development which the Council says is necessary and increase our efficiency and improve our competitive position in a rapidly shrinking world.

I do not want to be tagged with the label of being opposed to social security, because I am not. I approve of social security. In this country we have tremendous social security programs which all of us would like to see expanded in accordance with our means and other priorities. But I say with all the seriousness at my command that the time has come when we should stop, look and listen in regard to these continually expanding social security programs and decide on some evaluation. This decision should be made in this Chamber, in this Parliament, here. We must evaluate the various programs and challenges which have been thrown to us, and this should be done before we embark on any war on poverty or before we step further with some of these social security programs.

I say that the decision must be made here and it is easy to see why. We have a Dominion-Provincial conference, say, on health. Certainly the Federal Minister of Health responsible for the development of the program, and the ten Provincial Ministers of Health responsible in their own respective fields, will all welcome the additional moneys which may be made available. The same is true with social security and other welfare measures. You will find you get the approval of the Ministers representing the Provinces and the Minister representing the Dominion Government in their own particular fields; and when the matter is brought to this Parliament, then we are told that perhaps we are right in our criticisms and that the matter should have been deferred, that perhaps the Government should not have gone ahead with it. But then the Government will say that this decision had been made by a joint Dominion-Provincial conference and there is nothing the Government can do about it. We will be confronted with that situation. I suggest once more that the first responsibility of Parliament is not to initiate more welfare measures but to evaluate the ones we already have. We should consider the ones which we feel are necessary and have been recommended. We should choose between them and have a concrete evaluation of them. All of this time we must bear in mind the overriding responsibility, in my opinion, of Canada going ahead with an ample and a proper educational system.

Having dealt generally with education I should like to refer to a specific problem in university education, because I have been talking generally. I think that the main burden of education will fall upon the universities. As I have said already, the municipalities have perhaps already met the challenge in the last few years, and through private capital facilities have provided schoolhouses and everything else. Further additions may not be required and it may well be that the municipalities will be able to hold their own.

In this regard I think particularly of my own province of Nova Scotia. I think, for example, of Acadia University. I have been associated with that university for many years and know it well. We have a large number of small universities in Nova Scotia. They are good universities, very good, but they are not state endowed, with the exception of the Nova Scotia Technical College and the Dalhousie medical and dental schools. All the rest of them depend upon gifts, meagre endowments, Government assistance such as we know it today, and unfortunately in many cases they suffer from continually increasing deficits. That is hardly the way a university should be financed. We have a peculiar and pressing problem in the Province of Nova Scotia in that almost 40 per cent—39 and something per cent—of the students attending universities there come from outside the Province of Nova Scotia.

There are various reasons for this, Mr. Speaker. To use an old cliché, we have to export our brains, and our graduates leave the Province. But when they are older they like to send their children back to their old university. In my case I have at least two sons with children whom they want to go back to Nova Scotia and attend Acadia University, and the same is true with a great majority of people from Nova Scotia. These colleges are small in these days of mass production factories—which are what some universities are—and these parents want their children to go to a small university. As I say, almost 40 per cent of our students are from without the province. Everybody knows how the grants are paid by the Federal Government to the universities; they are paid on a basis proportionate to the population of the Province. Nova Scotia is a Province which geographically is small, is relatively small in population, and the student grant is based on the total population of that Province with no regard whatever to the student population of the Province. I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that that is not the proper way to administer these university grants.

I remember speaking to a distinguished gentleman who sat opposite me in this chamber at one time. He held a very distinguished position, and even at that time I had said something to this effect. He told me afterwards that he was inclined to agree with me, but that it was part of historical tradition that we had to maintain at least the appearance of provincial control; therefore the only way the Government could get these grants through the house, or the only way they thought they could get them through the House, and the only way they thought they could get the support of all the Provinces, was to keep it on a Provincial population basis. I did not agree with him on this point, and in fact the Government did not get the support of all the Provinces for quite a long while.

Mr. Regan: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Nowlan: Yes.

Mr. Regan: I agree entirely with what the hon. gentleman has said, and some change should be made to recognize the situation of the Nova Scotia universities, but I would respectfully ask the hon. Member why, when he was Minister of Finance, he did not carry out this change himself?

Mr. Nowlan: Because the people of Canada did not have the good sense to leave me as Minister of Finance long enough to accomplish it.

• (6:10 p.m.)

This is a problem for the Provinces as well. I know it is well known to all of us that the Province of Nova Scotia is concerned and it is making large grants to Nova Scotia Universities. The same situation is in existence in the Province of New Brunswick. These governments are wondering whether they should continue to give grants for the support of students coming from all over Canada, or whether they should be limited in some way to those students emanating from those Provinces.

I would refer hon. Members to the Canadian Universities Foundation, an organization which represents all universities in Canada. From 1961 to the end of 1963, despite the fact that these universities were all coming to Ottawa and asking the Government for more money as a result of their claim that they had to have substantial increases in grants, they said that the problem as far as the universities of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were concerned was more acute, and urged upon the Federal Government to grant $400,000 per year to Nova Scotia Universities and $200,000 per year to the University of New Brunswick before providing increased grants to any other universities. In view of this attitude taken by the other universities, one does not have to urge this upon the Government, but I do suggest that if there is any validity to these arguments that these grants must continue on the basis of provincial population, then this recommendation of that association should be considered.

I should like to refer to the Atlantic Development Board which was created to develop the national resources of the Atlantic Provinces. This Board is doing very good work. It was instituted by that Government of which I had the honour of being a Member, and it has received the support of the present Government. I would suggest to the Government that, if it cannot pay out these amounts of money because of the population formula, then it might accept the recommendation of the Canadian Universities Foundation and have the special grants to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick universities paid by the Atlantic Development Board. I would suggest to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), who has a special interest in this Board, that he give his attention to the suggestion that the Atlantic Development Board could in some way be made responsible for the development of the Universities of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Perhaps part of the substantial sums of money which have been made available to that Board could be used for the development of these universities. Perhaps in that way the Government could move away from the difficulties in respect of grants on the basis of population, and also get around any technical constitutional problems that might arise. I can think of no greater resource which we have than our young men and women.

The universities of Nova Scotia receive $183.19 per student in the way of a federal grant. This can be compared to $281 per student in the wealthy Province of Ontario. Of course that Province has a larger population, and a larger student population. These universities receive $281 per student, as compared to the $183.19 in Nova Scotia. I suggest there is something radically wrong when this system is allowed to continue to operate in this manner; I urge the Government and particularly the Minister to pay some attention to the suggestion that the Atlantic Development Board make some of the money which it receives available in this way for the development of that important resource. That Board has received large sums of money and will receive more when it is required, and I think it should give very careful consideration to the necessity for making grants to these universities.

Mr. Speaker, I am afraid my time is running out. I am not sure how much time I have left.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member has at least two or three minutes at his disposal.

Mr. Nowlan: Thank you.

As I have suggested, I think the youth of our Province is its greatest resource. Since this Atlantic Development Board was created for the purpose of developing our resources, this is a matter with which it could deal quite adequately and efficiently.

There are other problems of a more local nature to which I intended to refer, but as my time is running short I should like to refer to at least one, and then resume my seat.

The problem to which I have reference is one which was referred to by the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Regan). A suggestion has been made which has created fears in the minds of the people of Nova Scotia and in the Maritimes generally, to the effect that possibly some day the C.P.R. will terminate its service across the Bay of Fundy. I do not think this alarm is justified. This C.P.R. service has been in existence for generation after generation and I have been assured by officials of the company that, while there may have to be adjustments made in the future, it will likely be maintained.

One prominent executive said to me the other day: When you read during one week of the Russians walking on the clouds, and the next week of the United States photographing the moon preparatory to landing on it, do you not think we would be very foolish to commit ourselves to the expenditure of $4 million to $5 million for something which we can anticipate may have to be changed in five or six years' time. All they are asking for is a delay in the consideration of this problem. If that is the situation, that is one thing. If this is an intimation that the service might some day be discontinued, that is an entirely different thing. As the Minister of Transport suggested the other day in answer to questions raised by the Member for Saint John-Albert and myself the discontinuance of that service is impossible. No Provincial Government in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, and no Federal Government of any Party, would permit such a thing to happen. It is too bad that undue concern has been raised in this regard, because at the moment all we can do is wait to see how the situation will be resolved.

In addition to that problem, Mr. Speaker, there is a problem in respect of the fishermen. Originally a new wharf was to be built. The Government intended to spend between $3 million and $4 million to build that wharf. All the plans had been prepared and everything was ready. The old wharf was to be used by the fishermen. Plans have been changed and the old wharf will have to remain in service for the C.P.R. for some time. Other adequate accommodation will have to be provided for the fishermen. This is absolutely essential, as I think anyone who has seen the scores and scores of boats tied up behind the spur wharf will agree. The ability these fishermen have in operating in and out from that wharf is a credit to them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. Member have the consent of the House to continue beyond his allotted time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nowlan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do not wish to trespass on the rules of the House by taking up more than my allotted time, and I know that other Members here wish to speak. I should like to refer to only one other local matter, if I may.

There is a problem which exists in respect of providing adequate accommodation for fishermen, particularly in the western part of my constituency, having regard to communication between Brier Island, Long Island and the mainland. These islands have had access to the mainland by two motorboats and two scows. Travel accommodation in that area today is worse than it was 75 years ago, and I am not speaking in a political vein in any way. Seventy five years ago there was daily service provided between Brier Island, Long Island and Saint John. That service, of course, went by the boards long ago.

A suggestion was made that a causeway could be built across this very narrow bit of water. The Government made an estimate of the cost, which was about twice as high as an estimate made by a Nova Scotia engineering firm. If a causeway could be built it would provide easy communication for cars and trucks. Thousands and thousands of tons of fish were transported in this area last year by boats and overloaded ancient scows. With the construction of a causeway there would be a tremendous development in the fishing industry and a tremendous impetus given to the transportation industry generally between those islands and the mainland. You would provide a deep-water harbour, which is very badly needed today. Even in the short time I have been here the motorboats used largely by the inshore fishermen have become very much larger and you have large draggers owned by young fishermen which cost $80,000, $90,000, $100,000 or $125,000. True, they have borrowed from the Fishermen's Loan Board. True, they have mortgaged their souls to pay for them. True, they go into debt. But where can these boats lie at night? There is hardly a deep-water harbour along that coast, and such harbours must be provided. This is one way in which that service can be performed. When the estimates come before us, which I trust will not be too long from now, we will be able to go into greater detail with respect to these matters and others which I had hoped to raise at this time, but have not been able to do so.

I appreciate the courtesy of the House in giving me a few moments additional time because I know I am trespassing on the time of others.

• (6:20 p.m.)

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of my participation in the debate is to present a proposal for federal aid to education designed to deal with the stunning educational crisis which faces Canada today. It is a crisis which, if not met with boldness and imagination by all levels of government, will have drastic effects on the future of Canada for generations to come.

Throughout the world there is perhaps no subject which is causing more concern among responsible people than education. In the modern technological world no nation can hope to survive if it fails to develop the talents of all its members to the highest possible degree. The future industrial strength of Canada will depend, not just upon the actions of the few but rather on how successful we are in developing the abilities and skills of all our people.

We hear much talk today about scientific change and automation, and the extent to which they will change our lives and displace workers. There is absolutely no hope of meeting such problems without a firm understanding of the role of education and the massive amount of money and effort which will have to be devoted to it in the years ahead. On January 12 of this year President Lyndon Johnson recommended to the United States Congress the doubling of the federal budget for education, which he described as the number one business of America. He declared:

> Nothing matters more to the future of our country. We must demand that our schools increase not only the quantity but the quality of our education. It is our primary weapon in the war against poverty and the principal tool for building a great society.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, the bill has already been passed and was signed by the President on Sunday night, a striking example of what can happen when a determined leader determines to move aggressively in an important field. What a contrast this represents to the attitude of this Government which in its legislative program does not even mention the subject and has even forgotten completely about its very modest program of 10,000 scholarships. Canadians could take greater comfort if the Government's program had contained a firm commitment to work in co-operation with the Provinces toward the goal of equal opportunity for all to education at every level. It is time, Mr. Speaker, that Ottawa stopped hiding behind the British North America Act and, without interfering in the provincial field of education, began giving the Provinces strong financial assistance in carrying the heavy burden of education costs.

Equality of opportunity has always been held up as one of the great ideals of democracy, but in Canada so far as education is concerned this ideal has been far from realized. The inequalities between province and province and between urban and rural centres are conspicuous. Children are growing up in some parts of Canada with only a fraction of the chance of the educational advantages enjoyed in other parts, and these differences are caused by the mere accident of geography.

It is a tragic state of affairs when the quality of education available to Canadians depends upon where they happen to live. Yet, Mr. Speaker, a poor education is a handicap that follows a person all the days of his life. There are today in Canada 1,017,869 men and women with no more than four years of formal schooling. They represent 9 per cent of all Canadians of working age. In rural Canada 64 per cent have attended only grade eight or less. I need hardly add that in the modern Canada most of these people will be chronically unemployed as long as they live, unless schemes can be developed to raise their educational level and provide them with skills with which to earn a living. Persons with not more than four years of formal schooling are simply not qualified for the skilled jobs that are becoming ever more important in our society.

One of the best indications of equality of opportunity is the amount of money that is spent yearly for each pupil. In 1961 the amounts spent in each Province ranged from $378 in Alberta and $373 in British Columbia to $141 in Newfoundland and $162 in Prince Edward Island. Thus, in dollars one Province spent almost three times as much per pupil as another.

Another yardstick to measure equality of opportunity is teacher qualifications. The proportion of teachers with university degrees varies from 47.4 per cent in one Province to only 7.7 per cent in another. Thus, five times as many teachers hold degrees in one Province as in another. Where is the equal opportunity here?

Another test to apply is the ability of a school system to hold its pupils. Among Canadian Provinces there is wide variation in the number of early dropouts. In one Province six out of ten children in a particular age group remain in school until they reach junior matriculation. In several other Provinces the corresponding figure is less than three out of ten.

These facts and many others which I could add destroy any illusion we might have cherished about equality of education opportunity in Canada. Yet on this vital subject all we receive from the Government is a thundering silence. How can we hope to think of ourselves as a unified nation when one part of the country is on such an obviously different level from the rest? It seems to me a major contribution to the goal of Canadian unity would be a commitment by the Government to make available the necessary funds to wipe out this discrimination and provide every Canadian with equal opportunity to develop to the limit of his educational ability.

In addition, economic gain would also result. Instead of just handing out subsidies and tax concessions to private industry to stimulate growth in certain areas, we suggest that economic growth would be more effectively stimulated by equalization grants and other methods aimed at upgrading the general level of education. Investment in human capital is the most promising strategy in a long range attempt to reduce inequalities in education and living standards.

So far, Mr. Speaker, I have referred to the lack of equal opportunity in Canada. I should like to turn now to the level of higher education, for it is here that the staggering proportions of our education crisis become startlingly clear.

Let us look for a moment at the depressing lack of facilities. In Ontario, despite the fact that we have a critical shortage of doctors and dentists, the University of Toronto rejected three out of every four students who wanted to enter dentistry. Four hundred and sixty six students applied, but the lack of facilities meant that only 128 could be accepted. At the Faculty of Medicine two out of every three applicants were rejected because of the lack of facilities. At the University of Western Ontario 200 medical students applied but there was space for only 60 and at the University of Ottawa 200 were eligible but there were places for only 78. This story could be repeated for other such institutions from coast to coast and represent an appalling waste of badly needed brainpower.

In Ontario the number of applicants trying to enter university will climb from 33,000 in 1963 to over 100,000 in 1970. In Canada as a whole it will rise from 141,000 in 1963 to nearly 290,000 six years later.

What answer will we give to this wave of young people battering on the doors of our universities? How many additional hundreds of thousands would there be if we were to take a step which the New Democratic Party has advocated for years, namely free university education to all with the ability to absorb it? Yet, if we fail to meet this crisis, if we fail to provide the facilities, we deprive hundreds of thousands of Canadian youth of the chance to a better life than that enjoyed by their parents. By failing to meet this crisis, we deprive Canada of the contribution that such trained people can make to our general prosperity.

If we are to provide all these facilities in the next ten years, we will require a capital outlay of $1.7 billion. This does not include the expenses of such things as heat, light, maintenance and salaries. Yet, Mr. Speaker, in 1963-64 our universities received only 60 per cent of the capital grants which they requested. We are not even meeting current needs, never mind preparing for the wave of students that will face us tomorrow and that will continue to enter our universities well into the late eighties. Even if we were prepared to make massive expenditures to provide these facilities, we will still face the staggering problem of professors, teachers and lecturers. In the year 1961-62 there were 2,100 on the staffs as teachers. By the year 1970 8.5 thousand will be needed.

However, Mr. Speaker, instead of taking positive steps to hold our teachers in the fields of science, engineering, medicine, etc., we seem determined to create conditions in Canada that will drive them to other countries. Most people are familiar with the term "brain drain". Let me provide a few examples. We are losing doctors, scientists and researchers at the rate of 1,500 per year. We train them and export them, then buy back the products of their brains. Between 1950 and 1960, we lost 1,864 scientists, 5,864 engineers, 3,956 teachers, 569 professors, 2,107 physicians, the latter at an average training cost of $25,000. We have 12 medical schools and the yearly loss of 250 is equal to the output of three of them. Unless this drain is halted we stand no chance at all of building up a sufficiently large staff of teachers to man our universities. The loss to our economy of such brains is incalculable. Why do they go, and what can we do about it?

Part of the reason, no doubt, is salaries. The average United States salary in these categories varies anywhere from $3,000 to $10,000 over the Canadian scale. However the salary issue is by no means the most important factor. The most important factor is recognition of their worth to the community and the provision of adequate facilities for research.

Research, Mr. Speaker, is basic to the lifeblood of higher education. Without it, the whole level of your educational system falls behind the rest of the world. Without it, universities become nothing but glorified high schools. Since industry draws on such basic research, a lack of it means your industrial growth is slowed. In short, a continued program of extensive research is vital to higher education. The tragic lack of such facilities is the single biggest contribution to the "brain drain" to the United States.

The Medical Research Council received a grant of $6,900,000. This meets only 65 per cent of the applications it receives for research projects. We are so niggardly in this field that many of these applicants could not carry on without grants from the United States. Four of our Canadian universities constructing basic science buildings will have to apply to the United States for grants because we have no mechanism for capital grants for equipment. For every dollar we spend per scientist Britain spends $3 and the United States $10 to $15.

In 1963 the total medical research grant for 12 universities was $4,800,000. In the United States, for 78 universities the grant was $900 million. By comparison, our grant should have been $100 million. Is it any wonder that we are failing to hold these people in Canada? Can anyone blame them for going where their talents are recognized and they are given the opportunity to develop their genius? One cannot help but concur in the view of Dr. D. V. Bates, the Assistant Dean of Graduate Studies in Research at McGill Medical Faculty, when he said:

> The Canadian Government has been worse served in its scientific research advice in the last six or seven years than any other western government.

Another source of teachers is our graduates. If time permitted, I could detail our niggardly system of graduate bursaries, which results in our graduate system being about the worst in the western world. However, Mr. Speaker, I think I have said enough to indicate that if we are going to meet the crisis of higher education in Canada it will require a massive effort that is far, far greater than anything we have ever imagined possible.

Another aspect of the education crisis arises from automation and technological change. Canada is just beginning to feel the effects of this change, and in the next decade there is probably no aspect of Canadian life that will not be affected. In order to be sure that people adjust to such changes, we must develop far more effective retraining schemes than those in effect today. As workers' jobs disappear through the use of new scientific machines, they will have to be retrained for other jobs. During such retraining their income will have to be maintained until they are relocated. Such income will have to be a proper income, and not the pittance now paid. Failure to erect such educational schemes will result in widespread hardship and unemployment.

We shall have to encourage the building of technical colleges to turn out the thousands of technicians that the scientific age will require. It is freely predicted that young people starting to work today may have to be retrained four or five times during their working lives. I could go on outlining the years of crisis in our educational system, but I think I have given enough examples to indicate that a problem of gigantic and staggering proportions confronts Canada. It is obvious that a serious attempt to grapple with the problem is going to result in skyrocketing costs and massive outlays of money. And yet, it is imperative that we succeed because the whole future of Canada is at stake, since education has a direct relationship to a nation's economic growth.

It must be obvious also that if a realistic approach is going to be taken, the Provinces simply do not have the financial resources to do the job alone. They will need and must receive very large financial assistance from the Federal Government. I realize, of course, that education is an area of Provincial responsibility under the British North America Act, and I am not suggesting that we interfere in this exclusive jurisdiction. At the same time, it is hard to see how we are to proceed as a united nation unless education is regarded as a matter of national concern and of direct interest to all Canadians. A competent and well balanced work force is required for the healthy growth of our Canadian economy and the maintenance of our standard of living. If Canada is to be successful in carrying on the economic and political struggles of the future, a much greater percentage of her citizens must possess a higher degree of education or skill.

The principle of Federal aid to education is nothing new. The education of Indians and Eskimos, as well as children of the armed forces overseas, is a Federal responsibility. Through the years, substantial grants have been made available to the Provinces for technical and agricultural education. More recently some $340 million have been advanced under the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act. Following the war an immense D.V.A. program of education was financed by Ottawa. A per capita grant of $2 has been paid to universities as well as various grants to research and scholarships. The Glassco Commission refers to some 20 different Federal departments which provide some educational service today. Today more than ever, there is a greater need for Federal support for education through financial agreements with the Provinces. For such Provinces as might object, some formula can no doubt be worked out to meet such objections, similar to the opting out formula since, as I have emphasized, we are not advocating that the Government enter the educational fields of the Provinces except in a financial way.

• (6:40 p.m.)

In order to assist the Provinces in carrying out their responsibilities in this vital field we advocate the following 10 point program.

1. The establishment, in co-operation with the Provinces, of a Federal secretariat of education to perform the following services. (a) To supervise the educational activities of more than 80,000 students at present attending Federally operated schools at an annual cost of $50 million. (b) To assist the Department of Labour in carrying out a continuous survey of labour needs in Canada. Such studies would permit the programs of the retraining schools to be adjusted to meet trends in the labour market as they are revealed. Unless this is done we are educating in a vacuum and our expensive retraining facilities will prove ineffective. (c) To encourage and publicize the comprehensive programs of adult education at present offered by extension departments of universities across this country. (d) To act as a clearing house for matching grants and other contributions paid to the Provinces for university construction, vocational schools, student loans, scholarships, special courses for new Canadians, handicapped children, apprentices, unemployed, etc. (e) To provide a medium for the distribution among Provinces of information resulting from research studies and experiments conducted at the local level by school and university authorities. (f) To facilitate student exchange and teacher exchange abroad. (g) To co-ordinate the educational work of the Canada Council, the National Research Council, the Medical Research Council, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and UNESCO.

Let me emphasize that all of these educational services are being performed now, but in a fragmentary and hit-or-miss fashion. It would seem the time is at hand to set up, with the approval and support of the Provinces, this type of co-ordinating agency.

2. The Federal Government should assume 75 per cent of the capital cost of university construction costs. The total cost of public education is now $2 billion a year and will double in the next 10 years. If the Government assumed the major portion of university construction costs, the Provinces would be better able to carry their resposibilities on lower levels.

3. Immediately raise the per capita grant from $2 to $3. Operating costs of universities double every five years and immediate relief from this pressing burden is needed. The last increase was in 1962-63 but costs have continued to rise. This would be the most effective way of preventing an alarming increase in student fees. The objective should be the lowering of fees and their eventual removal altogether.

4. A special grant of $1 million yearly for distribution among Maritime Provinces to assist them with their special university problems. At the same time review and if necessary, increase the equalization grants so that all areas can develop educational programs equal to that in the wealthier areas.

5. Assume 75 per cent of the cost of vocational and technical training, and in particular full cost of research in universities including facilities, salaries, equipment, etc. Such a step would make a vital and stimulating contribution to education at all levels and, at the same time, to the total development of Canada.

6. Provide for a broad program of bursaries and scholarships as well as the present system of loans. It is imperative to make sure that every student obtains as much education as his ability will allow.

7. Increased financial support for graduate schools. Unless we have a spectacular increase in graduate studies we shall never be able to train the scientists and teachers which our expanding schools and modernized industries require. The shortage of skilled people is world wide and we can no longer look to other countries. We must train our own educators.

8. Intensify enormously our long term analysis of the economy as a guide to the provinces in drawing up curricula and courses.

9. Encourage the practice of student exchange. In 1963, 8,115 Canadians studied outside Canada and about 8,500 foreign students studied in Canada. In terms of international good will such programs should be expanded. To supplement the Commonwealth scholarship plan a similar one should be established for student exchange within the whole French cultural community.

10. Treat all university donations from private sources as deductible for income tax purposes and exempt universities from federal sales taxes, as is done with hospitals.

I realize that, to some, these proposals may seem extreme, but to my mind they are the very minimum which will suffice. It is suggested as an interim measure, pending the report of the Commission on the Financing of Higher Education in Canada, whose report is expected late this year.

It may well be that the above measures will prove to be totally inadequate. The crisis in Canadian education is neither new nor is it likely to become easier in the very near future. It is estimated that the rapid expansion of students will be with us throughout the 1970's and well into the 1980's.

That being the case, the problems I have outlined today are going to intensify. Strong financial assistance such as I have suggested would also relieve the pressure on the individual home owner, who still carries the main burden of education costs in Canada. This has always struck me as being an unfair burden. No doubt many people would ask if such assistance would result in higher taxation. The answer of course is no. The report of the Economic Council of Canada estimates that if the Government is prepared to institute growth programs sufficient to bring unemployment down to 3 per cent, even existing tax levels will produce surpluses of over $2 billion. There is no reason why such surpluses cannot be channeled into the critical area of education.

May I again emphasize, as emphatically as it is possible for me to do, that Canada faces an education crisis of the first magnitude. While recognizing the constitutional position with regard to education the Federal Government must still step in with strong financial help to the Provinces.

Canada is a Confederation of ten Provinces, but it is also a nation. To move forward as a nation into the scientific age with imagination and confidence the Federal Government must play its part in providing what President Claude Bissell of the University of Toronto describes as "heroic measures" to meet the pressing demands of modern education.

In conclusion, I wish to quote a brief passage from the second volume of the Report of the Royal Commission on Health Services. I quote:

> We have in Canada a land of immense resources. We must use them for the good of all Canadians. We have an opportunity to build upon the northern half of this continent a nation of educated and healthy people. Nature itself favours such a possibility.
>
> It is for us to to organize our resources in harmony with our favoured situation that Canada may become a show-place of man's humanity to man.
>
> We will rightly stand condemned by history if we fail to do what our people need and what our resources make readily possible.

Nothing less than this is acceptable to the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Bernard Pilon (Chambly-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add the voice of my riding to those already heard in order to congratulate the mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne (Mr. Cashin) and the seconder (Mr. Chrétien) for a job done resolutely and intelligently.

There is no need for me to point out the various measures outlined in the speech from the throne. It is obvious that special emphasis is put on new farm policies which, in turn will provide our eastern farmers with more sustained reforms and which will, as a matter if fact, give a new value to their profession.

Other areas are also being dealt with. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) said that the legislation set forth was copied from our neighbours to the south. All members of this house are in perfect agreement as to the similarity of problems facing our two countries.

Furthermore, it is intended that Quebec citizens should become true partners within confederation and that the constitution should be an instrument of unity and justice. We are justified, therefore, in anticipating a better future for all Canadians.

I would be remiss if I failed to point out our contribution to the settlement of international conflicts. We are fortunate in having a team that is inured to the complex problems which face our country daily—perhaps it will play the role of mediator in the future —and I am positive that with our allies we will find solutions to the situations brought about by greedy and ambitious persons. Our Prime Minister distinguished himself in that area and continues to do so. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) runs his department with a firm hand. Much has been done for the maintenance of peace; several bilateral agreements were revised and others will undergo a revision in the future.

The UN is facing a crisis, and you may rest assured that our Prime Minister will be called upon to sit on any commission to settle it.

In an editorial in La Presse of February 1964, the Prime Minister was mentioned as the only man able to save the UN. It is now facing another difficult situation where great skill is required. The Prime Minister has opened the door to negotiation, and I am prepared to say that the American reaction is very favourable, since the need for negotiation is felt. The Viet Nam situation is highly complicated: there are political ideals difficult to attain and blameworthy religious ideals. The political and social problems created by this conflict will only be solved through measures reflecting common sense, foresight, charity and compassion.

Our friends of the New Democratic Party advocate pacifism and neutrality, but this does not contribute to the immediate settlement of those confused situations created by ambitious political men paid by absentee enemies whose influence is felt in domestic conflicts and revolutions.

The part which our country wants to play is one of peace and not of intimidation; we ought to continue to maintain our prestige in the eyes of the whole world. The reforms which we will have to make in order to maintain our standard of living are sensible and will meet present needs.

Obviously we are conscious of the role that our youth will have to play, those young men and women who will carry on. Our young people will be faced with more serious and complicated problems, but their training will help them find a solution. They will be severely judged by the community, just as we are now. We all hope that our young people will be able to get all the necessary experience to govern and meet the problems that will arise.

Before I close my remarks, on behalf of my constituents, especially those from St. Hilaire and Beloeil, I would like to remind the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) that the Richelieu River still flows a distance of 25 miles through the constituency of Chambly-Rouville. We are interested in reviving the question of the canalization of this river and hope the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) may see his way clear to building the necessary retaining walls.

Mr. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks, may I congratulate very warmly the mover (Mr. Cashin) and the seconder (Mr. Chrétien) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I do so because, in the first place, it is the custom, but mostly because they carried out their task with mastership, conviction and displayed much eloquence. I hope this optimism they have shown will spread in high government circles so as to inspire them with ideal and instil in them the required energy to apply the program proposed in the speech from the throne, and this for the benefit of all Canadians.

But what exactly does the program which the government holds out to us mean? To embellish it, the government has succeeded in adorning it with lots of flowers which, unfortunately, are a little faded since they date back several years and which, it seems to me, are doomed to a slow death, precisley because of the inaction and lack of imagination on the part of the present government.

Mr. Speaker, the program advocated in the speech from the throne constitutes a real electoral manifesto, but that does not necessarily make it reprehensible provided the government introduces the necessary measures to implement it. I think it is absolutely impossible to consider passing such a program without first initiating a basic reform, that of parliamentary procedure.

I for one sincerely regret that the report of the special committee on procedure and organization was not agreed to at the end of last session. In fact, I believe that to be realistic, any program of parliamentary reform should call for a time limit for the debates of this house and also propose the necessary means to refer to committees specially set up for that purpose the detailed consideration of estimates and study section by section of government bills. In my opinion, it will be impossible to carry out a large part of the government program as long as the government does not give proof of energy and determination in that regard.

Mr. Speaker, I find it impossible, in reading the speech from the throne, to determine where the government wants to lead us. To be sure, it wants to please everybody, and I cannot blame it for that, but quite a few of the measures it is putting forward seem contradictory.

For instance, the government claims it is committed to a policy meant to promote the strength and unity of the Canadian confederation. To this end, it proposes the maintenance of consultation at the federal-provincial level. Such consultation is indeed most desirable, but specific measures still have to be put forth, if this co-operation which the government apparently wants to see established in the field of federal-provincial relations is to become a reality. Now, the one concrete measure the government seems to be setting forth has to do with its intention of repatriating the Canadian constitution through a formula already approved by all provincial premiers, but which has not yet been ratified by all the provincial legislatures.

As everyone knows, that is a highly controversial issue in Canada, especially in the province of Quebec, and I feel that before proceeding with the adoption of the formula, the government would be well advised to set up immediately a committee of the house which would hear evidence from constitutional experts and submit a report on which the government should base its future action.

As far as Senate reform is concerned, Mr. Speaker, I feel the government should forget about an old proposal which is not even a measure but which has been put forward on many instances. Instead, it should give serious consideration to the reform of the other place by transforming it into a constitutional committee or assembly to which recognized experts in constitutional matters would be appointed.

In my opinion, the Prime Minister could very well call to the Senate, immediately, for instance, Messers. Robert Fowler and Marcel Faribault, the authors of this treatise on the constitution which has already attracted much attention, namely, the book entitled "Ten for One". There is surely room in the upper chamber for people of such a standing as Marcel Faribault and Robert Fowler. I believe that if reforms of that nature were effected, we could restore to that legislative chamber most of the prestige it enjoyed in days gone by.

Mr. Speaker, the government claims that it intends to promote national unity, but let us examine the contradictions which exist in several of its measures: on the one hand, it says that the rights of the provinces must be respected; and on the other, after it had parliament approve a bill allowing provinces who so wish to opt out from joint programs, it announces new measures which are but new joint programs.

There are, for instance, measures designed to promote rural development, the re-employment and training of workers, social assistance, urban renewal; all those measures will be co-ordinated by a secretariat within the Prime Minister's office, necessarily involving further agreements between the provinces and the central power.

Premier Lesage has already termed those measures as gifts from the Greeks. He said that the province of Quebec was thinking of opting out of those new joint programs.

The government also seems quite pleased with the economic situation. It states its satisfaction at the growth rate of the economy, at the volume of our external trade and at the fewer number of unemployed.

But the vagueness of the measures proposed gives clearly to understand that the government is at the end of its resources, and I rather get the impression that we are drifting, that we are buffeted by forces the government is powerless to control.

And all the time chronic poverty prevails and we cannot solve the problems created by a new technology.

The government adopts a carefree attitude which is not warranted by the economic situation. Unable to act, it is helpless in the face of run-away inflation. It admits that the cost of living, already at its highest in the history of Canada, is still going up; and the only remedy it can find is to freely advise the private sector to practise self-discipline. And yet the government continues to spend at a dizzy rate and controls all sectors of the economy.

The economic council is doing something, of course, since it submitted a report but did the government act on it? There has been no evidence of that until now. Besides, what are the powers of that economic council?

Moreover, I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the government on its initiative to establish a company of young Canadians, through which the energies and talents of youth can be enlisted toward useful projects both in Canada and abroad. Surely the time has come to fully use that vis viva which is youth.

And talking about young people I should like to insist upon the proposal of establishing a model parliament in order to celebrate Canada's centennial. That initiative was conceived by William Fair, from Saskatoon, who has been working on it firmly and intelligently for more than two years. It has already received the approval of both the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition.

It is a most interesting proposal, first from the point of view of the representatives sitting on it who will come from the electoral constituencies. The selection will be made on a merit basis and, to be elected, it will not be sufficient to enjoy a certain popularity, but also to have been selected by an impartial jury for one's qualities as speaker and for one's ability to express ideas.

I think that such a parliament should be free from any partisanship. It will discuss matters regarding Canadian unity and the future of confederation. Finally, it is proposed that it sit in this very house during parliamentary recesses, if, there are any in the year of the centennial. It seems that, to prepare adequately this model parliament of young people, the senior parliament, that is our own parliament, could right now get seriously to work on its present task of improving the situation of all Canadians and thus serving the whole people. And, the most important task it has to accomplish, is to restore the dignity of parliament itself.

Mr. Speaker, we are living in Canada through troubled days, and perhaps no single event illustrates more this crisis than the event which occurred in this Chamber last week, when the hon. Member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) crossed the floor, leaving the party to which he had dedicated so many years and all his loyalties and energies to sit as an independent. At the loss of a close friend and associate, I can only express grief and dismay.

As for the reasons which prompted him to make his dramatic decision, after months of soul searching, I speak more in pity than in anger. Here is a man of abiding loyalties, an urbane, civilized, erudite Canadian, with a broad political concept; a man of moderation, quiet and competent and of sound judgment. He is a man who wore lightly the mantle of high office and who enjoys the friendship of so many on all sides of this House. Surely the departure of such a man from the ranks of any party must signify tragedy for the party that bears this loss. And the tragedy involves much more than just the person or personality of the hon. Member for Three Rivers; it affects all of us. For if there is no room for such a man in the Party, what kind of a man from Quebec or even elsewhere can the Party accommodate?

It has been said that certain elements rejoiced at the departure of the hon. Member for Three Rivers from their ranks. I cannot believe that such sentiments, if indeed they were exhibited, could be genuine. For if they were expressed, what happy turn of events, what victory could they possibly portray? If there was a victory for anyone, it was indeed a hollow victory. Was it a victory for the unity of the Party that has lost one of its most loyal supporters? Was it a victory for Canadian unity? Will it inspire confidence throughout the land? Very few people, I believe, not even political adversaries, can rejoice in their heart of hearts, or lightly dismiss the gesture posed by the hon. Member for Three Rivers, or feel anything but deep regret and frustration.

Yet, the historic Conservative Party, to which I belong, must carry on. Its past role has been honourable and, at times, decisive. Its present potential is great—never has such an opportunity been given to a political group to exercise responsibility, leadership and comprehension—to rise above the petty issues of the day and, by highly asserting leadership and principles, win the allegiance of the great mass of Canadian voters, many of whom remain undecided and even confused at the spectacle daily reported from Parliament.

This is the Party that affirms its faith in "One Canada". Like the Member for Three Rivers, I believe in "One Canada", but it must be a Canada broad enough and generous enough to encompass all of its people and particularly to give to one of its founding races—the people of Quebec—to which I belong, ample scope for the fulfilment of deep yearning for autonomy, and an autonomous cultural destiny. That "One Canada" must aver itself full of understanding for the particular history, traditions and aspirations of the people who were, after the Indians, the first settlers to its shores. It must not be a recognition given grudgingly or with restriction, or on such a narrow basis that the recipient can only stifle or wither away, cast off as a lonely branch on the great Canadian Tree.

The Member for Three Rivers, along with others of his colleagues from Quebec, understands the need for comprehension. On an historic occasion in this Chamber, he spoke loudly against separatism and expressed so eloquently authentic Canadian sentiments in these terms:

> We have not been elected to bisect this country but rather to unite it and weld it together and to encourage comprehension, not only between the two great races which compose its population, but also between the different provinces of Canada—

And, again, he said:

> I am here to take an interest in the affairs of the country as a whole—I am convinced that Quebec will be strong and prosperous inasmuch as the whole of Canada is strong and prosperous, and vice-versa.

They speak of the need for a strong, central power. I believe in a strong central Government capable of exercising all its attributes under the Constitution, but governing within the limits of this Constitution and dedicated to the spirit of federalism which is nothing if not based on diversity, or a respect for the autonomy of the provinces, and to the recognition of the basic partnership implicit in Confederation.

Some claim for the central Government greater powers in the interest of efficiency and strength. But let me ask them this: Will Canada be more efficient or stronger when one of its founding races feels itself frustrated, unhappy, even alien within its own country, or merely tolerated?

And yet, this is surely where an inflexible policy would lead. What inspiration or leadership, that vaunted leadership based on moderation, which is supposed to be Canada's special trademark and contribution, can this country give to the world if it cannot even solve the problems of unity within its own borders. How, indeed, can it speak with any authority to Africans, Asians and so many other people of the world where racial, cultural, religious and social differences are so much greater and deeper than our own, when it cannot settle differences between two peoples, both the heirs of the same Western civilization, each professing Christianity and who, moreover, have lived side by side for two centuries?

Yet, I am not one of those who harbour feelings of despair. My hope is founded on the firm basis that there are men and women in this Chamber, and in this they reflect the views of the millions across the land whom they represent, who are firmly dedicated toward the attainment of comprehension, mutual understanding and respect as their primary goal and the most noble achievement toward which this Parliament can aim.

Indeed, what else but such a broad, flexible policy can weld together the mosaic of peoples, regional interest, and geographical and economic differences that make up this uncertain entity that is Canada?

Yes, Mr. Speaker, I believe in Canada, and my faith grows stronger when I see these men and women of so many different origins and backgrounds, drawn from all parties, and outside parties, speaking out, appealing for unity and understanding with an authentic Canadian voice—men from English speaking Canada appealing to my own compatriots, telling them of their understanding, indicating their willingness to meet, to parley, to negotiate honourably and openly in an attempt to spell out the needs and ideals of a Canada acceptable to all, men who are willing to innovate to gain this end.

Should not such overtures inspire all of us who are concerned about Canadian unity and the future of Canada to greater efforts in achieving it? This is no time for withdrawal or retrenchment, but rather for greater effort and involvement.

To those who have extended the hand of friendship and understanding, I say, thank you. We will clasp that hand of friendship and will with your help together build the kind of Canada which we know is possible, faithful to all of its past, yet looking toward the future, the sort of Canada which alone can be a beacon of light in a difficult age.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few brief remarks during the debate on the Speech from the Throne. First of all, I would like to congratulate the mover, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) and the seconder, the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien), of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I think that through their speeches they have made us aware that our Canadian youth has potentialities that are fundamentally good and which all of us here should encourage. I believe these two young members of the house have made us realize to what extent we can be optimistic as far as the future of our country is concerned.

I would also like to congratulate the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue (Mr. Martineau) who just resumed his seat, for the magnificent speech he delivered.

It is very difficult to make a speech after such a speaker as the one who preceded me. I cannot help agreeing totally with most of the points in his statement.

It is really a pity that in our country we cannot have men of good will or find some ground for agreement that would allow us to find solutions to the problems with which we are now faced.

Mr. Speaker, we are now discussing the proposals set forth by the government in the Speech from the Throne. Very briefly, I should like to say that, after going over all those proposals, I realize that the government is being quite bold, but also that its program will probably give rise to a great deal of discussion, a lot of negotiations, and could only result in legislation after quite a few lengthy conferences with the various provincial governments.

I am aware that the government has put forward certain measures which concern the activities and responsibilities of provincial governments. Here again, of course, one is tempted to say that the government is intruding into provincial jurisdiction and that such encroachments are unacceptable. For my part, I am inclined to ask certain questions.

Are all those efforts of the government really blameworthy? Not necessarily. So long as the government will agree to discuss with the provincial governments so that the latter might draw such legislation in agreement with the central government, so long as the central government will agree to include in its programs a provision enabling the various provincial governments to opt out when they so desire, while collecting the monies required for the administration costs of those projects, I am sure they will not be bad.

There might be some disadvantages. There will certainly be some. There is probably a positive aspect also and it is this aspect that we should stress. Personally, I see the possibility of an advantage which would be enjoyed throughout our great country. When I speak of uniformity, I mean that some provinces may have special needs because of very special problems. Those provinces will surely want the joint programs to contain provisions respecting their particular situation.

There is another aspect of joint programs which I find advantageous. You may say that it is a bit selfish on my part but I feel that during the first few years following the establishment of a joint program by the federal government, with the approval of the provinces, there is a certain amount of groping; one has to experiment. Experience is there to prove it. During the first two or three years of operation, the need for several changes comes to light. Distributing the cost of experimenting and implementing such a plan among the whole population of the country is not a bad idea in itself. I think there is no point in each and everyone going about his own experimentation. This is an economical, logical and practical way. When several plans are tried out on a national basis in agreement with provincial governments, from an economical and practical point of view, I think it is not a bad thing provided a province has the opportunity to opt out when it deems it necessary and collect that part of the tax it is entitled to for contracting out of that particular plan.

Mr. Speaker, here is another point I should like to deal with. I was listening earlier to the remarks made by the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue (Mr. Martineau) on this matter and I could not help but agree with him in this connection, for on several occassions I personally advocated that this was perhaps not the appropriate time in our history to undertake to amend our constitution.

I think some amendments could be made to it but, there again, in the heat of this debate we often hear constitution or so-called constitution experts make ex cathedra statements on what amendments should be made. So far as I am concerned—and I am no expert in this field, I am only a member of the mass of the workers—I am rather inclined to think that it would be wise to put off repatriation of the constitution. I think nobody is strongly objecting to this repatriation but to tie it to a certain amendment formula is another thing.

This matter is so wrapped up in emotions at the present time that I think perhaps it would be better if repatriation of and amendment to our constitution were put off for the time being. There are now in the province of Quebec two agencies which have been set up precisely in order to consider the amendments which should be made to the constitution. Those two organizations have not reported yet.

I think that the Lesage government should be careful and should wait for those agencies to submit their reports before treading a path where it will perhaps be very difficult to turn back. The Laurendeau-Dunton commission does research work and will certainly be in a position to make very appropriate recommendations with respect to the amendments which will have to be made to the constitution. Is this not another good reason to delay the repatriation of the constitution or at least the proposed amendments?

Perhaps it would be good for the central government to consider the setting up of a special commission made up of members of the house and experts from outside who might be selected throughout the country, real specialists who would report. Then we might legislate in the field with a deeper knowledge of the real needs of the time.

There are also in the Speech from the Throne several suggestions respecting measures which the government intends to take in order to solve the problem of unemployment in this country and promote economic development. In two parts of that speech I see things in which I am interested and which I take to heart. At one place, it says:

> You will be asked to approve the creation of a fund for rural economic development—

Well, Mr. Speaker, personally, I am anxious to see that measure because we have already a fund for economic development. It is only a matter of giving it the extension it requires to face the present needs and use it in order to promote greater industrial development.

• (7:30 p.m.)

I would think, Mr. Speaker, that that bank is the instrument we are looking for. It has been in existence for a long time and in operation for several years. Therefore, let us provide that organization with the powers it requires, particularly in order to meet the demand of capital for the development of secondary industry in Canada.

The Speech from the Throne also announces that the government is planning legislation to set up a Canadian Development Corporation.

I would say that both projects are almost similar since both have the same goal, namely the expansion of the Canadian economy.

It is obvious that it is only in developing the secondary industry sector that we will eradicate unemployment which is affecting our country and make up the exchange or monetary deficits we have been experiencing for a number of years.

As all other countries, Canada must have as an objective maximum or optimum production, if you like, of consumer goods under any form. We realize that it is impossible to produce everything that we consume, but there is quite a wide margin between what we produce, what we consume and the potential of this country.

Before I conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to a trip I had the opportunity to make recently when the government delegated some members of the special committee on defence as observers during naval exercises held under NATO in the Caribbean Sea.

I should like first of all to commend the R.C.N. officers for the fine welcome they gave us on board. They treated us very well, and I have nothing but praise and thanks for them. I also want to congratulate them on the way they executed the manoeuvres.

However, because there is a qualification—I would even say there are several of them—like the other members of the expedition, I noticed that the living conditions of our men were far from satisfactory, especially on our only carrier, the Bonaventure.

I am not making these remarks to be critical or to condemn anyone in particular. Perish the thought. I merely wish to draw those facts to the attention of hon. members and to show the sailors we visited that we did not fail to notice the problems which existed on the Bonaventure even if we pretended not to see them. Our aircraft carrier is 20 years old. It was assigned a specific task which called for a crew of about 800. However, with the passing of time and with the evolution of Canada's and North America's defence systems, in one word, following our commitments to NATO, we had to entrust the Bonaventure with the new tasks with the result that, today, it has a crew of 1,300 and those men have to live in extremely cramped quarters.

Mr. Speaker, if Canada wishes to continue playing in the major leagues, it should be ready to pay the price; otherwise, it should go back to the minor leagues. By that I mean that if we cannot afford to buy adequate material to provide decent living conditions for our sailors, it would be just as well for us to withdraw from the game and to be content with a field of endeavour which is within our means.

Canada has only one aircraft carrier. The crew of the Bonaventure is very able and I was truly amazed to see how its members behaved in those circumstances.

But if the operation of an aircraft carrier is warranted, we must consider either getting a modern one, or have two so that they could spell each other in naval exercises in order that the crew members will not be kept away from their homes as long as they were recently, that is three months.

Moreover, considering the conditions under which those men work, they must be well rested and have a clear mind because they always have to be on the alert.

Mr. Speaker, I can hardly see how men as competent as our Canadian seamen, working in such conditions and having such inadequate facilities to rest, can be in physical condition and have the open mind to perform the task they are required to do.

Men living aboard the Bonaventure or at least some of them, are lacking the bare essentials as far as facilities are concerned.

We are told that the ship will be put in dry dock next year to be completely rebuilt inside. We are even told that some facilities now lacking will be added, but I do not see how the ship could be enlarged, and unless the crew is reduced and the tasks assigned to that ship, made fewer, I think it would be impossible to give this aircraft carrier modern and up-to-date comfort. Facilities on that ship were good for the turn of the century but not for the year 1965.

If it can be justified to lay that ship in dry dock for a period of one year, if it has been found that we could dispense with that aircraft carrier for a year, it can only mean one of two things: either we have no more use for that ship or our defence system will be inadequate for the period during which the ship will be under repairs. Either we will have to abandon that field of activity completely or we will have to rent a similar ship so that its present crew may continue the training it is undergoing at the present time.

I know nothing about the plans of the Department of National Defence in that field. I know it is a very expensive piece of equipment, but if we decided that it was needed then we should secure what is best, a ship on which men can live decently.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal with another subject, housing. I see on the other side of the house the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Lloyd), formerly mayor of Halifax. I know he is aware of this problem, as are other members of the house, but for the information of my colleagues, I would like to point out that certain members of the Bonaventure crew have expressed major criticisms.

[Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John).]

One of these concerned living conditions aboard the ship and the other related to housing in Halifax.

Incidentally, I would like to say that the situation is not something of which the former mayor of Halifax should be proud. In fact, I think he should have brought pressure to bear on his fellow citizens during his mayoralty in order to promote certain developments in his city and provide for reasonable cost housing, where our seamen could live decently.

They are now forced to pay fantastic amounts, sometimes even higher than what hon. members have to pay here in Ottawa. In my opinion, this is a situation which is absolutely unacceptable on the part of the authorities of the city of Halifax and the military authorities of this country.

We should see to it that our Canadian sailors enjoy low rental housing.

Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the criticisms which were levelled by our sailors, because they came from responsible people. In fact, some criticisms were made by young men who had joined the navy six months, one year or two years ago. I listened to their grievances, but I paid more attention to those which came from the petty officers. The latter play a most important role on board because they are responsible for the efficient and continuous handling of the ship. Most of those petty officers have 10, 15, 18 and even 20 years service in the Canadian navy, and many say that they are ready to quit the navy if they are to remain on that ship.

I feel that, after having invested so much money to train men, it would be simply ridiculous to let them go because we are not supplying them with the proper equipment they need to do the jobs we give them. It is one or the other: either we give them the tools to perform those jobs or we simply eliminate both the jobs and the men.

[Text]

Mr. D. G. Hahn (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, it is traditional in the Throne Speech debate to congratulate the Mover and the Seconder of the Address in Reply. In following that path tonight I am more than just following tradition. I believe the speeches of the hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) and the hon. Member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien) are worthy of high commendation.

I would also like to congratulate the hon. Member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue (Mr. Martineau) on the speech he delivered in this Chamber tonight. As an English Canadian I thought the points of view he expressed on the problems and tensions within our country were extremely well put, and I would hope he would distribute copies of his speech to his own caucus colleagues because, if the views he holds were more widely held throughout the country, the tensions he was discussing would be largely diminished.

Often in the Throne Speech debate a Government Member gives a scenic tour of his riding and discusses with fulsome praise the items contained in the Speech from the Throne. I am not going to follow that path tonight. We on the back benches on this side of the House have little enough opportunity to get up and talk about issues in which we are particularly interested. If we do so on the estimates, when Opposition members have an opportunity to do that, we are often accused of filibustering our own estimates. It is sufficient I think to say that I, as a supporter of the Government, am delighted with the contents of the Throne Speech. It is a program that offers excitement and challenge. It is a program aimed at many of the fundamental problems existing in the country.

The only description I am going to give of my riding is of one of the boundaries of it. Flowing down the western boundary of my riding is the Don River. It is a colourful river, but unfortunately the colour is generally supplied by the waste dyestuffs that flow out from the industry located along its banks, so that at times the river is red, blue, deep green or purple. The river flows through a valley rich in vegetation, fruit, trees and flowers, but in summertime when you travel up the river you are not able to enjoy the fragrance of the valley. You get the fragrance of the river; and that fragrance, unfortunately, tends to be coloured by the sewage that is flowing down it. In the sunlight, the river sparkles, but it is not the water that is sparkling; it is the pile of foamy detergent that is flowing out into the river. In short, the river is polluted and it is carrying its polluted products down into Lake Ontario. The topic therefore I would like to discuss tonight is the problem of pollution that exists within the Great Lakes area. This may seem like a parochial issue, but I do not think it is. The Great Lakes are important to all Canada. Some 30 million people live in the basin surrounding them. A third of the Canadian population lives in the area surrounding the Great Lakes.

The Great Lakes were the cause of the tremendous build-up in population and of the tremendous industrial growth in the central part of our country. They offered water for navigation, water for cheap power and, above all, the water that was needed for consumptive purposes, for industry, for human beings, for communities. The abundance of clean water made possible the growth of this part of our country, and I think made possible the industrial growth of our country. As a by-product of these things we have since developed a fishing industry, and we have many recreational uses for water in this area.

Water is an important resource to any country, and we in this country are lucky. We have an abundant supply. Some 50 years ago or so, we never worried about our water supply. We appeared to have it in ample quantity, and we could use it as we liked; but now we are beginning to be concerned about it because we realize that a few generations hence water on this continent will be in short supply.

We who live in Canada, which has a vast supply of this commodity, are particularly lucky, but I think we realize that we must plan now for the future use of this resource, so that when we do need it, it will be available. I think we realize that within our borders we have a commodity that in the future is going to be a valuable export item, something that will be needed by our neighbours to the south, something they will not have that we do have.

The recent problem of water levels on the Great Lakes has highlighted the importance of water supplies to this area. It has produced the low water levels of the last few years, which affected navigation on the lakes and the production of power on them. I was a member of the committee that was looking into the problem of water levels on the lakes, and, as a result of the preliminary examination we were able to make last session, I think it is pretty clear that the problem of regulation of water levels can be solved, and, in fact, will be solved. I would think that because of the time required to build the works necessary, we shall probably have the cyclical improvement so that the problem will tend to rectify itself, at least temporarily, before we establish a permanent solution. Nevertheless, solved it will be.

In the evidence that was given before that committee one of the things that impressed me was the role of the Federal Government in this problem. We found that many, many Government Agencies, Boards, Commissions and Departments were involved. We asked to have a chart prepared—which we did not get—showing the relationship of all these Federal Government bodies dealing with this problem. I would think that if an organization chart were prepared, showing the Federal Government's role in this area, it would tend to look like a plate of spaghetti. This is a fundamental problem we must bear in mind.

We are not co-ordinated at the Federal level. We have divided responsibility. We have overlapping jurisdiction. We have groups here, there and everywhere, scattered throughout the Federal Government, each doing a little piece, with nobody that I can really see completely responsible for the problem. We talk about these things being co-ordinated, but I am afraid too often co-ordination in this sense mostly means shifting the responsibility to somebody else, and this is a problem we have to bear in mind.

Out of the work we have done on the problem of water levels has come a realization that the Federal Government must establish clearcut responsibility for the future use of this great resource, dealing first of all with problems of the levels on the lakes, and then looking further ahead at the future requirements on a continental basis, and the future diversions that are going to be necessary—such things as the Grand Canal we have heard about, flowing the waters from the James Bay watershed into the Great Lakes area; and other diversions from the West coast, bringing water down to the Central plain where it can be used.

All these things were discussed before the Committee dealing with the problem of the conservation and regulation of the supply of water. They dealt with the quantity of water available, but what they did not deal with is the quality of water. There is not a great deal of use having a vast quantity of water if the water you have is unusable. Quality for the uses to which we want to put our water is vital.

It is true we can use dirty water for navigation and power production; but if we cannot use it for consumption we cannot support large communities, we cannot support industry, we cannot support population in the surrounding area. It seems to me that we in the Great Lakes area, and also in other parts of the country—but I think primarily in the Great Lakes area—are now in the process of destroying this great resource that we have. Man in his wisdom is taking this one vital commodity that is essential for the economic survival of this area, and destroying it. If we are not careful we shall not have it in usable condition for much longer. I think everyone is aware that Lakes Erie and Michigan are in almost critical condition now. I think we all know there are 2,000 miles of Lake Erie which no longer support fish life or proper vegetation—algae are spreading everywhere. We are all aware of the decline in the fishing, particularly in Lake Erie. It is suggested that most of the beaches on the shores of Lake Erie and probably Lake Michigan as well, are now unfit for swimming and recreational use. It is known that no raw sewage should be pumped into water to be used for consumption; yet the city of Windsor pumps all its sewage, raw and untreated, into the Detroit river and the city of Welland is still pumping raw sewage into the Welland canal area. There are plans to rectify this situation, but as of this moment the old practice is still being followed.

Toronto has made vast improvements in its treatment of sewage, but despite this in heavy storms raw sewage is pumped into Lake Ontario off the shores of Toronto, and it is estimated that $300 million would be required to provide completely adequate treatment in Toronto to ensure that no raw sewage would get into the lake.

Dr. Langford, Director of the Great Lakes Institute and associated with the University of Toronto, said recently that the next ten years would be critical. This is about the amount of time we have; if we fail to deal with the problem soon we shall have passed the point of no return. I could go on to give further statistics, but I think it is generally accepted that the Great Lakes are reaching the critical point. We must find a solution to this problem and find it quickly. We, with our ingenuity, will fairly soon I think control water levels in the Great Lakes, and we shall probably spend a billion dollars doing it. Having done that, if we are not careful we shall create a new world wonder; we shall then have what is probably the largest, the most expensive and the best regulated cesspool on earth. It is something we should not allow to happen.

One might think that a solution to the pollution problem would be simple. After all, pollution comes from only three sources—sewage dumped by municipalities, industrial waste, and garbage and sewage discharged from ships. The effect of all this on the water is varied. There is the serious hazard to human life. Fatal and contagious diseases can result from infected water. I should like to read a quotation from a speech given on December 9 last by the Secretary General of the Canadian Council of Resource Ministers on the subject of water pollution. The Secretary General said:

> The St. Lawrence Seaway has opened the Great Lakes to 90 per cent of the world's commercial vessels. The increase in pollution by these vessels is a matter of great concern, involving water supplies, recreational beaches and real estate values. The discharge of shipboard sewage near public water supply intakes is of special concern. With ships from all parts of the world entering waters adjacent to public water supply intakes, the chances are greatly enhanced for waterborne disease transmission, and particularly those diseases from other countries which have long been gone from the Canadian scene or never have obtained a foothold here. Few ships plying the Great Lakes have some kind of shipboard waste control device aboard. Most dump their garbage directly into the lakes. It has been estimated the amount reaches between 1,000 and 2,000 tons annually.

This is the first serious effect of polluted water—the danger to health. The second is the effect on the fishing industry and the effect on the fish that live in the waters concerned. The third is the effect on humans of a less dangerous but nevertheless unpleasant nature —water which, because of its appearance or its odour, is unfit for human consumption or use. There is also the effect of polluted water on industrial growth. Industry needs clean water, for use in its processing; it will not locate by a polluted lake. Finally there is the recreational aspect, the effect on the tourist industry, on wildlife and all the other things which make life really worth living.

The solution to this problem should be simple. If the municipalities would stop dumping raw sewage, if industry would stop dumping its waste and if ships and pleasure craft would stop dumping garbage and sewage into the water there would be no problem. But the solution is not as simple as it appears. There is the question of jurisdiction. Pollution is mainly a provincial matter, yet many of the waters about which we are speaking flow from one province to another. The Federal Government is involved to some degree. We have federal legislation now under the Fisheries Act, under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, under the Criminal Code and under the Shipping Act. All these statutes deal in minor ways with the problem of pollution. Yet within the Departments of Fisheries, Justice, and Transport who really is concerned about water pollution at the federal level? I do not think we know.

In addition to split jurisdiction between the Federal Government and the Provincial Governments the Federal and State Governments of the United States are obviously involved as they, too, share the lakes and are polluting the waters just as badly as we are.

The next major hurdle is probably the highest of all. It is, of course, the amount of money which it will cost all municipalities to treat every bit of sewage before dumping their waste into the lakes. How much will it cost to eradicate sewage and industrial wastes? I do not think we know. I have tried to get figures indicating the total cost of clearing up pollution in the Great Lakes, but so far I have not succeeded. I think it is sufficient to say that the cost would be tremendous. This is the reason why in the past adequate treatment has not been provided.

A final difficulty which has to be overcome is the apathy of the public generally. It is not very glamourous to spend tax dollars on sewage plants. As an example, there is a story that the Mayor of Toronto was recently questioned about a project to build an arts centre in that city. The comment which followed, was this "What do you want,—a centennial sewer?" Well, maybe that is exactly what we do need, but it is not an easy policy to sell.

I should like to consider for a few moments what is being done at the present time to try to tackle this problem. First, there is a meeting scheduled for the spring of 1966—a meeting of the Resource Ministers Council which consists of the ten Provincial Ministers and the Federal Minister involved in this question. The meeting will discuss all aspects of pollution whether of a water, air or land. I think this conference will produce extremely beneficial results in the long range, but I am concerned about its timing. It is scheduled for the spring of 1966 and I am sure it will be at least a year after that before any positive action is taken as a result of that meeting. We would then be in the spring of 1967. Dr. Langford about a year ago said we had ten years left in which to act. Three of those years would already be gone.

• (8:00 p.m.)

I feel that this conference is covering too broad an area. I feel that this conference is going to arrive at long term solutions. But I do not think it is going to move quickly enough to deal with the specific problem which exists in the Great Lakes area.

The second thing I am concerned about is the lack of really good liaison with the United States on this problem. We have some liaison with them now, and I gather that the International Joint Commission issued a preliminary report about a week or so ago dealing with a limited segment of the pollution in the lakes area. But again we have not really got down to a hard bargaining position with the United States, trying to launch a major campaign to clean up the Great Lakes area. We are doing a bit of research on the problem, but the amount of research being done, particularly by the Great Lakes Institute, is woefully inadequate. The amount of money they are allocated by the Federal and Provincial Governments in relation to the size of the problem is minute, and we have a great deal more to do in this area.

The Province of Ontario has, I think, done a major job in the last few years with their part of the problem. In 1956 they established the Ontario Water Resources Commission. Within that Commission they have now co-ordinated their efforts, so there is one place in the Province of Ontario to which you go, knowing that there is where the responsibility lies. As a result of this co-ordinated effort they have recently announced, within the last few weeks, that they are embarking upon a five-year program, setting limits for industry so that the industry around the Province will stop polluting its waters. They are going to give industry five years to achieve this goal. I think this is a very practical, useful step; the only concern I have is whether industry will be able within this five-year period to finance the work necessary to stop its pollution.

The Federal Government is offering assistance to municipalities through the National Housing Act, to build sewage treatment plants. This too is beneficial, but again I raise the question, is it enough? Is this going to get the job done?

Finally, there is a certain amount of work being done now in the field of educating the public. I think particularly of the series of articles which ran during the last week or so in the Toronto Telegram outlining the problem of water pollution. I think this is a very necessary step, and it is something which has to be done on a much wider scale so that the public at large, who are going to have to raise the tax money to cure the problem, are aware of the need for expenditures in this area.

The steps which have been taken thus far are all practical, useful steps. They are all moving in the right direction. They are all working toward a co-ordinated water policy for the country. They are working toward eventual solution of regulation of the Great Lakes. They are working toward eventual elimination of the pollution problem. But again I am concerned that they are too slow, on too broad a front and they are not dealing specifically enough and quickly enough with this prime problem.

I think there are a number of things that could and should be done right away. I think that the principle we have to follow, if we are going to save this water resource is, first of all, to put our own house in order in this country. We must make sure we are doing what needs to be done, and then having done that we can sit down with the United States government and say: "Look this is the effort that we are putting forth to clean up our side of the lake; it is now on your plate to handle your problem and clean up your side". I think that if we were able to sit down and bargain on that basis we could get full co-operation from the other side.

In order to put our house in order we have several things to do. First of all, we have to establish clearly and distinctly who is responsible at the Federal level, and what is the organization at the Federal level that will cut out this problem of shifting responsibility from one side to another. We must tie in definitely and clearly responsibility, with an ability to act in the field of water resources. Having done that, I think then we should get together with the Provincial Government, and in this case it is relatively easy because there is only one province directly concerned, the Province of Ontario. Having got together with the Province of Ontario I think it would be quite easy to work out with them a joint program.

First of all, we have to look at the preventive legislation which is on the books and see what legislative changes are necessary. I think we should arrive at an estimate of cost both to the municipalities and industry to clean up our side of the lakes. Having arrived at an estimate of cost, we then have to see who is going to pay the cost and how it is going to be financed.

There are several means of financing available. The sewage treatment plants needed by municipalities are essentially a municipal responsibility, and I think that the extension of low cost loans from the Federal Government might induce the municipalities to proceed at a much faster rate. As far as industry is concerned I think it might well make it possible for industries to do the job if they were to be offered accelerated depreciation, fast write-offs on the special plant and equipment they would need in order to treat their waste products, before they dump them into the waters. I think that between these two levels of government public information must be stepped up so that when it comes to a choice between an arts centre and a sewer, the choice is not as ludicrous as it seems, and perhaps the right choice may be not an arts centre but a sewer. I think the public have at least to be able to make an intelligent discrimination when they are offered choices of this type.

We must also look at the laws respecting navigation of the lakes, to see whether we should not change our laws and prevent our own ships and foreign ships from polluting our waters. We must step up the grants that we are giving in the field of research so that we can know much more than we know now how much pollution the lakes can take, what type of pollution the lakes can stand. They can stand certain types of chemicals, and certain types they cannot stand. We do not know nearly enough about this, so we must increase the research in this area.

Finally, in the research area there is a great deal which might be done to lower the cost of treating sewage, to lower the cost of treating industrial wastes. I think that research into this effort would produce very beneficial results. If we can discuss this whole range of topics and reach agreement with the province on solutions to these problems, then we are in a position to go to the United States with our program laid out and see whether we cannot get them to do the same thing on their side of the border. If we are able to do this—and I think it imperative that we do this—we can stop the destruction of the Great Lakes and we can stop the waste of this resource that we are now spoiling. If we do not do this, Mr. Speaker, and if we do not do it quickly, I am afraid that the gloomy predictions of Dr. Langford and others might well come true, and we in our great wisdom may well succeed in destroying an essential resource, essential not only to Central Canada but to the economy of the whole country.

Mr. A. C. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this Throne Speech Debate it gives me a great deal of pleasure to congratulate the hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) and the hon. Member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien) on the very efficient manner in which they performed their task. However, Mr. Speaker, I cannot say that the Speech from the Throne means very much to the people in the constituency of Meadow Lake.

I note there is a section of the Speech dealing with the abolition of poverty.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the Throne Speech Debate and I noted that the Liberal Government has advocated an attack on poverty. Liberal Governments down though the years have created poverty by their lack of development and organization and their lack of assistance to those early settlers who pushed forth into these unlimited yet undeveloped areas. This same Government which has enunciated an attack on poverty, only a few days before the Throne Speech voted against an amendment to give $25 per month to that old age group 65 years to 70 years, and voted against an increase in pensions payable to individuals 70 years and over to $100 a month. Such an increase in pensions and a lowering of the age requirement would in itself have provided a great deal of assistance in the fight against poverty throughout this country.

The Meadow Lake constituency encompasses a vast area and takes in about 40 per cent of the area of the Province of Saskatchewan. It does not represent that percentage of the population, but the population of that area has dwindled since the Liberal Government took office. No one can predict with any certainty what will happen to the Meadow Lake constituency after redistribution.

I should like this evening to draw the attention of this House to several problems of concern to many of the people in my constituency. Perhaps to begin with I should refer to proposed rail line abandonments. Our memories reach back to years when the pioneers moved into this area, and what took place when the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. operated what they called Colonization Settlement Boards which, in many cases, preceded the settlers in the search for arable lands, and then returned with large placards advertising these fine fertile areas they had discovered, in an attempt to encourage people to go in and settle these productive lands. A great many war veterans returning from overseas, having fought over there on behalf of this country, were encouraged to go into these areas and to develop them. They were assured that rail line surveys had been made and that these lines would be constructed. Provincial Governments offered large tracts of land for homesteading purposes. People moved in by the hundreds and thousands, to settle these vast areas in the Meadow Lake constituency.

These pioneers were led down the garden path by the railway companies and the various Governments. The C.P.R., for instance, in collusion with others, was allowed to mislead these people. In that area at the south end of my constituency, where I live, the C.N.R. surveyed a rail line and brought in settlers. The C.P.R. realized that this was a prosperous area and also looked at the area with some prospect of moving in. The C.P.R. was granted running rights over the C.N.R. track from Prince Albert to Debden, a distance of some 90 miles built an additional 90 miles and were allowed to reap the wealth of this area. No assurance or guarantee was required of that company that it would push on further. Why were they allowed these running rights without the assurance that they would continue the line? Surely those settlers in the areas of Goodsoil and Pierceland could expect that the C.P.R. would continue this line in return for running rights. These officials should have been compelled to continue this line. Many of the people in this area have to haul their farm produce to Meadow Lake, the nearest rail point, and in some cases over 65 miles. I suggest these people were betrayed.

Why has the C.N.R. not been compelled to build a line between Frenchman Butte and Heinsburg, Alberta, thus creating a direct line from Prince Albert and North Battleford and on into northern Alberta? Such a line would service all the people on the north side of the Saskatchewan River. This would mean a direct line link along the natural barrier of the North Saskatchewan River into Alberta. Why was the C.N.R. not compelled to build this line, closing the gap over a 38-mile area?

I am not one to advocate the nationalization of the C.P.R., as I believe in private enterprise, but I believe that if two farmers who lived side by side found that their holdings were not sufficient to provide both with a decent standard of living, one would sell out to the other. I think all the rollingstock in this area should be operated by one railway company concentrating its efforts on providing the service these people can justifiably expect. The C.N.R. pioneered this part of the country and should have the opportunity of operating this service. It should have been incumbent upon the Federal Government to see that this company provided the services warranted by the area and its development. I am sure when one looks at the fine farm towns that have sprung up in this area, the mineral resources which have not been tapped and the number of settlers who have moved in and developed the country, he can only come to the conclusion that these people have been deceived. Their rail line was abandoned before it was ever completed. If the gap were completed from Frenchman Butte to Heinsburg, Alberta, I am sure it would be a rail line that would pay dividends. One should look at its geographical location on the north side of the North Saskatchewan River.

[Mr. Cadieu (Meadow Lake).]

Look at some of the losing propositions in which the C.N.R. has invested and which the taxpayers have had to subsidize. There are so many that I could go on at great length. Take their adventure into the provision of hotel accommodation. I think they would have been well advised to leave the hotel business to private enterprise. The loss on the Chateau Laurier hotel alone would pay in a very short time for the bridging of the gap between Frenchman Butte and Heinsburg, Alberta, and I am sure it would do a great deal more for the development that this country needs than the Chateau Laurier hotel is doing for the welfare of the country.

So far as this problem is concerned, I think it is the duty of this Government or any government of the country to get down to straight facts and sound business principles, and to see to it that before the railway companies are allowed to talk about rail line abandonment they must lay their cards on the table and produce facts. This is particularly so in the case of the Government owned railway, and the Government should see to it that it does the things by way of development which are required of it.

When one looks at the Town of Meadow Lake he sees the largest grain storage facilities of any town in the Province of Saskatchewan. One can see that the products and the development are there. We do not know what they are paying to maintain 90 miles of track in order to reap the benefit of this whole country, but we do know that both railway companies are complaining that they are not making any money on these lines. Let them get together on their books and see where the real trouble lies, before they are allowed to talk about coming in and tearing up the tracks.

Let us look at some of the blunders that were made by the railway companies. Let us look at some of the miles of grade they built on which they never laid the track. I am speaking now of the miles of grading they did from St. Walburg up through to Pierceland on which they never laid any track, whereas only a few miles away they should have linked up the gap between Heinsburg and Frenchman Butte, and they overlooked this completely.

I should like to speak for a few minutes about another grievance in my constituency about which quite a few people are concerned, and I think they have a right to be concerned. I refer to the Cold Lake bombing range. The land was taken over by the former Liberal Government to establish a bombing range at Cold Lake, and when settlement was first made early in the summer of 1957 a group of settlers in the area were discriminated against. I am speaking now of the Métis people in the Canoe Lake, Beauval and Île à la Crosse areas. They were tricked in the settlement that was made and were not paid on the same basis as other groups or individuals in the area.

When this was drawn to my attention in 1958 I set about to try to get these people further consideration. I was successful in doing this under the former government. While the payment was not made equal to the settlement received by the other groups, I was encouraged to believe that the payments would be brought up to an equal basis. Our Government was defeated early in 1963, but when I later approached the Associate Minister of National Defence of the present Government and presented the plight of these people to him, any further payment was completely rejected. I was told by the Minister that no further settlement would be made.

I think it was a shame that the Liberal Government of 1957 took advantage of these people. Later the Conservative Government, under the leadership of the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), proved that there was a discrepancy in the settlement with these people. We made a further payment to them and planned to bring them up in line with other groups that had been affected by the bombing range.

I think the present Government had a responsibility to complete this settlement, and I do not intend to let them forget this injustice so easily. It is quite possible that some people will think that these people were well paid, but when a government takes away the livelihood of people and does nothing to rehabilitate them and their families, there certainly should be no discrepancy. All groups or individuals should be paid on an equal basis. The livelihood of these people was taken away from them because of this bombing range. Their forefathers came to this area and lived by fishing, trapping and hunting in the area. I think the Government of the day has a responsibility and these people certainly should have been rehabilitated in some other way, and not by paying them a certain amount of money on the eve of an election and taking away their livelihood from them. I think this was a shame. I am receiving letters every day about this matter and I do not think the Government has any right to say to these people: We are going to take away your livelihood from you; you will have to go on living there in your shacks and cabins and all we will pay you is a measly token.

The Indian Affairs Branch looked after the Indian population and they received a considerably different settlement from that given the Métis. I think it is the duty of the Government to open up this file and take a good look at it. We can easily go through the file and find out where the discrepancy lies, and give these people the justice to which they are entitled.

There is another matter which I brought up earlier. It has gone by the boards now and nothing can be done about it, but I think it is a shame. I am referring to the destruction of the mid-Canada radar line. How secret this was kept. I was the Member for that constituency and I was not told a single thing about it. I saw an article which said, I believe, that the Saskatchewan Government was notified, but did nothing about it because when the time was ripe for offering suggestions the Provincial Minister, who did not realize what this meant to northern Canada, was misled. This radar line across the vast northland of Canada cost millions of dollars and it was ordered to be scrapped. Crews were hired to go in, cut the guywires, and let the installations go to waste. They were told to wreck fine cabins and other such accommodation for the caretakers, and to destroy all the equipment.

As soon as word leaked out of the possible destruction of these towers, the Minister was questioned. He wanted to remain ignorant of the fact. He let on it was too late, then, but we found out 15 hours before these radar towers were to be destroyed. We questioned the Minister and he had received word that the C.B.C. was interested. He indicated that word of their interest had been received too late, but it was 15 hours before these towers were to be destroyed. You can declare war in a quarter of that time. With modern communications systems, this destruction could have been stopped. If the C.B.C. were interested, there was a possibility of bringing radio and perhaps even television into this vast area of the northland. One only has to think of the many isolated people, the thousands of young people in that area, to realize the benefit that might have been derived from such a development. However, nothing was done to stop this destruction.

This Government knew, and the Minister knew that there were crews stationed at these towers. He came out with the weak excuse that the towers were dangerous to airplanes flying in the area. Very few airplanes fly in the area, but the towers were equipped with beacon lights. We had the equipment and we even had the fuel to keep these lights going for the next ten years. This was a weak excuse. This destruction had to take place. These are some of the things that make one wonder. As I say, this destruction could have been stopped because the lighting equipment was there and the caretaker was there. There was no danger to airplanes. The C.B.C. could have been given time to study the possibilities of these towers which were built throughout this country at great cost, whether we paid for them or the United States government paid for them. If the C.B.C. was interested, then God knows they spend enough money, and in the interests of economy we should have given them an opportunity to study the matter.

I should like to speak for a few moments about northern development. During the past few days I received a copy of a speech, as I suppose many other hon. Members did, from a C.C.F. member of the Saskatchewan Legislature. He was giving his version of northern development. He advocated that a vast part of the Northwest Territories adjacent to northern Saskatchewan be included in that Province. I am sure the people of the Northwest Territories, when they look at the development that has taken place in Saskatchewan during the last 20 years under a C.C.F. government, would have little desire to be linked up with that Province. I could not blame them. When one looks at the development that has taken place in northern Saskatchewan under a C.C.F. government for the last 20 years and a Liberal government for 30 years, he finds that all that has been done has been the removal of minerals during wartime. Little has been done since.

[Mr. Cadieu (Meadow Lake).]

The Leader of the Conservative Party in Saskatchewan proposed the construction of a rail line from Meadow Lake to Hudson Bay. This was no pipe dream. This is an area which has a vast potential in timber, minerals and fish products. I believe the Federal Government should take a good look at this proposal. We built the Pine Point Railway in Alberta and now that Provincial Government is proposing to build another rail line to develop the northern part of the province. Yes, there is great need for development of the northland. A number of years ago some of the businessmen in Meadow Lake, who could get no action from the Government, took it upon themselves to blaze a winter road through to Lake Athabasca in order that some of this freight that was going into Uranium City could go in through northern Saskatchewan, rather than through Alberta. They proved the feasibility of such a road. They blazed the road through and took freight in through Lake Athabasca across to Uranium City.

Under the former Government, and the Provincial Government of Saskatchewan, we started a winter access road. We built it as far as La Loche. When one looks at the terrain beyond that point, he cannot see any reason why this project should be stopped at La Loche. It should be continued to Lake Athabasca, then down to Stony Rapids where it could go into the Northwest Territories. I think Mr. Petersen, the Leader of the Conservative Party in Saskatchewan, had a brilliant idea when he proposed the construction of a railroad from northern Saskatchewan to Hudson Bay.

There is an unlimited potential for development in northern Saskatchewan, especially when one thinks of the mineral resources north of Buffalo Narrows such as iron and copper. There is a vast population in this area with nothing to do; there is nothing for them in the future, except socialist aid. Since this Government took office not one move has been made to continue the winter access roads or to undertake any developmental projects. There is a great need, for instance, for a bridge at Buffalo Narrows where there was a tragic accident last winter. These are developments which, I am sure, would pay great dividends. I believe it is the duty of this Government to take a good look at the possibilities of northern development and to continue the work which was started by the former Government.

I recall so well that when I was elected there were hundreds of Indian boys and girls who did not have a school to attend. During the campaign of 1963 I could brag that not one Indian boy or girl was unable to attend school. We built wharves and we assisted the Provincial Government in the construction of winter access roads. Today we find everything at a standstill, the same sort of standstill we went through for 20 years under a Liberal regime. Why can these people not take an honest-to-God look at a country that has so much potential, and then let us get down to our northern development policy that was started under the Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker?

• (8:40 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate very warmly the mover (Mr. Cashin) and the seconder (Mr. Chrétien) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

They discharged extremely well one of the most difficult tasks; did they not succeed in putting a new face on their old party?

Tradition was well served and the party's honour is safe.

Some criticism was most constructive, in particular what the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette), the leader of our party, the Ralliement Creditiste, had to say. I think everyone will agree that the first two days of debate were very interesting and useful to the house.

During those days every party had the opportunity to speak on behalf of its own group, and all members delivered well prepared and fine speeches.

On subsequent days, however, speakers were inclined to repeat simply the main ideas put forward by their first spokesman. We would have been ready to vote after the first stage; but since an eight-day throne speech debate is provided under the standing orders, members must speak during those eight days. We must vie with one another at all costs.

I shall try as much as possible not to repeat the remarks already put on the record, so as to spare you the torture of the drop of water.

As a matter of fact, since the beginning, we have been listening unconcerned and helplessly to a series of speakers and to what avail? Let us vote on the document read to us so that we can get on with it.

It is unthinkable that no government over the past 97 years felt the need to improve the beginning period of a session. Has it ever occurred to anyone that it was urgent to shorten this tedious period? Will an end ever be put to all these repetitions which are such a waste of the time of the house?

Governing, Mr. Speaker, is not a question of days or hours but a question of judgment.

Is there anything more painful than to drink even though one is no longer thirsty? And yet that is what we are asking the members of the house to do at the opening of each session.

The first time I attended this wordy battle, I thought it was to harden new members; such a performance on the part of adults is inadmissible because in a meeting intelligent men should have enough sense to keep quiet when they have nothing to say; however, timidity did not prevent some remarks to be made.

Today, at the opening of my third session, I notice a repetition of this comedy because, I am told, it is done in England. Mr. Speaker, you will agree with me that there is a limit to everything. We have today the absolute proof that our standing orders are outmoded.

I welcome this proposal to amend those dusty standing orders and I would even ask the Prime Minister to make it the first item of business.

Concerning this famous program containing the future business of the house, I would like to ask those in charge to establish a list of priorities for all those items and that it be scrupulously respected so that we may know what work we will be undertaking in the months to come.

Nothing is more disarming for opposition members not to know what tomorrow holds in store for them.

We are given notice of the business of the house for the next day only at ten o'clock in the evening while it is time to go to bed, and sometimes we are notified the same day. How can we proceed rapidly when we have not been informed of the subject matter to be debated.

The last session, Mr. Speaker, was an unprecedented monument built to the painful memory of a government groping ceaselessly to find its way.

Is it due to the incompetence of its leaders? Is it due to the lack of experience of some members of the cabinet? Is it due to this internal disorder brought about by this wave of scandals that unfurled on key members of the administration and reached the rank of the most humble members?

Is it due to a hidden, extra-governmental influence, by which government itself is outstripped?

Who is the master in your house? Is it the private secretaries? The technicians or officialdom?

To all those questions, only the party in office holds the answers. It is certainly not compelled to reveal them publicly, although the Prime Minister has made unquestioned efforts in order to set afloat his ship which dangerously keels over.

However, I am afraid the crew is too contaminated.

At all events, the Prime Minister will certainly have his hands full with his own party, his own government.

That is why I advise him not to complicate his position by interfering with the neighbour's business, namely the provinces.

There is an old saying: "Grasp all, lose all".

So I say to the Prime Minister that if he insists on continuing his illegal interference in fields exclusively reserved to the provinces, he will run with closed eyes to disappointments much more bitter than those he has known in the last few months, while leading his group of adventurers.

• (8:50 p.m.)

We are, therefore, warning the Prime Minister and his cabinet that eight or ten items contained in the Speech from the Throne constitute a revolting change of policy toward the provinces and a direct insult to the province of Quebec where I live.

A few days ago the Prime Minister, through legislation passed here, offered the provinces the option to take over certain joint programs into which the federal government had wormed its way, but today, the same government is suggesting the establishment of further joint programs.

It is truly the game of old-line governments who hand $1 to the provinces so as to better take $10 away from them. And this is what has always been called treating the provinces fairly.

When will you stop laughing at the people?

Do you take all Canadians for complete morons or are you that irresponsible?

When Quebec asks the federal government to get out of those fields of taxation, that does not mean the federal government should merely change place or position, but that it should disappear from Quebec's territory and mind its own business in Ottawa. Do I make myself clear enough with those simple words?

Will the Liberal government finally be intelligent enough to learn to respect provincial rights?

Back home, we say "like father like son". A government that shows so little respect for other people's property is setting a very poor example to the other members of the family, as we can judge by what is happening within the Liberal party.

The Prime Minister knows, better than anyone else, that education, agriculture, health, natural resources are fields exclusively reserved to the provinces. He is, therefore, the less excusable for interfering with such offhandedness in the business of the Quebec government. One should, therefore, not wonder anymore at the beginning of a quite legitimate revolt among the very leaders of Quebec.

As evidence, the last warnings given by Mr. Jean Lesage to the federal government that he will not tolerate that what was given by the right hand should be taken back by the left hand. Such action is hypocrisy, and nothing more, and it is not honest.

Consequently, we demand from the Liberal government the cancellation of these items, and I beg all my Liberal fellow citizens, if they still have the right to speak in their party, to take every possible means to call their leaders to reason.

If we scan quickly the speech from the throne, what is obvious is the socialistic legislation advocated by an ultra-centralizing government.

While 60 per cent of the 30 items of the speech from the throne are only a jumble of rehashed proposals, repetitions, aiming only at one goal, "to increase the volume", the end of this deluge of words ends on a discovery: war against poverty.

Do you know at least that since the dawn of history associations and governments everywhere have been fighting against poverty? As you can see, yours is not exactly a new idea.

However, what you seem to forget more than anything else is that in order to help, you have to give not take.

What is lacking today is purchasing power. It is not by increasing contributions and taxes that you will restore the purchasing power that the labour classes need for their economic recovery.

Indeed, we notice that the government has failed to put forward a single measure to fill that gap, which is the same as saying that the most remarkable aspect of the speech from the throne is its shortcomings.

It is not by setting up commissions of inquiry to provide employment for those who served the party well but by launching concrete reforms which will directly affect the working class that you will solve the existing problem.

That is why we, of the Ralliement Creditiste, request an immediate increase in family allowances, which have been forgotten since 1945.

We also request that income tax exemptions be raised to $2,500 for single persons and to $5,000 for married couples, with an additional exemption of $600 for each child.

We shall continue to fight so that our senior citizens receive $100 per month at the age of 60, without a means test, in order to do away once and for all with this army of inquisitive patronage agents who continuously harass our old people.

Everyone agrees that the Unemployment Insurance Act is unfair, especially with respect to farmers. The present act discriminates against many workers.

When will the government finally present the bill amending this famous act, and for which we have been waiting so patiently? When will it stop penalizing the unemployed workers instead of giving them what they are entitled to, for which they paid and for which they were taxed?

The present act is only a penalizing system. A family head is penalized because he forgot to return his card every fortnight; he is penalized because he left his employer who was exploiting him; he is penalized because he was sick; penalized for having refused a job which was too far away; penalized for having worked two days away from his job where he was working for three months, and his 24 stamps were even withdrawn from him; penalized for reporting to the office half an hour after the time set by the manager. A farmer is penalized because he owns a farm; for having kept five dairy cows which yield nothing in winter; penalized under section 59 (b), (c), (d); penalized under sections 146, 60, 62, 64, 65, 66; always penalized but taxed from the very first hour of work.

The present government has the nasty habit of grabbing everything it can, of taxing everything to the limit and giving back only what it wants.

That is what the people find revolting. When will Canada have a government which will govern in the interests of the people? When the people learn to elect their representatives instead of having them elected by the financiers. It will then rest with the people to keep their eyes open in the future to elect their own members of parliament.

Mr. M. L. Klein (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to extend my very warm congratulations to the mover of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne (Mr. Cashin) and to the seconder (Mr. Chrétien) for their very appropriate speeches.

I wish to add that both these young men are splendid examples of their races and both are destined some day, I believe, to achieve great things because they are eminently qualified to occupy the highest positions in this land.

I should like to speak tonight about the outcry which emanates from the Soviet Union and Red China whenever any action is undertaken by the Western allies or by the United States, whether it be in the Congo, Viet Nam, South Korea, when the West is constantly accused of being imperialistic. So I thought I would like to look at the record—and since 1945 the record of the number of countries which have achieved independence and the populations involved staggers the imagination.

I should like to put on the record the countries that have achieved independence since 1945. They are: Algeria, the Kingdom of Burundi, Burma, the Federal Republic of Cameroon, Cambodia, the Republic of Central Africa, Ceylon, the Republic of Chad, Cyprus, the Republic of Congo, the Democratic Republic of Congo, Dahomey, Gabon, Gambia, Ghana, Guinea, India, Indonesia, Ivory Coast, Jamaica, Kenya, Republic of South Korea, Malagasy Republic, Malawi, formerly Nyasaland, Mali, Malaysia, Malta, Mauritania, Morocco, Nigeria, Pakistan, the Phillipines, Rwanda, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Somali Republic, Sudan, Tanzania, Togo, Tunisia, Trinidad and Tobago, Uganda, Republic of the Upper Volta, Zambia, Israel, Lagos and the Republic of Viet Nam. The total number of countries which have gained their independence since 1945 is 49. A population of 948 million people is involved and 11,500,000 square miles of territory has been liberated.

As opposed to this Western record we have to ask ourselves the question: Where is Latvia, where is Estonia and where is Lithuania? Under the domination of the Soviet Union and Red China since the war are the countries of Bulgaria, Rumania, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, East Germany, Albania, Yugoslavia, Korea, the Republic of North Viet Nam, Tibet—Tibet is an example of what can be expected if United States troops withdraw from South Viet Nam—Cuba and Mongolia. The Western alliance has not taken a single mile of territory belonging to any other country since 1945.

The struggle in North Viet Nam and South Viet Nam, Mr. Speaker, is not the struggle between the north and the south any more than was the struggle in North Korea and South Korea. The struggle in North Viet Nam and South Viet Nam is the struggle between the East and West. I remember, as do many members in this House, when France fell and England stood alone, the isolationist policy which existed at that time in the United States. I remember the United States First Party. I remember the United States Ambassador to the court of St. James reporting to the United States Government not to intervene in the war because Hitler was going to win. I cannot help but feel that instead of having the isolationist policy which the United States had in 1940 if the United States had intervened or warned Hitler in 1933 when he crossed the Rhine that he was going to have to deal with the United States, perhaps the second world war would have been averted.

When people say that the United States should get out of South Viet Nam because they have no business in South Viet Nam, I cannot help but think back to the time of the Hungarian revolution in 1956 or 1957—I do not recall the exact time—when people pleaded with the United States to go into Hungary during the three days the revolution took place. If United States troops were in Hungary tonight, Hungary would be free. If United States troops were in Poland tonight, Poland would be free. Wherever United States troops are there is also to be found freedom.

[Mr. Klein.]

As we are all aware, there have been renewed tensions in the Middle East, and while the Soviet Union makes an appeal to peace loving nations in the world to bring pressure on the United States in South Viet Nam, she is doing more to create problems in the world than any other nation by arming the Middle East. There have been renewed tensions in the Middle East, and the danger of a renewed outbreak of fighting cannot be absolutely excluded. I noticed in the press that despite the dominant preoccupation with the dangerous situation in Viet Nam the council of NATO has found the situation in the Middle East sufficiently dangerous as to merit its consideration last week. The most inflammable element in that situation is the build-up of armaments, on the one hand by the Arab States which say openly they are determined to destroy their neighbour Israel, and on the other hand by Israel, which feels her existence is under permanent threat and who is making desperate efforts to acquire military material by way of a deterrent. I feel it would be correct to say that if this arms race can be halted on both sides the dangerous situation might decrease. What is the use of discussing disarmament between the great powers if the Soviet Union continues to pour war materiels into the Middle East? It seems to me it would make better sense to take a first step toward disarmament, which does not involve the question of how the great powers should disarm, but would involve a pledge on the part of the great powers not to supply danger areas with arms, tanks, guns and planes.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Another step which should be taken before disarmament can be discussed, is a step to obtain agreement on the part of the great powers in respect of boundaries of all countries in the world, because as long as boundaries are in dispute there can never be disarmament. Perhaps such an agreement would lend itself to a more calm period, and once any danger of military intervention was obviated substantive political problems in the Middle East might improve, even though this is bound to be a slow and gradual process.

There is no denial of the fact that the Soviet Union represents the major factor regarding a build-up in arms at least on the Arab side through a continuous, uncontrolled and unlimited supply of materiel to the United Arab Republic and other Arab countries. Surely the Soviet Union is as interested as are we and our allies in preventing a new conflagration in that delicate part of the world.

Therefore, I would request the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) to consider approaches to the Soviet Union through diplomatic channels and, if possible, in concert with our allies in an attempt to find out whether something can be done by agreement with the purpose of putting a lid on the armament race which, if it continues unchecked, is almost bound to sooner or later cause further military clashes.

I do not believe that a third world war will come, as the result of a direct attack by one major party on another, but a third major war could come as the result of a smaller war in a danger area such as the Middle East or Viet Nam.

Another matter which I should like to commend to the attention of the Government, again in terms of diplomatic dialogue with the Soviet Union, is the problem facing religious and ethnic minorities inside the Soviet Union, particularly that of the Jewish community there which numbers close to three million. A process continues, by which the Soviet authorities are gradually but systematically stifling the possibility for Jewish people there, who wish to do so, of practising their religious beliefs and obtaining the means for observance of the dietary and other religious practices, and to express their specific culture by way of books, newspapers and language studies.

Recently we had an example in this country of two individuals applying for citizenship being denied citizenship because they did not believe in religion. Our Government is now financing their case before the courts in order to preserve what we think is their right. This is exactly opposite to the situation which exists in the Soviet Union.

This strangulation of religious and cultural life has been causing great anxiety to the Jewish people here in Canada, as well as to Jews everywhere in the world, and I would request the Government to seek every opportunity to explain to the Soviet Union that this anxiety is shared by humanitarian opinions in this and other countries. Assuming that the Soviet Union desires to build friendship with our country, not only in the sphere of Government relations but also in the sphere of wider public relations, they should realize that this policy which is directed particularly at this moment against the Jewish community is not only wrong in itself but is bound to militate against their efforts to create a better image of the Soviet Union in the world.

In this connection there exists a problem in respect of reunification of families torn apart by World War II. Many of my constituents and I myself have been most gratified to note that our Government has continued its efforts to persuade the Soviet Government to alleviate individual suffering by permitting members of broken families to join their dear ones here in Canada and in other countries, and I sincerely hope that these efforts will bear fruit.

In conclusion, I should like to point out one specific thing. We in this country are going to debate very shortly the abolition of the death penalty. I believe that the tenor of this House favours the abolition of the death penalty, but while we are debating that question the Soviet Union still maintains the death penalty for economic crimes. I hope the debates which take place in this House on the abolition of capital punishment will be forwarded to the Soviet Union, so that they might know how Canada feels in this regard and how a democracy operates, and that while the death penalty for economic crimes existed perhaps in the 17th and 18th centuries, it has no place in the 20th century.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak during this debate on the Throne Speech. Like many other farmers I listened closely to the Throne Speech for some indication of hope for the farming industry. It contained a great deal of reference to poverty, yet in only one paragraph did it touch upon farm economy. Nowhere in that Speech was there set out any concrete or specific suggestion as to what will specifically be done in this regard.

The Throne Speech contained some reference to aid to uneconomical farms and assistance for small farmers, through ARDA and other measures, to put the agricultural industry on an economic basis, as they term it. Let us consider quickly the position in which farmers find themselves today. In doing so we must remember that the price of wheat dropped last fall approximately 18 cents per bushel. We must also remember that beef prices fell three cents per pound, pork prices were down and that there was general concern in respect of dairy products, and prices of other farm products, including eggs. We have recently heard a good deal of talk about farmers marching on Ottawa. This must drive home to the Government that there is a great deal of fear and unrest among the farming population today. There is a lot of talk about how the small farmer has to be moved so as to make room for the big farmer. How small is small? The large farmer today may be a small farmer tomorrow. This is the concern of the agricultural industry as I see it.

Surely as legislators we must realize that for a farmer to make a success of farming he must love the occupation. He must love the land, he must love animals, and he must love the outdoor life and the freedom to do what he wants to do when he wants to do it. I think that basically farmers do like farming for these four reasons.

But what is the trend today? The farmers are saying: Where are we going? Last fall the farmers faced a general decline in farm prices. They are not really desperate yet, but they are concerned. What is the trend today? What does the future hold for the farmer? In the United States, President Johnson is talking about the great society. What does the great society of Canada hold for farmers today? The fact is that their numbers will become smaller and smaller, their land larger and larger, their cares greater and greater and their pocketbooks slimmer and slimmer. This may well be the trend of agriculture today. How can the trend best be arrested? That is the question that I think the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) and others should be concerning themselves with.

An hon. Member: He is not here.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Well, the Minister is busy making speeches and trying to be the farmers' friend, but rarely if ever visualizing the farmers' plight as the farmer sees it. Some time ago the Minister referred to himself as the food minister or the grocery minister. I saw him on television one night about six months ago when he said that we have a meat problem in Canada. What is he doing about it? I looked for something in the Speech from the Throne. Where is it? Where is the great aid for the basic problems confronting agriculture? It is not a question of giving handouts to farmers or more money to small farmers to drive out their neighbours.

I should like to direct the Government's thinking today to the other side of the coin. People are continually saying that we must drive out the inefficient farmer and force him out of business by one method or another. Editorials in newspapers say: Do not subsidize the inefficient. Let us look at the other side of the coin. Is there not inefficiency in the marketing of the farmers' products? Surely we all know that the lower the price the farmer gets for his product, the more he must produce of that product; and the more he produces of the product, the greater the surplus and the lower the price he gets. The farmer finds himself on a terrible treadmill.

Let us have a look at the selling methods so far as the farmers' products are concerned. As cities grow and expand we see suburbia springing up here, here and here, and the establishment of great shopping plazas with food stores. Today these shopping centres do something like 75 per cent of the retail food business. The Price Spreads Commission, which dealt with the matter up until 1958, said that by that time shopping centres had gobbled up 64 per cent of the retail business and the small independent grocers had only 36 per cent. I would venture to say that today the shopping centres have close to 75 per cent, if not more than that.

I know there is a general concept today that these large, well lighted food stores with their big buildings must be efficient because of their size. This is not the case. The Price Spreads Commission of 1960 found the very opposite to be the case. They found that the supermarkets are not necessarily efficient. As I mentioned, the farmer is concerned about his share of the consumer dollar. In the report of the Price Spreads Commission of 1960 I notice that in 1949 the farmers' share of the retail dollar in the case of a loaf of bread was 23 per cent, while in 1958 it was 12 per cent. I would think that today it would be close to 9 per cent. That is found on page 312, volume 3, of the Price Spreads Commission report.

The same thing is true of beef, eggs and every agricultural product that the farmer markets today. Taking 1949 as the base year and representing 100, the retail price of beef today is 140. Yet there is only 2 cents a pound difference in the price the farmer receives. In 1949 the average price of beef on the hoof at the stockyards was 20 cents a pound. Today it is 22 cents. Yet there is a difference of 40 index points in the retail price of beef over the same period of time. Where has the inefficiency been in the marketing of that product?

Over the week end I visited the shopping centres of Ottawa and watched consumers buying in Loblaws, A & P and Dominion Stores. I would say that the grocery chains in Ottawa are a prime example of what the Commission pointed out, the inefficiency in the marketing of the farmers' products. I have here a flyer from a Calgary newspaper and I will refer to it as an example. In Calgary there is keen competition in the meat industry right through the packing plant and shopping centres down to the consumer. I dare anybody in Ottawa to tell me where weiners can be bought in this city for three pounds for a dollar. I use weiners as an example because they are a typical food, and similar in Western and Eastern Canada. You can buy the best steak in Calgary for 75 cents a pound, but at Loblaws in Ottawa on Saturday steak was $1.05 a pound. Where has the 30 cents gone? That is what the farmers want to know. In the old days when grocery stores were owned by individuals and the grocers had a guild they would take the owners of Loblaws, tar and feather them and drag them through the streets to convince customers that they were a firm with which they should not do business.

Mr. Greene: What are you waiting for?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Some smart aleck who does not know the seriousness of the plight of the farmer is making some loud remark. There is talk about the inefficient farmer. Let us look at the inefficient marketing of his products. This is what the Price Spreads Commission had to say about the food industry in 1960 in their report. I quote from page 60:

> The evidence we have studied has led us to the conclusion that there is an essential difference between the determination of prices at the farm level and the determination of prices in other markets between the farm and the consumer.

They then go on to say:

> The general recommendations we have made are designed to bring about changes in the process of price-making in the food marketing system which would be of benefit to consumers...and to primary producers...

They may have made recommendations but those recommendations did not bring about a general revision of price-making in the shopping centres. One only has to go to the shopping centres in Ottawa and see the prices that A & P, Loblaws and the rest of them charge for meat, and then compare the prices in Calgary for similar meat. I used the example of three pounds of weiners for a dollar. Bologna is another product that is the same all across Canada. It is four pounds for a dollar in Calgary. You cannot get two pounds for a dollar in Ottawa.

No, there is just no rhyme or reason for that price differentiation. The trouble is that there is no competition in the marketing of food, particularly meat products, in the large shopping centres. They are competing in the marketing of services, as was pointed out on page 26 of the Price Spreads Commission report. They said they were convinced that the structure of the food marketing industry has contributed to the advancement of prices to consumers, although they were unable to measure the effectiveness of the structure or the amount by which added services were really widening the spread in the price to the consumer.

I point this out because I seriously believe that this part of the agriculture industry needs greater study. You can take the Hedlin and Menzies report on poverty on the farm, and on inefficient farms, but let us look at the need for competition in the area of marketing of farm products. Certainly, we all know that under a system of free enterprise you must have sharp and keen competition or things get out of line. This is exactly what has happened. Our city planners who have been planning suburbia and the shopping centres have given these shopping centres a captive market with very little competition. They have driven out the independent grocer solely because the independent grocer has not provided a parking place for his customers. This subject needs careful study, and I would recommend a royal commission to do that.

One only has to talk to people who are buying beef at the stockyard, and ask them what determines the price. They will say: We have an order—and I am a buyer for Canada Packers or for Burns—from Safeway for such and such a poundage of beef. They will tell you out and out that today the shopping centres are able to dictate the price the farmer receives for his beef. There is evidence of this in the Price Spreads Commission report. The shopping centres, the chain stores, show a greater profit when the price to the farmer is the lowest. This is understandable, if you know their system. They charge all the market will bear. If the price of cattle is high and the shopping centre has to pay dearly for beef, that narrows the spread between what the shopping centre pays and what the consumer will pay. The consumer will only pay so much. If the price to the farmer is low and the shopping centre can buy beef cheaply, that widens the spread.

This is exactly what was pointed out by the Price Spreads Commission. The final price remains what the consumer will pay, and there was ample evidence of this as I toured the shopping centres here in Ottawa on Saturday. There was ample evidence that the shopping centres and chain stores were selling meat, in particular, at the highest level and were robbing the public of dollars which the public did not realize they were losing.

Somebody says, "Oh". I ask him to study the market to see if I am not correct. We hear a great deal of talk about productivity on the farm and how the farmer must be efficient. Let us have a little efficiency in the marketing of his products. Somebody may wonder why the shopping centres are able to widen the spread. This is solely because today the average worker spends 20 per cent of his wage on food, whereas a few years ago he spent 25 per cent. In other words he has more money to spend on food today than he had a few years ago. The shopping centres, therefore, can charge more for this food and widen the margin of profit. There is evidence of this in the Price Spreads Commission report. I have a number of pages marked, but I do not believe I will have time to read them.

One only needs to look at the Financial Post of September 26 which dealt with wholesale chain stores marketing food to see that the dividend on those shares doubled in the last four years. Certainly, I believe we must take a very close look at these facts before we condemn the small farmer, before we condemn the inefficient farmer. We should take a look at the inefficient system that great society, as President Johnson calls it, has evolved. Certainly the profits of chain stores and grocery stores that handle meat are higher than any other part of the industry.

On page 28 of the Price Spreads Commission report, volume 1, there is a table which outlines the gross margins of food retailing and wholesaling outlets up until 1957. This indicates that chain meat stores have the widest margin; 20.2 per cent of their sales was profit. It rose from something like 15 per cent in 1951 to 20 per cent in 1957. I suggest that if one could find similar figures today he would find it would be practically 24 per cent or 25 per cent. This is their profit margin on the products we are asking the farmers to produce.

During the last session of this House we had a committee set up to study the prices of feed grain for farmers in Eastern Canada.

This committee would have been better off studying the relationship of the price a farmer receives for his product and the price the consumer has to pay for it. This would have done the farmer a lot more good, in my opinion. Perhaps the committee could have recommended an agency to watch over the shopping centres rather than recommending an agency to watch over feed grain prices. A civil servant told me this interesting story, and I was not going to tell it, but I will. He said that we were importing mutton from Australia. I asked how it happened we were importing mutton from Australia when we had such a difficult time selling our own mutton or lamb. Nobody really likes mutton. This man deals with the packing plants and the chain stores every day. He said they are taking beef blood plasma and mixing it with Australian mutton, then selling it as ground meat. This is the kind of thing that is happening to our meat industry in Canada.

An hon. Member: We are getting the wool pulled over our eyes.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Somebody says we are getting the wool pulled over our eyes, and that is certainly true so far as the consumer is concerned, and so far as the primary producer is concerned. These people are charging all the market will bear, and their profits are largest when the price to the primary producer is lower. It is therefore their prime purpose to keep the price of the primary producer as low as possible so their profits will be as large as possible. I am convinced that is the basic rule of thumb on which shopping centres and meat chain stores work. I am sure you, Mr. Speaker, and other hon. Members know about this. The housewives have heard the price of meat has gone down and that the farmers are in terrible shape because the price on the hoof has dropped. But when they go to the butcher shop they never see that reduction in the price they pay.

I am sure all housewives in Canada have asked their husbands at some time or another, "Why don't we see this reduction in the price of meat when we go the meat store?" The reduction is rarely seen there or, if it is, it is a gradual reduction, not a sharp one which could be brought about by keen competition at the retail level.

I do not believe that the packing plants are making a killing. In fact I think they are operating a very efficient type of business; but it is the chain store, the final outlet, which is the culprit in this industry.

About two years ago the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission dealt with the merger of Canada Packers with Calgary Packers of Calgary, and Wilsil Meat Packers of Montreal. The price squeeze commission brought down their evidence, which was referred by the Minister of Justice to counsel who recommended that no prosecution be undertaken. The Throne Speech is concerned with the livelihood of farmers and we as legislators are concerned with this problem. Canada Packers today processes 30 per cent of the meat consumed and produced in Canada. This is a huge supply to put in the hands of one company, especially when one understands the principle that competition must be keen and active in order to maintain, for any length of time, the free enterprise system which we all cherish so much.

At the time the price squeeze commission reported there was great concern among farmers because nobody in government proceeded to prosecute Canada Packers. Recently we had the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) tour Australia and New Zealand and return with a terrific report. He spent a lot of money and I hope the taxpayers of Canada will get something for it. He gave us a great report to the effect that a steer could be produced in Australia for $7 while it would cost $100 for the same steer in Canada. What has happened to Australian beef production over the past two years? They have pretty nearly doubled their beef production and that increase is continuing at a rapid rate.

What do we see Canada Packers doing now? The Financial Post of April 10, 1965 gave an outline of the great profits Canada Packers are making and how much dividend they were paying on class A and B shares. I quote from that paper as follows:

> Recently the company announced it had formed a partnership with Jackson's (Corio) Meat Packing Pty. Ltd., of Geelong, Australia, to operate a packing and canning plant there.

This will be interesting to farmers in Canada because we know that, in years ahead, what happened in the United States during the past two years, due to the importation of Australian beef at a tremendous rate—which caused a great deal of concern to the U.S. beef industry—will happen here. Will it matter to Canada Packers Limited if they make a dollar processing Canadian meat or processing Australian meat and selling it in Canada? It will make no difference. Canada Packers can see what is coming and that is why that company is buying plants in Australia.

The biggest threat I can see today is Australian beef production. The Minister has admitted quit frankly that we have a meat problem in Canada. At one time or another he has called himself the minister of food and the minister of groceries. We cherish the idea that this is a free enterprise system and that we must maintain competition, but there is plenty of evidence from the Commission on Price Spreads of 1959 and 1960 to suggest shopping centres do not especially try to become efficient, so far as keeping the price spread narrow. In fact they try to keep the spread as wide as possible.

Though I do not see it mentioned in the Speech from the Throne I would like the government to follow what the United States is doing in the same industry, and in this connection I would like to read a short paragraph from the National Livestock Producer, a United States magazine, which I believe is published in Denver. It deals with the U.S. National Commission on Food Marketing and with what the U.S. expects this Commission to do. I quote as follows:

> "In the study of meats and livestock," said Dr. G. E. Brandow, Commission executive director, "attention will be directed in part to the sale of meat by packers to wholesalers and large retailers. Practices of buyers and sellers will be studied from the standpoint of efficiency of distribution, fairness of competition, manner of price determination, product differentiation, and relative bargaining power of participants. A second area dealing with livestock markets and feedlot operations of packers will be similarly examined.

I quote this to show what they are doing in the United States. The U.S. combines investigation branch directed its attention to the electrical industry in the States over the past few years, and not so many days ago it prohibited the merger of a couple of breweries. Now its investigations are being directed to the shopping centres, and the problem brought about by this new system of marketing the farmers' produce. They are showing a real concern for it, and I would hope our Minister of Agriculture could take up from where the Price Spreads Commission left off, which pointed out a similar trend in the food marketing industry.

Many farmers across Canada would like to see a study made of this problem and I hope the government will meet this demand to study efficient marketing of the farmers' produce. I am convinced that here lies a large part of the answer to the problems of the small farmer. I am sure most people realize that if a man wants to remain a small farmer he should be allowed to do so. As I see it, it is the Government's duty to create a climate in which the large and the small can work side by side, not a climate in which the large can strangle the small.

In many cases in farming, the small farmer is the most efficient. This was pointed out also by the Royal Commission on Price Spreads because the small and independent grocer is the most efficient in many cases in price setting and maintaining price competition. The large chain stores are more concerned with offering services, and I believe this whole problem needs a thorough investigation in order that the farmer may maintain his rightful share of the retailer's dollar.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, this debate is usually noted for its variety, both in style and subject matter. I would like my opening words to be traditional; that is, I would like to join in the congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the Address in Reply on their very well delivered speeches at the opening of the debate. I think they deserve congratulations.

My colleagues in the New Democratic Party have presented in this debate a series of policy statements as an alternative to the policies outlined in the Speech from the Throne. They have proposed immediate action to implement the report of the Hall Commission for universal Government financed medicare. They have dealt with the steps required to achieve the goals set up by the Economic Council of Canada. They have dealt with manpower and employment policies and with steps at the federal level needed to protect the consumer. They have indicated the vitally important role of the Federal authority in the field of education, if Canada is to meet the challenge of the age of automation.

But all of this will be difficult if not impossible without a new sense of national purpose and unless we solve the crisis of Canadian unity. This sense of national purpose, this solution to the crisis of Confederation, will have to be embodied in a new Constitution. I urge that the most important task confronting this Parliament is the task of developing and framing a new Constitution for Canada.

It is for this reason that I find the Speech from the Throne a bitterly disappointing document. Not only is there no suggestion that the Parliament of Canada will be allowed to take a serious look at a new Constitution for Canada by means of a special Committee set up for the purpose but, on the contrary, the Speech from the Throne promises to bring into effect the constitutional amending formula which will—for reasons I will speak about later—sound a death-knell to any hope of a dynamic re-thinking and revision of our constitutional structure.

[Mr. Horner (Acadia).]

There are both negative and positive reasons why a new Constitution for Canada is required. One of the negative reasons is expressed by two distinguished Canadians in a book called "Ten to One". One of the authors, Mr. Fowler, is a Liberal of English or Scots background; the other, Mr. Faribault, a Conservative of French background. Both are distinguished businessmen. Although I would hesitate to endorse all that they say in "Ten to One", I think Canadians will be much indebted to them for their tackling boldly the problems that face Canada. They say:

> The present Canadian Constitution as set out in the British North America Act and subsequent amendments, is inadequate to meet the needs of Canada in 1965.

And again.

> In any event the kind of constitution we envisage for Canada—a document that will be a resounding declaration of our present national agreement and a point of departure for our future unity—will not be achieved by tinkering with clauses of the British North America Act. We must find some way to make a bold fresh start. We think that the new Constitution Canada needs, is a much more comprehensive undertaking.

I could not agree more. Canada and Canada's Parliament should now be embarking on the preparatory work for such a bold and comprehensive undertaking. Instead, the Government by urging on us a too rigid and inflexible formula, is asking us to foreclose forever such a possibility and to condemn ourselves to a static—not a dynamic—conception of Canada's future.

I am sure that many people, including perhaps a few in this House, think of constitutions as dull, legal documents fit only for the discussion of constitutional lawyers, political scientists and other self-appointed experts. There may be times when this is true, but not, I venture to assert, in Canada today. I prophesy that there will be an increasing and intense public concern amongst Canadians about the Constitution for the next few years. The Constitution is the framework within which Governments can act or can be prevented from acting to meet human needs. Constitutions, if they are inflexible, can prevent governments in the future from dealing effectively with basic practical needs, for example for full employment, for economic growth, for minimal labour standards, for adequate marketing of farm products, for Canada's full international stature, and many other vital requirements of a dynamic changing society.

The Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism has in its preliminary report given us a solemn warning that we must make adjustments if we are to meet "the greatest crisis in our history". Can anyone doubt that the richer, more dynamic Canada whose rebirth is called for by the Commission will require new constitutional forms to be evolved? This in turn will require much effort, examination, travail and "dialogue", to use a term now so much in favour.

It is for this reason that the insistence of the Government that we should accept a rigid amending formula would be funny if it were not tragic. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) speaking in Montreal on February 27 said:

> I have no doubt that the population of Quebec will understand that the formula, even if certain intransigent ideologists find it less than ideal, represents an indispensable step in our constitutional evolution. Obviously it is only a preliminary step to a formal revision of the Constitution.

Thank God the people of Quebec have more intelligence than the hon. gentleman credits them with. At the risk of being called an intransigent ideologist—and I would be in good company—let me state as clearly as I can that this so-called indispensable step may yet turn out to be the last step, because in the guise of taking the first preliminary step Canada would be hobbling herself for all time. What is the core of the amending formula and why are we in this party fighting it with all the force we can muster? It is contained in section 2 which makes subject to the unanimity rule, as it is called, that is, the veto of each one of the Provinces, all substantial amendments affecting in any way the powers of the Provinces to make laws. This would have a threefold effect.

But I see it is now ten o'clock and I will leave the dénouement of the threefold effect until tomorrow, if I may.

Mr. McIlraith: I would like to ask that we continue for a few minutes, if that is agreeable, in order to deal with the two resolutions I mentioned today at 2.30. The first is No. 5 on today's Order Paper.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PUBLIC SERVICE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SUPERANNUATION

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council) moved that the house go into Committee to consider the following resolution:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend certain acts respecting the superannuation of persons employed in the public service, members of the Canadian forces and members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, to give effect to the provisions set out in Finance votes 18d, 21d and 23d of the supplementary estimates (D) tabled in the House of Commons on March 19, 1965.

Motion agreed to and the house went into Committee, Mr. Lamoureux in the Chair.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said Bill be read the second time? By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

Mr. McIlraith moved the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, might I ask a question on second reading. Are these changes going to cover Messrs. Bélec and Poitras, the men who are now no longer on the staff of the R.C.M.P.?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the Minister speaks now he will close the debate.

May I suggest that these questions may be asked during our consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Cowan: All right.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into Committee thereon —Mr. Lamoureux in the Chair.

On clause 1—

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask one question. If these changes do not establish payments to Messrs. Bélec and Poitras, recently connected with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, I am in favour of passing them tonight; but if they do place these men in a preferred position, enabling them to receive some type of superannuation, I wish to discuss the matter at another time.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, this bill does not in any way affect the rights of Messrs. Bélec and Poitras.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported and read the third time and passed.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the House for its co-operation.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under Provisional Standing Order No. 39A deemed to have been moved.

AGRICULTURE—BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR LONG TERM LOANS TO TREE FRUIT GROWERS

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question this evening about something of which I have personal experience, having been a practising orchardist for nearly 50 years. In discussing this at the present time let me say that I have grown fruit even earlier than the somewhat junior graduate. At one time I even ran poultry. In fact, I come from a family which I think is the only family in British Columbia I know of that operated a travelling rooster.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Let me say that we paid $100 an acre for forest land which we were told would grow apples and grow us rich. We grew apples but we did not grow rich.

I am well acquainted with the problems that I wish to present to the Parliamentary Secretary this evening. I know these problems which face the tree fruit growers in British Columbia both in respect of production and marketing. I represent a part of the country which is ideal for the growing of tree fruit. Unfortunately, owing to the flooding that will be occasioned by the building of the High Arrow dam many thousands of acres of some of the best land in my constituency for growing peaches, cherries, apples and pears will be destroyed.

I want to bring to the attention of the Parliamentary Secretary a resolution that was adopted at the last annual convention of the British Columbia Fruit Growers Association. That organization has been in existence since 1889 and represents the tree fruit growers of the Okanagan and Kootenay districts in the southeastern part of British Columbia. This organization has had long experience in respect of the problems which face the fruit industry. This question was raised at their convention which was held between January 19 and 21 of this year and it was the subject of considerable discussion because it is a problem that faces tree fruit growers in British Columbia and in other parts of Canada. I am sure the same problem will be found in Ontario and Quebec, and no doubt in the Maritimes. As the result of this discussion the following resolution headed "Financial Assistance Program" was adopted:

> Whereas there is no act or arrangement at present under which fruit growers may borrow long term, low interest funds to renovate their orchards by cutting out trees of low marketable varieties or on low volume rootstocks and replacing the removed trees with varieties acceptable to the consuming public and on high volume type rootstocks, and
> Whereas many orchards were planted 30 to 40 years ago and the production has fallen to 500 to 700 bushels per acre of average to low quality fruit and are therefore uneconomical, and
> Whereas it is estimated in the United States that production of 1,500 bushels of high quality apples per acre must be produced in the years to come to meet competition.

Therefore be it resolved that the British Columbia Fruit Growers Association approach the Canadian Government and request that the Farm Credit Corporation or other Government plan be amended to the extent that loans be made available to fruit farmers to enable them to cut out all or a part of their trees, if thought necessary, or plant or replant with acceptable market varieties on quick bearing high volume rootstocks, said loans to cover not only the removing of old trees and replanting of new ones, but the continued care and maintenance of the new trees until they have grown to an economic size, and moreover funds be loaned to take care of the livelihood of the farmer to enable him to carry out the above renovations.

This very important resolution was passed by this convention as the result of considerable study of this question. Our foreign markets are changing. We are losing the market in Britain and Europe for certain varieties. We used to have a very large market for Cox's Orange in Britain. There have been very heavy plantings there since the second world war and there are large imports from Italy and other parts of Europe and from Australia and New Zealand. The competition there is keener.

The Canadian consumer now has a different taste and requires a different type of apple. More and more the Canadian consumer has changed from the green and high quality apple to red apples like the McIntosh, Red Delicious, Rome Beauty and apples of that type. This has caused the growers to realize that they have got to change some of their varieties, if they are going to compete in the foreign and domestic markets, and they have also got to change to varieties, particularly dwarf specimens, that produce on quick bearing, high volume root stocks at a much higher rate than at the present time.

It is because of the problem that faces the growers that they gave it such consideration at the convention, and I was asked to raise the matter here. I always like raising matters and asking questions of the Parliamentary Secretary because I take great delight in the fact that I attended Ontario Agriculutral College in 1909 and he was born the following year. So it is a question of an aging man talking to a juvenile—but a very wise one, I trust, in these circumstances. My question is: Has the Department heard of these representations from the British Columbia Fruit Growers Association? Are they giving them serious study and what is the intention of the Government with respect to this request?

Mr. B. S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to express appreciation to the hon. Member for Kootenay West for bringing this important matter before the House. I also want to express appreciation for the fact that he has completed his autobiography so far as I am concerned. I always knew he was a tree farmer but I did not know his experience extended to orcharding and, of course, I am particularly happy about that.

In the absence of the Minister I am unable to confirm or deny whether or not representations have been received by the Minister on behalf of the British Columbia Fruit Growers Association, but I would assume that representations have been made. I am conscious, of course, of the changes that have taken place in recent years and that tastes have changed as indicated by the hon. Member. I realize that orcharding is a business that has gone through various stages of specialization and that orchardists no longer grow 10 or 20 varieties as they used to do in years gone by. I realize they are now concentrating on the more desirable varieties in order to meet consumer demand. I can only assure the hon. Member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) that this matter will be brought to the attention of the Minister. I am confident that very careful consideration will be given to it. Of course, the hon. Member will appreciate that I am unable to give him any firm commitment, since his question involves a matter of Government policy, which would be announced by the Minister in due course. I wish to assure him, however, a question so pressing will be brought to the Minister's attention.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—PREPARATION OF PAMPHLET ON CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, on Friday afternoon the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) was speaking in the Throne Speech debate and he made an announcement that was new to the Members of the House. He indicated that he had given instructions to his departmental officials to prepare, for the information of hon. Members and the general public, not a white paper, because it will not involve a matter of Government policy, but an information pamphlet bearing on capital punishment. This pamphlet will be made available to all Members, and will contain statistics, along with the pros and cons of the problem involved. Finally, there will be a historical record and the result of facts observed in various countries which, to a varying degree, have retained or abolished capital punishment. This was the announcement made by the Minister.

As one who favours the retention of capital punishment, I wish to ask the Minister of Justice if he will see that this information pamphlet is as fair as it is possible to be in presenting both sides of the matter, because this is an information pamphlet which is going to be paid for by the taxpayers of Canada. Since it is not a Government white paper, it should be impartial when discussing a matter that affects the hearts and consciences of Canadians as does this question of capital punishment. I am not one to argue that the Cabinet is the repository of all the virtues. I do not believe that it is impossible for them to commit an error. This is particularly so when I can show you a copy of the April 1 issue of the United Church Observer, the official publication of the United Church, where on page 14 of this edition, in discussing the question of capital punishment, this publication makes the flat-footed statement that the British Parliament has voted capital punishment out, while public opinion favoured its retention.

This is a definite misstatement of fact because the British House of Commons did vote against capital punishment, but the question has yet to go up to the House of Lords. It has since been stymied in the House of Commons. If an official organ of the United Church of Canada cannot present the facts accurately, then I am asking you, can an information pamphlet be prepared accurately presenting both sides of the case, when you bear in mind that this Cabinet has commuted every death sentence which has been imposed since they came into office two years ago this month? This certainly gives an indication of their way of thinking.

When the Minister of Justice was speaking on Friday afternoon he stated that we are no longer in an era of punishment for vengeful purposes. The only people I hear making such statements are those who are in favour of the abolition of capital punishment. The Minister of Justice not only made that comment on Friday afternoon, but the day he announced the commutation of the death sentence of the Santa Claus murderer Marcotte, he announced this free vote on capital punishment. Later, when speaking in Montreal, he said he was against capital punishment except in three specific instances, which he mentioned. Marcotte fitted into all three. He had murdered a policeman, he had been convicted and he is now being tried on a second charge of murdering a policeman.

[Mr. Cowan.]

• (10:20 p.m.)

Could I suggest to the Minister of Justice or the Department, in order that this pamphlet may be as fair as possible, before it is published, and certainly before it is printed, that it be shown to and considered by one or two, or three representatives of that school of thought who still believe in the moral law.

We do not think it is a good policy to appoint cats as guardians of goldfish bowls, and since the United Church Observer states that those who favour the retention of capital punishment are fundamentalists or policemen, I would suggest the Department of Justice might ask Mr. George A. Shea, secretary of the Canadian Association of the Chiefs of Police, of Montreal, to consider the pamphlet before giving it to the printers; or the Rev. Perry Rockwood, of Halifax, Nova Scotia; or Hon. Claude Wagner, Attorney General of Quebec, the man who prosecuted the Santa Claus murderer in the first case; and I would suggest with all respect Mr. Heath Macquarrie, the hon. Member for Queens, P.E.I. I would even suggest the name of Mr. Cassidy of Ottawa, President of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Veterans Association. Another man I would name is the Attorney General of Newfoundland, Hon. L. R. Curtis, and Elmer L. Steeves of Moncton, New Brunswick —and in passing may I say one of the Steeves was a Father of Confederation.

They are men of the utmost probity and integrity who favour the retention of capital punishment in this country. I believe this information pamphlet will be open to criticism on the grounds that it is biased, unless it is considered by the representatives of the school of thought that I represent before it is sent to the printers.

Two weeks ago today the House of Commons Debates carried a statement as to the 38 states in the world which have abolished capital punishment. The list is accurate enough, but no emphasis is placed on the fact that it contains such tremendously self-governing states as the Dominican Republic, Greenland, the Netherlands Antilles, which are two islands off South America, the great republic of San Marino, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. Member, but his time has expired.

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, at the start I would like to re-emphasize that the proposed debate on the abolition of capital punishment is not one in which the Government intends to take a position which would make the vote one of confidence. On this question it is expected that there will be diverse points of view taken by people in all parties, and therefore the debate will not be along party lines.

But the Government is prepared to assist the debate, as the hon. Member pointed out and as the Minister pointed out last Friday, by presenting an information pamphlet in order to put into the hands of all interested persons, both inside and outside the House, such of the relevant material as will permit an informed consideration of this important question.

Perhaps I should emphasize the word "information" in this regard. It is not intended in this particular document to set out the arguments pro and con. It is felt the various protagonists will be able to do this most effectively. But in setting forth the facts we must remember there is no absolute of objectivity. Inevitably everyone approaches any problem with a certain number of preconceptions. Subject to that limitation the information pamphlet will seek to be, as was said of Thomas Paine, "As impartial as sun and rain", and in its preparation the Government will seek to demonstrate, in the words of Burke, "The cold neutrality of an impartial judge." The hon. Member has made a useful suggestion which I will bring to the attention of the Minister and the officers of the Department.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—VANCOUVER—POSSIBLE USE OF FORMER R.C.A.F. BASE

Mr. Ron Basford (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I was told on Orders of the Day this morning that no decision has yet been reached by the Government in its consideration of the latest resolution passed by the City Council of Vancouver with regard to the disposition of the former R.C.A.F. base located at Kitsilano Beach in Vancouver.

In 1942, when this property was acquired by the Department of National Defence as an R.C.A.F. supply depot, there was, as far as I can determine, a clear and unmistakable understanding on the part of the then council that the use of this property by the R.C.A.F. would be for the duration of the war, that any buildings erected on the property would be of a temporary nature, and that after the war the property would be surrendered to the City of Vancouver for park purposes, as has been recommended by every planning report prepared for, or by, the City of Vancouver.

After the defence reorganization by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) last year, this supply depot was closed, and I was hopeful that 30 years of public controversy in Vancouver would come to an end and that this property would be granted to the city for park purposes as is desired, I am firmly convinced, by an overwhelming majority of the citizens of Vancouver.

At that time proposals were put forward to use part of the base for new C.B.C. radio and television headquarters. Due to decisions made by the previous Government, Vancouver is fourth in line after Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg, for new C.B.C. facilities. Our C.B.C. facilities are a disgrace to Canada's third largest city and are a discredit to a national broadcasting corporation. Over the last year negotiations went on to determine whether there was a compromise arrangement which would be acceptable to most people, by which the C.B.C. could locate on part of the base and the balance be given to the City of Vancouver for park purposes. It has become obvious that permanent location of the C.B.C. at Kitsilano is unacceptable.

City council's latest resolution calls for the city to acquire the whole of the base on a 99-year lease for $1 a year, but will permit the C.B.C. to lease approximately 11 acres of it for 15 years, with a possible right to renegotiate a further extension of ten years. I am inclined to believe that when this resolution was passed unanimously by Council, the aldermen must not have thought out the matter to its logical conclusion.

This resolution, this proposal now being considered by the Government, falls between two stools. It represents a second best settlement; a second best park of 11 acres, rather than 26 acres, and a second best C.B.C. centre, because how can the Corporation be expected or allowed, with any logic or economic sense, to spend the large amounts of money required to build the type of C.B.C. centre worthy of Vancouver, when they only have the property for 15 years?

If City Council is prepared to allow the C.B.C. to locate on part of Kitsilano, surely they should want the C.B.C. to be in a position to make the sort of capital expenditures necessary to make it a first class headquarters. We do not want some gerrybuilt structure down there on the beach for the next 15 years. If City Council's latest resolution is accepted by the Government, I am sure it will result in a freeze on C.B.C. developments in Vancouver for the next 15 years. Within five or ten years, we will, for example, undoubtedly be going into colour television. How can the C.B.C. be expected to spend large sums of money developing a colour studio on property which they may have for only another five or ten years?

If City Council is not prepared to allow the C.B.C. to locate on the Kitsilano base for a sufficiently long time to warrant a large capital expenditure, I strongly urge them to say so. I ask the Council to reconsider its position. If they are not prepared to make a logical and economically sound proposal with regard to the C.B.C. at Kitsilano they should indicate that they want it for park purposes as an integral part of Vancouver's beautiful waterfront development, as recently urged by the Vancouver parks board. Let not Vancouver make the mistakes of Toronto where millions are now being spent trying to reclaim the waterfront for the benefit of the citizens.

I urge City Council to indicate their position to the Government quickly, because we have been dealing with this for 18 months and time is running out, if any of this potential parkland is to be used this summer. I assure Council that, armed with the sort of resolution I have indicated, I am hopeful we can obtain the desired end.

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I think we have all come to know that the hon. Member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Basford) holds very strong views on this subject. Tonight I can only tell him that the Board of Directors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is even now considering the merits of the offer contained in the resolution passed unanimously by the City Council of Vancouver.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.32 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

STATUS OF GOVERNMENT ORDER RESPECTING PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE COMMISSION

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My point of order is that the government order referring to the recommendations contained in the report of the Prairie Farm Assistance Administration Commission of Inquiry is a nullity and must be struck off the order paper.

I say that the only opportunity I have to appeal against the report of the Prairie Farm Assistance Administration Commission of Inquiry is today. Inasmuch as the motion does appear on page 210 of yesterday's Hansard as a government order under the heading "Agriculture", I repeat that this is my only opportunity to appeal because under our statutes there is no appeal against the findings of a statutory commission. No case can be found where a court of appeal has adjudicated upon a report or a recommendation of a commission or whether a commission has exceeded its terms of reference.

The commission in question is not—I repeat "not"—a judicial inquiry. Any reference to it as a judicial inquiry is a misuse of the word "judicial" because there is no legal appeal from its findings. I suggest and maintain that this is an executive or crown court without an appeal. It is the modern counterpart of the ill-famed star chamber or cabal. The Commissioner exceeded his jurisdiction in many respects and ignored clause 13 of the Inquiries Act. I shall read that one clause, Mr. Speaker:

No report shall be made against any person until reasonable notice has been given to him of the charge of misconduct alleged against him and he has been allowed full opportunity to be heard in person by counsel.

This was not done in this case. This is only one of the bases for my point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Commissioner did not carry out his terms of reference as laid down by the Inquiries Act in that he carried out his inquiry totally in the Swift Current area and did not follow the terms of reference which related to other parts of the country.

This government order, Mr. Speaker, would refer the recommendations of the report of the Prairie Farm Assistance Administration Commission of Inquiry to the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization for such recommendation as it deems advisable. The Commission, under its constituting order in council and terms of reference, was not authorized or empowered to make recommendations.

The powers and authorities granted to a commission by order in council under the Inquiries Act are of two classes, investigative and advisory. An investigative commission inquires into facts, law, or mixed law and fact, and reports its findings to the Governor in Council. An advisory commission aids and advises the Governor in Council in somewhat the same way as the Privy Council aids and advises Her Majesty's Governor General under section 11 of the British North America Act. An advisory commission must, by its nature, be almost always an investigative commission as well. It first investigates and makes findings, and thereafter advises or recommends on the basis of its inquiry.

This distinction between the function of fact finding and the function of opinion gathering is referred to by J. E. Hodgetts in his article on "The Role of Royal Commission in Canadian Government", published in the proceedings of the third annual conference, 1951, of the Institute of Public Administration of Canada, pages 351 to 367. The distinction between the delegation of the power to make a fact finding investigation and the delegation of the power to give an opinion or make a recommendation is clearly illustrated by the United Kingdom House of Commons procedure on select committees. May's fifteenth edition at page 614 states:

Reports of Select Committees

Power of committees to report their opinion—By Standing Order No. 75, a select committee of the Commons which has been invested with power to send for persons, papers and records, may report its opinion and observations upon the matters referred to its consideration, even thought it is not expressly directed to do so by the order of reference.

Point of Order

The United Kingdom House of Commons Standing Order No. 75 is as follows:

> Every select committee having power to send for persons, papers, and records, shall have leave to report their opinion and observations upon any matters referred to their consideration, together with the minutes of the evidence taken before them, to the House, and also to make a special report of any matters which they may think fit to bring to the notice of the House.

This Standing Order clearly indicates the principle that in the absence of such a general term of reference then, unless there is a specific power to recommend contained in the special terms of reference, there is no power to recommend.

The operative words in an order in council constituting an investigative commission are "inquire into". These are words of limitation. The operative words with respect to an advisory commission are "inquire into and consider" or "inquire into and recommend". In any particular case, the words "and report upon" may or may not be added to the operative words. They are imported in any event. The Inquiries Act does not contain a general power to recommend.

In the present order in council No. 1963-1896, which established the P.F.A.A. Commission of Inquiry, the operative words are "inquire into and report". In the Order in Council which appointed the Commissioner the words are "inquire into". There are no words in either Order in Council to authorize or empower the Commissioner to advise or recommend.

The specific terms of reference confirm the negation of any power to recommend: they delegate the power to investigate and make findings of fact only. They authorize the Commissioner to inquire into and report upon:

> (a) the circumstances leading to the dismissal of—

—etc. etc., and:

> (b) irregularities alleged to have occurred in the processing of claims for benefits under the provisions of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and the payment of such claims, relative to the crop grown in the year 1962 in the province of Saskatchewan.

So much of the Commissioner's report, tabled as Sessional Paper No. 12A, as purport to be recommendations are in excess of the powers and authorities granted him by the Governor in Council. These recommendations are in breach of Order in Council 1963-1896, tabled in the House of Commons and affixed to the report. They are null and void and of no force and effect.

There is no remedy in the courts against these recommendations so improperly made.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

They cannot be appealed; the Queen's prerogative writ of certiorari cannot run against the Commission of Inquiry or the Commissioner. There was no remedy in this House either so long as the report was merely tabled as Sessional Paper 12A. When, however, these recommendations are subsequently made the subject matter of an Order of this House and now appear on the Order Paper as government order No. 78, then this House is seized of them and can and must take cognizance of their impropriety. That order, in effect, brings in as Government business for consideration by this House and a standing committee of this House, matters that are a nullity and void ab initio.

This government order should be struck out as disclosing no business for this House to proceed upon; as frivolous, vexatious and scandalous matter, and as an abuse of the privilege of this House.

If Your Honour has any doubt about the validity of my argument I should like to reserve the right to be heard further.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am unable to find any point of order in the argument advanced by the hon. Member. What he has in fact been doing is seeking to debate a resolution under the item "Government Orders." That item has not been called. Whether what he says about the report of the Prairie Farm Assistance Administration Commission of Inquiry is right or wrong is something to be debated when the resolution is before the House, but it is not before the House now and there is no order before the House. Indeed, there was no item before the Chair on which a point of order could be raised.

Therefore I can only ask you, Mr. Speaker, that if the hon. Member is to be permitted to continue his debate, all other hon. Members be permitted to debate the matter as well.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think I have heard quite a lot.

Mr. McIntosh: I don't think you have, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: In any event the hon. Member certainly does not expect me to have grasped all the intricate legal points he has been advancing this morning, so what I will do is get a copy of the transcript and examine the matter and, if humanly possible, try to bring in a just decision this afternoon.

Mr. McIntosh: May I just say a few words in reply?

Mr. Speaker: I don't think it is necessary at this point. The argument made by the hon. Member was very extensive.

Mr. McIntosh: All I wish to state is that what the Minister said is wrong.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There are rules to be followed here.

Mr. McIntosh: Well, Mr. Speaker, I rise on another point of order. I do not want the house to be misled by what the Minister has said. If he will look at yesterday's Hansard he will see the House has made it an order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. Member must give the Chair time to consider all the different facets involved in this matter and try to bring in a reasoned decision which I hope will be a right decision, and which I hope will satisfy in the circumstances.

THE BUDGET

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the hon. House Leader. In view of the fact that we now know the budget will be coming down on the evening that the House resumes after the Easter recess, will the Minister assure the House that due time will be given between the delivery of the budget and the resumption of debate on it so that its details can receive consideration by all hon. members of the House?

• (11:20 a.m.)

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will look at the precedents in this matter, and I will certainly take the point raised by the hon. member under consideration. I take it that what he really wants is to be sure that he has sufficient opportunity to peruse the budget before being asked to debate it; but as I say, I will take the point under consideration.

INDUSTRY

BENEFITS OF CANADA-U.S. AUTOMOBILE AGREEMENT TO CANADIAN CONSUMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, last week I asked the Prime Minister a question regarding the report that Canadian made cars were being sold in the United States at United States prices, which were considerably below the prices being paid by Canadian consumers. The Prime Minister promised to look into this matter, and I am wondering whether he is now ready to make a report to the House.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the report to which my hon. friend refers, that some Canadian made automobiles are being sold in the United States, is correct. I understand that the Ford Company plan to ship 400 cars per month for a period of three months as a trial measure. We do not have all the details of the price at which the company is shipping these cars to the Ford distribution agency in the United States but hon. members will be aware, of course, that generally speaking it is necessary in exporting to be competitive. Members are also aware, I am sure, that the Government's automotive program enables automobiles to be brought into Canada on a duty free basis by motor vehicle manufacturers who fulfil certain specific production and other requirements called for by the program. This is a conditional arrangement.

Anybody else who wants to buy a foreign made car continues to pay the 17½ per cent duty, apart, of course, from cars imported from the United Kingdom which are admitted duty free. If our sole objective was to wipe out the difference in car prices between United States and Canada this could be done, or almost done, very simply, by removing the tariff completely. Then there would be no price difference except that due to transportation and distribution and certain other minor costs. But it would not be only the price of the car which would be lowered as a result. Canadian production and employment would run the risk of being lowered too, not only in the automobile industry directly but in its supporting industries as well.

The Government's automotive program is an attempt to get higher employment and lower costs, and I am confident that this can be achieved in time. Both the industry and the consumers will benefit from expanded Canadian production and employment on a scale which will raise efficiency and cut costs and therefore gradually make it possible to bring United States and Canadian prices together. Cutting prices at once would merely take away people's jobs. If we are not going to do that and we do not want to perpetuate higher costs and prices, some time must be allowed in carrying through the program that has been started.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the Chrysler Corporation has already announced that it will sell 80,000 of its Valiants in the United States market at competitive prices this year, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the Government is making any investigation to see whether this means either that the United States is being charged less than the cost of production of the cars, or that the Canadian public is being charged a great deal more than the cost of production? I would like to ask the Prime Minister—

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are examining that aspect of the problem carefully.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister advise the House whether the United States Government is collecting duty on Canadian cars entering the United States?

Mr. Pearson: I will have to look into that matter, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. In view of the extremely important economic implications of this plan because of Government statements that it may be extended to other industries, and in view of the many unforeseen difficulties and complications which appear to be arising, would the Prime Minister consider referring this agreement to a special Select Committee of the House so that witnesses from the unions and companies and economists can appear and a full examination of the agreement can be made, so the Committee can understand its implications and in particular ascertain whether or not Canadians are being overcharged for their automobiles?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, in the first place I do not think I have ever stated that this plan may be extended to other industries. I have said that the automobile industry has certain special factors which made it possible to work out an agreement of this kind which I believe will increase production and employment, which is its main purpose and for which purpose it has been praised by unions, among others.

I have said that in the light of what happens in this particular arrangement, then naturally the Government will be glad to look into the whole application of an agreement of this kind to other industries. That will be done in the light of the experience we have with this one. Whether it will be practical to do that I do not know. This agreement will be dealt with by the House of Commons; the House will be given an opportunity to express its views in regard to it.

[Mr. Pearson.]

EXPO '67

REPORTED CALLING OF TENDERS FOR C.B.C. BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State. On Friday last the Minister stated, in reply to a question I raised regarding the commitment of the C.B.C. to spend some $10 million for a building at Expo '67 for which no approval had been given by Parliament, that the Government did not intend to go on with this project without the approval of Parliament.

In view of reports in the press, as carried in the Globe and Mail of April 9, that a tender has already been let for $3.9 million for the initial construction of the project, would the Minister confirm that the Government is now going to allow this project to go ahead without Parliament giving approval for this rather large sum of money, $10 million?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, in replying to this question and to comments made in the House on Friday last with respect to the construction of a broadcasting centre for Expo '67, I believe it would be helpful for Members to have a brief outline of the project.

Some 200 broadcasting teams from many countries around the world are expected to cover the 1967 World Exhibition being held in Canada. They will require radio and television facilities to tell the story of Canada and Expo to the world. As the host country it is Canada's responsibility to provide the basic broadcasting facilities. As the national broadcasting agency, the C.B.C. was asked to co-ordinate this project.

The Corporation's studies indicated that Canadian and international broadcasters combined would require a centre containing not less than six radio studios and two television studios, together with the associated equipment. Estimates were made of costs and the time required for building the structure and installing the equipment. Total capital costs are estimated at $9.9 million, with the initial requirement in the present fiscal year of $2.9 million. Treasury Board has approved the expenditure for this year, which is now subject to the approval of Parliament through consideration of the estimates, and this amount of $2.9 million has been included in the main estimates. Where annual financing is concerned, the House will note that this is the only procedure which can be followed in approving projects for corporations such as the C.B.C. The necessary additional amount will be included in the Corporation's estimates for the 1966 and 1967 fiscal years.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Secretary of State whether these studios are in addition to the planned facilities of the C.B.C. at Montreal, and what use will be made of the studios after the Exhibition is finished?

Mr. Lamontagne: They are in addition, Mr. Speaker, and it is expected that these studios will be used for some years after Expo.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, the specific question has not been answered. Has the C.B.C. committed itself for $3.9 million under this original tender that has been let without the approval of Parliament?

Mr. Lamontagne: I understand that the usual procedure has been followed in this case, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

• (11:30 a.m.)

Mr. Thompson: I have another supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If my memory is correct I believe that a certain brigadier who was in command of Canadian troops in Japan about ten years ago was fired from his position because he spent certain money without the necessary approval of Government. Does the Minister contemplate the dismissal of the President of the C.B.C. for a similar offence?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, this project has been approved by Treasury Board and the amounts to be spent this year have been included in the main estimates.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question supplementary to those asked the Secretary of State concerning the C.B.C. expenditures. The Secretary of State said that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was asked to take part in this program. By whom was the C.B.C. asked to take part?

Mr. Lamontagne: The C.B.C. was asked to take part by Expo '67.

Mr. Simpson: Were there no representations made by the Cabinet or the Government in this regard?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, as I said before, the project was approved by Cabinet and by the Treasury Board.

Mr. Simpson: I should like to ask one more supplementary question. How can the Secretary of State reconcile his answers to my questions regarding the extension of service, in view of the fact that he said the Cabinet would not be considering any C.B.C. expenditures until the Fowler Commission had reported? That is what I understood the Minister to intimate.

Mr. Lamontagne: I certainly did give that undertaking, Mr. Speaker, but in respect of this case we must not forget that this Canadian National Exposition is to take place in 1967.

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether he thinks we should forget the tens of thousands of people in Canada who are not now served by the C.B.C.

Mr. Lamontagne: I certainly do not agree with that, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that we will announce a program in due course following receipt of the Fowler Commission Report.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Secretary of State. Can he tell us whether this television centre will come under the jurisdiction of Expo '67 or under the direct control of the C.B.C.?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I think the C.B.C. and Expo '67 will co-operate very closely.

Mr. Grégoire: Could the Secretary of State tell us who will be in charge, rather than co-operate, with regard to this television centre?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I shall take this question as notice.

[Later:]

Mr. Guy Marcoux (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Inquiries of the Ministry

In view of the articles written by Mr. Raymond Grenier, in the newspaper La Presse, about the tragic fate reserved for several French Canadians by the 1967 World Exhibition Corporation, does the Prime Minister intend to inquire into that very serious problem?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to examine the article in question before deciding what action, if any, is required by the Government, and I shall be glad to do so.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RIGHT OF QUEBEC TO SIGN INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT RESPECTING EDUCATION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Does he intend to formally recognize Quebec's right to sign international agreements in the field of education, as advocated by the Quebec minister of education? Does he plan to facilitate the Quebec minister of education's task in this area?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the Quebec minister of education made a statement recently.

I answered that question, in principle, some ten days ago, but I am not aware of the statements the minister of education may have made recently.

However, I shall examine the question and answer it without fail.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The minister mentioned in his statement yesterday that Quebec had the right to enter into international agreements in the field of education.

Does the Secretary of State for External Affairs intend to acknowledge officially this right to the province of Quebec?

I do not believe this is the question put to him ten days ago.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have just received Le Devoir of this morning, and I had not seen this article before. I shall have to consider the matter before being in a position to state my opinion.

[Mr. Marcoux.]

CHILE—OFFER OF ASSISTANCE FOLLOWING EARTHQUAKE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning Canadian assistance to Chile. I am particularly interested in that matter since the diocese of St. John, in my riding, is twinned with that of Valparaiso, which was the district most affected by the recent earthquakes. Here is my question. Will Canada do its share to help Chile, part of whose territory was devastated by earthquakes recently?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, last Friday April 9, the Canadian government decided to hand over $20,000 to the Canadian Red Cross to meet immediate needs in Chile. At the same time the Canadian Red Cross decided to provide $5,000 of its own funds for the same purpose.

CANADIAN CONFEDERATION

REPORTED SPEECH BY CANADIAN AMBASSADOR TO FRANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the Minister's attention been drawn to a report on a speech made by the Canadian Ambassador to France, Mr. Jules Léger, in Paris on Friday last to the American Club in which the Ambassador is reported to have said that winds of change are blowing in Canada and that we are moving toward a loose federation? If that is so, does that statement represent the views of the Government in this regard, that Canada is moving toward a loose federation?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the House will generally agree with me that in her Ambassador in Paris Canada has one of her most responsible heads of mission.

Mr. Grafftey: For heaven's sake.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I take it that everyone is in agreement with what I have said. I have seen the report and I have also examined the actual text. The Ambassador was incorrectly reported. He referred to looser affiliations in certain sectors, but the generality of the language employed in the speech as reported is not supported by the text itself.

Mr. Lambert: I have a supplementary question. Will the Minister procure a transcript or copy of the speech and table it for the enlightenment of the Members of this House, particularly in view of the recognized senior position of the Ambassador in Paris?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I have already obtained the actual text and I will be glad to see that my hon. friend gets a copy of it today. I will also see that a copy is made available for the edification and instruction of the House in general.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If I understood the Minister correctly he indicated that the Ambassador had said there was a looseness in certain sectors. Does the Minister assume that the Ambassador acted in a responsible way in making that kind of statement?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure my hon. friend will agree that that is a correct statement.

Mr. Woolliams: My question to the Minister, Mr. Speaker, is, does he assume that the Ambassador made a responsible statement?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is entering into an argument.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF PROFESSOR SIBLEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Is the Minister aware of the presence in the gallery of Professor Mulford Sibley, and will the Minister join with us all in extending to Professor Sibley a formal welcome to the Parliament of Canada?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure that we are all happy to have all visitors come and observe the results of the good undertakings which are carried on from time to time in this Chamber.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PUBLIC SERVICE

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING SALARIES OF PENITENTIARY SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Privy Council. Is the Minister in a position to report on the meeting he held yesterday with members of the Canadian Penitentiary Service regarding reclassifications and pay increases?

• (11:40 a.m.)

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I can give much of a report on orders of the day. The Civil Service Association of Canada, along with representatives of the penitentiaries service, had a meeting with my colleague the Minister of National Revenue and myself at which the Association made representations concerning the pay conditions of employees of the penitentiaries service. It was quite an extensive meeting and the Association is putting its representations in writing. It has undertaken to do so within two weeks, and we have undertaken to reconsider the matter of pay increases very shortly thereafter.

AGRICULTURE

CHEESE—REQUEST FOR CONTINUATION OF SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Since announcing his 1965 dairy policy is the minister aware it is projected that there will actually be a decrease of 30 cents a hundredweight in the price of cheese milk?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with this.

Mr. Winkler: Will the minister then assure the House that, as outlined in his dairy policy, the subsidy of 3.6 cents a pound will be paid on the production of cheese?

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the hon. member has not studied closely the policy I announced in the House, because cheese will not be supported this year at 3.6 cents as it was last year. It will be supported on a basis whereby we will make up the difference between the factory price of between $3.10 to $3.15 and $3.30 by way of a deficiency payment and a lump sum to bring it from $3.30 to $3.50, depending on the amount that each producer produced in the 1964 period.

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister not reconsider his new dairy policy, because it will increase the price of cheese if the farmer is going to get the same returns as he did a year ago.

Mr. Hays: No, Mr. Speaker. I do not believe this is correct, and we are not going to reconsider the matter.

QUEBEC—ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture a question?

Can the minister inform us if he has taken into serious consideration the request for help made on behalf of the farmers of the Saguenay region in northwest Quebec whose crop was very poor last year?

[Text]

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): This is still under consideration.

TRANSPORT

CONTINUATION OF VESSEL SERVICE BETWEEN YARMOUTH, N.S. AND SAINT JOHN, N.B.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport, who has been left alone so far this morning. What steps has the Government taken to ensure the continuance of a vessel run between Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, and Saint John, New Brunswick, by the motor vessel Mohawk II, which service is due to terminate next week, I am advised, unless some action is taken?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the situation with respect to this vessel is being reviewed, but the review does indicate that the amount of traffic now using this vessel is so small and the subsidy per ton so high that there is some question whether the taxpayers should be asked to subsidize at that rate for that amount of traffic. However, a final decision has not yet been taken.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LOUISBURG, N.S.—LAY-OFF OF WORKERS AT HISTORIC SITE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister designated the battleground for his war on poverty, and is he now prepared to answer the question put to him yesterday by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe the question was out of order then, and it would be out of order today.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): On a point or order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, are we establishing a precedent that the Prime Minister can get up and rule a question on the Cape Breton unemployed out of order? Is the Chair going to permit this?

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Mr. MacInnis: What about my point of order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: I will tell the hon. member that these questions, of course, come to me first hand and I will have to review the record to see whether there is any substance in the allegation of the hon. member.

Mr. MacInnis: Further on the point of order, Mr. Speaker, it is very evident that there is substance to my point when any member of the House takes it upon himself to rise and rule a question out of order, since this is the job of the Chair. I have continued to ask questions in the House on behalf of the unemployed of Cape Breton and if this Government—

Some hon. Members: Louder.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member raised a point of order and he is now out of order because he is attempting to bring something new into this argument, if I may put it that way. I suggest that he allow the Chair to review the remarks made and try to come to a right conclusion.

Mr. MacInnis: I give notice to debate this matter at ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid there is nothing before the House to debate at ten o'clock.

[Later:]

Mr. John N. Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I wonder if I might be permitted to answer a question asked yesterday by the hon. Member for Cape Breton North and Victoria of the Prime Minister concerning the Louisburg fortress. I am informed that the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources will proceed with the reconstruction of Chateau St. Louis by contract this year. This major undertaking will use a large portion of the funds allotted to the Louisburg project in the current year's estimates, and the smaller projects now going on will be phased into the program at a later date.

Part of the lay-off arose from the completion of the winter works program, and the balance from deferment of smaller programs until the reconstruction of Chateau St. Louis is completed. When the contract is awarded for Chateau St. Louis it is anticipated that a far larger work force will be required by the contractor.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I wish to thank the Parliamentary Secretary for his reply to the question that was asked and the one which was ruled out of order this morning. I have a supplementary question which is the result of a further telegram received from the same people who sent the telegram yesterday, the executive of the Fortress of Louisburg Employees Association. This telegram contains a number of accusations and allegations. I want to be kind to the Prime Minister and think that he does not realize what is happening down there. I shall not incur your wrath, sir, by reading the whole telegram. However, for the enlightenment of the Prime Minister I shall point out that it says—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. Member says he is not going to read the telegram I do not know why he proceeds to read it. Would he kindly ask his question so that we can get to the point, as it were?

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I should be glad to do so. Apparently the superintendent of construction says that no man on the project can be trusted. These people say that they hope this den of iniquity will be straightened out. May I ask the Prime Minister, in all fairness, if he would arrange to have someone investigate this apparently rather serious situation because of the allegations and accusations? Could he dispatch someone immediately to investigate that complaint; and I do hope he does not rule this question out of order.

Mr. Pearson: The matter referred to by my hon. friend is being looked into. He has tried to put again a question which was ruled out of order. May I, Mr. Speaker, remind him that if he asks a factual question in a reasonable way, naturally it is my duty to answer. He said yesterday, and I call attention to this:

Since the Prime Minister has at this late date personally become interested in poverty—

That is an objectionable preamble, and that part of the question certainly is out of order.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, is the Prime Minister suggesting this is out of order, no matter how true it is?

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: If it is on the same point, I do ask the hon. Member to consider seriously whether it is helping the Chair or helping us with the progress of business before the House to raise these points, which may be important to him but which do seem to the Chair semi-serious.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should think that a question relating to the restriction of cigarette advertising in Canada would not be as important as having people thrown out on the street and this Government doing nothing about it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member is making allegations and statements. This is a question period, as he well knows.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I put a question to the Prime Minister this morning, and in answer he said it was out of order yesterday and it is out of order today.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Which is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. MacInnis: In order to base my question of privilege I should like to read the question that was put yesterday and the Prime Minister's answer.

An hon. Member: Dispense.

Mr. MacInnis: I quote:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I have a question for the Prime Minister as the result of a telegram I received a few minutes ago. It says:

"Fifty eight employees to be laid off at Louisburg project April 20. Are these men to be the first prisoners in the war on poverty or are there plans to place them in other jobs?

Executive The Fortress of Louisburg Employees Association."

Since the Prime Minister has at this late date personally become interested in poverty, would he be so kind as to investigate the contents of this telegram and report to the House?

The Prime Minister's answer was:

Mr. Speaker, I did not understand the preamble to this question, but the rest I shall be glad to look into.

This morning in the question I put to the Prime Minister I asked him if he would designate the battleground for his war on poverty, and further asked if he was prepared to answer the question of the hon. Member for Cape Breton North and Victoria. Again, Sir, the Prime Minister answered that question by saying "It was out of order yesterday; it is out of order today."

There is no indication in the records of yesterday's Hansard that this question was in any way ruled out of order either by yourself or, as the custom seems to be developing, by the Prime Minister, as he did today, misleading—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do think the Chair has heard enough of this most interesting point, and it does seem to me a most colossal waste of time. I must say I had already told the hon. Member I would investigate the matter and try and bring in a reasonable decision. It does seem to me a waste of time at this particular moment to continue argument on something that may interest the hon. Member but which I do not think deserves any more discussion at the moment.

Mr. MacInnis: I am sorry, but I will have to continue to make my point on a question of privilege, and if you will allow me to reach my point of privilege I will co-operate to the fullest. When I indicated that I was not satisfied with the Prime Minister's answer and wished to debate the matter at ten o'clock you, Sir, said there was nothing before the House. In other words the opportunity for me to debate this further at ten o'clock seemed to be denied.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member, of course, is indulging in argument with the Chair, which breaks every standing order we have and a long line of precedents which, if the hon. Member does not know, I will tell him so. I have told the hon. Member I would investigate the matter and if in my opinion I thought he had a question of privilege I would say so. Now, this is not the time to argue that statement, and until such time as the Chair has made up its mind on whether or not there is something before the House, the hon. Member obviously has nothing to argue at ten o'clock. I hope to come in this afternoon and clear up the matter.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Wait until you are recognized.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. Member rising on a question of privilege; because we had dealt with that matter? Is this a new matter of privilege?

Mr. MacInnis: Sir, if you will return to your seat I will answer your question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacInnis: It is the same question—

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I would like to call your attention to the remark made by the hon. Member, that if you resume your seat he will bring up his question of privilege.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. Courtesy, of course, demands that the Chair recognize the Prime Minister, but due to the noise in the Chamber I could not hear what the right hon. Prime Minister said.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege, how could I answer a question by you, sir, if—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not propose to get into an argument with the hon. Member. If he does not know it, I will tell him. The right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. MacInnis: On the question of privilege, Sir, another question of privilege—

Mr. Regan: You were not recognized.

Mr. MacInnis: I wish that childish member for Halifax would keep quiet for a while. My simple question of privilege is this. Am I not entitled to the opportunity to debate a question at ten o'clock when I am not satisfied with the answer, as is the custom developing under the new rules of the House; and I have not been satisfied with the answer?

Mr. Speaker: The answer to the question raised by the hon. Member will be given this afternoon by the Speaker, and I have already said so on the three separate occasions. I have to determine whether or not there is a question which can be debated. I am not satisfied that there is a question at this moment, and I need to refer to the record to find out.

[Later:]

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. May I ask the right hon. gentleman whether it is his intention to comply with the request of the Louisburg Employees Association to have an investigation on the spot carried out with reference to the many problems that apparently exist at this location?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour is already looking into this matter.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): A supplementary question. Could the Prime Minister say when we may have a report on this?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Minister will wish to do everything he can as quickly as he can to make certain that the maximum amount of employment is created on the island.

IMMIGRATION

TORONTO—PROSECUTION OF CHINESE LANDED IMMIGRANT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the hon. member for Spadina asked a question arising out of articles that appeared in the Toronto newspapers about a Chinese named Ngar Mye Lau, also known as Jack Mar, and I promised a full statement early this week. These are the facts. Early last September the Royal Canadian Mounted Police received information and had occasion to investigate the circumstances under which this man, known as Jack Mar, obtained a Canadian passport. He had been in Canada for some nine years prior to that date. As a result of these investigations the facts were laid before the Assistant Crown Attorney for the county of York on September 9, 1964, and he authorized the prosecution of the man in question under section 58 (1) of the Criminal Code for obtaining a passport by giving false information and he instructed that the man be charged on that same day. An information was laid on September 9 and a summons was served on that day.

On the following day, September 10, Jack Mar visited the immigration office in Toronto to say that he wished to make an adjustment statement. He did not say that he had been charged with an offence, and he did not ask for assistance of any kind. The immigration officials assumed he was but one of the many Chinese who were visiting the office to indicate a desire to make adjustment statements. Consequently his name was put on the lengthy list and no priority was given to it.

On September 11, he appeared in court pursuant to the charge and the case was finally heard on October 15. He was convicted of making a false statement resulting in his obtaining a passport, and he was fined $1,000 or four months in jail. An appeal was taken to the Court of Appeal. In the meantime he had paid the fine.

I should like to make it clear to interested members and the public generally that at no time, so far as I can discover, did Jack Mar or his counsel seek any assistance or advice from immigration officials in pleading his case before the courts on the grounds of the so-called Chinese amnesty program. In any event, after his conviction the Parliamentary Secretary to my colleague the Minister of Justice, on December 16 last, in reply to question No. 2,161 which had been placed on the order paper, stated that Ngar Mye Lau "did not qualify for the amnesty because it applied only to illegalities related to illegal entry and did not apply to subsequent illegalities not related thereto".

When this man applied for the passport he had been in Canada for nine years and had had a period of approximately three years in which to adjust his status and to become a resident in good standing. There is no record that he ever attempted to do this. He did not finally express a desire to adjust his status until he had been summoned to appear in the courts. Neither the original amnesty for Chinese who entered Canada illegally prior to July 1, 1960, nor the several extensions thereof granted by successive ministers were ever intended to give immunity to persons who have persisted in breaking the law after they have entered Canada.

May I say, however, that in spite of the conviction arrangements are being made for Jack Mar to adjust his status in Canada because he did come forward at a time while the assurance, that he could do so without facing deportation, still stands.

Inquiries of the Ministry

DOMINION OBSERVATORY

ABILITY TO RECEIVE RADIO EMISSIONS FROM OUTER SPACE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys and ask him if the Dominion Observatory has the capability to listen to and evaluate radio emissions from outer space, which a Russian astronomer claims are transmitted by intelligent beings?

Hon. W. M. Benidickson (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): I too read the morning newspaper, and perhaps I should be cautious in this field. I want to assure my hon. friend that up to now the Observatory has not indicated to me it has such capabilities.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): May I ask a supplementary question. Will the Minister consider providing the Dominion Observatory with such a capability, especially in the light of the fact that the Government apparently does not listen to intelligent beings elsewhere?

UNITED NATIONS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DISCUSSIONS WITH SECRETARY GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As reported in the newspapers this morning, he stated yesterday in Montreal that either today or tomorrow he would be conferring with the Secretary General of the United Nations with regard to the Viet Nam situation. In view of the fact that we will not be gathering together again in this House for some days, would the Minister care to make a statement concerning the Government's intention in relation to this discussion?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I hope between now and the end of next week to have an opportunity of discussing some matters having to do with problems facing the United Nations and Canada's interest therein, as well as some other questions.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DAMAGE CAUSED BY PLANES BREAKING SOUND BARRIER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Yesterday the hon. Member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings asked if any complaints had been received from western Nova Scotia with respect to United States aircraft breaking the sound barrier, in view of the fact that we are approaching the mink whelping season. I notice that in the Hansard report the hon. Member is quoted as having said that the female mink would prefer to eat their young rather than have them die of an atomic bomb. I think the hon. Member has been misquoted. I told the hon. Member that I would look into the matter.

I am now in a position to say that three complaints were received since April 5, 1965 from the Nova Scotia and Grand Manan Island, New Brunswick, areas. In addition, yesterday I received a communication from the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare including a petition signed by a number of mink ranchers of the Digby and Clare municipalities in Nova Scotia on the same subject.

The incidents referred to apparently occurred during a recent United States air force exercise which involved several supersonic flights. The area of the exercise extended from the centre of the Bay of Fundy to a location in northern Maine, and the only Canadian territory which was overflown was Grand Manan Island. The routes did not pass over Nova Scotia. That exercise has now ended.

Both the R.C.A.F. and the U.S.A.F. are well aware of the approaching mink breeding season, and I can assure the hon. member that every precaution will be taken to minimize any danger to this important industry.

In a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lapointe asked if I had received any complaints from the Saguenay-Lake St. John area regarding R.C.A.F. Voodoo aircraft stationed at Bagotville breaking the sound barrier. I can inform him that one complaint was received on April 8, 1965 from the village of St. Prime on the west shore of Lake St. John approximately 65 miles west of Bagotville. It is not known when the sonic boom occurred, but an investigation is now under way.

MID-CANADA RADAR LINE—CESSATION OF OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the Minister say whether plans are under way to phase out some or all of the eastern section of the mid-Canada radar line?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the balance of the mid-Canada radar line ceased operations on March 31.

POINT EDWARD NAVAL BASE—CONTINUATION OF RESPONSIBILITY OF DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, since this is probably the last day of this part of the session may I direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence and ask whether he is yet in a position to advise how many employees are going to be retained at the Point Edward naval base, or continued, as they are anxious to have this information.

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I expect to be able to make a statement on that particular question in two or three days. From the information I have the prospects are for more employment at Point Edward naval base rather than less.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): A supplementary question. Does the Minister suggest that the naval base is going to expand, in view of this extra employment which is going to take place?

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I am not suggesting that, Mr. Speaker, but I know the hon. Member is aware that the Canadian motor industry is planning to take over some of the buildings which will be made available by the armed forces.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF CIGARETTE ADVERTISING FROM PROGRAMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): I have a question I want to ask the Secretary of State. Two weeks ago the Minister undertook to check with the C.B.C. to ascertain whether it considered its promotion of cigarette consumption through television advertising was proper in view of the activity of the department of health in attempting to reduce sales of cigarettes. I wonder if he has any report from the C.B.C. at this time.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): No, I have not received anything as yet.

SHIPPING

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO COMPETENCE OF CANADIAN SHIP CREWS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport and ask him whether he has received a telegram from Leonard J. McLaughlin, president of the Seafarers' International Union of Canada, in which he points out that although the navigation season is only a few days old there have already been some five accidents involving one total loss and as I understand it, asking the Minister to have an investigation conducted to determine whether ships travelling the waterways of Canada, the harbours and the approaches thereto, are adequately and competently manned. I know the Minister indicated yesterday that there was to be an inquiry into one particular accident on the St. Lawrence. I am asking whether this inquiry is going to be broadened to cover the question of whether adequate, competent crews are required by the Government, under the Canada Shipping Act, on all Canadian ships travelling on Canadian waterways?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I did receive this telegram last night, and I had such inquiries made as I could have made immediately in my Department. Because this is really quite an important subject I think perhaps I might be permitted to give a slightly more extended reply than is usual.

I may say in the first place that we intend to ask Mr. McLaughlin to give any substantiating evidence he is able to give for the generalization he has made, and that in fact the Department does carry out an investigation into every accident of this character; I refer particularly to the one in Lake St. Peter the other day.

It is true that this is the worst year for a number of years so far as ice conditions are concerned in the St. Lawrence, in the lakes and in the canals, and it is perhaps possible that on that account, because of the greater hazards, there may have been a somewhat higher accident rate than has been usual. But we are making a very careful investigation to see whether there is anything special about it, whether it is due to the ice hazards or whether there is any foundation for the allegation made by Mr. McLaughlin. I could not, of course, hope to give an answer to them without the investigation being completed.

Mr. Douglas: As a supplementary question, I notice that in the same wire Mr. McLaughlin suggests that the provisions under the Canada Shipping Act are of such a general nature as to be virtually unenforceable. Would the Minister undertake to look into this aspect of the matter and see whether some amendments to the Canada Shipping Act would be necessary in that regard?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad if Mr. McLaughlin or anyone else is able to furnish particulars in this regard, and I would be happy to look into them. We did, of course, have a very extensive revision of the Canada Shipping Act at the last session of Parliament, and we tried to put into that revision all the provisions that up to that time, it seemed to the Department, and to anyone who made representations to us, to be desirable. However, that does not mean it is perfect, and if there is any improvement that can be made, and if the House will give time for it, we will do our best.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Would the Minister not agree there would be less trouble if traders used the ice free ports of Saint John and Halifax?

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, of course, that is a point of view, and the opposite point of view was expressed by the hon. Member for Hamilton West yesterday in a very eloquent speech. This controversy is apt to go on for quite a few more years.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the $64 million surplus in the Old Age Security Fund will the Government consider an immediate increase in the Old Age Pension, or are they saving this for an election gimmick?

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

EXTENSION OF FRANCHISE IN NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gene Rhéaume (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister if the proposed amendment to the Northwest Territories Act, announced in the Speech from the Throne, will have the effect of granting the franchise to all the residents of the eastern and central Arctic in the forthcoming territorial elections.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Of course, Mr. Speaker, it would be quite improper for me to indicate on orders of the day what is to be included in amendments to legislation.

Mr. Rhéaume: As a supplementary question, would the Prime Minister assure the House that this oversight is one that is close to his heart and will be attended to in the present session?

Mr. Pearson: I can assure the House that the point of view mentioned by my hon. friend is very much in our minds.

• (12:10 p.m.)

FORESTRY

REPORTED RESIGNATIONS FOLLOWING TRANSFER OF LABORATORIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. It relates to the Department of Forestry and the decision which was approved by the Minister of Forestry to transfer scientific forestry staff from Maple to Sault Ste. Marie.

The urgency of my question is this. From the information I have, large scale resignations, considering the number of personnel involved, are taking place, with people going to alternative employment in the United States and to universities. I wonder whether the Prime Minister could look into this matter and see whether the consequences are as serious as have been suggested. If he wanted some advice on the matter I think the Prime Minister could get some information from the hon. member for York North.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am already looking into the matter, and I am receiving a great deal of advice with regard to this, including representations from the hon. member who has been mentioned.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare may

I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Would it be possible some time today, before the house rises for the Easter recess, for a statement to be made by the Government on the conference which was held last week between the Federal Government and the Provinces with respect to the Canada assistance plan? The Prime Minister will recall that he indicated to the House that that was one of the purposes of the conference held last week. Does he not agree that it would be useful to have a statement on the conference made to members before we go home for Easter?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will look into that right away.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CONSIDERATION OF COMMITTEE REPORT ON REPRODUCTION OF "HANSARD" INDEX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last I asked the President of the Privy Council whether it was the intention of the Government to take the initiative and bring forward a motion to debate the report of the privileges and elections committee which was brought down in the immediately preceding session. The Minister said the matter had not received consideration but that he would be very glad to take the question as notice. I merely want to pose this question again and see whether the Government has given that matter any consideration and has reached a conclusion.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, I have nothing further to add to the answer I gave the other day. I hope soon to have the answer, but now it will not be until after the Easter recess.

Mr. Howard: A supplementary question. I wonder whether in his leisure moments during the Easter recess the Minister might not be able to conclude this matter.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I hope to use some of these leisure moments for other purposes, but I will see that the question does receive consideration.

DIVORCE

REQUEST FOR ROYAL COMMISSION ON REFORM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister which I would have held until another day, but this being the last day before the recess I wonder whether he could give me an answer. In view of the action of the Manitoba legislature in overwhelmingly passing a resolution calling for legislation to expand divorce grounds in Canada, has the Prime Minister reached any decision on my question of March 16 regarding the setting up of a royal commission on divorce reform in Canada? If so, can he make a policy statement to the House at this time?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am unable to add anything to what I have said in regard to a matter of this importance. I said when the question was first asked that the matter was under consideration, but I should not like that reply to be interpreted as meaning that we would be shortly setting up a royal commission on this subject.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): May I suggest to the Prime Minister that if he does not wish to proceed with that course, Bill No. C-68 will do the same thing.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am aware of that bill.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Monday, April 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cashin for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, at ten o'clock last night I had just started to outline what I conceived to be the threefold and dangerous effects of the so-called Fulton-Favreau formula for constitutional amendment which it is proposed be adopted by this House. First of all I should like to deal with its effects on a possible transfer of new jurisdiction to Parliament from the provincial legislatures. Even if the Parliament of Canada, the governments representing all but one of the provinces and the vast consensus of public opinion across Canada desired to have transferred to Parliament the power to enact a federal labour code setting up minimum standards across Canada, this could not be done if one provincial government refused consent. The same would be true in regard to effective farm marketing legislation national in scope, and in regard to many other transfers of jurisdictions.

To come to the transfer of jurisdiction from the federal to the provincial sphere, if the Federal Government, the government of Quebec and the governments of all other provinces but one agreed to a constitutional amendment which would transfer some aspect of federal jurisdiction to provincial legislatures, or would confer a special position upon, say, the Province of Quebec, this being thought necessary and advisable in order to preserve Confederation, then any one province could veto this proposal. It is not just the Province of Quebec, as Mr. Lesage seems to have thought, which has a veto; every province in Canada has a veto in regard to this formula.

• (12:20 p.m.)

If this present formula were adopted it could prevent the definition within the constitution of Canada of the fundamental and inviolable rights of all Canadians as individuals if one province said no. In other words, if this formula is adopted we can say goodbye to any effective Bill of Rights for Canada. Indeed, if the formula is adopted we will have a Canadian amending formula but we might well have one which we will never be able to use. How ironic it would be if we were to free ourselves from a symbol of colonial bondage of the distant past only to fix upon ourselves and our descendants very real and perpetual constitutional fetters for the future. Only those who accept a static laissez faire view of Canada's government and Canada's future would knowingly accept such a formula. It is not surprising that there are united in opposition not only those who see a dynamic role for the Government of Canada, of which we in this party believe ourselves to be spokesmen, but also those in the Provinces—Quebec, for example—who desire a dynamic role for provincial governments. Both alike recognize the prospect of frustration if the formula is adopted. The program for which this party stands, for example, would be impossible if a rigid formula prevented any adjustment of jurisdiction between the Provinces and the Federal authorities.

Mr. Speaker, let me quote a few authorities on this subject. The late Professor Norman Rogers of Queen's, later Minister of Defence—and in case there are some younger Members who do not know about Professor Norman Rogers, he was a distinguished Liberal statesman—said this of the unanimity rule embodied in the formula, and it is exactly the same as that in the present formula:

> There would be no more effective brake on the development of our national institutions. No adequate means would exist to give effect to the national will. Our constitution would tend to become rigid at a time when changing currents of social and economic thought call for serious reconsideration of the distribution of powers and the limitation of fields of taxation as laid down at Confederation. The purpose of unanimous consent is security through stability. But political societies are not static, but progressive. If their needs and aspirations grow with the times, stability of constitutional arrangements will produce friction instead of security.

If this was true—and I think it was—in the 1930's when Professor Rogers was speaking, how much more true is it in 1965, at the time of our "greatest crisis"? I would now like to refer to a recent pronouncement by a very eminent Canadian who might perhaps disclaim the title of a constitutional expert if he had not just gone out of the chamber. The present Prime Minister is quoted in an interview with Mr. Robertson, printed in Weekend Magazine just a few days ago, as saying this, and I call this to the attention of those of his supporters who are in the House:

> A charter or constitution which cannot be adapted to changing conditions is likely to be inadequate for survival. Consequently the constitution is insecure.

True, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister was referring to the UN Charter, not the Constitution of Canada. Apparently he has not yet been adequately advised on the application of his statement to the amending formula which his Government is putting forward. I repeat that the present amending formula, if adopted, would operate to prevent adaptation of our constitution to changing conditions. If the Prime Minister does not choose to accept my statement I refer him back to the statement to the same effect by that eminent scholar and prominent Liberal statesman whom I have just quoted, Professor Norman Rogers. Indeed, I could furnish him with the words of many experts on our Constitution which are precisely to the same effect. If I may adopt the Prime Minister's own language, such a Constitution is likely to be inadequate for survival. Canada's Constitution will be insecure.

I would like to refer to another statement in the White Paper itself which has been put out on this subject. It says:

> The problem of framing federal Constitutions and the procedure for amending them, always has been to strike the proper balance between the requirements of stability and of adaptability. Excessive flexibility and excessive inflexibility are equally destructive to the federal structure.

I ask the House to note those words "equally destructive". How true. The formula which the White Paper contains strikes no balance between flexibility and inflexibility. By section 2 it transfers to the realm of inflexibility every part of our Constitution that counts, whether fundamental or not. This wholesale acceptance of inflexibility will, if adopted, in the words of the White Paper itself be destructive of our Federal structure. Surely this is not what Canada wants. Surely this is not what this Parliament wants. And as surely, if this Parliament were free to examine this formula carefully and vote on it without the coercion of Party ties, this is now what Parliament would ever accept.

Why, then, it may be asked, have the Federal and Provincial Governments accepted this formula? I cannot do better than give as my answer the words of Professor E. R. Alexander of Ottawa University. Professor Alexander has prepared an article entitled "A Constitutional Strait-Jacket for Canada" for the Canadian Bar Review, which is to be published shortly. I strongly recommend that anyone who wishes to have detailed and scholarly information on this important subject should read this article which I believe will be in the May issue of Canadian Bar Review. Professor Alexander has authorized me to quote the following paragraphs:

> On October 14th, 1964 22 men meeting behind closed doors in Ottawa performed a disservice for this country whose repercussions will be felt by generations of yet unborn Canadians. By unanimously agreeing on a domestic amending formula these men took the first step in bringing the Canadian Constitution home. Under this formula the unanimous consent of Parliament and the Legislatures will be required for most significant amendments to our Constitution.
> This is the most important constitutional step taken in Canada since Confederation. Canada deserved statesmanship—

These are not my words; they are Professor Alexander's:

> —Canada got provincial partisanship. There was political advantage in arriving at a Canadian amending formula; there was political advantage in giving every province a veto over important amendments; there was no political advantage in preserving the integrity of Canada as a nation.
> Yes, we will have a Canadian amending formula, but in many important matters we will never be able to use it. Canada will indeed be in a constitutional strait jacket.

Mr. Speaker, if this is a fair assessment, and I think it is, what is the way out? I suggest that the Government should set up a Parliamentary Committee charged with the task not only of examining the amending formula, but also with consideration of what form the new Constitution, "the bold fresh start", the "much more comprehensive undertaking" referred to by Mr. Fowler and Mr. Faribault, whom I mentioned yesterday, should take. In this connection I should like to quote and adopt as my own the words of R. A. Walker, then the Attorney General of Saskatchewan, at the opening of the Constitutional Conference in October, 1960, when he said:

> We also believe that when this constitution is being developed, the people of Canada should be given an opportunity to present opinions and submissions on this matter. In our view the constitution does not belong to the federal and provincial governments of the country. It belongs to the Canadian people. They all have an interest in the form of structure of this fundamental law...I suggest in a matter of this importance we should hear what interested citizens and organizations have to say.

Again in the Review of Saskatchewan's Position, January, 1962, the following:

> An opportunity should be given to all interested organizations, associations, constitutional experts and private citizens to participate in the formulation of an amending procedure to our constitution.

A Parliamentary Committee could be a focus for a stimulating, exciting Canadian discussion out of which a true Canadian unity might emerge and the strong, vital and respected Constitution which, to quote Mr. Fowler and Mr. Faribault again, "is essential if we are to have a strong nation".

There is, as is well known, some delay being experienced in at least two key Provinces in dealing with the formula, Quebec and Saskatchewan. How long this delay is likely to last, I do not know; but the Prime Minister the other day in answer to a question I put to him—and I think it was repeated in reply to a question put by my leader yesterday—said the Government had no intention of indicating what was to be the procedure in the House with regard to this amending formula until after the Provinces had completed dealing with the matter.

If Parliament is eventually to be invited to deal with this formula, why should it not examine it in committee now? I suggest there is no time for delay. We have not got that much time left. Let us, in Parliament, get on with this task. As my leader said, it seems an absurd anomaly that the one group of people not invited to study the matters pertaining to the crisis of Canada—that is what the B and B Commission described it as—are the elected Members in this House of Commons.

• (12:30 p.m.)

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this delay in dealing with this matter is not based upon the fact that the Government hopes that with the assistance of my friend the hon. Member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) and some of his followers it can shove this most important constitutional step ever to be taken in Canada since Confederation through this House without the sort of examination that only a committee with power to call qualified witnesses could provide. I call upon the Prime Minister on behalf of this party and I believe with the concurrence of many other Members of this House, to set up such a committee as a necessary preliminary for a constitutional conference which could evolve a new constitution as a basis for Canada to move forward in unity into the second century of her history.

Messrs. Faribault and Fowler in their book, to which I have referred, not only speak of the need for a new constitution but put forward in draft form their ideas of what that constitution might be. They said their book was only for the purpose of provoking informed discussion. I will not be so bold as to emulate Messrs. Faribault and Fowler, but I want to follow their example to a limited extent. I should like to suggest a preamble to a new constitution which I hope is in the spirit in which Canada's new constitution should be approached, and I do so with the thought that many other people will put their hands to this task.

Perhaps I should say that this is my own idea, and I do not in this regard speak for the party which I represent. I put this suggestion forward for consideration and discussion. This would be a preamble to a new constitution replacing what are called the dull and unimaginative words of our present constitution, the British North America Act. Some might think these words are also dull and unimaginative, but I will suggest this preamble:

> We the people of Canada, speaking through our elected representatives in the Parliament and Legislatures of the Provinces of Canada.
> Hereby assert our determination to continue together as an independent and sovereign nation within the interdependent world community of nations.
> We accept and adopt a federal system as best fitted to the needs of Canada.
>
> We believe that such a federal system must be based upon the equal partnership between the two founding races and we acknowledge the valued contribution made in the past and to be made in the future by Canadians of other origins.
>
> We affirm that the continuing compact of Confederation is based upon respect for individual human rights and upon parliamentary democracy.
>
> We acknowledge the special position occupied by the Province of Quebec as the guardian of a distinctive language and culture.
>
> We hereby provide for the distribution of all legislative judicial and executive power within Canada between the federal and provincial authorities, so as to create a strong federal government able to deal with economic and social objectives affecting the whole of Canada and its relations with the rest of the world, and strong provincial governments endowed with the powers and resources required to express fully and adequately local and regional cultural and historic aspirations of the different provinces and regions of Canada.
>
> We further embody herein the means necessary for continuing co-operation between the different levels of government.
>
> We therefore enact and adopt as the fundamental law of Canada amendable only in Canada in the manner hereinafter set out the following constitution:

[Mr. Brewin.]

Mr. Speaker, perhaps it is easy to draft preambles, but I shall leave the rest of the constitution for another day, shall I say, or at least until others have made some effort in this regard. Perhaps we shall even have to wait until after a constitutional conference has been held.

Mr. Macdonald: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. Member permit a question?

Mr. Brewin: I have only one or two minutes left, but perhaps I should allow the question.

Mr. Macdonald: If other hon. Members of this House agree to give the hon. Member time, will he set out now the precise and practical details of a new constitution which would constitute the real meat of the constitution to follow the gravy which he has just given us in the form of an exhortation?

Mr. Fisher: That is the whole idea, you goof.

Mr. Macdonald: Will all hon. Members give unanimous consent?

Mr. Knowles: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Brewin: I would remind the hon. Member that if he had done me the courtesy of listening to what I said he would know that I suggested this is a tremendous task to which all Canadians must set their hands. It might involve the creation of a Committee of this House which would have the power to call expert witnesses on the subject. The draft of the preamble which I have made sets out just the general framework and tenor of what might become a new Canadian constitution. My friend can call it gravy if he likes, but I think this is something that we feel is part of a task which can only be performed by all the people of Canada working together, and by all the Members of this House giving their best efforts. This will require the setting up of a committee and, as has been suggested by Messrs. Faribault and Fowler, among other things, at some stage a constitutional conference will have to be held. If the hon. Member would like to hear my preliminary views on the subject I shall be very glad to discuss them with him. However, I have not more than a minute or two in which to finish my speech, and I shall do so now.

I hope many other Members of the House and many other Canadians will try their hand at expressing what they believe to be the foundation of our existence as a nation. No doubt there are many Canadian poets and philosophers, some of them in this House, who will improve tremendously on the version I have put forward. I suggest that only out of real striving will grow a truly Canadian constitution, repatriated not in name only but springing from the basic thoughts and feelings of the people of Canada. Such a constitution will only grow out of real striving and consideration. If this can take place we will obtain a constitution which will be a source of inspiration to future generations of Canadians.

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. Member permit a question? Does the hon. Member not consider that the present Canadian constitution, which was worked out by Canadians here in Canada, is a truly Canadian constitution?

Mr. Brewin: What the hon. Member for Winnipeg South Centre has said is certainly true in part, but this constitution was worked out nearly 100 years ago in a community which was colonial in its basic essence, which is totally different to the sort of community we have today. That is why we are discussing an amending formula and full repatriation to Canada. The constitution is still in its form as a British North America Act, an Act of the Imperial Parliament of the United Kingdom. I want to make it Canadian, modern and up to date to meet the needs of Canada in this age and in this generation. Then only will it be truly Canadian.

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in presenting to this House another of his command performances at the beginning of this debate the right hon. Leader of the Opposition said he wanted to know about the position of agriculture across this country. He also used that occasion to give me a few swift verbal kicks in the overalls, claiming among other things that I had told Quebec farmers that they do not know how to look after things, and that their solution is six cows and two sows.

I have nothing but admiration for his mastery of grade school mockery. I have less appreciation for his ability to distort without quite fabricating. I do not know what one can do about evil insinuations which apparently have no purpose except to play on cheap regional prejudices. It seems to me that our new dairy program—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

• (12:40 p.m.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Côté, Longueuil): Order. The Minister of Agriculture has the floor.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the Minister be prohibited from reading his speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Côté, Longueuil): Order. I can see that the Minister looks quite often at his notes, but he is allowed to do so.

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that our new dairy program, which will raise the incomes of some 62,000 farmers in Quebec alone, is enough to refute any insinuation that I have no interest in or understanding of the problems of Quebec farmers. Any halfway objective examination of my views on the need for expanded farm units and better farm management in Quebec will also show that they are completely in line with the current thinking of the Quebec Government.

But the Leader of the Opposition has such a fatal genius for bringing troubles on himself that I cannot bring myself to cause him any more. When he mentioned agriculture I wanted to take him seriously if I could. I went through his speech twice, and I could not find a single policy in the whole carload of his sarcasms, and it occurred to me that you just cannot give leadership in anything, certainly not in agriculture and much less to a whole country, with nothing but invective, however entertaining that invective might be.

To govern Canada, Mr. Speaker, and to help agriculture we must have policies, the kind of policies referred to in the Speech from the Throne. Instead of getting into the kind of cat fight the Leader of the Opposition is always asking for, I want to discuss some of the Government's thinking on new agricultural policies and new agricultural approaches. I would be interested to hear the Leader of the Opposition or the hon. Member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) present some alternatives.

As I have said before, some of the policies of the previous Government were steps in the right direction, but they were faltering steps. In agriculture their stock in trade was the handout approach.

Mr. McIntosh: Pretty extensive notes.

Mr. Hays: They lacked either the imagination or the guts to bring in solid and responsible policies aimed at providing lasting solutions to our agricultural problems.

Mr. Fisher: Author?

Mr. Hays: What they apparently wanted most from all their policies were votes. They did not care how much of the taxpayers' money they had to spend trying to buy them, or how much they worsened the long term problems of agriculture in the process.

Mr. Fisher: Author?

Mr. Hays: The mess they made of the dairy program is a good example. They were right in wanting to give our dairy producers higher returns, but they were too chicken-hearted to go the whole way and develop a policy that would put those higher returns on a sound basis, a basis that would not eventually have wrecked the industry with an ever-increasing surplus of production. They were afraid to do what they must have known should be done. They might have lost a few votes—

Mr. McIntosh: Who wrote that for you?

Mr. Fisher: Author?

Mr. Hays: —or else they were incompetent to do the job. They left it to this Government to get the dairy industry out of its mess, and we are now well on our way toward doing just that.

Mr. Fisher: Author?

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, this will give the middle-aged beatnik from Port Arthur something to put in his column. Anyone who cares to examine our dairy program in detail will find that while it is designed to bring about a return for manufacturing milk which on the national average basis will be equal to $3.50 per hundredweight compared with $2.80 to $3 up to a year ago, it is also designed to discourage production surplus to our domestic needs.

In crop insurance it was the same story. They brought in a program that our farmers need, but it was so crippled by their political fearfulness that no province was ready to buy it. It was left to this Government to straighten it out and make it work. They brought in the ARDA program; then they made such a mess of the whole country's finances that they could not afford to get it off the ground. It was not until this Government took over and straightened out their financial mess that ARDA really got rolling. They expanded farm credit, but again they only went half far enough and left it to this Government to apply the bold approach demanded in this field.

We have to think a little bigger in Canada today than we ever thought before because our problems are a great deal larger. We have to define our problems and then define the goals we want our policies to head for. Our agriculture as a whole is healthier and more productive today than ever before, but we all recognize that thousands of individual farmers still have serious problems. You can sum up these problems in two words: low income. This is the core of the problem we have to deal with in all our agricultural policies.

Since I have been Minister of Agriculture I have studied personally at first hand the agricultural policies in 10 countries. From what I have learned it is my considered opinion that Canada today is behind most of those countries in establishing policies that will ensure a strong, economically sound food production industry for the expanded population we will have in the future. Where we are most behind is in establishing a comprehensive national policy to cover the whole of our agricultural economy.

We like to think of Canada as an agricultural exporting country, and we still do export some 30 per cent of our total farm production, which amounts to about a fifth of our total exports. But we have been so careless of agriculture during the last 20 years or so that today we import almost as much food, in terms of value, as we export, including items like pork and beef and cheese which Canada can produce as well as any country in the world. We do not think Canada should become dependant on world markets for such an essential item as food. It is to see that this does not happen that this Government is developing a comprehensive national policy for agriculture.

This is not the appropriate occasion to go into the details, but I can say this: I believe that the direction in which we will be moving with the proposed National Dairy Commission should provide a guide for approaches to income and marketing problems in other areas of agriculture in the future. If these sound like radical approaches, I defend them by pointing out that our problems are also radical. Handouts are certainly no solution, nor are subsidy programs that only encourage unhealthy surpluses.

We have taken an ad hoc approach to our agricultural problems for too long. The Government intends to develop in co-operation with the provinces a national agricultural program based on economic principles which, as far as possible, can be placed beyond the reach of political expediences. This program must ensure a stable supply of food for our consumers at reasonable prices. It must recognize the legitimate interests in our domestic market of our trading partners. But it must also recognize the right of every farmer in the country to an income that is more closely equivalent to what the workers in our towns and cities enjoy.

We now have labour laws guaranteeing minimum wages for our workers. We have tariffs and tax incentives for our businessmen. It is time we started thinking of a minimum income for our farmers. In 1949 the average weekly industrial wage was equivalent to $2,236 per year. In the same year the average realized net income of farmers was almost the same, $2,283. In 1964, however, the average industrial wage had increased to $4,472 while average farm income was only $3,815, a difference of nearly $700.

I believe that the primary objective of all our agricultural programs should be to encourage a national average realized net income for the family farm equivalent to the national average industrial wage. I think that should be our definition of an economic farm unit. It was with this goal in mind that we doubled the farm credit available through the Federal Government. It was with this goal in mind that we established the Farm Machinery Syndicates Act. It was with this goal in mind that we revised the crop insurance program. It was with this goal in mind that we developed a new utility-based prize program for all major farm fairs and exhibitions in this country. It will be with this goal in mind that we will establish a National Dairy Commission.

Reviewing the agricultural situation after taking office, the Government decided that the most urgent step toward strengthening the position of the family farm was to provide better credit facilities. Without adequate credit the family farm could not be expanded to its rightful level of profitability in our economy as a whole. We have now provided the credit facilities to make this possible. Our farm credit legislation has also made it easier for a father to pass on the family farm to his children and for young farmers to get a decent start. Yet our critics complain that this is no help because you cannot borrow yourself out of debt.

These people just do not understand the uses of credit in farming. They still think of the family farm as a few acres of badly cultivated land, six tired cows, a couple of worn out sows, bookkeeping on the back of an envelope, a shed or two, a tarpaper shack, a mail order catalogue and an outhouse. This is not a family farm but a welfare problem, and we have policies for that, too.

Up to now in Canada it has generally been left to farmers themselves to develop economic units through their own resources. In my examination of agricultural policies in other countries I have been impressed by Government programs for the purchase and redevelopment of poorly used lands. I think the Federal and Provincial Governments in Canada will have to consider very soon a comprehensive national program for Government purchase and redevelopment of such lands into economic family farm units, which can be sold or leased back to private individuals who can then expect to make a decent living on them. We want a flush toilet, not an outhouse farm economy for Canada. The successful family farm today must mean modern, expensive and efficient machinery; good buildings, costly fertilizers, city style bookkeeping and management, with enough cash income to send the children to universities as city families do, and electric lights and indoor plumbing.

Let us take a look at the kind of family farm that could be expected to return a cash income of about $4,500 a year for the farmer's labour and investment. For a wheat farm on medium land in Saskatchewan he would need about 700 acres, plus the machinery to work it, or an investment of $40,000 at the very least and probably closer to $50,000 or $60,000. For a dairy farm in Ontario to provide that kind of living, the farmers would probably need at least 200 acres of land and 40 to 50 milk cows, a minimum investment of $60,000 and probably more. To make a cow and calf beef operation pay that much in Quebec or the Maritimes a farmer should have something like 500 acres and at least 100 cows, probably closer to 200, an investment of anywhere from $60,000 to $75,000 and upward.

This is the reason we expanded farm credit as much as we did, and we may eventually have to expand it even further. This is why we now intend to take the next step by developing policies that will assure our farmers the kind of markets and incomes that will enable them to pay for this kind of expansion.

Mr. Watson (Assiniboia): May I ask a question? Is it true that a farmer must be under the age of 45 and have assets of $75,000 in order to be eligible to borrow from the Farm Credit Corporation the $55,000 to which the Minister referred?

Mr. Hays: This is not so, Mr. Speaker. If he obtains a supervised loan up to $55,000 he gets the first $27,500 at 5 per cent, and an economic rate is charged on the balance. A farmer is required to have 25 per cent down. If you were selling to your son you could give him the 25 per cent and he would be able to finance the balance through the Farm Credit Corporation. I might say that since we amended the Act to grant larger loans, farmers across this country have been participating. Many of them are refinancing or extending loans that they have, and we have many new farmers who have just started and who have purchased land from their fathers or relatives.

Mr. Watson (Assiniboia): But these people would not be permitted to borrow $55,000, would they, because they would not be qualified?

Mr. Hays: Not necessarily; if they have the qualifications they certainly can borrow. They have to be bona fide farmers; they cannot be Members of Parliament or Cabinet Ministers or would-be authors, that sort of thing. Most of them can take advantage of these loans.

Mr. McIntosh: May I direct a question to the Minister?

Mr. Fisher: I will write your speech.

Mr. Hays: It would not be worth reading.

Mr. McIntosh: Can the Minister tell the House how many loans have been made up to the amount of $55,000?

Mr. Hays: I cannot answer the question because I should like to be accurate. However, I would be glad to get the information for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be of congratulations to the Mover and Seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I should like to offer special congratulations to the hon. Member for St. John's West, who acquitted himself very ably and indicated that he certainly has the ability and is the kind of representative from the Atlantic area the people look forward to having represent them in future Parliaments.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments on the speech delivered by the Minister of Agriculture. I may say that as a Member from Nova Scotia, where we have very significant problems in agriculture, we were pleased to see an indication in the Speech from the Throne that some action would be taken in agriculture that would be of benefit to our area. It is difficult to make further comments on the proposed legislation until we see it.

We have been waiting a long time for action in this field. Certainly I am not going to be overly critical of the Government at this stage, in view of the fact that action has been taken no matter how belated it might be. I will certainly look forward to the new agreements that have been developed between the Provincial Governments and the Federal Government under ARDA. I will look forward to the feed grain legislation which is so much needed in our area of Canada if we are to develop the beef cattle industry to the extent we would like to see it developed. I hope the Government will move very quickly in bringing this legislation before the House so that agriculture in the Atlantic area can be assisted, and assisted it must be in a very material way at the earliest possible opportunity.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make some general comments about the Speech from the Throne and a subject which has given me a great deal of concern for some time. We did not become the nation we are today by producing leaders who mimic their counterparts in the United States. Yet when we read the Throne Speech we must quickly come to the conclusion it is based on either a yellow, tattered and torn state of the union message outlining the new frontier policies of the late President Kennedy, or the new version of President Johnson's great society. In either instance it would be helpful to Canada if we had made in Canada policies, based on Canadians' ideas and applicable to our Canada.

What a shock this Throne Speech must have been to many Canadians who supported the Liberal Party in 1963, for it is a socialist philosophy dressed up in Madison Avenue language. It is the announcement of an impending marriage between the Liberal Party and the N.D.P. It may well be that the only reason the ceremony has not been performed before now is the language used in outlining the marriage proposal.

Some have said this Throne Speech is like a reversible coat in that it can be turned inside out and used as an election platform. Surely, Mr. Speaker, before election platforms can be considered by the Government of today we must expect action of a far different type which has been far too long in coming, and which will allow the electorate to make a sane and sensible decision. Surely this Throne Speech is little more than apple polishing in the hope the electorate will forget what has transpired in this nation since this Government took office. If this is a smokescreen for scandal, then it is too thin and too obvious and the Canadian public will quickly see through it and judge this Government for what it is, a gigantic flop.

• (1:00 p.m.)

The Prime Minister described my leader as Mr. Clean, and he was so correct. No man has a greater reputation for honesty and integrity than the Leader of the Official Opposition, and no man led his government with more fearless dedication to these principles. There was no code of ethics required among members of the Diefenbaker administration; it was a part of the character of the individuals appointed during that period. There were no charges of misleading Parliament levelled at my leader, and no concern among Members of this House over activities of Cabinet Ministers. No man in Canada today has been scrutinized with greater care by members of the Fourth Estate. No man has had his character investigated in such minute detail or has had his faults—yes, we all have some—magnified beyond recognition as has the Leader of the Opposition; and no man has a cleaner bill of health when the decision is rendered on his dedication to his country and to the principles of honesty and integrity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Coates: Surely, Mr. Speaker, the Government is not so simple minded as to think it could secure a mandate from the Canadian people on the basis of its present record. It would be an endorsation of fumbling and bumbling, of colossal ineptitude that has become the hallmark of this regime. Surely no Canadian would vote for the continued tenure of a Prime Minister who fled from the House of Commons on an unimportant junket to western Canada with bombshell after bombshell being dropped on his party, only to return, after the fireworks had died down, to inform the country and the House that he had misled them before embarking on his junket.

Where is the action from the Government on the gravest matter facing Parliament since I have been a Member, and surely one of the gravest in the history of our nation? Instead of action we get excuses on the character of the Prime Minister; he is timid, he is feeble, he is anaemic, he is a nice guy who does not like to hurt his friends. If these are the Prime Minister's friends, who needs enemies? But, Mr. Speaker, they do not tell the real story.

The real story is that the Prime Minister is not capable of taking the action that is demanded, and on this basis an appeal to the public will end his tenure in office—a good thing for Parliament and for Canada. The Liberal Party has caused irreparable damage to Parliament. It has left open sores that are so much in evidence today, and the ointment prescribed in the Throne Speech will not heal the wounds they have inflicted on this revered institution.

Early in the last session of Parliament, indeed soon after the session began, on February 20, 1964, as recorded at page 38 of Hansard I asked the Minister of Justice the following question:

> Is the Minister in a position to inform the House on his Department's assessment of the extent of Mafia operations in Canada?

At that time the Minister of Justice took my question as notice. Then on February 26, as recorded at page 258 of Hansard, I again asked the Minister if he was in a position to reply to my question of February 20, and he stated at that time:

> —I would prefer to answer that question later, and I also ask for leave to discuss the advisability of answering it.

I did not realize at that time, but I can certainly appreciate today, why the Minister of Justice wanted to consider the advisability of answering a question on the Government's assessment of organized crime in Canada, in view of the fact that I am sure the recent Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister would have been very anxious not to have the Minister of Justice provide us with that kind of information; and that a great many other friends of the Minister, important people in the Liberal Party, would not have been at all interested in having Canadians become aware of the degree of infiltration of organized crime within the Government of this nation.

Mr. Speaker, I did not realize the degree but I was concerned, because I was aware of the investigation that was carried out in the Province of Ontario and of the indications of the build-up in organized crime in this nation, most of it moving in from south of the border, taking over our great cities. Now we have found in a most unhelpful way just how far organized crime has gone in this nation and what a great influence it has on this institution and on people who have been elected to this institution.

We are now awaiting the report of the Dorion Inquiry, and that will look after one aspect of the situation. But, Mr. Speaker, are Canadians going to be satisfied that this is the full extent of the infiltration of organized crime into the Government and the operations of the Government of this nation? When we see how easy it was for Mr. Rivard to walk out of a penal institution and disappear completely, to become not only a national joke but an international joke, we get some appreciation of just how far organized crime has entered into the operations of governments in this nation. And surely if we are going to remove the smears that have been placed on this institution by the Liberal Party we as Canadians are entitled to more than the Dorion Inquiry, and we should demand it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Coates: What this country needs today is a Royal Commission that can investigate every aspect of organized crime and its operations in the nation; a commission that will go well beyond the scope of the Dorion Inquiry; that will look at the Department of Justice and the methods used in determining whether or not charges are to be laid against individuals; that will look at the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and determine how certain people get into this nation and how they stay here, and how difficult it seems to be for officials of that department to remove them from this nation when we find that they no longer should be here.

There are so many avenues that demand exploration that Canadians should expect at the very least from the Government a full disclosure to the public of what has been developing in this nation through the build-up of organized crime, and the only way this can be done is through the appointment of a royal commission or a judicial inquiry that will have available to it a scope that is not and has not been available to the Dorion Inquiry. When this comes about, then Members of Parliament will be able to feel that they need not have this type of smear hanging over their heads because of something in which they had no part. I would not like to think that this institution has been degraded to the degree evident in the minds of the Canadian people because of things the Liberal Party has done, things which they felt were to their benefit but which were certainly not to the benefit of Parliament or the Canadian people.

But this may be too much to expect, Mr. Speaker, from the present Prime Minister, for he seems to put his friends before his country, and to put his friends before Parliament. In fact he seems to put his friends before everything, and it is difficult to imagine what kind of action you can get from a man like this. But surely it is never too late to hope that he can change, that he may read some of the editorials which appear almost daily in the newspapers of the nation telling him to take action and to be ruthless; telling him to do the things which he gave the people of Canada the impression he would do when asking for their support in April, 1963, but which he has failed, and failed in a most miserable manner, to do since he became the Prime Minister of this nation.

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join other hon. Members of this house in congratulating the Mover and the Seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I was very impressed with one idea expressed by the hon. Member for St. John's West, which was that education is now a matter of national concern. In fact he went further than I ever did and said that the standards of education were a matter of national concern, and it is a tribute to his eloquence that so far no one has taken issue with him on that. I recall that the last occasion I broached this subject was on the education bill, and the Leader of the Opposition took me severely to task on the question. Therefore I congratulate the hon. Member for St. John's West on the success he has had, because he shows reform thinking.

In these few moments I should like to deal quite emphatically with the whole concept of reform. The Speech from the Throne finally adopts the idea that we must have reform of our rules and procedures. I am sure you will recall, Mr. Speaker, that back in November, 1962, when I made public my views about the Liberal Party and their zeal for reform, I said in my remarks that the most essential place for reform is in this House. At that time the word "reform" was not quite as acceptable as it is today, and I am happy to see that everyone else in this chamber is now in favour of reforming not only our rules and procedures but the whole concept of parliamentary government.

In the last eight or nine years we Liberals, I think, have learned one thing clearly, and that is that we do not rule by divine right. We occupy the treasury benches only if we pursue reform with zeal. That is our whole purpose of being. Sometimes I am inclined to remind hon. Members and some of the Ministers that the Liberal Party was not born in a soft easy chair at the Rideau Club. Nor was it intended or initiated to protect and solidify its establishment. Most hon. Members know that the whole purpose of the Liberal Party, its whole conception, was to be against establishment. It was a party for the individual, and I think this line of view is very well expressed in the Speech from the Throne.

I intend to deal with one specific issue in this idea of reform, and that is in connection with one problem existing today, namely that of assistance during times of unemployment. Most hon. Members will realize that there are eight or nine avenues which supposedly are means to assist people who become unemployed. If a man is fired from his job he then turns to unemployment insurance. This is a federal matter. There are certain regulations involved and he has to send in his card, get it mailed back and so on. However, if you exhaust your unemployment insurance and you are under the age of 65, then you have to apply for welfare, which is a municipal matter. If you are injured on the job you go to the compensation board, which is a provincial matter. If you are over 65 and out of work you can apply for old age assistance, a provincial matter. If you are under 65 and cannot get a job you go back to your municipality. If you are crippled or blinded then a provincial act comes into application.

All these measures deal with the provision of assistance during times of unemployment. Therefore I suggest to the Government that an insurance plan which is a measure of reform is absolutely needed now. We have all these plans, each with a different system of administration, yet not one of them actually deals with the subject properly.

Consider the question of unemployment insurance. Originally it was devised to provide a means to pay for food, clothing and shelter when a man lost his job. Consider again, Mr. Speaker, whether at the present time the $30 a week provided does any of these things. It scarcely pays for his food. What is to become of his shelter and clothing and all the other expenses necessary when a man is out of work?

Obviously our present measures are not sufficient. Unemployment insurance, I think we will all admit, has been a sort of political football. We included within its ambit fishermen, lumbermen and others, and the provision of strike pay. In other words, at the present time the only people who really get some benefit from the unemployment insurance fund are those who already have protection. For instance, if a man goes on strike and draws strike pay, this additional $30 will help him. If a female employee quits her job to raise a family, this sum again comes in very handy. If a man retires but does not receive a pension it also comes in handy.

However, Mr. Speaker, all these provisions have a reserve, and the unfortunate part about the whole matter is that most Canadians are now convinced that this is a sort of enforced savings plan, and they have no compunction whatever about asking for unemployment insurance whether or not they are really entitled to it. In other words they say to themselves "I have put so much money in and I want to draw so much money out". That is not the purpose of the fund.

To supplement this I think you would be surprised, Mr. Speaker, at the number of people who use family assistance as some sort of family allowance which people save up for the benefit of their children and their education, but when the time of stress comes they have to dip into that. This is another matter that is a sore point with most people. The situation now is that unemployment insurance, and in fact all these other programs, do not provide the proper assistance, the proper measures. This is where we, as the Liberal Party and a Liberal Government, should get our minds to work to develop a completely new scheme.

I would suggest the following, in keeping with that idea. We already have an unemployment insurance set-up; we now have the Pension Plan, and we have the old age assistance program. I suggest a comprehensive scheme that will merge all these programs into a truly beneficial pattern. I suggest that this be a contributory plan. I suggest that the benefits be geared to approximately 75 per cent of earnings, very similar to the Compensation Board, because this is a much truer idea of help and assistance. I also suggest that there be a maximum annual income and a maximum fixed to the benefits. I further suggest that the total annual earnings be taken into consideration, so that if a man draws $75 a week but happens to be a seasonal employee and during the course of the year earns more than he is entitled to under this scheme, then of course that would have to be refunded or levelled out. I also suggest one other thing, that all people, whether blind, crippled, old, not yet receiving the pension, who need assistance during the term of their employment should be merged into this one plan.

I have one further suggestion, Mr. Speaker, that may sound a little radical but I do not think it is; that is, that these benefits should be payable when a man wants to quit his job and look for another one. Some will say "Good heavens, this is strictly socialistic". I am looking at it from a business sense point of view. I know from personal experience that if a man doesn't like his work and doesn't feel this is where he belongs, he produces to only 10 per cent of his capacity. We should give them six months to find another job. I have done this; I have said "Go and look for another job and I will pay you until you find one". The result was that I was better off because I found somebody else who liked the job, and he was better off because he found a job he liked, and he and the man I employed produced to 90 per cent of their capacity rather than 10 per cent. This is a problem we must face, and I suggest that this type of new, comprehensive plan would be truly a measure of reform in this field.

I think, Sir, you will recall with me that this may be adopting an idea from private enterprise, because back in 1954, 1953, 1952, just in the general insurance field you had fire insurance, theft insurance, liability insurance, hail insurance, glass insurance and just about every type of insurance, and it was very costly. Then the idea of comprehensive general insurance was introduced. I was surprised to find just recently that I am paying less for insurance now, in 1965, than I was paying in 1954, and getting everything covered. So the administrative saving and the efficiency of this type of comprehensive plan would be very beneficial and is very much needed. We would finally be able to say to the people of Canada that we truly have a measure that gives them factual assistance when they are unemployed.

This would remove a lot of the apprehensions that exist at the present time. Some will say this is an interference with provincial rights, because the Provinces are already concerned in these matters. But if we do have—and we have—an idea of co-operative federalism, I think we can overcome these problems. That, Sir, I suggest would be the true meaning of reform, and I highly recommend that our Government look into this matter and that all Members pay serious attention to a comprehensive plan, which is a very much needed measure at the present time.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. Member a question. I noted with interest the hon. Member's review of the various plans this Government had taken up or advocated. I would like to ask him what became of the older workers training and assistance program, which was a much vaunted program a few months ago but about which I have not heard anything lately.

Mr. Otto: Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the Minister of Labour dealt with this matter the other day. However, I would like the opportunity to repeat my point. I am trying to say that we should merge all these plans. We have all these individual plans which could be merged into one truly effective plan, which we are going to need in this time of automation and in this time of a general movement of labour.

Mr. Eric Stefanson (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my first words are those of congratulation to the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. They are both young men who no doubt have a long future in public life ahead of them.

It is interesting to note that both these Members referred to unemployment; they both said they had unemployment in their ridings and that they were concerned with this. Many of us recall that when the Liberals were in opposition they claimed they had all the answers. They talked daily about doom and gloom and said "Give us a chance and we will correct everything".

During the 1962 and 1963 election compaigns, to listen to Liberal speakers and read their propaganda one would come to the conclusion that they were supermen with the power of magic; that all they would have to do was wave the magic wand and everything would be rosy.

However, it did not take very long for this bubble to break. It has become plain that those sitting on the treasury benches are not supermen; that they are mere mortals and are not infallible. They have also demonstrated that they are indecisive, ineffective, lackadaisical, even lazy, and in some cases are not free from corruption. It has become plain that they have not been able to solve the problems, and in many cases have not even been able to cope with them. This was demonstrated by the mover and seconder, who said that unemployment was a serious factor in their ridings.

Another frightening situation is the sky-rocketing cost of living during the past two years. This has created real hardship for those who have low incomes and those who are on fixed incomes, and this includes all retired people on pension.

The Speech from the Throne was certainly wordy. It is possibly one of the longest speeches presented to an opening of Parliament. It includes many left-overs and is full of generalities. One cannot help but be suspicious that it is mere window dressing and that, by the past performance of Liberal Governments, they have no intention of dealing with many of the items mentioned. In the event of an election it is a handy document to have, whereby the Government could say this was their program. This is a typical Liberal attitude.

Members on this side of the House have dealt with many of the items mentioned in the Throne Speech. I intend to deal briefly with some of them. The hon. Member for Simcoe East dealt with the paragraph relating to the price of drugs. I agree with him that it is not good enough for the Government to re-establish a committee to study this matter. The Government has the power to cut the price of drugs by removing the sales tax. It is most unfair and unjust that there should be a sales tax on drugs. I personally believe that the principle involved here is totally wrong. When a person is ill he has the added expense of obtaining drugs. It is not enough that these people are ill and have these added expenses over and above those incurred by a person who is well; the Government penalizes them further by putting a sales tax on drugs. I feel this is wrong, unfair and disgraceful, and I urge the Government to take immediate steps to correct this situation.

The hon. Member for London referred to the Income Tax Act and specific unrealistic exemptions. This matter was discussed during an amendment proposed yesterday, and the figure of $3,000 as exemption for a married individual was suggested as being realistic. Under today's conditions I believe also that that would be more realistic, and I urge the Minister of Finance to give some consideration to an increase in income tax exemptions in his budget which he intends to bring down on April 26.

The Minister of Finance and the Government have turned deaf ears to the requests by Conservative Members for the removal of the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials and production machinery. Surely by now the Government has learned through experience that this tax has placed a burden on Canadian industry and has hindered growth and development. It is to be hoped that the Government will take quick action to correct this inequity and injustice.

There is something for almost everyone in the Throne Speech, but one group has been left out completely, and that is the small businessman in Canada. In the past the small businessman in Canada has been the backbone of the nation. I am sure almost every Canadian has received assistance at some time from a small businessman. Today with the trend toward supermarkets and shopping centres many small businessmen are experiencing difficulty, but as far as the Government is concerned it is apparently prepared to see the small businessman perish and disappear completely. In this regard this Government is apparently void of ideas, and is content to sit on its fat backside and do nothing. I for one hope it will have a change of heart.

I should now like to refer to that paragraph in the Speech from the Throne which states:

> You will be asked to consider measures of special assistance to the family farm in both eastern and western Canada.

I listened to the Minister of Agriculture this afternoon but he did not clarify that paragraph in relation to agriculture. In fact I gained the impression that he was making fun of the family farm. His attitude has led me to believe that these are just flowery words which make nice reading, and they are there only for that purpose. The Minister of Agriculture referred to a national policy for agriculture. This Minister and this Government are noted for going out through the country making statements, grandiose announcements and announcements of policy without action to follow them up. They receive press coverage, are interviewed on television, and by this manner of behaviour are able to deceive the Canadian public.

The Minister of Agriculture spoke about low farm incomes, and that certainly is a true situation. It is interesting, however, to note that since he became Minister there has been a drastic drop in the prices of beef cattle, turkeys, eggs and poultry, and a short time ago in wheat. All this would indicate that he does not have a clue as to how to deal with these matters. When the hon. Minister accused the previous Government of not doing anything he seemed to have forgotten that the former Government introduced ARDA, crop insurance, the Farm Credit Corporation, the Stabilization Act, legislation providing interest free cash advances on farm-stored grain, and also introduced acreage payments. All this Minister has ever done is increase the load placed on farmers. His announcement regarding the increased amount that farmers can borrow drastically increased the value of land and has done nothing whatever to assist the farmers.

Perhaps I should also point out to the Minister that although he brought in an amendment to the Crop Insurance Act last summer to provide for reinsurance, it is my understanding that the Minister has not finalized this with the Provinces, although he has had several months to do so. In that regard I would charge him with being tardy in his duties.

The former Minister of Public Works (Mr. Deschatelets) made a grandiose announcement in the House of Commons on July 17, 1963 about arranging meetings with the Provinces to discuss a national highway policy. This anouncement received a great deal of publicity in the press, on radio and on television. The Minister was interviewed on television and gave the impression that this was a tremendously important policy announcement and that action would be forthcoming. What has been the result? This conference was never convened. Why was it not convened? A cost-sharing arrangement between the Federal and Provincial Governments in respect of major highways would have been acceptable to Provincial Governments, and I suspect that is the reason this conference was not convened. There are indications that this Government is discontinuing the Roads to Resources Program. This was a beneficial and useful program, and it was under this program that many of the roads in central and northern Manitoba were built including the road from Gypsumville to Grand Rapids.

There is an urgent need for the establishment of a national highway policy. To help the growth and development of western Canada it is essential to construct a second east-west route. This second highway should follow a northern route. It could easily pass through the interlake area of Manitoba, cross Lake Manitoba at the Narrows and carry on west to Edmonton and beyond. There is also a need for more highways in northern Manitoba to make this area more accessible so the natural resources can be developed. I urge the new Minister of Public Works to get cracking and establish a national highway policy without further delay.

Another matter for his consideration is the need for a policy covering pleasure boats, which are increasing in large numbers each year in all parts of Canada and will continue to increase. This traffic requires certain services, and it is therefore essential to determine who has the responsibility for providing these services. It has become urgent that policy be adopted in this regard.

Members of this Government have made so-called policy statements with a lot of fanfare and publicity, following which nothing has been done. I suggest this is a pattern which has developed among those sitting on the treasury benches. This type of performance is not good enough. The people in all parts of Canada are entitled to something better.

I should now like to refer briefly to the paragraph in the Throne Speech which refers to human resources. It states:

> All the great potentialities of our economy are not, however, being realized. The talents of some of our people are wasted because of poverty, illness, inadequate education and training—

It then states:

> My government therefore is developing a program for the full utilization of our human resources and the elimination of poverty among our people.

Those are very nice words, but sound very much as though they have been borrowed from the former Kennedy administration and the present Johnson administration across the line. They indicate quite clearly that this Government has far from solved the problems with which it is faced. I await with interest the legislation which the Government will introduce to deal with these problems. I sincerely hope that these are not just flowery expressions put into the Throne Speech for effect, but that the Government will take concrete action. I hope the Government will come up with some good, effective legislation which will best utilize all human resources. It does seem to me that redevelopment of rural areas and the training of workers fits into the ARDA program.

The ARDA legislation introduced by the former Government is the most forward looking legislation introduced by any Government. Another paragraph of the Throne Speech refers to ARDA as follows:

> You will be asked to approve the creation of a fund for rural economic development and, in order to provide for fuller integration of action for rural development, amendments to the legislation regarding ARDA will be placed before you.

When the Minister of Agriculture spoke this afternoon he poked fun at what the former Government had done through ARDA. I think the ARDA legislation was by far the most forward looking and imaginative legislation ever introduced by any Parliament on the North American continent. Certainly it is not the type of legislation that a Minister should treat humorously. As an indication of what the Prime Minister must have thought of the competence of the Minister of Agriculture, let me point out that he did not allow ARDA to remain under the Department of Agriculture, where it actually belongs. He removed it from the Minister and has now placed it under the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé). He has much more confidence in the Minister of Forestry administering this act properly. I certainly will await with interest the amendments which the Government proposes to introduce. The original ARDA legislation had three main aims; to put to better use marginal land that is not very productive in its present use, to develop income and employment opportunities in rural areas, and to develop and conserve the water and soil resources of rural Canada.

On checking over the projects which have been approved in the Province of Manitoba I find that these come mainly under soil and water conservation projects, alternate uses of land and research. Actually very little has been done to date under rural development. In my opinion this section of the Act is the most challenging, for in the long run it will accomplish the most good. I hope a determined effort will be made to promote projects under this section of the Act. One project which has been approved and which comes under this section is a pilot plant to process rough fish from Lake Winnipeg for mink food to increase the income of local fishermen and make available low cost animal food.

In March of 1963 the Interlake region of Manitoba was declared a test area under the ARDA program, and later it was designated as a rural development area. Many research programs were carried out in this area, some paid for 100 per cent by the Federal Government and some on a cost sharing basis with the province. Some of these programs dealt with research, land use, water conservation, wildlife, tourist facilities and attractions, manpower and the prospects of establishing industry. Many of these surveys have been completed and no doubt they were very useful in that a lot of valuable data has been collected. This information should be made available to area development committees and municipal councils. This information will be of little value if it is locked up. The more widely it is made available the more likely it will be made use of.

In April of 1964 two area resources conferences were held in the Interlake area, one at Arborg and the other at Stonewall. These two conferences provided a lot of information and generated a great deal of local interest. Since these conferences were held, area development committees have been set up throughout the whole district. These committees are doing a lot of good work, and the men and women serving on them and giving of their time and effort deserve a lot of credit. With the spirit of the people at the local level, I am sure that the ARDA program will be made good use of in the Interlake area.

These people, however, need a lot of encouragement from both provincial and federal officials. I am aware that these officials are doing a good job, but I should like to suggest that in an area which has been designated as a rural development area an even greater degree of co-operation and effort should be put forth by officials of both governments.

The Minister of Forestry, who is in charge of administering the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act, has, I understand, great confidence in the Act. For this

I am very thankful. However, I have one criticism to make. With the original agreement which was signed in 1962 now expired, the Minister has not signed the new agreement with the provinces. In my opinion this is being tardy. I urge the Minister to take care of this without further delay. I also urge the Minister and his officials to do everything in their power to make sure this legislation does what it was set up to do, and that they make all possible assistance available to areas designated as development areas. The success of this legislation will help to make Canada a better place in which to live.

In the paragraph of the Speech from the Throne dealing with ARDA there is reference to the creation of a fund for rural economic development. I certainly hope that when the fund is created the money will be spent all across Canada. My constituency could benefit a great deal if some of the money was used in that particular area, and I urge the Government to see to it that some of the funds are allotted to that area.

There is another matter I want to touch on. I refer to water pollution. In 1958 I had the pleasure of introducing a private Member's resolution in the House dealing with water pollution. Subsequently the former Conservative Government took the first step to deal with water pollution when they made loans available to towns and cities for trunk sewers and sewage disposal plants. In the agreements there was a forgiveness provision to the extent of 25 per cent to encourage towns and cities to undertake this work.

This was the first step to deal with water pollution and it was indeed a most welcome one. Many towns have used this legislation to tackle this problem. But this is not enough. A far greater effort has to be made. The Government of today have ignored this question completely, and by the looks of things they intend to ignore it because I do not believe it is referred to in the Speech from the Throne.

The hon. Member for Simcoe East dealt with water. I would agree with him that water is fast becoming Canada's most important natural resource. A shortage of water is developing all over the North American continent, and it is urgent that steps be taken to conserve water and develop a water policy.

Another matter I raised on one occasion by way of a resolution had to do with establishing a permanent voters' list. In the Speech from the Throne there are these words:

> My Government intends ot make proposals regarding the limitation and payment of election expenses when it has received and considered the findings of the committee of inquiry.

I hope that at the same time they will also see fit to deal with the matter of establishing a permanent voters' list. Under our system today many people are disfranchised, and there certainly is no reason why every Canadian should not have the chance to vote in a federal election. From my own experience in my own riding I know that if an election occurs at a certain time the fishermen will have gone north to their fishing grounds, and they will lose their votes. I hope this matter will be given serious consideration.

There is another matter which is back on the agenda and is referred to in the Speech from the Throne in these words:

> You will be asked to enact legislation to establish an Indian Claims Commission.

We have seen that promise before but nothing has been done about it. I will wait with interest to see whether the same thing will apply again or whether any action will be forthcoming.

There is one other item I want to touch on before I take my seat, and it is referred to in this paragraph in the Speech from the Throne:

> In order to raise the level of income of Canadian fishermen, a measure will be placed before you to provide for an expanded national fisheries development program.

I am very pleased to see that the Minister of Fisheries is in his seat. Hon. Members will recall that in January, 1964 the Minister of Fisheries convened a conference which we were all very glad to see convened. Everybody had high hopes that there was going to be tremendous activity and a lot of things done for the fishermen. This heading appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press: "Fishermen To Get New Deal On Aid". Again, there was this heading in the Winnipeg Tribune: "Fishermen To Get Same Federal Aid As Farmers". However, a Mr. Kramer of Saskatchewan indicated he felt that if the fishermen were only going to get the same deal as the farmers they certainly would not be getting much. Nevertheless, fishermen are among our primary producers, and I personally feel it has been the tendency of most countries to forget the primary producer. It is certainly a fact that not much assistance has been provided to the fishing industry.

This communiqué, issued following the conference, was lengthy, consisting of 1,850 words. It says here that after the meeting

Mr. Smallwood was ecstatic about the conference results. He said there was agreement on all sides to the proposition that the fishing industry should be treated the same as agriculture, and called it a "Magna Carta" for the fishing industry. I would be amazed if Mr. Smallwood was not getting a little bit impatient at the inactivity of the present Government and the lack of action on the recommendations made at this most important conference.

In so far as Manitoba is concerned, Mines and Resources Minister Sterling Lyon has made several recommendations. The first is for an expanded program of biological research, specifically a fish culture and biological station for Grand Rapids, in view of the need to increase output. So far as I know, nothing has been done in this regard. Then he goes on, and I quote:

> Much greater effort and technological research, to meet the need for new product development and the development of new fishing gear and technology. A technological research station concerned with new product development was recommended for Winnipeg and an increased program of technological research was requested for both the large lakes and the smaller northern lakes.

I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries to look into this proposal and at a later date advise me as to what has been done about it. Another proposal is as follows:

> Assistance for the University of Manitoba to establish a fisherman education program to fill the need for education and extension work. Additional aid was recommended for technical and vocational training for fishermen in three appropriate communities in the province.

I should like to know also whether any action has been taken on this proposal. The next recommendation was:

> Immediate establishment of a Federal-Provincial technical group to examine capital requirements in the industry which requires increased investment.

The last proposal related to the establishment of a fish marketing board. I take it from the results of the conference that this would require legislation by both Provincial and Federal Governments. I should like to know, however, whether any action has been taken on this proposal, and if so at what stage it is.

Before I conclude I should like to refer to one other item which relates to fishing, and that is the shipbuilding subsidy for fishing vessels which is available to fishermen in the Atlantic Provinces. I have no quarrel with this subsidy. I think it is very good; but if these fishermen are entitled to this type of assistance I believe the inland fishermen who fish on Lake Winnipeg and Lake Winnipegosis should be given the same consideration. This is a subsidy which is provided for boats of 35 feet or over in length. I believe it should apply to fishermen in Manitoba and elsewhere in Canada.

There is another matter I should like to mention under the heading of fishing, and that is the sales tax on equipment used by inland fishermen. I am referring to bombardiers, motor vehicles, power ice augers and diesel fuel used for generating electric power. These are items that are essential to the fishing industry, particularly in the area from which I come. An ice auger is used precisely for boring a hole in the ice. The fisherman puts his ice auger on the bombardier and drills a hole in the ice for fishing. It should not be difficult to understand that is its only purpose. I maintain there should be no sales tax on this item.

In conclusion, I hope the Government will give consideration to the suggestions I have made, and not only give consideration to them but will take action to implement some of them.

Mr. Carl Legault (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. members for their encouragement.

The fact that I came here after a by-election held last June shows that the electors of the riding of Nipissing have confidence in this government under the able leadership of the right hon. Prime Minister.

This by-election was held as a result of the death of our friend, Hon. Jack Garland, who was liked by all members of parliament and by all his electors. Everyone could approach him because he was so sympathetic. His decisions were as fair as Solomon's. He was unassuming, but a man of action who always found a favourable and constructive solution to the problems which faced him.

For us in Nipissing Jack Garland had become a living legend. We have lost a close friend and a great Canadian.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with the praise expressed to the movers of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) and the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien), who have shown by their speeches that they deserve the confidence of their constituents.

I also congratulate the hon. member for Westmorland (Mrs. Rideout) for the fine way in which she made her maiden speech, last Wednesday.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker, the district of Nipissing, which I have the honour to represent, has a population of approximately 70,000, with close to 38,000 voters, and possesses the whole gamut of requisites for the ideal Garden of Eden sought by everyone. It is composed of 130 townships ranging in size from 36 square miles to 100 square miles, and because of its geographical position could be considered the hub for all future developments in Canada.

It is in this area that you will find a very important factor, the height of land distributing fresh water north to James Bay, east down the Ottawa River and south by the French River toward the Great Lakes. You can appreciate my interest in promoting an extended study of the Grand Canal system prepared by Mr. Tom Kierans of Sudbury, which would affect favourably the development of northern Ontario. It is practically a foregone conclusion that this solution to the serious problem of low water levels on the Great Lakes will come about within a few years. The urgent importance and need for fresh water have reached a proportion unsurpassed by any previous problem undertaken by Governments.

The interim report of the Mines, Forests and Natural Water Resources Committee includes a suggestion that an immediate survey be made of this great Grand Canal system potential. If we put off the solution of this acute problem until later we can only bring hardship to millions of people and serious financial loss to a vast industrial empire. I cannot emphasize strongly enough the importance of immediate action on this project. It would certainly contribute immensely to the development and economic stability of a large territory. You can well forecast the access this would give to great resources and the subsequent addition of secondary industries. This in itself would complete the circuit of water navigation from the Great Lakes to the Ottawa River and to Hudson Bay. It is in North Bay that you will find the centre of distribution for all means of transportation and communication which, as I have mentioned before, will prove to be the main artery to all Canadian points.

Nipissing is very colourful because within its boundaries are found developments for all interests. The northern part, famous for its tourist resource, possesses numerous mineral deposits which have lately aroused the interest of many firms because of the large content of iron and copper. We can boast of a granite quarry having a product of quality unsurpassed in North America. The operators of this development have started to produce curling stones, and it is good at this time to mention that they are better than those imported, and that they are the only manufacturers of this kind in North America.

You will find agricultural and dairy farming in the western and southeastern part of the riding. There are numerous lumber operations and sawmills which play a great part in the economy of the region. We have a manufacturer of explosives in DuPont of Canada Limited; manufacturers of wood by-products in the Abitibi Power and Paper Company Limited, Johns-Manville Company, Weyer-Houser Company Limited. Many sawmills are operated and their products exported to various parts of the world. The potential of the tourist trade will be developed in coming years to an extent undreamed of in the past. The numerous scenic lakes are slowly being discovered by thirsty vacation seekers. The visitors to the eastern end of the riding will find indescribable appreciation of the grandiose, majestic splendours surrounding Mattawa.

Widdifield Township at the moment is undergoing growing pains but is coping with the situation very well with the installation of the Bomarc base and the complex Sage installation which is the nerve centre for the air defence of all North America. You can well understand that because of its position, Nipissing is soon to experience an unheard of expansion.

When I say my riding is colourful it is because of the wonderful and varied ethnic groups of people who live in it and give it an atmosphere of warmth and friendliness never forgotten by all who visit us. It is composed of people of numerous racial origins such as Indians, Anglo-Saxons, French Italians, Germans, Greek, Chinese, Ukrainians, Poles and many others. It would be well to realize that this is a proving ground of bilingualism and biculturalism. In this great district you will find all commodities and services at your disposition. The opportunities are unlimited and the growth is being accomplished step by step in a very intelligent way.

I was very proud and privileged to have been nominated and elected to represent Nipissing in support of the present administration guided by our Prime Minister, a great man at the right time for the right job, who has steered the country during its most difficult years, the man knowing the secret of how to compromise in order to satisfy everyone but, as you have all realized, always achieving a definite goal that had been set. A great quality which he possesses is to delegate responsibilities to well chosen experts in their field. This Government has undertaken constructive measures well balanced to the true economic potentiality of this country and its citizens. This Government has taken positive action to bring about a more unified Canada. There has been a lot of criticism, but we all must accept the fact that the decisions taken were definite, constructive measures for this purpose.

A distinctive flag, a controversial issue for many years, unifies and identifies our great country and its people. The B and B Commission was the only practical movement made in order to study and suggest the proper solution to a problem which faces us, but which was too often brushed aside for fear of facing reality. It is bringing facts to the attention of everyone, which we have to accept and to which concrete, logical solutions will be brought about for a more unified country.

The Pension Plan passed at the last session is a social measure which in itself helps to cement this unity. We have all experienced numerous pieces of legislation which make our country the best democratic place to live in. All this has been under the powerful leadership of our right hon. Prime Minister. Evidence is in the united and complete support and great admiration for him from all members of the Liberal Party, and from many others. This is being accomplished under adverse conditions and the difficulty of fighting off distorted interpretations of various reports detrimental to favourable solutions, coupled with the uneasiness and impractical position of a minority Government. It is the first time in Canadian history that a minority Government has been able to survive for more than a few months and yet accomplish so much.

The Government is sometimes accused of being accident-prone, by innuendo, but certainly not of being a Government of do nothing and be nothing. All Canadians appreciate and support social measures which have as their purpose to give security to needy and elderly people, but we must beware of extremists who would bring about socialism. We must leave the citizens of this country free, so that by their incentive, desire for improvement and reward, all shall obtain a better standard of living. The new legislation in the Throne Speech will do much for all the people of Canada.

I would like to bring to your attention the difficult preparation of the comprehensive medicare plan which must bring satisfaction to everyone. We do want to obtain the required protection and attention for needy and elderly people, but still respect the liberty of action, choice and decision of all parties affected by this legislation. The policies and ideals of this Government respecting proper administration call for co-ordination and recognition of the rights of various jurisdictions.

The federal-provincial co-operative way of administering such a vast country is the only logical action to take. It is to be regretted that we as a people have somewhat failed to keep pace mentally with the accelerated technical developments which have taken place. We have to realize such facts as that within the next few years, two hours and fifteen minutes is all that will be required to cross the Atlantic. Immediate transcription is obtained of all activities throughout the world, yet we seem to be immunized against the miseries that exist in most parts of this world. Water always finds a way to adjust to its own level. Racial, economical and social problems throughout this world can within a few hours be our own, whether we like it or not.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the program undertaken for the educational, cultural, social and economic development of our Indians, as set forth during the last session, is one that, within the next 10 years, should bring out the great potential of that capable and very intelligent race.

We often show too much impatience for the solutions of problems concerning bilingualism and biculturalism. The steps taken have already brought about an obvious improvement, but it will take at least two generations before results really satisfactory for all Canadians can be achieved.

I think that the setting up of a company of young Canadians will fulfil two functions. One is the work and the good that those young citizens will do; the other is the education and the practical knowledge that they will get from those experiences.

The revision of the regulations concerning the administration of the Immigration Act will bring about an improvement to the situation that we know today.

A study to reform parliamentary procedure should be welcome by all hon. members. All social measures proposed will certainly, with the years, fill many gaps, simplify and cut the number of welfare pension plans in existence today. That will entail the rationalization of several measures which are now impracticable. It is with such an approach that Canada will improve and continue to be a country that is envied the world over.

A suggestion I should like to make to the house at this time would be to provide money to tourist camp operators as it is done at the present time in the case of farmers through farm credit.

[Text]

The area development program is very welcome, and will bring encouragement to temporarily depressed areas. This, Mr. Speaker, should prove to be a very aggressive and interesting session.

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to pay tribute to the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) and the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien) for the gracefulness and the efficiency with which they discharged their task in moving and seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

There are many subjects with which I would like to deal, but I will abstain and will merely mention them casually.

One could make a complete speech on the absence of the measures the government should take to stop the ever-increasing rise in the cost of living. At present the cost of living has reached an all-time high in the country, that is 137.3 per cent. In my opinion those who are responsible for this situation are the hon. members now sitting on the treasury benches. It is their responsibility to take the necessary steps so that the income of the average worker, of the factory worker is no longer taxed so heavily because of the excessive cost of living. A moment of thought is enough to notice that the cost of living has risen alarmingly by 2.7 per cent during a single year. This should be enough to urge all the people of good will to do something to correct this situation.

[Mr. Legault.]

Of course, there is the 11 per cent tax created by our hon. friends opposite which has surely contributed to a great extent to increase the cost of living. The numerous representations which we made to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) urging him to repeal this tax have been unsuccessful so far.

Once again, appealing to his generosity, I ask him to remove this 11 per cent tax which is surely responsible to a great extent for this increase in the cost of living.

I could say a great deal also about the means to check unemployment. We had been promised full employment during the last two election campaigns, and I am sorry to tell the house that my province still has the largest group of unemployed in Canada. I understand that unemployed in the province of Quebec represent 39 per cent of all unemployed in Canada. However, this did not seem to upset too much the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen) to whom we have asked, and are asking again, what he intends to do in order to provide some assistance, especially to the unemployed of the province of Quebec and of the Maritime provinces. To each of our questions, he always gave the same answer: You will get a reply to your questions in due course. We have been hearing that for two years and the speech from the throne does not contain any measure that will increase the number of jobs in Canada.

I would also like to point out that thanks to the opposition's pressures and suggestions, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) finally agreed to meet our requests to a limited extent. For more than two years, we have been urging the Liberal government, more particularly the Minister of Agriculture, to set up a price of approximately $3.50 per hundredweight for manufactured milk. Well, some time ago, the Minister of Agriculture announced to the house a dairy policy based on the one his predecessor had set up a few years previously.

However, as he himself acknowledged, he took that decision only after having caused the farmers to lose about $11 million that they would have got if the dairy policy put forward while we were in office had been maintained. No wonder farmers feel insecure. In fact, all of them are peeved with the Minister of Agriculture at present.

Mr. Speaker, my next remarks will concern mainly the Canadian textile industry, and they are made in the best interests of my constituents.

Of all our industries, that of textile is one of the oldest ones in this country. Throughout the years, it has provided stable and profitable employment. It is imperative to give that industry, which is one of our basic industries, all the protection it needs. It is found mostly in small and medium sized cities where it enables most of the inhabitants to earn a living.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, if one keeps in mind the fact that last year the synthetic textile industry gave work to about 20,600 workers, one realizes its importance. Those 20,600 workers are integrated into the parish and community life of our cities. They are citizens who pay taxes. We ought to give them the protection to which they are entitled.

In 1964, in the field of synthetic textile, this industry spent about $7.7 million for new buildings, while almost $40 million was spent on machinery. This means that this industry deserves the attention of the government and of the members of this house.

There is a danger that this industry may be seriously affected in the coming months, unless beneficial and drastic measures are taken immediately.

When one remembers that in 1950, the Canadian industry supplied 77 per cent of the local market, while it supplied only 60 per cent in 1963, one realizes that foreign manufacturers are progressively taking over our domestic market, year after year, to the great detriment of the Canadian worker.

In 1964, imports from Japan amounted to $44.7 million, that is 37.9 per cent more than in 1963.

When the Japanese industry started to compete with the Canadian textile industry immediately after the war, its products left a lot to be desired and they were quite inferior in quality to the products made in Canada. But today, conditions have changed and if the Japanese products are not of a superior quality they are at least equal in quality to the products made in Canada.

As a result of the improvement of its machinery, the Japanese textile industry has now exceeded the needs of the Japanese market. In fact, according to the information provided by a Canadian businessman, the Japanese synthetic textile industry is determined to invade at all costs the Canadian market.

According to statistics I have obtained from various sources, we have practically succeeded, up to now, in keeping in check imports from the United States. On the other hand, imports from Japan increased from 6.1 per cent in 1959 to 22.6 per cent in 1964. And, according to the information I have obtained from that same Canadian industrialist, imports from Japan during the first few months of this year well exceeded those of 1964. There is therefore reason for alarm, and it is the government's responsibility to take whatever action is necessary to restrain such imports which can only be detrimental to our workers.

Last week, I met the president of a synthetic textiles company and as I remarked that his staff appeared to be quite busy, he said: Yes, we are quite busy this year, but unless some action is taken I fear we may not be so busy next year, for if Japanese imports continue to invade our market at this rate, several of our employees will be forced, I am sorry to say, to find employment elsewhere.

Mr. Speaker, the textile industry is, as everybody knows, of prime importance to the riding I represent. The remarks of the president of that company made me think of the employees of Consolidated Textile Limited, operating a very important spinning-mill in my constituency, as well as those of the Yamaska Shirt Company who will also be affected if shirts, blouses, trousers and shorts continue to be imported at the rate they are now.

Last year, for instance, the management of Consolidated Textile Limited spent a great deal of money on machinery improvement, and it would be most unfortunate if, because of this government's inaction, many of my compatriots were obliged, next year, to find some other kind of employment while they have devoted so many years to this particular work.

Mr. Speaker, let us keep in mind that, like Cornwall, St. Hyacinthe has the best employees in the Canadian textile industry.

I have here a brief submitted to the tariff board by the Canadian Textile Institute. A look at the tables it contains will give an idea of the real danger which the Canadian textile industry is facing at the present time.

At this stage I might be allowed to quote a few figures. A table entitled:

Imports of synthetic textiles from Japan (in thousand square yards) shows that Japanese imports increased from 119 square yards or .3 per cent of the Canadian market in 1954 to 14,853 square yards or 20.2 per cent in 1963. This situation would not be too alarming if our local market could be expanded only up to a certain point.

The natural increase in our population can absorb a greater production of synthetic textiles, but our industry already produces a great deal as a result of an improved labour force and modernized machinery.

• (2:30 p.m.)

What is alarming is that, while imports amounted to .3 per cent in 1954, they are now 20.2 per cent and this is in one area only.

For instance, imports of Japanese rayon spun textiles increased from 17,000 square yards to 85,000,000 square yards in 1963, which means that such imports now supply 15.7 per cent of the Canadian market, as compared to 4.6 per cent in 1959.

Another table shows that in 1959 imports of Japanese textiles (rayon spun goods) totalled 102,000 square yards, while in 1963, Japanese manufacturers exported to Canada 7,565,000 square yards. Therefore, imports increased from 1.9 per cent in 1959 to 10.6 per cent in 1963.

Mr. Speaker, to prove beyond the shadow of a doubt that the Japanese industry, especially in the field of synthetic textiles, is constantly invading our home market, I feel it is my duty to raise my voice and remind the government of its obligations. I am not against Canada trading with other countries, far from it. To a certain extent, we have to depend on foreign markets for our own products, but it seems to me we would behave like an ostrich if we were to bury our heads in the sand to avoid seeing the danger that is threatening our workers at the present time.

It is all very well, as I said, to have trade relations with foreign countries, but our first obligation is to our fellow Canadians. It was in order to remind the Minister of this thing that I decided today to speak for a few minutes on this subject.

My hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Forest) recognized last week the importance of this textile industry for his constituency. I associate myself with him and with my hon. friend from Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Marcoux), in requesting the government to give immediate attention to this problem. Let us not wait until it is too late; let us take right now the necessary steps.

During a discussion with the president of one of the most important textile manufacturing companies in the province, I realized there is presently great apprehension and people stand in fear of the future in the event steps are not taken immediately to correct this situation.

I trust that other members, representing constituencies where there are textile industries, will support my representations and will ask that voluntary quotas be applied on all imports from Japan.

I reviewed some articles which appeared in the Japanese press, and I found out that for the year 1964 only, compared with 1963, Japanese production of nylon goods increased 48.8 per cent, of polyester goods 37.5 per cent, and of acrylic textile goods, 71.1 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, if we consider, as I was saying a few minutes ago, that the production of the Japanese industry now exceeds the needs of the Japanese market and that they are determined to drop goods on the Canadian market, we must conclude that we have to protect ourselves against this danger.

I wish to say that I endorse the proposal made by CATMA in its brief to the department a few weeks ago. To that end, Japanese exports should be subject to quotas of not more than two million square yards for synthetic fabric, four million square yards for rayon thread and not more than six million square yards for rayon fabric.

Unless we take the necessary steps to establish such quotas, our textile industry and especially that of synthetic textiles, will end up in the doldrums and possibly vanish before too many years.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding, I call upon hon. members to co-operate so that Canadian workers will not have to suffer from the encouragement given imports of products manufactured by others than Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to devote the major portion of my remarks on this occasion to the paragraph in the Speech from the Throne which refers to the need to improve the procedures of Parliament.

Before I do so I should like to take just a moment or two to make reference to some other items in the Speech from the Throne that hold particular interest for me and for all of us in the New Democratic Party. I refer to those measures which suggest that further steps are to be taken in the field of social welfare and that there is to be launched a war on poverty. We heartily welcome these words, and we earnestly hope that during the course of this session they will be translated into actual statutes. It is our fear that in many instances only words have been given to us, but we shall press for action.

• (2:40 p.m.)

It is my notion from studying the Speech from the Throne that perhaps the item that is closest to being ready to present to us is what is referred to as the Canada Assistance Plan. We do not have much detail about this piece of legislation yet, but I gather it is to be a form of legislation that will in time take the place of the Old Age Assistance Act, the Blind Persons Act, the Disabled Persons Act and unemployment assistance, and that it will provide certain other benefits as well. We believe it is a good move to replace these categorical programs with an over-all program based on need rather than on the means that a person may have. We earnestly hope this session will not be prorogued until the Canada Assistance Plan is on our statute books.

It has been said in editorials in a number of newspapers since the Speech from the Throne was delivered that the Government would appear to have been raiding the cupboard of the New Democratic Party. This is a form of raiding that we do not mind.

Mr. Winkler: The new socialists.

Mr. Knowles: We only hope that when the Government takes things out of our cupboard it will really put them on the statute books and not just hide them away somewhere. May I remind the Government and may I remind the writers of newspaper editorials that there are still a good many items in our cupboard. Let me name two or three of them. It is still our belief that the pension legislation that we developed in the last session, good as it is, would be a lot better if the flat rate benefit under old age security was raised to $100 a month.

Mr. Winkler: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: We suggest that when the Government is raiding our cupboard it take that one and put it on the statute books, and that it make the full pension available at age 65 right away.

We also feel, despite the explanations given by the Prime Minister, that the Government is still moving too slowly with respect to medicare. We want to see not just federal-provincial conferences, not just talk; we want to see action in this important field. When there is talk about a war on poverty, let it be remembered we will not be rid of poverty until we are rid of all the slums in this country, until our people are well housed whether they live in the cities or in the rural areas. We will not be free of poverty until even in a country where education is a provincial matter we have found a way to make our nation's resources available so that for all our people education can be brought to a much higher level than is the case at the present time.

There is one other immediate item in our New Democratic Party cupboard which we wish the Government would take and put on the statute books. I refer to the need to provide for the maintenance of income when the breadwinner is off work because of illness. This is one of the most serious gaps in our social legislation. We moved a bit in that direction a few years ago when we provided that if a person has collected one benefit under unemployment insurance and then becomes ill he may continue to receive his benefits. But it is still the case that if a person is out of work basically because of illness there is no benefit for him. This, as I say, is a most glaring gap in the social legislation of this country, and we urge the Government to act on this matter at an early date.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, there are still many items in our cupboard which we hope the Government will take and act upon at this session, and I urge in particular that this session not be prorogued until we have at least got the Canada Assistance Plan on the statute books.

I said I wanted to talk mainly about the procedures of Parliament. There is a paragraph in the Speech from the Throne the opening sentence of which reads as follows:

> My ministers believe that it is imperative to reform the procedures of the House of Commons in order that it may accomplish the large volume of work required to meet the needs of the Canadian people in modern times.

We may find ourselves in some disagreement with the Government, Mr. Speaker, when it comes to ways and means of implementing that sentiment, but we could not agree with it more than we do. When it comes to improving the procedures of Parliament there are, of course, many items to be studied. There are many rules that need to be modernized, and even after we have looked at all the rules and made them the best they can be made, that is not everything. There is still room for reforming ourselves and for introducing those measures of self-discipline that will enable us to make this Parliament the place the people of Canada believe it is, the place they think it ought to be.

But I want to say that in terms of procedure, in terms of our rules, I think the most important problem that faces us—and it is alluded to in the sentence in the Speech from the Throne which I just read—is the problem of time. This is an age in which there have been all kinds of explosions that we hear about and read about. In Parliament in recent years we have had an explosion in the amount of business with which we have to deal, and unless we find some way to apportion, to allocate, to plan the use of our Parliamentary year we are going to find ourselves failing as a Parliament to serve the needs of the Canadian people.

Years ago when Parliament first met the year had 12 months and Parliament needed only a few of them to get the business done. Even this Government has not found it possible to provide more than 12 months in the year, and the last Government was not able to do so either. But we now seem to have enough business every year to take 15 or 20 months, and I suggest that poses a very direct problem and that we have to do something about planning and allocating the use of our time.

Lest it be thought that those of us who make statements like this are just generalizing, may I put one or two bits of statistics on the record. It is one of my hobbies not to read detective stories but to read Parliamentary documents. I hear some of my colleagues questioning my choice of reading matter but at any rate, Mr. Speaker, I find it a very interesting hobby. I find that back in the first two or three decades of the Parliament of Canada the sessions lasted two, two and a half or three months. Indeed there was not a single session prior to the turn of the century that reached a duration of four months. Even in World War I, when Canada grew up and became a nation amongst the nations of the world and dealt with terrific problems, the sessions lasted from four to four and a half months and no longer.

There was one session prior to World War I, the session of 1912-13, which is still referred to by oldtimers. I hope Senator Grattan O'Leary will not mind if I include him in that category because he has referred to it as a session that lasted almost as long as the last session of this House. But even that session, which had the naval aid bill to deal with, which had the introduction of closure and the terrific battle it provoked, lasted from start to finish only six and a half months, and during that period of six and a half months there were two recesses.

Some of us in this chamber today were here during the sessions of World War II. We recall that during World War II Parliament was kept in session on a year round basis; from start to finish was a full calendar year. However, the actual number of weeks that we were in session was such that the sessions did not extend over six or six and a half months.

The facts are clear, Mr. Speaker. Down to the end of World War II, time was not a problem. The rules, I suggest, were made back in the days 100 or 200 years ago when time was not an issue, so arrangements were not necessary to plan the use of time. After all, if the nation's business at the federal level could be done in two and a half or three months, it was an avocation for those who came here, it was a prestigious position to be a Member, and the going was fairly easy. There needed to be no time limit on speeches; there needed to be no set adjournment time. Members just got things done in their own sweet way.

However, Mr. Speaker, all that has now changed. Today if we are going to deal with the tremendous amount of business that faces us we have to cope with the problem of time. In those early days Parliament dealt with such things as postal services, customs, railways and canals, but not many more things. Today everything that affects our people from the cradle to the grave, at home and abroad or in outer space, is the concern of Parliament. At each and every session the new events of the complicated life of the twentieth century impinge upon our jobs as Members of Parliament. It is this explosion in the amount of business that we have to do, the mounting accumulation of work that is ours, that faces us with the necessity of taking a look at the way we use our time.

There are some who would cut the Gordian knot by simply imposing rigid time limits and settling it in that way. I think it has to be faced that unless as a Parliament, unless as Members in all parties, we think about this and come to some kind of reasonable agreement, one of these days some Government with a majority is going to do that and do damage to Parliament in the process.

Those who would do it in that way, who would fix rigid time limits for everything, seem to take the position that the only job we have is to reach decisions, to vote, to pass the laws that are placed before us.

However, I suggest that our job in Parliament is twofold. It is, on the one hand, the making of decisions, the voting; but it is also, to put it plainly, to talk. The very word Parliament describes this institution as what it is and implies that the whole democratic process involves the taking of decisions after there has been a full and free discussion. Those are our two jobs; to talk, to discuss, to review matters thoroughly on the one hand, and to take votes, to reach decisions, on the other. The whole problem, the whole history of Parliamentary procedure, has been an attempt to find a balance between these two roles. Without free speech, without a guarantee that nothing will be done in undue haste, in fact without the right to look at a proposition in general and in detail, to do this a second and a third time, it would not be Parliament.

It is equally true that if the rules permit an endless expression of views to the point of preventing decisions from being taken, if so much time is spent on one or two matters that others do not get reached, then that too is not Parliament. Our undoubted responsibility is to protect the right of free speech in Parliament, but it is also our responsibility so to arrange our business, which is the public's business, that we deal with all of it each year.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when anyone talks about planning the Parliamentary year, about allocating time for debates, about making arrangements so that we move from one subject to another and get things done, there are those who say this is a denial of free speech. There are those who shout that awful word "closure". I want to make it clear, Mr. Speaker, that no one in this House dislikes the closure rule that we now have on our books more than I do. I think it was conceived in sin and shapen in iniquity. It was brought in in the middle of a contentious debate and then applied to the debate that was already in process. Most of the times when it is applied this is done because the rules as they exist at the start of the debate fail to fit the situation. I do not believe the closure rule we have now works any better than would be the case if the referee in a football game tried to change the rules in the middle of the third quarter.

As one who is against closure—indeed I voted against its use during the flag debate in the last session for the reasons I have just given, and for the reason that I think every time we use the present closure rule we put off the day when we will find a better way of coping with the problem of time—the point I want to make is this, that I think the deadliest form of closure we have in this Parliament is not the closure rule; is not the rule that says this Throne Speech debate shall last only eight days, the budget debate six days; is not the rule that prohibits Members from speaking more than a certain number of minutes. I think the deadliest form of closure is the practice of carrying some debates over so many days, so many weeks or so many months that we never get to the other important issues with which Parliament should be dealing.

I have criticized the Liberals over the years for their dilatory manner in bringing in the things they promised in 1919. I am still at it, still trying to get them to get along. However, even though a great deal of the fault lies in the fact that that is the Liberal way, it is true also that when you spend week after week on a flag debate, when you spend week after week on a pension plan that has been thoroughly gone into in a committee, you do not leave time to get at medicare, you do not leave time to get at the problems of Federal-Provincial relations and all the other tremendous problems now facing the people of Canada which should receive the attention of this Parliament. You cannot go on having a 14-month session every 12 months. What is serious about this is that in these 14-month sessions you have to spend so much time on a few subjects you do not get at the others. So, Mr. Speaker, as an opponent of closure—I mean the closure rule that is now on the books—I am equally opposed to the way in which Parliament has been spending so much time on some subjects that it has foreclosed the possibility of getting at some of the serious problems that face us in this House of Commons.

I say therefore that we should stop trying to deal with this question by using the word "closure", by saying it is a denial of free speech to plan our debates. It is no more a denial of free speech to say a certain debate shall last only a certain length of time than it is for you to say to me, Mr. Speaker, that I have only 30 minutes in this debate. If I try to go over 30 minutes, you will stop me. Is that closure against me? No; you are trying to protect the rights of other Members to speak as well. When we get to the point of planning important debates and reaching decisions after a time limit that has been agreed to, we will not be imposing closure, we will be protecting Parliament's right to get at other matters as well.

We had a suggestion today in a question by the hon. Member for Queens to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys of how the problems with which we have to deal in Parliament may multiply manyfold. We have problems now in dealing with Federal-Provincial relations, with social welfare, international relations, trade, and carrying on the war on poverty at home and abroad. If we have made contact with a civilization out in outer space, then we may need another secretary of state for external affairs more diplomatic than the one we have now. Our problems will multiply tremendously. When are we going to get time to deal with these problems if we do not plan and organize the use of the time we have? The hon. Member for Peace River suggests that there may need to be an ambassador to outer space.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Douglas: We have got a list ready.

Mr. Knowles: Apparently there are more people being nominated for these posts than are willing to volunteer for them.

I would like to make the point that if we are going to go in for planning our Parliamentary year, for allocating the time that we use, we have to arrive at a means of doing it by agreement. This is where I am still asking questions about the Government's proposal. I read the opening sentence in the paragraph about this matter in the Speech from the Throne, and I agree with it 100 per cent. But the rest of that paragraph tells us the Government is going to bring proposals before Parliament in the field of procedure.

It is pretty hard to be critical of the Government at this point for doing this, because of the fact that we have moved pretty slowly in the matter of reforming the rules of the House; but we did make some progress last session, as a matter of fact a fair amount of progress. I do urge very strongly upon the Government, however, that it do not effect rule changes by having them brought in by the Government and passed directly on the basis of such majority as it can command. I know the Government will say it is in a minority position, but it does seem to find support somewhere, sometimes by absenteeism, and it does seem to be able to put its will across. I suggest that rule changes imposed in that way will not work as well as rule changes arrived at by agreement among all parties in the House, and I suggest that if the Government has some proposals to lay before us it should keep this in mind.

I suggest there are some things that were agreed upon by the Special Committee on Procedure and Organization in the last session which did not get through the house, but which had the support of all the parties represented on that Committee, and the Government would be justified in finding a way to bring those measures before Parliament and give it a chance to vote on them one way or the other.

But if the Government has other proposals, for example something in the field of allocation of time, a rule that a subcommittee of mine worked out in the last session, its best course would be to present those proposals to the House and then have the House refer them to an all-party committee. It may take a little longer and I would not blame the Prime Minister for feeling a little impatient at the time it would take, but an agreement arrived at in that way will certainly work much better than something that bears the mark of having been imposed by the government of the day.

In entering this word of caution I am simply asking the Government to see to it that changing the rules is a job done by Parliament, not by the Government. Members of the Government found last session that in getting a flag through the House it became easier to do it when it was a parliamentary choice instead of a Government choice, and the same thing should apply to procedure. But even though I am entering this note of caution I am also urging the Government to find a way to get the House working on this matter.

We cannot go on year after year doing nothing about this problem of planning and allocating the use of our time, and I think we should get at it very early in this session. A good deal has been said about the many measures mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. Members of the House and newspapers are saying we will be here for another 14-month session, and we will be if we deal with all the measures contained in the Throne Speech as we ought to; but we are going to waste a lot of time if we do not cope with this main problem of time itself.

Therefore I urge the Prime Minister to bring whatever proposals the Government has in this field before the House. In so far as those proposals are ones that were already worked out last session by the Special Committee, I suggest it would be appropriate to ask the House to vote on them more or less right away. With respect to any other proposals I suggest they be referred immediately to another Special Committee on Procedure and Organization. Further, I suggest that Committee should work even harder than the Committee of last session, and having been a member of that last Committee I can say it worked very hard.

We should go into this matter with the clearcut realization that the people of Canada expect us to act on this important problem at this session of Parliament. To me, Mr. Speaker, a great deal is at stake, so far as democracy is concerned, in the image that Parliament has in the eyes of our people. We are being criticized, and I do not think there is anything wrong about the criticism we are subjected to in the press, over the radio and television. In fact, I think it is good for us. It would be tragic if the Canadian people were not paying any attention to us. It is good that they are discussing Parliament and, if you test Parliament by the amount of discussion about it, then this one stands up pretty well because we are certainly getting a lot of discussion. However, it is not good enough for us to bristle because we are being criticized. It not good enough for us to defend ourselves against the criticism. Our main response to it should be an attempt to improve things in Parliament itself.

As I have said, there are many rules, many details that can be looked at, and we must get at them. I have already said there is room for reforming ourselves, for improving our own self-discipline, but I think the most important problem is the use that we make of the Parliamentary year. The year still has only 12 months and I think it would be useful if some portion of those 12 months could be spent by Members in their constituencies. However, the main problem we have to cope with is finding how to allocate and use our time. I urge that it be on a planned basis. I urge it be on a basis of agreement. I think it can be worked out.

They have rules that cover this in other jurisdictions. We have worked out some things here, and I think if we feel the importance of this and have a bit of leadership from the Government on it, while at the same time it is recognized that it is a parliamentary task, then we can do something about it.

I do not think the last rule of procedure will ever be written. Procedure in a free parliament is in fact living and dynamic. We will have to make other changes in the future to meet other needs that arise, but at this point in our history I believe what we need most are rules that will provide for agreement in advance on the allocation of time, so that in a common sense way we can get a year's business done inside a year, preferably with some time to spare so that Members can mingle a bit more with their constituents.

I have already made it clear that I do not propose a rigid time limit on everything. I do not propose rules that can be invoked without agreement among the various parties in the House. One must preserve the right to oppose to the ultimate when the Opposition feels that the Government is dead wrong, as the Liberals felt about the naval aid bill in 1913, and as most of us in the opposition felt about the pipe line bill in 1956. You do not have to worry about Parliament when extreme measures are introduced. Parliament will always rise in its own defence when the times demand it. Our problem is with the great and growing mass of routine business, and I believe if we are to achieve a balance between full discussion and getting things done, between latitude in debate and getting decisions made, we will have to plan our discussion time. This way, in my view, lies real freedom, freedom to discuss not just one issue but all the issues that present themselves to us, freedom not only to discuss but freedom to vote and to make decisions. This way, in my view, Parliament will survive.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

STATUS OF GOVERNMENT ORDER RESPECTING PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE COMMISSION

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. Member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Stewart) allow me to make a ruling before he speaks? The matter was raised this morning, and this being the last day before the recess, with the consent of the House I would like to finish this matter now, if I could. Do I have the consent of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh) rose this morning on a point of order when there was really nothing before the House. After listening to his long argument I stated I would examine the matter and try to bring in a just decision this afternoon. I have since that time read the transcript and it appears to me that his objection is to item No. 9 which appears on today's Order Paper and which reads as follows:

> That the recommendations contained in the report of the Prairie Farm Assistance Administration Commission of Enquiry, tabled on July 29, 1964, including the following two questions:
> 1. Whether the permanent staff of the P.F.A.A. should be brought under the Civil Service Commission, and
> 2. Whether there should be other changes in the operation of the P.F.A.A.,
> be referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization for such recommendations as it deems advisable.

• (3:10 p.m.)

I do not see that I have to go beyond the text of the resolution, which simply asks the Committee on Agriculture and Colonization, following the report of a Commission of Inquiry, to study that report including two questions, and make such recommendations as it deemed advisable. This is all, I respectfully submit, that is before the Chair, and on the face of it the resolution appears to be perfectly in order.

The hon. Member, however, suggests that I should go behind the resolution and he argues that the Government Order is a nullity and should be struck off the Order Paper. He also said that the Commission is not a judicial inquiry but that it is a Crown court without any appeal.

Points of order, according to citation 70 of Beauchesne are:

> —questions raised with the view of calling attention to any departure from the Standing Orders of the customary modes of proceeding in debate, or in the conduct of legislative business—

I can see here no departure from the Standing Orders but rather a request that the Speaker decide what is purely a question of law and entirely outside his jurisdiction in relation to the powers of a commission of inquiry.

Citation 71(5) of Beauchesne states explicitly that:

> The Speaker will not give a decision upon a constitutional question nor decide a question of law, though the same may be raised on a point of order or privilege.

This is exactly what happened. The hon. Member rose on a point of order and submitted to me what I consider to be a question of law, that is, whether the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry are in excess of the powers and authorities granted to the Commissioner by the Governor in Council.

[Mr. Speaker.]

He wants me to declare those recommendations to be a breach of the Order in Council tabled in the House of Commons and affixed to the report. He wants me further to declare those recommendations are null and void and of no force and effect.

If I were to decide this matter, I certainly would be going beyond the jurisdiction granted me by law and by the Standing Orders of this House. I would refer the House to an opinion of Mr. Deputy Speaker on October 25, 1963, with which I concur. In that case, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald) had argued that a Bill should not be considered, that it was out of order because it was ultra vires the Parliament of Canada. The Deputy Speaker ruled, as reported at page 4036 for October 25, 1963 that:

> —it should not be the responsibility of the Chair to rule whether a particular piece of legislation...is or is not within the competence of this House.

He then referred hon. Members to Standing Order 12 which limits and defines the duties and responsibilities of the Speaker, that is, to deciding on questions of order, not questions of law. The Deputy Speaker then quoted from page 825 of Beauchesne, third edition, which refers to a ruling of Hon. Lewis Wallbridge, Speaker, made on June 25, 1864, where he, the Speaker, stated:

> That according to the usages of the British Parliament he was not bound to decide on a question of law.

Following that decision, I would also like to refer to citation 71(5) of Beauchesne, fourth edition, at page 61:

> The Speaker will not give a decision upon a constitutional question nor decide a question of law, though the same may be raised on a point of order or privilege.

Now, I am of the opinion that it is not the duty of the Speaker to examine the powers of an outside Commission and to sit on appeal of the Commission's decision in its report to make certain recommendations. This is a question of argument touching on the very heart of the matter to be discussed in the Committee. It has no real connection with the motion itself, which is in order according to precedent, which may or may not be called like all other Government Orders.

For the above reasons, and in view of the citations to which I have referred, I am, as I have already stated, unable to agree with the point of order raised by the hon. Member, and I must rule that the hon. Member's proposition is not receivable in any case because it asks the Speaker to decide a question of law and not a question of order or of procedure.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, with regard to your decision I have three legal opinions as to what—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. Member is disputing the decision of the Chair he has certain procedures he can follow; but I would be quite surprised if he is. The hon. Member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Stewart).

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege may I say a few words with regard to your ruling?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member is out of order in attempting to raise these questions at the present time. The Chair is here to decide these matters. There are other ways of appealing decisions; but to enter into a dispute after the Chair has laboured —hopefully—to try to arrive at a proper decision is to enter into argument with the Chair, a procedure which is quite contrary to custom and to Standing Order.

Mr. McIntosh: With all deference to you, Mr. Speaker, I was not trying to enter into an argument, but I was surprised when you brought forward your opinion at this period of the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I had no idea you would give it at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Well, that is argument in an indirect fashion. In view of the fact that the House is closing at ten tonight, when would the hon. Member suggest that the Speaker bring in his opinion? It was agreed this morning that the Speaker would bring it in as soon as possible, and that has been done.

Mr. McIntosh: Then may I have the privilege of replying as soon as possible?

Mr. Speaker: There is no reply under our rules. The Speaker is not a lawyer in court; he is in fact the judge, and my decision has been rendered. If every Member were to dispute everything the Chair says we would have chaos in this House.

Mr. McIntosh: Then you leave me no alternative but to challenge your ruling. I appeal your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the decision of the Chair from which the hon. Member for Swift Current-Maple Creek has appealed to the House. All those in favour of sustaining the Speaker's decision will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, I think five Members rose; would you call a vote?

Mr. Speaker: This is not an easy day; I can say that with some feeling. However, in order to be scrupulously fair, those in favour of sustaining the decision of the Chair will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the Members.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cashin for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the Session.

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) was educated in my constituency. The hon. Member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien) had already displayed his reasoned approach to our nation's problems. It was no surprise therefore that, given their splendid topic, the speeches they delivered in the House commended themselves so highly to all Members. I wish to add my congratulations.

The Speech from the Throne is a rich document, but I want to concentrate this afternoon on two particular facets of the Speech. One of these concerns the Canada Assistance Plan and the other the plan for regional development. You will recall, Sir, that earlier this day the hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) for a report on the meeting that took place on April 8 and 9 between the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) and the welfare ministers for the Provinces. The Minister of National Health and Welfare could not remain this afternoon, but she has asked me to say some words on her behalf to discharge a responsibility in this regard.

The welfare ministers from all the ten provinces were present at this meeting, together with representatives from the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. Developments in the field of welfare during the past year were discussed thoroughly and cordially. The major discussion at the meeting was on the proposed Canada Assistance Plan announced in the Speech from the Throne and outlined by the Prime Minister last Tuesday. I am happy to be able to report, on behalf of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, that the plan was given general approval by the Provincial Ministers, who welcomed it as providing a basis for a more flexible approach to public welfare in Canada.

The plan in general conforms to the suggestions which had been made by the Provinces at previous conferences. It does not interfere with the right of the Provinces to continue the present assistance programs for the aged, the blind, and the disabled. Under the Canada Assistance Plan recipients will be granted assistance on the basis of their needs. The plan will extend Federal cost-sharing to needy mothers, to the health costs of recipients and to expenditures for improved administration of assistance programs and welfare services for recipients.

During the conference the Minister went into somewhat more detail than was possible earlier. First, she made it clear that Canada is prepared to match dollar for dollar the expenditures that the provinces now make in the field of mothers' allowances, that is, aid to mothers with dependant children. Second, the Minister explained that Canada is now prepared to share in the costs of health services provided by the Provinces to public assistance recipients. Under this proposal provision is made for the inclusion of the costs of medical, nursing, dental and optical care and drugs. The extent that such services cover will be for the Provinces themselves to decide, and it will be up to them to make the types of arrangements for the provision of health services that they consider most suitable in their particular case. In her discussions with the Welfare Ministers, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) also made very clear, as did the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) himself last Tuesday, that the health proposal is an interim measure which will carry on only until the medicare program comes into operation, which the Minister hopes will be very soon.

Another important feature of the plan which was warmly received by the Provincial Ministers of Welfare was the one calling for a sharing in new expenditures for the expansion of staff and services. This proposal recognizes the need for increased and better trained public assistance staffs to make possible a rehabilitative approach through lowering case loads, through adjustment of the requirements of assistance recipients, and through referral to training, employment, medical, and other resources. It is anticipated many of those now receiving assistance can attain independence. Sir, I should hope that the aspect of the Speech from the Throne which was discussed at this meeting, which took place last Thursday and Friday, is one to which the House will be able to turn rapidly, once we have completed the debate on the Budget.

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. Member permit a question? Does he know whether any papers were presented by the Federal Government to that conference, copies of which could be tabled in the House or made available to us in some way?

Mr. Stewart: I will inquire about this, Mr. Speaker, to ascertain if such papers as were used at the conference could be presented. This might cause some difficulty, as you would realize I am sure, because it may be that the Provinces would not wish a portion of the documentation to be revealed when other parts were not.

I think perhaps I will go on with the other aspect of the Speech from the Throne with which I wanted to deal this afternoon. The other aspect of the Speech from the Throne to which I wish to direct attention this afternoon concerns the plans for regional development. As you perhaps remember, Sir, there has been some disputation in this House recently about to whom Nova Scotians should give thanks for certain economic improvements in their Province. This dispute was predictable because both Governments, the Government of Canada and the Government of Nova Scotia, have been active, and it is far from easy to sort out the credits.

The truth—no matter to whom the praise or blame as the case may be should go—is that unemployment in Nova Scotia is much too high. The release made on March 17, 1965 on the condition of the labour force shows that while on February 20, 1965, approximately 20,000 more persons were employed in the Atlantic region than one year earlier, the unemployment rate was 13 per cent. In every other region of Canada, there had been a decline in the unemployment rate during that period, but in the Atlantic region it had gone up from 12.7 per cent in February, 1964, to 13 per cent in February, 1965. It is encouraging to learn from the Speech from the Throne that this Government is keenly aware of this regional problem and is devising measures to cope with it.

In 1956, when the Bill that eventually was to become the Area Redevelopment Act was before the Senate of the United States, a sharp disagreement became evident between the views of two very distinguished Senators who participated in the debate. One was Senator Goldwater and the other was Senator John F. Kennedy. Actually there was an element of truth in what both said. Speaking on July 25, 1956, Mr. Goldwater said:

> The whole history of this country's development refutes the contention of those who would invoke extreme federal remedies in such situations. In the West, for instance, we have experienced the boom development of certain areas, only to realize, at some later date when the economic sources were dissipated, the collapse of whole communities which exist today only as ghost towns. During such transitions, our people did not seek governmental assistance for the artificial stimulation of areas whose economic wells had run dry. They accepted the tribulations of their ventures with stout hearts and strong backs, just as in the beginning they accepted their triumphs.

It is clear that Senator Goldwater was thinking almost exclusively about primary industries based on some scarce natural resource. This being recognized, we must concede that there is some validity in what he said. If the industries that maintain a population are based on gold, timber, oil or some similar resource, and if these are exhausted and no other economic base is introduced, there is no point in trying to maintain new generations in that place.

Senator Kennedy, speaking earlier that same day, contended that:

> —the responsibility of the federal government to aid such areas is commonly acknowledged. This responsibility is in the interest of the areas which are subject to chronic unemployment and underemployment, and coincides also with the interests of the nation. The fact is that these less fortunate areas exert a general drag upon the economy and the federal government, in order to assure full prosperity for the nation as a whole, should do all it can to eliminate pockets of unemployment and underemployment.

It is quite clear that Senator Kennedy was thinking of people engaged in secondary and tertiary industries. There are limits beyond which a country such as Canada should not go in efforts to help less fortunate areas, because to go beyond those limits would be to endanger the nation's position in the international market. On the other hand, as Senator Kennedy was insisting, such areas, if permitted to exist for long, exact their price. They do constitute a drag on regional prosperity and on the national economy as well. I think we can say safely that if either Senator Goldwater's position or Senator Kennedy's position was pushed in practice to its extreme, the result would be very costly. The Goldwater extreme would promote complete population mobility; that is, it would allow economic causes freely to move the population to the favoured national sites of secondary and tertiary industry. The extreme Kennedy position is to accept population stagnation, that is, to try to bring employment to all the people wherever they live.

Now, these distinctions are relevant to the identification of the areas to which measures for regional development are to apply. The general conclusion to which we are driven by them is that if special measures for regional economic development are to be effective, unless we are dealing with primary industries based on a local resource, the smaller the areas selected the more expensive the measures that will be effective. The area development program, which now provides tax incentives taking the form of a three-year income tax exemption and accelerated write-offs of the capital costs of both machinery and equipment and new buildings acquired by new manufacturing and processing enterprises has been helpful in Nova Scotia, for example, in attracting new industries to places like Canso, Abercrombie, Stellarton, and Point Edward. The areas eligible for these incentives have been those national employment service areas wherein there has been relatively high unemployment. The Speech from the Throne reveals that the Government is now proposing to expand its program to include other areas where incomes are low.

This is encouraging. We know that the National Employment Service areas are only administrative areas. As labour market areas they can be regarded as sufficiently distinct to serve as the long-run theatres for economic development programs only if we forget that population mobility, not population stagnation, is essential to the reformation of the economy of the Atlantic region. A program of regional development directed at the Atlantic Provinces must deal, not with mere administrative units but with genuine economic regions.

It is desirable, of course, to employ statistical criteria in identifying the less fortunate areas. Without such criteria the Government will find itself involved in highly subjective judgments and would be subject to heavy local pressures. But it is also desirable to assure that the areas selected are justifiable in terms of their economic potential for either primary, resource-based industries or for secondary and tertiary industries. Otherwise, the measures applied will be either relatively ineffectual or extremely costly.

What I am proposing is that while statistical criteria should be used to ascertain the localities in which the population is plagued by high unemployment and low incomes, the special development measures should not be restricted to those localities, but should be applied to the general economic region in which such localities prevail. I am suggesting that the regional development policy ought to be based on a recognition that the most promising growth centres, even if now relatively prosperous, must not be excluded from growth encouragement. Do not cast your seeds on only the rocky ground! Perhaps, Sir, at this juncture I ought to mention that my entire constituency is already eligible for tax incentives under the designated area program, so I am not pleading my own case.

In addition to forecasting a new method for defining the regions needing development, the Speech from the Throne forecasts both new measures "to aid industrial expansion" in those regions and measures "to help people to take full advantage of such improved employment opportunities."

It has been known all along that the present tax incentive program for designated areas has not been regarded by the Government as a full-blown program for regional development. I think we may conclude from the Speech from the Throne that the Government is now ready to put into effect a new and higher phase of its program. Just what the new measures to aid industrial expansion will be we cannot say at this time, but I would presume they will not include any plan to transmit Federal money to the Provinces, to be used by the Provinces to provide direct proportional grants toward either the capital costs or the payroll costs of new ventures. Any such plan would entail many difficulties.

There are certain advantages for all concerned when a training program is established for the potential employees of projected industry. I assume it is some such training program that the Government has in mind in this laconic passage in the Speech from the Throne. Men and women could be recruited from near and far according to their potentialities for the projected work, and trained specifically for that work. In this way the training program would not simply take in the people who happen to arrive at the technical or vocational school's door. I hope this is what is forecast in the paragraph to which I have just referred.

It is encouraging to note that reference is made in the Speech from the Throne to the ARDA program. In the Atlantic Provinces the ARDA program is the other side of the coin of development. It is most important that our land resources be used properly, whether the use to which they are put be agriculture, forestation, or recreation. I have a feeling, Mr. Speaker, that in some of our Provinces the possibilities of the ARDA program are not thoroughly appreciated. We get small projects, important perhaps to some Minister or to some locality, but projects which by being small create the image of the ARDA program as a rather dreary undertaking.

The ARDA program ought to be approached most imaginatively; and I say that, realizing that large parts of my constituency being underdeveloped have, in the very fact that they are underdeveloped, great potentiality.

Back in 1957, in the Royal Commission on Canada's Economic Prospects, there was set forth a paragraph which I will abbreviate as follows:

> An objective of economic policy should be to integrate and improve the basic economic framework of the Atlantic region, including in particular the transportation facilities of the area, with a view to facilitating and encouraging economic growth within the region. This is not likely to be accomplished by a multiplicity of unco-ordinated measures providing aid on an ad hoc basis... What is needed we believe is bold comprehensive and co-ordinated approach to the underlying problems of the region in order to make the best possible use of the resources of the area and to improve transportation and other basic services.

I am glad that the Government has remembered that passage in the report of the Gordon Royal Commission. There is a great danger in all unco-ordinated approaches to economic development, particularly when two, or even three levels of government assume some responsibility for that development.

One of the complaints we have been hearing in Atlantic Canada recently is that there are so many agencies for regional development, both Federal and Provincial, that it is difficult not only to understand the distinct undertakings of each of the several agencies but even to remember what the initials of their names stand for. I should hope that the proposed special Federal-Provincial conference would help in clarifying the goals of these various agencies and in harmonizing federal and provincial policies and programs.

In this connection I should like to suggest that when the general Federal-Provincial conference on regional development has finished its work, there should be a special session involving the Government of Canada and the Governments of the four Atlantic Provinces, because I think that certain of the problems germane to the discussion that would take place at such a conference would not be directly relevant to other parts of the country. Such a conference, if well planned, could be most helpful in producing a better understanding between the Provinces and the Government of Canada, and in shaping the kinds of policies which will be necessary.

In this kind of venture organization is very important. One of the most encouraging aspects of the Speech from the Throne is that the Prime Minister himself is proposing to direct his own attention to this assault upon regional economic stagnation. In the Atlantic Provinces, as you might expect, we have a great deal of confidence in the Prime Minister, and that in itself is important.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Speak for yourself, John.

Mr. Stewart: Well, we do have certain people who disagree, but such ones are always with us. What is even more important, Sir, is that the inevitable temptation for different agencies to go their several ways can be overcome if the Prime Minister himself is directly involved. The future development of the Atlantic region is going to require the co-operation of the Federal Department of Public Works, the Federal Department of Transport, the Federal Department of Finance, the Federal Department of Industry, the Federal Department of Labour, and the Atlantic Development Board. If all these agencies are going to work harmoniously together without dispersion of energy and conflict of interest, without the leadership of the Prime Minister nothing much will be accomplished. That is why I am glad that the Government has resisted the temptation, an almost inevitable temptation, I suppose, to set up a ministry for regional development. That would have been a mistake. What is needed is the ordinary departmental approach to this problem, co-ordinated by the Minister whose job it is to co-ordinate the works of the several departments, namely the Prime Minister.

There is one other topic to which I want to refer very briefly, Sir, in conclusion. It is a related topic, for unless something is done about it and unless it is taken seriously neither the Canada Assistance Plan nor the plan for regional development will ever find their way, via the statute books, into action. I refer to the need for reform of our procedures in this House, a subject which was discussed earlier this afternoon by the hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

I think it would be a mistake to found a demand for parliamentary reform on the experience—experience which extended to some 248 days, it is true—of the last session of this Parliament. But we all know, and it has been known since the days of World War II, that this House and its Committees seldom work intensively enough on the increasingly large bulk of public business which comes before them. Too much time is spent in what one might call the parliamentary doldrums.

The Special Committee on Procedure established last session at the instigation of the Government worked earnestly and long for basic reform, but we know the sorry reward of their efforts. I think it is now quite clear that nothing much could be achieved to reform our procedures unless the Government itself acts. It is encouraging to see in the Speech from the Throne that the Government does propose to undertake specific reforms essential to parliamentary reform. As the hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre said, there are two aspects to this. We are here to discuss, and we are here to decide. The reconciliation of these two aims, which are likely to be viewed rather differently according to where one sits in this House, is not easy; but it is now patently clear that no solution more satisfactory than the one we now have, which is to experience something like a 14 or 15 month session, is likely to be attained unless the Government itself goes ahead, assumes the responsibility for proposing necessary reforms, and brings those reforms forward for debate, and, in good time, to a decision in this House.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. Member will permit a question?

Mr. Stewart: Yes.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I listened to my learned colleague's rather interesting discourse and I did not wish to interrupt his remarks. In his remarks he stated that the unemployment rate as at mid-February, 1965 was 13 per cent in the Atlantic Provinces. I am inclined to agree with him; unfortunately it is that high. However, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) recently stated to the Maritime Women's Club at Montreal that the rate was 7.8 per cent. There seems to be a conflict of opinion there and I am wondering whether the hon. Member could tell me why a Cabinet Minister would give this information, which I think is erroneous, to a respectable and important group like the Maritime Women's Club. Would the hon. Member take it upon himself to advise the Minister that she is in error?

Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, these kinds of disagreements appear to be inevitable. The hon. gentleman is insisting that I was correct when I recited the figure set forth in the survey of the labour force, yet he himself the other evening told us that we should all rejoice and throw up our hands because Mr. Robert L. Stanfield had solved all the economic problems in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Could I pose another question to the hon. Member? Would the hon. Member accept another question?

Mr. Stewart: Well, I think my time has expired.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Surely you are not afraid of questions. Have I your permission?

Mr. Stewart: If I have time, Mr. Speaker, to deal with the question I would be willing.

Mr. Starr: You did not deal with the last one.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Is he not aware that my feelings the other night were these. I said that we were so fortunate in having Bob Stanfield and Industrial Estates in Nova Scotia to bring in new industries to replace those which have been taken out of the Province by this Government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order, please.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Now we have cleared up the problems facing Nova Scotia, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can proceed with my ill-prepared remarks. I want to agree with one point made by the last speaker, the hon. Member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Stewart), when he discussed the problem of designating an area which really has no relationship to the over-all problems in a province. This is very true of the designated areas in New Brunswick, owing to some quite artificial formula, or by reason of a formula which does not take into account the economic problems or the problems of transportation, or where industry would be best located. I am very hopeful that the Government will change this arrangement during the next few months.

It is the custom—and I want to include myself in this—to congratulate the mover and second of the Speech; I think each of them did credit to himself in a really wonderful way. It was a good effort and a good afternoon.

I would be less than gracious were I not also to include in my congratulations and compliments the hon. Member for Westmorland (Mrs. Rideout) on her maiden speech. She discussed Maritime union, which has been discussed in the Maritimes for all of 110 years. Her interest is in locating the capital of such a union, of such a country or new province, which might be called Acadia, in Moncton.

• (4:20 p.m.)

I prefer a different approach. I would think it would be better for the time being that the capital rotate between St. John's, Newfoundland, Halifax, Charlottetown and Fredericton, and then in the millennium we can come to Moncton.

However, now we have solved the problems of Maritime union I would like to pass on to a problem that the Principal and Vice-Chancellor of McGill, Dr. Robertson, calls really the crisis in the country today. He says that the "developing crisis in higher education" ranks as a national problem second only to "the problem of unity in our country".

That was in a speech reported in the Montreal Star of April 5. The Vice-Chancellor of York University in the United Kingdom, Lord James of Rusholme, says that the Federal Government must put education higher on its priorities list. I would think most of us in this House, no matter what our political affiliation, would agree with Lord James of Rusholme.

Mr. Addison: Where do you stand?

Mr. Fairweather: We will deal with where I stand in a moment. I am disappointed in the Speech from the Throne because it has not faced the crisis of higher education in any manner. I think the problem of assistance to universities is, as Dr. Robertson said, the second most important thing in this country. The other day in Fredericton, New Brunswick, 1,500 students met before the Legislative Assembly of that Province protesting the increase in fees of the University of New Brunswick at Mount Allison. Then in the other two universities that I know of, which have increased their fees, Acadia and Dalhousie, similar protests have been made to Government. Many years ago in the United States a group of researchers, academics and practising lawyers formed what is known as the Law Institute, which from time to time prepares and publishes a brief restatement of a particular aspect of the law. For example, there is the restatement of the law on torts, on practice, on evidence, and so on. The Institute does this because changing conditions demand different solutions for problems, different concepts and different approaches.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, it is time that a group of Canadians with an interest in and concern for the rapidly developing crisis in higher education prepared just such a restatement of the constitutional concept of the word "education" as used in the British North America Act. The Federal Government, in spite of several well documented briefs from the Canadian Universities Foundation, plus innumerable individual requests, has done nothing to change the formula for per capita grants for universities since the Diefenbaker Government increased these grants from $1.50 to $2 effective June 1, 1962. The university operating budgets have far outstripped the increase in population and the $2 per capita figure, in order that it be in any way comparable with present day buying power should be a minimum of $2.95. I presume that is where my hon. friend from Danforth (Mr. Scott) got his $3 figure yesterday.

Mr. Scott: I was just rounding it out.

Mr. Fairweather: The hon. Member says he was just rounding it out. Well, the nickel would be very helpful. The actual federal per capita grants to universities as of June 1 this year will be about $39,300,000, whereas if the grants had kept pace with the increase in university operating costs—that is, $2.95 per capita—they would be approximately $58 million. I suggest this is a substantial difference, and it is a difference that should make hon. Members who support the Government just a little bit ashamed of that Government's neglect of higher education in this country.

The problem is not, however, simply one of dollars for university operating grants. The restatement I seek is for a co-ordinated approach by Federal and Provincial Governments to special aspects of higher education, but within the framework and basic philosophy of the Constitution. I think this can be done. I think there are people in, say the Province of Quebec and on the Treasury benches, who could re-negotiate this matter of education in so far as the Constitution is concerned.

Some aspects of higher education which recognize neither Provincial nor, for that matter, national boundaries are, I suggest, in the areas of research, overseas students and programs involving studies of the cultures of lands other than our own. For example, Canada's needs for nuclear physicists cannot be circumscribed by the statutory injunction making education solely a provincial responsibility. Researchers in medicine and in the dynamics of space flights will not be impressed by a narrow and restrictive constitutional debate. McGill University, in its most excellent brief to the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, put it this way:

> There are two major dimensions to the role of a modern university. The first is universality. Language, culture, and social milieu are factors that influence the quality and style of its activities, but to be worthy of the designation "university", it must have a commitment to the quest for knowledge that transcends these particulars. The second dimension is is involvement in the society of which it is a part. The role of educational institutions generally is to nourish and develop the culture of the society in which they exist and which they serve.
> The changing circumstances of the twentieth century have altered the character of the university and changed its role but they have increased, rather than diminished, its interests and responsibilities beyond the margins of the immediate community in which it finds itself.

It is in this context, then, that I seek a new accord between the Government of Canada and the Provincial Governments in the field of higher education while ensuring academic freedom and preserving fundamental provincial rights. Let Canada as a nation develop a sophisticated formula for ensuring that the universities of this land can provide us with the necessary number of doctors and scientists for our national needs and our international obligations. This type of accord, it seems to me—and I am not going to talk for very long about it—was found in another area of largely provincial concern, and that is of natural resources, in the conference held in Montreal a couple of months ago, the Resource Conference. It is this type of approach that I think could well be used in the field of education.

Let Canada assist some of our great universities establish schools of Asian and of African studies, for example. Then, too, we could have a Foreign Service Institute which, I suggest, could transfuse the Departments of External Affairs, Trade and Commerce and other Government Departments with qualified recruits. I feel that there is a mood prevalent in both French and English speaking Canada for a redrawing of the present too restrictive areas of responsibility in the field of education. Let us harness the mood, restate the principles and give university education, particularly at the graduate level, a clear direction for what I think of as the exciting years ahead.

Mr. Speaker, yesterday the New Democratic Party outlined various projects for higher education. I think it was a pity that they could not wait to announce them—they have all been busy with election manifestos here; the Throne Speech, and now the New Democratic Party on higher education—in August of this year, when we expect to have the results of the Bladen Commission report on higher education. I think this is something of an indication of our constitutional thin skin in the fact that the Canadian Universities Foundation found the money and the formula for this Commission, which the Government of Canada, because of a narrow concept of education, could not finance, or for which it could not provide the initiative.

As you know, Dr. Vincent Bladen, the Chairman, who is Dean of Arts and Sciences at the University of Toronto; Dr. Louis Paul Dugal, Dean of Pure and Applied Sciences; Hon. Senator W. W. McCutcheon and Mr. Howard Ross of the well-known firm Touche, Ross, Bailey and Smart, are Commissioners studying the financing of higher education in Canada. Not only are they studying it, but they are to make recommendations on the financing of universities and colleges in Canada, with particular reference to the decade ending in 1975, respecting financial requirements of universities and colleges for operation, research, physical facilities and student aid. They are also studying the proportion of the financial support of higher education which should be provided by tuition fees, contributions from governments, corporations, foundations and individuals. They are studying policies regarding the allocation of funds for higher education, and criteria by which institutions and students should be deemed eligible to receive such aid.

I am sure the recommendations of this Commission will be watched by the Government of Canada in spite of the fact that at the moment there is no co-ordination of this field. I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) some time ago who had replaced Dr. Taylor in the Privy Council office, and who was to advise the Government in this area. I have not received an answer as yet, and I do not know whether or not it means that nobody has replaced Dr. Taylor.

There is a serious gap in Federal responsibility, and I think it is no longer good enough just to slough off responsibility by rushing to Section 93 of the Constitution, which was drafted years ago when colleges were just local colleges and had not conceived of the universality which the McGill Commission submission so eloquently set out.

There are one or two other things I should like to mention in the field of higher education. One is the suggestion of the Canadian Universities Foundation in respect of national achievement awards. These awards would be made in the form of remissions of portions of loans made under the Canada Student Loans Fund. There would be remissions made if students achieved superior marks. This is the type of challenge for excellence that we in Parliament should encourage. I think this would be much better than grinding out loans without any thought as to how well the students receiving the loans are doing.

Another interesting suggestion which I certainly cannot claim as my own, but one that I had the opportunity of passing on, is that a national university be established on the site which will be vacated some day when Expo '67 completes its exposition. This would certainly be a good location because it would have the advantage of utilizing the two founding cultures in Canada.

Another problem we must face in respect of higher education is created by the lack of real, meaningful exchange programs between students of French Canada and those of so-called English Canada. This could be encouraged in a much more massive way than is taking place now.

We have had some discussion here about the rules of this House. It was my privilege to serve on the House Committee on Organization and Procedure. I have not been here for very long, but that was the high mark certainly for me during my two years in Parliament. I sometimes think in respect of the matter of Parliamentary rules that we worship the form but forget the substance. I think it is time we considered the substance and ignored the form. I have had 10 years experience in a small Provincial Legislature, if I may become personal for a moment, and I have followed the happenings in Legislatures of other Provinces. I can assure the House that these small Provincial Legislatures go through about ten times the amount of work, in about half the time, as we do here. I think it is incumbent upon us as Members of Parliament to do something about this situation. I welcome that part of the Throne Speech, to which I will give enthusiastic support when it comes before us in the form of legislation.

It has been said here this afternoon that the House of Commons is a dynamic place. If this need be said anywhere else, let me remind hon. Members that people have been talking about this and writing about it to a great degree, particularly because we are now celebrating the 700th anniversary of Parliament as an institution. Obviously rules and procedures have undergone tremendous changes during that 700-year period; but sometimes sitting here I wonder whether during some of the debate we are not living the whole 700 years of history. That of course is another story.

Because this is a Speech which has not been carefully typed and prepared, I must take a moment or two to consult my notes. This seems to be about the right juncture to discuss for just a moment what I envisage as a division, if I may call it that, of the roles of a Member of Parliament. Some of us forget that we are really three people in one, with three separate roles. The first role surely is to represent the people of our constituencies. I suggest this is only one role, but a very important one, and one which cannot be forgotten or, if forgotten, at the peril of each Member.

The second role is one of obligation as an educator in our ridings and throughout the country. The last role of a Member of Parliament embodies an obligation to the country to give it "his unbiased opinion, his mature judgment and his enlightened conscience." Edmund Burke said so in 1774, and it seems to me that his affirmation of that day still stands.

It is in this context that I want to speak about a problem which I face as a representative, as an educator, as well as one who has a duty to give an unbiased opinion. It troubles me to think that the Royal Commission on Biculturalism and Bilingualism is touching only the high spots. By that, Sir, I mean the large centres of population in this country. In spite of the efforts of the mass media to get the message across, I do not believe the results of this Commission's work are reaching the small towns, villages and countrysides of Canada. This is a serious defect in the work of this Commission. I am one of those individuals who believes, and this is almost too trite to mention, that hate and prejudice are not inherited but are taught. Surely this is a role for this Royal Commission. It is all very well to hear briefs at the King Edward Hotel in Toronto, but I wonder whether the Commission could not fragmentize itself and hear briefs at the Queen's Hotel at Sussex, New Brunswick, which has a population of 2,500. I think it is only by hearing the type of message that might come from small communities of this kind that this Commission will find out what the general public thinking is.

I have been intrigued, as any Canadian must be, by the sensible thoughts of Dr. Wilder Penfield. He says, of course, that in teaching other languages our fault is that we start too late. I have always wondered why some Canadians sneer at those who have the privilege of having a second or third language. In Europe and in fact almost anywhere in the world but in North America this would be taken for granted. Yet I am afraid that in Canada we have not yet reached that stage in our civilizing process when second and third languages are taken in this matter of fact way. I know this is not particularly a Federal field, but undoubtedly the Bilingualism and Biculturalism Commission will be giving attention to how the teaching of the second language can begin, not in secondary school but in kindergarten.

I think that is about all I have to say, except for one last point. Yesterday the hon. Member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan, posed a question to which a good many writers and thinkers have been giving their attention lately. I refer to the fact that so much of government at the present time is taking place outside the forum of this Parliament, and in fact in the forums of the Legislatures, in committee rooms in the West Block and in committee rooms in hotels across this land; and unless this type of thing is stopped we as members are going to put ourselves out of business, so to speak. Many people might think this is a good idea. Claude Ryan, writing the other day in Le Devoir, pointed out that there are eight fields in the Speech from the Throne that will require Dominion-Provincial conferences or Canada-Provincial conferences, or whatever the new, modern, up to date word is for "dominion". I think we have to be very careful that this type of conference is exposed to proper, public debate and criticism, which can only take place either in this Parliament or in a Legislature.

I support the Canada Pension Plan; but let me cite it as an example. It troubled me to think that the plan could not really be changed at all and that the debate here was in effect a sham, because all decisions had already been made. The excuse was given that matters had all been cleared up or clarified, or that an agreement had been made with the Provinces; and we were left more or less to put "well done" on the document and shoot it off to the Senate.

We are going to be considering very soon another very important piece of legislation involving the patriation of the Constitution—which is not a patriation at all, because the constitution, of course, will remain a United Kingdom statute. But it would be very disturbing if those on the treasury benches came to us—in fact, as Members of Parliament we cannot let it happen—and said to us: There is nothing you can do or say now because it has all been agreed to long ago by the Legislatures of the Provinces, or has been the subject of some agreement. I do not care whether it is the Fulton formula, the Favreau formula, the Fulton-Favreau formula or some other combination of names that it is currently popular to attach to it. I want to see the formula.

I support the hon. Member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin). I think the proper place to examine the matter is in a committee and I certainly think the very fullest debate must be held on this problem. It would be an absolute negation of all our responsibilities if we were to be told that we would have no opportunity to change the formula or to amend the philosophy, and so on, just because the Legislatures had done something. This is a field on which the political scientists I see sitting on the other side of the House can put their classes to work for years to come. I sort of think of it as a non-parliamentary process, with everything being nicely tied up and handed to us, and with our not having an opportunity to examine the matter thoroughly.

Mr. Pepin: May I ask the hon. Member a question? I recognize some of the problems that the hon. Member is discussing are real, but would he not also recognize that the people who meet at these Federal-Provincial conferences are also elected Members, or people responsible to elected Members?

Mr. Fairweather: I recognize, of course, that the 10 provincial Premiers and their attorneys general are very real and I also recognize that they also represent a point of view. But I think I also represent a point of view, and I believe that we as Members of Parliament have to have a chance to express our point of view. This matter has all been tied up somewhere over in the West Block or in the East Block, and I want to see the matter dealt with here, where it should be.

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks I should like to congratulate the hon. Member for Royal (Mr. Fairweather) on his very thought-provoking and moderate speech. While I do not agree with all portions of his speech, or with all his opinions I do share his desire for peace and unity in this nation and I most certainly subscribe to the teachings of Dr. Penfield which, if they were implemented a little more fully, I think would do much to make bilingualism a reality.

Tradition affords me the opportunity to congratulate the hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) and the hon. Member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien) on their contributions to the debate on the Speech from the Throne. The spontaneous applause and many messages of congratulations sent their way indicate the respect of all Members, regardless of political affiliation, for well-prepared and well-delivered speeches. Perhaps what is even more important, this is an indication of the bond of affection that does at times permeate and traverse traditional partisan lines, although in modern times I think that the bond of affection has perhaps too often been buried in the rubble of political partisanship.

The reaction in the House to the Speech from the Throne is, I think, traditional in that we on the Government side indicate what we like about it and those in the Opposition indicate what is missing. But I have been rather pleased at the reception that the proposed legislation set forth in the Speech from the Throne has received in leading editorials in our large daily newspapers. I do not intend to read from these editorials, but in a general way I believe they come to the conclusion that the Speech from the Throne does indicate a determination on the part of the Liberal Party to continue to implement the type of social welfare measures that Canadians of this day and age have come to expect from the Liberal Party. But underlying the Speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker, is an awareness of the fact that all our welfare measures must be paid for by an ever-expanding economy, one that will provide the jobs for newcomers to the labour market, one that will provide positions for those who must be retrained to new skills, and an economy that must provide the moneys not only for social welfare measures but also for the new legislation that is contemplated in the Speech from the Throne. I would say to my good friends from the N.D.P. who were talking about our constant borrowing from the cupboard, that if all the social welfare measures suggested in the Throne Speech are implemented their cupboard would bear a great similarity to Mother Hubbard's.

One thing that appealed to me in the Throne Speech, Mr. Speaker, was the re-establishment of a Special Committee of the House of Commons known as the Food and Drugs Committee. The purpose as outlined in the Throne Speech will be specifically to aim at reducing the prices paid by the public for drugs. While the Throne Speech is by nature rather sketchy in detail, I would have hoped that the reference to the price of drugs would have been tied in with some reference to the necessity for maintaining, above all else, that degree of safety that we in Canada have come to expect from our pharmaceutical manufacturers, and which I have come to realize more and more, as an active member of that Food and Drugs Committee, has a direct bearing on the cost of drugs, as do the moneys being spent on research and the construction of more and more research laboratories.

It is imperative, Mr. Speaker, that the cost of drugs to the Canadian public be as low as possible, consistent with our Canadian ideas of free enterprise, the realization of safety standards established by the Food and Drugs Directorate, and compatible with the development and expansion of our pharmaceutical manufacturing industry which, as at present in Montreal and Toronto, does provide thousands of jobs and money toward the almost disgraceful lack of pure research in this country.

The second significant paragraph in the Throne Speech alludes to the proposed legislation to strengthen the position of Canadian publications. While it is tempting, Mr. Speaker, to comment at length on such proposed legislation, I would prefer to do so when the proposed legislation is before the House. But I do note with a great deal of interest the substitution of the word "publication" for "periodical". This coincides with an opinion I expressed in the House almost a year ago, that when Canada loses complete control in the field of communications, radio programs, television, newspapers and magazines, then the day will have arrived when Canada ceases to grow as a nation. My sentiments cannot and must not be regarded as anti-American but rather as pro-Canadian. I submit there is a fundamental difference. I believe it is imperative that our daily newspapers remain in full control of Canadians; that our editorials in those daily newspapers remain in the hands of Canadians, Canadians who can interpret the events in this House and in this country, as well as international affairs, free from the natural bias that could prevail in those editorials if they originated from some other source outside of this nation. I would urge the Government, Mr. Speaker, to introduce this legislation as soon as possible. The present uncertainty that prevails over the magazine field as a result of the ever present legislation on the Order Paper is unfair to those Canadian periodicals who look hopefully for some solution to their financial problem. It is unfair also to those periodicals under scrutiny, and as yet unaccepted as Canadian periodicals; who have the right to have their position defined once and for all so that they, too, may plan for their future, if there is one for them in Canada. I do not pretend to know the solution to the problem of the periodicals, but I do feel it is not in the best interest or not in the best Canadian tradition to retard appropriate legislation any longer. If it is undemocratic to introduce discriminatory retroactive legislation, then we must and should spell out correctly what this Government feels constitutes a Canadian publication.

The indication that this Government intends to go forward with its proposal to establish a Canadian Development Corporation to assist in financing major new industrial developments in this country, to increase the Canadian ownership of business corporations, reflects the determination of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) to help reduce, by legislation if possible, the ever-continuing erosion of our own industries and of our industrial resources to foreign interests. It indicates a type of Canadianism that is not as prevalent as it should be in certain financial circles. It is indeed a tribute to the Minister of Finance that he is willing to introduce ways and means that must cause some eyebrow lifting amongst his business acquaintances, with whom he was associated so long before he decided to serve his country through the medium of elected office.

If time permitted, Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the officers of Power Corporation who recently showed enough initiative to take over Consolidated Paper, and with this takeover regain for this country control over a large tract of forest and natural resources as well, of course, as regaining control over Consolidated Paper's Canadian subsidiary. In a speech made recently in Winnipeg Maurice Strong, President of Power Corporation, advocated the establishment of more corporations similar in make-up and purpose to Power Corporation, corporations that would not hesitate to take over parent firms rather than seek out a minority voice in Canadian subsidiaries. This type of initiative, combined with the legislation to be introduced by the Minister of Finance establishing the Canadian Development Corporation, will do much to help us retain what is left of our Canadian identity in the business world.

I should have liked to continue in this vein, Mr. Speaker, because as a Member of the Government Party the opportunities to speak in the House are not as frequent as some of us would like. I, Mr. Speaker, rarely depart from this type of speech, rarely participate unless I feel I have something to say. Rarely do I take the time of the House to retaliate or answer personal attacks upon this Party or upon Members of this Party. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I share the opinion of a well-known United States congressman—I believe his name was Joe Cannon—who rose to be Speaker in the House of Representatives. One day he was asked why he did not retaliate to a rather vicious attack that had just been made and he replied. "There are times when you have to fight the skunks, but you don't need to give them the choice of weapons." This has been my philosophy since I came into the House.

But if I sound a little angry, and if I would like to answer in detail the remarks the hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) expressed in the House yesterday, it is only because I feel as an individual that perhaps he has gone to the well once too often, and that Members all over the House, without exception, are getting a little tired of his personal attacks upon the Prime Minister of this country.

Any hopes that we may have had that rubbing shoulders with the hierarchy of his Party may have mellowed the hon. Member for Yukon, may have made him a little more objective in his remarks, were rapidly dispelled by his speech yesterday. Instead of objective, constructive criticism of the Throne Speech, as we have just been treated to by the hon. Member for Royal (Mr. Fairweather), we were treated to another vicious, unwarranted, but I suppose utterly predictable attack upon the Prime Minister and upon the front bench of this Party.

Some Members may ask, "What do you expect from the hon. Member for Yukon? Why do you think he is capable of being responsible in his remarks? What contribution has he every made in the House that was not of a destructive nature?"

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, when the hon. Member rose in the House last November to bring to the attention of the House certain alleged wrongdoings, I spoke in that debate and expressed the opinion that the hon. Member for Yukon was doing his duty as a Member of the House, and I expressed the opinion at that time that wrongdoing should not be shoved under any rug.

But, Mr. Speaker, I had expected better things from the hon. Member for Yukon, because of his new-found role in the Conservative Party, that of alleged master strategist, the dark horse in the leadership stakes, the man who is to outline the strategy that would restore the party's image in Quebec and restore the Conservative Party to the ranks of those that deserve the description of national.

The Montreal Star, to which the hon. Member for Yukon likes to allude on occasion, had an editorial in its issue of March 6 this year entitled, "The New Role of Mr. Nielsen." It is a lengthy editorial and the first paragraph of it says this:

> Nothing in Mr. Erik Nielsen's parliamentary record has shown him up as a constitutional expert, but that apparently is to be his new role. For the moment, to judge by a document circulating among Conservative M.P.'s and attributed to the hon. member from the Yukon, muckraking is out—

He forgot to read that document yesterday.

> —though he rendered a most useful service in this connection—and the constitution in.

I shall leave out sections of the editorial because they refer to the pros and cons of opting, and opting out; but further on the editorial says:

> All this has no meaning to that limited section of the Conservative Party which includes the Horners and the Nielsens and is led by Mr. Diefenbaker. The Leader of the Opposition has in fact given his supporters what amounts to an ultimatum: support the party or get out, though what is equally clear is that Diefenbaker ultimatums no longer carry the weight they once did.
> Once more a section of the Conservative party in Parliament is finding in the past the natural home of its reaction. But the clock cannot be turned back to some happy era which this group finds more to its liking. The issue is not whether to centralize or not to centralize, but to develop policies which will meet the needs of the present and, in so doing, strengthen the future of this country.

I do not question the loyalty of the hon. Member for Yukon to his leader. I believe it is the duty of every member of a political party to show precisely that same loyalty to the party leader, and that is just precisely what I am trying to do this afternoon. Nor do I have any question about the ambitions of the hon. Member for Yukon, for ambition goes hand in hand with politics, and I do not fault the hon. Member for seizing the opportunities provided by his propensity to destructiveness to push his way to the top of his party, to be the voice behind the Leader of the Opposition. I simply had hopes that the hon. Member for Yukon would use his new place of prominence in his Party for the unity of this country, to indicate to the House that from henceforth the Conservative party would stop living in the past and start looking to the future.

Instead, we see the sorry spectacle of the hon. Member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer), a Conservative of 16 years standing, leaving his Party because he realized that the philosophy of the Leader of the Opposition, strengthened by the support of the hon. Member for Yukon, could only lead to the complete destruction of the Conservative party in Quebec, and ultimately to its complete destruction as a national Party.

Unless the saner voices of moderation have an opportunity, in the hon. Member for Yukon's Party, to emerge, to be heard, to formulate policy, then this great Party is doomed to extinction. For, contrary to any opinion the hon. Member for Yukon has, or any other hon. Member has, that there is a strong English backlash setting in, in this nation, the reverse is true. Canadians from coast to coast, of all racial backgrounds, want national unity. They want the type of Canada that the Prime Minister is striving for, and the voice of the hon. Member for Yukon, or 50 similar voices, will not drown out the voice of reason of the Prime Minister or stifle his desire to provide the guidance and enlightened legislation that is so vitally necessary at this time in our history.

[Mr. Mackasey.]

In his remarks yesterday the hon. Member referred briefly to the C.B.C. Sunday night program, "This Hour Has Seven Days," and suggested that hon. Members who saw the program would have a great laugh at the expense of the Prime Minister. Well, I saw that program, Mr. Speaker, and I would defend the C.B.C.'s right to present it with my last breath, for I will never subscribe to censorship in any form. But this does not preclude me from saying that the program was in bad taste, that ridiculing the Prime Minister of this country, or for that matter ridiculing the President of the United States, indicates what many people have long suspected about this program, that it is running out of constructive and creative ideas, and is failing to live up to the high hopes many people had for it at its inception. Its reference to the flag as "the rag" is despicable and can only weaken the respect that all Canadians should have for our national symbol, regardless of the controversy that preceded its adoption. The same performers who imitated the Prime Minister, creating the impression that the Prime Minister may have referred to the flag as the rag and who in turn ridiculed the President of the United States, have no compunction about crossing the border to take advantage of the opportunities there for second rate comedians.

By some queer reasoning the hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) feels that we must not attack poverty in this country because the United States thought of it first. We must not think of a youth corps because the United States has a peace corps. We must not introduce social welfare measures because, in his opinion, we have borrowed these measures from the N.D.P. I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is precisely this willingness on the part of the Prime Minister to borrow what is best for this nation, from whatever source it may stem, that makes him the great man that he is. He cares little for the alleged glory of being considered original. He is more interested in alleviating poverty in this nation. If we can benefit from the experiences of our friendly nation to the south of us, and if we can benefit from the experiences which they had in their war on poverty, why should we not take advantage of this experience? I wonder whether any Canadian who feels the benefit of this attack on poverty particularly cares whether the idea stems from the House of Parliament or from the White House? As for borrowing the N.D.P.'s philosophies, any legislation which we have adopted in the past and that which we will adopt in the future, has always been an important part of the manifesto of the Liberal Party. Our Party has been consistently known for its willingness to introduce social welfare measures to the Canadian economy.

The hon. Member for Yukon, Mr. Speaker, once again has been reviewing his moments of glory by referring darkly to the so-called scandals and so-called immorality in high places, and he indicates his willingness to discuss them again at some time in the future. Personally I would prefer to see him staying closely to the field for which he has such an affinity, instead of playing strategist within his own caucus, which indirectly is driving from the ranks of his party one of the few voices of moderation in this country, a voice which was accepted and appreciated in English Tory ranks as well as in his own native Province.

The hon. Member referred quite cheerfully to an editorial by Mr. W. A. Wilson in the Montreal Star and his references to the Cabinet. I am quite willing to admit that I am an admirer of Mr. Wilson's writings and read his comments quite closely. I appreciate his editorials, whether they be critical or whether they be complimentary.

I should like to read another editorial from the Montreal Star dated April 1 which is entitled "Sound and fury signify nothing". This article bears the stamp of Mr. Wilson and reads, in part, as follows:

> Mr. Erik Nielsen was going his best lick in the House of Commons on the government's opting-out bill. He called it "deconfederation on the instalment plan", charged the Liberals with responsibility for parliament being "plucked from its powers like a chicken", described the bill itself as the "first halting step along the road to eventual disintegration".
> It was all dandy political stuff, and if it had no validity at least it had entertainment value. No sooner had he finished his vaudeville act, however, than members were back on track and the opting-out legislation on its way to the Senate. The Tories it is clear had no heart in the Nielsen approach. The weakness of their opposition to it was in almost direct proportion to the violence of Mr. Nielsen's oratory. The threatened drawn-out debate on the legislation never materialized. The Conservative amendment was defeated and the legislation given second reading in 45 minutes.

I will conclude this article, Mr. Speaker, with this last paragraph:

> Meanwhile, all that the Diefenbaker group have succeeded in doing is to show up once again the deep division in the Conservative Party. Mr. Greene, the Liberal Member for Renfrew South, read back to Mr. Nielsen statements made by another Conservative, Marcel Lambert of Edmonton West, describing the Bill as innocuous and declaring in effect that the Act was unnecessary because the provinces were only taking over fields assigned to them by the constitution. It must be heart breaking for the rest of the Conservative party to stand by and watch the kind of portrait of Conservatism which men like Mr. Nielsen are painting.

Mr. Churchill: Why don't you worry about the Liberal Party?

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. Member for Yukon referred to caucus leaks in his own Party and he was rather rough on his fellow members. I can appreciate the problem of caucuses, but these leaks no doubt led to an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press on March 19 entitled "Two views of opting-out", or "One Tory's mouse is another Tory's monster". This editorial dwells on the fact that the hon. Member for Yukon was not able to win over his Party in face of reasoned logic on the part of the hon. Member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) during the Tory caucus debate on the opting-out formula. I say thank goodness for the Conservative Party, which we need as a national party in this country, and thank goodness for the moderate voice of the hon. member for Edmonton West.

Mr. Lambert: It was the voice of caucus.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have to interrupt the hon. Member because his time has expired, unless he has unanimous agreement to continue.

Mr. Churchill: If he talks about the Liberal Party, yes.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Mackasey: I thank hon. Members and I shall attempt to shorten my speech by not reading too extensively from another editorial which concerns Tory caucus leaks, and which indicates that the hon. Member for Yukon is not above revealing caucus secrets if he feels that it is in his own best interests to do so.

Mr. Lambert: That is a low blow.

Mr. Mackasey: Wait until I have read the editorial. It says:

Conservatives of both factions have shown an unusual disposition in recent weeks to share their caucus thought with the general public.

I might say this article is from the Winnipeg Free Press for March 19, and I should like to read that passage again because I see that the hon. Member for Edmonton West is paying attention.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Conservatives of both factions have shown an unusual disposition in recent weeks to share their caucus thought with the general public. There has been an astonishing discrepancy in the views thus communicated. In the light of Mr. Lambert's present verdict that the bill is a mere mouse which will scarcely change anything, what are we to make of the "confidential" published remarks of Mr. Nielsen (an undoubted loyalist) only a fortnight ago?

Mr. Speaker, there is more in the same vein in this rather lengthy editorial, but certainly the indication that a confidential document published by Mr. Nielsen—

Mr. Churchill: It was not published by Mr. Nielsen.

Mr. Mackasey: I am not making the charges; they are in the Winnipeg Free Press. I suggest, however, that those who live in glass houses should not throw stones and the hon. Member should not be too critical of others when from his own Party there are leaks from the caucus.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. Member permit a question?

Mr. Mackasey: I will, when I have finished. I promise. That is the least I can do, in view of the hon. Member's co-operation. There is one last aspect of this matter, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Member asked me to refer to the Liberal Party, and the hon. Member for Yukon yesterday, in a very benevolent mood, made a direct appeal to the backbenchers of the Liberal Party to rebel against what he called the old guard along the front row. I must inform the House that regardless of our weaknesses, our problems and the fact that at times we have been a little accident prone, there has never been in this Party any indication of division or a lack of loyalty on the part of the backbenchers to the Prime Minister or those hon. Gentlemen who sit along the front row. In fact, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. Gentleman, when referring to the old guard, was including, as I presume he was, the House Leader (Mr. McIlraith), the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), let me say this, that these men have already contributed more to this country, to this House and to this Party than the hon. Member for Yukon will if he sits here for another 20 years.

Mr. Churchill: Don't be too sure of that.

Mr. Mackasey: Instead of trying to drive a wedge into the Party solidarity for which this Liberal Party is justly famous, the hon. Member should examine his own conscience and see why it is that Members of the calibre of the hon. Member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) and the hon. Member for Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière (Mr. Paul) found it necessary to leave the Conservative Party; or why it was that the Conservative Leader—with whom I sympathize and whom I respect greatly—found that, even with the wonderful help of the hon. Member for Yukon, he was barely able to carry the day in the face of mounting revolt. Certainly this should take up the time of the hon. Member for Yukon, rather than worrying about Liberal backbenchers.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say this, that the backbenchers in the Liberal Party are satisfied with the leadership they are getting—

Mr. Alkenbrack: They have got to be.

Mr. Mackasey: —for they know that they share in the confidence of a man who is dedicated to the future of this nation. If time permitted—and I do not want to prevail upon the benevolence of this House—I would have read an article which appeared in the Montreal Gazette entitled "A Party Fighting Friend and Foe", which refers to the problems that are splitting the Conservative Party asunder. I would just like to repeat—and I know I express the opinion of the backbenchers of this Party—and a few remarks that I made outside this House, when I said that when Lester Pearson retires from the political arena, when the historians of this nation have had an opportunity to assess this man's career, they will find that his greatest single achievement was not winning the Nobel Peace Prize but—

Mr. Alkenbrack: Suez?

Mr. Mackasey: —was in introducing proper legislation and understanding the problems that confront this nation, and who singlehanded has done more than any other man in this country for national unity.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, with indulgence of the House may I ask a question of the hon. Member?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert: The hon. Member mentioned, from his lofty position of Chairman of the Liberal Caucus, that those who live in glass houses should not cast stones. Can he assure the House that he himself is not in a vulnerable position and that he does not have to preside over some rather serious differences of opinion?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Member made a very excellent point. There is one fundamental difference, however. We do not drag our differences of opinion about caucus leaks into the House of Commons. I do not stand up in this House, as Caucus Leader, and castigate my fellow backbenchers, as the hon. Member for Yukon did yesterday. This is the fundamental difference. If we have caucus leaks, we repair them ourselves; we do not wash this type of dirty linen in the House of Commons.

Mr. MacInnis: Oh, you do have dirty linen?

Mr. Churchill: You have it, eh?

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add my congratulations to the Mover and Seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, and to the hon. Lady for Westmorland (Mrs. Rideout) for her fine contribution. I hope to keep my remarks on a positive basis, as I always try to do, so I will not try to defend my colleague from the Yukon who at the present time has, I think, attained national stature as being—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bigg: —a man of great courage and ability.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bigg: It is obvious to this House and to the whole country that this young man, who was said by the former speaker to be green and brash, has shown himself to be a young statesman of no mean character. He stood in this House and accused the Government of carelessness in protecting the public of Canada and the reputation of our law enforcement bodies in a very, very serious situation. He was immediately called a prevaricator and he was challenged to produce the evidence necessary to show that there was in fact fire where there was smoke. I am not going to comment on the Dorion Inquiry because I do not know what the findings will be, but I am quite sure that everybody in Canada was satisfied that this inquiry was necessary; and whether or not the errors made on the treasury benches were deliberate or merely careless, the actions of the hon. Member for Yukon were in my opinion nothing but admirable.

We have before us a Throne Speech. It is big enough; it takes in the whole ambit, I think, of Canada's future. We are going to declare a war on poverty; we are going to take a new look at agriculture; we are going to do all the things that Canada has been waiting for during the last two years, shall I say with bated breath. I hope it is not merely a baited election trap. The small farmers in my community—and there are many of them—have not had large crops; they have had no grain whatsoever to sell, in many cases, but to those on the treasury benches at the moment, they mean nothing. They are great at generalizing. They say, "Oh, the West is prosperous". I suppose this is true when a prairie farmer has had three bumper crops at high prices. I would say he is personally well off. How about those who have not had anything? These are the people I represent.

Some of these people are faced with the kind of poverty that the Throne Speech promises to correct. I should like to know specifically what the Government intends in this regard. When we were faced with this problem we came up with positive answers. We worked out a system of paying $200 to each farm family so they could buy underwear for their children and pay their taxes.

I noted with favour the use of the expression "farm family" in the Throne Speech, and the indication there that something was to be done for these families. What has been done on their behalf in the last two years, and what will be done for them in the future? I suppose nothing will be done for them unless they vote Liberal. Is this a new form of national blackmail, that unless people of this country vote in the right way, nothing will be done for them?

Mention was also made of an Indian Affairs Commission. We sought to set up such a Commission when we were in office and the plans were completed and available, but nothing has been done in that regard in the past two years. If this Government intends to appoint any new Royal Commissions, surely it will give consideration to appointing an Indian Affairs Commission to solve the problems which face this minority. We were able to provide this minority with the right to vote, and I told them that this right would be of assistance to them in gaining equality in this country. This whole problem requires immediate study and solution, which could be accomplished by the appointment of such a Commission. Nothing has been done in this regard during the time this Government has been in office.

We have heard a number of lectures in the House during this Throne Speech debate about the duties of Members of Parliament. Is this Parliament falling into disrepute? If it is, why is it moving in this downhill direction? All hon. Members of the House should ask themselves these questions: Are we doing enough with the opportunities at hand? Are we giving proper and adequate consideration to the problems of this country? Are we actually going to do something about them?

This Throne Speech covers the whole ambit of difficulties which exist today in Canada. I am not here making an election speech, but I am not worried about an election being called. You can call one at any time you wish, but this House should get down to business and bring forward legislation which does not need complete overhaul. Legislation brought forward by the present Government has required overhauling, and this has been carried out as a result of the efforts of Members on this side of the House. When that has taken place many of the newspapers in this country have suggested that the delay in passage is all Mr. Diefenbaker's fault. On the other side of the coin, the Government has continually accepted credit for the few measures which have not required overhaul.

As an example of what I have in mind, let me ask why the Pension Plan had to be submitted three times and is still, in my opinion, a failure. On many occasions we have not been given the opportunity to vote for or against certain programs, but have been put off by arguments as to whether or not we should have the right to discuss them at all. Let us have some positive discussions about the measures which this Government brings forward. Surely the time has come when we should return parliamentary powers to Parliament. Let us stop appointing Royal Commissions and creating Crown corporations to denude Parliament of its powers.

It was pleasing to me to note that the Government intends to at least suggest the appointment of an ombudsman. This points up the fact that there are many things wrong with the bureaucratic administration of this country. I should also like to see an end to the creation of Crown corporations which presumably take the powers of administration out of the hands of Parliament, following which they can hide behind these administrative screens and refuse to accept responsibility.

At this point I should like to refer to a specific subject rather than speak in generalities. On March 8 I stood in this House and asked the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Teillet) whether the Secretary of the Army Benevolent Fund had been suspended. That Minister replied immediately, so he must have known the facts, and said that the Secretary was under suspension, although nothing wrong had been found in respect of this Fund. Let me inform this House that I consider that man to be exemplary in his service to this country. He was a member of the first company to go ashore in France on D-Day. He lost one leg in that battle and sustained serious damage to the other as a result of hand grenades. He is a prominent member of the War Amputees Society of Canada. He has been in charge of the Canadian Army Benevolent Fund as Secretary for 17 years. Each year the Auditor General has commended this man, who is responsible for the administration of this $6 million fund. He has reported that this valuable civil servant has carried out his duties in an exemplary manner during the 17 years he has been associated with the Fund.

In spite of all these facts, this man received, by long distance telephone call, information to the effect that he had been suspended and was no longer required to fulfil his duties. That telephone call was placed during the last week of February and I rose in this House on March 8 and asked the question to which I referred earlier. Is it surprising that today, April 13, this man is still under suspension, yet was not told for over a month why he had been suspended? On March 9, in answer to the second question I asked in regard to this case, the Minister stated that no charges had been preferred by the Legion or the Army and that there was nothing wrong with the Fund. He indicated that no complaints of a serious nature had been lodged against this man, yet this valuable civil servant has been suspended from his job for approximately eight weeks.

Several of the newspapers across this country have carried reports that this man was fired. Is it necessary for me to ask whether or not we need an ombudsman. I realize the Minister of Veterans Affairs is sick, but I see no reason why one of his assistants on the other side of this chamber could not get up and tell us why this valuable civil servant was suspended. I am one of this man's best friends and I cannot find out why he was suspended. As a result of telephone calls I have ascertained that a board sat in respect of this case and found him to be free of any guilt. That man is not aware of that fact, nor are his thousands of friends across this country. He has been locked out of his office and instructed not to communicate with his personal staff. I know of my own knowledge that his personal mail has been opened and read. Does this mean that we are entering a new era in Canada, during which letters from my wife and family will be opened and read because some member of the Treasury Board thinks that there may or may not be something wrong with my behaviour? This man is still not allowed to communicate with his staff, and although his mail is not now being opened, it is still being subjected to scrutiny.

Surely it must be obvious to us all that we need an ombudsman to ferret out answers to questions of this kind, and to see that public servants of this calibre are not subjected to this kind of improper treatment. I do not want to use violent language, but I did not fight overseas for five and a half years only to return and find it possible in Canada to be subjected to this kind of thing. I am not an Erik Nielsen, trained in the law, to look after this sort of thing, but I am a mature Member of this House and as such intend to ask questions and obtain answers. I have not been able to obtain a satisfactory answer to this question in the past month, but as a Member of this House I intend to continue to ask it until I do. If setting up a Crown corporation makes it possible to treat a Canadian citizen in this way, then I say we had better pass a federal statute now doing away with all Crown corporations, until we are assured that every citizen of this country has the right to the privacy of his own mail, the right to communicate with his office staff and the right to know what charges he faces any time he is put under this kind of house arrest.

I came home from overseas 20 years ago yesterday, and I have waited for the opportunity to stand up and say that the kind of tactics against which we fought in Europe will never occur in Canada. If I have to become violent in my speech, then I will say that as long as I am alive this type of treatment will not be given to any Canadian citizen. If you want to hide behind statutes, let us pass a statute which says that this sort of thing cannot occur. I am not blaming the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Teillet) for this but I am saying that he is sitting there with this sort of thing going on, and to my knowledge nothing is being done about it. I should like every Member of the House to take cognizance of this fact. If the Minister needs the power to stop this kind of thing and protect the average Canadian citizen, I want to be the first one to see that he gets it.

There is reference to amendment of the legislation concerning the Canadian Army Benevolent Fund in the Speech from the Throne and I suggest the reason it is there is that I asked a question on the 8th of March and there is no satisfactory answer to this problem up to the present time. We had better find one. There are hundred of thousands of men in the War Amputations Society. Who can say that this man has paid the price in blood, and sweat for the right to be treated like a human being?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Louis Frenette (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the youth of this country will be called upon some day to play an increasingly important role in the public business of Canada, and an eloquent evidence of this was given to us by the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Indeed, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) and the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien) have brilliantly stated the views of the Canadian youth on the problems facing parliament at this time. After those who spoke before me, I want to offer them my sincere congratulations for their contribution to the debate and to Canadian politics.

I do not for one moment suppose that the few remarks I propose to make will be a very important factor that could induce the government to change its policies. But considering that it is my responsibility to air the views of my constituents in this house, I shall try to be their true spokesman and to voice their comments on Canadian policies at this time.

The speech from the throne which was read by His Excellency the Governor General did not overexcite us or reveal anything very sensational. However, we must recognize that that document gives a rather faithful picture of the economic situation in Canada, especially through its pointed allusions to poverty and want, which are the lot of too many of our fellow citizens.

While, for some years now, we have been able to rejoice over a notable improvement in the standard of living of the average citizen, this satisfaction should not blind us to such an extent that we forget the hardship which is the lot of almost 20 per cent of our population.

With your agreement, Mr. Speaker, I shall read that paragraph of the speech of the throne where it is acknowledged that poverty does exist among the Canadian people. I quote:

> All the great potentialities of our economy are not, however, being realized. The talents of some of our people are wasted because of poverty, illness, inadequate education and training, inequality in opportunities for work. To combat these problems, to improve the opportunities of people who are now at a disadvantage, is to put new power into economic expansion and to enhance the unity of our country.

Mr. Speaker, this recognition of poverty among us should be an incentive turning us into an army of fighters, imbued with one desire, one ideal: to put a quick end to this deplorable state of affairs.

I could not be more favourably disposed toward the underdeveloped countries and all those, throughout the world, who suffer hunger, but I do not hesitate to say and to admit that our first duty is, to wage a merciless war on poverty and on hardship among our own people.

We have the privilege of living in a country exceptionally rich, and I consider it outrageous that because of our political prejudices, our ignorance and our indifference, we should be unable to help those who rely on us to distribute this wealth among them.

The Speech from the Throne is an inspiration in that war we must wage. It contains the outlines of the program which is essential, but I would have liked it to be more explicit and more detailed. The long range policies will not result in any immediate improvement, and yet, for millions of Canadians, a state of emergency has unfortunately been prevailing for too long.

In the last session, we passed a measure to improve the lot of our older citizens; it is not perfect, I agree, but it will give, we hope, good results.

As a matter of fact, since the adoption of the first social security measure for our older citizens, we have witnessed a constant progress in the payment of benefits. From $20 a month, the old age pension was raised to $75 a month in the space of some 20 years. I am very glad indeed that there has been this improvement. In fact, I would even hope for more, and it seems to me that the concern of our government should not stop there and that it would be urgent, for instance, to adjust the payment of family allowances to the variations in the cost of living. Let the government grant children but half of what they gave to our older citizens, which might represent an increase of about $5 per child per month, and I am ready to bet on the results of the next general election.

There is more and more emphasis put, and rightly so, on the necessity of preparing our young people for their role as full citizens. Emphasis is laid also on the need for production incentives, on credit facilities and on the improvement of our domestic and foreign markets.

Mr. Speaker, are not all those measures inspired by our concern for the well-being of the people?

• (5:50 p.m.)

Such an increase in family allowances would have the immediate effect of putting in circulation another half a billion dollars in Canada. I challenge anyone to find a better incentive to production. Canadian parents could put this money to good use for the benefit of their children and create by this very fact a constant demand for all sorts of products; this would be a shot in the arm for the Canadian economy.

As members of parliament, our first and foremost duty is to legislate in the interests of the Canadian people; we must combine all our energies for the welfare of the majority and as we are also representing our ridings, we have the responsibility to express the feelings of our electors who have been clamouring for many years for increased family allowances.

I have much respect for the economists who suggest elaborate and complex plans to boost the Canadian economy, but I also have confidence in the common sense of the people, and I always listen carefully to the voice of our farmers, workers and small craftsmen whose common sense often astonishes me.

I noticed during my very brief experience in parliament that, as the middle class people, safe from financial difficulties and daily worries of the average family man, we easily become complacent like everyone who is content with his lot and, without realizing it, we are gradually getting away from the people, and the voice of the humble folk and the indigent reaches us distorted and blurred. It would really be something to see how easily some politicians can get rid of their "bourgeois" shells, at the mere sign of an approaching election, to suddenly become dedicated protectors of the people.

Unfortunately, our examination of proposed legislation too often turns into an election campaign or useless discussions on procedure. We forget the important thing and let our attention be taken over by side issues. All our proceedings, in my opinion, should be governed by a humanitarian feeling that would inspire each and every one of us to work for the happiness of others. This, as I see it, is the mission assigned to us as members of parliament. And if each one of us were to stop worrying about his political interests and work in that kind of spirit, I am convinced it would soon be possible to provide all Canadian families with the bare necessities they are entitled to as Canadian citizens.

Mr. Speaker, following again the principle that a member of parliament must interpret as faithfully as possible the views of his electors, I would like to make some comments on the activities of the C.B.C. Over the past few weeks, I have been receiving letters and I have heard comments and remarks on the moral rating of the T.V. shows; heads of families, parents' associations, school trustees strongly protest because with their own money, the income from their own taxes, a corporation belonging to the Canadian people broadcasts in their homes a pervasive and baneful poison whose effect is all the more dangerous as it is often presented in a pleasant form.

Some C.B.C. programs give wide and shameless publicity to free love, prostitution, violence and crime. On behalf of my constituents, I strongly protest against the bad use that is made of a publicity medium financed by the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the theory that parliament should not deal with this situation, that it should not interfere with the operation of this corporation, that the board of governors is solely responsible and does not have to report to anybody. We do have organizations in Canada to protect society as far as the sale of pharmaceutical or food products is concerned. Why then is society not protected against this evil which is perhaps even worse and attacks insidiously moral values and human dignity?

Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal briefly here with a meeting I had recently with high school students who had organized a debate among themselves on the television problem. I was very much impressed by the way those students discussed that problem and pointed to the dangers and benefits of television. I make it a point, Mr. Speaker, to refer to what those students told me on that occasion: television programs—remember these are children 15, 16 or 17 years—are generally insignificant and stupid. This is what our children think, Mr. Speaker, about Canadian television. I think this calls for immediate action.

I should also like to draw the attention of the government to the problem of agriculture, particularly in the province of Quebec. I do not propose to re-examine here statistics issued in this regard; they are available to everybody. But I urge the minister, who is too often absent unfortunately, to have his government change its farm policy.

Some encouraging steps have been taken lately in favour of dairy farmers. It is surely a stimulus which will produce effective results, but it is no time to stop when things are going so well under the delusion that all problems are solved. Marketing, and especially the search for methods likely to reduce production costs are, in my opinion, the main factors of success in agriculture. Besides, farming organizations quite often submit briefs which are really charters of the farmers' rights. I am sure the minister's advisers will find in them many suggestions likely to help Canadian agriculture.

Although our agricultural calling of the past has gradually changed over the years to the extent of becoming industrial and commercial, nevertheless, a very important segment of our economy is closely related to farming. We were pleased to hear of the forthcoming establishment of the Canadian dairy commission, which will work in cooperation with the provincial agencies. It is our heartfelt hope that this commission, unlike so many others, will not be a haven for disappointed or defeated politicians, but rather a really effective organization, with all the competence and authority required to undertake and continue a truly positive action.

Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne contains two paragraphs, which, in my view, are of capital importance. The first deals with the designation of areas where income is low. Such a program has been in existence for some weeks already and has given some results.

However, I think that to be truly efficient, any governmental action in that field must be taken in close co-operation with the provinces which are better able to select those areas and offer concrete solutions to each area's industrial needs.

Under the federal plan for natural resources and industrial development, the riding of Portneuf, for instance, which I have the honour and privilege to represent, is lost in the economic region of Quebec and the St. Maurice. In spite of its natural beauties and the worth of its inhabitants, that riding remains in fact an anonymous region within that great country of ours.

On the other hand, if you look at that riding on the provincial level, you will quickly realize that because of its wealth and population, it is worthy of the attention and care of our governments.

Therefore, I suggest that the designation of areas be left to the discretion of the provinces which, later on, might take action according to the needs of those areas, such measures being implemented thereafter on a co-operative basis with the federal government. Unfortunately, in the past, it is the opposite which occurred and it is probably the reason for the inefficiency of the programs already in effect.

The second paragraph which I mentioned earlier deals with vocational and technical training. We are told today that a worker cannot learn a trade at which he will work all his life on account of the modernization of facilities and means of production. This is a problem we have to face bravely and which calls for joint action of employees, employers and governments.

However, as all the fields of education and technical and vocational training are primarily under provincial jurisdiction, the federal government should limit itself to providing the provincial governments with the necessary funds, so that they may carry out their own training schemes.

With all due respect to some of my colleagues, I suggest that such a field of activity should be reserved to the provinces, which have everything necessary to succeed.

When the time has come to study this piece of legislation—I shall indeed avail myself of the opportunity to get back to this subject—I will take it upon myself to recommend to the responsible minister the convening of a conference of the provincial ministers of labour, so that he may submit specific projects that will be acceptable to the provinces.

And while I am dealing with this question respecting workers, I wish to express my pleasure upon learning that the Unemployment Insurance Act will be revised. For many of us, this will be a unique opportunity to endorse the claims of the workers in all our ridings.

We all recognize that the Unemployment Insurance Act no longer meets the needs of our times, and particularly that the regulations enacted under it are but an obscure and complicated maze where the unemployed of this country go astray.

It is also recognized that too many officials of that commission are incompetent or ill-disposed toward workers. The factory worker and the woodsman usually are honest persons who have no distrust for the administration, and it is unfortunate to see that these honest individuals sometimes are victimized by unscrupulous officials.

I am glad to admit, of course, that most members and employees of the unemployment insurance commission are good, devoted and attentive civil servants, but in view of the complexity of this agency very little is needed sometimes, it could be an obscure and ill-advised employee, to throw a monkey wrench in the whole administration of the commission.

This matter should be referred to a committee of the house so that representatives of the working class could testify and make suggestions for, after all, they are directly concerned in and most familiar with this question.

Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne, in spite of what I have said in my opening remarks, does contain many items from which the Canadian people will benefit. We shall be glad to support most of them. But, finally, what purpose would be served by having the best throne speech, the best Prime Minister and the best brains in the country if all these elements cannot be combined objectively by means of modern procedure?

During the last session, the committee on procedure did a wonderful job and all those who were members of that committee should be commended, but there is still a lot to do to make Parliament the effective instrument we need. The House of Commons is not yet the hall of democracy and it is only by making the necessary adjustment to its code of procedure that its image and its authority will be preserved.

Personally, I think more authority should be given to the various committees of the house; that their recommendations should be implemented by the house and that it should not be permitted to discuss in committee of the whole what has already been discussed in the standing committees.

Mr. Speaker, I agree that the business of the house has become increasingly difficult, especially with a minority government and an opposition divided into four different parties. Consequently, conscious of his responsibility, every member of the house, during the discussion of various pieces of legislation, must be as objective as possible and get rid of any partisan approach. As far as I am concerned, while staying in line with certain principles which I have been supporting for some years, I propose to give my loyal and honest support to those in charge of the administration of the country, provided the legislation brought before the house seems to me to be in the best interests of the Canadian people.

However, so that there will be no misunderstanding as to the stand I intend to take, I should like, before I conclude, to offer for the consideration of members of the house an item reported in Time Magazine of January 15 last where we see that an organization called the international development association is in fact a branch of the World Bank, founded in 1960 by fifteen of its members to assist underprivileged nations and had made, up to January last, loans for a total value of $1 billion.

The international development association grants credit only to those countries that are so poor that they could not pay the regular interest, although it is only 5.5 per cent. Those borrowing countries are charged only three quarters of 1 per cent to pay for the bank's overhead. The money is loaned for a 50-year period, with a ten-year period of grace, before capital repayments are begun.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Here is a striking and convincing example of what could be done in Canada so as to meet present requirements.

There is here in Canada a body known as the Bank of Canada which could create and distribute new credit to the provinces and municipalities at an interest rate equivalent only to administrative costs.

I feel that if every member would look fully into our present monetary system and sought to find its weak points and its faults, as well as the appropriate cures, it would then be possible to make constant progress, while removing deficits and the interests which weight heavily on our budgets.

I would not be so bold as to think that we have a monopoly on truth here or that the methods we advocate would be a cure-all for every ailment of society. However, I honestly feel that is the best we could find after intense consideration and I call upon all hon. members, individually and collectively, to examine seriously and objectively the problem of finance and money, our theories and principles, after which we could undertake a frank and honest dialogue. I am convinced that that would greatly contribute to the progress of parliamentary business and that, as a consequence, the Canadian people would enjoy greater welfare.

PROCEEDING ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTION TO BE DEBATED UNDER ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, subject to the special order made yesterday and pursuant to Standing Order 39A to inform the House that the question to be raised at ten o'clock this day is as follows: the hon. Member for Danforth (Mr. Scott), industry—benefits of Canada-U.S. automobile agreement to Canadian consumers.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cashin for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Marvin Gelber (York South): Mr. Speaker, Eric H. Erikson writes: "Strength inherent in the age of youth. I call it the sense of and the capacity for Fidelity". In this debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne the hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) and the hon. Member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien) have been faithful to the best traditions of this House and I would like to congratulate them on their addresses in moving and seconding this motion. The hon. Member for Westmorland (Mrs. Rideout), in her maiden speech, also did credit to this House and to her historic constituency. The hon. Member for Nipissing (Mr. Legault) is a valued member and we welcome him as well to this historic House.

In a searching discussion of the problems of youth, Professor Erikson writes:

> Fidelity could not mature earlier in life, and must not in the crises of youth, fail its time of ascendance if human adaptation is to remain intact...Here again diversity and fidelity are polarized...fidelity without a sense of diversity can become an obsession and a bore...diversity without a sense of fidelity..."

—can become empty. The role of youth is crucial in our society and this Government sets an important horizon in organizing a Company of Young Canadians. The Professor of Human Development at Harvard continues:

> In youth, then, the life history intersects with history: here individuals are confirmed in their identities, societies regenerated in their life style.

E. E. Cohen, executive secretary, National Child Labour Committee, is concerned about "early physical maturation combined with delayed social responsibility". This program of the Government of Canada to provide a wider context of service meets in some measure what has been called the moratorium of responsibility. Some feel that youth is too preoccupied with solving personal problems and problems of adjustment. Professor Erikson writes:

> —but in youth the tables of childhood dependence begin slowly to turn: no longer is it merely for the old to teach the young the meaning of life, whether individual or collective. It is the young who, by their responses and actions, tell the old whether life as represented by the old and as presented to the young has meaning; and it is the young who carry in them the power to confirm those who confirm them and, joining the issues, to renew and to regenerate, or to reform and to rebel.

This historic role meets new challenges in the nuclear age.

The youth of Canada is prepared to meet the challenge which the Company of Young Canadians offers. We do not accept the tragic ethic expressed in the story from Greek myths told by the ancient historian Herodotus about two youths, Kleobis and Biton, of remarkable strength, who were victorious in many gymnastic games and drew the chariot of their mother, Hera, a priestess, a great distance to the sanctuary of Argos. She prayed to the gods to reward her sons and as their greatest gift, allowed the two brothers to die in their sleep in the fulness of their youth. Our ideal is the fulness of life, and in providing added avenues for social responsibility for the youth of Canada the Company of Young Canadians can play a historic role.

[Mr. Gelber.]

Dr. Harold Taylor, a well known Canadian points out:

> We do find changes taking place in the attitudes of students towards themselves and towards their society. These changes occur when two major factors are present. The first is the presence of idealistic, sensitive teachers who care about their students and who develop ways of helping them to find the guidance they need. The second is a community life in which the students are called upon to concern themselves with their relationships to each other and to their world, not merely on the extroverted basis provided by sports and social engagements, but by the structure of the community itself.

The effort of Canadians in two world wars is a most remarkable one. About a million Canadians volunteered for service overseas 1939-45 and the honour role contains 41,992 who paid the supreme sacrifice in corners of foreign fields that will always remain part of our Canadian heritage. Our country has had this great tradition of voluntary service both in peace and war. The names of many battles are hallowed in the history of our country where with skill and bravery Canadians fought for a common cause. Some volunteered again in the Pacific area and during the United Nations collective security action in Korea Canadian volunteers carried the colours of famous Canadian regiments. We can paraphase the famous English poet, A. E. Housman who wrote: "It dawns in Asia. Tombstones show"—and Canadian names are read.

I know the House would want to hear again this excerpt from the citation on the awarding of the Victoria Cross to Captain (acting Major) Paul Triquet, Royal 22nd Regiment. Upon instructing soldiers in security I always read the entire citation and I am pleased to recall it today.

> Against bitter and determined defence and under heavy fire, Captain Triquet and his company in close co-operation with the tanks, forced their way on until a position was reached on the outskirts of Casa Berardi. By this time the strength of the company was reduced to two sergeants and 15 men. In expectation of a counterattack, Captain Triquet at once set about organizing his handful of men into a defensive perimeter around the remaining tanks and passed the mot d'ordre "Ils ne passeront pas". A German counterattack supported by tanks developed almost immediately. Captain Triquet, ignoring the heavy fire, was everywhere encouraging his men and directing the defence, and by using whatever weapons were to hand personally accounted for several of the enemy. This and subsequent attacks were beaten off with heavy losses and Captain Triquet and his small force held out against overwhelming odds until the remainder of the battalion took Casa Berardi and relieved them the next day.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have been told that the idea of a Company of Young Canadians has been borrowed. Ideas are always borrowed. They are borrowed, reinterpreted and rearranged. We have been told that many ideas in the Speech from the Throne have been borrowed, and of course they have. They have been matured and mellowed by experience and they will be applied to the problems of Canada. That is the test of any government, to make a political reality out of a good idea. The idea of a program of service is something that springs from deep wells within Canadian life.

I would like to say a word about a very successful project, CUSO—the Canadian University Service Overseas. CUSO is organized on the basis of a partnership between the CUSO organization and the university that is recruiting personnel, because this is a student organization. CUSO selects, trains and transports the students. The host country provides them with local salary, room and board and an appropriate allowance. A Ghanaian official said this:

> I am extremely suspicious of the "dedicated person" who wishes to help but has no specific skill. Don't send underdeveloped people to underdeveloped countries.

Its personnel must be screened, carefully selected and trained. Training programs for them before they go abroad have been conducted at the University of British Columbia, McGill University, the University of Montreal and the University of Toronto. Here is what was said by an educator from Tibet about one CUSO worker:

> Due to her intense devotion to work and her medical knowledge we have been able to bring a tremendous improvement in the school. This school was primarily established for children who are so weak that they need particular care. So the task here is demanding. She has been wonderful with the children and they have taken a great liking to her.

In addition to intellectual ability, candidates must possess emotional maturity, resourcefulness and must be able to adapt themselves to the unfamiliar. They must be willing to regard their overseas assignment as an opportunity for learning through service, and they must have the capacity to conduct themselves at all times with humility and understanding. This is not only a process for serving others; it is a process for serving ourselves, for learning. Here is a story from Ghana. Two CUSO students were married in Ghana, and here is a letter which one of them wrote:

> I'm afraid the only excuse I can offer for this late report is my marriage to fellow CUSO volunteer, John Baigent, and perhaps you'll see from my description just how hectic things have been. We were delighted when Terry Bacon, Third Secretary of the Canadian High Commission, responded by offering to give the reception as his gift.
>
> One thing led to another. Since the wedding reception was out of our hands, we could then afford invitations and we had great fun trying to convince the African printer that we did not want elaborate cards covered with silver bells and cupids. We ended up with a design somewhere between African and Canadian tastes and had a marvellous time sending off 250 invitations—although we knew that 200 of the invited people would be too far away to come. It made us feel a little bit closer to the folks back home anyway.
> No wedding is complete without a cake and once again we had fun with the African baker, convincing him that we were people of very simple tastes and didn't really want bells, cupids, hearts, etc., adorning our cake. The Africans love bright colours, gaudy decorations, etc., and their tradesmen reflect the philosophy that if a little bit is good, then lots is better! But we won—simplicity prevailed.

Mr. Speaker, under the Canadian University Service Overseas, Canada has sent a group of students to a wide number of countries around the world. The Globe and Mail reports some of them wrote back:

> "No matter how much you prepare, you're rocked when you arrive," says Don Millar of Toronto, a 22-year-old history graduate teaching English in Dhampur, Uttar Pradesh.
>
> "The heat and the faces just crowd in upon you", says Martha Nixon, 21, of Montreal, McGill graduate in psychology and anthropology, who is teaching at Balarampur, West Bengal.
> "But the initial impression that our living conditions here were primitive and dirty has already worn off," adds Montrealer Stephen Jasper, 22, another McGill graduate, who is teaching English at Jamal Mohamed college in Tiruchirapalli, Madras State.
>
> "India can be daunting—You're such a drop in a huge bucket, as one student put it—but the 10 young men and nine young women display no lack of enthusiasm, only a measure of humility about how much enthusiasm can accomplish.
> "My greatest fear is that I somehow may not fit into the educational system, won't be able to communicate," says Terry McElroy, 22, of Ottawa, a Queen's University graduate teaching English at Padhampali High School in Orissa province."

There are other programs of service for students. Here is one described in the Ottawa Citizen:

> A group of 180 Canadian university students, 54 of them from Ottawa, will spend part of their summer holiday in the Mexican hinterland trying to improve the lot of the less fortunate. What makes this project a particular challenge is that they have to raise funds to pay the costs of transportation and the bare essentials of living.

Here is another program at present being carried on in Canada by The International Grenfell Association. This information was supplied to me by the hon. Member for St. John's East (Mr. O'Keefe):

> These...are...young men and women who have recently finished what would be equivalent to our high school, and are just prior to entering university. These students come on the coast for various lengths of time, as orderlies, voluntary workers of one type or another. We have medical students who come on a rotational basis the year around, with the largest number coming during the summer months. These students come from various universities in Canada, the United States and England. During the summer months, we have short term volunteer workers from universities of Canada and the U.S.A., mainly, who do volunteer work in our dormitories, hospitals, and community work in various areas.

Then I have information here about Operation Beaver, 1965, a Canadian Ecumenical Council project. There is a whole series of projects listed here by the Student Christian Movement. Here is another group of projects listed by the Vocational Register, Student Christian Movement of Canada. There is a wide variety of voluntary programs, not only for students but at all levels in Canada. The voluntary tradition is an important tradition in Canada, and I believe that a proper challenge to the youth of Canada—not only to the students but to all the youth of Canada—will meet with a most happy response. The British, the French, the Dutch, the Scandinavians, the Australians all have programs of assistance abroad. I have information here about a great number of these. I would like to say just a word about the largest of these, and that is the United States Peace Corps. The then Senator Hubert Humphrey, now Vice President of the United States, in introducing the Peace Corps legislation into the Senate on June 1, 1961, said this:

> The Peace Corps which has been set up under Executive order will cost less than the cost of firing one Atlas missile, even one that does not work. The anticipated first year's budget for the Peace Corps will cost one tenth of 1 per cent of what it will take to put a man on the moon.

For the Peace Corps program the host country credits the Corps with a significant role in its development. Every nation in which the Peace Corps is serving is asking for more volunteers. Additional countries are also asking for Peace Corps participation in upbuilding.

I think it is symptomatic that the Ramon Magsaysay Philippines award which has been considered as one of Asia's prime awards was given to a Peace Corps Director, Sergeant Shriver, on behalf of the Volunteers, who had served in 11 Asian countries by 1962. It was the first time this award has been given to a non-Asian.

There are many types of individuals that the United States Peace Corps invites for participation. It wants physicians, both general practitioners and specialists, registered nurses, licensed practical nurses, health directors, medical technicians, physical technicians, hospital administrators and many others.

There is also a great deal of work for manual labourers in the Peace Corps. Jim McKay volunteered to serve in the Peace Corps and is now working in Lahore, Pakistan, helping to build a hospital. The average bricklayer there lays 225 bricks per day, whereas Jim's average is 750, and his skill is being used to help his Pakistani co-workers improve their own production.

There are important tasks at home which a Canadian corps of service could perform. Certainly the more obvious might be those relating to our Indian and Eskimo populations. There are all types of Group Workers needed in the most advanced and mature urban societies, as well as in the less advantageous urban areas.

We know of the work that is being done through ARDA. There is a demand for young Canadians to serve and assist in the type of work that ARDA is doing. They can do much to help with these important tasks. The frontiers of this country are great and the imagination and challenges which this Government can offer to the youth of Canada I am sure will meet with hearty response.

We hear a great deal about youth, and I was very interested when I found a quotation from Socrates who lived about 2,400 years ago. Socrates said:

> Our youth now loves luxury. They have bad manners and contempt for authority. They show disrespect for their elders and love idle chatter in place of exercise. Children are now tyrants—not the servants of the household. They no longer rise when elders enter the room. They contradict their parents, chatter before company, gobble up their food and tyrannize their teachers.

I believe that both at home and abroad there are great tasks, great challenges and great opportunities for the youth of Canada, which is responding and will continue to respond. I think the Government is to be congratulated for bringing before this Parliament the idea of a Company of Young Canadians to serve both at home and abroad —to give service to others and to serve themselves.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from Sir Rabindranath Tagore, the Indian poet and philosopher, who once said:

Man goes into the noisy crowd to drown the clamour of his own silence.

Canadian youth will go forward into the crowd to find itself and its fulfilment.

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should first like to join with others in congratulating the Mover and Seconder of the Speech from the Throne. Their efforts are all the more commendable because of the vague generalities contained in the Speech. It contains plenty of fancy frosting on the cake, but not much cake to bite into. It contains promises but lacks detail.

I agree with many views expressed by editorial writers and T.V. commentators, that this is a pre-election speech which is not actually intended for full implementation during this session of Parliament. It was meant more for possible vote catching. The date of the coming election is not revealed in the Speech, but the intent is certainly there.

Many speakers have dealt at some length with what the Speech contains, and more particularly with what it does not contain. I should like to refer to three or four items which have not been covered during this debate. One item in the Throne Speech deals with what is described as "comprehensive legislation to reform public regulation of the railways". This really should read "reform of last session's legislation, Bill C-120". This is just another example of the Government being forced to revise ill-considered legislation hastily produced.

We have held some worth-while meetings of the Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines and I am sure the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) has had certain deficiencies of Bill C-120 forcibly drawn to his attention. I should now like to draw his attention to the Sixth National Farm and Business Forum, held in Winnipeg recently under the sponsorship of the Agricultural Bureau of the Winnipeg Chamber of Commerce.

A large number of individuals were in attendance at this conference, all of whom expressed opinions. While I do not intend to outline every opinion expressed, I should like to refer to one or two and place them on record, so that they will come to the attention of the Minister of Transport.

The first statement to which I wish to refer was made by Mr. A. V. Mauro, Q.C., Chairman of the Manitoba Transport Commission. He said that——national policy of rail rationalization was necessary and the primary objective of this should be to enhance the political and economic welfare of the Canadian people.

He then went on to say that——if any rationalization program is proposed for railway systems in the prairie provinces it should be worked out on a basis much wider than merely the solely related formula of railway submission.

Mr. Mauro then stated that——any appointed authority should consider an over-all pattern rather than a simple point to point approach undertaken by rail companies.

• (6:40 p.m.)

Here is another statement, this time by Hon. George Taylor, Minister of Highways for Alberta. He stated five points which I should like to put on the record.

1. That a rationalization authority should be established with full responsibility to deal with rail line abandonment and with power to order the interchange of lines, the seasonal use of lines and the exchange of running rights between two or more railways. It should also have power to deal with costs and revenues before and after and would not be required to deal only with costs and revenues at the time of application.

2. That all authority dealing with the abandonment of rail lines presently in the hands of the Board of Transport Commissioners, be transferred to the rationalization authority.

3. That the rationalization authority be given full power to order the Board of Transport to carry out studies affecting the railways and the results of such studies should be transmitted to the authority without recommendation for a final decision.

4. That the rationalization authority be given full power to deal with governments at all levels, the railways, businesses and all others in the area and region that will be affected by the abandonment of a branch line.

5. The rationalization authority should be required to give extra weight to any item adversely affecting the favourable position of Canadian grain in world markets.

I want to emphasize that last point because I come from a grain producing area where the people are very much interested in the whole railway problem and especially in the problem of rail line abandonment. Mr. E. A. Boden, vice president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, also spoke and he said:

Abandonment of branch lines on the scale sought by the railways will cause major disruption of the grain industry... He said it would mean the removal of 3,453 miles of tracks and 923 country elevators which would cost approximately $60 million to replace.

Again I am emphasizing this because of my interest in the grain producing area from which I come. Mr. Boden continued:

A federal authority concerned with branch line abandonment should have the power to act rather than to just recommend changes.

With respect to the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and other organizations he said:

They hold the view that whatever body is given the responsibility for deciding the fate of rail lines, should have the authority and the ability to examine the broad picture, to look at areas rather than single lines.

An article in the Western Producer summed up the conference and I should like to put part of it on the record:

It was significant that much of the time during the sessions was taken up with wide-ranging discussion of the shortcomings of the now defunct Bill C-120.

I think we can all agree with that because the Government has withdrawn that Bill. Then there is a reference to Mr. Boden to whom I have already referred:

Mr. E. A. Boden, Saskatchewan Wheat Pool second vice president, following a graphic description of the final results of the closure of all branch lines now proposed by the railway companies for abandonment, gave a number of interesting examples of possible rationalization. These included situations in which there could be line sharing and interchange of running rights, the bridging of existing gaps so that routes of access to main lines could be shortened, and other devices which appear perfectly feasible and desirable. It was interesting to note that no railway representative at the meeting offered critcism of Mr. Boden's proposals.

There is one other aspect of the railway problem to which I wish to refer briefly. It concerns reports of the curtailment of passenger services, particularly by the Canadian Pacific Railway. In this connection I wish to put on the record a resolution passed at the annual meeting of the Saskatchewan Urban Municipalities Association in Regina on April 2 last. It reads as follows:

Whereas the C.P.R. has been granted land, mineral and tax concessions in the early days of its operation, and

Whereas an expanding population and economy requires a comprehensive transportation system for such growth, and

Whereas the C.P.R. has shown a disregard for the public interest and intends to discontinue passenger rail service even though the C.N.R. has increased passenger rail service profit by some 19 per cent,

Be it resolved that this assembly go on record as insisting upon the consideration of public interest before any further discontinuance of C.P.R. passenger train service is allowed, and

Be it further resolved that no additional curtailment of existing passenger service be allowed by the Board of Transport until a full inquiry is held by the Federal Government to determine whether the public is able to obtain space on present facilities.

[Mr. Pascoe.]

Many in my riding are not convinced that the C.P.R. is making every possible effort to improve passenger traffic and they think the company should make this extra effort. Apparently Canadian National Railways has met with considerable success in its campaign to interest more people in travelling by rail. I would refer to the annual report of the C.N.R. just received where on page 9 there is this notation in regard to passenger services:

Sales. The number of passengers carried by C.N. increased in 1964 by 14.0 per cent over 1963 and passenger service revenues were 16.7 per cent higher. The red, white and blue fare plan, to which is credited much of the increase in passenger sales, was extended throughout the system during 1964 and this and other passenger sales projects were intensively advertised and promoted in various ways.

I read this as a challenge to the C.P.R. also to go out after passenger traffic, and I am quite sure they would be able to get it. I know we are trying to finish tonight, Mr. Speaker, and I do not want to take too much time but there is one more point to which I should like to refer because I am quite concerned about this matter. As I said before, I come from a wheat producing area. Early in the Speech from the Throne there appears this reference:

My Government is resolved that Canada shall make the fullest contribution it can to the lessening of international tensions, including the provision of practical assistance to developing countries.

I suggest that one way to extend practical assistance to developing countries is to provide greater help with regard to their food problems. I know that this Government and the previous Government have participated in the world food program under F.A.O. I believe we are the third largest contributor to this program under which distributions of skim milk, cheese, butter oil, dried fish, flour and oats have been made to 15 countries mostly in Asia and Africa. This particular food aid project was started in January, 1963 by the Diefenbaker Government. It seems to me that Canada could do much more to meet the food needs of underdeveloped countries. I am thinking particularly of our great stocks of wheat that are again beginning to pile up, despite the brave words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp). There are problems in regard to our commercial wheat markets, but a more extensive food aid program of wheat and wheat flour should not interfere with our regular markets. It would certainly help the developing countries. Previous gifts of wheat and wheat flour brought the first taste of bread to millions who now welcome bread as a staple diet. Canada should do more to satisfy this demand.

• (6:50 p.m.)

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, this is a good time to take issue, as I have done in this House on previous occasions, with those who advocate diets that do not include bread. Some of these advocates of no-bread meals are in this Parliament. I have a copy of such a diet here and the chart says that you must not eat bread or anything containing starch or flour. This is a diet to which I take very strong exception, Mr. Speaker. I cannot put it in better words than I find in this particular farm journal, and I quote:

> Diet fads may easily do harm which can never be erased, as can posture fads, high heel fads, and any number of others. In food, fads have again and again thrown nutrition out of balance in a shocking proportion of the population. Bread and potatoes, the most common starch suppliers, have been repeatedly cast in the villain's role....
> None of these foods is either villain or hero on its own. In a balanced diet each can and does play an excellent part. It is the silliness of fadism which gets them all out of proportion in human eating habits.

I have a news item here, Mr. Speaker, which may explain the no-bread diet of some of our friends. The article is headed "Soft Life Reduces Wheat Consumption". I quote:

> A higher income is associated with the "soft life" and a minimum of physical exercise—desk work, driving instead of walking to the neighbourhood store, and hiring someone to do the odd jobs around the house. As a result, the need for high-caloric foods is reduced.
> A bigger pay cheque also allows a family to indulge to a greater degree in the more expensive food items, thus creating a larger demand for meats and fruits at the expense of low priced items such as bread.

I am trying, as I said, to contradict this no-bread diet, and I think in the interests of good health I should. I should like to refer briefly to the suggestions of the nutrition division of the Department of National Health and Welfare. Here, I have "Canada's Food Guide," indicating the foods to eat every day, and bread and cereals are certainly very much played up. Then, there is another copy of "Canada's Food Guide", and it advocates bread and cereals very day for good health. This pamphlet is from the Health League of Canada and is headed "Every Week is Health Week." I have quoted this before and it advocates at least four slices of bread a day.

These are just a few items relating to the health qualities of bread, Mr. Speaker. I should like to refer briefly to an article concerning foods and nutrition in Japan and India. I quote:

> Long ago Japan realized the nutritional dangers of using rice to the exclusion of other foods and the advantage of using wheat and other cereal products as well as rice in their diet.

Then, with regard to India, the article says:

> Although India is considered to be a rice eating country, half the population look on wheat as part of their staple diet.

I should like to quote an article from "Grain Market Features":

> Speaking in London recently, Sir Charles Dodds, one of the world's acknowledged leaders in the field of nutrition referred to...the food value of cereals and the fact that cereals would go farther and were capable of contributing more to the maintenance of human life, more economically, than any other food product...
> He added that experience over the centuries had shown that life could be maintained adequately on bread alone, and if this was supplemented by vegetables and possibly small quantities of dairy products a high standard of nutrition could be maintained.

In concluding my argument with regard to bread I should like to quote this article from the Family Herald:

> Canadian consumption of bread has tended to fall on a per capita basis as our standard of living has risen. Yet it would be a sorry day if flour ever became too much taken for granted by Canadians. With our enormous wheatlands, we are the custodians of perhaps the most important food crop the white man has ever known.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, I am from a bread eating area of Canada, the Prairies. My diet consists of at least four slices of bread daily. I do not believe I am too much overweight, and I am in good health. The young women of the Prairies eat bread and they are slim and attractive. They raise fine families of healthy bread-eaters. I am sure their measurements would compare with those who are skimping on bread. I had some exhibits in the gallery a short time ago, but unfortunately they have gone.

I have one more small item to which I should like to refer with regard to the Speech from the Throne. Actually, reference was made to it by the hon. Member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) yesterday. He referred to the big problem in that area of the very large stocks of damp wheat. I should like to draw to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays), who is in charge of the Board of Grain Commissioners, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp), who is in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, the fact that in my city of Moose Jaw there is a large Canadian Government elevator equipped with the finest and most modern facilities for drying grain. It is not being used at this moment. I suggest to these Ministers that they look into the situation carefully. I think at very little expense they could move that wheat to this elevator at Moose Jaw, dry it and sell it at a much better price, a price which would cover the cost of drying.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): It is a pleasure, Mr. Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif) to see you in the Chair. I know your reputation for never missing votes, and it is nice to see that has been recognized by giving you this higher responsibility. In connection with votes, I want to say that of all the votes that have taken place here in the last few years, the one I regret most missing was the one last Friday on the main motion of non-confidence. I regret missing it because I believe completely in the indictment that condemned this Government particularly for carelessness, indifference and neglect of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) in refusing to take action to eradicate wrongdoing in high and low places under Federal responsibility, and restore public confidence in the honesty and integrity of the Government.

The question that still remains in my mind, despite the vote I was not here to take part in, really centres on the fact that I cannot believe the story that we have had in connection with a number of items, particularly in relation to the Prime Minister's conduct and the conduct of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) in the whole matter relating to the Rivard inquiry.

One of the things that most concerns me is the uneven, one might almost call it the random justice which the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) seems to be so proud of. In his speech during this debate he thundered out how quickly he acted in connection with his Parliamentary Secretary. He acted very quickly with his Parliamentary Secretary, yet nothing has been proven against his Parliamentary Secretary. He acted very quickly with the Minister without Portfolio, and nothing has been yet proven against the Minister without Portfolio. He gave us no explanation of his actions in either case, other than it is quite obvious he thinks he has proven his ability to react in such a situation by the abrupt dismissal he has given those two men.

I have no brief for them, but I am very much bothered by the fact that the Prime Minister will make a virtue out of a curt dismissal like that of two of his advisers and yet, at the same time, have a completely different attitude to other people and other Ministers, for example the Minister of Justice, for example the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the matter of the Onofrio Mainaudo case, for example the gentlemen with their furniture. All that seems to be fine.

We have the situation that the hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) referred to, that the postal employees in this country are up in arms and enraged because they feel they have been slurred by the minister they have been given as a result of the minor shake-up coming out of these scandals. I was interested this afternoon in hearing one of the Government supporters giving the hon. Member for Yukon the devil for his tactics in raising these things, especially the serious question that brought about the Dorion Inquiry.

What do my friends on the Government side think the situation would have been if the Government had been in a comfortable majority? Do you think we would have had the terms of the Dorion Inquiry altered? Do you think we would not have been shut off completely? We certainly would. It is only as the result of vigilance—and I give a great deal of credit to the hon. Member for Yukon —that we can begin to probe what I think is the most dangerous aspect of this Government, and that is its wishy-washy attitude towards its own integrity.

There is the difference between integrity and performance, or inept performance, and a lot of the ineptitude, the boneheaded plays of the Government do not have any relationship to the whole question I am talking about. They just reflect the general weakness of the Ministry and the Cabinet. I do not know whether we should feel sorry or sympathetic for some of the supporters of the Government, who have to sit behind it and put up with the performance of this Ministry.

One of the points I wanted to make in connection with this whole question of integrity and morality is to say how absurd I think it is that the Minister of Justice has made the kind of defence that he has. I wanted to put on the record—and of course this is in translation—what I consider his corny melodramatic, indefensible kind of reaction to his own stupidity and ineptitude in the performance of his chores. He gave a speech on Friday and this is what he said:

I am proud—and I thank God and my fellow citizens for giving me the opportunity, despite some difficulties and sometimes also, perhaps, the cruelty of politics, especially for a beginner to work on this team, with the group of Liberals which faithfully surround me, for the greatest prosperity and happiness of the Canadian people. And all this under the dynamic leadership of a man who will undoubtedly be remembered in history as one of the great Prime Ministers of our country and certainly also as one of our most genuine Canadian patriots, the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Pearson).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fisher: If anyone can applaud that nonsensical hyperbole, all reason is gone. But my point is that here is a man who talks about the cruelty and the penalty of politics as though he has been absurdly hurt, as though he has been pushed around by the fates and the wicked, vicious and evil politicians who have attacked him.

An hon. Member: Isn't he entitled to defend himself?

Mr. Fisher: Sure he is entitled, but I am getting sick and tired of the kind of people who wrap themselves in the flag of God and the family, and all the rest, when they are under attack. I am sick of the whiners, and the Government Party has one of the greatest collection of whiners I have ever encountered. They cannot get used to the fact that the old establishment game they play is gone, and perhaps forever. We have had the hon. Member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro), the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, whining all over the place—"You know the terrible things, the persecution of politics, with people attacking the Prime Minister." We have got whiners like the hon. Member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald) who is always sort of complaining about anyone who makes any kind of attack against the Government.

Mr. Macdonald: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. Member should mention one specific instance when I have complained about anything he has said about the Government or about me.

Mr. Fisher: What I have said is that he is whining all the time in the House. I rank him as the No. 2 backbench whiner. As a matter of fact I think he is trying to whine his way into the Ministry.

Mr. Macdonald: Mention one instance.

Mr. Fisher: My point in connection with this is that in any kind of politics when there is rough going there is attack and there is counterattack, and the characteristic of this Government and its supporters is: This isn't fair; this isn't decent. Well, I would like to tell some of the newer members opposite that I was here in a Parliament when a very small nucleus of members of their party, and particularly that prince of partisanship, the hon. Member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), unleashed day after day after day, through 1962 and 1963, a kind of attack that has made some of the things the Opposition has done in this Parliament seem pretty pale. Yet that was great, because that was in noble aid of getting the country back on the rails with a wonderful Liberal government.

I would like to suggest to hon. Members that this whining game they indulge in, this complaining about attack, and particularly the kind of whining exemplified by the Minister of Justice, is getting rather sickening.

I would now like to turn to some of the items in the Speech from the Throne and to make some comments on them. The first part of the Speech from the Throne contains the usual guff about the Royal Family and what a wonderful institution the Commonwealth is, and how we are going to make our contributions. One of the points that interested me was the sentence which read:

My Ministers attach great importance to Canada's neighbourly relationship with the United States and to the development of practical, mutually beneficial arrangements within that relationship.

Just last week we had the embarrassing situation of the whole question, in the public press coming out of Washington and New York, as to whether Lyndon Johnson was angry with Lester Pearson: What kind of treatment did Lester Pearson get when he was secluded with President Johnson? Why was President Johnson curt with the newspapermen? Why couldn't there be more newspapermen there?

We had one correspondent, the Globe and Mail correspondent in Washington, coming out with a story that never had a Canadian Prime Minister and a United States President established warmer, better relations. These two fellows hardly knew each other, but they got along better together than blood brothers, even better than the spirit of Hyannis Port and the relationship with the previous President.

• (7:10 p.m.)

I do not know how the Prime Minister gets along with President Johnson. I would hope he gets along well; but it is this promotional aspect that becomes a mockery when it is proven to be not true, this promotional aspect that somehow this particular Prime Minister has the quality that enables him to somehow mesmerize people in the foreign field. I wish he would save some of this mesmerism for the Canadian House of Commons, which seems to be the place where he will have his difficulties.

The point which is given the premier position, I think, in the Speech from the Throne is the reform of the proceedings of this House, which I think is something which the majority of members welcome. Certainly we in this party hope we will be given a strong lead. It is my opinion that the Government and the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), after discussions with party groups, can bring in thorough measures of reform, and if it comes to a vote they can count on the voting support of most hon. Members.

In connection with this I should like to say that, unlike other people, I welcome the step anounced later in the Throne Speech to attach to the office of the Prime Minister a secretariat in connection with this program to attack poverty. It seems to me that this House of Commons has been one of the difficulties in terms of getting a legislative program through in the last five years, and this is where much more concentration should take place. It seems to me that it is now the function of the Prime Minister and that of his office to perform, if you want, a brokerage job in the House of Commons and with the Ministries in order to get things moving. This kind of achievement requires, it seems to me, very drastic changes in our House rules. Our party is on record as supporting a number of reforms which I know are not unique to us. A number of hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Northumberland (Miss Jewett) and the hon. Member for Royal (Mr. Fairweather), have views which are similar to ours.

In elaboration of this question of the Prime Minister's office having a secretariat, I hope that one of the balancing things will be to see that our Committees are given more power or, in effect, a permanent secretariat. If we do give the executive the ability to do a better and more intensive job in relation to a legislative program in particular, rather than an administrative program, it seems to me that the House will have to get its compensations in terms of checks on that kind of power by having stronger and more powerful committees.

[Mr. Fisher.]

The next paragraph in the Speech deals with the question of promoting strength and unity in the Canadian federation. In my view, this is what you might call a "nothing" paragraph, since it takes us into no new suggestions of policy but just carries on the standard Liberal line adopted over the years. I read their first platform put out in 1894, I think it was, and it talked about national unity, how great it was, and how the Liberal Party was the vehicle for its expression. We are still getting the same kind of platitudes and I suppose it is as shopworn now as it was in 1917, or 1935, or whatever the case may be.

We also have a reference to amending the Constitution. The only comment I make here is, in a sense, a prediction. I would like to predict that we will not get the opportunity in this session to deal with the Constitution. I will predict that on the basis that Mr. Lesage, the Premier of Quebec, will lose his nerve.

Mr. Winkler: And his seat.

Mr. Fisher: Maybe his seat. But the Premier of Quebec will call off the Federal Government, and I can already see why. As far as I am concerned this is one of the least significant items, if it is a positive one, in the speech, because I do not believe that it will go through in this Session of Parliament.

The next paragraph does refer to amending the constitution, and I assume that if that were split off with the other aspect of it, it would have a fairly easy passage and receive general approval.

The next paragraph is:

> You will be asked to authorize my government to provide that "O Canada" shall be the national anthem of Canada and that "God Save the Queen" shall be recognized as the royal anthem in Canada.

This is a subject which is in accord with the majority of Members drawn from all parties. I find it a logical follow-up to the flag achievement, which in my opinion is the greatest achievement the present Prime Minister has made. Even though my party was certainly critical of the way it was introduced I think the majority of us, although I am speaking for myself, felt that in many ways at least the persistence and leadership given did give us something which I personally take a great deal of pride in; and I think an increasing pride on the part of my constituents is being taken in our new flag.

The next paragraphs refer to economic growth, and we get into this poverty business. There have been a number of snide remarks about the copy-cat aspect of this particular program, particularly relating to the United States scene. I have read practically everything the present Prime Minister has written and I do not think I am giving away any secrets when I say that he is not a man of ideas. He does have an eclectic approach to things. In a sense, he is a packrat who picks things up where they are. There is nothing wrong with this. It seems to me that if we had to wait for the virtue of a completely new idea we would be lost and would never get anywhere. I would agree with the hon. Member for York South (Mr. Gelber), who made this point.

What bothers many of us is that, like so many of the previous ideas, it borrows a kind of marketeering aspect from the United States. In other words, it was a good gimmick there in the political sense, so the Government say they will transfer it here. I think back to the truth squad, that noble effort headed by the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh), which again was a copy of an American device. It is this very matter of phrasing which is more bothersome, rather than trying to achieve the same goals President Johnson is trying to achieve with his war on poverty.

Another item in this part of the speech which intrigues me is the Government Area Development Program, which has already been of substantial assistance to industrial expansion in areas of high employment. This program is going to be extended. I should like to suggest that we created a new Department a couple of years ago, the Department of Industry, and whatever its achievements in connection with the automobile industry have been, its greatest failure has been in area development. We have the greatest collection of high priced, able civil servants, as far as I am concerned, sitting in a void with regard to area development.

I represent one of the great undeveloped areas in this country which is definitely an economic region and considered so by the Province of Ontario, but they have not even listened to us. I have a letter here addressed to the Minister from the Northwestern Ontario Development Association dated April 9, 1965. This letter welcomes the statement on area development, and in the context you will see that 15 months ago the Minister replied to their representations, in effect giving them the brush-off by saying that perhaps in a couple of months the Government will do something. I know many Members in this House, particularly on the Government side, are fed up with this policy, this attitude of delayed indifference to area development. As far as I am concerned I welcome this paragraph, but I am wondering how we are going to get it, given the foot dragging and indifference and lack of idealism of the present Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury). It does not make sense to me.

I suggest that one of the things which needs to be done—and I hope some hon. Members over there will withhold their applause for a moment—is to get a new, idealistic, driving Minister of Industry into the Cabinet, which will be necessary if we are going to have a real area development program.

I should now like to refer to measures to assist the re-employment of workers displaced by automation, and the question of workers moving to new jobs. I have enough experience—I suppose this is the case with almost every Member with a large Unemployment Insurance Commission office in his area—to know that the greatest weakness of our unemployment service and our National Employment Service is the fact that the majority of Canadians do not understand them.

• (7:20 p.m.)

There was a survey carried out by the Ontario Economic Survey Council, which was recently published, with regard to unemployment in our area. We discovered that less than 15 per cent of the people who were unemployed or were recently unemployed were really informed about the opportunities open to them under existing legislation. One of the difficulties is that the legislation is so complicated and so lacking in interrelation that the people who administer it are never very constructive in its use. I certainly welcome this particular intention and I only wish we would get a clear outline from the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen) with regard to it.

I do not take seriously this little spat he had with the Economic Council of Canada. After all, he was just defending his senior Ministers whose wisdom, I suppose, was called in question by the Economic Council's criticism of the manpower policy. But I can give all kinds of examples to demonstrate that this manpower policy is crazy. The railway run-through situation is one, where we had a wildcat strike and 2,800 men walking off the job, and a special inquiry had to be conducted. A development in that situation was that the Minister of Labour was advised, or knew, that trouble was coming and he did not even have enough power or initiative to stop the Acting Minister of Transport from letting the railway go ahead with this unilateral action that was bound to lead to trouble. We did not even find any use then for the Manpower Consultative Service and as a consequence we had, in effect, a strike, we have had a long, expensive inquiry; and the actions, it seems to me, of the railway and the Ministry at that time are just indefensible in the light of what has appeared before that inquiry. I argue that as another point to indicate that we really need something in the area set out in this paragraph.

We are going to be given a fund for rural development and closer integration of ARDA. Again I welcome this. But one of the things we find in Ontario—and this is no discredit to Herbert Crown, who is the Ontario head of ARDA—is that we are not able to get a quick response and citizens are not able to get a quick response that gives them any leadership from the Federal Government in this matter of ARDA. I know that the response often is—it is from the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé)—that the Province has to take the initiative. I am sick of programs where the Province has to take the initiative and where the Federal Government has not enough leadership to get in and determine where projects can be started and worked on. I am sick of the fact that in ARDA you have this peculiar relationship of Municipalities, the Provincial Government and the Federal Government, with the Federal Government unable to give a very strong lead. I would hope that for an effective ARDA program this is remedied. This is why I will live in some hopes with regard to that paragraph.

Next, we are going to have this Company of Young Canadians. I suppose the first famous company in Canada was the Company of Good Cheer; the next one was the Hudson's Bay Company, often referred to as "Your Company". I think the idea of the use of the word "Company" has a certain amount of Canadian tradition behind it. I don't know whether it will develop into very much. I think the potential is here amongst our youth. I think all of them are looking forward to the opportunity of travel and getting out of the country. I think we should have a Company of Youth working on Canadian projects within the domestic framework. I think that a year in some kind of work within Canada should almost be a basic requirement before anyone in a Company of Canadian Youth has the opportunity to represent us and work for us abroad. It seems to me this could be a very imaginative program. I look forward to seeing what kind of statute arrangement it has, particularly with regard to who is the leader.

I have heard that one of the hon. Members from Quebec, the hon. Member for Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie (Mr. Watson), has been very instrumental in pushing this program, and I would like to give him credit for it; because if, as I have been informed, he is in a sense largely instrumental for getting the idea in front of the Government, he deserves credit for his persistence, because he suffers under the disabilities of not having been here very long and also being very young—and I know they are sometimes qualities that do not help when you are trying to impress the Ministry.

The next item that I find of interest, and which our Party thoroughly welcomes—particularly because the Prime Minister gave an elaboration of it in his speech—is this question of filling in the welfare assistance program in this country.

The next item is related to the Special Committee on Food and Drugs. It does not seem to me it is anything we are either going to get excited about, since it has already been in progress, or we are going to get discouraged about, because it is unlikely to come up with anything either very exciting or constructive.

The next section deals with farming. I was interested to hear the speech of our absentee landlord, or whom I might call, referring back to one of my earlier comments, the absentee whiner. I have never heard a man who spends less time in Parliament and yet can go outside of it and whine more about it than the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays). He shows a facility when he is speaking in his own vernacular that I cannot help but admire. I only wish he could read as well when he gets into the House on those rare occasions when we see him.

The item I find most promising is this question of the Immigration Act and immigration policy. I have been finding that promising for the last eight years, ever since I came here. Every Minister is going to do something about it. I only say to my colleague the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai), who is working as a Parliamentary Secretary, that I know he has some ideas that could do something and I would just like to tell him, with all due respect, that I hope at last this is the Session that some of those ideas bear fruit, because I think many of us are getting very suspicious of this failure to conform. I know that the hon. Member knows, as I do, that the procedures and attitudes are in many cases inadequate. One of the points I notice here—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. gentleman that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Some hon. Members: No.

• (7:30 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (St. Ann): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of my remarks I wish to challenge the remarks of the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) who, during the first ten minutes of his speech, endeavoured to reactivate and rehash all the supposed scandals which were blamed on the present administration. I think this is merely a storm in a teapot. I will soon start reading the book entitled "Douglas in Saskatchewan." I am told that it is better than "The Renegade in Power" written by Paul Newman. I am anxious to read it because it seems to be very interesting. I cannot pursue the same line as the hon. member for Port Arthur who tried to demolish the Speech from the Throne. Knowing him as we do, we could hardly expect him to congratulate the present government.

May I now add my congratulations to those addressed by the previous speakers to the mover (Mr. Cashin) and the seconder (Mr. Chrétien) of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne for the brilliant and eloquent way they discharged their functions.

We already knew that they were gifted; we were convinced that they would do their duty honourably. Their constituents must be proud to have elected men of that caliber to represent them in the house.

Most newspapers, Mr. Speaker, are practically unanimous in stating in big type that this speech from the throne is one of the most comprehensive ever presented by a government. It is true that it deals with all sectors of national activity.

Special mention is made in this speech of international and domestic matters, in the economic and industrial as well as social fields. Every field is mentioned, which prompt certain members of the opposition to suggest it is an electoral manifesto. Whether it is or not, one fact remains: the government is ready and willing, after due consideration, to submit to this house the legislation required to improve living conditions in all fields. It is a frontal attack on all problems facing the Canadian citizens and what pleases me most, it is a war on poverty that the government is determined to launch. On the whole, about 30 different items are put forward in this speech.

Mr. Speaker, I am happy to belong to a team which gives the people of Canada a government which is concerned with the welfare of its citizens, which has the courage to face all the problems which Canadians, young and old, have to face.

In the course of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I intend to comment on only two or three of the main items in this impressive speech.

One of the proposed measures deals with the need to reform the procedure of the House of Commons so that the legislative work can be done more quickly. We all know in what atmosphere this house has worked over the last 12 months and, personally, I am not proud of it.

In spite of the foul punches it got and the obstruction and delaying tactics it had to put up with during the last session of parliament, the government did more for the advancement of Canada than any of its predecessors did for a good many years.

Very often during the last session, long and useless speeches were made for the deliberate purpose of impeding the proper functioning of this house. For the past several months, in talks on the radio during the program "Report from parliament hill", I have advocated a change in our rules which is called for now more than ever. One thing which proves it clearly is that everyone has heard certain members of the opposition state, when they were asked about their impressions on the speech from the throne, that parliament now has worked for two years to come.

The government has certainly work for two years to come if things go the way they did during last session. I would not perhaps say two years but more; this is why we should amend our rules.

A maximum of eight days is now provided for the throne speech debate and a maximum of six days for the budget debate. Why could the same time limit not be set for the discussion of other government legislation? I am in favour of freedom of speech, but freedom of speech of certain persons or groups must not interfere with the freedom of action of the government.

A government is elected with the assent and consent of the people. The people who elect all members of the house have no use for dull speeches which do nothing to improve legislation. What Canadians want is serious work, painstaking so that all may benefit by the legislation which the members of the house are called upon to vote. If the present government proposes legislation that is not in the interests of the population, it will be up to the people, at the next election, to express their views on the laws already voted and on the measures the government will have brought before the house. In other words, I eagerly hope, Mr. Speaker, that, upon our return from the Easter recess, the question of procedural changes will be brought before the house.

One of the major concerns of the Prime Minister and the members of his party, is national unity. All the actions of the government during the last two years prove it. In the speech from the throne we find that same interest for unity which, in spite of the opposition of some people, and some groups, will shine brightly and forever.

As soon as this government was elected to office, after the election of April 1963, there was a sigh of relief in anticipation of the future, of happier days compared to those we had lived through in the recent past.

In fact, everyone can notice—even those who do not support the government, those who, for the last two years, have been criticizing, rightly or wrongly, any legislation proposed by the government—an expansion of trade, an increase in salaries, an increase in our exports, which is but the beginning. It is said that figures do not lie; let those who are prompted to criticize look at those figures. They will see for themselves a substantial increase in all areas.

Mr. Speaker, another matter which is of great concern to me is unemployment. Although unemployment is at its lowest level for years, the government does not think that the problem is solved by any means. We know that the percentage is still too high. That is why the government is taking steps to remedy the situation; it shows its willingness to take action in order to reduce the number of unemployed. Unemployment is now at its lowest level since 1957.

In the field of industry, there has been new expansion for the last two years. The forecasts are to the effect that 1965 will be one of the better years yet.

[Mr. Loiselle.]

• (7:40 p.m.)

As far as old age security is concerned, the situation has improved. I admit that it could be better than it is now, but in any field progress must be gradual. "In order to give with one hand, one must have something in the other".

Even if in the last two years of the administration of the business of the country, progress and a better social security have been achieved, even if all spheres of our Canadian society have known, for the last two years, a better lot, this government, aware of its responsibilities, admits in its speech from the throne that there is much to do. Here I would like to quote a paragraph to that effect:

> Our country is achieving a higher rate of economic growth. Trade is expanding. With growing industrialization, Canadians are enjoying rapidly increasing employment opportunities; incomes and living standards are rising; the number of people out of work has been reduced to lower levels than for many years.
> All the great potentialities of our economy are not, however, being realized. The talents of some of our people are wasted because of poverty, illness, inadequate education and training, inequality in opportunities for work. To combat these problems, to improve the opportunities of people who are now at a disadvantage, is to put new power into economic expansion and to enhance the unity of our country.

Some have criticized those who express an awareness for those problems still facing our country, but I do not see anything wrong with the admission that, despite our many achievements, there is still much to do in order to provide better living conditions for one and all and not only for a part of our society. It is a recognized fact that a part of the population has much difficulty in finding work necessary to meet their needs, due to automation and their lack of training to adapt to our modern industries.

Being the representative of a working class district, one of the oldest wards of Montreal, I am aware of the difficulty workers experience in finding employment. I welcome the proposals announced in the speech from the throne to correct this situation. I hope that all my hon. friends, being aware of the seriousness of this problem, will support this legislation which will tend to the welfare of the working class.

The worst tragedy for the head of a family is to lose his job or to be unemployed; this prevents him from providing for the needs of his family and he suffers even more when he is forced to refuse to his children certain amenities which their friends have. Knowing the problem and its effects on society, I welcome the action of the government which is determined to tackle this matter. It is a fact that, rightly or wrongly, too many people do not realize why they are unemployed. They expect that the higher level of government will provide them with the job they want. There must be co-ordination between the municipal, provincial and federal administrations and also suggestions of reforms by large and small businesses to correct the social evil of unemployment.

These last few years, the winter works subsidized by the federal government have contributed to reduce the number of jobless in winter. It is the duty of every administration, whatever its level, to provide for the future of our workers. At present, unemployment strikes those who have not enough education or no trade, the so-called labourers.

The city of Montreal is going through a period of fantastic development in the field of building, road and subway construction and the preparations for the 1967 world fair. In spite of all that activity, the unemployed who do not have the necessary training to adapt themselves to modern equipment cannot find work to provide for their needs, for their own welfare and that of their families. Consequently, I am happy to foresee better times for all those who will benefit from the action the government intends to take in that respect.

In another field, Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne states that the government will give special consideration to the problem of urban renewal in several communities.

I have always been concerned with that and, during the very first session I had the pleasure and the honour of representing my constituents here, I considered it my duty to call it to the attention of the government then in power. On several instances, both here and at the municipal council of the city of Montreal, I mentioned that question which is of vital importance for the people of my riding. As a Montreal alderman, I sat on the committee which prepared and realized the only low rental housing project in the province of Quebec and which was carried out in Montreal under the name of "Habitations Jeanne-Mance".

On many occasions, I stated publicly my regret that no other such project has been executed since. All those who are familiar with Montreal know that the administration must face that problem. Renewal projects should be carried out in several parts of the city, and I could add especially in my riding. As I said previously, the problem of urban renewal in Montreal is of such scope that to make a complete job of it, that is to expropriate, demolish and rebuild, it must be tackled on a 20 to 40 year basis, at great expense to the city.

I now raise the problem of urban renewal in Montreal, knowing that the minister responsible for C.M.H.C. is fully aware of it. He even held discussions with the Quebec minister of municipal affairs and with the municipal authorities on the subject. The town planning division of the city of Montreal, composed of competent men, has been making thorough studies for more than a year to promote the type of renewal most appropriate to the present needs of Montreal.

This renewal program now proposed by the city council has been known for some time, but it has some special characteristics, in that it does not comply with all the beneficial provisions of the C.M.H.C. legislation. Therefore, I intend to submit this problem to the House in order to suggest amendments to that legislation so that this program might be carried out.

The renewal program suggested now by the administration is brand new and it is, I think, the only one to have ever been proposed by the municipal government of any city in North America. What allows me to bring this problem to the attention of the house is the fact that the area now designated for renewal is located in the municipal district I represent at City Hall; besides, the major part of that area lies in my federal riding and that of my colleague from St. Henry (Mr. Lessard). This pilot area covers 265 acres; it has been called "Petite Bourgogne". After all the necessary inquiries and studies required under the C.M.H.C. legislation, it has now been recognized as a renewal area by that corporation and by the Quebec minister of municipal affairs.

It is of the utmost importance that some amendments be made to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act to encourage the renewal which is so badly needed in Montreal and to ensure at the same time the welfare of all those families who live in the said district. An agreement has already been reached by the corporation's office and the municipal administration, and the city has already taken advantage of the act to set up in that area two new recreation parks.

Unfortunately, with the passing of time and due to circumstances, that 265-acre residential section had only one very small park which will be expanded, and the creation of two new parks in that area augurs well.

I rejoice also at the fact that the amendments made to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act last session made possible the beginning of that renewal project called "Petite Bourgogne".

• (7:50 p.m.)

Everything leads to the belief that, very soon, the government of the province of Quebec will establish within the municipal commission a department which will be responsible, as in other provinces, for promoting urban renewal in municipalities and towns of the "belle province". Such department will be able to offer to the municipalities and towns willing to avail themselves of the benefits of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act the co-operation and the financial contributions of the government of the province, which are essential to the success of any program of urban renewal.

Such renewal program, presently put forward in the city of Montreal, will be for the province of Quebec a prelude to improvements for several municipalities interested in this matter and, especially with the help of the government of the province, other similar programs will very soon be implemented in several areas.

I would like to give some particulars about the area picked out for renewal, in Montreal, which will indicate the importance and the need to act, and to act quickly.

For instance, it has been found after a survey had been made in the area chosen, that 84 buildings had been built prior to 1874. The whole range follows: Between 1875 and 1884, 347 buildings; between 1885 and 1894, 430; and among the most recent constructions, 16 were erected between 1935 and 1944; 35, between 1945 and 1954; and 20, between 1955 and 1964.

Out of a total of 1,495 buildings, in this area, 1,281 had been erected prior to 1914. Needless to say that these buildings no longer meet today's requirements. This proves immediately the urgent need to renew this area and, also, an urgent need for provincial and federal assistance.

Even with such assistance from higher level governments, the city is assuming a heavy burden for the municipal budget. The magnitude of the additional charges imposed on the Montreal taxpayers are an added responsibility.

The alarming aspect of the situation, which creates an urgent necessity, is the fact that for the last 20 years, the resident population of that district has been decreasing from year to year. The area to be renovated is only a few steps from down town and it will become one of the best residential sites for those who want to take up residence there. I am therefore pleased to note in the speech from the throne that special attention will be paid to the renewal of the blighted and congested areas, which will promote the welfare of the residents.

Finally, the object of urban renewal in that 265-acre area can be carried out in seven stages: 1. Redevelopment of some small islands; 2. Demolition and reconstruction of some buildings on various small islands; 3. Restoration of houses which may be economically repaired; 4. Application of measures for the preservation of buildings in good condition; 5. Low rent housing; 6. Necessary adjustments to the infrastructure of the area; 7. Adequate collective equipment.

All this cannot be paid for by the taxpayers of beautiful Montreal without federal and provincial government assistance.

Needless to continue to prove that such renewal is necessary; it is a moral obligation and, in this connection, I should like to make the following suggestions to the minister responsible for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, so that this renewal be carried out expeditiously without neglecting renewal of other areas where it is equally warranted.

It would be advisable, in the future, in order to speed consideration of each new area so that it may be approved by both the department of municipal affairs of Quebec and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, that the Montreal district office, responsible to the corporation, be empowered to approve a definite area, after having summarily examined the site, without waiting, as the act requires today, for every examination reports to be submitted. This would help speed up renewal of future areas. Furthermore, the act should be amended to favour such renewal: 1. By accepting the principle of grants for renewal purposes; 2. —grants for demolition and rebuilding; 3.—grants for rents.

In the latter case, it is a monthly grant intended to make up for the rent, the value of which would be determined by the difference between the rental value roll of the city of Montreal and the rent an individual may pay according to his income.

When considering the high cost of urban renewal, we should also take into account that price is no object when the welfare of almost half the population, the normal development of family life and liberty of community life are involved.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, may I touch lightly on the project for a harbour station in the city of Montreal.

When the main estimates were tabled recently by the Minister of Finance, an amount of $1 million was provided for the construction of a harbour station in Montreal. This need has existed for several years. At the present time, passengers have to embark and disembark by going through sheds that are being used as warehouses. Such a thing is inconceivable, especially when it happens in this country's metropolis. The building of a harbour station in Montreal is urgent; we have heard about it for years and now we have almost reached the goal.

I should like, at this stage, to emphasize certain facts which would favour the building of this harbour station at the lower end or in the vicinity of McGill street. Other places have often been mentioned, but I do not think there would be a more appropriate place than the southwestern part of Montreal, namely on the western side of the harbour; it would be the ideal place, a short distance from the centre of the city, from hotels, department stores, railway stations, the entrance to the world fair or from the approach to the bridges giving access to all the main highways in the province.

I have in the past made representations to the proper authorities, and I wish to state that I hope to see that harbour station erected in the southwestern area of the city of Montreal which is in every way an ideal location.

I trust that in the very near future the Government, through the Department of Transport, will announce the site selected for the construction of that station.

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, I hope that all the members of the house, as representatives of the people, will promote their welfare by supporting all the measures proposed in the throne speech, in order that all Canadian citizens may be happy and proud to live in that beautiful and great country of ours.

Mr. Robert Beaulé (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, if the house is ready for the question, I will be pleased to co-operate.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Beaulé: As we have not reached unanimity, I will make a few remarks on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

As usual, I associate myself with those who preceded me in congratulating the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) and the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien) for the way in which they carried out their task.

• (8:00 p.m.)

We read the speech from the throne very closely and several members, especially on the government side, seem very pleased with it.

The people are wondering if we are not slowly moving toward socialism with all the measures proposed in the speech from the throne.

As stated in that speech, the provinces will be called upon to approve an address to the Queen to allow for the amending of the constitution in Canada. That constitution was written a hundred years ago by people who were not Canadians, adopted by others who were not Canadians, kept by others who are not Canadians; as a nation, we have reached maturity and are able to shoulder our responsibilities. Why not leave that constitution where it is and write a new one taking into account the needs and aspirations of Canadians and remembering the two nations that built Canada.

I need not list all the points which, in our opinion, should be included in the constitution, because in my speech on the supplementary estimates during the last session, I dealt with those four points. Besides, our leader set them forth very effectively in his speech.

We learn in the speech from the throne that the government intends to set up a federal public welfare program. At the end of last session, the house passed Bill No. C-142 enabling the provinces to opt out from joint programs.

This legislation has been enacted only a few days ago, and the government has already decided to intrude in the provincial field and, what is more, this time under the pretext of helping the poor. Once again, the federal government is undermining provincial autonomy. Every attempt is being made to violate the constitution.

On many occasions we took a firm stand against the federal government when it interfered in provincial fields and we intend to keep on doing just that this session.

If we want a strong Canada, a united Canada, a prosperous Canada, if we want to create a climate of unity in Canada, the federal government must stop infringing upon provincial jurisdictions; only then will we be able to say that a giant step has been taken toward unity.

Another item which caught my attention and that of all hon. members, is the one advocating war on poverty.

It is very difficult to understand how the Prime Minister will be able to declare war on poverty when the Premier of Quebec decides to fight to add new burdens to family budgets, particularly those of the Quebec workers.

How do you want to fight poverty with a premier, as in the province of Quebec, who levies taxes at will? Who is going to be affected the most by that new taxation other than the labour class?

In Ottawa, they have finally realized that there are, in Canada, some poor and destitute people. The government has just realized that action was necessary to fight hardship in Canada. While here in Ottawa they are getting ready to introduce legislation to cope with that ticklish problem—and we are anxious to know what kind of legislation the house will be called upon to discuss and vote—the Quebec premier, has not yet realized that there is hardship in Canada and also in his province.

In his ivory tower and in his jet plane, his head in the clouds, he drops a bomb filled with taxes on the province of Quebec.

If that is what we mean by fighting poverty and hardship; if that is what we mean by helping the little people and commiserating with the poor, then I am wondering if we are not laughing hypocritically at the people.

If the government really wishes to fight unemployment and poverty, it must enact spectacular measures, proclaim a broad public works program, reduce income tax, increase family allowances in keeping with the rise in the cost of living, increase veterans' allowances, raise the basic exemptions of individuals and grant a pre-salary to students.

Mr. Speaker, such spectacular measures would give a great impetus to the Canadian economy and increase our purchasing power.

Why wait until another war breaks out? We are asking the government to do in peacetime what it can do in wartime to the advantage of the Canadian people.

[Mr. Beaulé.]

The first report of the economic council of Canada was published a few weeks ago. It is an important survey of the Canadian economy and I do hope that it will not rot on the dusty shelves but that the government, the labouring classes and the business men will go through it and take appropriate measures.

In this report, the council is endeavouring to determine objectives and practical purposes for Canadians so as to secure, as much as possible, full employment, a fast rate of economic growth, price stabilization, to bring the balance of payments back to normal and to provide for a fair distribution of revenues. The thing to do is not to concentrate on one of those objectives, but to make all the necessary efforts in order to reach them all.

It is essential, I think, to secure a balanced development of the economy.

We have here in Canada specific problems that are not to be found elsewhere. For instance, in the field of labour we record a larger increase than any other industrialized country.

If the government wants to prevent the rise of unemployment above 3 per cent, it should endeavour to create 1,500,000 new jobs by 1970. To reach that goal, the Canadian economy will have to expand quickly and tremendously.

Another point contained in the brief, which is not the least, is the tax problem. If we reach our objectives, obviously, government expenditures will increase.

But the Canadian economy should expand more rapidly than government expenditures and, in this way, bring about a rapid and considerable increase in income, which would give the government the long awaited opportunity to alleviate the burden of taxes while spurring on the economy of the country.

This report from the council is not a planning report but one in which it is trying to place the facts in their true perspective. I hope the government will duly consider this report.

I will now deal briefly with our relations with foreign countries.

What action will the government take regarding economic and cultural pressure exercised by the United States which we have heard so much about? It is high time we thought about it and prepare a plan of action. Is it necessary or desirable, in present circumstances, to divorce completely and drastically our economy from that of the United States? Is it possible? Have we the necessary determination, courage and understanding to take decisions in this matter and abide by them?

What about our relations with China, Russia and other communist countries becoming important outlets for our wheat and other farm products, countries also interested in our industrial production? Can we carry on business with Red China while refusing to recognize its political existence?

What about our responsibilities toward the United Nations, NATO, GATT and other international bodies to which Canada belongs?

Considering the rapid economic, political and military evolution of the world today, Canada should be able to act quickly and firmly to protect its own interests and fulfil its commitments on the international scene. Are we so much preoccupied by our domestic problems, our regional and local issues, that our capacity to take some decisive action at the international level is hampered? Of course, those are questions which cannot be answered forthwith. However, they underline the complex problems and the difficult alternatives which are facing the country today.

On the other hand, we are in a better position than ever before to create an economic and cultural climate favourable to all Canadians and to contribute to a considerable extent to peace and welfare in the world. Let us not forget that our problems must be faced and solved by a mature and united Canada having faith in its destiny.

Mr. Speaker, there is now another problem of tremendous concern to several members, organizations and Canadians: it is the peaceful revolution taking place in Quebec, and the Ralliement Creditiste has something to do with this ferment.

Whatever the Anglo-Saxons in our province might say, we are not extremists. And our so-called extremism is not, any more than history, the reason for our disagreement.

I am not aware in my time of a stranger and more appalling phenomenon than this desire to depreciate us morally and to accuse us of all the sins under the sun especially those we are not responsible for.

Our people have certainly been hurt and harassed in the last 150 years. We have often been deceived, humiliated and oppressed. But we can proudly assert that we have remained free from hate.

We have never given back blow for blow. We do not entertain the slightest desire for revenge, we only want our little share of justice.

Nothing will be changed as long as no decision has been made to go to the root of the problem.

The first charity English and French Canadians owe each other, the prerequisite to good understanding is frankness.

The two races do not agree because one wants equal rights provided that it gets the lion's share. Deep down some English Canadians do not want to recognize and accept the French fact.

It is no longer necessary to wonder how the right to think, to feel, to act as French Canadians becomes in some people's opinion narrow provincialism.

Each time one of our rights was challenged, some of our political leaders asked us, for the sake of peace and national unity, to give up part of our heritage. And, for the sake of peace and national unity we yielded every time.

There was always members of Parliament, senators, ministers charged with rallying their compatriots, to take away from us, shred by shred, our heritage and our dignity.

Political history since confederation tells us that most of our so-called great men were primarily yes-men.

What remains to be done? We do not have to prove that we want national unity in Canada more than anybody else, since we have made more sacrifices for it than anybody else. We always keep our hand open and outstretched, but we no longer outstretch a limp hand to be crushed.

We do not refuse to co-operate, but co-operation must be mutual. Our co-operation is no longer inspired and directed by the slavishness of parties, but by the interests of the province and of our nation when those interests do not conflict with the general interests.

Let us be strong and conscious of our geographical position. In 1867, confederation would not have been possible without us, and we are still indispensable to the maintenance of confederation. We are the bridge linking east and west.

On the St. Lawrence we have the most beautiful harbours, and railway lines must go through our territory. The province of Quebec affords air lines their easiest landing fields.

Our lands are the best in Canada and in America. Let us no longer offer this wealth to foreigners for a mess of pottage.

Let others day in and day out inveigh against provincialism.

To sum up, we will be respected the day we have our economy well in hand.

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote an excerpt from an article by André Langvin which was published in the April 1965 issue of Le Magazine Maclean concerning the fame of our national institution:

It is obvious that all those turpitudes have fostered some sort of fatalism which, like a cancer, eats away at what we are bound to call our national conscience. That is the worst that could happen to us because to believe that, as an ethnical group, we can only engender dubious politicians or that the latter are such only because they come from our group is to believe that immorality in public affairs is connected with a biological phenomen.

Then, any attempt at cleaning up becomes an illusion and, worse still, seems to be the typical gimmick of the system. When our young men and women say openly: "All politicians are alike, they are only interested in making money", it is not so much the cruelty of their statement that is shocking as the kind of cynical submissiveness behind such a statement; it is a terrible admission of helplessness.

Therefore, on the one hand, those young men and women must be convinced that they will not necessarily inherit a sort of original sin, because there is no collective guilt and, on the other, that they will be encouraged to fight a rotten system instead of accepting with resignation the fact that it will only produce dishonest politicians. The system did not only permit this avalanche of scandals where so many of our fellow citizens were involved, it also encouraged their proliferation: a system which gives hidden powers to those who fill the electoral coffers, which forces the representative of the people to act as go-between in order to obtain preferential treatment, for his supporters, which stuffs the Senate and the legislative body with directors of large companies, which leads dozens of lawyers into conflicts of interests, confusing their duties as members of Parliament and their duties as professional men, permitting so many officials trained in government service to take advantage of their contacts and of their knowledge to secure employment with private firms, and which, finally, makes so many appointments and requests for services to the state dependant upon political allegiance.

All this of course can be remedied and legislation can be passed regarding all those matters in order to establish standards giving less leeway to elastic consciences. Every political party should be made to show the amount of its funds and the nature of contributions. Nobody will really believe in a complete reform of the provincial Liberal party as long as the Premier is against transferring the full and open control of the fund to members of the federation. The administration can be brought closer together, geographically as well as humanly, and a control agency could be created to which any citizen could appeal who considers himself wronged. Senators, legislative councillors and members of parliament could be forced to declare publicly their sources of income; the nation is too generous with them that they might consider evading a mild obligation such as this. High officials might be prohibited for some time to enter the service of a business dealing with the department where they were employed. Finally, a non-political organization might be created to scrutinize the appointments made by the government and the list of persons called upon to render service.

It might be argued that this would hinder greatly the politicians and civil servants, and that this would be demanding more from them than from ordinary citizens. But whoever chooses to serve in the public service chooses also to be responsible for his actions, and the nation expects him to obey this code of ethics. The fact that this code is written in part can only reassure him. It is only at this price that the function of the politician will be revalorized, that we will escape this false collective guilt some are trying to pin on us, and that our young people made cynical by various happenings will be convinced that democracy does not necessarily mean corruption.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. J. B. Morison (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, in the interests of brevity may I quickly pass over the traditional compliments on the excellence of the members' speeches, with the suggestion that we remember what has been said over the last seven days, and in the days to come try to live up to the ambitions which have been expressed. If this is the case, I am sure that the sentiments expressed earlier this afternoon by the hon. Member for Royal (Mr. Fairweather), that the opinions of this House have possibly been overlooked by Provincial-Federal conferences in the West Block, will not be overlooked in the future. If we can contain ourselves and express ideas, instead of just making noise, then we will make a contribution to the Government of his country.

The Speech from the Throne dealt with many problems of the day and proposals for higher standards of living, proposals which will affect the lives of Canadians in all walks of life and in all areas of this wonderful country. I intend to touch on just a few of them which I feel are most important to my constituents and to Canadians of the nation.

First, I would like to draw hon. Members' attention to a lecture which was given by Mr. Peter F. Drucker, of the School of Business at the University of Toronto, last March. Professor Drucker's remarks have been widely publicized in the Canadian press and have created great interest not only among industry but also the professions. His remarks dealt with entrepreneurship in business. He stressed that certain companies do well year after year, that they consistently outperform their competitors in good times or bad. One of the chief reasons for this was entrepreneurship.

Entrepreneurship has a specific subject matter, a specific concern. It is effectiveness. Entrepreneurship is not concerned with efficiency; that is the concern of management, or we might say, in the case of Government, the civil service. It is the subject of managerial discipline. Efficiency attempts to do things the right way. It deals with quality, rather than the quantity of results and output.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Efficiency of course is not unimportant, but no business or government can continue to survive or give the leadership required of it because it is efficient. Unless it does the right things, unless it has a degree of effectiveness, it cannot live at all, no matter how efficient it may be. It is also true that a Government that does the right thing can tolerate inefficiency, it can tolerate abuse, and it can tolerate these things without suffering too much. Entrepreneurship, then, is knowing what things to do; it is not how to do them. Mr. Speaker, if the continued success of the Liberal Party over the last 30 years is to be attributed to a special ability, then surely that ability must be the art of doing the right thing.

Many Canadians have said that the Liberals were just plain lucky to be defeated in 1957. I believe there are a few Ministers on the front bench that can be excluded from that group. Many Canadians said that the forces of recession were building up and could not be stopped. They said it was a product of Liberal administration. Whatever the cause, whatever the case, it was a situation that had to be met. It was a time for entrepreneurial decisions; because unemployment was becoming a national problem at that time and it was top editorial material, instead of flags or furniture or fighting, interparty style. I remember a statement that was made by the Labour Minister at that time. I am thinking of the winter of 1961-62. As I remember, he said that the Government had done all it could; now it was up to industry to correct mass unemployment. Well, Sir, that lacks entrepreneurship; it lacks imagination; it lacks the art of being able to do the right thing. That was just one example, and there are many that I am not going to quote this evening because of the time. But, contrast, if you will, the simple move, the oh so effective move, the $500 winter building bonus. In one stroke winter unemployment in this country was well on the way to being licked.

There are other examples; the Columbia River Treaty, the Seaway project, the Crown Corporations and the Export Credits Insurance Corporation, the latter both being set up by Mr. C. D. Howe, with his exceptional flair for being able to do the right thing—possibly politics might be excluded from that. Each and every example I have given is one of doing what was required at the right time.

Mr. Pugh: You had better call an election, John.

Mr. Morison: The Unemployment Insurance Fund was an example of doing what had to be done. Unfortunately, through Government inefficiency, which I mentioned earlier—I am thinking of the previous Government, of course—its effectiveness has been hampered.

Let us look, Mr. Speaker, to entrepeneurship in the future; the proposals in the Throne Speech. First I would like to mention the lessening of international tension. I do not know what confidential advice was given to the President of the United States by our Prime Minister. In fact, I do not know if L.B.J. really knew he was getting advice—

Mr. Alkenbrack: Entrepreneurship.

Mr. Morison: —but I do believe that with the deft ability of our Prime Minister—and this is his forte—the message of doing the right thing got across to Mr. Johnson and I do believe that a contribution has already been made in the touchy area of international peace. Second, is the matter of the Conference of Commonwealth Prime Ministers to discuss the expansion of trade and the establishment of a Commonwealth Secretariat. We in this Government, Mr. Speaker, are vitally aware of the changes that must come in our trading pattern with Great Britain. For years past this great and bountiful mother country has favoured us at every turn with trading privileges; always giving, always asking very little in return. Today this generosity is no longer possible. England is struggling for her economic life, combating trade deficits, financial problems and inefficient production. We in Canada, taking only 12 per cent of her exports, contribute to almost 23.5 per cent of her trade imbalance. England can no longer afford to tolerate this situation and she must seek from us a new trading pattern.

I support our automobile agreement. In this vital segment of our industry there is the greatest opportunity for the increased employment of Canadians. But as we ratify this agreement, let us produce an equally brilliant plan so that the United Kingdom industries will not suffer; and if this is not possible, let us not be shackled by old ideas, by trading defeats in the past. There are new markets. Is industrial trade with the Soviet Union out of the question? They buy our wheat; why not our machinery and technology? Britain, France and other western countries have the major part of a new billion-dollar market that has emerged from Russia in the last few years. As I say, this is a new market. Why cannot Canada lead into new market areas and ideas, where success is to be found ahead of those who wait in hopes of an easier path?

Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but recall the many letters I received during the flag debate concerning traditional ties, allegiance to the mother country, the breaking of honourable connections. They were just words, Mr. Speaker. Our Government's proposal to form a secretariat to bring England and the Commonwealth closer together and work to their mutual advantage is more than that. It is constructive work. It is the ability to do the right thing, to seek accomplishment through deeds and not words.

We must be entrepreneurs if we are going to find the wealth necessary to finance our war on poverty, which brings me to my third observation. At the outset let me say that I am aware that in an affluent society, as we have in Canada today—the third wealthiest nation in the world; a nation which has an average income per capita of $1,800; a nation that is on the threshold of an ever more expanding and technically sophisticated economy—there is going to be a widening gap between the honest hard worker and those who are not—

Mr. Alkenbrack: Just words.

Mr. Morison: —or those who, for one reason or another, just cannot compete in the labour market.

Mr. Speaker, those remarks on the other side of the House almost make me wonder whether I should not be addressing my remarks to them.

Into this gap the three levels of Government, Federal, Provincial and Municipal, poured almost 4 billion last year, almost twice as much as ten years ago. I do not believe there are twice as many poor in this country or that they need twice as much welfare; but I do believe that a complete overhaul of our welfare programs is necessary.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Today welfare is a part of our society. It must provide the basic needs for its people or they will turn to socialism. We have had welfare programs of a spotty character for years. They have been expensive but they have not always been adequate. We needed family allowances in this country. We needed assistance to education if our labour force was going to meet the modern challenge. We must help the disabled, the blind and the old, or we will have a social revolution on our hands. But we must do this for another reason too, and business must understand this as well.

We must try to raise the standards of our people. If Government does not do this, business will suffer. Business, if consistently asked for charitable contributions to community chests, to universities and to all kinds of charitable enterprise to assist the needy, the helpless, the sick, will really wonder whether or not it is helping worthy causes. The Speech from the Throne recognizes this problem. The Government plans to review with the Provinces the whole picture of the welfare field. This plan is not to instal Socialism; it is to avoid Socialism.

I have not dealt with specific areas like the Labour Code, the Pension Plan or medicare. Perhaps I should, because nobody thinks that the Labour Code is perfect. The minimum wage is certainly not out of line and the hours of work provisions, generally speaking, are found in collective agreements, although there are some industries where they do not apply. The Minister has authority to provide the necessary exemptions in these cases, and I think he will do so.

The Pension Plan is needed, in my view, and too many people have no opportunity to help provide for their old age. The Pension Plan now provides for a minimum, and an employee in order to achieve this minimum will contribute less than $80 a year.

Medicare is a very involved subject. The Federal authorities cannot undertake it alone. This program must be developed cautiously, through experience and by working with the Provinces. It cannot be developed in a way which will slow down the economy, and in this regard we must be prudent.

My fourth observation deals with the agricultural segment of the population. It was revealing to me when campaigning in rural Wentworth to hear on many occasions that old question: Why vote Liberal, they never do anything for the farmer. Not being a farmer or a student of agricultural history, I found this a rather difficult point to debate, especially when I knew the western boys were getting fat. Wheat payments were being made, and although the local press did not give that fact much publicity, the word did get around. On my next trip to the farms of Wentworth I will be able to refer to the many good things that have been done for farmers. Who is a bigger entrepreneur than Harry Hays? He knows what the farmers want and is impatient to have the Government carry out his programs. These programs will not be give-aways, but based on sound practical policies to assist the Eastern farmer to become a part of an efficient and profitable farming community.

Originally the word "entrepreneur" referred to a single individual, and we might still think of such a man as an isolated individual. On the other hand, as soon as an individual has attained the slightest amount of success, he builds an organization for continuing success.

Mr. Speaker, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said that the latter half of the 20th century belongs to Canada. May the Liberal Party continue to be the entrepreneur to fulfil this prophecy.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Wentworth (Mr. Morison) indicated that he would be brief, but as it turned out he did not keep his promise. I assure this House that I will be extremely brief.

Mr. Knowles: This makes two Tory speakers in a row.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winkler: I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I will be brief because I do not believe that traditionally a supporter of the Government should conclude this debate. Perhaps that is not a good reason for speaking, but let me say that I do have a few remarks I wish to make.

At several points the previous speaker bragged about the Liberal record, particularly with reference to the $1,800 per capita income. I wish the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) had been present in the House when the hon. Member made that statement, because it is precisely in this regard that the Minister of Agriculture has failed as an entrepreneur. That Minister may know what the farmers want in some respects, but he has not manifested good sense as far as the incomes of Eastern farmers are concerned.

I asked the Minister a question this morning regarding the price of cheese. His reply indicated at least to me that the producers of cheese milk will receive less this year than they did last year. It is my humble opinion that the Government is making a determined effort to avoid supporting this particular segment of the dairy industry. One can only wait to see what will happen in this regard, but I hope my words will have some bearing on the Government's attitude toward the producers of this product in Eastern Canada.

The Speech from the Throne was an exercise in the creation of hypocrisies. The Government has brought forward a great number of promised programs, but it remains to be seen whether they will carry them forward in the form of legislation. The secret right now, as to whether this will happen, lies in the knowledge of what will be contained in the budget which is to brought down the Monday following the Easter recess. I am sure that if it contains as many hypocrisies as are contained in the Throne Speech an election is imminent. I am not afraid of an election, but realize that it is an old Liberal trick to fill the Speech from the Throne and the Budget with all kinds of promises in the hope that the electorate will believe in them. It is well known on this side of the House that some of the Ministers went out of their way a couple of nights ago to keep Members out of the House, with the hope that the Government would be defeated, and they would be forced to call an election.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Winkler: It was obvious that these Ministers wanted to go to the country, but could not convince the old guard that this was now a propitious time or that this was a good tactic. I think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon), who is an enthusiastic individual, holds the key to this situation. He holds that key and we will wait to see what comes out in the Budget.

• (8:40 p.m.)

As I look over the items in the Speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker, I note, as other Members have noted, the reference to the Government's war on poverty. This is a great big joke to me, when I think of the whole mass of Government members standing up and voting against $100 old age security for people 65 years of age and over, when they knew full well they could have done so without charging the taxpayers one cent. This was possible. It was spelled out. Even my friends on the left voted against it, and that does not matter to me, but the fact is that now the Government talks about a war on poverty.

I said once before in the course of this session that if they want to come along with me and look at some of the cases I deal with on week ends they will see how people have to live on $75 a month in this Liberal Government high cost of living era. I hope the Member for Hamilton, whatever his riding is, or Wentworth, will take that home with him because he will have exactly the same experiences. If he had to live on $75 a month he might have decided to stand up and vote for the responsible amendment put forward by our party at that time.

Another thing that is very topical this evening is something that the Government missed. They have covered everything else. I think the Member for Wentworth said that the Government has recognized every problem, and certainly the Speech from the Throne would appear to cover every problem; but they have missed one. What the Government should have said in the Speech from the Throne is: My Ministers believe it is high time that the Press Gallery be removed from the Centre Block. Tonight the members of the Press Gallery have got their answer. They have got to get out. This would have been the fastest action that this Government ever took. I understand that the members of the Press Gallery were advised today that their time in the Centre Block is finished. I believe this is going to ruin a certain fundamental tradition around here which everybody more or less appreciates. I think arrangements might have been made to retain that particular facility in this building. However, the Government is acting in its usual dictatorial manner and it is going to fix everything and kick them out of the Centre Block. That is the fate of the Press Gallery this evening.

I promised to be brief, Mr. Speaker, but I want to make a few remarks about my constituency. The Speech from the Throne has indicated the desire of the Government to expand the development program for low income areas. No one likes to brag about coming from a low income area, but I have a letter here similar to that referred to by the hon. Member for Port Arthur. It comes from the Georgian Bay Development Association which encompasses a number of counties running all the way from Bruce right up to the top. I would imagine it goes right up to the Prime Minister's constituency.

The letter is signed by the president of the Association, a very well known Liberal in the area. He pleads with the Government to take action. He even thanks them for what they have set forth in their Throne Speech, and I will too if they carry it out; but this has not been the case in the past. There are a number of counties in that area, Mr. Speaker, that are eligible in every sense of the word to be named designated areas, but where do these designations occur? If the Government were acting responsibly they would take this entire area from Lake Huron right around to the north end of Georgian Bay and make it a designated area, so that at least the people would have the opportunity to offer something to industries that might come there.

Even the agricultural people of these counties, who are well known in almost every field of mixed farming endeavour, are experiencing a continuing decline in their income, and I have also mentioned that before in the House. They rarely reach the level of $1,800 mentioned by the hon. Member for Wentworth. He should come with me and see what these people have to say. Since this Government took office the incomes of agricultural producers in this area have gone down and down and down. We have these great promises in the Speech from the Throne and I hope the Government lives up to them. I will be one of those who will vote for them, if they can show me a program that is going to increase the income of farmers.

We have a few very basic indigenous industries there that we want to retain, because they are very prosperous. The Government knows why they are prospeous. I have mentioned this to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp). He knows the problem very well and I hope he does not place them in an embarrassing position such as we fear by reason of what might happen through further movement toward free trade.

As a matter of fact, I have a clipping of a speech made by the Minister in Kitchener during the Christmas recess, which indicates he is beginning to have second thoughts about free trade, and I hope he will keep the industries of my constituency closely in mind. We will support him as long as he does not sell us out.

At the time that the Government changed there were two major projects under way in our area that could have helped the whole area financially and economically. One was the establishment of a national park in Bruce County, and in my humble opinion this still remains a very important factor in regard to the economy of that area, which is now one of the black areas on the map of Ontario. In other words, it is a poverty area. I promoted this park. I do not know what is being done about it today. I almost had it to the point of being consummated at the time the Government changed. I have discussed it with the relevant Minister and I hope he will read these words and do something about the matter, because now it is not just something we would like to have but rather almost a necessity.

I must also make reference to the visit of a few weeks ago of the Prime Minister and his entourage to the County of Northumberland. I have forgotten the name of the town, but he turned the sod there for a new penitentiary. It happens to be one that the Liberals stole for patronage purposes from the constituency of Grey-Bruce and placed in the County of the hon. Lady. The hon. Lady has a little more influence than I thought she had, but I can tell you that the people of Grey-Bruce will not forget it, because the Liberal Association of that riding supported every move to have that penitentiary located there, for economic reasons. It was the subject of the first letter I wrote after going into opposition and I informed the highest authorities in the Government accordingly. I would also say in conclusion—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winkler: —that the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) should act in accordance with the wishes of his Liberal friends in that area, and in particular the President of the Georgian Bay Development Association, and give that area those advantages that accrue to designated areas so that at least it will have those advantages in endeavouring to induce industry to locate in that section of Ontario. Before I resume my seat—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: You are good for another half hour.

Mr. Winkler: I am but I will not take it—may I say everyone on this side is waiting with anticipation to see the developments that are forecast in the Speech from the Throne. We will support those things that are right for the country and those things that will re-establish the integrity of Parliament, the honesty of its Members and the course that should be followed for the good of Canada.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise seething with indignation to bring a question of privilege to the attention of the House. I have in my hand a statement issued by Davidson Dunton and André Laurendeau, co-chairmen of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, under date of April 13, 1965. You will remember the excellent attitude taken by the Prime Minister toward a certain questionnaire. I will simply read the concluding two paragraphs. A great deal of the statement is explanatory but this is what it has to say in part:

> We believe, therefore, that the survey should continue on the same voluntary confidential basis as before. If refusals become too high the interviews, of course, will be stopped. Sixty seven Members have already been interviewed and only eight others have refused to date. As long as a high response rate continues, the interviews will go on unchanged.
> The Commission has been charged with carrying out an inquiry; and that in fact is precisely what it is trying to do.

• (8:50 p.m.)

> Surely in all good sense it should not be hampered or blocked as it endeavours to fulfil the purpose for which it was established; nor be called on continually to justify the methods which after careful consideration it deems suitable. We believe this would be a dangerous precedent from which the work of this and other royal commissions could suffer.

My point of privilege is that I think this is a gross piece of impertinence with regard to the Prime Minister of our country and his efforts to protect the rights of Members of Parliament of all parties, and his efforts to protect their privileges and their privacy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Langlois: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Do I understand that there was no division?

Mr. Nowlan: No division.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1965-66

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1966 was presented by Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance) and read by Mr. Speaker to the House.

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should make a short statement. There is no need for detailed comment concerning these main estimates because they are identical with those which I tabled in this House during the previous session of Parliament. Because they were distributed to all members of Parliament at that time, I have not arranged for another general distribution now.

On that occasion, which was March 22, I made a short statement which can be found on pages 12,607 and 12,608 of Hansard for the second session of this Parliament. Tables related to the estimates were included in Hansard on pages 12,609, 12,610 and 12,611. Opposition spokesmen made their usual statements at that time also.

During the previous session Parliament provided interim supply for April and May by the enactment of Appropriation Act No. 1, 1965, based on estimates identical to those which I have tabled today. These estimates will provide the basis for further votes of supply during this session to provide for 1965-66 requirements.

I should draw the attention of the House to a discrepancy on page 5 of these estimates. The total amount shown in the summary for "Loans, Investments and Advances" should read $201,994,800, as printed on page 524, rather than $202,144,800 as shown in the summary. The correct figure which appears on page 524 will be the one considered by the Committee of Supply.

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the message of His Excellency, together with the estimates presented this day, be referred to the Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE

WHEAT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF EXTENSION OF INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to advise the House that last Thursday, April 22, our Ambassador to the United States signed on behalf of the Government of Canada a protocol extending the current International Wheat Agreement without amendment for one year, to July 31, 1966. The International Wheat Council agreed at its session last February to recommend to member governments this extension of the agreement, pending the possible development of broader international arrangements on grains under the Kennedy round of trade negotiations, which could have implications for the International Wheat Agreement.

INDUSTRY

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING AUTOMOTIVE AGREEMENT

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Acting Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, with leave I, as the acting minister, wish to table copies of correspondence between the Minister of Industry and General Motors of Canada Ltd., Ford Motor Company of Canada Ltd. and Chrysler Canada Ltd., concerning the Canada-United States automotive agreement signed by the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States on January 16, 1965.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wonder would the Minister also include any correspondence that was received from the Secretary of State for External Affairs in connection with that matter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

3 & 4. This was granted. In September 1963 a freeze was placed on applications for licences involving the extension of alternative television services. This was to be in effect until July 1, 1964.

However, with the appointment of the Advisory Committee on Broadcasting, the freeze has been extended until the Committee makes its report, as the terms of reference of the Committee includes an inquiry into the various means of providing alternate television services. [Translation]

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. The rights to televise National Hockey League games are owned by an advertising agency, not the C.B.C. The NHL clubs themselves refuse to allow coverage of full games during regular season.

2. From time to time letters are received requesting full coverage of games and occasionally petitions are received from groups making the same request. The numbers of such letters and petitions have dropped greatly in the past two years since the starting time of the telecasts was advanced from 9:00 p.m. to 8:30 p.m. and video tape highlights of the first period included in the first intermission show.

3. English Network, The Saint; French Network, Thierry la Fronde.

4. By Neilsen Television Index for January 1965: The Saint, ranks 25th; Thierry la Fronde, ranks 20th.

5. Live coverage of sports events, other than regular season NHL games, usually is for the complete game. It should be pointed out, however, that in the case of football, the other major sport which is telecast, the city in which the game is being played is blacked-out. This is not the case with hockey.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MAKING OF AGREEMENTS BETWEEN PROVINCES AND FOREIGN STATES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I would direct a question to the Prime Minister in connection with remarks made by Hon. Gérin-Lajoie regarding agreements which could be made, as he contended, between any province and a foreign state. I ask the Prime Minister whether he is prepared to make a statement in this connection and to make very clear that any agreement made between a province and a foreign state cannot be sloughed off as a mere agreement, but that in point of fact such agreements constitute treaties.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The position of the Federal Government regarding the negotiation and signing of treaties was set out in a statement issued on Friday last by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. If the right hon. gentleman so desires, that statement could be tabled and included in Hansard as an appendix. It sets out the position taken by the Government, and I have nothing to add to it at the moment.

However, in clarifying the position of his government, that is the government of Quebec, on this matter, Mr. Lesage is reported as having said in Toronto on Saturday night last—and I quote from the report—that his Government did not claim the right to make treaties but only to conclude agreements on matters within provincial jurisdiction. That is the end of the press quotation.

On both the federal and the provincial sides in statements made on this matter reference has been made to the recent cultural and educational entente between Quebec and France as a precedent which could well be followed. In this precedent, involving an intergovernmental exchange between France and Canada, the federal and provincial authorities co-operated to achieve the desired result for the province in a way which recognized that only the Federal Government can enter into treaty arrangements with a foreign power.

Having regard to this precedent, and having regard to the statement made on Saturday by Mr. Lesage, I am sure that any misunderstanding which might exist on this matter between the two levels of government can be cleared away, and steps are being taken to this end.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask a supplementary question arising out of the answer given by the Prime Minister. He has quoted the Premier of Quebec. Does he agree with the Premier of Quebec that everything which took place resulted from a misunderstanding by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and that in fact a treaty between countries involves only the question of sovereignty and the right to declare war? Does the Government accept that definition?

Furthermore, I would ask the Prime Minister this. He has stated that the cultural entente—that is a new description of a treaty —had been arrived at with the agreement of the federal authorities. Was Mr. Gérin-Lajoie right when he said that the Federal Government was informed of the agreement after it had been signed, and solely as a matter of information, by the French Embassy at Ottawa? He further says there was no request, in advance of the signing, for consideration by the Federal Government. Are those statements correct? I direct my question to the Prime Minister, because it is most unusual for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to be speaking on this matter and making a statement on behalf of the Government, as he did the other night.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, so far as the right hon. gentleman's last observation is concerned, I think it is quite proper for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, after consultation with me, to issue a statement on a matter which concerns treaty arrangements with foreign powers. With regard to the first part of the right hon. gentleman's question, I am in touch with Mr. Lesage and I am not at this moment going to comment on any statement reported to have been made by him until I get the exact text of that statement.

So far as the other part of the right hon. gentleman's question is concerned, I can assure him and anyone else who is interested that the Federal Government was indeed in touch with the Government of France with regard to this cultural and educational entente; that the negotiations between the provincial authorities and those concerned in departments of government in Paris were conducted with the knowledge and approval and co-operation of the Federal authorities, and indeed that there was an agreement by an exchange of notes between France and Canada as a kind of umbrella under which the other kind of entente was worked out.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question.

If the federal government, as he stated, reserves the right to negotiate all its international treaties, will it be authorized also to change anything to the text of those same agreements which might be entered into by the government of the province of Quebec and foreign governments in the field of education?

In other words, does the federal government reserve the right to impose its conditions in regard to education, with respect to the terms and texts of the agreements to be signed between Quebec and foreign governments?

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, only the Federal Government acting for Canada can make international treaties with other countries. If treaties of that kind are made with other countries and they deal with matters under provincial jurisdiction, then under our Constitution those treaties cannot be implemented in respect of those matters without the approval of the Provincial Governments. That has been the custom for many years, with a great deal of experience in this field, by which the Federal Government negotiates treaties and then works out with the Provinces their implementation in so far as there are matters in those treaties which come under provincial jurisdiction.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask another supplementary question.

If the federal government does not feel authorized to change or add anything to the text of the negotiations concluded by the provinces, what then is the role of the federal government in the conclusion of those international treaties between the province of Quebec and other countries with regard to education?

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the role of the Federal Government is to carry out its constitutional responsibility as representing Canada, and to do that, in cases to which my hon. friend has referred, in co-operation with the provincial governments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs—

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Calgary North.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, in view of the general confusion of mind which exists with regard to this whole matter, I wonder if the Prime Minister could outline the sequence of events in connection with it; by which I mean, who initiated and carried on the negotiations in regard to this matter, what documents did the Province sign, and when were they signed; and what documents, if any, did the Federal Government sign, and when were they signed?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, to get a complete reply it would be, I think, desirable to put this question on the order paper so that all the details can be made public, as indeed they should be made public. If my hon. friend would like to have a tentative reply, because we have not all the details here, my hon. friend the Secretary of State for External Affairs is, I think, in a position to give it.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, perhaps by way of a supplement to the reply given by the Prime Minister I might point out that the Federal Government was, of course, aware of the desire of the government of Quebec with regard to an agreement covering cultural exchanges with France. The procedure to make effective this entente, this consensus was discussed by me with the Minister of Foreign Affairs for France, and in February the agreement between the Quebec government and France was signed. On the same day there was an exchange of notes, as the Prime Minister mentioned a moment ago, between the governments of Canada and France which served as the basis for the arrangements entered into between Quebec and France.

Mr. Harkness: A further supplementary. Was this exchange of notes, which the Secretary of State for External Affairs mentioned took place in February, before or after the Province of Quebec had signed an agreement, or something of that nature, with the Government of France?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The agreement on education in February was the first such arrangement concluded between that jurisdiction and the foreign power in question. This matter has already been covered by arrangements made on other occasions. For instance, the Province of British Columbia recently was anxious to engage in an arrangement with the United States for the sale of downstream benefits of the Columbia river; and as my hon. friend knows, he was a member of a government which conducted, on behalf of the owner of the resource in question, negotiations with the United States. The resource came within the control of the province and could only be dealt with with the approval of the province, but as that province did not have any locus standi with the government of the United States the only way in which a treaty in that matter could be reached was through the Government of Canada. A procedure similar to that was followed in this instance.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the use of a few Latin phrases I think the Secretary of State has further confused the issue rather than shed light on it. Therefore I would ask him whether he could prepare a clearer statement in answer to the question I asked and give it to the House tomorrow if he is not in a position to give it to us today.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I failed to recollect that my hon. friend was not a lawyer, and on that account I suppose I should not have used a foreign language. But "locus standi" has a well known meaning among lawyers, and I think it covers this situation aptly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in connection with the locus standi would the Minister say whether, as Mr. Gérin-Lajoie says, the fact is that the agreement was signed in Paris? "We did not even inform them"—that is the Government of Canada—"of the negotiations which were in progress", Mr. Gérin-Lajoie said. Is that correct or is it not? When the signatures of the province of Quebec and the Republic of France had been duly affixed it was then, for the first time, that the Government of Canada, through the Department of External Affairs, took an interest in the matter at all.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I think we have already dealt with this aspect of the question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My right hon. friend is reading from a newspaper report, and I have learned from long practice in this House that before replying to a newspaper article it is well for one to have carefully read the article. I have not read the article to which my right hon. friend directs my attention; I will do so, and if I think it warrants a further reply perhaps I can give it later.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the Minister agree with the Premier of Quebec that in the remarks which were made by the Minister the other day there is a clear indication that the Minister did not know what he was talking about?

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, there may well be people who would feel that a minister often says things when he does not know what he is saying, but I can assure my hon. friend that in this instance that would not be a correct assessment to make of my position.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question for the minister. Would the minister not agree that any so-called international agreements made by a province must in virtually all cases be subject to federal acquiescence because of the paramount constitutional right to the national government to prohibit, regulate and control entry to and exit from Canada of persons and goods?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has obviously studied the statement I made on Saturday carefully and his assessment is the correct one.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Secretary of State for External Affairs now suggest by his use of language that the words "agreement", "treaty", "entente" and "consensus" are co-equal in meaning?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, Mr. Speaker. It is clear under international law, as my hon. friend, a good lawyer, knows, that they are not always co-equal in meaning.

Mr. Lambert: Then why is the minister using them as being co-equal this afternoon?

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question on the point raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West. When this matter is being discussed or when further information is being tabled, will the minister tell us the difference between a treaty, an arrangement, an entente, a note and an agreement?

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Could he tell us whether he has met or intends to meet the Quebec minister of education in order to discuss with him the jurisdiction of the Quebec government with regard to the signing of international agreements in the field of education?

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can answer that question. I hope to have the pleasure of meeting the minister in question very shortly on this and related matters.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Are there other agreements too?

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the use of the word "entente" meant to indicate that some new kind of automobile is being imported into Windsor?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the phrase "entente" was, of course, a phrase that was mutually agreed on by the Government of Canada and the Government of Quebec to describe a situation within the context of the over-all authority of the Federal Government under the British North America Act.

With regard to the question of automobiles, I might say that conditions in the city of Windsor at the present time with respect to automobile production reveal that employment is at its highest level, notwithstanding recent adjustments within that industry.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: It was my understanding that the Prime Minister suggested that the press release dealing with the provinces and treaty making powers be printed as an appendix to Hansard. Does he have the consent of the House?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think it should be in Votes and Proceedings rather than in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: In Votes and Proceedings, then?

Some hon. Members: Why?

Some hon. Members: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, would it not be fitting for the Prime Minister to read again that statement here in the House, on motions, so that opposition members may have the opportunity to make their comments in this regard?

On the whole, that statement is important enough to allow us to enlighten the government by acquainting them of our ideas on this matter. That would be valuable to everybody.

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: I could save time by sending all hon. Members a copy of the statement this afternoon, if that is desired.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, we would like the Prime Minister to afford us the opportunity to make some comments on this statement. That is why I am wondering whether he would not agree to revert to motions in order to read the said statement. In this way we would have the opportunity today or tomorrow to make our comments.

[Text]

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pearson: I would remind the hon. gentleman that the budget will be introduced at eight o'clock this evening.

VIET NAM—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING SETTLEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary fo State for External Affairs. In view of the visit of the Soviet Foreign Minister to France and in view of the statements already made by Mr. Gromyko and Mr. Maurice Couve de Murville regarding Viet Nam, has the minister been or is he in communication or does he intend to be in communication with either the French or Soviet Foreign Minister or perhaps the Secretary of State of the United States regarding any possible negotiations or settlement in relation to the critical situation in Viet Nam?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Government has been in consultation for a number of weeks now with a number of the governments represented at the Geneva conferences in 1954 and 1962. I hope some day soon to have the opportunity of discussing certain matters with Mr. Couve de Murville when I see him at the NATO meeting, and before that next week in Paris.

VIET NAM—REPORTED STATEMENT BY U.S. SENATOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Chester MacRae (York-Sunbury): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. I trust he received the notice I sent him this morning. It is based on statements that were made over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on Thursday evening last by Senator Wayne Morse, the Democratic Senator from Oregon. He said in effect that the Prime Ministers of Canada, Great Britain and Italy had been patting the United States on the back with words of encouragement as to her war-making policies in Viet Nam, but they should send troops if they mean it; that there are no British boys dying in South Viet Nam; there are no Canadian boys dying in South Viet Nam, and there are no Italian boys dying in South Viet Nam.

My question is in two parts, and perhaps I should ask both to give the Prime Minister an opportunity to reply. First, will the Prime Minister advise the House if he did, in effect, commend the President of the United States upon his policy as far as Viet Nam is concerned? Second, would the Prime Minister consider replying to the second part of Senator Wayne Morse's statement in which he said that there are no Canadian boys dying in Viet Nam by pointing out that Canadians in the Gaza strip, in the Congo and Cyprus have been playing their full part in the never ending struggle for world peace? Finally, would the Prime Minister point out to Senator Wayne Morse that for three years in World War I and two years in World War II, Canada and Britain fought by themselves for the democratic freedom we enjoy?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, so far as the first part of the question is concerned, I think the Government has made its position quite clear. It supports the purposes and objectives of United States policy in Viet Nam. So far as the second part of the question is concerned, my hon. friend has answered it more eloquently than I could ever hope to do.

POSSIBLE USE OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS BY U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Would the Prime Minister say whether the Canadian Government has been informed by the United States that the use of nuclear weapons is a possibility under circumstances which as yet have not been defined? Will he also say whether, in view of the very perilous situation in Viet Nam and the need for an expression of the views of Members of this House generally, one day this week may be set aside so that a discussion can take place on this matter and the House can express itself regarding events that have taken place as well as the build-up of United States activity since the Prime Minister gave his admonitory words and the suggestion about the pause that would refresh?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I have seen the reports to which my hon. friend refers, and I share his concern over those reports. However, I would point out that these are newspaper reports, and there is no evidence of which I know from official sources to confirm these reports. I think, Mr. Speaker, we have no reason to assume that the United States Government is contemplating that course.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister inform us whether he or the Secretary of State for External Affairs made any inquiries in Washington as to the correctness of the definite statement in the press that this view had been expressed with respect to reserving the United States' right to use nuclear weapons?

Mr. Pearson: This report appeared only this morning. Naturally we will follow it very closely and do our best to see if there is any basis for it, but I would like to emphasize that this is a newspaper report and there is no evidence that this is the policy or intended policy of the United States government.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am at a loss to understand why the Prime Minister did not see the report earlier, because I saw it in Dublin two days ago; the same report.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Pearson: The Irish newspapers, Mr. Speaker, are very imaginative.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister relating to the questions and answers of a few minutes ago. Pending information from Washington as to the position of the United States with respect to its operations in Viet Nam is it not possible for the Canadian Government to declare here in this House of Commons its opposition to the use of nuclear arms in that situation?

Mr. Pearson: I think our views with regard to the use of nuclear arms are well known.

Some hon. Members: What are they?

[Later:]

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of his statement a few moments ago to my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre, that the views of his Government with regard to the use of nuclear weapons in South Viet Nam and North Viet Nam were well known—I presume in Washington—would it be possible for him to take this House into his confidence and tell us what they are; for I for one do not know what the policy of this Government is in this respect, and I doubt if any other Member of the House knows.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I might say that we hope and expect that no Government in any part of the world will ever feel that the use of nuclear weapons is required. Our own position in this matter is very much like that of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and his Government, whom my hon. friend's leader is visiting at the present time.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON INDIA-PAKISTAN SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is he in a position to give the House an up to date report on the difficulties that are taking place between two members of the Commonwealth, Pakistan and India? The second part of my question is, is Canada using her good offices to try to resolve the present dispute between our two partners in the Commonwealth?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. Member knows, there have been a series of incidents on the northwestern boundary between the Indian state of Kutch and the Pakistan province of Sind. Canada is supporting the United Nations military observer group in India and Pakistan. There are 16 Canadians serving at the present time with that group, supported by one Caribou aircraft. The Government is following the situation closely because we are naturally concerned at any incidents which affect relations between two of our fellow members of the Commonwealth.

[Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Mr. Nesbitt: Is this Canadian observer corps in the State of Kashmir or in the more southerly part on the boundary between the two countries where hostilities are taking place?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I cannot say whether they are immediately, at this moment, in that particular vicinity. It is a mobile operations observer group, but I intend to seek that information.

VISIT TO RUSSIA BY NORTHERN AFFAIRS MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Does the Minister intend to make an official tour in the Soviet Union shortly; and if so, what is the purpose of the visit?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to make an announcement at this time, but I am informed that today His Excellency the Soviet Ambassador made certain reference to it.

I very much appreciate an invitation I have received to spend two weeks in the Soviet Union as the guest of the Soviet Government and it is my intention to take, as a second representative of Canada, my Parliamentary Secretary, the hon. Member for St. Lawrence-St. George. In addition we will be taking four officers of the Department who are informed in northern matters in our own country. It has been indicated to us that we will have an opportunity of seeing the more northern reaches of the Soviet Union, and I hope this will be of benefit to us.

Mr. Aiken: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is there also an arrangement being made for a return visit by Soviet Officials to Canada?

Mr. MacInnis: What about the Member for Red Deer?

Mr. Laing: A return visit has been discussed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Brandon-Souris.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, mine was a supplementary question along the same lines.

FLOODS

RED RIVER—APPRECIATION OF ASSISTANCE RENDERED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question, which is more in the nature of a request, to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Transport. I would ask them to convey to the Canadian Wheat Board and Canada's national railway the sincere appreciation of the people of Provencher who live along the Red river for their splendid co-operation when the people of that area were faced with a threatened flood which fortunately did not materialize to the extent expected.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very happy to pass along these words of congratulation and thanks, and may I express my hope that conditions will rapidly improve in the hon. Member's constituency.

PUBLIC SERVICE

TRANSPORT DEPARTMENT—ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST FRENCH CANADIANS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question was meant for the Minister of Transport, but since he is not in the house I shall put it to the Prime Minister.

Over the week end we all heard over the radio and on television and read in the newspapers the statement made by Mr. Dominique Joncas, president of the association of French-Canadian federal civil servants.

Now, Mr. Joncas is accusing the Department of Transport of purely and simply practising discrimination against French Canadians.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Does the government intend to conduct an inquiry to find out if any employee of the Department of Transport is really being discriminated against at the present time?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I read that statement in the press and I am taking it up with the Civil Service Commission and the Minister of Transport.

POLITICAL ACTIVITIES OF NATIONAL REVENUE CLERK IN HAMILTON, ONT.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue based on an article which appeared in the Hamilton Spectator on April 22 concerning one John Beattie, a customs clerk who has set himself up as head of the Canadian Nazi party. Would the Minister care to comment on Mr. Beattie's employment position relative to this political activity?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): Could I take this question as notice?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WINDSOR—ANNOUNCEMENT OF LAY-OFFS BY FORD COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Could he make a statement to the House now which might allay the worries of thousands of Canadian workers with regard to the large scale lay-offs as announced by Ford in Windsor last week, which are taking place as a result of the implementation of the Canada-United States automotive agreement, which statement would indicate that the matter will be dealt with quickly by the government?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am going to ask the Minister of Labour to deal with that matter.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last, as hon. Members may recall, the progressive lay-off of some 1,600 workers between mid-May and August was made public by the United Automobile Workers and later confirmed by the Ford Motor Company. The lay-offs are for the purpose of modernizing and retooling the engine and transmission plants of the company at Windsor, and there is a strong possibility that when the procedure is completed total employment will be increased as a result of this operation. It is expected that the men will be rehired progressively commencing in the autumn of this year.

With your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a rather longer than usual reply to this question if I may do so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, possibly we could revert to motions, because some members want to make observations regarding this matter.

Mr. MacEachen: In that case I will reply directly to the hon. Member by saying that the announced lay-off covers 1,600 men and is to begin in mid-May and conclude in August. The employment situation in Windsor itself is very strong indeed, and the prospects for the re-employment of the first two groups in the Windsor area are very good indeed.

We have asked the president of the Ford Motor Company to come to Ottawa tomorrow morning to discuss this matter with the Government, and a meeting has been arranged for later in the week with the President of the United Automobile Workers for the purpose of discussing this matter.

Mr. Orlikow: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Minister what consideration the Government has given to the proposal made to the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Industry and the minister for Windsor that a tripartite meeting of Government, management and labour be set up to meet continuously in order to deal with the problems that have arisen as a result of the agreement in the first instance. If such a meeting has not been called, as the deputy minister indicated it would be, is it because the management of the big companies have refused to participate in such a meeting?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I agree in principle with the desirability of joint Government, labour and management co-operation in an effort to solve this question. That was my position earlier and it is my position today. In an effort to reach that objective I called a meeting of the company presidents in Ottawa on April 9, and at that meeting it was made clear that further groundwork ought to be done before considering a tripartite meeting of the kind suggested.

We did agree, however, at that meeting that the officials of my department and the Department of Industry would conduct very intensive discussions with company officials to determine in each case the exact extent of the displacement problem. When that is completed, and after a further review of the situation, it may be possible to consider the kind of meeting suggested by my hon. friend, with which I am in agreement in principle.

Mr. Orlikow: I should like to ask the Minister how, then, the statement he makes now about things which will happen some day in the future jibes with the speeches the Minister and his officials have been making about labour-management co-operation, manpower policy, and how we are ready to move whenever it is required.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): May I ask a supplementary question. The Minister in his statement concerning the laying off of 1,600 men mentioned two groups that would have a reasonable opportunity for new employment. I wonder if the Minister could tell us how many of the 1,600 are included in these two groups.

Mr. MacEachen: Before replying to my hon. friend may I congratulate him on becoming the Opposition House Leader, and tell him I am relying in the future on his good work.

In reply to his question, it is my understanding that approximately 500 workers will be included in the first two lay-offs, for whom there is a good prospect that employment will be available in the Windsor area, particularly in the Chrysler operation.

Mr. Starr: What arrangements are then being made for the 1,100 who will be laid off later? What opportunities for employment are available in the Windsor area for them?

Mr. MacEachen: I have asked the officials of the National Employment Service at regional headquarters in Toronto to go to Windsor to help develop a program of adjustment in consultation with the Ford Motor Company. We are having a meeting tomorrow with the President, and later in the week with Mr. Burt. We are striving to develop a program that will meet this situation that will not fully develop until August. We do have considerable time to reach what I would hope would be a satisfactory solution.

Mr. Starr: Is the Minister prepared then, under the circumstances, to declare Windsor a labour surplus area so the expenses of moving these workers to other areas where jobs may be available would be paid?

Mr. MacEachen: As my hon. friend knows, Mr. Speaker, Windsor is a designated area. We hope, because of the expanding employment opportunities, it may be dedesignated very shortly. It is my suggestion that we ought not to consider moving workers from the Windsor area, an area of expanding employment opportunities.

Mr. Starr: Can the Minister explain then why Windsor is a designated area now, when the minister for external affairs tells us that the situation was never as good as it is now?

Mr. MacEachen: Windsor was designated an area of chronic unemployment two years ago, and because of improved employment it is likely that it will lose that undesirable status.

Mr. Starr: You mean after the 1,600 are laid off?

WATER RESOURCES

REPORTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER TO U.S. CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): As one of the Members of this House who could be accused of having water on the brain, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources and I do so with buoyant, expectant anticipation. In view of the Minister's recent attendance at the Pacific Northwest Trade Association conference, the topic of which was "Water, the Ultimate Resource", held at Portland, Oregon, and in view of the speech made by the Minister, which I understand is of continental interest, will the Minister at the first opportunity make a statement with respect to Canadian Government policy in connection with the proposals of the North American Water and Power Alliance?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. Member for having spoken to me and informing me he was going to ask this question. It is in such general terms that I think I should not attempt to give an answer today. I made the speech in Oregon on April 12, and I will be happy to send him a copy. Thereafter, if there is any particular matter about which he would like to inquire, he can do so. Probably we would work more effectively that way.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REPORT BY LAW SOCIETY RESPECTING ONTARIO SUPREME COURT JUDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I wanted to ask the Minister of Justice a question but I have not given him notice of it. Perhaps he would like to take this as notice. Has he received a copy of a report from the Benchers of the Law Society of Upper Canada concerning the position of Mr. Justice Landreville on the Bench of the Supreme Court of Ontario, and if so can he tell us what action, if any, he proposes to take on it?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): I am willing to accept the hon. Member's suggestion and take this question as notice.

LUCIEN RIVARD—INQUIRY AS TO WHEREABOUTS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice.

Has he any news concerning Lucien Rivard? Was he found in Spain or elsewhere?

Can the minister inform the house about his whereabouts, or can he tell us if the R.C.M.P. is making any headway in locating this individual who was sprinkling skating rinks in summertime?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in answer to this question, I must state, as I already did, that it would not be in the interests of this house or of the administration of justice, if I made progress reports as it were, concerning the investigations in this matter.

NATIONAL PARKS

INQUIRIES RESPECTING ADDITIONAL PARKS IN SASKATCHEWAN AND ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I would like to direct to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Last week the Government of Saskatchewan announced that the Federal Government was considering the possibility of a second national park in the Province of Saskatchewan. In view of the very high potential of the Moose Mountain parkland area, would the minister consider this area as a site for Saskatchewan's second national park?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, we are now engaged with the Province of Saskatchewan in looking over that area of the Cypress Hills which is part of Saskatchewan. It may well be that in the discussions which take place between our people and theirs, other areas of Saskatchewan will be looked at as well, and I shall certainly draw the hon. Member's words to the attention of our parks department.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): As a supplementary question, would the Minister say whether there is such a co-operative examination going on in the province of Ontario?

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, for some time now I have owed the hon. Member a letter, and I dropped it in the mail box the other night. I think he will have it today and, with respect to the inquiry he is making regarding the Province of Ontario, I hope it is a satisfactory reply.

Mr. Winkler: May I thank the Minister for this information. I have been looking for this letter for days and days, and it had not reached me as of 2.30 this afternoon.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): As a further supplementary question, could the Minister inform the House whether the consideration of the Cypress Hills area in Saskatchewan extends across the boundary into Alberta, taking in that whole geographic area?

Mr. Laing: Yes, Mr. Speaker. On two or three occasions I have endeavoured to discuss this matter with the Minister of Resources for the province of Alberta, and on one occasion I have spoken with the Premier of Alberta. It would be our desire to incorporate the Cypress Hills on both sides of the provincial border. Some of our people are rather of the opinion that the more desirable portion is on the Alberta side, although I would not want to take sides as between two provinces; and, in the light of a review of the position of Wood Buffalo National Park we have not yet given up hope with respect to this particularly beautiful area of southern Alberta in our discussions with the Province of Alberta.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister whether the suggestion that the Cypress Hills area be incorporated into a national park has been discussed with Alberta apart from any barter arrangement regarding the Wood Buffalo National Park? In other words, has it been discussed as a potential program on its own merits?

[Mr. Southam.]

Mr. Laing: No, Mr. Speaker, but I am quite certain that if Alberta had been desirous it could have been separated in the discussions.

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, I too listened to the news release by the Minister in respect of national parks, and I would like to ask him would he specifically direct his attention to the excellent sites we have available in the Georgian Bay area?

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PERSONNEL OF INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE ON GAME AND FISH LAWS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on April 12, the day before the recess, the hon. member for Yukon inquired about the composition of the interdepartmental committee which I had announced earlier was being established to conduct a comparative study of the promises contained in the various Indian treaties and surrenders as related to the laws respecting game and fish.

The committee has now been formed and its members are: Mr. E. R. Olson of the Department of Justice, who will act as chairman; Mr. J. S. Nutt of External Affairs; Dr. A. L. Pritchard of Fisheries; Dr. D. A. Munro of Canadian Wildlife Service; Mr. C. M. Bolger, Northern Affairs and National Resources and Chief Superintendent C. B. Macdonell of the R.C.M. Police. The Department of Citizenship and Immigration will be represented on the committee by Dr. G. C. Monture and Mr. L. L. Brown.

With this representation the Committee will comprise persons trained in the law, those concerned with the conservation of fish and game, and those having broad experience in matters relating to Indian affairs and to northern administration. The committee has already begun its study.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, could the Minister give some indication how long these studies might take? Has he any estimate to make about that? Also, can he indicate whether he intends to broaden the scope of the Committee's inquiry so as to include hunting and fishing rights of native Indians not covered by treaties?

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to look into the second part of the question. I really think the directions that have been given to the committee are quite wide enough to include such a study, but I will make sure that they are. With regard to the length of time the Committee will take, it is too early to make an announcement at this early date.

[Later:]

Mr. O. J. Godin (Nickel Belt): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration in connection with the discussion of the Indian Claims Commission which took place a few minutes ago. Can the Minister advise the House whether the Indian population of the country will be represented on this commission?

Mr. Nicholson: The answer to that question is yes. Dr. G. C. Monture, O.B.E. is a member of the Six Nations at Brantford. He taught school on the Six Nations Reserve early in his career and he has maintained a lively interest in Indian affairs. He has worked closely with the Indian-Eskimo Association of Canada ever since its formation.

During a distinguished career in the federal civil service Dr. Monture has represented Canada on a number of international conferences. For his valuable wartime services as Canadian executive officer of the Combined Production and Resources Board in Washington, he was honoured by being made an officer of the Order of the British Empire.

Dr. Monture is singularly well qualified by background, training and experience to make a significant contribution to the work of the interdepartmental committee.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REPORTED STATEMENT RESPECTING PROVINCIAL TAX REVENUES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the public statement made recently by the Canadian High Commissioner in London, England, to the effect that the provinces of Canada must have more tax revenue, I am sure the Prime Minister will agree that this is an infringement by the High Commissioner on matters which are the subject of Government policy and beyond the scope of the high office he holds, and I would ask the Prime Minister whether he has brought this to the attention of Mr. Chevrier.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think if my hon. friend read the text of the statement, especially that observation to which he refers, in the context of the speech itself, he would come to the conclusion that what the High Commissioner said was quite appropriate in the circumstances, that provinces need greater tax revenue and also that the federal Government needs greater tax revenue.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is that a preview of tonight?

Mr. Starr: In view of what the Prime Minister has just said, that this was an appropriate statement, can he tell us how the Minister of Finance is going to bring about tax cuts tonight?

TERMS OF REFERENCE RESPECTING OFF-SHORE MINERAL RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that additional oil companies have applied for further licences for the exploration of mineral rights off the coast of Nova Scotia, could the Prime Minister advise whether the provinces have agreed on the terms of reference to the Supreme Court of Canada and, if so, when will this reference probably be made?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the terms of reference have now been submitted to the court, but I would like to look into that and I shall make a statement tomorrow.

• (3:30 p.m.)

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Justice.

At noon today I heard that yesterday the minister visited the riding of Villeneuve, one of the fine ridings of Quebec. Indeed, he seems to have been of some help to me.

On that occasion did his Liberal friends from the Malartic area convince him that I am sure to be returned at the next election?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I must say that the hon. member for Villeneuve has been very lucky to represent such a fine riding until now. However, had he attended the meeting for the nomination of a candidate for the next election he would have been slightly disappointed by such enthusiasm on the part of Liberals.

Mr. Caouette: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Did the minister not notice that half the audience were Créditistes?

[Text]

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): I have a question for the Minister of Forestry; I have been curious about this since reading Le Devoir of April 22. What are the results of the Minister's reflection on his political future, and did he find the necessary calm for reflection he sought on his recent trip?

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for being concerned with my fate; but in due time he will see what happens.

FISHERIES

NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST FOR ICEBREAKING ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): I have a question for the Prime Minister. Has the right hon. gentleman received a telegram which reads as follows:

> Fishermen of East Halifax county and Guysborough county are suffering from heavy ice along Eastern coast of Nova Scotia. Respectfully request Federal vessels break up ice and fisheries department extend lobster season.

If so, will the Prime Minister take this matter up with the proper officials in order to provide this very necessary assistance to our Nova Scotia inshore fishing?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I am not sure whether I have received that telegram. In any event I will certainly take it up at once in view of what the hon. Member has said.

[Later:]

Mr. J. E. Lloyd (Halifax): I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries; in a way it is supplementary to the question directed to the Prime Minister by the hon. Member for Queens-Lunenburg.

What steps are being taken by the Department to ascertain the full extent of the damage done by ice along the eastern shore of Nova Scotia particularly in the Port Dufferin, Ecum Secum and the Liscomb areas? I understand that the extent of this damage is such that it has now reached disaster proportions. I wonder what steps have been taken by the officials to ascertain quickly and fully the extent of the losses.

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Although I did not receive such a telegram as was mentioned a while ago by the hon. Member for Queens-Lunenburg—

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Robichaud: I think the hon. Member wishes to intervene to say that the telegram he referred to was to have been sent to the Prime Minister. I agree. But representations were made to me earlier today by the hon. Member for Halifax and the hon. Member for Antigonish-Guysborough, and I have asked officials of my Department to investigate immediately to determine the extent of the damage and ascertain whether it has reached disaster proportions. I wish to make it clear that in such a case representations would have to be made by the Government of the Province.

INDUSTRY

BENEFITS OF CANADA-U.S. AUTOMOBILE AGREEMENT TO CANADIAN CONSUMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Before the Easter recess the right hon. gentleman said he would check the facts in order to determine whether the United States Government was collecting duty on Canadian cars being shipped into the United States, and also that he would give us a more comprehensive report as to the circumstances in which Canadian made Ford cars are being sold at lower prices in Buffalo that those charged to Canadian consumers.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): We have taken steps to secure that information but I believe it has not arrived as yet. We hope it will be here within the next day or so.

SHIPPING

REPORTED COMPLAINTS RESPECTING SHIP "NORTHCLIFFE HALL"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wonder whether in the absence of the Minister of Transport I could direct a question to the Acting Minister and ask whether he or the Department has any knowledge of an accident which befell the S.S. Northcliffe Hall over the week end, a ship which two officers quit before it left Montreal and which has been declared unseaworthy; and whether the Department will conduct an investigation into the allegations and complaints of the seamen aboard this vessel.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): I will take up this matter with the Minister of Transport, who will undoubtedly deal with the question on his return.

INCOME TAX

ACCEPTANCE OF STATEMENTS RESPECTING CHARITABLE DONATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. I regret not having had time to give him notice, but in view of his grasp of the affairs of his Department I am sure he will be able to answer without notice. Can the Minister inform me whether it is Government policy to have officials of the Income Tax Branch question the word of clergymen and other individuals with regard to charitable donations for income tax purposes, which in effect accuses them of making false declarations without proving the charge?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): It is not the policy of the Government or of the Department of National Revenue to accuse anyone falsely.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I should like to take this matter up at ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

• (3:40 p.m.)

LABOUR RELATIONS

FEDERAL INTERVENTION IN STRIKE AT CANADAIR PLANT, MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Labour.

Since contracts let by the Canadian Government to Canadair, are now being carried out, does his department intend to intervene one way or another so as to put an end to the conflict between management and labour which has resulted in a strike of Canadair employees in Montreal?

[Text]

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, it would be certainly an unwarranted intrusion into provincial matters for the Minister of Labour to enter a situation which is within the exclusive authority of the Province of Quebec.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour.

Has he received representations from the United States government asking him to intervene in the settlement of the dispute at Canadair plants? Has the Minister of Labour or the Secretary of State for External Affairs received such representations from the United States government?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I personally did not receive any such representations or request.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

POSSIBLE POSTPONEMENT OF PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, just a short question to the Prime Minister. Is there any foundation for the suggestion that negotiations have been going on or consideration has been given by the various countries of the Commonwealth to a postponement of the date of the Prime Ministers' Conference, which I believe was set earlier for the first or second week of June?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any negotiations or discussions of any kind toward a postponement.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

CENTRAL AGENCY FOR PURCHASE OF GOVERNMENT AUTOMOBILES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address my question to the Minister of Defence Production, but in view of his absence perhaps the President of the Privy Council could answer it. Is it the intention of the Government to set up a central purchasing agency for all non-military cars for Federal use?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would prefer to take that question as notice.

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT

ORDERS FOR NEW COIN SERIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Finance a non-controversial question, and it is this. When is he going to make an announcement to the effect that the Mint will be prepared to take new orders for the coin sets?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I acknowledge that that was a non-controversial question, and I hope it is an indication of the kind of questions that we may have from the hon. gentleman from now on in his new position.

Mr. Starr: There is no guarantee of that.

Mr. Gordon: I undertook, Mr. Speaker, that some time before the end of this month I would make a complete statement on the situation at the Mint, and I hope to do that before the end of this week.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

FEDERAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR INCREASED COST OF OUTPATIENT CARE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to reply to a question that was put to me on April 12 by the hon. Member for Medicine Hat concerning the effect of possible extensions in the hospital insurance plans of Quebec and Alberta to provide certain outpatient services.

While this is a subject which comes more within the responsibility of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I can say that any such extension in services would require an amendment to the existing hospital insurance agreements before any costs could be shared. It is my understanding that no formal request for an amendment of the existing agreement has been received yet from the Province of Quebec, but such a letter was received today in the Department of National Health and Welfare from the Province of Alberta. There has not yet been time to consider the Alberta request, so I am not in a position to give a precise answer to my hon. friend's question.

[Mr. Hales.]

PENSIONS

LEGISLATION RESPECTING SUPERVISION OF PRIVATE PLANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Would the Minister say whether he will soon be introducing the legislation which he forecast on December 18 of last year concerning the supervision of private pension plans for employees who come under Federal jurisdiction?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I hope to be introducing not only that particular piece of legislation but others that I referred to even earlier. I am thinking particularly of the legislation respecting revision of the Bank Act.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the pension legislation be introduced at this session?

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, I hope all this legislation will be introduced at this session.

HATE LITERATURE

CONSIDERATION BY COMMITTEE ON EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to redirect to the Secretary of State for External Affairs the question that I previously asked the Prime Minister, and inquire whether steps will be taken to refer to the External Affairs Committee of this House the subject matter of hate literature, upon which considerable work was done by the Committee at the last session.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sure this is a desirable thing to do. I will see that the necessary arrangements are made through the Chairman of the Committee and that whatever other things must be done to make this possible are done.

THE SENATE

ESTABLISHMENT OF RETIREMENT AGE FOR SENATORS

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council) moved that the House go into Committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the retirement, upon attaining the age of seventy-five years, of any person appointed to the Senate after the coming into force of the said measure; to extend the provisions of the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act to such persons; to provide for the granting of an annuity to any person appointed to the Senate before the coming into force of the said measure who resigns his place in the Senate after having attained the age of seventy-five years or having become afflicted with a permanent infirmity disabling him from the performance of his duties; and to provide further for the granting of an annuity to the widow of a person who was granted such an annuity upon resigning his place in the Senate.

Motion agreed to and the House went into Committee, Mr. Lamoureux in the Chair.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, this proposed legislation envisages a situation whereby Senators will hold their places in the Senate until the age of 75 years is attained, rather than for life as at present. It is proposed that this situation be brought about by the following method: First, that any person summoned to the Senate after the coming into force of this legislation would be subject to compulsory retirement at the age of 75 years. Senators who are now holding their places in the Senate would not be interfered with. However, they would be given the option of retiring with an adequate retiring allowance, if they so wished, on attaining the age of 75 years, or if by reason of health they were unable to carry on.

In other words there are three distinct parts to the legislation. The first part would deal with the amendment of section 29 of the British North America Act to provide for the retirement at age 75 of persons summoned to the Senate in the future. Part two will consist of a series of amendments extending the provisions of the present Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, which now is applicable only to members of the House of Commons, to those members of the Senate who are summoned to the Senate in the future. These persons will be subject to the same retiring allowance legislation as are members of the House of Commons at the present time.

The third part of the proposals envisaged in the legislation is a series of provisions which will apply to Senators already holding their places in the Senate or who are appointed to the Senate before the coming into force of the proposed legislation. These latter provisions will make it possible for Senators who attain the age of 75 years or who have become permanently disabled to resign their places in the Senate and be granted an annuity equal to two thirds of their indemnity. Provision would also be made for an annuity to be granted to the widow of a Senator who during his lifetime had been granted an annuity under the Bill. This would make it possible for such a Senator to resign his place in the Senate with the assurance that if he died, his widow would be provided for. Thus in effect the legislation would provide that future Senators would contribute to a pension scheme in the same manner as members of the House of Commons, and that persons now in the Senate would have an option of retiring with non-contributory annuities similar to those provided for judges.

Now, Mr. Chairman, having outlined the purpose of the legislation and the method being sought to be used, I do not think there is much I can usefully add at this resolution stage. If there are any questions, I will be glad to try to answer them, but I think the three general points are fairly clear, simple and direct, and that the more detailed provisions can be better examined when we see the legislation after the Bill itself is put before the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, may I say at once of this resolution that one might almost term it a fiddling with Senate reform. Indeed, it is simply a generality, that those appointed to the Senate hereafter shall retire at the age of 75, but that no action will be taken among the Senators today occupying that high and august position.

I recall immediately that when we were in office we decided that there should be an age limit of 75, effective for new appointments and for incumbents. It is of interest to recall that on April 9, 1962 I, as the then Prime Minister, moved for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the British North America Act in respect of the Senate. I stated, as reported at page 2607 of Hansard for that date:

> The amendment which will be brought before the House will be restricted to retirement at the age of 75 years of all members in the other place, as well as those who may thereafter be appointed. Provision will be made for a retirement pension for all who are now in the Senate. A resolution to that effect will be placed on the order paper today. I think I should also make it clear now that in the event that this amendment is passed, no appointment of successors to vacancies resulting from the compulsory retirement of Senators under this legislation will be made until after the next general election.

That was the purport and summary of the measures we had in mind. We made it very clear that there would be no appointments made of successors to those who would be automatically retired until after the next election.

First reading of the bill was opposed by the hon. Member for Kootenay West, and the House divided on the question. The only members who voted against introduction and first reading of the bill were seven members belonging to the C.C.F. party of that day, the New Democratic Party of today.

The Bill, first reading of which was agreed to, stated simply as follows:

Section 29 of the British North America Act, 1867 is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"A Senator shall, subject to this Act, hold his place in the Senate until he attains the age of seventy-five years or until the coming into force of this section if at that time he has already attained that age."

The the Bill was described. At the same time, Mr. Chairman, there was a bill to provide for the payment of annuities to persons who had served as members of the Senate, immediately after each and every Senator to which the act applied ceased to hold office.

Now, Sir, the legislation that is envisaged by the resolution is simply a milk and water substitute for the promises that have been made for so many years. One has only to look back a matter of 46 years ago when Senate reform was promised during the 1919 convention of the Liberal Party. I recall very well the election of 1925 when the then Prime Minister, Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, stated that reform of the Senate was a first and a foremost course of action needed to assure democracy in this country. He said the same thing in 1926. I recall so well the promises of that day. He said he was going to substitute live Grits for dead Tories in the Senate. Some of those appointed were only half qualified on the basis of Mr. King's description.

Again in 1935 he was going to reform the Senate. You will recall that he stated that each and every Senator appointed would sign a declaration to the effect that he would voluntarily remove himself at any time that the Prime Minister decided. We do not know how many actually entered into that form of undertaking. On several occasions we endeavoured to secure copies of these resignations in anticipation but nobody was ever able to see them. We tried in 1944, as I recall, and again without success.

What of this measure now before us? Sir, this is simply a watered down type of reform. It is interesting to read about the Senate. It was to provide a sober, second thought. On many occasions throughout the years it has justified its existence. It has stood against an all-powerful House of Commons when members of the Senate believed that bills introduced in the House of Commons, other than money bills, were not representative of the thinking of Canadians as a whole.

It is of interest that numerous articles have been written by pundits and others regarding this subject. I have before me an article written by Bruce Hutchison, who I understand has ambitions. I also understand that another pundit by the name of Blair Fraser has ambitions, and I would recommend to the President of the Privy Council and the Prime Minister a reading of the views of these two hopefuls. On the 27th of February, 1964, Mr. Hutchison wrote an article headed "Don't Shoot the Senate". He said:

Every old reporter must be saddened by the news that Mr. Pearson will reform the Senate, as if a beloved face were about to be changed beyond recognition by plastic surgery. The late Mr. Mackenzie King also undertook to reform the Senate in 1921.

Then he goes on to deal with the real question. I am citing Mr. Hutchison's view to the Prime Minister because Mr. Hutchison has become a monitor to the Government. He went on to say:

The real question, therefore, is not whether Mr. Pearson plans to change the constitution but whether he plans to appoint better Senators.

I am not going into the list of appointments that have been made unless, of course, I am provoked into doing so, but certainly in the appointments that have been made by the present Government there is no indication that the admonitions and advice given by that extracurricular adviser have been carried out. He went on to say:

The Senate could be a generator of basic ideas, an unprejudiced critic, a continual national assize instead of an elderly orphan.

I do not agree with that description of that body. It has been an institution that on occasions in the past has lived up fully to the great traditions and opportunities that those who established the Senate had in mind.

I mentioned too that Mr. Blair Fraser had expressed himself. At the moment I will go no further than to say that he also has expressed himself strongly in this connection. Possibly the only reference I may need to make to Mr. Fraser is that he has stated that in the past the Liberal Party has only made a halfhearted gesture toward carrying out the party's platform pledge of Senate reform, that it brought the matter before the Dominion-Provincial Conference in 1927, and that the conference got nowhere.

As I read the press of Canada it is evident that almost without exception this legislation has been looked upon as simply a sham, simply a means of pretending there is going to be reform, without actually reforming. Indeed, the Toronto Star, never a very great critic of the Government, has stated:

> The Pearson Government has shown a characteristic weakness for half measures in its proposals for Senate reform.

Sir, we were told that we were in a new era of new politics, that all those things that have gone before would be no more. The appointments that have been made indicate that in the field of Senate reform Canadians have not seen a new heaven and a new earth as envisaged by the Liberal party in 1962 and 1963. Indeed, the Canadian Press has dealt with this matter at some length in an article headed "New Politics Pays Off" in which it said:

> The canniest politicians try to protect their rear by making their actions conform as closely as possible to their past pronouncements.

Then it deals with the appointments that have been made and it states that these appointments have been far removed from anything along the lines predicted or indicated in the past.

• (4:10 p.m.)

There has been no fundamental reform, but merely a glossing over of the situation on Senate reform. Today, the composition of the Senate is virtually two to one in favour of Liberal appointees, with three who claim some element of independence.

The matter of Senate reform has been a continuing subject of discussion throughout the years, something like the weather. I think the Prime Minister could continue the course we introduced of having a minister responsible for a portfolio, or several such ministers, in the Senate. I think there would be no particular objection taken by Canadians as a whole if two or three outstanding appointments were made from that body. When I was Prime Minister I tried, so far as possible, to have a larger measure of legislation introduced in the Senate than had been the case in the past. I feel that it would be most helpful if the Prime Minister would designate an ever increasing number of measures to be introduced in that body, so that the fullest possible examination could take place.

After all, this is a wonderful position today. It pays $15,000 a year, and the Senate sits from time to time. It should sit almost as long as does the House of Commons, if given an opportunity to discharge its responsibilities. I would suggest a measure of reform that could be made would be the designating, to a greater extent than ever before, of the number of Bills to be introduced in that body.

Mr. Pearson: I wonder if my hon. friend would permit me to ask him a question? While I certainly do not disagree with what he has been saying, would he approve a change by which money bills would be introduced in the Senate?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, Mr. Chairman, I would not and I made that clear earlier. It would be quite impossible to designate the Senate as a place in which money bills could be introduced. If we were to follow that course we would deprive the House of Commons of its inherent and exclusive right to control money matters. Many other types of legislation could be introduced there and the fullest examination could take place. I, of course, make it very clear, and I am sure the Prime Minister agrees, that there would be no justification whatever for the introduction in that Chamber of measures in the nature of money Bills.

So far as what is introduced here is concerned, I do not think it is of great importance. It is a step, a faltering step. Those who are going to be appointed hereafter will automatically retire at 75. Those who are over 75 can stay if they choose. It is interesting that an appointment to that body seems to be a tremendous encouragement to longevity. Few, if any, of the Senators who are over 75 will retire. Why should they, when they are going to get the indemnity that today is available? Why was it that action was not taken to make effective the retirement at 75? Well, I can only conclude there was a fear on the part of the Government that such a measure might receive opposition in the other place. This is scarcely a sound qualification for the determination of Government policy.

This is simply legislation that makes a step forward, but it is innocuous in so far as being effective today is concerned. However, half a loaf is better than none. What is before the House is merely a shadow of what was contemplated 46 years ago at the Liberal convention. However, 46 years is not a long time to wait for the implementation of Liberal policy.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that the proposal placed before the House is a case of fiddling with Senate reform. However, I was a bit surprised to hear that charge made by the Leader of the Opposition for I find it difficult to discover any substantial difference between the proposal now made by this Government and the proposal that was made by his Government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You had better read it over again.

Mr. Starr: Read both of them, not just one.

Mr. Knowles: I have read both, and as I recall both of them proposed retirement at 75. The only difference is that the Liberals propose that retirement at 75 shall be effective only after the Bill becomes law. On the other hand the Leader of the Opposition, when he brought in his proposal, suggested it be effective to all those appointed after the date on which he announced the proposed change.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You had better read it again.

Mr. Knowles: At any rate, apart from any difference in the effective retirement date, that is the only reform either of them proposed, namely that some Senators retire at age 75. The Leader of the Opposition suggests that half a loaf is better than no bread at all. I am not so sure that this measure is to be regarded in that light. It strikes me that it is the kind of measure that might fool the Canadian people into thinking that something had been done to reform the Senate, and therefore it would be another 46 years before something might be done again.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, if we are going to consider the Senate at all, we ought to come up to date; we ought to recognize that we are in the 1960's. We ought to ask ourselves whether there is any place in our parliamentary institution for a group of people who are not responsible to the electors of this country. I can understand the thinking of the Fathers of Confederation 100 years ago. In that day they believed in democracy, but not completely. There was a lingering notion that in addition to those who are elected by the people there should be some elder statesmen, like the Members of the House of Lords of the United Kingdom, who would have the final say, a veto, a chance to check on the work of the elected Members. But, Mr. Chairman, we have moved a bit in the last 100 years. We no longer think that the elected people have to be vetoed, or checked, or supervised by people who are not elected. In our view the House of Commons, consisting of Members elected by the people of Canada, should be the final court so far as the making of laws is concerned.

I am putting this forward in a very low key. I do not need to shout our position from the housetops because it has been well known throughout the years of the C.C.F. and since the founding of the New Democratic Party, namely, that we believe the Senate ought to be abolished. We think that any measure of reform, particularly so ineffective a measure as this, is hardly worth the time it takes us to deal with it.

I know the arguments in favour of having the Senate. With 23 other Members of the House of Commons I had the experience during the Christmas recess of sitting on a joint committee which had 12 members from the other place, and I know their contributions to the work of that committee were very useful. I also know that from time to time the Senate sets up interesting and useful committees. They had one on employment a while ago, one on the use of land, and one on aging. These are all good committees and their Honours do interesting and useful work. But this is the kind of work to be done by people appointed for that purpose, and ought not to be done by people who enjoy the same status that the elected representatives do, but with the additional right to veto legislation passed by the people's elected representatives.

Perhaps because in the United Kingdom the House of Lords cannot finally veto legislation, but can only delay its passage, or perhaps from the fact that in the United States the veto of the President can be overridden by a two thirds vote of the two houses of Congress, —whatever the origin—there is a notion held generally in Canada that the Senate can only go so far, that it can only turn down legislation once, twice or three times, or something like that.

However, the constitutional position is that the Senate could block a measure passed by the House, year after year, to the end of time. I know this has never happened. I know that the number of times the Senate has vetoed something passed in the House of Commons has been very limited. The outstanding example is the first old age pensions Act back in 1926, and two or three matters in the years from 1957 to 1963. I know the Senate does not do this very often, but it has, as a constitutional entitlement, the right to say no to what the people's elected representatives have decided. In terms of political theory, in terms of democratic practice, I think this is wrong, and that we should be taking a serious look at the position of a non-elected body in our parliamentary institution.

Another point sometimes made is that the Senators are there to protect minority rights, and in particular to protect provincial rights.

I suggest however that that is no more their function than it is the function of the House of Commons and also that of the courts. I further suggest that we have had the Senate for 98 years, that our Federal-Provincial situation is not all that it might be, and that having the Senate has not taken care of that problem.

It seems to me that all the various arguments for the retention of a second House, particularly a non-elected one, fall to the ground, and that what the House of Commons, should have placed before it on this occasion is not some measure of ineffective reform but rather a measure for the abolition of the Senate.

Hon. Members are aware I have such a bill on the Order Paper as a private Members' public bill, but it does not have quite the same chance of being reached, let alone the chance of being voted on, as a Government measure has.

As I have said, these arguments have been stated time and time again. They are frequently the subject of debate in high schools and universities. The subject has frequently come up here, and before we proceed with a measure of this kind I submit this is the kind of consideration we ought to be giving the subject.

I see, Mr. Chairman, that you are fidgeting a bit. Maybe it is just in my mind, but I wonder if perhaps you were thinking I was getting away from the subject of the resolution by talking about the abolition of the Senate, when all we have before us is a limited measure of Senate reform. But I want to make it clear that I do not agree with the position of the Leader of the Opposition, namely that by reforming the Senate we should be giving it more responsibility, more voice and more legislation. Members of the other place, fine ladies and gentlemen that they are, are not elected by the people of Canada and I do not think they should have the role in our parliamentary institution that is accorded them by our constitution—and I believe that is the change we ought to be making, namely the abolition of the Senate itself.

I should now like to say a word or two about the specific terms of the resolution, and particularly about the outline of those terms as given to us by the President of the Privy Council. I not that the Bill is to have three main parts and that the first part is to carry out the main proposal, to provide for an amendment to the British North America Act whereby all persons appointed to the Senate after the passage of this legislation shall be compulsorily retired at age 75. As I have already said, that is an ineffective piece of legislation that does not really amount to anything, in the face of what ought to be done.

The second part of the proposed Bill is to make provision for those who, having been appointed after the coming into effect of this legislation will be compelled to retire at 75, to give them the rights and privileges that Members of the House of Commons enjoy under the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act. I suppose if Members are going to be summoned to the Senate for a limited period of time, and if we are in an age when we feel that all classes of employment should have certain pension rights, then Members of the Senate appointed under these conditions should also have pension rights. But I want to object—and I ask the Prime Minister to listen to me on this—I want to object most strongly to what has been indicated as part III of the bill.

If I heard the President of the Privy Council correctly he said that provision would be made for those who are now in the Senate, and those who are appointed between now and the time the Bill becomes law, on reaching 75 to retire voluntarily on a pension that I understand will be non-contributory, a free pension equal to two-thirds of their present indemnity. The present indemnity of a Senator is $12,000 a year. Two thirds of that is $8,000 a year. We are therefore saying to any Senator who is now for example 50 years of age that for the next 25 years he gets an indemnity of $12,000, plus his $3,000 expense allowance; and then, at age 75, without having contributed one nickel to a pension fund he can retire, if he wishes to do so, on an $8,000 pension, plus provision for a widow's pension if he should die after he goes on that pension.

Let me divorce all of this, however, from what I am saying about the Senate as an institution. I think it should go. Apparently I cannot carry that idea today, so I have to deal with the situation as it is. I feel that in present situation, when we in this house have a pension plan to which we contribute, when we have just set up a Canada Pension Plan on a contributory basis and when it is accepted by most people that pensions are theirs as a right, because they have earned them by working for them and paying for them, to pick out this particular group of men and women and say "You do not have to pay one cent for this; if you do us the favour of retiring so that we can appoint someone else we shall give you absolutely free a pension of $8,000 a year" is entirely wrong. If I have misunderstood the President of the Privy Council I hope he will correct me, but I understood him to say this was to be an annuity on a non-contributory basis equal to two-thirds of the present indemnity. Remember, this is to be paid to persons who may have been drawing this indemnity for 20 years. I think the Government should reconsider this aspect of its proposals by providing that if such pensions are to be made available, the people concerned should be asked to pay for them.

Mr. McIlraith: Could I ask a question by way of clarification? How would the hon. Member get such persons to retire at the age of 75?

An hon. Member: Make it compulsory.

Mr. McIlraith: How would you get the Bill passed?

Mr. Knowles: The hon. Gentleman asks how the Government would get the Bill passed. In other words, this is a bribe. The Government is bribing the Senators to retire at 75 by offering them a free pension of $8,000. That is the import of the question which the President of the Privy Council has just asked.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder whether I could ask the hon. Member to address himself to the question itself. These incumbents hold office for life. If they are to retire at 75, how do you bring about such legislation to retire them at 75?

Mr. Knowles: Rather than be guilty of offering them a bribe I would let them live it out, because it seems to me this principle is wrong. When the pension plan affecting Members of the House of Commons was brought into being there were quite a few here, including the President of the Privy Council and myself, who had a number of years of service. We were given the right to elect to cover those past years of service but we had to make payments in respect of them.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the hon. Member not agree that we were in the position that we were not here for life? We had to face the electorate every four years or so. We are not holding our positions as Members of the House of Commons for life as a right.

Mr. Knowles: It seems to me that the President of the Privy Council has strengthened the case I am making. We were in a less favourable position, yet we still had to pay in respect of past service. The hon. Gentleman is saying that this is the only way he can expect the Senators to support this bill.

Mr. McIlraith: He was not saying that. He was asking a question.

Mr. Knowles: True, the President of the Privy Council was only asking a question, but the implications were clear. I would think that if the Senators cannot be persuaded to retire because it is right in principle, no such offer should be made to them.

Even though I have said many critical things about the Senate as an institution, I know a good many of them over there; there are many decent, upright and honourable people in the other place and I think most of them would agree in principle that they should pay for their pensions, just as we have to pay for ours. If they do not agree with this proposition I suggest they should not be given this pension as a bribe.

Speaking of the general situation there is, of course, provision for widows' pensions. This is a matter which, I know, concerns some of the Senators. When a Senator dies there is nothing for his widow. But if the pension, even if it had to be paid for, included a widow's pension, Senators might take a different view toward it than is now the case. When I looked at the resolution I wondered whether it was in effect an attempt to bribe Senators to vote in favour of the measure, but even I was not suspicious enough to think that this was the case. However, the question asked by the President of the Privy Council makes it clear that this is a bribe as the Government sees it. The Government wants to get this measure through. It wants some of the Senators to retire at the age of 75 and it has decided that the only way to accomplish this is to offer them a free pension of $8,000 at age 75. In a day when we have not yet got the old age security pension up to $100 a month or $1,200 a year; in a day when we have not found it possible to increase the pensions of retired civil servants or retired employees of the Canadian National Railways; in a day when, despite various improvements, we are still struggling with the problem of providing adequate pensions for our people, I do not think this Parliament should approve offering to those who have enjoyed indemnities for a lengthy period of time the kind of annuity which is now suggested. I do not think this phase of the legislation should receive the support of the House and I hope that before the Bill is brought down the Government will take a further look at this aspect of it.

We think this is a case of fiddling with Senate reform in an ineffective way. What should be done is to provide for its abolition so that our Parliament can be a truly democratic institution composed only of men and women elected by the citizens of Canada.

Mr. Thompson: I must say I am very disappointed by the resolution before us. I fail to understand why the Government should have taken such a "milquetoast" approach to this question. This is nothing but a minute and timid attempt to initiate a measure of Senate reform. Possibly the Government did not wish to come forward with proposals for a major overhaul; but why did it not bring forward at least one or two firm proposals indicative of a desire to correct some of the faults and shortcomings of the institution which we refer to as the other place? I urge the Government to amend its intentions, at least as they concern this phase of the resolution respecting the retirement of future Senators at the age of 75.

I have many good friends in the Senate and I highly respect many of the men and women who compose that body. I believe they have a worth-while contribution to make. From my conversations with them I would say that most of them have no objection to constructive proposals. They realize that the institution is antiquated. I cannot understand what pressures on the Government would result in the bringing forward of a bill which has so little backbone. If the establishment of a retirement age is a legitimate part of Senate reform, why not make it effective now? In recognition of the fact that no provision has been made for Senators who retire, it would be logical to make some provision. I do not go along with the hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre when he says they have not made any contribution—they have not had a chance to contribute. His suggestion may be something for the future. But even if they were retired at $8,000 a year now, that would save the Government of Canada $7,000 a year per Senator.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles: That would cost $15,000 plus $8,000, or a total of $23,000.

Mr. Thompson: We are talking now about setting the retirement at age 75. I really do hope that the Government are not going to bring in a Bill that is as insipid as this resolution indicates it is going to be. I do not think this is the time for entering into any lengthy debate on Senatorial reform, although I find it very amusing to listen to the Leader of the Official Opposition as he talks about what he had once planned to do. Certainly if he had wanted to bring in Senatorial reform long ago, he would have done it while he was in office. I do not think there has been any Prime Minister of Canada who has made such political use out of the Senate as did the former Prime Minister, now the Leader of the Official Opposition. I do not think there is much argument as far as concerns what should have been done in the past, but we must have our eyes to the future.

I for one certainly am not in favour of the abolition of the Senate. I think the Senate has a very important role to play, and I think we must be very cautious in taking an irrevocable stand on saying that even an appointed Senate does not have a responsible role. There are some advantages in an appointed Senate that an elected Senate cannot have. But on the other hand, to suggest that the Senate in its present state of affairs is anything but an antiquated piece of machinery that no longer fills a very useful role, or that it should be perpetuated even until future Senators reach 75 years of age is not, I think, putting on coloured glasses; it is just putting on glasses that cannot be seen through at all—because certainly there are some changes that should be brought into the Senatorial picture.

I think that one of the tragedies and certainly one of the weaknesses of the present Senate is that it does not properly represent political opinion, thinking and action in the various Provinces. Certainly it has not brought into the Senate the best qualified individuals in Canada who might have been, if the Senate had operated on any other basis than being a political arm of the particular party which was responsible for government. I would have hoped that at this stage the Government would have taken some step which would have made Provincial representation in the Senate possible. It is the prerogative of the Federal Government to appoint Senators; but what a tremendous opportunity there would have been toward establishing a greater sense of political unity if the Government were to have set up a Senatorial Commission, perhaps of three people, one representing the Government, one from the Senate itself and one appointed by the Government of the Province which was concerned in any specific Senatorial appointment.

How much stronger and how much more representative of Canadian thinking and public opinion the Senate would have been if there had been representation of Provincial Governments in the Senate.

I think another point that really is basic, and does not get into many of the more detailed problems that a complete Senatorial overhaul would require is action which would have eliminated the conflict of interest which now besets many of our Senators as they serve in the Senate. Why should they not be subject to the same restrictions, so far as a dual interest or a conflict of interest is concerned, as we are in this House? There was no better example of this than the recent Senatorial Committee on Banking which dealt with three different bills that would have set up or given authority to the establishment of three new banks in Canada. It so happened that the majority, if not all, of the members of that Senatorial Banking Committee were themselves members of the boards of directors of other banks already in existence. It seems to me that included in this legislation could very well have been the requirement that Senators have the same restrictions placed upon them which was intended to eliminate conflict of interest in so far as their public responsibilities are concerned.

I think that likewise if the Government had been concerned about the welfare of the Senators who hold appointments at the present time they might have set up some machinery by which a pension could have been provided for those who retire before they reach 75 years of age. In other words, there is nothing wrong at all with a contributory pension scheme for those who might be appointed under any new system of appointment.

I think another point that would have been very important here would have been to bring some attendance requirement into the Senate. All that is necessary now is that a Senator appear once in any session. Why should not Senators be required to fill a minimum requirement as far as attendance and participation are concerned, as we do in this House? These are small things, Mr. Chairman, that would not have required amendments to the British North America Act, which would have been a positive step toward an over-all Senatorial reform pattern and which could have been included in this legislation. I believe such action would have indicated to the Canadian people that the Government really was sincere in its intention of bringing in Senatorial reforms. As it is now, this insipid suggestion that is supposed to give benefit a little later on really has not any worth whatsoever to it. It is a sham or a cover-over in order to make the people of Canada think there has been some step taken toward reforming the Senate.

I am concerned, as one who believes that the Senate has a place, that the whole purpose and usefulness of the Senate in the eyes of public opinion has been weakened, and if continued in this way it might well lead us to a point where public opinion will demand the abolition of the Senate. I think this certainly would not be in the best interests of the country. I would like to see Senate appointments set up through a Senatorial Commission, not only so this Commission could consider the recommendations of the Provinces but also that Senators appointed would represent the Provinces as well as the Federal Government, and also making possible non-partisan political appointments. Men and women selected because of their own service to Canada and their own abilities on the Canadian scene in the non-political fields would make the Senate of much more worth. I am thinking of men in education, men in business, retired civil servants—yes, even retired military personnel—and men in the arts. All these people, if they had an opportunity to come into the Senate free of any partisan political influence, would make the Senate certainly a much more effective, much more efficient and much more useful institution.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, I would just close my remarks by saying that I hope the Government will seriously consider some of these suggestions before the Bill is actually brought before the House. The intended legislation could be strengthened, first of all by making retirement at 75 effective now, with adequate provisions to take care of those who may have no pension scheme under the present set-up; then by adding some of the other proposals which have been made. If this were done, then truly I think the Government would get the support of the House. As it is now I am concerned that they will not get support, even to take or bring into reality this very minute step which they are now suggesting. Certainly the Government has a great responsibility to those in their own ranks who have talked about Senatorial reform, as well as to others in this House who have made suggestions, but most of all it has a responsibility to the Canadian people.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, this resolution is some sort of a draft for the bill which will be introduced here eventually.

I thought it would contain other provisions than the one setting the retirement age of senators at 75, giving present incumbents the choice of retaining their seat even if they are past the age of retirement or to retire with full benefits as far as pension and other benefits are concerned if they have reached the age of 75.

How many senators are 75 or more at present? I should like to have a reply from the President of the Privy Council on that point.

On the other hand, I would suggest that if the bill to be introduced provides for retirement of senators at the age of 75, that provision apply to everyone whether one wants to retire or not. I even find that 75 is a rather advanced age; it should be 70. Considering the difficult task which they have to fulfil in the other house, I believe that when they reach 70 years of age, they have worked long enough to be entitled to retirement.

This would enable us to have a younger Senate who would understand better present day problems, not only with regard to one part of the country but concerning Canada as a whole. A little while ago the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) was telling us that he and his government had introduced a bill for that purpose a few years ago when there were 208 Conservative members in the House of Commons and that the Liberals had then voted against this measure as well as the New Democratic Party members, the CCF at that time.

The Liberal government is now introducing such a bill and the opposition does not know whether to vote for it or against it.

This is a clear evidence of the lack of seriousness of the two political parties who succeeded each other at the head of the government of Canada since Confederation. It is nevertheless the Canadian people who pay for the nonsense indulged in on either side with regard to the Senate, the senators and the setting of a retirement age.

A little later, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said that himself and his party were in favour of the abolition of the Senate purely and simply.

Considering the present constitution and structure of the Senate, I believe that its abolition would be in no way prejudicial to the Canadian people but, on the contrary, would be greatly profitable because we waste a lot of time while waiting for the decisions to be made in the other place.

For instance, we would support Senate reforms which would make for a more representative Senate. For instance, agriculture should be represented by one or more senators coming from the farming community. We would need representatives of the unions to speak for the working classes in Canada; representatives of professional groups such as teachers, lawyers, physicians, engineers, economists and industrialists. There should also be in the Senate someone to speak for our young people, someone who could defend the interests of that large and important segment of our society. There should also be representatives of women's associations, not necessarily representatives of Liberal, Conservative or Créditiste women's associations, but simply representatives of women's associations in Canada. Also, in the religious community, the various religions existing in Canada should have respective spokesmen in the Senate. Then, Mr. Chairman, to my mind the Senate would no longer be a haven for worn-out politicians, but rather a dignified and efficient assembly representing the whole people of Canada.

That is the provisions for Senate reform that I would have liked to see in this resolution instead of the mere fixing of an age limit of 75. I am convinced that at 75 years of age, one is too old to be a senator. Surely, there are good senators; I have nothing against any of them. But what we disapprove is the principle according to which, at the present time, the Senate is made up and organized and according to which senators are appointed to the upper chamber.

Those are the remarks I wanted to make concerning this resolution which provides for the retirement upon attaining the age of 75 years, of members of the Senate.

We suggest that the age provision be changed to 70 years when this bill is being drafted. But if it is imperative to fix the age limit at 75 years, if a senator is 77 years old when this bill is passed, he should then retire on pension, if he wants to. That has been agreed to since last year.

Mr. Chairman, we are for a reform of the Senate. We do not approve of the Senate as it is now constituted.

[Text]

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, in opening my brief remarks this afternoon I have found that there have been some rather wide-sweeping condemnations of the other place, and I am just wondering whether those remarks would have been quite as sincere if some representatives of the Parties in question had themselves been members of the other place. I think that some of the criticisms made of the other place are quite equivocal, and it is because there are particular hobby-horses or axes to grind that we hear such sweeping condemnations.

In a democracy I think it is absolutely essential that we protect the interests of the public from the tyranny of the temporary majority. Majorities are not always right, and I think it is essential that we do have an opportunity for review. In a democracy efficacy is not necessarily the byword. If it does sometimes take a little longer to get something through, certainly that so-called sober second thought is worth while. The Senate is an essential portion of Parliament and I find it absolutely ludicrous and, frankly, presumptuous of Members of this House, who after all form only one third of the constituents of Parliament, to offer such criticisms. According to our constitution, Parliament is composed of the Crown, of the Senate and of the Commons, and we owe one another respect, in accordance with our constitution, as constituting the Parliament of this country. I think it is presumptuous on the part of individuals in this chamber roundly to condemn the other constituent of Parliament, merely because it is fashionable to do so. Certainly suggestions for the improvement and modification of Parliament can be made, but if it is acceptable that we have every right roundly to condemn the other place they in turn have the right to condemn us, without mitigation. In that event I think hon. Members of this House might find themselves somewhat aggrieved if the other place, either as individuals or collectively, were to censure this House continually. I believe that we as a constituent of Parliament owe a certain respect to the institution of Parliament within this democracy.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Having said that, I think that certainly some modifications in the constitution of the other place may be suggested. The hon. Member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) said that his group would consider the age of 70 as a limitation on membership in the other place, because after that a man may be too old. Will he apply the age of 70 to this House?

[Mr. Lambert.]

Mr. Caouette: Would the hon. Member permit a question?

Mr. Lambert: No, I will deal with it later.

Mr. Caouette: Why not? Just one question.

An hon. Member: Are you afraid?

Mr. Lambert: No, I am not afraid. I do not care what age limit the hon. Member wishes to impose upon the other place, but if he says they have no right to be members of the other place because they are too old—

Mr. Caouette: I never said they have no right.

Mr. Lambert: Well, the implication is that they are too old. I am dealing with the criticism and the hon. Gentleman indicated it is the intention of his Party to advance an amendment calling for retirement at the age of 70. I am subject to correction but I thought that was the burden of his remarks. He said that the purpose of setting the limitation of the age of 70 was that by that age a man had gone far past his prime and it was time he retired. If that sort of criticism can be levelled at the other place, it is equally opposite in this House; but I would certainly think it would be most unfair to suggest that because a man had reached the age of 70 he could no longer qualify for membership in this House. Many a world leader and many a worthy leader of this House in years gone by would have found himself cut off when he was really in his prime in the face of such a limitation.

It is true that we have applied an arbitrary yardstick in other fields which compels retirement at the age of 65, but with the advance in science today I am not too sure that is a really valid concept. I think that compulsory retirement at age 65 is a depression complex yardstick, imposed because of a desire to make way for younger persons on the ground that they need the jobs. I cannot fully accept that proposition. Certainly many younger men may be impatient about replacing their elders but I would suggest to hon. Members that we must be very careful about the imposition of an arbitrary retirement age.

There is of course a norm of sorts that is applied in our courts, such as the Supreme Court of Canada and our Superior Courts, which results in the retirement of judges at age 75, the age that is set forth in the resolution. I suppose one might accept the age of 75 as a yardstick, provided this fact is known before appointment to the office. Certainly I think it is more arguable that it is a more legitimate age for retirement than age 70 or age 65, in that I think it should apply in this House as well as in the other place.

Mr. Caouette: Will the hon. Member permit a question? There is all the difference in the world between the two Houses.

Mr. Lambert: If the hon. Member is trying to make the point that superior intellects and superior beings are the prerogative of this House as opposed to the other place, I certainly do not find that argument acceptable.

Mr. Caouette: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Lambert: The hon. Member can make his speech again during the next round. Having regard to the limitations of the resolution, I think the resolution puts forward a just proposal to members of the other place, in that those who are now members of the Senate and may wish to retire at the age of 75 can do so on the basis of a pension of some kind. After all, they were appointed to the other place on the understanding and in accordance with the tradition that their appointments were for life, and I think that many of them have made changes in their lives, to their prejudice. I know some members of the other place who have made changes in their lives, to their prejudice, and it would be unfair to say to them now that they must go, and go without a pension. In all fairness I do not think we can take that attitude. I am expressing a personal point of view when I say that.

If hon. Gentlemen of the other place are placed under a contributory pension scheme, it seems to me that this is also fair. A pension scheme or retirement pension is part and parcel of mandatory retirement in any line of endeavour today, unless one is self-employed, in which case one is encouraged to provide for his own retirement on an annuity basis. I would say that such provision must be made for hon. Members of the other place if we are going to get men from all walks of life. In that regard may I say that I do not think the other place should be preserved for retirement from this House. I think the composition of the Senate has perhaps been somewhat limited. The ins always say it is quite all right to appoint those of one's own political party but when they are in the outs it is a different story. I could use the old adage that there is no greater traditionalist or reactionary than the rebel who has assumed power. In my view there should perhaps be wider representation in the other place, but should a man be disqualified simply because he belongs to a certain political party? In the other place there have been and are at this time eminent representatives of various types of organizations and interests, and their appointments have been made on that basis rather than the fact that they have been members of a particular party.

Somehow or other I fail to see why, because an hon. Member has reached a certain stage of service in this House and it is felt perhaps he should take a less demanding role, and is then appointed to the other place, the position of the other place suffers thereby. I do not understand this glib assumption that because one is a politician or has been a Member of this House he is therefore some sort of second class or second rate citizen. I do not understand why he should be immediately suspect when he goes to the Senate because he has taken part in the deliberations of this House. There is the suggestion that the Senate is composed of retired ward-heelers or suspect politicians. I reject that theory entirely. We have seen very able men who have retired from the hurly-burly, the more demanding pace of this House, and who have gone on to render great service to Parliament.

Personally, I should like to see more Government business initiated in the other place. Personally, again, I should like to see Members from the other place represented on the treasury benches, as is done in Westminster. They have Members of the House of Lords, up to one third of the Cabinet, participating in the Cabinet. There are other Ministers or Parliamentary Secretaries who cover for them in the House of Commons. I feel this is quite legitimate. I should like to see more Members from the Senate participating in the Cabinet. I am expressing a personal point of view. I should like to see as well more of the non-financial business of the House start in the other place.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think that in the main this measure meets with general approval of the House. There may be matters of detail—I said "general approval of the House", but there are some hon. Members who feel that the other place should be abolished. Well, perhaps somebody in the other place might stand up one of these days and say the House of Commons should be abolished. I do not know that anything is gained by debate at this level. I therefore limit my discussion at this time. When we are able to see the Bill there may be some provisions which will require further discussion.

Mr. Howard: It will be recalled, Mr. Chairman, that I had some comments to make about the Senate in the immediately preceding session during the course of the consideration of the estimates. I do not want to go over that ground again at this time. However, we have before us a specific measure upon which I should like to make a few comments. The gist of it is that Senators should be retired at age 75. Whether or not this measure is to apply in the future or retroactively to those who are there now is really immaterial to the main point.

This leaves me in a bit of a quandary as to how to approach this resolution, because it has always seemed to me that as soon as a person was appointed to the Senate he became retired whether he was 35 or 45. We only have to look at many of the recent appointments, both by the Government now in office and its predecessor, to see that that is exactly the case. People appointed to the Senate suddenly slip into oblivion, and are content to live the easy life of retirement and get a decent income for the rest of their lives. It seems a bit ridiculous to be talking now of putting into effect the retirement plan at age 75 when these gentlemen over there are retired almost as soon as they enter the hallowed halls of the other place. People refer to the other place but, unfortunately, I cannot bring myself to referring to it in this way. This has always seemed to me to be similar to lawyers calling each other learned gentlemen, with a sneer on their face. I would sooner refer to it as the Senate, which is what it is, and not try to upgrade it or degrade it by referring to it as the other place.

The implication of the measure before us is that a person who is appointed to political office ceases to be of any value in that office once he becomes 75. Age, as was mentioned by the hon. Member for Edmonton West, seems to be indicated as a factor which impinges upon the faculties. Perhaps the thought is that one becomes relatively valueless after 75 and therefore a retirement age should be set. If this is the thought behind the measure, then I submit we should have before us a companion measure to retire Members of Parliament at age 75. After all, we place a limit on the other end. We say that people below the age of 20 are not competent enough, do not have enough acumen, to sit in this place. I feel therefore we should place a limit at the other end and have before us a companion piece of legislation. The application of it is identical. It does not really matter that people get to one place by the political selection of the Government in office and to the other place in the normal process of election. The implication is that a person at age 75 is not competent enough to sit in the legislative bodies of this nation. We should I submit make that applicable to this House as well as to the Senate.

[Mr. Lambert.]

One of the parts of the measure now before us in the resolution constitutes a bribe, because what we are in effect attempting to do is to offer the Senators who are there now a bribe of $8,000 a year if they will retire at age 75. They do not have to make any contribution toward this pension. A Senator who is now 50 years of age can attend one session of the Senate once every two years and at age 75, without contributing a single cent, can leave the Senate and draw $8,000 a year. If there is going to be an annuity or something of this nature, to induce Senators to retire at age 75, then I submit it should be a contributory plan. They should avail themselves of the Members of Parliament retirement allowance and contribute just the same as the Members here contribute to a pension, and just as Senators who are appointed in the future will be required to contribute. To ask Parliament to grant $8,000 per year as a gift to any Senator who wants to retire at age 75 is going a little bit too far, being a little bit too lenient, with the taxpayers' money.

Heaven knows, a Senator receives a good pension as it is now, without tossing this extra amount of money down the drain. I think it is not simply a question of retiring Senators in the future at 75, as much as it is offering to the Senators at the moment a bribe to retire at age 75 if they desire to do so, or offering a potential bribe in the future if they will only give speedy passage to this particular measure which is being presented to us.

There has been a great deal of discussion about reform of the Senate and about the necessity for having respect for it, but I submit that respect is a thing which must be earned, and if the Senate does not have much respect for itself I do not see why it should require other people, including Members of this House, to have respect for it.

To me the Senate, by its past actions, is beyond reform. It is not possible to reform it, no matter how much we juggle the rules. Recently I read perhaps as decent and succinct an analysis as one could find of the Senate called, "The Senate of Canada—a Political Conundrum," by John Napier Turner. Incidentally that is the same name as the Parliamentary Secretary, the hon. Member for St. Lawrence-St. George. Whether it is the same person or not I could not say, but I am sure if it is not he will stand up in his place one of these days and deny he ever wrote such an article as this, which rips the Senate fore and aft and ridicules it as a rather useless entity and appendage to our political system.

I shall not read any excerpts from his article, which was published in 1961, not too long ago; but for a person with the ability and knowledge of the hon. Member for St. Lawrence-St. George it would indeed be strange if he has changed his mind in the short period of four years, since he wrote such a devastating, ridiculing article about the Senate.

Mr. Herridge: Was he a member of the Liberal Party then?

Mr. Howard: It is difficult to say whether he was or not at that time, but it is a fact that once one becomes a Member of the Liberal party one always looks for higher things, and when one becomes a Parliamentary Secretary there are no bounds to one's ambitions and hopes. Perhaps those who do not find their way into the Cabinet may discover they are valueless to the Cabinet and so they get to the Senate, and maybe this is the ambition of some Members on the other side.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, these mutterings on the other side should be expressed in a formal way so that the whole chamber can be appraised of the pearls of wisdom these hon. Gentlemen have respecting the measure before us.

If we want to reform the Senate, if there is a serious desire on the part of the Government to reform the Senate, then I submit the approach it should take is not to piddle around with this halfhearted, weak-kneed measure here, but to place the Senate on an elected basis, the same as is the situation in the United States.

I am not drawing an exact parallel between the political system down there, and saying it should apply here, but if we are to have a Senate that is worth while, a Senate that will fulfil the role conceived for it by the Fathers of Confederation, a Senate that is representative of political thought in this nation, a Senate that is to be somewhat representative of political opinion in the provinces, a Senate that is to be a useful functioning part that would gain respect within our political system, we should abolish it as an appointed political body and elect ten members to it from each Province, so that all Provinces would have equal representation in it.

By establishing whatever political boundaries are necessary within the Provinces for electoral districts we would have Members elected from within the Provinces. I am not concerned with details such as that, but if we were to place the Senate on an elected basis we would have another functioning body in our parliamentary system for which we could have respect, and which would be on equal terms, as it were, with Members in this place, because periodically Members of such a Senate would have to go back home and justify their existence to the people—and it is only the people who count in a political system, it is only the people's welfare and wishes that count in a political democracy.

As it is now, the people in the Senate have to give justification to no one. They can be as incompetent as they like, as lazy as they like, and as disrespectful of their positions as they like. They may not even bother to attend sessions. They can loll in their offices all day, and even not show up on the premises for months on end. There is no accounting to any one, and this is not sensible or reasonable in a political democracy.

Senators should have the responsibility to go back periodically to the electorate to justify their existence, and if the electorate feels they have been doing a reasonable job and they are re-elected, then well and good. If the electorate decides to change the Senators, then well and good too; because that is the essence of the political democracy built up in the western world over many centuries, namely, the opportunity of the people to make the final choice. But so far as the Senate is concerned the people do not have the opportunity to make the final choice. The people have no opportunity to make any choice whatever because the Senate is a haven for broken down political hacks, party givers and people who become relatively useless in political life elsewhere.

I am not in favour of the resolution before us. The position of our party is clear, namely that we should abolish the Senate. We feel this is fraught with some difficulty because we will have to get the consent of the Senate itself in order to abolish it; but where there's a will there's a way, and I submit that if the Government had a sincere desire to do something worth while for the Senate it would withdraw the resolution presently before us and put something on the order paper that had some meat in it, that would reflect its sincere and honest desire for reform. But perhaps it is asking too much for this Government to be sincere or to be honest.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, I would give much on this occasion, as on many others, to be able to speak with that firm determination, that absolute certainty of mind that the previous speaker exhibited. I hope I am not being too unfair to him when I suggest to Members of the Committee that one of the reasons I cannot speak in that way is that I feel that on both questions there is some doubt, and even on those questions where I think the balance of the argument is pretty preponderant on one side, there is usually enough doubt that I could not speak with that amount of certainty.

But did I belong to the hon. Member's Party perhaps I could understand him. They, after all, not only have no Members in the Senate, but I am sure most hon. Members will agree that under our present political system they are never likely to be in the position to get a Member of theirs in the Senate. It is therefore with some scepticism that we heard this last remark of the hon. Member about honesty and sincerity. We know that in the views of the Members of that Party only those in the N.D.P. are honest; and therefore, since there are no Members of that Party in the Senate, undoubtedly you would search in vain to find an honest Senator.

We have heard the hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre, as well as the hon. Member for Skeena, reflect the view that it is only the members of the N.D.P. who are intelligent, and therefore how could we expect any intelligent contribution to the Parliament of Canada from that part of our Parliament which has no representation from that Party? I am sure that, considering the certainty with which those hon. Members speak on any and every subject which comes up, we all realize it is only the members of the N.D.P. who take the trouble to get themselves informed on any subject. It is only they who, indeed, are qualified because of their vast knowledge and experience in every line of endeavour from banking to ditchdigging to give advice on each and every point, and we cannot expect anything like the same standards from the other House because there are no members of the New Democratic Party in it. While members of that party are much too modest to tell us how hard working and diligent they are, I infer, sometimes, from the way in which they tell us that Members of this House or in the other House have not really applied themselves to their tasks, that they feel they have a monopoly when it comes to diligence and hard work, and that this being the case it would be useless to expect diligence and hard work from any Member of the other place. Feeling so convinced, on such very strong grounds, that the Senate is useless, they would naturally feel they were being less than honest if they were to suggest that any Member of the other place was worthy of his hire. Since the virtues I have mentioned are the sole prerogatives of the New Democratic Party it follows that they are completely absent from the other place. Therefore, I for one have no doubt as to the absolute sincerity of the hon. Member for Skeena and the hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre in feeling it is their bounden duty to hound the other place out of existence. I think they honestly believe that any legislative body in this country upon which their Party is not represented must lack virtues which most of us feel are most important, if not essential, in any legislature.

• (5:30 p.m.)

However, I cannot myself speak with such a degree of certainty as the hon. Member for Skeena and his friends. In the same way I have reservations, for instance as to whether the age of 21 is really a better choice than the age of 18 when it comes to eligibility for voting. The question of the abolition of the Senate is one on which arguments could be made from both sides. But knowing something of what has gone on in the other House, having from time to time taken the trouble to listen to some very fine and informative speeches in that chamber, having read something of the work of its committees and knowing something of the dedication to democracy, the tremendous background of experience and information which those hon. gentlemen have brought to bear on the task before them, I am left in some doubt as to my willingness to agree with the hon. Member for Skeena, the hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre and, indeed, with their whole Party, that these men and women are somehow an inferior class. In fact, some of us who are capable of a touch of modesty—and I know the hon. Member for Skeena will find this hard to understand—sometimes feel we could learn a lot by listening to the voice of experience.

I found many of the statements made by the hon. Member for Skeena most insulting to the other House. I will admit there are Members of the Senate who apparently, from what I have been able to observe, do not work as hard as do some others. I have seen evidence from time to time that some are more capable than others. But I do resent, almost as a friend might, the insinuation that we should take for granted that there is no one in the other House who makes a worthwhile contribution, and that this is equally true of the work of the Senate as a whole.

I will say this: The method and the manner in which the hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre uses his knowledge of the rules of the House, the interpretation he sometimes places on those rules in order to give a political twist to some of the questions facing us while seeming to insist that politics is the subject furthest from his mind, is entirely consistent with the arguments he and his friends now present in connection with the Senate. It is of course democracy they are interested in. The country should be run on the direct say of the electors.

Well, I believe this approach just as much as I believe so many of the hon. Member's arguments on the rules. It is the application which counts, and since there is no application of political appointments of supporters of the N.D.P. to the Senate either now or in the foreseeable future, this cannot be other than a very bad state of affairs and it should be changed. I am absolutely convinced, too, that the honesty of the hon. Member will remain intact should he and his friends suddenly be in a position to make appointments to the Senate. His honesty would remain intact because he would be overwhelmed by the new arguments which his agile mind would suddenly find applicable to the new circumstances.

However, I do not wish to deal at any length with arguments for or against the abolition of the Senate, because the resolution really asks whether or not Senators should retire and proposes the manner in which this might be arranged. Most of us who were in the House when a bill to retire judges was brought down heard some valuable contributions on the question of how valid is the argument that retirement should be compulsory on the basis of age alone. I am sure there are many here who have met people considerably over the age of 75 who are as mentally alert as men half that age. Sometimes they are as physically fit, too. Indeed, most of us are acquainted with men unfortunate enough to have encountered the aging process early in life; we have seen signs of positive senility in people of 50 years of age.

There are considerations we must take into account before we arbitrarily pick a retirement age of 70, 75 or 80 years. The question is whether the age of 75 is the right age to pick? This question only arises when we decide there is need to apply an age limit at all. I think the same reasoning which persuaded this House to apply an age limit to judges should persuade us now that it is a good idea to apply an arbitrary age limit in the case before us. It is true we are likely to lose the services of some who are still rendering most valuable assistance and who, with respect to many of the subjects we discuss here, make more intelligent contributions than 75 per cent of the Members of this House.

By passing this Bill we are going to say that, no matter how valuable their contribution in the past, no matter what may be the treasure-house of knowledge, experience and wisdom that we might expect in the future from such great people as these, we must do without it because the danger of allowing people to stay on there is greater than any benefit we can experience.

I suggest that before the House can pass this measure we must recognize and accept that argument; and I do not advance that argument on the basis that these people are lazy, that the Members of the Senate go there to retire, that there is not in our parliamentary system a positive need for a second House. The question is simply that on the average and over the long run by the age of 75, even with the advance of modern medicine, we find that in the vast majority of cases men and women are so much past their prime that the odds are very long indeed that they will give that invaluable contribution that we ask from those senior Members in the second House. In other words, while we are getting to be a younger nation and perhaps the demands of youth are taking more prominence, the situation simply is that we want to retain all the experience and the benefit of the older, wiser and perhaps more stable people in our community, those who have gained pre-eminence and have earned an appointed which depends, not on popular vote, but is earned because of their dedication to public service and the confidence the Government of the day has in their devotion to our democratic systems and the belief in the use they will be to our Parliament. These are the qualities that give them their jobs; these are the qualities that we have asked them to have; these are the reasons, we say, that we rely on them implicitly.

Despite these qualifications and these reasons for their appointment, however, we are saying that we do not want an old fogey point of view, shall I say. We want a limit on the extent to which, shall we say, old age can influence their deliberations. Perhaps we want a limit on the length of time that a person may take to make up his mind. For any and all of these reasons, we feel that we cannot allow the Senate to take the risk of going beyond a certain age limit; that if we left the age limit off, the odds are that we will get an inferior type of person, rather than once in a while a really superior person of whom we, by this Act, would deprive ourselves.

I am a little puzzled, I must confess, as to why the resolution is directed at those who are going to be appointed after the coming into force of this act. I think the suggestion to the President of the Privy Council is a little unkind when we call it a bribe to get the present Members to retire, but I must confess that it does seem a most accurate description. As soon as I say that, I want to say that I do not mean it in any unfriendly way because the main argument is, I am afraid, that we do wish some who are now sitting, who are beyond that age limit, to retire. But there are many, or at least I believe there are some, who are beyond that age limit who have perhaps been improvident—although many there are very well off—and who took the employment in the belief that it was theirs for life, and that therefore they did not have to make other financial provision for a different type of livelihood when they had finished with it, who could not now support themselves, their wives or their families in anywhere near the manner to which they have grown accustomed. In fact there may be some who would find it extremely difficult to support their families in any fitting manner whatsoever. I think, then, to suggest, when it is said that we must do something for these people, that we are being unkind to call it a bribe, is perhaps not facing the realities of the situation. However, I am a little suspicious that this is a very small minority of those who would be affected.

From my personal knowledge of the Senate—and I am afraid I have not had the opportunity or the pleasure of getting to know as many as I would like, and of those I do know, there are some whose financial affairs I do not know very well—but from what I have gathered from meeting Senators and from talks with my colleagues, a great many Members of the Senate are not at all in need of financial assistance. That is an argument, of course, against the necessity for offering them a bribe. If a man is not in need of financial assistance, then a pension would hardly seem to be an effective bribe to offer him. It is only the person who needs a pension that would need, perhaps not a bribe to make up his mind, but a way in which it becomes economically possible for him to follow the expressed wish of Parliament. I think that is a very important distinction. I like to liken it to the difference between convicting the man who is innocent and letting guilty people go free.

It is a most important maxim of our law, in the conduct of our criminal courts, that it is better that ten guilty persons should go free than one innocent person should be punished. I think, in fairness to the President of the Privy Council, before we use the word "bribe" we should perhaps use this type of reasoning; that even if there were only one or two Senators whose retirement might be in the best interests of the country, because they are over age—and I suggest that those who are over age and should retire are perhaps not aware that it is they themselves who are the weak ones in the House—it makes it only just, and not terrible, that we should make it financially possible for them to retire; because when they took on the job it was a contract between them and the Government of a job for life. I suggest that if we substitute the compensation that the Government is going to pay them for their releasing the Government from their part of the contract, we are perhaps getting to—

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. Member but his time has expired.

Mr. Nugent: May I finish my sentence, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Does the hon. Member have the consent of the Committee to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nugent: I say, Mr. Chairman, that rather than a bribe it is compensation for their releasing the Government from the Government's obligations under the contract, and we will achieve what I would call a fairer description of the suggestion of pension for these people than the word "bribe" used by the N.D.P.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, it is not surprising that Members on the other side would like to get this resolution passed as quickly as possible, and with probably as little discussion as possible. I do not suppose in the years to come that there will be anything that this Party sitting on the other side, this great Canadian Party which has given such leadership to this country for so many years, will be so ashamed of as this proposal. I do not know for how many years—one would have to search the records—they have talked of Senate reform. Their great leaders, like Mr. Mackenzie King, could talk out of both sides of their mouths so ably that you could quote them on any subject; but they have told us what they would do and how they would do it. And what do we have here, Mr. Chairman? A proposal to bring in a bill which from now on means, after the bill is passed, that Senators will have to retire at age 75. But those great people now in the Senate can stay on or retire on an annuity of $8,000 a year.

I do not suppose in the history of Canada that there has been a worse group of Senators appointed to the upper chamber than those appointed by this Government in the short period of time it has been in office.

Mr. Brewin: That is because you are so familiar with them.

Mr. Orlikow: The hon. Member for Greenwood says it is because I am familiar with them. I hope that is the only reason; because it is inconceivable, to me at least, that worse ones were appointed in other years.

I am surprised by this, because there are some people in Canada who are Liberal Party supporters who do have ability. One has only to look at the universities of Canada to find a professor of history, or a professor of economics, or a doctor who is a Liberal. One would think, after all the fine speeches which have been made on the other side of the House, that some of these good people could have been appointed to the Senate since this Government took office so that they could have raised the standard of ability and quality in the other House.

I am not going to go into details today, but before this legislation passes we are going to put on the record the kind of people who have been appointed. One of the new Members is a very young man—I will not mention his name—who is still in his early forties. What is his great distinction, and the quality for which he has been appointed to the Senate—to a post where, as there seems to be something about the Senate which is conducive to old age, being in his early forties he can sit for another 40 years? What is his great quality or ability, this great service he can render to the Canadian people? He was the fund raiser in charge of the pork barrel of the Liberal Party in Ontario, which really makes him a good person to put in the Senate of Canada. That it the kind of person who has been appointed, Mr. Chairman.

What we have to realize with our present set-up, which will be such as long as this country is unfortunate enough to have the party opposite in power, is that we have a Senate, a second chamber, which has the kind of power which no other second chamber, to my knowledge, has in any other parliamentary system in the world. After all, in Great Britain, about whose customs and history we are so proud and which we emulate so often, in words if not in spirit, it is now almost 100 years, certainly more than 50, since the power of the House of Lords was clipped. The power of the House of Lords is very limited. I am speaking from memory, and I will go into this in detail at the appropriate time, but in the passage of legislation the matter becomes law on the second presentation to the House of Lords, whether that chamber agrees with it or not. But in Canada the Senate has practically as much power as the House of Commons.

These Senators are people who are appointed for life, many of them with very little qualifications. They have the right, the opportunity and the ability to stop cold legislation which the elected House of Commons may want to pass. Let this Government have the courage—which it has not—to propose a real medicare plan and you will see pressure brought upon the Senate from insurance companies and medical associations to cut the guts out of such a plan. And what will this Government do if it ever has the courage to bring that kind of legislation before the Senate? Nothing.

I would have thought that before this Government brought in this proposal it could have learned something from the Province of Quebec. There they have a second chamber, an appointed chamber. The government of Quebec wants to establish the principle—a very sound principle which I wish the Prime Minister would think about some time—that the second chamber should not have the power which the elected chamber has. Because the Executive Council of the Province of Quebec has refused to pass certain legislation, the Government of Quebec is going to the Queen with a proposal that the Queen enact legislation to reduce the power of the appointed Executive Council in the Province of Quebec. Why does not the Government of Canada, this so-called great Liberal Government, propose that the power of the Senate of Canada be reduced, as it has been in every other country which has a democratic system of government? They have not done so, Mr. Chairman, because they have not got the courage. They do not mind a second chamber which has the power and authority to keep in check any proposals which in future years may come from an elected House of Commons.

I should like to say on behalf of the Members of this group that not only will we oppose this resolution but that I hope, indeed I expect, that we will fight the Bill when it comes in, clause by clause. Because I think it is a farce, a disgrace and a fraud on the people of Canada.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Orlikow: Six o'clock.

The Chairman: It being six o'clock and in view of—

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, may we rise and report progress?

The Chairman: Shall I rise and report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED UNDER ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to Provisional Standing Order 39A, to inform the House that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock this evening are the following: the hon. Member for Danforth (Mr. Scott), industry, benefits of Canada-U.S. automobile agreement to Canadian consumers; the hon. Member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacInnis), labour conditions—

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, a question of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. Member for Timmins (Mr. Martin), income tax, acceptance of statements respecting charitable donations.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, on the thirteenth of this month when I gave notice to debate a matter pertaining to unemployment at Louisburg Mr. Speaker ruled, as reported in the last sentence on page 302 of Hansard:

> I am afraid there is nothing before the House to debate at ten o'clock.

This, Sir, constitutes a ruling on the request I made at that time. I was further informed that this matter was out of order. For some unknown reason this snap decision was taken. I made a legitimate request, one which I do not repeat at this time since the urgency of the matter has been removed. I see no reason why I should be put in such a position as this, having been denied the privilege of debating the matter according to the rules on the thirteenth, when it was ruled out of order by Mr. Speaker, and is now being brought forward, after some considerable thought on the part of the Speaker, who has now decided it is in order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I assume the hon. Member has unanimous consent of the House not to proceed with this question at this time. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles: I wonder whether, if the House is in an agreeable mood, we might not also agree to postpone the other items until tomorrow night, in view of certain uncertainties tonight at the end of the presentation of the Budget?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

He said: Mr. Speaker: It gives me a great deal of satisfaction to be able to report to the House, and to the country, on the state of our economy and of our national finances. There has been a great and encouraging improvement in economic conditions, and in the state of the budget during the past two years. This robust expansion must be continued. With the budget under control, we must use our fiscal policies to achieve the nation's goals. The primary objective now is a healthy rate of sustained economic growth.

[Translation]

I am glad to note that all regions in Canada have shared in this expansion. The Atlantic provinces and the province of Quebec, for example, have experienced substantially increased economic activity. I believe that it is in this context of a prosperous and expanding economy, benefiting all Canadians, that we shall best succeed not only in maintaining but in strengthening the unity of our great country.

[Text]

Economic Objectives

When this government first came into office we stated a number of economic objectives. Our first goal was a high level of employment for Canadians and the reduction of unemployment. The second was a high and sustainable level of economic growth. Third, we wanted a better regional balance in both employment and growth. We also wished to bring into closer balance our trade and other current international transactions. To realize these objectives, we recognized that our industry, especially our manufacturing industry, would have to become more vigorous and competitive. We expected that as unemployment was reduced and these other objectives achieved, we would also be able to move toward a balanced budget. Moreover, we sought over the long term to improve the degree of participation by Canadians in the ownership and direction of businesses operating within our borders and using our resources.

We may all take pride in the extent to which these goals have been achieved.

Almost half a million new jobs have been created since the spring of 1963.

Unemployment had fallen by last month to 3.9 per cent, on a seasonally adjusted basis, which is just about half the 7.7 per cent reached in the first quarter of 1961.

This improvement in employment was not confined to one or two favoured parts of Canada. During the past two years some of the most rapid increases in employment took place in those sections of the country where unemployment had been particularly high. The decline in the unemployment rate in the Atlantic provinces and British Columbia was of the order of one third between the last quarter of 1962 and the last quarter of 1964; in Quebec there was a reduction of one-quarter. In Ontario and in the prairie provinces unemployment by the last quarter of 1964 was down to about 3 per cent.

We have also had a rapid increase in the Gross National Product. In the two years 1963 and 1964, the value of the nation's output increased by 6.5 per cent and 8.9 per cent, or by a total for the two-year period of about 16 per cent. Incomes have improved materially. The value of construction of all kinds increased by more than 20 per cent from 1962 to 1964, and housing starts went up from 130,000 to 166,000—that is, by more than one-quarter.

• (8:10 p.m.)

In our dealings with other countries we have achieved a considerable improvement in our balance of trade and payments. Our deficit on current account in 1964 was less than one-third what it was at its peak in 1959.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All kinds of selective statistics.

Mr. Byrne: Sour grapes.

Mr. Gordon: This improvement was achieved not by restricting imports and travel by Canadians, but by a vigorous expansion of our exports. Our secondary manufacturing industry has accounted for an important part of this change.

The improvement in our international balance of payments, and indeed in our rate of economic growth in general, could not have come about if we had not been able to keep our prices and costs competitive. Canadian prices have risen less in the last two years than have those of any other industrial country in the world except the United States.

Along with these improvements in the performance of the economy we have been able to bring about a dramatic improvement in the federal budget. The 1962-63 fiscal year produced a budgetary deficit of $692 million. This has been reduced to $83 million for the fiscal year just ended.

If the accounts are translated into a form more suitable for measuring their impact on the economy, that is, into terms of the national economic accounts, the change in two years is from a deficit of $399 million in 1962-63 to a surplus of $332 million in the last fiscal year—an improvement of over $700 million.

These achievements have taken place against the background of the longest period of peacetime economic expansion we have enjoyed in the present century. However, the pace of our expansion has not proceeded without faltering. There was a noticeable pause in the advance at the end of 1962.

New Policies

In no small measure the strength of the expansion, certainly since 1962, is due to the introduction of new policies. The results achieved enable us to describe them as effective policies. They include:

(a) Strong incentives in the form of capital cost allowances to Canadian-owned manufacturing and processing companies installing new machinery and equipment.

(b) Similar inducements, together with a three-year tax exemption, for new manufacturing and processing companies to establish in designated areas of slow growth and high unemployment.

(c) Special arrangements to improve the efficiency of our automobile industry and to secure a fairer share of the total automotive production of North America.

Mr. Starr: Sixteen hundred laid off in Windsor.

Mr. Gordon: There seems to be a little noise, Mr. Speaker, but this will prove to be one of the most important policies ever introduced in Canada.

(d) Establishment of the Municipal Development and Loan Fund, to assist municipalities, with provincial approval, to accelerate their capital spending programs.

(e) Establishment of the Atlantic Development Fund of $100 million to stimulate economic activity in the Atlantic provinces.

[Mr. Gordon.]

(f) The highly effective $500 bonus for winter-built houses, and other increased help for housing and urban development.

(g) The provision of massive assistance to the provinces in the fields of technical and vocational training.

(h) The provision of guaranteed loans to students to assist them with their university education costs, and the provision of youth allowances to young people 16 and 17 years of age who remain in full-time education.

(i) A vigorous expansion in the loan programs of the Farm Credit Corporation.

(j) Increased amounts and improved terms for credits and insurance to finance a rapid increase in exports.

(k) Improved fiscal arrangements with the provinces to enable them to do their important part in a growing modern economy.

(l) And last, but certainly not least, there has been a monetary policy which enabled the demands of economic growth to be met without a tightening of credit conditions.

Partly as a result of such policies, the Canadian economy in the past two years has expanded faster, and unemployment has been reduced further than in the United States.

It might interest hon. Members to know that in the United States last year, 1964, the total output of the economy of that country increased by 6.6 per cent. In Canada the increase was one third as much again.

In 1964 unemployment in the United States was reduced by 7 per cent. The rate of reduction in Canada was almost twice that figure.

Current Situation and Outlook

The economy is currently in a very healthy state. Unemployment is at its lowest level since 1957. Our output of goods and services is at record heights and is still rising. Prices are reasonably stable. Our international competitive position remains strong. The capacity of our industry is being used more fully. Business confidence is reflected in the highest level of capital investment we have ever had. All areas of the country, almost all types of industry and agriculture, and most groups in the community are sharing in this advance.

Mr. Winkler: Is that why the farmers are coming to Ottawa on Wednesday?

Mr. Pearson: To get even more.

Mr. Gordon: I thought all the farmers were over there, Mr. Speaker, but they won't be like that after the next election.

We may view our prospects for the coming year with confidence. Canadians in the aggregate, both individuals and businesses, and their governments will invest and consume substantially increased quantities of goods and services in 1965.

• (8:20 p.m.)

The economies of the nations with whom we trade, subject to one or two exceptions, are continuing to expand, and the markets for our exports should continue to grow. We have sufficient productive capacity in Canada to meet our own needs and those of our trading partners. New investments now being made will increase our capacity to produce. And last—but of great importance—we have the most rapidly growing labour force in the industrialized world and it is better trained than ever before.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Thanks to Mr. Starr.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Even he couldn't keep a straight face.

Mr. Gordon: It is this growth in our labour force which provides the foundation for rapid economic growth in Canada. It also makes it necessary. This necessity for growth in order to put our young and rapidly growing labour force to work was the central feature of the First Annual Review of the Economic Council, published several months ago.

Economic Council Review

Honourable members will recall the main projections which the Council brought to the nation's attention: that between 1963 and 1970 Canada's labour force can be expected to grow by 2.7 per cent per year on the average; that the potential productivity of our workers—that is, output per person employed—can be expected to increase by 1.9 per cent per year; that, if the level of unemployment can be reduced to an annual national average of 3 per cent—which the Council regards as a realistic objective—and if we can catch up the lag in our productivity gains between 1957 and 1963—we can reach an average rate of growth in our production over this period of 5½ per cent. The Council points out how the achievement of this rate of growth would require and make possible rapidly expanding levels of consumer expenditures, government expenditures, business investment and exports.

The realization of the true potentials of the Canadian economy is a goal which all of us can accept. The problem has been, and will always be, to develop and put into effect the kind of policies needed so that each major part of the economy can make its full contribution. The Council has given us helpful advice in this regard.

There are, as the Council has pointed out, some especially difficult problems before us. Canada must train and place in the right jobs an enormous number of young people if we are to achieve the potentials the Council anticipates. Industry must grow at a pace which will provide these jobs and must increase its productivity. The capital must be found which industry, and governments, will require to finance this expansion. And above all, Canadians must find, and be efficient in competing for, the domestic and foreign markets for the goods which an expanded economy will be capable of producing.

To achieve all of this will be difficult enough, but our very success in doing so will itself pose problems. A higher rate of productivity is essential to the achievement of the nations's economic potential, and its ability to compete, but it means we have to find more markets to employ our manpower. Rapidly rising production generates more employment, but it could also lead to the large deficits in international payments which the Economic Council has projected in its model. These must be avoided.

Balances of Payments

We hear a great deal these days about the balance of payments problems of our friends the British and the Americans. The British problem springs in considerable part from the strain which has been placed on their productive capacity and which their recent budget is designed to relieve. The essence of the Americans' problem is that the very large surplus they earn in trade and other current transactions is substantially less than what is needed for the large scale private investment by Americans all over the world, in addition to the requirements of defence overseas and foreign aid.

Our problem is unlike either of these. Although we still have some room in our economy for increased production without undue strain, we continue to have a deficit in our current transactions with the rest of the world. To be sure, last year we achieved a trade surplus of $700 million. But we used up this surplus and more in servicing past debts, in paying dividends to foreigners, and in making other kinds of current payments. Our current operating deficit was, I am glad to say, lower than it had been for ten years. But it is still sizeable. Furthermore, last year we exported large quantities of wheat to Russia, and we cannot count on having such large markets for our wheat on a continuing basis.

Our persistent international payments problem is apparent not only in the total size of our current account deficit, but also in its structure. Last year our current account deficit with the United States reached nearly $1.7 billion. This was largely offset by a surplus of $1.2 billion on merchandise and non-merchandise trade with the rest of the world, including the large wheat sales to communist countries. These transactions still left us with a current account deficit of $453 million which we had to finance.

In order to provide jobs to match the quite exceptional growth of our labour force we will need high levels of capital investment in the next few years, higher than the present physical capacity of the economy can be expected to meet. I do not anticipate difficulties in financing outside Canada the moderate amounts really required for this purpose, but this dependence on foreign savings should not be permitted to persist indefinitely. The world is hungry for capital for investment both in developing and in industrialized countries. The major source of capital, the United States, is having to restrict its investments abroad. We would be foolhardy if we assumed that over the long term the capital needed to cover our continuing current account deficits, whatever their size, would always be ours for the asking.

Financial Markets

The performance of our financial markets during 1964 was remarkably good. Through the first half of the year, they weathered successfully the continuing uncertainties arising out of the United States' Interest Equalization Tax. Later they adjusted readily to the disturbances arising out of the United Kingdom balance of payments problems. In spite of these difficulties the Canadian capital markets handled a greater volume of new issues than in the previous year.

The substantial improvement in the federal government's financial position enabled us to reduce our demands on the market, thereby making room for other borrowers. The improvement in the government's position also made it easier for monetary policy to continue to give support to economic expansion. Interest rates were slightly lower at the end of the year than they had been at the beginning.

The House will recall that, at the time the United States' Interest Equalization Tax and the Canadian exemption were announced in July, 1963, the Canadian government stated its intention not to seek to increase Canadian exchange reserves through borrowing in the United States. During 1964 Canadian monetary and debt-management operations were undertaken with a view to their effect on Canadian borrowers who might seek funds in the United States, as well as with a view to domestic conditions. The interest rate differentials between Canada and the United States fell, during the course of 1964, to the lowest level for some time.

The financial disturbances at the time of the sterling crisis and the raising of the bank rate in Canada were not allowed to interfere with this development. In fact, the careful handling of that situation by the Bank of Canada considerably assisted in meeting this objective and keeping our capital market working effectively.

The past year was marked by a further evolution of the international financial machinery. Just as Canada benefited from the rapid assembly of massive financial assistance at the time of her exchange crisis in 1962, so Britain was the recipient of even more massive aid in the autumn of 1964. Canada was an active and major participant in this operation.

International Liquidity

During the year representatives of the government took part in a series of international discussions on world liquidity. The question at issue has been whether the total of international reserves, such as our own reserves of gold and foreign exchange, when combined with official international credit arrangements such as those provided by the International Monetary Fund or by arrangements between central banks, is sufficient to support the growing level of international trade and payments both now and in the years ahead.

As Minister of Finance I attended meetings of the so-called "Group of Ten" in Paris last June and of the Board of Governors of the International Monetary Fund in Tokyo last September. The most immediate result of these discussions is that the Fund itself is to be enlarged by a 25 per cent increase in the quotas of all members, plus special additional increases for member countries such as Canada whose growth has been well above the average. I have made it quite clear that Canada would have welcomed a greater increase than this in world liquidity in order to ensure expansion of world trade and payments without any drag or interruption.

Trade Policies

In the Budget Speech last year I described our preparations for the "Kennedy Round" of tariff negotiations in Geneva, and outlined the principles that would govern Canada's participation. The formal opening of the negotiations occurred last November when the offers of reductions in duties on industrial goods and materials were exchanged. Our delegation is now engaged in a detailed examination, with other delegations, of the scope for tariff reductions of mutual benefit.

The negotiations on agricultural products are only now getting under way. This means that for Canada, with its important export interests in agriculture, the Kennedy Round is not yet in full swing.

Consequently it would be premature to offer any firm or final judgment as to the probable outcome of this tariff conference. Nevertheless I believe there are real possibilities for important tariff reductions covering a broad range of our exports. We have a strong delegation in Geneva, headed by Mr. Norman Robertson, one of the most respected senior public servants of Canada. I can assure the House that our representatives will bargain vigorously and realistically to advance the interests of Canada at this conference. It is in our interests that barriers to trade throughout the world be progressively reduced.

There has been a good deal of interest recently in our trading relations with the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom has always been a very important market for Canadian raw materials and foodstuffs which Britain requires in great volume. For a wide range of such products Canada is Britain's nearest, and most reliable and cheapest source. As a result, our sales to Britain over the years have normally exceeded her sales to Canada.

In the last three years this excess has been increased because United Kingdom export markets in Canada were adversely affected, first by the devaluation of the Canadian dollar in 1962, and then by the Canadian import surcharges that were in effect for some nine months.

Understandably the British are concerned about the large deficit in their trade with Canada. We can appreciate this because we face the same sort of problem, but in a more exaggerated form, in our current account transactions with the United States. It would be better in both cases if increased exports enabled these large bilateral deficits to be reduced.

I am glad to note that for a good many products the United Kingdom has now significantly improved its position in this market. For 1964 as a whole its merchandise exports to Canada were $60 million more than in 1963. This improvement is reflected in a variety of British exports to Canada, of which automobiles are one of the most notable examples. Our imports of cars from Britain in 1964 increased by 100 per cent over 1963. Here is a real example of energetic British exporters adapting their products and their dealer and service organizations to meet the needs of Canadian consumers. We expect now to see further substantial improvement in the sale of British products in the Canadian market.

Federal-Provincial Relations

The achievement of Canada's economic goals—of our potential growth—will require the use of the whole range of policies available to us and to provincial governments and local authorities. These include not only general policies, fiscal and monetary, trade and industrial, but also particular policies. These particular policies are reflected in measures relating to the development and use of our natural resources, the education and training of our young people, the planning and proper use of our land, the develpment and the redevelopment of our cities and towns, and the proper planning and building of the roads and other utilities on which both our production and our living are dependent. That is necessary if business, labour, agriculture and other private interests are to play their full part in carrying forward the progress of our economy, and improving our productivity.

All this implies that the federal government must work with the provincial governments and that the latter, in turn, must work not only with us, but with the municipalities. The federal government's responsibility in the field of fiscal policy, monetary policy and trade policy is primary and indisputable. And that is as it should be. To work to best advantage, however, such policies should be co-ordinated with plans and policies in areas which come under provincial jurisdiction.

Moreover, we must recognize that the sum total of the effects of the fiscal policies of the provinces is also of national importance. The provinces and the municipalities together are now spending more than is the federal government. It follows that changes in provincial revenues and expenditures, and in their budgetary balance, have a major effect upon growth and stability in the Canadian economy. It follows too that the timing of their expenditure measures can be such as to contribute to a steady growth of production and jobs, or the reverse.

• (8:40 p.m.)

An essential part of the job of good economic management in Canada is to achieve a reasonable harmony in the policies of the different governments. That is why we spend much of our time, both Ministers and officials, in consultation with the provinces. For example, the Provincial Treasurers and Ministers of Finance met with me in what might be called a pre-budget meeting in December, in order that we might jointly review the state of the economy and compare our views as to its prospects.

During the next 18 months, the federal government and the provinces must also review and revise the federal-provincial fiscal arrangements between them in order that we can propose legislation for the five-year period commencing in 1967. It was for that purpose that the federal-provincial conference last year appointed the Tax Structure Committee of Ministers from Ottawa and from the provincial governments. The representatives of the eleven governments will examine the fiscal outlook of federal and provincial governments in an effort to determine the probable requirements of each of them in the six years ahead. We shall endeavour to find a division of the tax fields and a formula for equalizing fiscal capacity which will assure to Parliament and to each provincial legislature effective means of carrying out its own responsibilities under the Constitution.

Royal Commission on Taxation

During the same time that we are discussing and revising our fiscal arrangements with the provinces, we shall be making a thorough review of our own federal tax system—both in its general plan and in detail—with the aid of the report of the Royal Commission on Taxation appointed in September, 1962. Last year I said I expected the report would be published in time to find some reflection in this year's budget. Unfortunately the Commission was not able to conclude its work when it planned to do so, and now I do not expect the report to be available before fall. Consequently we are having to defer the thorough review of our tax laws until later.
